PREFACE.

THE first complete Catalogue of persons who had proceeded to Degrees in the University of Dublin was published in the year 1869. It contained the names of all those on whom Degrees had been conferred from the earliest recorded Commencements to July, 1866. A Supplement brought down the List of Degrees to December 16, 1868.

The present volume is intended to furnish a List of Graduates who have proceeded to Degrees from the beginning of the year 1869 to the close of the year 1883, a period of fifteen years. In this List there are incorporated, in alphabetical order, some additional names which had been accidentally omitted in the previous volume.

The Introductory Dissertation on "The College and the University" is from the pen of the late

PREFACE.

Right Hon. Sir Joseph Napier. It has been thought desirable to preserve it as an exposition of a difficult subject, proceeding from an eminent jurist, who, as Vice-Chancellor of the University, had occasion to study seriously the questions discussed in it.

INTRODUCTION.

THE COLLEGE AND THE UNIVERSITY.*

THE constitution of the University of Dublin, and its relation to Trinity College, have been a subject of controversy. Some questions that were generally supposed to have been settled have been recently re-opened. The Letters Patent of Her Majesty the Queen (21 Vict.) confirmed to the Provost and Senior Fellows of the College, and to the Chancellor or Vice-Chancellor, Doctors and Masters of the University, without any alteration or diminution whatsoever (save as therein provided), all such powers, rights, and privileges as by Royal Charters and Statutes had been given or granted to the Provost, Fellows, and Scholars of Trinity College, or to the University of Dublin, or which by long usage had been possessed.

The Introduction to the first volume of the University Calendar (1833) contains an instructive historical account of the foundation and settlement of the College. It afterwards states, that neither in the Charter of Queen Elizabeth, nor in the Charter of King Charles I., was the University recognised as a corporate body distinct from the corporation of the College: that the University was simply a College with University privileges and powers; and that the Provost and Senior Fellows of the College constituted the only Senate or University convocation which was recognised by Charter, and were entrusted with the same powers of electing Officers and conferring Degrees, which in the English Universities belong to a body consisting of Masters of Arts and Doctors in the higher faculties. A reference is therein made, in terms of unqualified approval, to a pamphlet published A.D. 1804 by the late Rev. George Miller, D.D., then a Fellow of the College, "for a complete and satisfactory discussion of the question about the distinction between the College and the University."

This discussion was afterwards deemed by the writer to be incomplete and unsatisfactory. In his introduction to the Book of Graduates published in 1869,* the same learned and much lamented writer (the late Dr. Todd) confuted the positions on which Dr. Miller relied in order to prove that the University was not a distinct body.

In this later publication reference is made to the official records, whereby it is shown that "the University consisted in Temple's time, as it does now, of the Chancellor or Vice-Chancellor, with the congregation of Doctors and Masters who constitute the Senate; and the Caput Senatus Academici." Temple was Provost of Trinity College from November, A.D. 1609, until January, A.D. 1627; and therefore the University and its Senate, as above described, could only have been constituted under the Charter of 34 Elizabeth, A.D. 1592.

This Charter consists of two parts—one relating to the College, designed to be (as described therein) 'mater Universitatis,' for the education, institution, and instruction of youths and students in arts and faculties; the other relating to the University that was to be brought into existence. The former provides an eleemosynary foundation for the support and habitation of a Provost, Fellows, and Scholars (whom it names), and their successors, and it constitutes these a body politic and corporate. It gives power to the Provost and majority of the Fellows to make laws for the government of the College, and to adopt such of the laws that were established in either of the Universities of Cambridge or Oxford as they should consider to be suitable to themselves. The latter part of the Charter confers on the studiosi of the College the privilege of obtaining Degrees of Bachelor, Master, and Doctor, “juxta tempus idoneum,” in all the arts and faculties. It gives power to the Provost and major part of the Fellows to prescribe the preliminary acts and scholastic exercises; to appoint “omnes personas pro hujusmodi rebus melius promovendis,” whether Vice-Chancellor, Proctor, or Proctors, and to elect the Chancellor, except the first, who is named in the Charter as having been appointed by the Queen.*

In interpreting this Charter it is proper to consider the circumstances under which it was granted, and which must be supposed to have been present to the mind of the Queen and her official advisers at the time of making the grant. Express reference is made to the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford; and the clause in which power is given to elect the proper officers, for the purpose of having Degrees conferred, must be taken to mean such as there were in these Universities for the like purpose. Three of these officers are expressly named—the Chancellor, Vice-Chancellor, and Proctor or Proctors. A like reference is impliedly made as to the Degrees, and the “idoneum tempus” at which they were to be conferred—et sic de similibus.

As to the meaning of “Universitas,” there are two reliable authorities. Dr. Cowell was the Regius Professor of Civil Law in the University of Cambridge. He published a work, that was printed at Cambridge, A.D. 1607, in which he gives the following explanation: “Universitie (Universitas) is, by the Civil Law, any body politic or corporation; but, in our language, it is (at the least most ordinarily) taken for those two bodies that are the nourishers of learning and the liberal sciences, Cambridge and Oxford." Another learned civilian (Dr. Ayliffe), a very high authority, in a treatise on the state of Oxford, published in 1714, states and proves that Oxford had the title of 'University' before the reign of Henry III. He adds that, "by legal grants, all Professors and Students incorporated into a body politic, in the Latin tongue called Universitas, do bear this name, and become hereby a republic of learning." He comments on and rejects other explanations of the word University.*

I have therefore been led to conclude that, inasmuch as the College is described in the first part of this Charter as 'mater Universitatis,' and express reference is made therein to the Universities of Cambridge and Oxford, and in the latter part a like reference is plainly to be implied, the University to be brought forth was intended to be constituted on the model of these, so far, at least, as related to what belonged to a 'Universitas,' in its then accepted meaning.

The Colleges in these Universities were adjuncts or accidends thereof. They were the later, the Universities the earlier institutions; but here, both the College and the University had to be created under the Queen's Charter, and, from the nature of the case, the College had to take precedence. It could not, indeed, be considered as having been intended to be an accidental adjunct to the University, but it might well have been designed to be subsidiary, by providing a tutorial system, in subordination to a professorial, and thus affording what, according to Sir W. Hamilton (post, p. xxiv.), is "the condition of an absolutely perfect University."

The designation of "mater Universitatis" was appropriate, as well because the studiosi, who were to be admitted to take Degrees, were to be supplied by the College, as because the prescribing of the preliminaries and conditions of graduation, the appointment of University officers (except the first Chancellor), and the making of regulations for conferring Degrees, were confided to the governing body of the College.

Although the actual creation of the University was, under the provisions of the Charter of Elizabeth, only effected by the instrumentality of the College, it does not follow that the University is not to be considered as having been founded by the Queen herself. What was done in pursuance of the Charter was done by the Queen's authority, and is deemed in law to have been done by herself. It has long been settled by law that the Sovereign, in erecting a corporation, may either name the officers and corporators, of his or her own authority, or by express words empower others to do so.

The distinction between the founding of the College and the founding of the University should be clearly understood. There were available means of completing the foundation of the College at once and directly; but the case was different as to the University; for although in legal intendment it was founded by the Charter, it had afterwards to be brought forth by the College as its 'mater.'

If the Charter of Queen Elizabeth be looked at, without reference to what was done under its provisions, it is likely to be (and it often has been) misunderstood to have merely founded a College with University privileges. But when the whole matter shall be duly considered, it will appear that the University designed by and constituted under this Charter was intended to be and was a distinct incorporation.

The power given to the Provost and Fellows, with reference to the conferring of Degrees, sufficiently implied a power to make such subsidiary regulations as were not unreasonable, nor against any rule of law, but were suitable to the purpose for which the express power was given. These were made and were entitled "Consuetudines seu Regulæ Universitatis Dublinensis, pro solenniore graduum collatione." The meaning of Universitas, as then and now understood, is shown by the prescribed form of supplication for a Degree.

In Barrett's MSS. the learned writer says—"The Crown

vested in the Provost and major part of the Fellows the power of transacting everything about the conferring of Degrees, and consequently that of framing University Statutes, or, as they are called, Consuetudines seu Regule Universitatis Dublinensis, pro solenniore collatione graduum. Under this grant, Temple drew up his Statutes for that purpose [i.e. pro solenniore graduum collatione], and so must the author of these Regule (whoever he was) have done. Acting under this authority, which being derived from the Crown may be called Royal, Statutes so made seem to me not to require any further confirmation or interference. Accordingly, I know no instance where the Crown interfered in making or changing any of them. Acts of Parliament indeed imposed certain oaths at Commencements, &c., but this was not making any new law or Statute, and in the Testimonium is mentioned as additional to the exercises imposed per leges et consuetudines." (Barrett MSS. 355.) The propriety and reasonableness of these Regule are clearly shown by Dr. Todd in the Introduction to the Book of Graduates, p. xviii. n.; p. xxix., pp. xxxii. xxxiii. They were recognised as the 'leges Academiæ' in the Statutes of King Charles I., cap. v. They have been recognised not only by the Crown but by the Legislature.

The Charter of King Charles I. is dated A.D. 1637. It is important to bear in mind how matters stood at the time when this Charter was granted. The 'Universitas' designed by the Charter of Queen Elizabeth had been constituted by the Provost and Fellows of the College in pursuance of its provisions. The Senate was governed by a code of regulations drawn up and approved under the power impliedly granted. A period of gestation (if I might so say) had been required before the University could thus have been brought to the birth. As the design was that it should come from the womb of the College, privileges had been conferred on the studiosi, and powers given to the Provost and Fellows of the College, by which provision was made for the constitution and continuance of a proper staff of University officers, and of a body of accredited teachers. It may, therefore, be said that the College was adorned or invested with the privileges of a University. But after the holding of Commencements (which first took place A.D. 1600, juxta tempus idoneum, i.e. seven years after the foundation of the College), the University was brought to the birth, and thenceforth it was distinct from, although dependent on, its mater—the College. As thus constituted, and as it then existed, it was recognised by the Charter of King Charles I. as ‘Academia sive Universitas.’ The Chancellor, who had been described in the Charter of Elizabeth as Chancellor of the College (at a time when the University existed only in intendment and consideration of law) is designated in the Charter of King Charles I. as Chancellor “Academiæ sive Universitatis prædictæ.” This Charter creates the distinction of Senior and Junior Fellows, and makes the Provost and Senior Fellows the governing body of the College. It gives to them the power of nominating, electing, and admitting the Chancellor, Proctors, and all other officers ‘ad Academiam spectantes,’ save the Vice-Chancellor—he is to be appointed by the Chancellor. To them the power is given by the Statutes of King Charles I. (cap. iv.), “ut graduum collationes definiant et concludant.” The leges Academiciæ (as already observed, that had been framed under the Charter of Queen Elizabeth, are recognised in these Statutes, cap. v. (Barrett MSS. 357.)

This code, much of which was taken from the Statutes of Trinity College and other Colleges in Cambridge, prescribes (inter alia) a course of discipline and tutorial instruction for undergraduates (cap. xv.), which has since been largely amended and improved. In cap. xxv. the College is again described as ‘mater Universitatis.’ The Chancellor of the University, or (in his absence) the Vice-Chancellor, together with the Archbishop of Dublin, are made the only Visitors of the College, with large powers of supervision. Where power is given to the Provost and Senior Fellows to make new decrees, ‘in casibus omissis,’ it is required that they should have the consent of the Visitors. In cases of doubt as to the interpretation of any of the College Statutes, provision is made for a reference to the Visitors, whose decision is to be final and conclusive.

It would seem that the framers of this code looked upon the College as subsidiary to and connected with the University, so as to secure completeness of instruction in arts and faculties. The University is not the less a distinct body because the College supplies the studiosi whom it prepares for their first Degree in Arts, and for availing themselves of the teaching of the Professors of the University, to qualify them for the higher Degrees. It would be strange, if not absurd, to have designated the College as ‘mater Universitatis,’ if the University was not to be regarded as distinct from the College; but it may have been truly said that Queen Elizabeth founded and endowed the College, “et Academiæ privilegiis ornavit.” This is all that is said on the subject in the preface or preamble to the Caroline code of Statutes for the College, in which the ‘leges Academiæ’ are expressly recognised as the code of the University. In the Charter of King Charles I. there is nothing whatsoever to indicate that the College and the University were not to be considered as distinct, though not independent bodies.

In the exercise of their powers, the governing body of the College appointed the University officers (except the first Chancellor, and, after the Charter of King Charles I., the Vice-Chancellor); they prescribed the preliminary acts and exercises for obtaining, and provided suitable regulations for the conferring of, Degrees, by which a concurrent voice was given to the Senate of the University. This was not only a confirmation of the fitness of those who obtained Degrees, but was also a guarantee to the public that the power confided as to the conferring of Degrees was properly exercised.

One corporation may be made out of another; and under the same Letters Patent or Royal grant, a body corporate may be constituted for a limited purpose and to act concurrently or conjointly with another body. The governing body of the College could act with the Senate of the University in relation to the conferring of Degrees, without prejudice to the distinct character and constitution of the two corporate bodies of the College and the University.

So far the intention is manifest that the University should be a distinct but not an independent body. With its appropriate head, its succession of Doctors and Masters, its perpetuity of privilege, its proper Officers, its Senate, its Professors and Schools, and its leges Academiae, it is (as it seems to me) a distinct incorporation.

The late Lord Chancellor Blackburne, on the 11th December, A. D. 1858, when he was Vice-Chancellor of the University, communicated to the Senate a formal and deliberate opinion, in which he observed that "through the agency of the Chancellor or Vice-Chancellor, and other proper officers, for whose perpetual appointment the Crown had made ample provision, the power to grant Degrees was insured to continue for all time. The state of things" (he said) "that had continued for above 250 years was in exact conformity with the intention these provisions indicate. That, in addition to these and other considerations of a similar kind, it was to be kept in mind that the Legislature and the Crown, from the earliest period down to the time of the last Charter (21 Vict.), had recognised and treated the University as a body corporate; but what was directly to the purpose was, that the Charter of the Queen recognises and perpetuates all the functions and duties of the University, and its means of exercising them in their full integrity."

The authority of so eminent a Judge, whose attention had been specially directed to this subject, when he was Vice-Chancellor of the University, not only before but after the granting of the Letters Patent of 21 Vict., naturally led me at the time to accept this exposition as final. But as the learned author of the introduction to the Book of Graduates, published A. D. 1869, propounded a view of this subject which not only was at variance with this opinion of the late Vice-Chancellor of the University as to its corporate character, but also impugned the received opinion as to the import of certain parts of the Charter of Queen Elizabeth, I felt that, having succeeded to the office of Vice-Chancellor, I was in some degree called on, if not bound, to consider the several positions which he put forward, and the arguments and proofs which he offered in order to sustain them.

In the Introduction to the Book of Graduates, it is more than once asserted that the University of Dublin is not a body corporate. It is true that an eminent lawyer gave an opinion to this effect, when consulted on this question, in the early part of the year 1858. But this was known to, and had been considered by, the late Vice-Chancellor of the University before he drew up the opinion that he publicly communicated to the Senate at the end of the same year. His great learning and judicial experience, as well as the soundness of his judgment, give an impressive authority to his deliberate exposition.

In this Introduction it is said, that "the true ancient notion of a University was a special society of students, although not in the strictly legal sense a Corporation." It might suffice to say that the material question is not as to the ancient notion, but in what sense was the word understood by the advisers of Queen Elizabeth and of King Charles I. at the time of granting the Charters?

The case of the University of Paris is referred to, and a passage is cited from Halmagrand on the origin of that University, in which this writer says that it was formed of itself by the association of its members, and that it never had either a Regal or Papal Charter. It does not follow from this that it was not a corporate body. Blackstone says that, by the Civil Law, corporations might be created by the mere act and voluntary association of their members, provided such convention was not contrary to law. Perhaps it is more accurate to say that such bodies could not assume a corporate character without the consent of the head of the State. It stands confessed that the University of Paris has been recognised by both Sovereigns and Popes, and has been granted many privileges under the name of a University. Savigny, in his work on the Roman Law of the Middle Ages,* in terms describes the University of Paris as a Corporation of teachers; and he contrasts it with Bologna, which he describes as a Corporation of scholars. These were the two oldest Universities. Merlin treats the old French Universities as corporations. In a learned treatise of Professor Bluntschli, of Heidelberg, on Universal Constitutional Law,† he describes Universities (especially in Germany), as they stood at first, “in the juristic-corporate sense of the word, beginning with single sciences; and, as they have become organic institutions, embracing and developing to full ripeness the entire higher scientific culture.” He explains in a lucid manner the important influence of their corporate character, in securing the independence and the mental freedom that the successful study of science demands, and for which, corporate self-dependence (he says) is an excellent foundation. He sets forth the principal corporate privileges: the last to which he refers is the representation which is conceded to the Corporations of the Universities in the Council of the Nation, which (he adds) “is quite as much corresponding to its great importance for the spiritual life of the Nation, as serviceable for discerning deliberations on legislation.” The whole of the extract, for which I am indebted to my friend Mr. Droop, of Lincoln’s Inn, late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, will be found in the Appendix.‡ From these and other authorities, it appears that the true ancient notion of an University included the corporate foundation. Sir William Hamilton, therefore, has well described the ancient Universities as “cosmopolite corporations.” The great authority of Savigny may suffice as to the particular case of the University of Paris. Halmagrand (on whose authority Dr. Todd has relied) was a medical writer, not a jurist.

It will be seen from what Ayliffe has said in the extract given in note A, as well as from what has been stated and explained by Professor Bluntschli, that the name of University did not originate in a 'Universitas Studiorum.' Its primary and etymological meaning is an aggregate whole; it is the generic name of a body corporate. In Paris it was applied to a body of teachers; in Bologna to a body of learners; and in Oxford and Cambridge to a like body of masters and scholars. It is quite true (as Dr. Todd observes) that the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge were first incorporated by Act of Parliament, about twenty years before the date of the Charter of Queen Elizabeth, under which the University of Dublin was founded. But he has not adverted to the reasons which made it expedient to have this Act passed. They are stated by Sir E. Coke.* He states that each of the Universities had divers courts, jurisdictions, and powers, by the Charters of the Kings of this realm, divers of which were not grantable by Charter, but by Parliament only; which being espied, Queen Elizabeth, who (he says) excelled all others of her sex in knowledge, both divine and human, for the love and affection that she had to her Universities, and with a view to settle and secure their rights and privileges, and quiet all controversies, procured the passing of this Act, in order to confirm these rights and privileges. They were incorporated by a certain name in the Act, "albeit" (as Coke adds) "they were ancient corporations before." The Act refers to the Letters Patent previously made by the Queen or by any of her progenitors or predecessors, "to either of the said corporated bodies severally." Throughout, it recognises them as corporations theretofore and then subsisting, and confirms all their powers, rights, and privileges, that they might prosper in their study with quietness, and be free from vexatious controversies.

The Letters Patent of King James I. (A.D. 1613) may here be adverted to. The main purpose seems to have been political, as part of a plan for increasing the Borough representation in his new Irish Parliament. They speak of the College as 'mater Universitatis,' and afterwards deal with the University and the College as one institution, proper to be represented in Parliament as one of the new Boroughs. They also speak of other Colleges and Halls to be erected in the said University; thus treating the College and the University as distinct. Few of the native studiosi of the College had at that time obtained any of the higher Degrees; and as the College (but not the University) had property with which it had been endowed, and as its influential members were Englishmen, it may have been considered important, as a matter of State policy, to keep the two bodies so bound together as to afford a sufficient pretext for making a new Borough, in which the members of the corporation of the College would be the electors. Whatever view may be taken of it, it could not vitiate the construction of the Charter of Queen Elizabeth, much less that of King Charles I.

I am not aware that there is any other reason put forward by Dr. Todd in support of his statement that the University is not a Corporation. Dr. Miller, indeed, contended that, as a name had not been expressly given to the University by either Charter, this was a decisive objection to its claim to be a body corporate. This is akin to the objection that there was no express grant of a common seal. It has been settled (at least from the time of Lord Chief Justice Holt) that it is sufficient if the name may be implied from the nature of the thing. The maternal name, i. e. the University of Trinity College, is that which is used in the treaty and the Act of Union between Great Britain and Ireland; and the local name—the University of Dublin—is found in the title and heading of the Regulæ that were drawn up by Provosts Temple and Bedell; in the Queen's Charter (21 Vict.), by which the rights and privileges of the University have been confirmed; in the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 53, which speaks of "the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, and Dublin"; and in the 31 & 32 Viet. c. 112, in which it is called "the Borough of the University of Dublin."*

No precise form of words is required to make a corporation. The instance to which Sir Edward Coke refers, in order to sustain this position, is much to the purpose in the present discussion. Of the Corporations that have been established directly by the King's Charter, the guilds seem to have been among the most ancient. Cowell says that one of the meanings of the word 'guild' is, a "fraternity or company combined together by orders and laws made among themselves by the Prince's license." Sir E. Coke says that it signifies "contubernium seu fraternitas incorporata." "I have seen" (he says) "the Charter made by King Henry I., textoribus Lond., by which he grants to them that they shall have guildam mercatoriam; and a confirmation of it made by Henry II., by which Charters they were incorporated." In order to show that it was not necessary that a corporation aggregate should have a head, he relies on the case of the guilds as decisive. "For at first" (he says) "the greater part of Corporations were bodies without any head, by force of these words, guilda mercatoria." He had in a previous case stated that "the King may erect guildam mercatoriam, i.e. a fraternity or society or corporation of merchants, to the end that good order and rule might be by them observed for the increase and advancement of trade and merchandise."

When a corporation has been duly created, there are incidents which are tacitly annexed. These include the privileges of suing and being sued, taking and granting property, and having a common seal. Although often expressly given, they may well be left out, for they are implied by law.

* In the Letters Patent of 1 Geo. III., where the University of Oxford is described as celeberrima Academia Oxoniensis, the University of Dublin is described as Academia illus- trissima Dubliniensis. See also 33 Geo. III. c. 21, s. 13: Letters Patent 34 Geo. III.; 40 Geo. III. c. 84, s. 11. References might be multiplied.

The 'guilda mercatoria' was a corporate body, distinct from that in which the local government of the place was vested. It was one of a class of lay corporations erected for the better carrying on of divers special purposes (to use the words of Blackstone); and in this class he ranks the general corporate bodies of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

'Universitas,' as importing a corporate body, whether of accredited teachers and matriculated learners, or of either, constituted for the purposes of instruction in arts and faculties and for the advancement of learning, is surely as much entitled to have its import allowed in a Charter of the Sovereign, as the word 'guilda' in the case of merchants or traders. And the more so, where the other provisions plainly indicate the intention that the society or fraternity shall be perpetuated without disruption of its continuity, or interruption of its franchise. Cowell's work was published a few years after the date of the Charter of Queen Elizabeth, and about thirty years before the Charter of King Charles I. His explanation of 'Universitas' may, therefore, be taken to be what had been and then was the accepted and applied sense of the word in England. It is but reasonable to suppose that it was used in this sense in these Charters. It plainly was so used in the title of the 'Regulæ,' and in the formula of supplication for a Degree. In addition to this, the recognition by the Crown and the Legislature to which the late Lord Chancellor Blackburne has referred seems to be sufficiently decisive.

The next position which I proceed to notice is as to the true import of that part of the Charter of Queen Elizabeth that relates to the privileges of the studiosi. Dr. Todd, in his 'Introduction' to the Book of Graduates, says that the real meaning of this part has been generally misunderstood, and that it seems to have been misunderstood even in the Charter of King Charles I. He contends that the studiosi were not only invested with the privilege of obtaining Degrees, on fulfilment of the conditions prescribed, but that the power was given to them, and not (as commonly supposed) to the Provost and majority of the Fellows, to elect, create, nominate, and ordain the University officers, such as the Vice-Chancellor, Proctors, &c.; whilst the election of a Chancellor (after the first) was confided to the Provost and major part of the Fellows. In order to sustain this contention, he sets out in a note (p. xxii., d) what he describes as “the whole passage of the Charter.” But in the text of the same page of this Introduction it will be found that the sentence with which his extract begins is said to be immediately connected with a clause that is before set forth (p. xx.) He gives a sufficient reason for omitting from his extract the clause that intervenes, inasmuch as it merely defines the duration of a Fellowship, and is not relevant to the question as to the studiosi. But I cannot find any reason for the omission of the preceding clause which is relevant, and with which the clause he places at the beginning of his extract is (as he has admitted and pointed out) “connected.” In fact, the omission of this clause made it necessary for him to insert the word [studiosi] in brackets in the first clause of his extract. This word is taken from this omitted clause. In order to prevent any misconception or mistake from unauthorised punctuation or otherwise, I have extracted the whole passage as it stands in the original Charter, from which I have had it copied, and with which the copy has been carefully collated. It is as follows:—

“Et cum gradus quosdam in artibus et facultatibus constitui literis fuisse adjumento compertum sit, ordinamus per præsentis ut studiosi in hoc Collegio sanctæ et individuae Trinitatis Elizabethæ Reginae juxta Dublin libertatem et facultatem habeant gradus tum Baccalaureatus Magisterii et Doctoratus juxta tempus idoneum in omnibus artibus et facultatibus obtinendi. Hoc semper interim proviso, ut cum hujus Collegii Socii septem integros annos post gradum Magisterii ibi assumptum adimpleverint, tum e Sociorum numero amoveantur, ut alii in eorum locum suffecti pro hujus Regni et Ecclesiæ beneficio emolumentum habeant. Et ut intra se pro hujusmodi gradibus assequendis habeant libertatem omnia acta et scholastica exer-citia adimplendi, quemadmodum Præposito et majori parti Sociorum visum fuerit. Ac ut omnes personas pro hujusmodi rebus melius promovendis eligere, creare, nominare, et ordinare possint, sive sit Procancellarius, Procurator, aut Procuratores (nam Cancellarii dignitatem honoratissimo et fidelissimo Consiliario nostro Guilelmo Cecillio Domino Baroni de Burghley totius Angliæ Thesaurario delegatam approbamus) et ut posthac idoneam hujusmodi personam cum defuerit pro hujus Collegii Cancellario Præpositus et major pars Sociorum eligant ordinamus.”

The second sentence, ‘Hoc semper . . . habeant,’ may be put in a parenthesis, or omitted altogether, as suggested by Dr. Todd. The remainder may then be divided into two parts; the one part governed by the ‘ordinamus’ at the opening; the same word at the close governing the other. The point of separation of the two parts is at ‘Ac ut.’ The subordinate clauses dependent on the same ‘ordinamus’ are, in each case, connected together by ‘et ut,’ while ‘ac’ is used to connect the two main sentences. The words ‘ut omnes personas ordinare possint’ are naturally connected with the second ‘ordinamus,’ not with the first. ‘Præpositus et major pars Sociorum’ may properly be taken as the nominative to ‘possint,’ as well as to ‘eligant.’ Dr. Todd’s more limited extract does not contain the first ‘ordinamus,’ and therefore ‘et ut visum fuerit’ appears in it to be connected with the second ‘ordinamus.’ His view that the studiosi were to elect the Vice-Chancellor, Proctors, &c., was never acted on. In the Introduction to the University Calendar, A.D. 1869, to which he specially refers as “containing a clear and concise history of the different Charters,” this power of election is stated to have been given by the Charter of Queen Elizabeth to the Provost and major part of the Fellows. No instance has been shown in which the studiosi claimed or were allowed to exercise this power, to which if they had a right, they could not have been deprived of it, without their consent, by the Charter of King Charles I. We have the record of the appointment of Ussher to the office of Vice-Chancellor, A.D.

1614, and his re-appointment, A.D. 1617. In both instances he was appointed by the Provost and Fellows. The former of these was made and confirmed in the same form as the election of the Chancellor, A.D. 1612.*

Thus we have the ‘contemporanea expositio, quæ est optima’; and this was adopted by the framers of the Charter of King Charles I. It is, at the least, reconcilable with (if not required by) the grammatical construction of the whole passage as it stands in the Charter of Queen Elizabeth. It may be admitted that the studiosi of the College are to be regarded as dependent members of the University, having inchoate privileges and rights of protection. But, however they may stand in relation to the corporate body of the University, their right to appoint any of the University officers is a different question. “It may seem strange,” says Dr. Todd, “and to modern ideas it is strange, that the nomination and election of officers of so much importance as the Vice-Chancellor and Proctors should have been committed to the general body of the University, consisting of all graduates, and even of matriculated undergraduates. But this is quite consistent with the ancient notion of a University, and is an evident proof that all matriculated students, as well as the graduates, were regarded as members of the University in the sense that has been explained” (p. xxiii.). He cites from Halmagrand (p. 67) a passage, in which it is said, as to the University of Paris, that “the Rector, who was supreme governor, and chief president of all the faculties, was chosen by the lowest of them all, the faculty of arts, which included undergraduates.”

With reference to the University of Paris, the authority of Savigny is distinct, and ought to be decisive. In the passage to which I have already referred, in which he contrasts the constitution of the Universities of Paris and of Bologna, he says “there is found from the earliest time a remarkable contrast. In Paris the corporation consists of all the teachers; these are in possession of all power, and of scholars, as merely subject members of the little state, no mention is made." In another part of the same volume of his learned work (p. 348) he controverts an opinion of Bulæus, that besides the assemblies of regent masters and of regents and non-regents, there was another assembly which included the students; but Savigny says that Bulæus could not point out a case in which such an assembly had been held, and that the grounds for the opinion appear to be, first, an incidental statement in a manuscript treatise of unknown date and origin; second, the very usual official phrase, "Universitas Magistrorum et Scholarium." "But this" (he adds) "proves nothing, as in any case the students belonged to the University as dependent members, even if they had no voices in it, but were only represented by the Professors. This explanation is confirmed by a resolution, A.D. 1250 (Bul. vol. iii. p. 356), the preamble of which has the formula 'Rector et Universitas Magistrorum et Scholarium,' but the conclusion of which is, 'Datum Parisiis, in nostrâ congregatione generali Magistrorum, tum regentium quum non regentium.'" With reference to the election of the Rector, Savigny says: "The Doctors of the three Faculties could neither themselves become Rector nor take part in the election; both were reserved for the Masters of the artists."

The earliest Statutes of Oxford are supposed to have been nearly a wholesale adoption of those of Paris. A regulation, attributed to the date A.D. 1250, requires that every scholar shall have his own master, on whose roll (matricula) his name must be entered, and of whom he shall hear one lecture daily.* Amongst the Statutes of Cambridge, there is one said to be "ante annum 1276," by which a scholar was required, within fifteen days, to inscribe himself in the matricula of some Master of Arts.† I do not find that in either of these Universities the studiosi had any voice in the election of the University officers.

† Documents relating to the Uni-

The next matter upon which Dr. Todd comments is as to the power of adopting any of the laws established in either of the Universities of Cambridge or Oxford. This he considers to be a power given with reference to the University, and not a power of adopting such laws for the government of Trinity College.

The clause in question is found in the part of the Charter which expressly provides for having laws for the good government of the College. The University had not been previously referred to except where the College is described as ‘mater Universitatis.’ The words of the clause are not ‘leges alterutræ Academiæ,’ or ‘ex alterutrâ Academiâ,’ but they are “et ut quasounque leges bene constitutas senserint in alterutrâ nostrâ Academiâ, modo sibi aptas et accommodas judicaverint, intra se stabiliant.” As they stand in their place in the Charter, and when taken with their context, they seem to import that, in settling laws for the government of the College, the Provost and Fellows might select from the laws of any of the Colleges in either of the English Universities such as were adapted to themselves, i.e. to their own College. This was the “contemporanea expositio” of the Charter by those who at the first had to exercise this power. In recording the reasons given by the Provost and Fellows for declining to surrender their Charter, Provost Temple speaks of “their Chartered privilege of procuring from the University of Cambridge copies of the best orders and laws in any of their Colleges there; and according to their said privilege, they have, upon obtaining from thence of so worthy a pattern and direction, made and enacted a certain number of Statutes for the good government of the said College—approved of by the Visitors and by the Chancellor.”* In a previous page his words are given thus: “We have been warranted by our Charter to entertain and establish for the government of the College any good and fit law observed in Cambridge" (p. 100). In another page the Statutes 'pro regimine Collegii' are spoken of as "framed after the best laws in Cambridge." In the Charter of King Charles I., where the power of making or establishing laws for the government of the College is taken away from the governing body, and reserved to the Crown in future, both parts of the clause in the Charter of Queen Elizabeth (the one as to making such laws, and the other as to adopting any of the 'leges constitutas' in the University of Cambridge or of Oxford) are recited, and then the Charter proceeds to take away 'hanc potestatem.' If this did not include both, why were both recited? The 'leges Academiæ' were not interfered with.

By the recent Charter (21 Vict.), the power of altering, amending, or repealing any of these 'leges Academiæ,' and of making new laws from time to time for the like purpose, is expressly given to the Provost and Senior Fellows; but, in order that such alterations or additions may be binding upon the University, it is required that they shall have received the sanction of the Senate in Congregation lawfully assembled.

The result, then, appears to me to be this:—

1. That the College has certain University privileges which have been conferred on its studiosi and on its governing body.

2. That the University (properly so called) is a distinct corporate body.

3. That the studiosi have not, and never had, the right to elect any of the principal officers of the University.

4. That the governing body of the College had the power of making the 'leges Academiæ,' with reference to the conferring of Degrees, and were not confined to the adoption of laws of either of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge.

5. That the true intent and purpose of the Charters and Statutes is, to deal with the College and the University as integral parts of one educational institution, in which a complete course of instruction in Arts and Faculties is to be provided.

Arts, according to the scholastic meaning, may be taken to include every description of knowledge that contributes to train the mind and faculties of man. Hence it has been said, “Universitas fundata est in artibus.” In this department regard is had to the training and development of the capacities of the student; he is dealt with as an end unto himself. In the professional departments his education is regarded as a mean towards an end that is ulterior to himself. The undergraduate course is, naturally and properly, a tutorial preparatory system, with an exact discipline for training the studiosi. It has special and appropriate studies, and progress is tested by periodic examinations. The student, trained and disciplined under the tutorial system of the College as the fit preparation for the special studies of a profession, may afterwards store his mind in the schools of the Professors of the University. In the course of his collegiate and tutorial training, a selection of studies has been made, with a view to the proper purpose of this preparatory discipline; and when he emerges into the professorial system of the University, provision is made for his progress. In both, the fulfilment of the prescribed conditions of graduation requires to be tested by examination or by other means that are suitable and practicable.

“A Tutorial system” (says Sir W. Hamilton), “in subordination to a Professorial, we regard as affording the condition of an absolutely perfect University.”* He had spoken of Degrees as “solemn testimonials that the Graduate had accomplished a regular course of study in the public schools of the University, and approved his competence by exercise and examination”; but that this had declined. He complains of the retention of privilege, where the distinction is nominal.

That the foundation in Arts has been well and truly laid, is testified by the Bachelor's Degree; and, generally speaking, this represents a reality. As to the higher Degrees, in some instances, the case is different, but it ought not to be so in any. The eminent German Professor, to whose learned work I have before referred, has not failed to observe that "many Faculties have at times contributed to destroy the credit, and therewith the value of academical honours, even those of the Doctorate, by squandering them on candidates who were not worthy of such distinction." It is by making the tests of fitness for the higher Degrees efficient for the purpose, that the distinct status and functions of the University will not only be more clearly apprehended, but more generally appreciated. The opportunity and course of instruction in the different schools and lectures may be collected from the clear and full explanation of the whole curriculum of College and University education to be found in the University Calendar. It exhibits the important and distinctive functions of the University (properly so called), and the relation in which it is intended to stand to the College.

It has been supposed by some that a University with but one College is an anomaly. On the contrary, a University with several Colleges is more unusual. There are Universities in Scotland and elsewhere with each of which only one College is connected. It appears from the Report of the Commissioners of 1863 under the Universities (Scotland) Act, that, after the most mature deliberation, they came to the conclusion that it would be impolitic and inexpedient to merge these Universities into one, having a central examining board. "The greatest apprehensions," they say, "were manifested of any steps being taken to deprive the Universities of the exercise of their ancient privilege, not merely of conferring Degrees, but of conducting the examinations for them. They were unable to see" (they add) "that any corresponding advantage is likely to be derived from so serious a step, as is implied in reducing the ancient Universities of Scotland from the position of Universities, and converting them into Colleges of a new National University." This Report is signed by some of the most competent laymen in Scotland, including his Grace the Duke of Argyll.*

[The references to Blackstone will be found in vol. i. pp. 470-6; to Sir Edward Coke, in the City of London's Case, 8th Rep. 125 (a); Case of Sutton's Hospital, 10th Rep. 30 (a)-33 (b). To these may be added, Rutter v. Chapman, Meeson and Welsby's Rep. vol. viii. pp. 88-90; Reg. v. Scott, Jebb and Symes' Rep. vol. ii. p. 488; Jones v. Galway Commissioners, Irish Law Rep. vol. xi. p. 435; the College of Physicians v. Salmon, L. Raymond's Rep. vol. i. p. 681.]

The right of the University to have a Common Seal, under its foundation Charter, was formally certified by the late Vice-Chancellor of the University (Blackburne) to Sir Bernard Burke (Ulster), and the Arms on the Seal were allowed in due form at the instance of the Chancellor of the University (the late Lord Primate).

* The distinction between the College and the University, in the case of the University and College of Glasgow, was considered in a suit which was commenced in 1807, in which this distinction was judicially established. In the course of the proceedings, Dr. Duigenan, among other witnesses, was examined as to his status in the University of Dublin as Professor of Law.

NOTE A, PAGE VI.

John Aylyffe.—Ancient and Present State of the University of Oxford, 1714.

Page 2. After citing old documents and seals to show that the word University, and the name of the University of Oxford, were used before Henry III.'s reign, he proceeds thus :

“So that these are irrefragable proofs that these schools of learning, and even those at Oxford, were honoured with the title of Universities long before the foregoing epoch of time ; but the word University did not at first signify so much the place of study as the society of students therein placed. And in this sense the lawyers use it at this day ; for, by legal grant, all Professors and Students incorporated into a body politick, in the Latin tongue called Universitas, do bear this name, and become hereby a republick of learning. Some persons, indeed, affirm that these publick schools first received the name of Universities, either from the Universality of sciences taught therein, or if all sciences were not therein read and taught, yet (say they) such as were read and taught there ought to be heard and read, ab universis scholaribus, by all the scholars therein resident. And Erasmus, too, to humour his fancy, will have them styled Universities, because Professors in the Universal parts of learning read lectures there ; and thus were these august seats of knowledge in the foregoing style called Universities, which style (some say) entirely prevailed from Pope Leo's time to the reign of Richard II., when the word Academia began to be restored, yet not so as to bring the ancient name of University into disuse.”

It may here be observed that, in the Year Book of 11th Henry IV., fo. 47, pl. 21, it is said that it would be unreasonable to prevent a master from holding his school, “unless it was in case where a University was corporate, and Schools founded from ancient time.” The law requires ‘a place of corporation.’

“An University” (says Lord Chief Justice Wilmot) “is a great school incorporated to instruct by their professors and regular exercises all who come to study there, and by Degrees to give their students rank and credit in the republic of letters, and which are qualifications for lucrative offices and employments in life. It is a public school of Divinity, Physic, Law, and all Arts and Sciences. And Colleges are schools of learning, furnishing scholars for the universal school, which is a combination of all those schools; and in any other view than as schools of learning, they are as useless to society as monasteries.”*

NOTE B, PAGE XIII.

Allgemeines Staatsrecht. “Universal Constitutional Law,” by Professor Bluntschli of Heidelberg, vol. ii. p. 367 (4th edition).

“The Universities having sprung up first in Italy, and in the beginning only with reference to single sciences, have in modern times, and especially in Germany, become organic institutions, embracing and developing to full ripeness the entire higher scientific culture, have grown from mere Universities, in the juristic-corporate sense of the word, to Universities of the sciences.”

Page 368. “The University requires scientific self-dependence, for the higher science unlocks itself only to complete mental freedom. For this, its corporate self-dependence is an excellent foundation. But here we meet with an important contrast between the middle ages and modern times. The former loved and protected corporate self-dependence to such an extent, that it was raised to complete independence and a kind of sovereignty. But this is at variance with the modern State, the unity of organization of which requires the subordination of all public corporations, and which claims a certain supervision and guardianship, even over the highest institutions of culture. In the English Universities the mediæval freedom has also in this respect maintained itself longer, but even there the spirit of our age admonishes the State to exercise the rights of superiority (Hoheitsrechte) which belong to it. On the Continent, the modern principle of State curatorship has already long since been practically carried out. The guardianship of the Church has also been everywhere obliged to yield to the State, and only with reference to the theological faculties, whose importance for the education of the Clergy closely touches the Church, a certain co-operation, and, in part, co-superintendence is either still conceded to her, or not without some justification claimed by her.

“What has remained, or is worth preserving in corporate self-dependence, consists principally—(a) in the possession and the administration of separate property, even if under the superintendence of the State. The outward existence of Universities is by this means in a higher degree protected from the perils of various kinds to which the public finances of the State are more exposed, and at the same time a free and respected social position is secured to the University; (b) in a separate administration of justice, which, indeed, within the modern State, must submit to a more complete subordination and narrower limitation than in the middle ages, and can only continue in the form and fashion of scholastic discipline; (c) in the honour which the corporation has a right to expect from the State (it has no claim to external power, but a well-grounded one to honour, corresponding with the degree of the scientific spirit), and in the academic honours which it bestows itself. Neither of these is duly estimated always and everywhere. Many faculties have themselves at times contributed to destroy the credit, and therewith the value, of academical honours, even those of the doctorate, by squandering them on candidates who were not worthy of such distinction; and the State, instead of preventing such abuses, has refused to respect such honours, and thereby again destroyed an important element of moral-mental order. Also, the mode in which particular States have arranged the precedence of Universities and their members shows that there also true insight is often wanting; (d) in the representation which is conceded to the corporations of the Universities in the council of the nation, and is quite as much corresponding to their great importance for the mental life of the nation, as serviceable for discerning deliberations on legislation.”

“Mem^m. That Mar. 2, 1614, Doctor Ussher was chosen Vice-Chancellor by the Provost and Fellows, and the next day he was confirmed and approved touching this choice by the whole Senate of the University.” The form seems to have been the same as was used in the election of the Chancellor (Archbishop Abbot). In the same Register it is stated that he was chosen by the Provost and Fellows on 27th August, 1612, and that this choice was published and notified in a solemn congregation of Regents and Non-Regents, called to that end and purpose. There is another entry in this Register in which the re-appointment of Ussher is stated. “Memorand. That July 3, 1617, Dr. Ussher was again chosen Vice-Chancellor by the Provost and Fellows.” Each of these entries is signed W. Temple, Prov.

With reference to the grammatical construction of the passage in the Charter of Elizabeth (p. xviii.), under which these elections took place, it has been suggested by more than one competent classical authority, that the ‘contemporanea expositio’ is preferable to that of Dr. Todd.

By one of these it is said that, according to Dr. Todd’s view, a new sentence, completely separate from the preceding, and in which the principal verb has a different nominative, begins at ‘et ut posthac,’ &c. The parenthesis, then explaining why the office of Chancellor is not specified with the others to be elected by the studiosi, is connected with the preceding sentence; but the parenthetical explanation would be quite irrelevant and unmeaning in such a place, if it was never intended that the Chancellor should be elected by the studiosi, as the next sentence shows to be the case. The parenthetical explanation (differently worded perhaps) would naturally come in after the ‘posthac’ or ‘defuerit,’ but would be altogether inappropriate where we now find it. The structure of the whole paragraph, on the other hand, is plain and natural, if there is no full stop at the end of the parenthesis, and if the principal verbs in both clauses, ‘possint,’ ‘eligant,’ have the same subject, ‘Præpositus et major pars Sociorum.’

Another observes that it would have been a strange distribution of power to have given to the Provost and Fellows the power to make regulations as to Degrees, and at the same time to vest the appointment of the officers who were to carry out these regulations, and even the determination as to what kind of officers should be appointed, in the studiosi. Moreover, the studiosi were a perfectly undefined body, consisting, at first, mainly of undergraduates, and quite unfit to exercise such powers, according to the notions which prevailed in Elizabeth's time, as now, in the English Universities. The reason given for excepting the Chancellorship from the offices to be filled in the first instance would be illogical and insufficient, if the subsequent nomination was to be conferred upon a different body, the Provost and Fellows, instead of the studiosi.

Dr. REEVES has suggested that an explanation of the Term “Commencements” might be useful to some readers:—To take the highest Degree in each Faculty is described in the Old Statutes as Commencing in that Faculty, i.e. commencing as a Teacher or Doctor. Thus the supplication of a Candidate for M. A. is, that the completion of certain exercises “sufficient ei ad INCIPIENDUM in Artibus”; and so for D. D., that 20 years spent in the Study of Theology “sufficient ei ad INCIPIENDUM in S. Theologia”.—See the Supplicationum formulæ (Univ. Stat. cap. 11). But for the lower Degrees, A. B., B. D., M. B., &c., the phrase used is, AD RESPONDENDUM QUESTIONI in Artibus; in S. Theologia; in Medicina; &c. Hence the term COMMENCEMENTS, because the Candidates were said to commence, when they took their highest Degree in each Faculty. [The singular form COMMENCEMENT is less correct. The Latin word is Comitia.] “Incipere, Doctoris gradum adipisci,” apud Bulaëum tom. v. Hist. Univ. Paris, p. 911. “Incipiens, Doctorali infula donatus”. Ap. Bulaëum, l. c., p. 913.—See Du Cange, Gloss. Med. et Infim. Latinitatis, ed. Carpentier, in voc.
