MEMORIAL.

DEACON SMITH BAKER.

BORN JUNE 17, 1791; DIED JULY 3, 1871.

Deacon Baker was a man of great physical activity and endurance, constantly engaged in business and toil till the last few months of his life. His energy of character, force of will and uncommon self-control gave him unusual executive ability, making him a natural leader among men, and he was called to positions of trust by his fellow-citizens, in the town, the church and other situations of importance. He was Deacon of the First Congregational Church in Litchfield for many years; also President of the Board of Trustees of the Academy, of which he was one of the founders and most generous supporters. He had strong convictions and was an independent thinker, passionately fond of an argument and loving to reason out his own conclusions, which when he had reached he grasped with all the tenacity of his strong will and warm heart. Assertions never moved him; thus he was just the man to defend a weak cause against majorities, which he lived to do and often did, as his natural ability in argument and gift of expression was far above the average. Young men sought him to assist them in their discussions, and sometimes he was called to plead in questions of local interest against gentlemen of the legal profession. One of his Pastors, the Rev. Benjamin Smith (who was as dear to him as an own son,) remarked, "that he never knew finer talents only needing the advantages of early culture, to bring them into greatness." He was thoroughly fearless and independent, enjoying to be on the "other side," rather than seem to be governed by another.

A public-spirited generosity was another characteristic of his nature, and more than any other one he led in the educational and reformatory interests of the community where he resided. He loved to give to others and deny himself that he might give, doing always as much if not more than his share of toil for them; indeed he had a most hearty contempt for the man who would not sacrifice his own comfort for the public good, and with two or three others of like spirit in his own community and thousands of others scattered all over the hills of New England, he toiled to rear and sustain the church and the school for the benefit of the public as he would toil for his own family.

His honesty and purity of character were never doubted. His morality was of the Puritan style with very little fellowship with many of the modern ways and habits of society. He was thoroughly religious, loving what are called the old doctrines of the Evangelical School, and his religious duties were placed first. Neither pleasure, business nor friends were allowed to interfere with his family, social or sanctuary devotions. The first and deepest impression his unspoken allowed to interfere with his family, social, or sanctuary devotions. The first and deepest impression his unspoken influence made upon the members of his family was the strength of his religious purpose, and that the uppermost desire of his heart was, all about him should become Christians. He never failed to give and leave this impression, not so much by the words he said as by the spiritual atmosphere in which he lived, for he was positive in his silent as well as spoken influence.

He had enemies, but they were few, and of two classes: Those who opposed what he considered to be right. Such found in him a foe worthy to be met, one they respected the more when the contest was over. One such from whom he differed in religious sentiment, the temperance reform, and party politics, remarked that he was the toughest and most Christian foe he ever had, a remark which well represents the strength and balance of his character.

His other enemies were a few of that class of persons who have neither mental or spiritual energy enough to be positive on moral questions, and who, in the religious life, seek to be considered religious without professing religion. Such people could hardly rest under his decided and earnest words and still more decided and earnest life. His whole example was a constant rebuke to lukewarmness or cowardice in religion, and their course rather awakened his mirth for their timidity, his pity for their littleness, and his contempt for their opposition. He said he liked to have an apple either sweet or sour, and it was hard for him to respect a man, in particular a young man who had no ambition, and he admired (as most sensible people do) a decided sinner more than a passive, inactive good man, if such there can be.

He was a deeply spiritual man, and for the last ten years of his life had an unusual experience of the Divine favor, living in an atmosphere of prayer and communion with his Master. Spiritual things became real to him, and in the truest and highest sense he enjoyed religion—so much so that it was a means of grace to be with him as he prayed or told of his hopes, for he had reached a plane above the common Christian life, and not being naturally of a hopeful disposition, all his victories were the result of the deep spiritual experience. His soul seemed filled not only with a constant joy in God, but with a tender anxiety for souls, which rested like a sweet burden upon his heart, and an all-embracing charity for others, in particular those who differed from him or said unkind things about him; such did not know how out of a loving heart he prayed that no bitterness of feeling might be between them, and only those who knew something of the strength of his will could understand how complete was the triumph of grace in his soul by which he endured all and controlled himself, when, but for the love of God, there would have been at least a righteous indignation.

We who heard his family prayers saw how he communed with God, longing to depart and be with Christ, there to meet her with whom he lived in wedded life for fifty-six years, as a weary child longs to find its mother's arms and rest there. He had often expressed the wish that when the time of his departure came he might fall asleep and awake in eternity; and thus on the afternoon of the third day of July, 1871, after a brief illness, remarking he would try and have a little rest, he slumbered and in his sleep passed out into the world of glory. While the body rested the angels took the ripened spirit to its home. Thus died an honest, brave and holy man, who was never afraid to confess his Lord or perform his duty to his fellow-men, and when we followed his body to the tomb, his plain but strong features looked more kingly than ever, like a warrior who had finished his battles and found his throne and crown.

And now, though the time grows longer since he left us, the more we miss him, his words, his prayers and his visible presence, for he made spiritual things seem more real and brought God nearer to our hearts than any other man we have seen or expect to see.

MRS. MARY S. BAKER,

Wife of Deacon Smith Baker.

BORN AUGUST 24, 1791. - - - - DIED MAY 27, 1867.

“The deceased was a mother in Israel. She was a woman of strong, robust constitution, great energy, activity and benevolence of character, cheerful and youthful in her disposition, firm and decided in her religious convictions, and peaceful and hopeful in her Christian experience. She was a favorite with the young and a cheerful companion for the aged. The weary traveller for many years found her table and her house a home-like resort, and beneath her roof was a prophet's chamber, where the Sewalls, Tappans and Thurstons of former days were accustomed to rest.

“The last few weeks of her life were those of great physical suffering, but borne with Christian patience and resignation. Among her last expressions were such as these: ‘More than fifty years ago I found Christ precious, but he is more precious to me now.’ ‘We shall meet again in Heaven.’ Again—‘God has forgiven my sins and given me peace in believing. When the Lord calls, I am willing to go.’ ‘Oh, that I might go to-day.’ And thus she rested in Christ.”—Boston Congregationalist.

The following is a brief extract from the sermon preached at her funeral by Rev. J. T. Hawes:—

“But what have we to say of that ‘mother in Israel’ whose lifeless form has this day been committed to the grave to await the resurrection of the just? Not a few of the ministers of Christ, living and dead, can say of her what Paul said of a godly woman in his day, ‘She hath been a succorer of many, and of myself also.’ She was ‘given to hospitality.’ I well remember the ‘ministers’ tavern’ in yonder not far distant house, some thirty years ago; a house which was ‘not forgetful to entertain strangers;’ a house where the servants of the Master, ‘for his dear sake,’ never failed to find a ‘cordial welcome.’

“But why do I speak of this? Because I am one of the many who have occasion to bear it in grateful remembrance. I am not here, however, to eulogise her character. Eulogy would afford no music to the ear that is cold in death; nor will the spirit that has gone to God stoop to the accents of a mortal’s praise. But neither private affection nor public sentiment would be wholly satisfied should no notice be taken of one who has so long moved in the midst of this community, and who will be so widely missed, and so deeply mourned, in the circle of domestic and social life. Here she was born, here she lived, and here she died, dwelling among her people for more than ‘three-score years and ten.’ That she was an affectionate wife in whom ‘the heart of her husband could safely trust’; that she was a devoted mother, loving her children, and beloved by them; that she was a kind and obliging neighbor, and a sincere friend to all, I need not say. More and better than all, she was a sincere and hearty Christian, a woman ‘professing godliness,’ and practising it. She had a cheerful spirit—I know not whether this was natural or acquired—always disposing her to make the best of everything. She looked on the bright side of life, when the cloud was darkest. She remembered that it had a ‘silver lining.’ Her faith was strong, and her hope firm. When she came near to death, it had lost its sting. The gloom of the grave did not disturb her, for it was despoiled of its victory. The victory was hers, ‘through our Lord Jesus Christ.’ ‘Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord from henceforth; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them.’”
