The merchant tailor is a creator. He manufactures no stock. He deals with the individual. Every garment he makes is different from every other he produces. Each suit he designs for the same man is unlike any previous order. He deals in individualities. No two patrons ever have precisely the same thing from his work-rooms. He measures his customers' ages and positions as well as their bodies. He instills youth into a young man's garb and sobriety into his father's. He mirrors the spirit of the man in the clothes ho gives him. This is only possible in merchant tailoring-in the highest type of tailoring. It differs on the broadest possible basis from stock suits, the lines and shapes of which have already been determined so inflexibly that the individual must reverse the logical process and fit himself to the ready-made garments.
