Major-General Hodsdon gave notice that the several regiments in his Division (Third) of Militia would be reviewed on several days in the month of September, and that it was the intention of the Commander-in-chief to be present during six of the days. After giving various directions to the officers in regard to their respective duties, and to Major Watson, of the Corps of Artillery, to cause a salute of thirteen guns to be fired from "the ordnance of the highest calibre" on the arrival of the Commander-in-chief in the villages of Belfast and Bangor, and on his approach to the parade grounds, the Major-General concludes in this characteristic manner:

The Major-General deems it unadvisable to call the attention of the troops to the performance of any particular evolutions, presuming rather that they are too well acquainted with their respective duties to require it; but will, at the time, direct in person the performance of such manoeuvres and evolutions as the discipline of the troops and other circumstances may require.

The Major-General was an exceedingly enthusiastic chieftain and a martinet, and did not hesitate at reviews, if he saw any defect or want of promptness in the manoeuvres, to take the command from the Colonel for the time, and give the orders himself, much to the disgust of that officer.

On the 16th of August the friends of the Administration, in convention at Garland, nominated Samuel Butman, of Dixmont, as their candidate for Representative to Congress, and Solomon Parsons, of Sebec, as candidate for Senator.

The Opposition convention on the 20th, at Dexter, nominated Major-General Isaac Hodsdon as their candidate for Representative to Congress, and Daniel Wilkins, of Charleston, as candidate for Senator.

Andrew Jackson was now coming into favor with the politicians who called themselves Democratic Republicans, and the Register, in order to prevent the editor of the Eastern Republican coming into favor with the people, accused him of hating Adams, and with not daring to avow it.

In the course of the administration of President Madison, dis-integration commenced in the two political parties then existing—the Federal and Republican—in consequence of questions which arose in the War of 1812. Mr. Monroe, a Republican, was elected in 1816, with great unanimity, and in 1820 was re-elected with hardly any opposition. Every Electoral vote was given him, except Governor Pluman's, in New Hampshire. During his last term—the “era of good feeding”—the parties from various causes became demoralized, and when a new candidate was to be nominated in 1823, old partisans of the Federal school affiliated with partisans of the Republican school, in the support of either Adams, Calhoun, Clay, Crawford, or Jackson. There was no choice by the people, and John Quincy Adams was elected by the House of Representatives.

During the administration of Mr. Adams party principle generally had less to do with the elections than the personal merits, popularity, or successful manœuvring of the candidates, as has been seen during the pitiful crimination and recrimination in several campaigns in the Penobscot Congressional District. But, fortunately, this state of things was not to continue forever. The elements — Federal and Republican — that had been opposed to Mr. Adams openly and secretly, were combining for the purpose of effecting a strong organization to operate against him in the next election and to nominate candidates as party candidates. When the organization came into existence it adopted the name of “Democratic Republican,” in contradistinction to that of “National Republican,” which was adopted by the supporters of Mr. Adams.

The Eastern Republican was the offspring of the movement in this District, as has been before stated.

There was much anxiety among the friends of Mr. Adams that the State delegation in Congress should be opposed to him. The nominee of the Democratic Republicans had always been opposed to Mr. Adams, and although yet they were quiet in regard to their preference as a party, there was not much doubt that secretly they were unfriendly to his re-election, and, if they should succeed in electing General Hodsdon, they would declare at once for Jackson.

At a town meeting on the 27th of August, it was voted to purchase the Samuel E. Dutton farm for the purpose of establishing an alms-house. It was purchased and converted into the Poor Farm.

The people of Bangor were grieved to learn that a party of Indians, who had encamped on the banks of the Androscoggin, not far from the village of Brunswick, were attacked by a gang of villains on August 18, who burned their camps, clothing, etc., and nearly frightened them to death by their yells and outrageous conduct. The citizens of Brunswick, however, were prompt to clear themselves of the suspicion of countenancing and outrage, by calling a public meeting and appointing Benjamin Orr, Jeremiah O'Brien, John McKeen, Ethan Earle, Ebenezer Everett, Robert Eastman, and Charles Packard, a committee to ascertain from the Indians the amount of their loss and to spare no means to detect and bring to justice the perpetrators of the disgraceful act.

The discussion of the merits of the several candidates was very much more unobjectionable during the present canvass, since the organization of the two parties than before, as in all cases a warfare is less bitter between open enemies than it is between ostensible friends.

The meeting for the choice of Governor, Representative to Congress, and other officers, was held on September 10. The votes cast in Bangor for Governor were: for Enoch Lincoln 90; scattering 4. For Representative: Samuel Butman 110, Isaac Hodsdon 43; for Senator, Solomon Parsons 138, Daniel Wilkins 36, scattering 10. For Representative to the Legislature, Joseph Treat 95, Gorham Parks 39, James Tilton 33, Bennock 3.

Mr. Lincoln was re-elected Governor, Mr. Butman was elected to Congress, and Mr. Parsons Senator. Mr. Butman received 1,926 votes, General Hodsdon, 1,427.

On the 8th of September Mrs. Mary Howard died. She came to Bangor with her husband, Thomas Howard, in 1772, within three years after the first settlement of the town. She had lived with her husband sixty-two years. From the time she came to Bangor her family had lived upon the lot upon which she and her husband first settled (16, Holland's survey), and there her daughter Mary, the first white child in Bangor, was born. She was an energetic and intelligent woman, and a worthy member of the Methodist church. Her age was eighty-one.

A company of light infantry in Brewer, called the Washington Guards, first made its public appearance on September 19, under the command of Captain Jonathan Burr. A standard was presented to it at the house of Deodat Brastow, from the ladies, by Miss Mary Ann Burr, with a patriotic address. Ensign Watson Holbrook received it and assured the ladies that “this consecrated symbol of Columbia's pride should never be insulted with impunity; and the breeze on which it floated should resound either with our dying groans or shouts of triumph.”

After the close of the ceremonies the ladies and company sat down “to an excellent dinner provided by Mr. David Doane.”

The circus made its appearance again this month at Mr. Hutchins's hotel, and entertained the lovers of such things with a grand display by six beautiful horses, ground and lofty tumbling, Shetland pony, hunted tailor, etc.

Hops were first raised in the county this year, and became an article of export. Mr. David Damon, of Stetson, raised upwards of four thousand pounds, which he brought into Bangor in bales.

In October Madame Anna Royal, a somewhat notorious character, whose occupation was to show herself and write people up and down, visited Bangor. She kept a “black book” in which she had the autographs of many famous persons of the time, and recorded the names of such others as she became acquainted with, favorably or unfavorably, as the notion seized her. With the editors she chose to be on good terms, and was very complaisant towards them; but the missionaries were too honest to flatter her, therefore were not favorites. Her opinion of Bangor was not in the main favorable, and perhaps the town was not strikingly benefited by her visit.

At this time there was much excitement in regard to the arrest of Mr. Baker, at Madawaska, by Mr. Miller, High Sheriff of the county of York, New Brunswick, and his imprisonment in Fredericton gaol, on the charges "of having stopped the British mail, resisting a British peace-officer in the discharge of his duty, and for exciting and stirring up a spirit of sedition, insurrection, and revolt amongst the people."

The American account of the affair was that Baker had a deed of his land from Messrs. Coffin & Irish, Land Agents of Massachusetts and Maine; that the Provincial mail-carrier proceeding over his land, was forbidden by Baker to pass over it in future, as he was holding his land under American title. He then caused the American flag to be raised.

This was deemed an insult by the Provincial Government, and they sent the High Sheriff, with deputies, militia officers, and others, numbering forty all told, in fifteen canoes. Baker made no resistance, and was incarcerated as before stated.

The Provincials had exercised other jurisdiction over the Aroostook country, such as summoning the American settlers on the Madawaska to answer for trespass on the Crown lands, seizing the cow of a debtor on the Aroostook River, forty miles within the American line, and in other ways.

Mr. Baker was afterward sentenced to imprisonment for six months, and to pay a fine of $750 for obstructing the passage of the mail.

The proceedings of the Provincial authorities had become so offensive that loyal Americans who could get away, were leaving. Mr. Dalton, an Aroostook settler, was not willing to live where such a state of things existed, and sacrificed his house, thirty acres of cleared land, the products of the season,—150 bushels of wheat, 200 of potatoes, 75 of corn,—barn and farming utensils, worth $700, for $184.38, and left for the West. On reaching Bangor he stated that "the inhabitants were in constant fear, and dared not sleep in their houses."

The counties of Hertford, Devon, and Cornwallis, in Lower Canada, at separate meetings, passed resolves that that part of the country was surcharged with inhabitants; that there was an extent of land containing a superficies of about fifteen leagues, on the waters of the St. John, fit for the formation of "a new establishment" upon, and offering an "opening for the superabundant population of the ancient establishments." But that their "neighbors of the United States could not see without coveting the fine plains of this part of North America, that the measures for the establishment of this part of the province are unhappily arrested by the pretensions of the Government of the United States to the lands from the sources of the St. John to from two to twelve leagues from the banks of the St. Lawrence, and that it is for the greatest interest of Lower Canada generally, that the just rights of His Majesty upon this extensive country be properly recognized and established." The Quebec Gazette said that the future importance of Lower Canada depended entirely upon the decision of this question—"that it would no longer be anything if they took from it fifteen hundred leagues of its territory in one of its most fertile parts."

On October 13 William V. Cram gave notice of a meeting of subscribers for the erection of a Methodist meeting-house "at the Old School-house" on the east side of the Kenduskeag, on the 25th.

On the 22d of October the Commander-in-chief issued an order by Samuel Cony, Adjutant-General, in which he announced that he had inspected and reviewed fourteen regiments in the counties of Waldo, Hancock, Penobscot, Somerset, and Oxford, and that he was "enabled to speak of their appearance as proof that Maine was not disposed to abandon or neglect an institution by means of which the Independence of this country was achieved." The watchword is, "Militia of Maine, march forward."

A meeting to consider the matter of building a Unitarian meeting-house was held on October 25.

On November 3 Dr. Elisha Skinner died in Brewer, at the age of seventy three. He came to Brewer (then a part of Orrington) in 1787, from Mansfield, Massachusetts. He entered the army in the early part of the Revolution as surgeon's mate, and was shortly promoted to the office of surgeon, which he held until the war closed. His service was in the Southern army. He was a good and faithful surgeon in the army, and a successful physician in private life. When he died he was deacon of the Congregational church in Brewer, and was for many years Master in the Rising Virtue Lodge of Free Masons.

Samuel Veazie and seven others published a petition to the Legislature for incorporation as the Orono Canal Company, to make a canal on the westerly side of the Penobscot at the falls and rapids at Indian Oldtown; and Thomas Bartlett and others published a petition for a road on the westerly side of the river from Oldtown to Howland, which they declared was "loudly called for."

Charles S. Davis, of Portland, was appointed by the Executive to inquire into the nature and extent of the difficulties on the frontier and to act in behalf of the State.

Governor Lincoln issued his proclamation on the 9th of November, referring to the arrest of Baker and other infringements on the rights of Maine by a foreign power, and exhorted to forbearance and peace, so that the preparations for preventing the removal of our landmarks might not be embarrassed by any unauthorized acts.

The Northeastern boundary question attracted much attention at this time, and several papers were published over the signature of "A Citizen of Portland," in the Portland Advertiser; of "Cato," in the Ellsworth Courier, and "Terminus," in the Bangor Register, setting forth the American argument very ably and clearly.

There was fear at this time that the questions of the boundary, fisheries, and the colonial trade would lead to war between England and America. The two nations had long been rivals in commerce and were beginning to be so in manufactures. Great Britain could not bear a rival. It was a proud and supercilious nation. The English people loved war. According to Sir John Froissart, at the time of the attempted treaty at Amiens in 1391, they were "fonder of war than of peace," and they had not as yet given much evidence that Christianity had produced a change in them for the better.

The submission of the boundary question to an arbiter was under consideration, it is true, but it was rather too much to expect that England would submit to a decision that was not favorable to that nation.

Isaac R. Park, the sign painter and author of the famous transparencies that figured on the occasion of the celebration of John Quincy Adams's inauguration; Mr. Jacob Chick's Fourth of July, and at other times, according to his own account, came near being lost to Bangor and the world about this time. He engaged a man "at an extra price" to convey him safely across the river at Oldtown, and therefore sat still, and did not deem it necessary to take thought for his safety until he found himself near going over the falls "from this world into eternity on Tuesday, 20th November." His navigator deserted the batteau, leaving him no means to get on shore; so he was saved by accident. In his opinion that man was "only fit for a journeyman for old Charon, who ferries across the river Styx." He tendered his thanks to the gentlemen for saving him "from going to the world of spirits before he got ready," "not being able to distinguish or call all of them by name, in consequence of being thinly clad at the time."

The Stillwater bridge, in Orono, was completed as a toll bridge and offered for lease.

Mr. Thomas Howard, the death of whose wife occurred in September, died in December. He had been a soldier in Wolfe's army, and was at the taking of Quebec. He came to Bangor in 1772, and occupied one lot (No. 16) to the time of his death. He lived an exemplary life, and was a good citizen. He was a member of the Methodist church for thirty years before his decease, which occurred when he was eighty-six years of age.

The New Brunswick Royal Gazette claimed that the actual possession of the disputed territory northward of the highlands, commencing at Mars Hill, "and of course all the lands on the Restook, as we call the river, or Aroostook," as the Americans call it, had always been in Great Britain.

The St. John British Colonist said: "It is certainly revolting to the feelings of Englishmen to witness the provoking and insulting language of such an infant nation towards the greatest power on the terrestrial globe. She who has had almost every other nation with the Americans united in colleague against her, and has combated and subdued them without assistance, is now to be insulted by one of the most infant governments on the earth; by a nation whose greatest trait is chicanery and duplicity!"

On December 22d the "Clarion," a small four-page weekly literary paper, edited by Charles Gilman, was issued from the Register office.

The supercilious and arrogant tone of the British press led to the discussion, in Maine, of a military road from Bangor to Houlton. The latter place was about 140 miles from any shire town. In from thirty to forty miles of the distance there was no road, or scarcely a track; and the traveler was obliged in passing to camp over night in the woods. The mail was received there but once a month. It was conveyed a part of the way by land and a part by water—the mail-carrier's back being the vehicle for much of the distance. The number of inhabitants south of Mars Hill was nearly 1,500; and in Madawaska about 3,000. With a good road and the boundary question settled, it was predicted that the population would double in six years.

The subject of the arrest of Baker was discussed by Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, and Mr. Charles R. Vaughn, the British Minister. The latter said that it was evident that the offensive conduct of Baker "was not confined to stopping the mail, but that he had hoisted the flag of the United States in defiance of British claims, and had sought to engage a party in an ancient British settlement to transfer the possession to the United States," and produced depositions from Frenchmen, that a paper was circulated in a Madawaska settlement for signatures, by which the signers bound themselves to resist British authority. The Minister urged that too much vigilance could not be exerted by the different Governments to remove misapprehension and control passion among the settlers.

The brig Bold Jack, of Bangor, was wrecked on a voyage to the West Indies. She was discovered, about November 24, drifting among the rocks off the Bermudas, and appeared to have been dismantled and drifting about the ocean, full of water, for some months. She had an assorted cargo.

The business men who established themselves or formed new connections in Bangor in the year 1827 were Nathaniel Haynes, Ira Chamberlain (tailor), James Tolman, Edward Kent and Jonathan P. Rogers, became a business firm as lawyers, George Perry, William Cutter, Theodore S. Dodd, Joseph N. Downe and Bartlett Willis (wheelwrights), Philip H. and John E. Hesseltine, Charles Reynolds, Ammi West, Shadrack Roberts and George Hervey (tailors), Charles Buck, John Hoyt and O. N. Bradford, Erastus and J. M. Learned, Joseph Leavitt, Jr., Willis Patten, Samuel Fellows (blacksmith), Haren Mitchell, William W. Emerson, Horatio P. Blood, Peleg Chandler and Gorham Parks (law firm), James H. Mills, Henry A. Head (bought out Elmore Parker), Mighill H. Blood, Dr. Cary, Isaac W. Patten and Charles Lowell (company), Joseph C. Stevens (boots and shoes), George W. Pickering, formed company with George A. Thatcher (Pickering & Thatcher), A. A. Dillingham (baker, bought out David J. Bent), Mark L. Hill, formed company with John C. Dexter (Hill & Dexter). Romulus Haskins & Company, French, Quimby, and Benjamin Weed (French, Weed & Co.), Preston Jones (cabinet-maker), Henry Nolen.

1828. Mr. Davies, of Portland, who had been appointed to visit New Brunswick in relation to the border difficulties, was hospitably but not officially received at Fredericton. The subject being national, it was for national agents to settle. Mr. Barrell, an agent of the United States, followed Mr. Davies, but the Governor of New Brunswick would not communicate with him in his official capacity. Both agents devoted themselves to obtaining all the information upon the subject in their power. Mr. Barrell went to Madawaska for the purpose.

The mail was now conveyed by coaches every day between Bangor and Augusta, through Hampden, Frankfort, Prospect, Swanville, Belfast, Belmont, Palermo, China, and Vassalboro, under the direction of Benjamin Garland and J. B. Hanscomb.

Mr. Timothy Colby, the notable fisherman, while fishing for frost fish in the Kenduskeag, on the 3d of January, caught a fine, fat salmon weighing five and a quarter pounds. This was the only salmon, probably, ever caught in that way through the ice in that river.

Mr. John Ham, an efficient fire ward, in the exercise of his duty at a fire, came in collision with some choleric individual, who put the law in motion against him; whereupon the Fire Club voted its disapprobation of the prosecution, and gave the persecuted brother the benefit of its sympathy.

Oliver Leonard, Esq., died in Bangor, in January, at the age of sixty-five.

There was some misapprehension in regard to the claim of the American Government in the boundary dispute. George Van Ness, one of the Commissioners under the Treaty of Ghent, stated that the angle of the American lines was about 144 miles north from the source of the river St. Croix, 66 miles north of the river St. John, and 104 miles from Mars Hill; while the British commissioner, Mr. Vaughan, claimed it was 40 miles north of the source of the St. Croix river, and 38 miles south of the river St. John.

On the 15th of January, the Republican members of the Legislature renominated Enoch Lincoln as candidate for Governor.

Rev. Samuel Baker, an eccentric preacher, had established a school in Dexter, which occasioned considerable animadversion among the citizens, whereupon a town meeting was called and some votes were passed unfavorable to the school.

This naturally was not agreeable to Mr. Baker, and he, as "Overseer," deemed it proper to state in the Bangor Register that the school was "greatly encouraged by remarks of all the virtuous;" that the "manners and tempers of the scholars had been improved;" that both sexes, from four to twenty-two, had attended "with remarkable health and content;" that the scholars were taught, both by precept and example, to attend "meetings of all orders;" that the "donors of the school and officers" were of different orders, and the constitution prohibited sectarianism; that the numerous applications for admission proved the "loud call" for it; and that the pecuniary saving to each scholar was $63 per year.

This statement of Mr. Baker was contradicted in some important particulars by Edward Jumper, John Bates, and Thomas R. Bicknell, the Selectmen. They said that the town meeting was called to remonstrate against the granting a petition by the Legislature for the incorporation of the school; that the school was sectarian; that Mr. Baker had denounced the preaching of a Baptist minister in town as false; that scholars who attended that meeting were required to sign an acknowledgment that they had done wrong in attending it, or to be expelled from the school; that Mr. Baker misrepresented; that the school was taught by a female, who would have taught as well as other female teachers if not controlled by Mr. Baker; that the meeting was well attended, and was almost unanimous in voting to remonstrate against the incorporation, as they were satisfied that sectarianism and many superstitious ideas, unprofitable to persons of any age, were taught and enforced in the school. Seba French, E. H. Burleigh, and other prominent citizens, signed the statement.

Mr. Baker felt still further aggrieved by this public demonstration against his school, and protested still that it was unsectarian, that he had required no written acknowledgment from scholars that they had done wrong because they attended a Baptist meeting, but that they had done wrong in leaving their own Methodist meeting, by which they had broken their "church covenant," and published certificates of members of the school in confirmation of his statement. He thought this persecution grew out of jealousy, occasioned by "uncertain flying reports."

As a proof that in the Penobscot as good fruit could be raised as in the "Western country," the Register stated that Mr. Elias Blake had left at the office a New York pippin apple, raised on his farm, twelve and one-half inches in circumference, four inches in diameter, weighing thirteen and one-half ounces. The tree that bore it was presented to Mr. Blake by Mr. Brimmer, of Boston.

The Theological Seminary gave notice that the Ac-adematical Department would be open in March for the admission of students preparing for college or the counting-room, under a competent instructor—a college graduate.

Thirteen townships and half-townships of timber lands were advertised by Mr. Irish, Land Agent, to be sold by public auction in July.

The amount of postage which accrued in 1827 in towns in Maine, that exceeded $500 in each, was as follows: Augusta, $540.24; Bangor, $1,032.30; Bath, $1,172.89; Belfast, $592.28; Brunswick, $781.19; Castine, $509.26; Eastport, $774.10; Gardiner, $729.97; Hallowell, $1,061.33; Portland, $4,630.37; Saco, $980.40; Thomaston, $626.62; Wiscasset, $563.36.

The excitement upon the boundary question was increasing. The Legislature referred it to a committee consisting of John L. Mcquire, Ruel Williams, Joshua W. Hathaway, John G. Deane, Henry W. Fuller, William Vance, Joshua Carpenter, Rufus Burnham, which made an able report, stating the position of the question, referring to the encroachments of the British, the action of the Executive approving it, and suggesting the duty devolving upon the General Government to protect our citizens and our State rights. The newspapers in the Provinces were supercilious and taunting, and those of Maine indignant. A messenger from Houlton arrived in Bangor in March with a petition from some of the inhabitants of that region to the Executive for protection against the usurpations of the Government of New Brunswick.

Baker and six other Americans were indicted by the grand jury in New Brunswick, and arraigned for conspiracy and seditious practices by hoisting the American colors in Madawaska, and refusing to pull them down when requested, and for opposing a British constable in the performance of his duty. He declined at first to answer whether he were guilty or not guilty—claimed that the alleged offenses, if committed, were committed within the State of Maine, of which he was a citizen, and that the court had no jurisdiction. The court insisted that he should plead. He then said if there was no alternative—he having no counsel—that he should say he was not guilty, protesting against the jurisdiction and asking for a continuance. This was granted, and he was released upon bail in £400.

Eight Americans living at Madawaska and eleven living on the Aroostook River were indicted, and a posse comitatus was sent up to take those to Fredericton gaol who were concerned in the affray about Arnold's cow. On hearing this several made their way through the wilderness to Houlton.

The annual meeting for the choice of town officers was held on March 10th. Amos Patten, James Crosby, and Daniel Pike were made Selectmen; S. L. Pomroy, J. P. Dickinson, George Starrett, Edwin Kent, John Godfrey, Superintending School Committee; Alexander Savage was elected Town Clerk; George Starrett, Treasurer; Jacob McGaw, Town Agent; John Godfrey, Auditor of Accounts. The moneys raised were for town charges, $1,700; for highways, $4,000; for schools, $1,600; $50 for putting stone posts at the corner of the streets.

On the 24th March an adjourned meeting of the town was held, and William D. Williamson was chosen Moderator. The meeting was comparatively small. It refused to accept a report on the subject of the alms-house, made in accordance with the wishes of the town at the first session. A reconsideration of the first vote was moved, and objected to on the ground that no notice was given that such a motion was contemplated; that the meeting was not as full as when the vote was taken; that the motion was not made by one who voted with the majority when the vote was taken. The objections were all overruled by the Moderator, who, it was alleged by the Register, knew little of parliamentary rules, although he had presided over the Senate of Maine! The Register loved to criticise its opponents, right or wrong.

At this meeting John Godfrey, Samuel Call, and George Starrett were appointed a committee to draft a code of by-laws for the town.

At this time there were two town pumps, one in the centre of West Market Square and one in the Mercantile Square near the head of Mercantile Block, on Broad street. There was much complaint that they were not kept in repair. There was no want of water, however, in West Market Square, for there was a little pond of water in the centre of it nearly all the summer through, and there was not enterprise enough in the Selectmen to get rid of it for many years.

Among the appointments by the Governor this year was that of Samuel Lowder, Jr., of Bangor, as Public Administrator; Joshua Carpenter, of Howland, Agent on the Mattanawcook road.

The Bangor Young Ladies' Academy was discontinued about this time, and Abel M. Quimby, some time its preceptor, opened a school for young ladies in the hall of the Franklin House, on the first Monday in May.

On the 22d March James Tilton, Edward Sargent, and Jacob Garland gave notice of a meeting of the proprietors of the First Baptist meeting-house for the purchase of land.

John Williams gave notice that the Bangor Mechanic Association would organize on April 15th. There was much feeling at this time among the apprentices against the clerks in stores on account of their real or supposed assumption of superiority, and the older mechanics were determined to afford the apprentices such opportunities as it was in their power to provide, to become at least the equals, if not the superiors, of the clerks in intelligence and cultivation. This was one of the ends for which the association was organized, and it accomplished much good.

Rufus Dwinel gave notice that the Penobscot boom had been put in repair and would be ready to receive logs as soon as they commenced running, at thirty-five cents per thousand feet.

John Bennock, Daniel White, William Emerson, and Asa W. Babcock, gave notice of a meeting on the 21st of April, for the organization of the Stillwater Canal Corporation.

Mr. Timothy Colby and Mr. Albert Chick made themselves temporarily famous by bringing to Bangor several trout which they caught in the Schoodic Lake, above Sebec, the largest of which weighed twenty-three pounds. Mr. Chick was so highly elated by his success that, with others, he made another trip to the lake and returned with thirty, the largest weighing twelve pounds. They were called "salmon trout," and described "as hard and rich, with a fine flavor, and having the appearance of the salmon, though the belly was more yellow, and the back and sides thoroughly interspersed with small, bright yellowish spots."

The late events on the frontier, and the excitement occasioned thereby, had their effect in Washington. Congress appropriated a large sum for building a Military Road from Mattawamkeag, where the State road terminated, to Houlton, the nearest settlement to Mars Hill within the acknowledged limits of the United States of any importance.

Government had also ordered four companies of infantry from different posts in the neighborhood of Detroit, Michigan, to be stationed at Houlton.

The correspondence between the Governor of Maine and the Department of State of the United States, and other functionaries, in relation to the boundary, became quite voluminous.

Messrs. Burley and Marshall now carried the United States' mail by coach on Mondays, Thursdays, and Saturdays, between Bangor and Oldtown.

Much complaint was made of the Judge of Probate because he required all the probate notices to be published in the Eastern Republican. This was attributed to his partisan feelings rather than to the convenience it was to have all the notices in one paper. To do away with all occasion of complaint on this account, the Legislature provided by law that probate notices should be published in whatever newspapers parties having the control of them desired.

Many children were victims of a disease called the quinzy, and children and others were attacked by croup, which was often fatal, at this period, and much alarm prevailed in the community on account of these diseases.

On the 23d of April Major Clark and Lieutenant Russell, of the United States Army, arrived in Bangor on their way to Houlton, to make arrangements for the accommodation of the troops which were to be stationed at that place.

The success of Messrs. Colby and Chick in taking what they called salmon trout occasioned some excitement among the anglers of Boston, and they wrote to the Bangor Register for information in regard to the place where and the manner in which those enormous trout were obtained. They had made frequent visits to Sebago Lake, where the trout did not weigh over two pounds at the most, were covered with black spots, had neither fat nor flavor, and afforded more pleasure in taking than eating.

The Register replied that the lake where the fish were taken was called Otter Lake on Hale's map, but not here. It was called Schoodic Lake, was situated partly in Brownville and partly in Township No. 4, Eighth Range, and that the outlet disembogued into the Piscataquis at Kilmarnock (Medford), and was called Schoodic Stream; that Chick reported the distance from Bangor to the lake about forty-five miles; that, not having success at the foot of the lake, his party went to the head, seven or eight miles; that, after fishing about ten minutes, they caught a trout weighing nine and a half pounds, and between 9 and 12 o'clock took twelve. After dinner they took three more. This was the 29th of March. On the 2d of April he was at the lake again, and in the day and night succeeding he and his companions caught twenty of the fish with about a dozen lines they let down through the ice.

A mail stage now ran between Bangor and Bucksport three times a week.

The Fire Wards, on the 15th of April, appointed Amos Patten to have the general direction of the engines at fires; John Ham and James B. Fiske, to have special charge of Engine No. 1; Samuel Lowder and John Williams, of Washington Engine; Ezra Hutchins, to take charge of fire hooks and remove vessels; John Barker, Jacob McGaw, Wiggins Hill, Edward Sargent, to form lines for Washington Engine; Edmund Dole, Abner Taylor, John M. Prince, Isaac Hodsdon, to form lines for Engine No. 1; George W. Brown, John Godfrey, George Savage, and George W. Pickering, to take charge of furniture and merchandise; David Hill and John Ham, to take charge of ladders.

On May 10 a company of United States troops, under Lieutenant Gallagher, arrived in the schooner Eddington; Captain Lowder, from New York, en route for Houlton.

Messrs. Lander, Burley, and Saunders, on June 3, commenced carrying the United States mail to Houlton, under a contract to convey it once a week.

Lieutenant B. F. Russell caused some excitement among the cattle growers by advertising for thirty thousand pounds of beef (on hoof), to be delivered at Houlton for the United States troops, by the 1st day of November, 1828.

There were at this time published in Maine thirty-three papers—twenty-five political, six religious, two literary, and one temperance. The Register, Eastern Republican, and Clarion were published in Bangor. Of the religious papers, two were Calvinist Baptist, one Orthodox Congregationalist, one Universalist, one Free-will Baptist.

Mr. Chick's green peas did not appear upon his table this year until the 23d of June.

At the June term of the Supreme Judicial Court, Thornton McGaw, James S. Holmes, and George Starrett, were admitted as counsellors, and Jonathan P. Rogers Charles Stetson, Nathaniel Hatch, William Goodenow, and George B. Moody, attorneys.

Albion K. Parris was appointed by the Governor a Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court, vice William Pitt Preble, who had been appointed one of the Commissioners of the Northeastern boundary. Daniel Rose was appointed Land Agent, vice James Irish, resigned, and Joel Miller Warden of the State Prison, vice Daniel Rose; Joshua Chamberlain, of Brewer, an Agent of the Penobscot Indians; Alexander Savage, Register of Probate.

The Fourth of July was celebrated by the Bangor Artillery, Captain John A. Mayhew. An address was delivered at the First Parish church by Mr. Richard Woodhull.

The political parties had now distinctly defined their position. The Administration party had renominated John Quincy Adams for President, and the opposition had adopted Andrew Jackson as their candidate.

The Administration candidate for Representative to Congress from Penobscot was Samuel Butman; for Senator, Solomon Parsons. Opposition for Representative, William Emerson; for Senator, Daniel Emery, of Hampden.

The subject of the "better observance of the Sabbath" was agitated at this period in the county, and Jacob McGaw, Daniel Pike, Royal Clark, James B. Fiske, S. L. Pomroy, John Ham, Eliashib Adams, John Smith, James Crosby, John Pearson, Abner Taylor, and Caleb C. Billings, notified a meeting on the 6th of August to consider the subject.

July 21 Jacob Chick gave notice that the Penobscot Exchange Coffee House was open for the accommodation of the public, under his charge; that it contained about seventy rooms, comprising halls, parlors, club-rooms, etc., and was furnished in a manner equal, if not superior, to any other public house in Maine.

Considerable interest was awakened in the town by the arrival, on the 28th, of three companies of United States troops, lately detached from the Second Regiment, at Green Bay, and on their way to Houlton. They were under the command of Captain Staniford. Lieutenants Morton and Bloodgood, and Surgeon Russell, were with them. They were pleasantly encamped on an open square between Penobscot, Somerset, and Park streets and Broadway. At the request of many of the citizens they were paraded and performed various evolutions, and being accompanied by a fine band, afforded the people much entertainment. The military men of the town were highly pleased with the excellent appearance and perfect drill of the troops, and the lovers of music were delighted with the performances of the band, which played an hour or two every evening while it was in town. The encampment had many visitors of both sexes, and officers, privates, and visitors were mutually pleased with each other. They remained from Tuesday until Saturday, when they took up their line of march for Houlton.

The political excitement increased, but, although there was much bitterness between the parties and their organs, yet there was not that indecent criticism of candidates that prevailed before the party lines were so clearly defined. The Register complained that the "Gemini," as it called the Eastern Republican, endeavored to excite the jealousies of the people of the country against the people of the town. Perhaps at this period commenced those jealousies which have to a greater or less extent been perpetuated by the reckless charges of politicians.

In this month permits were sold at Oldtown, for the purpose of raising twelve hundred dollars to build a church for the Indians, to cut timber on the townships of the Penobscot tribe.

On the 22d of August the real estate upon which John Brewer established himself near the Segeundedunk Stream nearly sixty years before, was sold at public auction by his executor, Allen Gilman.

The annual exhibition of the Theological Seminary took place on the 6th of August. Rev. George E. Adams delivered his inaugural address as professor, which was highly complimented.

Mr. Henry Nolen succeeded Mr. Chick in the Maine Coffee House.

On August 20 Major John Williams was elected Brigadier-General of the First Brigade, Third Division, in place of General Joseph Treat, honorably discharged.

Mr. D. R. Newhall and several gentlemen and ladies from Boston, gave an exhibition of their abilities in a concert of sacred music at the First Parish church, on the evening of August 26.

Mr. Zadock Davis, who was a meek man in appearance, was always bold and outspoken towards the delinquent debtors of Davis & Weed. He addressed them no longer in poetry, but in such emphatic prose as this: "Their notes and accounts are about to pass into the hands of the subscriber, and from there into the hands of an attorney to collect forthwith."

The annual meeting for the choice of Governor and other officers, was held on September 9th. Enoch Lincoln received for Governor, 97 votes; Solomon Parsons, for Senator, 141; Daniel Emery, 52; Edward Kent, for Representative to the Legislature, 131; Thomas A. Hill, 49; Charles Rice, for County Treasurer, 87; Samuel Butman, 129; William Emerson, 68.

Mr. Lincoln was elected Governor; Mr. Parsons, Senator; Mr. Rice, Treasurer; Mr. Kent, Representative to the Legislature; Mr. Butman, Representative to Congress.

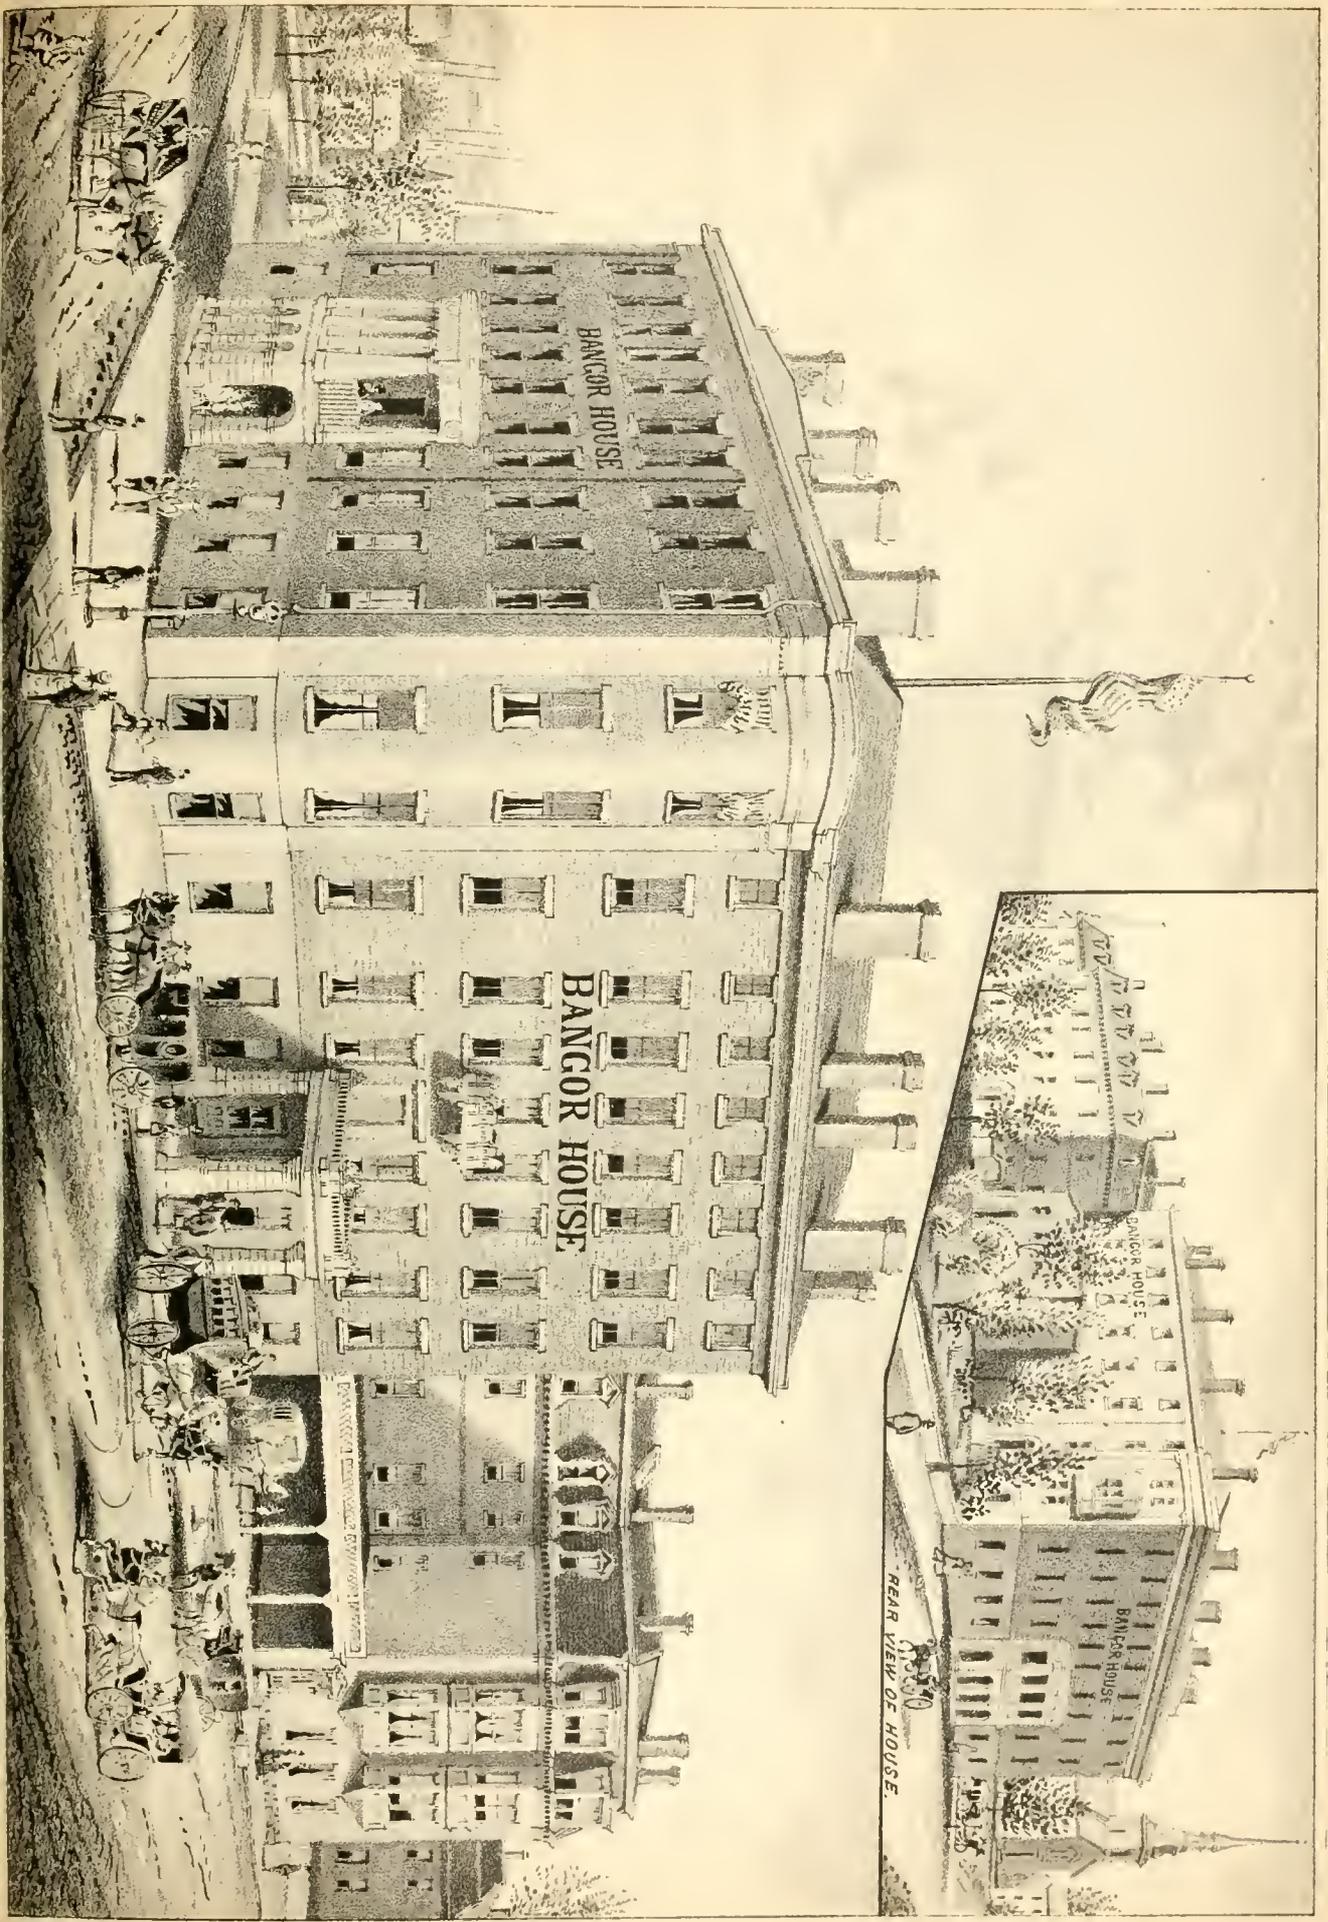

Mr. Simeon Gorton, who came from Connecticut and settled in Hampden in 1770, died in September, at the age of seventy-nine. Benjamin Orr, the eminent lawyer of Brunswick, died at the age of fifty-five. Gehudi Ashmun, former Professor of the Theological Seminary, and late Governor of Liberia, died in New Haven, Connecticut, and was buried with every mark of respect.

The review of Colonel Rogers's Regiment of Militia took place on the 23d of September. The interest in the musters was waning. At Belfast there was mutinous conduct on the 16th, which occasioned a withdrawal of a part of the troops. There was an increasing feeling that these military gatherings were more injurious to the morals than they would be likely to be of benefit in case of any military contingency; then the tax upon the people was a matter worthy of consideration. Still they afforded relaxation to multitudes, whose occasions for amusement were few enough—but amusement was the last thing that was thought worthy of public recognition in a country where work was worshipped. It was to be many a year before the surplus means of Maine farmers and business men would authorize the expenditure of much time in recreation.

The trouble at Belfast grew out of an old dispute, a year or more old, in relation to the correctness of a certain maneuver which Major-General Hodsdon ordered the Colonel to cause to be performed. The order was given to the regiment, when preparing for inspection—"Break into open column of companies, to the left backward." The order was disapproved by the Major-General the year before, he insisting that the companies should wheel to the right forward. On the Colonel's repeating the objectionable order this year, it was again disapproved; hence the mutinous manifestation.

The Land Agent, Daniel Rose, gave notice that he should sell by auction Township No. 3, Range 4, Norris & McMillan's survey, at the minimum price of twenty cents per acre; No. 4, R. 5, Norris' survey, at a minimum of twenty-five cents per acre; No. 2, R. 9, minimum 25; No. 3, R. 14, minimum 25; Tract A, 2, in R. 12; and 14, 25; and Tract X, R. 14, 25. Not more than a town of six miles square, nor less than a tract of a mile square, would be struck off at one time. Terms one-fourth down; remainder in one, two and three years, and interest annually, secured by mortgage on the premises.

John B. Hill, Webster Kelley, and Albert Bingham were admitted to practice as attorneys at the October term of the Court of Common Pleas.

In September a frame meeting-house was completed near the foot of Union street, where Independent street connects with it, by the Methodist society.

Mr. Richard Woodhull opened the Classical School of the Theological Seminary on the 18th of September.

Some excitement was occasioned by the death of Mrs. Nathaniel Pike, formerly of Waterford, said to be under the treatment of a quack. It was said that she was a healthy and strong woman, that on Friday and Saturday she complained of cold, which had increased on Sunday, though she was able to make her bed and sit up a part of the time; that she called in a "steam doctor," who administered four or five emetics in quick succession, which occasioned great distress and apparent derangement of the mind; that on her friends expressing alarm, the "doctor" told them that these effects might have been expected, for the patient had taken opium at some time in her life, and his medicine was battling with the narcotic and would soon overcome it. Their apprehensions being quieted, the operations were continued, emetics were administered, the patient was subjected to a steaming process, cold water was dashed over her, capsicum was poured down her throat to keep up the internal heat, until Monday night, when nature gave way, and she expired.

Mr. Pike made a statement somewhat modifying the above account, that had gone abroad. The emetics were not administered in so objectionable a manner; the steaming was about fifteen minutes, and subject to the will of the patient. Red pepper, "Composition," and "Nerve Powder" were often administered.

The politicians were as much alarmed for the future of the country in the event of the success of their opponents this year as they have been at any time since. An enthusiastic Adams man, deprecating the election of General Jackson, urged his fellow-citizens to "remember that not only their liberties, but the fate of their posterity, of nations yet unborn depended, in some measure, upon the right of suffrage." Enthusiastic Jackson men expressed themselves in a similar manner, threw up their hats, and shouted "Hurrah for Jackson!" Partisans accused their enemies of "using falsehood in all its phases of hardy assertion, brazen denial, and ingenious misrepresentation."

The electors of Bangor had a partiality for John Quincy Adams; but, notwithstanding, they gave 184 votes for General Simon Norvell and the other National Republican Electors, to 94 for Daniel Rose and the Democratic Electors; yet General Jackson was elected to the Presidency.

Samuel Butman's majority for Representative to Congress at the September election was 2,045 over William Emerson and others.

About this time appeared the "Journal of the Times," edited by William Lloyd Garrison, and published at Bennington, Vermont. It favored the election of Mr. Adams, and was hailed as an "important auxiliary."

Daniel Wilkins, of Charleston, was appointed Sheriff of Penobscot, in place of John Wilkins, who had resigned.

There was just complaint that the Supreme Court held a session on election day, thereby depriving jurors, suitors, and others, of their privilege of the franchise. This has since been provided against by law.

The young men formed an association called the "Literary Club," and established a reading-room having the leading newspapers, reviews, and periodicals of the day.

November 8, B. B. Thatcher connected himself with Charles Gilman in the editorship of "The Clarion," which was enlarged to a paper of eight pages. It was a rather interesting literary paper to the young people, but it did not get far into its second year before it finished its career.

This month Vaughan & Robinson were doing a crockeryware business at No. 4, and Mrs. Ruth Ingraham a fashionable millinery business at No. 5, Merchants' Row. This was a row of two-story stores extending from West Market Place, on the south side of Main street.

On November 18 Elisha Allen—since Chief Justice of the Sandwich Islands—opened a law office on the easterly side of Broad street, facing Mercantile Square.

This day there was a violent snow-storm. The ground, however, was not frozen, the preceding part of the month having been rainy.

Mr. Richard Woodhull gave notice that he would deliver the first of a course of lectures on astronomy "(gratis), before the Mechanic Association at the Court-house, in this village," on the evening of December 16. The lecture was delivered. The "matter and style of the lecture" were pronounced "perspicuous, the delivery and manner clear and intelligible," the apparatus "imperfect."

A citizens' watch was organized and commenced its duties on December 15, which were to be continued until the 1st of May.

The votes for President in some of the towns in the Penobscot District were as follow:

The vote of the State was for Adams, 20,807; for Jackson, 13,963; scattering, 101.

Richard H. Bartlett and Amos M. Roberts gave notice of a copartnership and of their opening a store in Bangor for the sale of all kinds of goods. The style of the firm was Bartlett & Roberts. Among their stock was New England rum. Deacon George W. Brown advertised wines; Joseph C. Stevens and E. Learned advertised brandy and West Indies rum. Indeed, all the dealers at this time had no scruples in regard to selling liquors openly.

The river closed on the night of the 18th. The sloop Brutus brought a large quantity of freight from Hampden, and having landed it left on that day.

A new Universalist chapel was dedicated at Hampden Lower Corner on December 25. The sermon was by Rev. F. Mace; the music was under the direction of Dr. John Abbott, who was assisted by Mr. John Hoyt, of Bangor. Rev. Joshua Hall, Methodist, made the concluding prayer.

On December 30, the Bangor Fire Club, of which George Starrett, Esq., was Secretary, held its annual meeting at Hutchins's hotel (Hatch House) and partook of a supper.

1829. Mail communication between Bangor and the outer world continued to improve. By a new arrangement the mail after January 1st was but little more than two days on its way from Boston to Bangor. It left the former place at 5 o'clock P. M. and arrived at the latter at 8 o'clock P. M. on the second day, stopping at Brunswick six or eight hours the first night. It is now something less than a quarter of that time on its way, and in a few years will probably be less than an eighth of it.

"A Unitarian," who frequently attended public worship with the Methodist Society, for "whose moral and religious character he had a profound reverence," was much disturbed on reading in their hymn-book a hymn headed "For the Mahometans," in which were these lines:

Stretch out thy arm, thou triune God;
The Unitarian fiend expel,
And chase his doctrine back to hell.

"In charity to them" he believed that "very few of them are disposed to apply such language as the above to a doctrine which it is humbly believed is expressly commanded and enjoined by God himself, and taught by the prophets in the Old Testament, and confirmed by Christ and his Apostles in the New Testament."

Peleg Sprague and John Holmes were elected by the Legislature to Congress, the latter for the unexpired term occasioned by the resignation of Albion K. Parris.

On February 21st there was a fall of eighteen inches of snow, and the snow was five to six feet deep in the woods. Between that and March 3d another, and the roads were completely blocked.

This month the vote for President and Vice-President of the United States was proclaimed. For President Andrew Jackson had 178, John Quincy Adams 83; John C. Calhoun had 171, Richard Rush 83, William Smith 7, for Vice-President. Maine cast one vote for Jackson and eight for Adams. The rest of New England went solid for Adams. The Slave States went solid for Jackson, with the exception of Delaware and Maryland. Delaware went for Adams. Maryland five for Jackson and six for Adams. Georgia threw seven of its nine votes for Smith for Vice President.

On March 2 a chapel of the Theological Seminary which stood at the corner of Hammond and Fifth streets (west side), was destroyed by fire.

The town was agitated upon the subject of a town clock. An article was inserted in the warrant for the town meeting to see if the town would purchase one. The purchase was opposed for the reasons that the town was in debt—had recently incurred heavy expenses, and must continue to be at great expense for other more necessary purposes; that the benefits would be partial; that it could not be located so as to give satisfaction to the citizens.

On March 5 a meeting of such of the "inhabitants as believed in the final happiness of all men" was held in "Crane's Hall." This hall was in the attic of a two-story frame building that stood on the west side of Mercantile Square.

The death of Mrs. Eleanor Madison, widow of President Madison, at the age of ninety-three, at Montpelier, Virginia, on February 11, was announced.

On March 4 the friends of General Jackson caused all the bells in town to be rung until about one o'clock. His cabinet had been announced: Martin Van Buren, New York, Secretary of State; Samuel D. Ingham, Pennsylvania, Treasury; John McLean, Ohio, Postmaster General; John H. Eaton, Tennessee, War; John Branch, North Carolina, Navy; John M. Berein, Georgia, Attorney-General.

The Congregational meeting-house near the ferry, in Brewer, was dedicated March 12.

At the annual town meeting on the 9th of March, Alexander Sawyer was elected Town Clerk; Amos Patten, James Tilton, William Rice, Selectmen; George Starrett, Treasurer and Collector.

The Fire Wardens elected Daniel Pike Chief Engineer; Eben French, Assistant; Colonel Zeb. Rogers, Warden of Engine No. 1 ("Old Settler"); General John Williams, of Washington Engine; Edmund Dole, of Hooks and Ladders, west side; John Ham, of same, east side; Edmund Sargent, for removal of merchandise and furniture.

This month a large majority of the members of the Legislature nominated Hon. Jonathan G. Huntoon, of Readfield, as candidate for Governor. He accepted the nomination in a letter signed "J. G. Huntoon." At this time his name was written Huntoon. He was afterward elected Governor as "Jonathan G. Hunton."

President Jackson appointed John McLean Judge of the United States Supreme Court, and William T. Barry, of Kentucky, Postmaster-General in his place.

The hemlock gaol was partially burnt on the 26th. Females formed a line and passed water in buckets to extinguish the fire, while many of the lazy men wrapped in their cloaks were looking on like Spanish hidalgos.

An appropriation of $42,932 was made last year for completing the Military Road from Mattawamkeag to Mars Hill; $5,000 for a light-house on Mount Desert Rock; and $300 for surveying the ship channel of Penobscot River from White Head to Bangor, and ascertaining the cost of improving the navigation and proper sites for spindles and buoys.

Deacon William Boyd died on the 24th of March, aged eighty-four. He was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, in 1745. At the age of twenty-four he settled in Bristol, Maine, where he resided about twenty years. He then removed to Bangor. This was about 1789. He was a religious man, and is said to have been the only church member in the place for nine or ten years. He led an exemplary life. He was a ship-carpenter, and built the first vessel in Bangor, and probably the first above Fort Point. This was for Major Robert Treat. He was appointed Deacon of the Congregational church organized in Bangor and Orrington in 1800, over which Rev. Mr. Boyd was settled. When Rev. Mr. Loomis was settled, in 1811, he was continued a Deacon, and remained such until his death. He died sitting in his chair.

Joseph Leavitt, Esq., died on March 6, at the age of sixty-two. He was born in Stratham, New Hampshire. Before his majority he went several voyages to sea. After attending Exeter Academy one year, he taught school seven years. He then went into trade in Lee, New Hampshire, where he remained fourteen years. In 1810 he removed to Bangor with his accumulations, which were considerable. He was quite enterprising; built vessels, carried on trade in various kinds of merchandise, bought and sold lands, was engaged in banking as a Director of the Bangor Bank, built a brick block a little way up Washington street on the right—the block since converted into a store-house and offices by the European & North American Railway, and in the hall of which the Young Ladies' Academy was first kept. He was Town Clerk, Selectman, and member of the first convention on the separation of the State in 1816, at Brunswick. He lost much in the war, and at his death his worldly possessions were small.

The town was authorized by the Legislature this year to regulate the harbor.

Moses Greenleaf published his Map and Statistical Survey of Maine.

At its April session the Court of Sessions considered the subject of building a new gaol of rough granite.

The ice left the river on April 15, vessels arrived, and the spring business opened favorably.

A horse ferry-boat was built by Master George Savage for G. W. Brimmer, of Boston, and John C. Dexter, and put upon the route between Bangor and Brewer.

Bangor dealers were obliged to sell their shingles in Boston at this time at $1 and $1.25 per thousand.

General Mark Trafton was appointed postmaster, in place of Major Royal Clark, removed.

Mr. C. M. Rogers became landlord of the Penobscot Exchange, in place of Jacob Chick, removed.

A portion of the Democrats having in view the strengthening of their party, made a movement for a partisan celebration of the Fourth of July. This awakened the patriotic indignation of such sturdy Republicans as John Wilkins, Jacob McGaw, Benjamin Nourse, John Williams, Edward Kent, P. B. Mills, Samuel Lowder, and others, and they organized with much enthusiasm to have a citizens' no-party celebration. They desired to know if the managers supposed "that our citizens were so tame, so spiritless, so yielding, so slavish as to submit in silence to such imposition—to be hoodwinked, and hooked on as the mere tail of the Jackson kite?”

The party feeling at this time was bitter. A Jackson caucus at Kennebunk instructed its delegates to an Augusta convention to “ascertain if any individual by the name of Jonathan G. Hunton is known to reside within the limits of the State!” Another caucus in Elliott instructed their delegates “to inquire who this Jonathan G. Hunton is.”

The convention to which these delegates were sent nominated Judge Samuel E. Smith, of the Court of Common Pleas, as the Jackson candidate for Governor.

There were women at this time who had the courage to lift up their voices in public. Miss Clarke advertised to give a course of ten historical lectures in the brick school-house on State street. The lectures were well attended and Miss Clarke received many encomiums.

A caribou (reindeer) was exhibited at Hutchins's inn.

1829. This year Ruel Williams, George Evans, Timothy Boutelle, and others, were competitors for the office of Representative to Congress in the Kennebec district, and Joshua W. Hathaway, John G. Deane, Leonard Jarvis, Samuel Upton, and Jeremiah O'Brien, and others, in the Hancock district. There were 4,525 votes thrown in the former district and 4,520 in the latter, at the first balloting, when there was no choice.

The stimulus given the citizens by the announcement of a partisan celebration by the “Jacksonites” was the occasion of an unusual celebration of the anniversary of Independence this year. “Edward Kent, Esquire,” delivered the oration at the First Parish meeting-house; the prayer was made by Rev. John Smith, D. D., Professor of the Theological Seminary; “Rev. George E. Adams” read the Declaration of Independence, prefacing it, “in a very pertinent and happy manner, by a few eloquent remarks.” The audience was “very numerous, respectable, and intelligent;” the oration was pronounced “a chaste and eloquent production,” and was listened to “with gratified attention.” It breathed the sentiments of enlightened patriotism, unsullied by the bitterness of party spirit, and was worthy of the day.

Mr. B. B. Thatcher prepared the following hymn for the occasion, which was “sung with fine effect” by the choir:

Oh! not alone is sacred soil,
Where temples have been built to God,
And odors burned o'er fires divine,
And blood of victims stained the sod.

But holy is the air we breathe,
And holy is the ground we tread;
For here, upon a thousand hills,
Our fathers' life-blood hath been shed.

On Freedom's proud, high battle-ground,
For all we are and hope and have,
They fought—and fell—and the world saw!
Their memories shall find no grave;

But ages hence, o'er the wide earth,
Unnumbered millions of the free
Shall wake, this day, their deathless fame,
With praise and prayer, O God! to Thee.

Thy breath was flame upon their souls,
When the starr'd banner wav'd them on!
Grant us to feel the breath they felt,
That we may prize the wealth they won.

After the services the procession re-formed, and escorted by a company of volunteer citizens under Captain Philip H. Coombs, with Major William E. Robinson and Mr. Cyrus Arnold as marshals, marched to the Penobscot Exchange and partook of a rare dinner provided by C. M. Rogers.

Jacob McGaw, Esq., presided at the feast. Sentiments were given by the President, Enoch Brown, John Wilkins, James Crosby, Eben French, George B. Moody, Samuel Butman, Edward Kent, Samuel Call, Samuel Lowder, and John C. Dexter, Esquires, all prominent citizens of Bangor and neighborhood; by Edward Wilkins and Benjamin Butman, soldiers of the Revolution; by General Joseph Treat, General John Blake, and Major W. E. Robinson; by Hon. Emery L. Emerson, Senator from York county, Hon. George W. Coffin, Land Agent of Massachusetts, and by Benjamin Bussey, Esq., of Boston. The only things pointed were in the sentiments of Mr. Call and Mr. Lowder. The former gave a fling at “modern reformation,” meaning Jackson politics, and the latter a kick at the exclusives who celebrated the day in the interest of Jacksonism, his sentiment being: “The memory of our departed friends on the west side of the Kenduskeag.”

On this day a meeting of gentlemen from different parts of the county was held in the Court-house to make preparations for the formation of a county temperance society. Judge Moses Greenleaf, of Williamsburg, presided, and Hon. R. K. Cushing, of Brewer, was Secretary. John Wilkins, Hiram Nourse, Edward Kent, George E. Adams, and Dr. Cushing were appointed a committee to draft a plan of organization.

The “Jacksonites” celebrated the day in a manner satisfactory to themselves, having music from Piscataquis. Their opponents were so well satisfied with having “taken the wind out of their sails” by the citizens' celebration, that they concluded to make no comments unfavorable to their exclusive neighbors.

The Brewer Light Infantry, “after six years of turmoil and division” under Captain Abraham Hill, reconciled their differences by the election of Robert Clary Captain and Thomas Gregg Lieutenant.

The County Temperance Society was organized on the 9th, and Hon. Judge Perham was elected President.

Colonel Joshua Carpenter was appointed Collector of the Port of Castine. He was a clamorous supporter of General Jackson—not scrupulous in regard to the language he used in conversation, and well disposed to “magnify his office.” The Register considered his appointment “a subject too serious for raillery.”

James Lander & Company had a weekly accommodation conveyance by stage and batteau to Houlton. It left Bangor on Tuesday morning and arrived at Houlton on Saturday. It left Houlton on Tuesday and arrived in Bangor on Friday.

The subject of temperance was at this time so prominent before the community, that the keeping of spirituous liquors for sale was becoming unpopular, and Mr. Albert G. Chick, whose education had been in the other direction, advertised that he had opened an establishment where he intended to keep "refreshments of every kind, with the exception of spirituous liquors, which, by the way, are no refreshment, and will not be kept either the counter or under the counter."

The interest in the Gubernatorial election became intense in August. The friends of the new administration scraped up everything they could find against Mr. Hunton. His personal enemies presented their side of the case against him. For so good-natured a man he was very much badgered, and his political friends had about as much as they could do to deny and explain the matters charged against him. It cannot be denied that the Eastern Republican, under Nathaniel Haynes, was bitter and relentless, and that much partisan hate was engendered by it that ought to have been avoided. The course of the administration press in the State, however, was exceedingly effective, and the agrarian element at length came uppermost under its influence. Their opponents made the best fight they could, but their weapons were not of a character to turn aside those of their adversaries.

On the 12th of August the "National Republicans" of Penobscot held a convention at Bangor, and re-nominated Solomon Parsons for Senator. They passed resolutions condemning the proscriptive course of the Administration in removing "honest and faithful public servants" to reward "party zealots," and adopted an address to the Electors, three columns in length, reported by George B. Moody, Esq., in which the politics of the country were reviewed from beginning to end, the corruption and bad faith of Jackson and his "Republican" party denounced, and the virtue and purity of the "National Republican" party asserted.

It was claimed for Mr. Parsons, by the Register, that he had served the people "faithfully and honestly, and with credit to himself, for two years;" that he had "grown upon the esteem" of the people, and that "those who had been acquainted with him as a legislator concurred in the opinion that he stood high at the Senate board for intelligence, capacity for business, industry, honesty, and independence."

Thomas Davee was nominated by the Republicans as their candidate for Senator. The Boston Statesman, leading Republican paper of New England, was pleased to designate his supporter, the Eastern Republican, "an able champion of the Democratic cause in the 'land of Egypt.'"

During all this erimination and recrimination among the politicians, the disciples of Thalia offered their services to the amusement-loving public, and opened at Oldtown, on August 19, a series of dramatic entertainments, which continued three evenings. Messrs. Belcour, Crouta, and Holden were so successful that they afterwards came to Bangor and erected a theater of rough boards upon the site now occupied by the Bangor House. Upon this spot the Great Bashaw became famous, and Mr. Crouta won enduring laurels by singing the songs of "The King and Countrymen," "Sitting on a Rail;" "Down in Fly Market," etc. Theater-going people laughed, religious people frowned, and the poor actors left town quite as poor as they came. Whether the acerbity of politics was modified by those performances is uncertain. But it is certain that many a Bangor boy had his first introduction to the theater at this time.

The Hunton men were indignant because the Jackson papers spelled their candidate's name Huntoon, after it was determined that the right orthography was Hunton. But the Jackson papers did not care.

On August 29 Charles Thomas, Assistant Quartermaster United States Army, advertised for proposals to build the Military Road from Mattawamkeag to Houlton.

On the 3d of September the Unitarian church was dedicated. The sermon was preached by Rev. Benjamin Huntoon, then of Carlton, Massachusetts. The house was a brick structure and stood upon the site of the present meeting-house, but fronting on Main street. It had a plain, unpretentious tower on the roof, painted white, and a cupola. In the tower was a town clock.

The gubernatorial election took place on September 14. Mr. Hunton received 196 votes in Bangor, Samuel E. Smith, 187; Solomon Parsons received 201 votes for Senator, Thomas Davee, 164; Edward Kent received 196 votes for Representative to the Legislature; Amos Patten, 161; scattering, 19.

Thomas A. Hill, Amos Patten, and John Godfrey, a committee appointed by the Court of Sessions, advertised for proposals to build a stone jail, on September 9.

Maine this year showed a strong inclination to support the Administration. Mr. Hunton was elected Governor, it is true, but his majority was small. Mr. Davee was elected Senator over Mr. Parsons in the Penobscot district, and there was no choice of Representative in the Bangor class at the first balloting, Mr. Kent having 298 votes, Mr. Patten 224, all others 80. At the second trial Mr. Kent received 488 votes to 304 for N. Nason, and 25 scattering. This was his second election to the Legislature.

The National Republicans were chagrined at the great progress of the Democratic Republicans, but they put on the best face they could, and said "on the whole, taking into view all the circumstances that belong to the occasion, the National Republicans have every reason to be well satisfied with the event of the election.

A meteor of great brilliancy passed from the southeast to the northwest on the evening of September 17. It illuminated the whole atmosphere for several seconds with a dazzling light. When in its most brilliant state it exploded, and in about two minutes afterward eight or ten successive reports, as of the rapid discharges of artillery, were heard.

The first Methodist meeting-house in Bangor was completed. It was situated at the intersection of Union and Independent streets, and fronted upon the Kenduskeag Stream.

Rev. George E. Adams, Professor in the Theological Seminary in Bangor, was invited to become the pastor of the First Congregational society in Brunswick.

On the 8th October Enoch Lincoln, Governor of Maine, died at the age of forty. He was a brother of Levi Lincoln, Governor of Massachusetts. He was unmarried.

On October 14 the Universalist meeting-house in Dexter was dedicated.

George Evans was elected to Congress from the Kennebec district.

The Congregational meeting-house in Holden was dedicated November 18.

Madam Anne Royal, the woman who annoyed our citizens by her impertinencies some time ago, received an introduction by Mr. Edward Everett to President Adams, that she probably did not forget. Mr. Everett was standing near the easterly end of the Long Bridge in Washington, when he was accosted by Mrs. Royal with a request to introduce her to the President. He said, "would you like to see him now?" On her replying that she would, he took her to the side of the bridge and directed her attention to him bathing in the Potomac!

In the autumn an institution similar to others in different parts of the country—a lyceum—was organized in Bangor, in which citizens could be profited by lectures, debates, etc. It was a popular society for the "diffusion of useful knowledge." The opening address was delivered on the evening of November 17 by Professor George E. Adams, at the Court-house.

Dr. Dickinson was disturbed by the larceny of his saddle-bags, containing medicine and surgical instruments, from his horse, which he had left ten or fifteen minutes before, at about eight o'clock in the evening, "tied at a door in one of our most public streets near the Exchange." It was considered a very singular robbery.

Mr. Jesse Smith, a Revolutionary soldier, died at the age of seventy, on November 22. He had been long a resident in Bangor, and was the father of Colonel James Smith.

The year 1829 closed with Bangor in an apparently prosperous condition. The Lyceum and Literary Club were well patronized, and the people through them manifested their interest in literary pursuits.

The town was occasionally visited by fires, and the citizens were stimulated to procure the appliances necessary for extinguishing them and saving property endangered by them. "A hook and ladder" movement was inaugurated.

On the 29th the Fire Club had its annual meeting and supper, and congratulated each other that things were "no worse."

1830. The Register of January 5 contained the following:

John G. Whittier, late Editor of the Manufacturer, and a poet of much promise, has assumed the editorial charge of the Essex Gazette. Mr. Whittier, who is quite a young man, has risen from a very humble situation by the force of his own industry and genius, and bids fair to be an ornament to the literary world.

Mr. Whittier afterward applied for the editorship of the Bangor Gazette.

On January 9—a windy day, with the mercury below zero—a two-story frame building on the northeasterly side of Kenduskeag Bridge, near the intersection of State and Harlow streets, was destroyed by fire. The building was owned by Nathaniel Harlow, Jr., and was an awkward old landmark, with a hip roof.

Ezra Hutchins, President, and Albert P. Jewett, Secretary, gave notice that a meeting of the Long-Nine Association would be held at the President's East Room on the evening of the 11th.

Jonathan G. Hunton was elected Governor by a majority of 315 over Samuel E. Smith. He received 23,315 votes; Mr. Smith, 22,991, and there were 262 scattering.

The pews in the Unitarian meeting-house were sold on January 30, and brought the sum of $14,615—$1,575 more than the cost of the house.

Mr. "Somebody" was disgusted with the manners of a person who put on his hat directly on leaving his pew in church, and the Register thought there could "be no greater evidence of ill-breeding."

A newspaper called the Eastern Pioneer made its appearance from a press in Oldtown on March 13. Its appearance was creditable. It preferred to be in the interests of no party.

A soap factory—one of the first of Bangor factories—was in full operation this spring, under James Wagg and Rufus Prince.

A newspaper called the Bluehill Beacon and Hancock County Journal came up from Bluehill this month with a Jackson smirk on its face.

On the 27th the Maine State Lottery, for the benefit of steam navigation, was drawn at the Court-house, and John Wilkins, Samuel Lowder, Jr., and Samuel Call certified that numbers 30, 3, 11, 21, 8, and 16 were drawn.

Some strictures were made by the Jacksonians on the action of Mr. Kent in the Legislature upon the question of incorporating the town of Argyle. He opposed the incorporation, for the reason that the town was principally owned by Waterville College, whose lands were exempt from taxation; that there were but two freeholders in the township; that but thirty persons petitioned for the incorporation, while forty remonstrated against it on the ground that the taxes to which they would be subjected would ruin them.

The principal cause of complaint against Mr. Kent, however, was because he resisted the annexation of the township to the Bangor Representative District. Such annexation might have changed the political character of the district. It was natural that Mr. Kent should oppose this, if he could find legitimate reasons for so doing. His reasons were, first, that it would enlarge a district that was already probably the largest in the State, and second, that it could not be annexed constitutionally, as the Constitution prohibited the established representation being altered until the next general apportionment. The Supreme Court afterward expressed the same opinion.*

On April 6 the First Parish meeting house, including organ and the fine-toned bell presented to the society, was destroyed by fire, supposed to have been the work of an incendiary. The Selectmen offered a reward of $500 for his detection. The house had been built about nine years. The loss was about $9,000; $300 insurance. The First Baptist society tendered the use of its house one-half the day on Sunday to the First Parish society. The offer was gratefully accepted.

Governor Hunton appointed Samuel G. Ladd, of Hallowell, Adjutant General, in place of Samuel Cony. Albert Smith was appointed by President Jackson Marshal of Maine, and Leonard Jarvis was appointed Collector of Customs of Passamaquoddy District, in place of Stephen Thacher, removed. This latter appointment simplified the canvass for Representative to Congress in Washington District by reducing the number of candidates by one.

The Military Road to Houlton received an impetus from the appropriation of $47,000 by Congress for its construction.

A meeting was called by George W. Pickering, Benjamin Nourse, and John C. Dexter, to be holden May 4, for the purpose of forming an Athenæum and Reading-room, such as would "meet the wishes of the literary and mercantile inhabitants of Bangor.

Beef was selling at reasonable rates at this time. When there was an unusually large and fine animal slaughtered an extra price was obtained for choice cuts. George Wellington, market man, slaughtered an ox that weighed 2,240 pounds alive, 1,601 dressed. The beef was superior to any that had been sold in this market. Choice pieces sold for one shilling per pound; whole ox for $176.41—about nine cents a pound.

This year there were sixteen lawyers in Bangor, twenty-six in Portland, and 313 in the State.

Charles Thomas, Assistant Quartermaster United States army, issued proposals for making the United States Military Road from Mattawamkeag to Houlton, in May.

Charles Gilman, of Bangor, Enoch E. Brown, of Hampden, and Jeremiah Russell, of Hopkinton, New Hampshire, were admitted as attorneys at the Court of Common Pleas.

Samuel F. Dutton was elected captain of the Bangor Artillery.

On June 23 Rev. Benjamin Huntoon was installed over the Unitarian Society; Dr. Nichols, of Portland, preached the sermon; Rev. Mr. Mason, of Castine, made the installation prayer, and Rev. Mr. Frothingham, of Belfast, gave the charge.

This month George B. Moody, Nathaniel Hatch, Jonathan P. Rogers, Charles Stetson, and William Goodman, were admitted as counsellors in the Supreme Court, and Samuel Garnsey and Jonas Cutting, as attorneys.

The anniversary of National Independence was celebrated on July 5 by the Democratic Republicans. The committee were Isaac Hodsdon, Thomas A. Hill, John Williams, David Hill, Levi Bradley, Samuel Lowder, Jr., Asa Sawyer, and Albert G. Jewett. The orator was Gorham Parks. The Register reported the celebration as a failure, of course, and designated the oration "a lengthy production." The Register, describing the celebration in Foxcraft, says the oration was by John Appleton, Esq., of Sebec, and "was characterized by a sound and discriminating exposition of the origin, character, and excellency of our Government, and of the means which could not fail to give it perpetuity. It was free from the bitterness of party," etc. The Register said that the Jackson politicians undertook to give the impression that the celebration was a party affair, but did not succeed in their "slandorous imputation."

July 13, Muzzy & Wing—Franklin Muzzy and Aaron A. Wing—at Bucksport, advertised machinery of all kinds and of the best quality; cast-iron reacting water-wheels; iron and wood turning "done with neatness and despatch. No mistake."

A notice of a celebration of the Fourth of July was given from the pulpits, and the Eastern Republican and some of its supporters made it the basis of a prognostication of a contemplated union of Church and State.

* See Maine Reports, vol. 33, pages 587-8.

The "opposition party" were somewhat moved on getting into their possession a document of which the following is a copy:—

* Col. Carpenter is requested to procure the removal of Lt. Gallagher; is requested to see Lt. Charles Thomas, who has a brother who keeps a book-store in Philadelphia, in Chestnut or Market street.

New Post-office in North Dixmont. F. Butman at the corner to be removed after election.

County Committee: Gorham Parks, Wm. Emerson, Mark Trafton, Isaac Hodsdon, E. H. Allen.

Remove Hodsdon, Levant—Clark, Atkinson, Hill, Wiles.

Colonel Carpenter, it was alleged, took the document to Washington.

Lieutenant Gallagher was a religious man and supposed by the Jacksonians not to be friendly to the Administration; therefore he was not in favor with them. Colonel Parks did not hesitate to express his antipathy to him.

Mr. Emerson denied that he signed the Colonel Carpenter memorandum. Lieutenant Thomas disclaimed any knowledge of it, and the publication of it appears to have caused some unpleasant feeling among the gentlemen whose names were alluded to in it. Much capital was made of this paper by the opposition.

At a meeting held in Bangor on July 22d it was stated that more than one thousand families in the county had been found destitute of the Bible and supplied.

The census of the town was taken this year by William Randall, and the number of inhabitants found to be 2,864, showing an increase in ten years of 1,643.

The annual political canvass was particularly exciting. The Democrats nominated Judge Samuel E. Smith for Governor, and their opponents Jonathan G. Hunton, the incumbent. The Eastern Republican was particularly sharp on Mr. Hunton, while the Register was earnest in his support. Colonel Parks, in the columns of the former, denounced Lieutenant Gallagher because in a debate in the Lyceum he expressed an opinion in favor of the Indians, and "Castigator" in the Register was quite as severe upon Parks.

The candidates this year were, besides Hunton and Smith for Governor, John Wilkins and Thomas Davee, for Senator; Edward Kent and Gorham Parks, for Representative to the Legislature; Charles Rice, County Treasurer; Ebenezer S. Phelps and James Bates, of Somerset, for Representative to Congress. The vote of Bangor for Mr. Hunton was 321; for Judge Smith, 267; for Mr. Kent, 326; for Colonel Parks, 260.

The contest between the candidates for the Legislature was hard fought. Mr. Kent was popular beyond the limits of his party. He was a man of practical common sense, genial, and interested himself in the affairs of the town. He was a good, sensible speaker, though not eloquent. Colonel Parks was a more ready, fluent speaker, affable, with some show of attainments, but superficial. He interested himself more in politics than in his profession of the law, and took no unusual interest in the affairs of the town or of the people. He offended the religious people by his attack on Lieutenant Gallagher, and as he belonged to a party that was not known for its excessive regard for religion, he cared little for that. Mr. Kent was a Unitarian, but he respected the opinions of all denominations, knowing that they were founded in sincerity. Colonel Parks was not understood to have respect for any religious opinions.

The anniversary exercises of the Theological Seminary took place on September 8. Rev. John Crosby, a grandson of Simeon Crosby, one of the first inhabitants of Bangor, and born here, then a clergyman at Castine, delivered an address before one of the societies. The graduates this year were: Robert Crossett, of Bennington, Vermont; Elliot Palmer, Jr., of Vernon, Connecticut; Henry Richardson, of Hadley, Massachusetts; Joseph B. Stevens, of Brookfield, Connecticut. The chief criticism on the performances was that there was "too much of what is called a ministerial tone in the voice of the speakers."

Full returns showed the election of Judge Samuel E. Smith, Governor, and Gorham Parks, Representative for the Bangor District. The opposition, as usual, tried to cover up their mortification by saying that Judge Smith was elected by less than one thousand majority "out of more than fifty-five thousand," and that Colonel Parks was not the Representative of Bangor at all, but of the towns classed with it, viz: Orono, Dutton, and Sunkhaze. Dr. Bates (Administration) was elected to Congress for Somerset and Penobscot.

On the 10th the saw- and flour-mills at the lower dam on the Kenduskeag were destroyed by fire. The fire, it was supposed, originated from the friction of the spindle in the flour-mill. The mills were the property of Captain John Pearson.

This year the female scholars in the town of Atkinson started a project for reforming the fashions of the sex in such a manner that there should be no more consumption or death in that portion of the human family. They formed a society and adopted a constitution, of which this is Article 4. Every person subscribing, pledges herself to refrain entirely from wearing Busks, Boards, Stays, Cushings, Pillars (sic), Bolsters, or any kind of furnishen or rigging about the body, which is likely to cause consumption or endanger life.

The penalty for violating this article was expulsion from the society. An adult thought such societies ought to be formed in other places. It does not appear that the plan was followed by the sex, or what became of the Atkinson society.

The citizens' watch continued to be an institution in Bangor.

The Lyceum, in which the subject of the removal of the Indians had been discussed until the people became surfeited and staid away from its meetings, was resuscitated in the autumn, and Mr. Abel M. Quimby put some electricity into it by his lectures on chemistry.

Much interest was manifested this year in the improvement of the common schools in Bangor and in other parts of the State.

The condition of the streets in muddy times, and of Kenduskeag Bridge, was the cause of much complaint. In a dark night a trip from the post-office (which was in

James P. Veazie

Merchants' Row, on the easterly side of Main street) to the east side of the stream, was attended with much danger. The mud between Mason's Corner and the bridge was frequently over the shoes. The bridge was not lighted, and the plank walks were sideling and much out of repair. It was suggested that a lantern at each corner of the bridge on dark evenings would be of service.

General Webber succeeded in obtaining the census of Madawaska without interruption from the Provincials. The males were 1,314; females, 1,174—2,488. The people were French Acadians, and "generally in favor of remaining citizens of the United States." It was predicted that they were "but the pioneers of a mighty army of emigrants who will ere long be seen to spread themselves over the valleys of the St. John and Penobscot."

The Mechanic Association, at its annual meeting in December, elected John Williams President; Henry Call Vice-President; John S. Carter Secretary; Preserved B. Mills Treasurer; John S. Sayward Librarian; Nathan B. Wiggin, Stephen Gilman, John Brown, Joseph Wing, and William Emerson, second, Trustees.

John A. Poor, Secretary, gave notice of a meeting of the "Forensic Club" at the Court-house, on December 21st, to discuss the "propriety of the transporting the mails and opening the post-offices on Sunday."

The Bangor Fire Club held its annual meeting for a supper on the 28th December, at 5:30 o'clock, at Chick's hotel. Mr. A. Savage, the Secretary, reminded the members that, by their vote, it was the duty of each to furnish himself with two fire-buckets, a fire-bag four feet long by two wide, with a round bottom, and draw at the top with cords, and a bed-key, to be constantly kept together at some convenient place, and that they should keep their buckets at their respective houses.

There were at this time in the town four societies in operation for intellectual culture—the "Lyceum," the "Mechanic Association," the "Bangor Literary Club," and the "Forensic Club."

Zadock French, an enterprising merchant from Billerica, Massachusetts, who built the Penobscot Exchange and owned other valuable estates in Bangor, died December 31st, at the age of sixty-two.

1831. The year opened with remarkable weather. On the first day of January a farmer in the neighborhood ploughed his field. On the same day the schooner Success arrived in port and discharged her cargo of goods. The river had closed, but on the 26th of December it opened and continued open until after the 4th of January. On the last week in December the mercury was 56° above zero, and rain fell every other day. The freshet in the river was very high.

A new interest was at this time awakened in regard to public schools. A meeting of gentlemen from different parts of the county was held in Bangor on January 4th and 5th. Rev. Mr. Ripley, of the First Baptist Society, delivered an address upon the subject of education. A county society was organized, with Oliver Crosby, of Atkinson, President; William D. Williamson of Bangor, Ephraim Goodale of Orrington, Moses Greenleaf of Williamsburg, Vice-Presidents; Edward Kent, of Bangor, Recording Secretary; Daniel Pike, of Bangor, Corresponding Secretary; Benjamin Nourse, of Bangor, Treasurer; Seba French of Dexter, Elias Dudley of Hampden, Jonas Cutting of Orono, Thomas A. Hill and Royal Clark of Bangor, Councillors.

The society was called the "Penobscot County Association for Promoting Popular Education."

Addresses were delivered by Cyril Pearl on the defects in common schools; by Abel M. Quimby on the monitorial system; by Joseph C. Lovejoy on school-houses, apparatus and discipline. Remarks were made by Amos Patten, Daniel Pike, and William D. Williamson, and the feeling was that "the subject was one of immense importance; that great defects existed, and that they could and must be removed by a vigorous and united effort."

The Hampden Mutual Fire Insurance Company went into operation this year, under a notice of three of the corporators—Simeon Stetson, Enoch Brown, and Jedediah Herrick.

The population of Penobscot county by the census of 1830 was 31,530; Washington, Hancock, and Waldo were the only counties containing a smaller population. The population of Penobscot in 1820 was 13,870. The census of New England was 1,049,882; in 1820 it was 1,659,854; increase 200,028.

Although the country was constantly improving, yet there was much hardship among the settlers. The following tale will show that the comforts of the city were not yet known to all. In the first of the winter Mr. Stinson Potter removed his family into a camp on the east side of Pushaw Lake. About the first of January Mrs. Potter, being there with only her children, had all the cares of the household upon her. One day her cow having strayed away she sent the children into the woods to search for her, and becoming alarmed by their long absence, she went in pursuit of them. Her husband came home in the evening, and finding no one in the camp went in search of the family. He soon found the children, but not the wife. The next day her body was found a long distance from the camp, dead. Her feet and ankles were much bruised and torn, and her clothes were nearly torn from her body. She had waded through water four feet deep to reach the place where her body was found.

The ice in the Penobscot stopped permanently on the 9th January.

Hon. William D. Williamson made an attempt to get the Legislature to subscribe for three hundred and fifty copies of his History of Maine, at $4.50 per copy. The National Republicans meanly allowed political objections to the author to control their vote, and there were peculiarly mean Democratic Republicans enough to assist them in sending his petition to the next Legislature.

Party spirit ran so high that the Democrats this year insulted Mr. Hunton's administration by passing an act rendering valid the acts of the last Legislature, and of the Governor and Council! thereby rendering themselves ridiculous. The act was called the "Healing Plaster." It was reported by Ebenezer Knowlton and advocated by Gorham Parks!

Mr. Parks also advocated subscribing for Mr. Williamson's History. The Portland Advertiser had the following comments:

In the debate in the Legislature on the merits of this work it was remarked that before it went into press it would be revised and polished by a person well qualified for the task. It is now rumored that the person alluded to is no less than Williamson's son-in-law, the redoubtable Haynes, "the gentlemen alike distinguished, etc., etc." If it be so, Heaven save the work—he is as destitute of literary taste as he is of modesty—the veriest chowder-head that ever dug clams in Helicon. If such be the fact, and the Legislature patronize the work, they will be entitled to the credit of having caught the biggest humbug in Christendom.

The History was revised by Mr. Haynes, and one edition was published by the house of Glazier, Masters & Co., of Hallowell, in 1832. It contained many valuable facts. It is now nearly out of print and is much sought for.

Citizens of Dover, Maine, established an "Anti-Litigation Society" this winter. Its object was to have all controversies between its members settled by referees. Temperance societies at this time were much in vogue. The Anti-Litigation Society is not now alive, but temperance societies are, owing to the frailty of human nature; and, what is not remarkable, the friends of temperance invoke the aid of lawyers and courts in putting down intemperance.

The Hon. Samuel E. Dutton died on February 16, aged fifty-six. He had been the first President of the first bank in Bangor, and the first Judge of Probate of the county of Penobscot.

The question of the Northeastern boundary had been referred to the King of the Netherlands, and on the 10th of July his decision was put into the hands of Mr. Preble and Mr. Bagot, the American and English Commissioners.

Captain Edward Wilkins, who had been a soldier of the Revolution, died at Charleston, March 9, aged seventy-seven.

On March 14 Daniel Pike, Royal Clark, and Henry Call were elected Selectmen, Assessors, etc.; Henry Call, Town Clerk; Fred Whitman, Treasurer.

On the 1st day of April there was a great freshet in the river. In consequence of a heavy fall of rain on March 30, the ice was broken in the streams above Bangor, and came down the river with irresistible force. On the night of the 31st the prospects were alarming; the ice had jammed below the town, and the river began to rise, threatening to overflow the business part of the town. The jam gave way, however, and the water subsided. But on Friday morning (April 1) the Register says:

At 8 o'clock the alarm was again given that the jam of ice, etc., above the town had given way, and that the immense body was moving down. In a few moments the head of the advancing column was seen, and the whole village was intently watching its movements. It came opposite the mouth of the Kenduskeag; acres of ice of great thickness were thrown in heaps upon the shore with tremendous force, whilst the great body moved on, crowding and jostling like a militia company on muster-day. Suddenly the cry was raised that the mass had again jammed, as the water was rising rapidly. In less than five minutes the water rose ten or twelve feet above high-water mark, overflowing the wharves, lower streets, and the bridge. The water came in through the streets bearing shingles and clapboards on its bosom, and compelling the loitering pedestrians to abandon the sidewalks for higher ground. It is well known that at this season of the year our wharves are covered with shingles and other lumber. It is estimated that at least one million of shingles, besides other lumber, were swept off the wharves and carried down the river and lost. The water, overflowing the bridge, carried off the whole railing on both sides, together with all the sidewalks and centre arch, leaving only the carriage-way of earth; so that the old bridge now looks as demure, crestfallen, and smooth as an ancient maiden who has suddenly lost her cap and curls. (The town has been talking some time about rebuilding the bridge.) The water began to subside again in about ten minutes, and went down as suddenly as it rose; and just as our classicals (for we have classical on the Penobscot) were exclaiming: "Eheu! jam satis," the jam broke, and the ice and water took up their march for the ocean. One vessel on the stocks was thrown down—one or two buildings of small value were swept away. Shortly after this alarm we were again startled by the information that the ice and logs on the Kenduskeag were moving down; and so it proved. They came over the dam at Pearson's mills (the lower mills), carrying the dam partly away and injuring the mills considerably. A large number of logs passed through the arch of the bridge, but a considerable number were stopped. It was thought that this rush would carry away the bridge, but it produced no effect on the remaining part of it.

At Hampden the Sowadabscook cut for itself a new channel on the southerly side of the bridge, undermining it, leaving the Crosby & Dudley mills high and dry and destroying the navigation of the creek for some distance below.

At Orono the bridge, which had cost between $4,000 and $5,000, was carried away.

The bridge and dam at Levant (Kenduskeag) were carried away. The Jameson bridge, below, was carried away.

The Bridge at Six-mile Falls, Bangor, was nearly destroyed.

Eddington, at the "Bend," was overflowed—the large Sibley store was upset and some shops and a large quantity of lumber carried away.

At Sunkhaze the country was overflowed and resembled a large lake. The shore residents were obliged to abandon their houses.

This year the valuation of the State showed that Penobscot county, in the number of polls and wealth, was greater than its parent, Hancock county; the number of polls being 5,549, and valuation $1,892,812, while the number of polls in Hancock was 4,090, and valuation $1,557,571.12. Of the ten counties Penobscot was the seventh in wealth and population. Cumberland was first: polls, 9,970; valuation, $6,175,814.45.

Rev. John Smith, D. D., Principal and Professor of Theology of the Bangor Theological Seminary, died April 7, at the age of sixty-five. He was highly esteemed for his dignity, learning, and good sense.

By order of the Court of Sessions John Godfrey, Esq., County Attorney, was appointed to offer the old Court-house for sale, preparatory to building the new Court-house.

The Six-mile Falls dam being out of repair, J. K. Lumbert applied to Edward Kent, Esq., to call a meeting of the owners to take measures for its repair.

The classification of the Representative Districts by the Administration created much excitement among their opponents, who declared that it was unjustly made, and with a view only to the aggrandizement of the party. In order to insure a Representative of their own political complexion, they were accused of making inconvenient districts. One in Penobscot, called the "Hammer District," was the especial mark of their objurgation. It commenced on the northerly line of Bangor, embracing six towns, then west about ten miles to include Williamsburg, which made the Hammer. There was a great deal of criticism of this method of districting, but the Jacksonians laughed at the objections, so long as they had secured a Representative for a decade, at least, no matter how.

The Kenduskeag bridge was rebuilt this year, under Ford Whitman, James Crosby, and John Ham, a committee.

A brick school-house, twenty-four by twenty-eight, ten feet walls, was built above Treat's Falls, beyond the hill and turn in the road next above and on the westerly side of the road.

Advardus Shaw took the Maine Coffee House this year on Water street, on the site occupied by the late Daniel House.

The sloop Aurora, Captain Hutchinson, "having excellent accommodations for passengers," plied between Bangor and Portland this season. A schooner called the Free Trade plied as a packet between Bangor and Boston.

The anniversary of Independence was celebrated in the town by the Bangor Artillery, under Captain Samuel P. Dutton. Rev. Benjamin Huntoon was the orator and Edward Kent the reader of the Declaration of Independence. There were two sentiments drunk at the dinner worthy of note. One (a regular) shows the feeling that existed in regard to the decision of the King of the Netherlands on the boundary question.

"The State of Maine: Always inclined to peace—but she finds it hard to agree to the Dutchman's division, which finds a range of highlands in the bed of a river."

The other was a volunteer, by George B. Moody, Esq.: "Patriotism has been jestingly said to be the want of an office. May our patriotism be love of country, and our politics her prosperity."

Temperance societies continued to be organized through the county this year. At Dixmont one was formed with Josiah Howe President; Samuel Butman Vice President; Rowland Tyler Secretary.

The First Parish meeting-house was rebuilt, and was dedicated July 20. Rev. Swan S. Pomroy preached the sermon, Text John iv. 24. Rev. Mr. Ripley, Baptist; Rev. Mr. Schermerhorn, Methodist, of Bangor, Rev. George E. Adams, of Brunswick, Rev. John Crosby, of Castine, and Rev. Mr. Fitch, of Belfast, took part in the services.

The house was upon the present site; in fact, it was the principal part of the present house. It fronted on French street. Its windows were pointed. It had a wooden tower with four pinnacles, one at each corner, which were painted white and looked like a table bottom upwards. It was a quasi Gothic structure—not a creditable specimen of architecture. It contained 134 comfortable pews: an organ made by Calvin Edwards of Portland, and in the tower was the old bell of Mr. Bussey, re-cast, but with a tone very inferior to the original. It is the present bell. The house and organ cost something more than $12,000. The sale of pews produced $14,000.

The committees appointed by the Board of Directors for promoting popular education in Penobscot county were: On School Books: Moses Greenleaf, Joseph C. Lovejoy, Joseph Doane, Charles Stetson, William Upton, Jonas Cutting, John B. Hill, Aaron Hill, Dr. Stevens. On Qualification of Teachers: David Perham, Ephraim Goodale, Edward Kent, S. Wyman. On Systems of Instruction: David Shepherd, Samuel Garnsey, Joshua P. Dickinson, Elisha H. Allen, Jeremiah Perley. On School Houses and Apparatus: Daniel Pike, Daniel Wilkins, Elias Dudley, John Bennoch, Thomas A. Hill. On Expenses of Education: Moses Greenleaf, Amos Patten, Ephraim Goodale, George Leonard, James S. Holmes. On Arrangements: Daniel Pike, Royal Clark, Benjamin Nourse.

On August 2 the last number of the Bangor Register was issued. In their valedictory the publishers, Messrs. Burton & Carter, recommended to its patrons the Penobscot Journal, which was to be published the next week under the editorial charge of Phineas Barney, Esq., and with which they were to be connected. They plumed themselves upon the pure Republican principles the Register had always advocated, and declared it to be "a most gratifying reflection that from the first they had been decided and unwavering in their opposition to the election of Andrew Jackson to the Presidency; and desired to be thankful that for the disgrace and humiliation of his election their humble selves had nothing to answer; that they had been thought too lenient and forbearing to those who had assailed them often with billingsgate and blackguardism; that they had been inclined to reply, but had been quieted by the reflection 'that if you only give certain men rope enough, they will hang themselves;' and certainly the acts and editorials of their neighbor [of the Eastern Republican] were most excellent exemplifications of the truth of the old adage."

James Monroe, late President of the United States, died on the Fourth of July.

General Jackson's Cabinet resigned this year, because of the refusal of their ladies to associate with Mrs. Eaton, the wife of the Secretary of War. Martin Van Buren, Secretary of State; Samuel D. Ingham, Secretary of the Treasury; John H. Eaton, Secretary of War, and John Branch, Secretary of the Navy, were the resigning ministers.

August 9 Samuel L. Valentine issued a newspaper called the Penobscot Journal. Its editor was Phineas Barnes, Esq., a graduate of Waterville College. It proposed to advocate, among other things, "the encouragement and protection of domestic industry," thus showing that it would be an organ of what was then called the "National Republican" party. The paper was a large weekly, and contained from ten to fifteen columns of reading matter.

Bangor then contained 2,868 inhabitants, and the Journal gave this pleasant notice of the condition of the town:

The activity of trade in Bangor at the present time is cheering to its citizens, and excites the admiration of strangers. A large share of our merchants are in the very comfortable condition of having as much as they can do. Our streets exhibit the bustle of a city, and a fleet of shipping is constantly in the harbor. Boats and rafts are passing on the river at all times, in all directions. A large number of buildings are in progress, including several blocks of stores. Six or seven brick-yards within this village are in constant operation. A spacious hotel, we believe the largest in the State, is well filled. Laboring men are in great demand, and at the highest wages. The country around finds a ready market for its productions.

The editor, in another article, says:

This town is the key, the inlet and the outlet of an extensive region of country, highly distinguished for natural advantages. It possesses a soil which will yield ample subsistence to that which alone deserves subsistence—persevering industry—and which now bears upon much of its surface a mine of immense wealth. It is spotted with interesting and useful lakes, and traversed by numberless water-courses of untold value. With these advantages, and inhabited by a population much more than double the number of settlers in 1820, the Penobscot country seems to offer the fairest field for the useful labors of the public press.

The valuation of Bangor this year was: Personal estate, $171,465; real estate, $234,202; total, $405,667. Tillage land was valued at $11 an acre; mowing, $12.18; pasture, $6.57; woodland, $4.06; unimproved land, $1.31. Hampden's valuation was: Personal estate, $41,010; real, $111,193; Orono (including Oldtown): Personal, $11,645; real, $79,287. Brewer: Personal, $14,308; real, $62,545. Orrington: Personal, $18,528; real, $58,227. Dexter: Personal, $10,702; real, $32,692.

There was much speculation at this time in regard to the future growth of Bangor. One enthusiastic vaticinator made the following calculation, premising it by saying, that "it is probably safe to calculate that it will ultimately become the first town in Maine, and possibly in New England." Bangor, in 1830, with a population of 2,865, had increased at the rate of 135 per cent. for ten years. Portland, with a population of 12,601, had received an increase of about 46 per cent. in the same time. At the same ratio, Bangor in 1840 would contain a population of 6,739, and Portland of 18,397. In 1850 Bangor would have 15,845; Portland, 27,859. In 1860 Bangor would have 38,245; Portland, 40,674. In 1862 Bangor would have 48,571, and Portland 44,334. Thus in thirty-one years Portland would be second to Bangor in population. This view did not suit a Portland citizen, and he was unwilling to admit the conclusion, whereupon the man of Bangor says that he (the Portland man) had lost sight of the fact that the calculation was based upon this one truth, that Bangor has "twice the amount of territory depending upon it for a market that Portland ever can have; and that this whole country is now settling with unexampled rapidity." The Portland man said that Bangor lived upon the lumber trade, and would not continue to grow after the lumber was cut off: that what they wanted in Portland was money to develop its resources. The Bangor man admitted that the lumber trade was of great importance to Bangor; but that the prosperity and growth of Bangor mainly depended upon the trade of the immense and growing back country "which concentrated itself here," and that as to money, Bangor at present felt no such lack; "our lumber furnishes a very tolerable amount of this article, and we have enterprise, which is far better than cash." The Bangor writer was too enthusiastic. Bangor did not contain twenty thousand in 1862; Portland contained thirty thousand, more or less.

The Independent Volunteers (Light Infantry Company), Captain Micajah Haskell, made an excursion down the river on the 23d of August, in the packet-sloop Adventurer, Captain Cornwallis. At Bucksport and Belfast they performed various evolutions, and were highly complimented. The Belfast Light Infantry gave them a dinner at the Eagle Hotel.

The United States Revenue Cutter Morris arrived in port from a cruise on August 31; Richard Derby, Commander; Gold, Carter, and Martin, Lieutenants.

Samuel E. Smith, Democrat, was elected Governor this year over Daniel Goodenow, National Republican. Edward Kent, National Republican, was elected Representative from Bangor over Gorham Parks, Democrat. Kent's vote was 358, Parks's 840.

Hemp, raised in the county, was brought into the Bangor market, and the hope was expressed that the farmers would give their attention to its cultivation, as with proper attention it could be made profitable.

Henry A. Head and N. O. Pillsbury formed a co-partnership as auctioneers September 26.

Paul Joseph Osson, son of John Osson, a Penobscot Indian, gave indications of superior talent in a school at Oldtown, under a Catholic priest, and on a visit to Bangor became so much interested in some engravings which he saw in a store that he was taken to an artist's room, where he saw some paintings that fired him with the idea of imitating them. He succeeded so well that some Bangor gentlemen placed him with an artist, who said that his improvement indicated great promise. He was about eighteen years of age, was rather a wonder in the tribe, and an enthusiastic writer thought, if he should prove to have real genius, that the "world would stare at the Indian artist! He will be a greater wonder than West was to Europeans."

About the 1st of October there were rumors of troubles in Madawaska between Americans and Provincials.

On October 5 the Bangor Mechanic Association, the object of which was "to improve its members in the theory and practice of their several arts and professions, and to acquire and promote among themselves all good and useful knowledge," celebrated its first triennial festival by an address in the First Baptist church by Henry Call, Esq., and a dinner at the Penobscot Exchange hotel. An elegant banner was presented by the ladies.

The editor of the Journal was about calling the attention of farmers to the capacity of Maine for wheat-growing, when his eye fell upon the following paragraph from a New York magazine of 1817:—

The farmers of the District of Maine are turning their attention to the cultivation of wheat, and it is anticipated that the time will soon arrive when Boston and the other seaboard towns of the Commonwealth will derive their full supply of flour from the mills on the Kennebec and Penobscot. The scarcity in the year 1816 was not because wheat would not grow, but because very little was sown; and this year the abundance is such that one contract has been made for the sale of two thousand bushels, to be shipped from the Kennebec to Baltimore. As a specimen of what the soil of the District of Maine can produce, it is stated that Mr. Daniel Hasey, of Fairfield, raised on one acre and twenty-six rods of ground, in the summer of 1816, sixty-four bushels and a half of wheat.

And the editor put this pertinent inquiry:—

Why is it, when the capacity of the State for wheat-growing is so good, and when we have water-power equal to any in the world, that we are annually drawing thousands and thousands of barrels of our substance from the wheat-fields of New York, Maryland, Delaware, and Virginia, and paying freight and commissions, besides the first cost, which might be kept here in circulation and in our own farmers' pockets.

The unsettled condition of the Northeast boundary gave periodical excitements which possessed serious aspects for a time, though they usually subsided in the expectation that something would be done by the General Government.

The settlement on the Madawaska River, composed principally of French inhabitants, was sometimes the centre of commotions. In August, this year, under an act of the Legislature, a warrant was issued by William D. Williamson, Esq., for the purpose of organizing a town—the whole of the Madawaska settlement from the Monument north to the Highlands—as part of the county of Penobscot. The warrant was issued to Walter Powers, who appointed the meeting at the house of Peter Lirotte, but Lirotte refused to have the meeting at his house, and it was adjourned to an open field and held around a cart. Barnabas Hannawall was chosen Moderator; Jesse Wheelock, Town Clerk; Amos Mattocks, Daniel Savage, and John Hanford, Selectmen; Randall Hanford and Barnabas Hannawall, Constables. Powers administered the oath to the Selectmen. About a dozen Americans participated in the organization. Mr. Justice Rice and Captain Coombs, of the Provincial militia, protested against the proceedings. The French inhabitants took no part.

A second town meeting was held September 1, by direction of Moderator Hannawall, at Raphael Martin's house, to elect a Representative to the Maine Legislature. Peter Lirotte (a Provincial captain of militia) was elected, against the protest of Justice Rice, in His Majesty's name. About twenty of the French inhabitants participated in the proceedings.

It had been reported among the Provincials that John G. Deane and Edward Kavanagh had, in August previous, under a resolve by the Maine Legislature, been through the settlement, taking an account of the number of settlers, and had taken pains to impress it upon them that they were inhabitants of Maine and owed no allegiance to Great Britain.

These proceedings were reported by James A. Mac- lauchlan, a magistrate, and an agent of the British Government to prevent aggressions upon the disputed territory, to the Provincial Government. Whereupon the Governor and Council sent the Attorney-General and Mac- lauchlan to Madawaska to learn facts and "prevent further aggressions." The result was the arrest of Moderator Hannawall, Selectman Savage, Town Clerk Wheelock, and one Daniel Bean, who, refusing to give bail, were committed to prison to answer to indictments that might be found against them. Some French people were arrested who gave bail and were not committed. Some escaped to the woods; among them John Barker.

On October 13 the grand jury of York county, Province of New Brunswick, found a bill of indictment against Barnabas Hannawall, John Baker, Walter Powers, Jesse Wheelock, Daniel Savage, Randal Harford, John Harford, Nathaniel Bartlett, Augustin Webster, and Amos Mattocks, for attempting to procure sedition within said Province, and to subvert His Majesty's authority within the same, and to set up and establish a foreign power and dominion in place thereof. Of these, Hannawall, Wheelock, and Savage were tried before Mr. Justice Chipman, found guilty, and each sentenced to pay a fine of £50, and be imprisoned in the gaol of the county for three months and until the fines were paid.

The imprisonment of these men, however, did not continue long. Before the end of November they were on their way home, having been permitted to depart on their personal security for the payment of fines and costs. The release was in consequence of communications from the British Minister at Washington to the Government of New Brunswick, and the order for their release was signed by the Governor of the Province, Sir Archibald Campbell.

This affair created much excitement in Bangor, but the opinion prevailed to some extent that the action of the Legislature in relation to the territory when negotiations were pending between the General Governments for the settlement of the boundary question, was injudicious and seemed too much like nullification.

The lead mine discovered at Sebec a year or two before this was said to contain very rich ore, equal to the Missouri, and, in the opinion of English miners who had examined it, inexhaustible.

The Educational Association for Penobscot county organized this year, held a public meeting in Bangor on October 5. The introductory lecture was given by Rev. Mr. Huntoon, of Bangor, and the closing by Rev. Mr. Niles, of Brewer. Rev. J. C. Lovejoy and Daniel Pike, Esq., of Bangor, and Judge Perham, of Brewer, were appointed a committee on the qualification of teachers.

The indications of thrift and growth in Bangor this year were very encouraging. Nine brick-yards turned out three million two hundred thousand bricks. The number of buildings erected was in the neighborhood of one hundred. Among them were fourteen large brick stores, two blocks three stories high.

The Bangor Commercial Bank went into operation. Thomas A. Hill, President; Thomas A. Hill, William Emerson, Amos Patten, James B. Fiske, James Crosby, Directors; Edward Richardson, Cashier.

Lieutenant J. S. Gallagher, Second Regiment United States Infantry, who had been stationed at Bangor as Assistant Commissary of Subsistence, was transferred to Fort Gratiot, Michigan Territory, and left on the 19th of October. Lieutenant Samuel L. Russell was appointed to his place.

Chief Justice Mellen presided at a session of the Supreme Judicial Court in October. But one indictment for a criminal offence was found, and there was no trial. The Journal said the Chief Justice "presided with his usual ability, fairness, and impartiality. We think the Chief Justice an excellent judge in many respects, and especially in keeping the lawyers in order and to the point."

The Madawaska difficulties were the occasion of a meeting of the Governor and Council, who resolved "to adopt all proper and constitutional means to procure the release" of the prisoners, and appointed one of their number to go to Fredericton to see the prisoners and provide for their families, and caused a "general order to be issued to the militia to be in readiness to meet such requisition as circumstances may require, and as the President of the United States may deem necessary for the protection of our citizens and territory."

The organization of Madawaska was made after the designation by the King of the Netherlands of the bed of St. John River as a suitable boundary between the United States and British America, and therefore considered unquestionably justifiable, as it was made on the United States side of the line designated.

This year a public clock, the product of the skill of

Mr. George Fitts, an ingenious mechanic of the town, was placed upon the Unitarian church, at a cost of $500, raised by private subscription.

The Bangor Bridge Company under their act of incorporation took preliminary steps for building a bridge to connect Bangor and Brewer.

The complaints of the selling of liquor and drunkenness in Bangor were common. "Citizen" in the Journal on the 6th of December says:

I had supposed that temperance societies and the unpopularity of drinking strong liquors would be sufficient to put a stop to the evil. I sav evil; I have no doubt, in my own mind, that it is the greatest evil of our day. We now almost daily, and in some instances oftener, see some of our fellow-beings—and some of them once respectable—falling into the mud in our streets, and when down not able to rise. We find grog-shops erected and kept in nearly every possible place, selling spirits without license, making drunkards by the thousand. Shops are kept open on the Sabbath and young men are carried home to their parents on that day unable to help themselves.

In the issue of the 20th a subscriber says:

I can assure the editor that I will find ten shops and cellars in the village that are selling rum, gin, and other strong drinks without a license, and also a greater number of stores. Many of the store-keepers do not wish to be thought rumsellers, and have removed their rum into the second story.

The editor corroborates the statement, but adds that he is in possession of some very gratifying facts in relation to the progress of temperance in the town and vicinity.

Proposals were requested in October by Thomas A. Hill, John Godfrey, and Thornton McGaw, Committee, for building a brick court-house agreeably to plan.

Ford Whitman, Joseph K. Lumbert, and John Fiske wished to contract for building a block of brick stores, 335 feet in length by 58 feet wide, and for graveling a wharf 335 feet in length. This block was built on Exchange street.

On the 26th of November, 1831, the Selectmen, Daniel Pike, Royal Clark, and Henry Call, published a petition to the Legislature setting forth that, on application, the Overseers of the Poor had furnished supplies to Oliver Leonard, Esq., and his wife Sarah, before his decease to them both, and after his decease January 3, 1828, until her decease; that, in 1829, said Sarah received an annuity,* and left an estate of considerable amount; that the administrator of Sarah's estate had refunded the supplies furnished her, but doubted his authority to refund the sum advanced before the death of her husband, and refused to do so; whereupon they prayed the Legislature to authorize the administrator to refund that sum, being $83.53.

On March 3, 1832, the Legislature granted the Selectmen leave to withdraw.

General Trafton had on exhibition some fine specimens of apples and grapes from the farm of General Herrick, of Hampden, and fruit growers were convinced that the climate of the region would be no obstacle to success in raising many of the most valuable kinds of fruit.

On December 22 pledges were given in the Methodist congregation, to abstain from the use and manufacture of ardent spirits, except when they were absolutely necessary as a medicine.

John Atean, Governor; Joseph Lion, Councilor; Norril Lion; Sappeal Mohawk, Co.; Joseph Poris; Jo Mary Mohawk; Nicolar Netchet; Poris Bear, Esquire; Noel Poris; Peal Pole Poris; Captain Nicolar; Peal Michael Sousep; Captain Fransnay Sousep; Fransnay Sousep; Sabatis Sousep; John Sousep; Jo Mitchell; Captain Jo Mary; Sabatis Bear; Deniselas Jo Nicolar; Fransnay Jo Nicolar; Sol Ninepence; Atean Racoon; Glossean; Jo Michael Glossean; Socabason Glossean; Andra Sappeal; Tomer Soc Lexis; Sappael Sock Lexis; Peal Michael Sock Lexis; Captain Francis; Peal Nicolar Francis; Peal Nicolar Palassy; Sabatis Sunksus; Loui Neptune; Captain John Orson; Captain Atean Orson; Nicolar John Orson; Paul Sousep John Orson; Jo Mary John Orson; Sabatis Martin; Jo Lolar; Loui Lolar; Jo Swarsin, published a card in the Journal of January 3, alleging that they were Indians of the Penobscot Tribe, friends of the then Governor, John Atean, and all over eighteen years of age, which was the period of their majority and freedom from their fathers.

It was estimated that the advantage derived by the people of this county in the last three years from the temperance cause, if it could be reduced to money, was of more value than $200,000.

A Congregational meeting-house was built at Oldtown this year.

Bangor at this time was attracting much attention, and enterprising business men were establishing themselves in the town. Mr. Isaac Damon, an architect of note from Northampton, Massachusetts, in a letter dated Bangor, January 26, 1832, said :

I was most agreeably disappointed at the appearance of the place, and greatly surprised at the magnitude of its business operations. Bangor is situated on the west side of the Penobscot, and on both sides of the Stream Kenduskeag, over which a new and excellent bridge has been constructed the past year. It has four houses of public worship, three of which are brick—three of them have bells, and one is furnished with a town clock; besides these, you have presented in the same view another meeting-house in the growing village of Brewer, upon the east side of the main river. There is also a Theological Seminary, together with public free school, very creditable to the people, as evidence of a just concern for universal education, in conformity with the spirit of the age and the laws of the State. There are seventy-three stores and shops occupied by merchants and traders, and a great number of almost all descriptions of mechanics. There are five public houses, one of which, where I am now writing, owned and occupied by Mr. Ebenezer French, and the widows and heirs of the late Zadoc French, Esq., by whom it was created, is a splendid mansion, that would be an ornament to any of our largest cities; and, what is of more importance to the traveler, it is kept in a style in no respect inferior to its appearance.

To give you some idea of the growth of Bangor I will first notice that seventy-two dwelling houses and stores have been erected and put under contract for building within the past year; more than half of which appear to be substantial brick buildings, and most of them are rented or contracted for before they are completed; while many persons are waiting their removal here for a chance to hire a house and store.

It may be well inquired, what sustains the business and population so rapidly concentrating at Bangor?

The resources afforded by the great extent of territory connected by the river and tributary streams, all navigable for boats and rafts, which here find a common outlet for the immense productions of the forest, from a distance of more than an hundred miles, consisting of lumber of almost all descriptions, superior, in general, to any that can be procured in any part of New England. Great as this branch of business undoubtedly is, it will soon be rivalled by the superior importance of those agricultural productions which here also must receive their destination to different part of the United States and to foreign countries. The mills at Stillwater and Orono comprise upwards of fifty saws, estimated to cut over forty millions of boards; to be added to these are numerous mills above, on the main river, as well as those on the Kenduskeag and other streams connected with and falling into it above Bangor, which greatly augment the quantity of boards; besides which there are clapboard, latli, and shingle-mills that manufacture an almost incredible quantity of those articles to add to the stock of boards and timber. In fact, the value and fitness of materials for building to be found at Bangor, together with the faithfulness of their merchants in the execution of contracts and the high character of their survey, have come to be in such extensive reputation that large orders are sent here to be executed from the principal manufacturing places in New England.

It is computed that over four hundred yoke of oxen, with an appropriate number of choppers and loggers, are scattered over the territory contiguous to the river and its tributary streams, for a distance of more than 120 miles, all connected with the mills and business of this place. When this view is taken of the resources of the county, together with the important fact that ten or twelve ships and vessels of various descriptions are, and probably will continue to be annually built here and in the immediate vicinity, there is no difficulty in finding efficient causes for the growth and permanent increase and prosperity of Bangor.

In regard to agriculture, he says that from his residence and observation for several months he is convinced that "no part of New England affords so great inducements for our enterprising and industrious young men to come and settle down as farmers. The soil is good, and a cash market is at hand for produce. . . . I have no doubt the chance is better from the mere pursuit of agriculture for a young man to acquire property, support a family, and enjoy health and promote his happiness here than in any of the Western States remote from the Atlantic."

The Mechanic Association celebrated the 22d of February, the one hundredth anniversary of Washington's birthday, by thirteen guns at sunrise—"the old thirteen"—and one hundred at noon, and a meeting in the Court-house in the evening, where a prayer was made by Rev. Mr. Huntoon. Washington's Farewell Address was read by Rev. Mr. Ripley, and remarks were made by Henry Call, Esq., and others. The temperature in the morning was from twenty to twelve degrees below zero, and the day was said to be "one of the brightest and most beautiful of our winter days."

The day was celebrated in Hampden. An address was delivered by Hon. Enoch Brown. Washington's Farewell Address was read by Rev. Otis Briggs. The music was directed by D. John Abbott, and was pronounced "excellent." Captain Edward Snow "served up" a dinner in "good style," which was partaken of by citizens, among whom were several soldiers of the Revolution. General John Crosby officiated as President; Hon. S. Stetson and General J. Herrick as Vice-Presidents. Some of the volunteer sentiments were partisan and spicy:

By General Herrick (Whig). "President Jackson's Visit: A series of vulgar fractions reduced to their lowest terms."

By Colonel Emery (Democrat). "The Tariff of 1828: Recommended by Adams and Clay, and may it sink into oblivion with those who recommended it."

By A. Matthews. "Free Trade: Sensible in theory, but infeasible in practice."

It was predicted at this time that the buildings to be put up the next season on the east side of the Kenduskeag, and the consequent transfer of business to that side, with the location of the bridge there, would cause "a nearer equilibrium in the growth and prosperity of our town." During a series of years the business on the westerly side of the Kenduskeag predominated over that of the easterly side.

The town election this year occurred on the 12th of March. Edward Kent had 175 votes for Moderator; William D. Williamson, 133. It was a partisan election. The majorities of the Whigs were about the same for all the candidates. Samuel Lowder, Royal Clark, and Henry Call were elected Selectmen; Timothy Crosby, James R. Fiske, and John Wilkins, Overseers of the Poor; Ford Whitman, Treasurer.

The Northeast boundary question was before the Legislature this year, and proceedings were had in relation to a surrender of a portion of the territory for a consideration, which created much acrimonious feeling.

An act regulating the survey of lumber was passed by the Legislature, which was decidedly of great importance.

The Fire Wards of the town established some regulations for efficient action this year.

The number of children in Penobscot county by the last census was 7,407 males, 6,954 females; total, 14,361. In the then ten counties it was the ninth in numbers. The whole number of children in the State was 171,406.

Portland became a city this year.

Wiggins Hill, Samuel Louder, John Ham, Ezra Hutchins, and John LeGro, Jr., were chosen Road Commissioners, under a statute of the last Legislature, instead of Highway Surveyors.

The School Committee of this year were John Godfrey, William Abbott, Daniel Pike, John Ham, Samuel Garnsey, Thomas J. Folks, William Thompson, John Thurston, William Blaisdell; and $2,000 were raised for the support of schools.

A packet schooner called the Free Trade, that plied between Bangor and Boston, Captain H. Harriman, master, struck on the Duck ledges on Sunday morning, April 8, and bilged. She was on her return from Boston with a freight of $20,000; vessel worth $4,000; small insurance on all. The passengers were landed in the vessel's boats on Monhegan Island. The master was absolved from blame. The Free Trade was new and owned in Bangor. The captain attributed the loss to the disregard of his orders by the mates. The weather was bad and continued so for several days. The captain made great efforts to recover her and some part of the cargo, but did not succeed. The wreck was afterwards picked up off Cape Cod (April 25), and was towed into Gloucester. A portion of her cargo was saved. The Free Trade was repaired and put upon the route again the next September.

On April 30 Kenduskeag Bank was organized. John Wilkins, Joseph R. Lumbert, Elisha H. Allen, George W. Pickering, and Levi Cram were chosen Directors. John Wilkins was made President, and Theodore S. Dodd Cashier.

Daniel Pike, a prominent citizen, died May 6, at the age of forty-eight.

A fine-toned bell was put in the Methodist meeting-house in April.

A writer in the Journal discovers that there were "seventy-one barrels of liquors" on board the schooner Free Trade when she was lost, and did not wonder at the quantity on board a smuggler's vessel when it might be sold "either with or without license, without any molestation or hindrance in this town." Another, in reply, says that no town in the State is in advance of Bangor in temperance.

Rev. Mr. Pomroy said of the trustees that Dr. Enoch Pond had accepted a professorship in the Theological Seminary; and acknowledged the receipt of $1,000 from Mrs. Lord of Kennebunk for the benefit of the library.

The spring was cold this year. Fires were comfortable up to and into June. They were kept up until May 24th in Baltimore, and snow fell later as far south as Newport, Rhode Island. It was claimed that the climate was quite as mild as that in those places.

In June "A Friend" proposes a walk with a friend in the morning in several stanzas of this style of poetry:

My friends! the sun begins to gild
* The concave of the Eastern sky;
And all the landscape now is filled
With sounds of mirth and jollity.

Winter has gone, and lovely June
Is clad in cerule vestments fair;
Then rise and listen to the tune
Of Linnet in the summer air.

We'll hasten to our fav'rite spot,
Where rise the crags so high and steep;
And lose ourselves in busy thought,
While going down the "Lover's Leap."*

It has been a question with many of the Bangor ro-mancers how the precipice called "Lover's Leap" acquired its name, and frequent attempts have been made for its solution. A poem was written in 1881, from which a solution satisfactory to some sentimental pilgrims to that spot may be gathered. "Raven Hair" must have belonged to a tribe anterior to the Penobscot, or "Iron Hand" been under the influence of that nectar which inspires so many of the knights of the wood to perform astonishing feats, and led to the enactment of a law for the suppression of its use. The poem may be found in the sketch of Kenduskeag town, in the second division of this book.

Jonathan P. Rogers, of Bangor, was appointed Attorney-General of the State, in place of Erastus Foote.

On the 28th June the Selectmen gave notice that a quarantine was established from that date on all vessels which should arrive within the limits of the town in the Penobscot River, from Eastport and Lubec, and the British Provinces, and any port in which cholera morbus or any contagious disease was prevailing. Timothy Crosby, Esq., was appointed Quarantine Officer, and Dr. Rufus K. Cushing, Physician.

Much alarm existed because of the prevalence of Asiatic cholera in Lower Canada. A public meeting of the citizens was called, and physicians were called upon by the Board of Health to report regulations in regard to the disease. They replied by saying, in order to allay undue excitement and alarm, that there were but few insulated and solitary cases within the bounds of the United States, and those were connected with the emigration of foreigners from Canada, and that they had positive assurance that the disease was in no case spreading or prevailing. For regulations they referred to the then recent report of the Boston Board of Health, published in the Journal of June 26th, in the principles of which they concurred. The cholera did not reach Bangor until 1849, when many persons died of the disease, and great alarm prevailed, and business was prostrated.

Dr. John Mason was selected by the citizens, in 1831, to visit New York to obtain information respecting the disease, and observe its symptoms and modes of treatment.

In July more than two hundred dwelling-houses, stores, and shops were building in the town. Rents were enormously high, and nearly every building about to be erected was rented as soon as the plan was drawn. The courthouse and bridge across the Penobscot were commenced, and wharves and piers were springing up in the harbor.

There were two celebrations of the Fourth of July this year—one by the citizens, the other by the Jackson partisans.

The citizens' celebration was by a procession, oration, and dinner. The procession was escorted by a company of citizen volunteers, under command of Captain Samuel P. Dutton. The reading of the Declaration of Independence was by Peleg Chandler, Esq.; the oration was by Dr. Barker; and the dinner was presided over by Hon. Allen Gilman, assisted by Samuel Lowder and Edward Kent.

Although a citizens' celebration, the regular toasts indicated partisanship the reverse of Jacksonism, as :

"The President of the United States. He said a wise thing when he expressed an opinion against being a candidate for re-election; he would do a wise thing if he would follow his own prescription."

"Henry Clay. The advocate of liberty in every clime. We trust to see him President of these United States." (Received with three cheers.)

Of the volunteer sentiments, this by Nathaniel Hatch: "The present Administration are for fixing our limits in the bed of a river,—we trust yet to find them on a Clay hill."

And this by J. Appleton, Esq., of Sebec [afterwards Chief Justice Supreme Court]: "Our Governor. A better speculator on his own account than in behalf of the State."

The excitement was considerable in the State, because the Administration party was inclined to adopt the award of the King of the Netherlands, fixing our northeast boundary in the bed of the St. John River for a consideration—virtually selling all the territory north of that river, and several of the sentiments referred to that.

A notable feature in the celebration of the day was a company of truckmen and others in white frocks, with blue ribbons about the neck and white trousers, on horseback. Their fine riding and evolutions occasioned much favorable comment.

Colonel Samuel Lowder, Jr., of this town, a fine classical scholar and a gentleman very highly esteemed, died on the Fourth of July, in Exuma, Turk's Island, where he had gone for the improvement of his health. His remains were brought to Bangor for interment. He was buried with appropriate civil and military honors. Major-General Hodsdon (to whose staff he belonged) and his staff, Brigadier-General Williams and his staff, and the officers of the regiment, with the military companies of the place and vicinity, and citizens generally, attended the funeral. Colonel Lowder was a native of Dedham, Massachusetts.

William F., only son of Hon. William D. Williamson, died on the 6th of September, at the age of eighteen.

At this time the following table was published, showing the men supplied by each State to the regular army during the Revolution, between 1775 and 1783, inclusive, and the population of the States in round numbers:—

STATES	Regulars	Free Population in 1790.
New Hampshire	12,497	141,000
Massachusetts (including Maine).	67,907	475,000
Rhode Island	5,098	68,000
Connecticut	31,939	235,000
New York	17,781	319,000
New Jersey	10,726	176,000
Pennsylvania	25,778	431,000
Delaware	2,386	51,000
Maryland	13,912	216,000
Virginia	26,677	561,000
North Carolina	7,263	293,000
South Carolina	6,447	133,000
Georgia	2,697	51,000

The votes of Bangor, on September 10, at the State annual meeting, were: For Samuel E. Smith, Democrat, 434; Daniel Goodenow, National Republican, 512. Smith was re-elected.

Captain Andrew W. Hasey, who kept a hotel at the corner of Hammond and Franklin streets (where the Davis Block now stands), received much credit for abandoning his lucrative traffic in ardent spirits.

The National Republicans made great complaint against General Mark Trafton, the "Jackson Postmaster" of the town, for abuse of the franking privilege in distributing partisan circulars through the post-office urging his party to organize, and said that they thought it inconsistent with the utterances of President Jackson in his inaugural, where he accused the Administration of John Quincy Adams of having brought the "power and patronage of the General Government into conflict with the freedom of elections." The complaint, however, was abortive; the State and county were Jacksonian, and the dominant party held to the principle, "To the victors belong the spoils."

Lawlessness prevailed to some extent in the fall. A fire-engine on the west side of the Kenduskeag was mischievously removed from its place of deposit; a valuable elm tree on Hammond street was cut down; signs were pulled down, and other acts of wanton mischief were done, and the Selectmen offered a reward of $50 for evidence that would convict the principal offenders.

The benevolence of the people was taxed in behalf of the people of the Cape de Verde Islands, and contributions were taken in the several churches, with the following result:

First Parish (Congregational), Rev. Mr. Pomroy	$158 25
First Baptist, Rev. Mr. Ripley	40 00
Union Street (Unitarian), Rev. Mr. Huntoon	103 09
Methodist	43 00

The Madawaska "insult" afforded the Major-General of the Third Division of Militia, Isaac Hodsdon, through John Hodgdon, his aid-de-camp, opportunity to manifest his patriotism under the head of "Division Orders." An extract or two from the manifesto will give an idea of the gallant spirit that prevailed among the military worthies at the time. Referring to the call of the Governor to be ready for service, he says:

In reiterating this call of the Commander-in-chief to the officers and soldiers of the Division, it affords peculiar pleasure to the Major-General to know that they have anticipated such a requisition with that zeal and satisfaction which the occasion demands, and are impatient to manifest their alacrity in obeying it.

The proximity of this Division to the place where the outrage was committed is a sufficient guarantee to the troops of which it is composed that they will be allowed to participate in avenging (if necessary) the indignity which would otherwise be cast upon the escutcheon of the Republic. A spirit of forbearance only has restrained them until now from avenging it, either by capture or reprisal.

The volunteer corps, and particularly the companies of light infantry and riflemen, are reminded that an opportunity may soon be presented them to evince the ability of their knowledge of military evolutions and discipline for which which they have been so deservedly distinguished.

The Presidential election occurred on November 6. The vote of Bangor was: For Henry Clay, 504; for Andrew Jackson, 367. The vote of Brewer was: For Clay, 117; Jackson, 111. Of Orrington: For Clay, 131; Jackson, 44.

Samuel Snow, Jr., of Bangor, was killed on the night of November 1 by a blow from William Dwelley, a neighbor and relative. Dwelley and his wife had been absent from home. On returning they heard the cries of their children as if terrified. On entering his house, Dwelley found Snow there, and that he was the cause of the children's alarm. On seeing Dwelley, Snow ran, and Dwelley gave him a blow upon his stomach which caused his instant death.

On November 6 appeared the petition to the Legislature of 1833, of Moses Greenleaf and others, for the incorporation of the "Bangor and Piscataquis Canal and Railway Company," to construct canals and railways from the tide-waters of Penobscot River to places on the Piscataquis River.

Judge William D. Williamson, of Bangor, published his History of Maine, in two volumes, this year.

The deaths in Bangor for four years ending December, 1832, were:

From January, 1829, to January, 1830	54
From January, 1830, to January, 1831	34
From January, 1831, to January, 1832	54
From January, 1832, to January, 1833	95

1833. After the organization of the Legislature this year John Hodgdon, Esq., (Democrat) a young lawyer of Bangor and Aid de-Camp of Major-General Isaac Hodsdon, was elected a member of Governor Smith's Council.

Proposals for building a granite wall three hundred feet long, three feet thick, and fifteen feet high, on the north shore of Dennet's Cove, were advertised for by M. & A. Patten and J. B. Fiske. This was a beautiful cove about a quarter of a mile below the mouth of the Kenduskeag. It was a depot for rafts of lumber, but has since been filled and the Maine Central Railroad now occupies the ground for a station and other purposes.

On the 26th of January a portion of the Fire Department and several citizens, went to Oldtown to assist in extinguishing a fire at General Veazie's mills, occasioned by throwing coals and brands from the stove in one of the mills on the slabs on the outside. The mills were saved.

The towns of Bangor, Hampden, Frankfort, Prospect, and Camden were at this time included in the customs district of Belfast. In this district there were registered and enrolled, in 1832, four new brigs, thirty-four schooners, and one sloop. The amount of tonnage was 14,014 tons.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph E. Littlefield opened a young ladies' school. Lectures were to be given in physiology, chemistry, astronomy, etc. Terms, French and English, $6 per quarter; English, $5. A class of misses between eight and twelve years of age would be admitted at $4 per quarter.

On the 12th of February an "Old Inhabitant of Boston" said through the Penobscot Journal:

Within a few years our town has so essentially altered its appearance that a person who resided here about ten years since, and who recently paid us a visit, said that he could hardly believe the fact that he was in Bangor; that the last year more than two hundred buildings, wharves, etc., were erected, and the present season there will probably be as many more, including a meeting-house and a spacious hotel.

On February 13 Philip Coombs advertised for sale three parcels of land on State street, within two hundred rods of the Kenduskeag bridge. One of the lots consisted of thirty-two acres on the north side of the street; one lot on the south side between the street and low water mark, comprising ten acres; and one lot twenty-seven rods on the street and twenty-three rods on Newbury street, containing ten acres, with a house forty by forty-four, three stories high, and twenty finished rooms.

On the 16th a meeting was notified by the request of George W. B., James B. Fiske, George Starrett, and twenty-five others, to be held at Hill & Starrett's office on February 26, for organizing a "parish or religious society."

Fast driving was, as it ever will be, until drivers become decent, a cause of complaint. Somebody was very properly indignant that "a sleigh drove directly across the path" of two ladies who were on their way to church on Sunday, and struck one of the ladies "with such force as to tear in tatters a thick broadcloth cape, cloak, and under silk cape, and then passed on without stopping."

On the 18th of February a building on the lot now occupied by ex-Vice-President Hamlin, owned by the Theological Institute, and used by them as a chapel and school-house, was destroyed by fire. The loss was $1,000, for which it was insured. Counsellor Peleg Chandler tendered his thanks to the fire wards, engine men, and all the citizens whose "cool, prompt, and energetic exertions," and "calm and affective aid, saved his house and outbuildings—which were near the chapel—from a like fate."

Mr. Major Moulthrop, from Connecticut, at this time commenced a course of instruction in landscape drawing and painting at the Franklin House on the 26th of February.

A fire which destroyed a building of Judge Williamson's, occupied as a dry-goods store (by William H. Hartwell), and in which were two lawyers' offices (S. H. Blake's and N. Haynes's), and the Democratic Republican (newspaper) office, causing a loss of some $5,000 or more, led to the suggestion that a fire department be organized in town. Something more was wanting than men mounting ridge-poles and bawling "fire!" "water!" on the one hand and females passing water on the other.

A temperance celebration occurred on the 26th of February. An address was delivered by Edward Kent, and contained these memorable words:

But there are objectors to this system of total abstinence. Perhaps you say, "I care but little about my glass; I can drink, or I can omit drinking without any painful effort. I occasionally take my glass, but have no fixed habit. It would be no great effort for me to abandon it altogether. But I do not choose to do so. I will not pledge myself to abandon it."

Waiving all appeals to you in respect to your own danger of yet finding yourself on the downward road, let us reason a moment together in relation to your influence upon others. I ask you, what hope is there of effecting the great moral reformation we aim at, and you admit you desire, if men should act upon your principle? Would you depend upon the fines and imprisonment, and the house of correction, to bring to disgrace and punishment the hopeless drunkard? But our object is not only, and in truth not so much, to cure, as to prevent intemperance. We would not despair of the habitual and confirmed drunkard. But we honestly confess that our hopes and our aims lie in resisting the beginning of evils; in drying up the fountain from which issues the deadly stream—in staying the steps of the unfortunate ere yet the fatal habit is formed, or the fatal spell cast around them. And now, I ask, how can you assist in this work whilst you are in the daily or common use of ardent spirits? The youth who is just forming his habits of intemperance, replies to your remonstrance, "Why do you upbraid or advise me? You, too, drink; why should not I?" You may say: "I never drink to excess; I can command myself; I have no fear of any bad effects." But will he believe it, or admit that he is not your equal in resolution? Will self-love thus decide? Will not your example give confidence and encouragement in this self-relying course of temperate drinking, which has been the smooth, worn path of thousands to a drunkard's grave?

The meeting was adjourned from the Methodist meeting-house (then on Union street) to the First Parish meeting-house in the evening, when William Abbot, Esq., was chosen Chairman, and Rev. Joseph C. Lovejoy, Secretary.

Rev. T. B. Ripley (Baptist) spoke to a resolution expressing gratitude to the Almighty for the success which had attended the efforts of the American Temperance Society. He said that "previous to its operations our country was in a most deplorable situation. The history of the past exhibited a fearful and rapid progress of the evil, and our forebodings of the future were still more dreary." Some previous efforts had been made, but with little success: "It was at last discovered that nothing could be done without entire abstinence."

From the best information the committee of that society had been able to obtain, "more than 1,500,000 people in the United States now abstain from the use of ardent spirits, and from furnishing it for the use of others; there are more than 4,000 temperance societies, embracing more than 500,000 members; more than 1,500 distilleries have been stopped; more than 4,000 merchants have ceased to traffic in it; and more than 4,500 drunkards ceased to use intoxicating drinks. There is reason to believe that 20,000 persons are now sober, who but for the temperance reformation would have been sots; 20,000 families are in comfort who would have been in poverty; and 50,000 children saved from the blasting influence of drunken parents."

John Appleton, Esq. (now Chief Justice Appleton), spoke to this resolution:

Resolved, That moderate drinking is the real and true cause of intemperance, and should be so considered and treated by the friends of temperance.

He said:

Drunkenness is supported by no one. The very sight of the drunkard is sufficient to disgust all who see him. He is looked upon by all as a criminal, loathed and avoided. But who made him a drunkard? From what class do drunkards come? From the temperate drinkers. Let no one who uses a little presume to say, "I am safe." Let him not in the fire of conscious strength say, "I shall never be moved." When he is warned of danger let him not say, "Am I a dog that I should become a drunkard?" No one goes to ruin at once. No one can say, "I can set bounds that I will not pass." Every drunkard has said this, and yet not one has kept his word. Temperate drinkers, these are the supporters of drunkenness, the very class from which the more daring and brave are promoted to the honors and titles and wounds and bruises, disgrace and death of drunkards; this is the path to glory in which all temperate drinkers are walking. I repeat it, moderate drinkers are the only efficient friends of intemperance.

Rev. Mr. Husted (Methodist), to the resolution that the traffic in ardent spirits is a moral wrong, said if ardent spirits do evil, the conclusion follows that it is wrong to deal in them. "The fact was evident from looking into even one province of its ravages. Look at its desolations in the empire of mind."

Rev. Professor Pond (Congregationalist) in seconding the resolution, said that he arose "not to reproach the dealer, but to expostulate with him." . . . "You have seen the mischief it [rum] has done, and you know what it will do. Now if you not only suffer it to go but send it out, who, I beseech you, is to blame? Are not you to blame?"

Rev. Mr. Pomroy (Congregationalist) in advocating the resolution said about forty stores now sold ardent spirits in Bangor; and the influence the traffic exerted upon the inhabitants of the county was very great and disastrous.

Rev. J. C. Lovejoy (Congregationalist) presented a resolution that a committee of five be appointed to labor for three months in the cause of temperance in the county, and said that the American Congress in 1776 resolved to carry on the war of the Revolution to save the country from tyranny, and "they conquered. A day of joyful triumph has ever since been kept. I trust the day will come when this anniversary shall be kept as a day of jubilee, a day of songs, of joy and grateful anthems of praise to God. But the war is yet for a long time to be carried on. We may, if we will, banish the monster from our shores."

The committee appointed were the Rev. J. C. Lovejoy, Edward Kent, Esq., Rev. T. B. Ripley, and Rev. Mr. Husted.

The Penobscot Mill-dam Company was organized and proceeded to build their dam and mills at McMahan's Falls for the manufacture of lumber.

Albert G. Jewett, Esq., had been appointed by the Governor and Council County Attorney for Penobscot. The tenure of the office was seven years.

Bonds for the conveyance of timber-lands and house-lots had now become articles of speculation, and the demand for them was so great that the values of all kinds of real estate became so enormous as almost to craze the community. There were cool heads, but the many were engaged in making the country wealthy by giving fictitious values to the manufacture or transfer of bonds for their conveyance for a certain sum within a fixed time. Men would make bonds of lands to which they had no title whatever, find purchasers, and run the risk of being required to make the conveyance. As these bonds were the subject of speculation, and not the lands, they would finally get into the hands of some one who neither could sell them again nor raise the money to pay for the lands, and they would expire in his possession. Sometimes the obligor, if possessed of means, would prepare himself for the emergency of conveying by afterwards getting a bond of the owner with the value of the lands fixed at a far less sum than he was to be paid. Some actual sales were made under such contracts.

But the poor people had heard so much in regard to large sums of money being made by "bonds" that much imposition was practiced. It is recorded that a conceited man of color was so impressed with the idea that his fortune was to come to him in this way that he was determined to be the possessor of a bond at some price. He found a person who was willing to aid him—This person—a wag—gave him a bond; and his bond was a bond—no more. The effect upon the obligee was astonishing. He conceived that he had a fortune, and he became very much excited and could not sleep. He could not comprehend why it should produce such a change in his feelings. He seemed to be beside himself, and finally disappeared altogether from the town.

Another speculator, who was a deacon of a church, became so involved in bond speculation that his pastor deemed it his duty to refer to the questionable character of the business. The deacon's reply was, "My dear sir, I would that that thou wast altogether such as I am, except these bonds." The poor deacon, like St. Paul, had some bonds that did not affect him comfortably.

General Isaac Hodsdon was this year reappointed Clerk of the Courts for Penobscot county.

The Legislature passed acts to increase the capital stock of the Kenduskeag Bank, Bangor; to incorporate Bangor Savings Institution; to incorporate the Bangor and Piscataquis Railroad Company; additional act to incorporate Commercial Bank, Bangor; to incorporate Penobscot Stage Company; to incorporate Bangor & Pushaw Canal Company; to incorporate Bangor Insurance Company; to incorporate Penobscot Log Driving Company; to incorporate Bangor House Proprietary; additional act to incorporate Panobscot Mill-dam Company; to regulate the survey of lumber in Penobscot county.

On March 19 the Journal said:

Our town, at the present moment, is overflowing with strangers. The taverns are filled, and it is with difficulty that those who come last can get accommodations. In a list of about sixty arrivals at the Exchange Coffee House, the last week, we find the names of gentlemen from New York, Rhode Island, Massachusetts, New Hampshire, and from all parts of the State. Some are here, we suppose, with a view to make their fortunes—others are intending to settle—and not a few are honorable Legislators returning home.

At the annual town-meeting (11th of March) Henry Call was elected Town Clerk; William Abbott, George W. Brown and Royal Clark, Selectmen and Overseers of the Poor; Ford Whitman, Treasurer; William Rice, Harbor-master; Thornton McGaw, Town Agent; William Abbott, Benjamin Nourse, Joseph R. Lambert, William Thompson, Andrew Webster, School Committee.

The Bangor Fire and Marine Insurance Company was organized and on March 13 elected George W. Pickering, Amos Patten, Caleb C. Billings, James Crosby, Samuel Smith, Waldo T. Pierce, Ebenezer French, Thomas A. Hill, and Amos Davis, Directors. George W. Pickering was elected by the Directors, President.

The committee of the Hammond Street Congregational Society, John Godfrey, Thomas A. Hill, Levi Cram, Moses Patten, and Edmund Dole, gave notice that they would receive proposals for building a house of worship for the society until the 1st day of April.

The regular line of packets between Bangor and Boston, at this time, consisted of schooners Free Trade, Madawaska, Albion, and Herald.

The editor of the Journal was delighted with Mr. Moulthrop's paintings, and with sixteen wax figures on exhibition, representing Gibbs and Mourley, the pirates, the Salem murder, the Siamese twins, and advised all who desired to patronize the painter, as he would leave them soon; and as to the wax display, no one could "view them without deriving peculiar satisfaction."

The Directors of the Bangor House Proprietary advertised for proposals for building the Bangor House. They would be received until April 6th. The Directors were William Emerson, Moses Patten, Charles Thomas, Rufus Dwinel, and John Hodgdon.

The Bangor Savings Bank and the Mercantile Bank were organized on the third day of April. Amos Patten was made President and Treasurer of the former, and Caleb C. Billings, George W. Pickering, Jacob McGaw, George Starrett, Henry Call, Thomas F. Hatch, John Fiske, Thomas Drew, and Nathan B. Wiggin, Trustees. C. C. Billings, Thornton McGaw, Waldo T. Pierce, Amos M. Roberts, Cyrus Goss, Willis Patten, and John Hodsdon were chosen Directors of the latter.

The speculation in timber lands had become so extensive, and the means resorted to by speculators to dispose of their lands had become so questionable, that the pens of the wits found ready employment. A little paper appeared in Portland bearing the title, "The World in a Nutshell," and containing information "interesting to gentlemen of moderate fortunes who wish to double their capital in six months."

"We" had been shown by the "Great Land Committee" a plan of a tract of timber land situated on the coast of Norway, five hundred miles long and running back into the interior forty miles. Affidavits of the explorers (all of them gentlemen of the first respectability from the county of Penobscot, in this State) representing that the strip was "divided by five navigable streams, having the best possible water-falls flowing through the tract to the sea, at just a mile and a half distant from each other; so that not a stick of timber can require to be hauled more than three-quarters of a mile." We have never met any set of affidavits that, take them all in all, afforded us more satisfaction. The reporters are very explicit. They found each tract between the rivers contained large quantities of timber over and above any amount which can be expressed by figures. To avoid, therefore, all confusion in putting down their estimates, they only give the excess on each tract over the amount which cannot be immediately reckoned. This struck us as peculiarly ingenious and simple. Several enterprising gentlemen in Bangor have obtained a bond of this notable timber tract. It was understood that they would not sell at any price, and the intelligence threw the business part of the city into the greatest gloom, and a public meeting was proposed to condemn their "monopolizing and sordid stand." Whereupon they gave up their first determination and put two-thirds of the tract into the market.

An adventure at this time is reported of a young resident of Bangor, who was one night returning from a visit to his fair one. His route lay through timber-land partly felled. Being in good spirits, he bounded over the fallen trees with alacrity until he found himself face to face with a ravenous bear. Springing to the nearest pine, he climbed up some distance. The bear pursued until he came within reach of our hero's feet. These did good service by dashing the animal to the ground. The bear returned, and, seizing one of his antagonist's legs, was again sent back with a boot in his arms! While the bear was exercising his wits as to how he could circumvent his victim, the young man was climbing. When he had attained the height of about fifty feet the bear had out-climbed him, and again seized the last leg. In his eagerness to enjoy his spoil, however, he became detached from the tree, and the leg being his only support, and the young man being so nearly exhausted that he could hold on no longer, down both fell together. Fortunately the young man was on top, and least injured by the fall. The bear was dumbfounded, and the young man, taking advantage of his confusion, rushed away and was glad enough to escape with the loss of a boot and his hat! The effect of this adventure upon the mind of the lady was not unfavorable. There was a tinge of romance in it. The hero had been in imminent peril because of her. She could not be unkind. She was not.

The ice left the Penobscot on the 10th of April, and a large number of vessels arrived in port directly afterward, and the streets and wharves were filled with life and business activity.

A "new translation of the Bible" at this time excited some comment. From specimens of the translation a favorable reception was not expected. "Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God," was translated: "Indeed I assure you that except a man be reproduced he cannot realize the reign of God." The translator disposed of Judas in this manner: "Falling prostrate, a violent internal spasm ensued, and all his viscera were emitted." The editor of the Penobscot Journal gave assurances that he would not countenance any such translation.

William Abbott and Benjamin Nourse, the School Committee in charge of Districts 1 and 2, were alive to the importance of the constant, regular, and prompt attendance of pupils in the schools, and assuming that parents must also be aware of it, they earnestly requested them to see that their children were "sent to school daily, and at the hour appointed for opening the schools."

Mr. Abel M. Quimby, who was President of the Bangor Academy for several years, was now teaching an "English High School" for both sexes.

It was voted this year to raise $6,900 for highways, $2,500 for schools, $2,500 for town charges.

Horses were prohibited from being left on Kenduskeag bridge without a keeper or driver, and from being hitched to the fences or posts therein.

Bells were prohibited from being tolled at funerals.

Driving faster than at the rate of five miles an hour was prohibited within half a mile of Kenduskeag Bridge.

The votes in Bangor at the State election were for Governor: Daniel Goodenow, Whig, 467 votes; Robert P. Dunlap, Democrat, 466; Thomas A. Hill, Anti-Mason, 30. For Representative to Congress, Gorham Parks, Democrat, 481; Ebenezer Hutchison, Whig, 445; Judah McLellan, Anti-Mason, 40. For Representative to Legislature, Henry Call, Republican, 481; John Sargent, Jr., Democrat, 408; Thomas F. Hatch, 40.

In this year there had been much disorder. Many laborers had come into the town who were recently from Ireland, and were seeking to earn a livelihood with the spade and mattock, and in any lawful way. There was need of such laborers, and they were employed. Among the American laborers of similar description there was a jealousy of these foreigners that boded anything but comfort to them when opportunity should offer for the manifestation of their ill-will. The opportunity came.

One very dark evening, early in the business season, a mob of sailors from vessels moored off Carr's Wharf—at a place in the river where vessels lading with lumber were accustomed to lie—conceiving that they had cause against the occupants, attacked a building upon that wharf with axes, hammers, crow-bars, fire, and whatever would enable them to render the building untenable. Of course the alarm was given, and a great crowd of wondering people were soon gathered in the neighborhood of the scene; but, for some reason, no disposition appeared to be manifested to interfere with the work of destruction. The outside crowd became a compact mass of humanity without apparent purpose, swaying this way and that, drawing to itself every new comer and taking him in, willing or unwilling, and like an avalanche bearing down everything in its way. It had the power of locomotion, but seemed to be without sense and without self-control. In vain did the owner of the building call for help to save his property. "Will you see this building destroyed," he cried, "and is there no one who will aid me in saving it?" There was no response. The crowd was as stolid as solid. It seemed to have neither pity nor other emotion—at least generous emotion. The only way to account for this is by the supposition that the building was a nest for characters that ought not be tolerated in any locality. The sailors accomplished their purpose. The morning light revealed a ruin with not an occupant.

It would have been well, perhaps, if this had been the end. But when the mob spirit is once aroused, time is required to allay it. There was evidence, the next day, of a disposition among the bad elements of the town to indulge in general lawlessness. Captain Charles G. Bryant, a military leader in that day, felt it incumbent on him to prevent mischief, and gathered together such citizens as were willing to use fire-arms, if necessary, for the protection of life and property; and perhaps he did to some extent curb the wrong impulse of many hot-headed people, and save property from destruction. But there was a portion of the mob who would have their way, and do something. Now came the opportunity of the haters of the Irish. It was not difficult to turn the current against them, and night after night was made hideous by the tramping and howling of the mob in pursuit of these poor people; and many a terrified man, woman, and child was compelled to pass homeless and sleepless nights in order to feel secure against the violence of the pursuers. They were glad when they had escaped, even though they had not where to lay their heads. It was a period of general alarm, and the better class of citizens extemporized a watch and a patrol. Men on foot and on horseback passed through the streets and gave a feeling of security until the mob by its hootings and howlings and mischievous performances had exhausted itself. When the calm came and there was an opportunity to reflect, there was a general feeling that some provision should be made against future contingencies of this kind.

At this time the voting population had become so numerous that the town meetings had become almost unmanageable. In fact, it had become well-nigh impossible to transact the town business understandingly in them, and, with the prospect of still further increase of voters, it was felt that some provision must be made for the intelligent transaction of the public business in future, and for the protection of the polls. When this was considered in connection with the recent lawless manifestation, the wisdom of the town was exercised in devising a plan which would afford the public necessary security in the conduct of municipal affairs and against mob violence. All plans were considered, and it was concluded that a city form of government, with a responsible head, under which the business could be transacted by delegates elected by the people from separate precincts, and a police force composed of good and reliable men, and the power to enlarge it in case of emergency, would be the surest guarantee of safety. In pursuance of this view the Selectmen, on the 16th day of November, issued their warrant for calling a meeting of the inhabitants, to be held on the 23d of November, "to see if the Town will apply to the next Legislature for a Charter for a City Government."

At this meeting Samuel Call presided as Moderator, and it was Voted. That the town do apply to the next Legislature for a Charter for a City Government.

Voted, To choose a committee of nine to petition the Legislature for that purpose, and to publish the said petition, and to draft a bill and present the same to the town for their acceptance at the adjournment of this meeting.

Chose, William Abbot, Royal Clark, George W. Brown, Amos Patten, Ebenezer French, Edward Kent, Willis Patten, Nathan B. Wiggin, and Charles G. Bryant, committee for the above purpose.

After changing the name of Poplar street to Exchange street the meeting adjourned to December 9. From that date the meeting was adjourned to December 14.

At this adjournment a bill was presented. Each article was examined and discussed, and amended when it was thought necessary. The bill was not completed until another adjourned meeting held on the next Monday, December 16, when, after it had been fully examined and other alterations were made it was recommitted to the same committee "with instructions to make a draft of the same, as amended, and to embody in the same the several laws to which reference is had in the bill, and which are necessary to the proper understanding and construction of the same, and forward it to the next Legislature."

This bill provided for the incorporation of the city of Bangor, for its division into seven wards, for meetings of the voters in those wards in general elections, and for the election of an Alderman from each ward—the whole to constitute a Board of Aldermen—and of three Councilmen from each ward, the whole to constitute a Board of Common Council; and, at the same time for the election of a Mayor of the city. The Board, in joint convention with the Mayor, was to constitute the City Council, which was to elect the subordinate officers of the city.

The bill also provided for a court and police, and conferred on the Mayor and Aldermen, Common Council, Court, and all subordinate officers, such powers as would enable them to perform all the duties before devolving upon the town, and such other powers as were deemed important in providing for the security and safety, and well-being of the city and people.

1834. An act to incorporate the city of Bangor, embracing the provisions of the bill passed by the citizen's committee, was enacted February 12, 1834, and was accepted by the town on the 24th of the same month by a vote of 526 yeas to 118 nays.

On the first day of March following the Selectmen, under the provisions of the act, divided the city into seven wards.

On March 10 the voters assembled in their respective wards, and, after electing ward officers, cast their ballots for Mayor, Alderman, and three Common Councilmen.

There was no choice of Mayor on this day.

Allen Gilman received 406 votes, Isaac Hodsdon 363, and various citizens from one to nine each, aggregating sixty-eight. For a choice 418 were necessary.

On March 17 there was another balloting, and Allen Gilman received 543 votes, Isaac Hodsdon 363, scattering 13; necessary for a choice 460.

Mr. Gilman, having been declared elected Mayor, was inaugurated, and the City Council was organized.

The Aldermen were: Ward 1, Asa Davis; Ward 2, Moses Patten; Ward 3, Samuel Call; Ward 4, John Wilkins; Ward 5, John Fiske; Ward 6, John Brown; Ward 7, Frederick Wingate.

Council: Ward 1, Abner Taylor, Anthony Woodard, Solomon Parsons; Ward 2, Wiggins Hill, Timothy Crosby, Jonathan C. Taylor; Ward 3, George W. Pickering, Samuel Lowder, Elisha H. Allen; Ward 4, John LeGro, Jr., Thomas Finson, Joseph Abbot; Ward 5, George Wellington, Nathan B. Wiggin, Edward Kent; Ward 6, Paul R. Barker, Bradford Harlow, Messenger Fisher; Ward 7, Ebenezer French, 2d, Charles G. Bryant, Pliny D. Parsons. Solomon Parsons was elected President of the Common Council.

The principal subordinate officers elected by the City Council were: Charles Rice, City Clerk; James Crosby, Treasurer; Ebenezer French, Marshal; Edward Kent, Solicitor and Agent; Allen Gilman, Street Commissioner; Benjamin Nourse, Edward Kent, William Abbott, Pliny D. Parsons, Joseph Abbot, Joshua P. Dickman, Ebenezer French, 2d, School Committee; Jonathan Cutting, John Fiske, Henry Call, Assessors; Amos Patten, William Abbot, Rufus K. Cushing, Overseers of the Poor; Ebenezer French, Rufus K. Cushing, Bradford Harlow, Health Officers.

As the provision in the Constitution for the election of civil officers by cities was not in existence until the following year, the votes for Governor, Representatives to Congress, and other civil officers, were this year cast by the people as previously under the town organization.

There was at this time a provision for the appointment of a City Messenger and Constable, to which Mr. John Lancey was appointed. The office was not in existence many years.

Provision was made for a Municipal Court, with a Judge and Recorder.

Hon. Charles Stetson was the first Judge of this court, and Reuben S. Prescott, Esq., Recorder. Hon. Samuel Farrar succeeded Judge Stetson, and Hon. John McDonald succeeded Judge Farrar.

During a portion of the time Judge Stetson held the office the financial situation of Bangor was very bad. The Recorder at times found it difficult and sometimes impossible to collect the fees; and, in order to raise the money to pay the salaries, was obliged to resort to broker Warren and pay him five per cent. per month for it.

On the 14th of July the new steamboat Bangor, George Barker captain, made an excursion to Castine and Belfast. This boat was a great improvement on the "Maine" that plied between Bangor and Portland ten year before, which could only accomplish the distance between Bangor and Bucksport, in a day. The Bangor took nearly four hundred ladies and gentlemen to Castine and Belfast and returned by six o'clock in the evening, made the circuit of nearly one hundred miles, including stoppages, in ten hours. Tickets for the excursion and meals were $1.50.

The Portland Rifle Corps, Captain Edward D. Preble, visited Bangor this month, and created quite a military furor among the young men.

Forty-one Whigs of Bangor, on July 17, were appointed delegates to a State convention at Augusta, on July 21, to nominate a candidate for Governor. At that convention Peleg Sprague was nominated for that office.

Hammond Street meeting-house was dedicated, and Rev. John Maltby was installed its pastor on July 23d. This building had two wooden towers, with cupolas. Its proportions were bad, and withal it was not an attractive, though a convenient structure. At the sale of the pews $4,000 were realized above their appraised value.

The famous bugle-player, James P. Kendall, with the Boston Band, gave a concert at the First Baptist meeting-house, on the evening of July 20th. Admission 25 cents.

The elms on Broadway began to attract attention. "This," said a stranger to the editor of the Whig, "is the work of your Mayor. The city is indebted for this delightful exhibition to the individual whom you see standing over the way, looking with an air of calm satisfaction on the result and progress of his labors—Mr. John Ham." The inquiries of the stranger afterward, and the replies of the editor, indicated something of the needs of the new city. "Where is the site of your market-house? What public squares are contemplated? Where your public cemetery?" "Our city is hardly begun. No one can tell where to locate its public buildings and squares. We have a temporary matter of a Court-house over the way; a sort of Mount Auburn several miles up the river, in the neighborhood of the mill-dam, near the probable centre of the city, where the railroad shall connect the line of steamboats from the St. Lawrence with those of the Penobscot."

No railroad from Bangor was then contemplated; and if the Maine Central had been suggested, the idea would have been considered utopian; and such a construction as the European & North American Railway within the century would have been scouted as altogether visionary. We now can predict almost anything for Bangor within the twentieth century without provoking a doubt; improvements have been so wonderful in the nineteenth.

The first number of the Penobscot Freeman, an anti-Masonic newspaper, edited by Asa Walker, and published by Aaron Herrick, was issued August 7th.

Captain George Barker left the command on the steamer Bangor this month, and was succeeded by Samuel F. Howes. The friends of Captain Barker were greatly indignant at his being removed from the command, as it was through his efforts that the vessel was built and put upon the route, and they had a meeting and chose a committee to investigate the causes of the removal. The committee reported that in their opinion he was removed without adequate cause, condemned the treatment he had been subjected to, and expressed their sympathy with him, whom they esteemed an "honorable man, a good citizen, and a gentleman." Then there was much complaint against the Directors for raising the fare from $6 to $7 between Bangor and Boston.

Monsieur Canderbeck, a celebrated performer on the harp and violin, entertained the citizens with specimens of his playing on August 25. His performances were much applauded.

Plank sidewalks up the clay hills, in the streets and lanes, were recommended this year.

The Mechanic Association held its second triennial festival on August 31. An address was delivered by John S. Sayward, Esq., "which was replete with sentiments of patriotism and philanthropy, and fastened the attention of the audience for three-quarters of an hour." Mr. John Barker, of the Franklin House, prepared the dinner, which was pronounced "sumptuous and splendid." The eleventh regular toast was this:

Our city and its prospective improvements:—

May every street
Be clean and neat,
And free from filth and swine;
And, each dark night,
A burning light
In every corner shine.

With no rude boys
To make a noise,
With boisterous mirth obscene;
Nor dirty shops
To sell vile slops
To swine, in shape of men.

May all our laws
Be free from flaws,
And executed well;
And at our homes,
Of bricks or stones,
May great contentment dwell.

So future days
Shall chaunt the praise,
In many a rhyming ditty—
Of all the men Assembled when
We made the Town a City!

Mr. Edmund Dole called to mind the Hampden battle and the visit of the British by the following:

"Twenty years ago: May our deliverance from the heavy gloom which then hung over us as 'prisoners of war' cause our hearts to ascend in gratitude to Him who has preserved us from calamity, and blessed us with prosperity."

On the arrival of the steamer Bangor, from Boston, having on board the Representative—Hon. Gorham Parks—from Washington, there was a large gathering of the people. Among these were Whigs who felt aggrieved by the course of Mr. Parks in Congress, who, as they said, grossly misrepresented the interests of the whole country by his treatment of a memorial they had intrusted to him to present to Congress requesting a survey of a military road from the Kennebec waters to the Bangor line, had treated a respectful memorial with contempt, and had boasted of being elected by seventeen hundred majority. In the crowd, and doubtless among the Whigs, were unmannerly people who hissed, groaned, and taunted Mr. Parks by shouting "seventeen hundred majority!" This, of course, excited Mr. Parks and his political friends, and afforded them an opportunity to arraign the whole Whig party of the district for insulting and persecuting their member of Congress for expressing his convictions and acting in accordance therewith.

Such demonstrations were disapproved by reflecting Whigs, whatever they may have thought of Mr. Parks's course, as impolitic, to say the least; but the mischief was done and all the Whigs alike had to suffer the consequences.

At the next election Mr. Parks was returned to Congress by an increased vote in Bangor, which was 577, while his vote at his first election was 481 against his competitor, Edward Hutchinson, which was 448. His competitor in 1834, however, was Edward Kent, whose vote in Bangor was 873 against Park's 577.

The political campaign was conducted with great bitterness this year. With Nathaniel Haynes conducting the Republican and Samuel Upton the Whig, and both ridiculing and blackening each other—the former calling the latter and his party Federalists—as if it were the most degrading of all epithets—and the latter spelling the name of the former "Gnat," and stigmatizing his party as Tories, they made their respective papers very uninteresting, excepting to themselves and partisans as bitter as themselves.

The candidate of the Democrats for Governor was Robert P. Dunlap; of the Whigs, Peleg Sprague. The Democratic candidate for Representative to Congress was Gorham Parks; of the Whigs, Edward Kent.

The election occurred on September 8th, and the Democratic candidates were elected.

The vote of Bangor for Sprague and Kent was 873 each; for Dunlap 576, for Parks 577. In 1833 the vote of Bangor was, for the Whigs, 467; for the Democrats, 466. The vote of other towns in the neighborhood of Bangor was:

Henry Call, Whig, was elected Representative from Bangor, over Thornton McGaw (Democrat), Theophilus Nickerson (Whig) from Orrington, etc., Samuel Coney (Democrat) Orono, Thomas Emery (Democrat) Hampden.

Although the Whigs were defeated in Governor and Representative to Congress, yet they consoled themselves with the reflection that they had made "very flattering gains."

In September the Directors of the steamer Bangor published their reasons for the dismissal of Captain Barker, saying they had paid him in full for his services, and "had good and sufficient reasons for discharging him."

At this time the poets were abroad and "a sweet singer of Israel from the neighborhood of Bangor" inspired some lover to perpetrate the following:

Sarah, what sound seraphic rapt my ear,
That heaven's own habitants might joy to hear?
It is an angel voice from human lips,
Whence heavenly music inspiration sips.
Sing on, my Fair, since it to thee is given
On earth to prelude the harmonies of heaven.

The Whigs complained much of the irregularities of the Democrats (Tories, as they called them) in the election. "In one town in this vicinity" they alleged, "where there were more voters than inhabitants, three persons were torn from their homes and their sick beds, and borne to the polls, who" within eight days afterward "passed to their long home." The Portland Advertiser said: "In the town of Hermon there were sixteen more votes thrown than there were voters," and it was a very current story, not denied, that in that town, on the votes being counted at one time, one or two Whig votes were found in the ballot-box, and one of the Selectmen, apparently astonished at seeing them, said they did not belong in that box—got there by mistake—and threw them aside without counting them.

Mr. E. Freeman Duren at this time established a circulating library at his bookstore.

Messrs. Albert G. Barker, a tailor, and Benjamin F. Baker,* a carpenter, established a school for instruction in sacred music. The former was a fine tenor, and the latter a superior bass. They made quite a sensation by the excellence of their singing.

The packets that at this time plied between Bangor and Boston were the schooners Free Trade and Madawaska.

Mr. John Bright was the conductor of a news-room.

In the Bangor Temperance Society the subjects of establishing a temperance society and of patronizing only such persons as did not use ardent spirits, were discussed.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph E. Littlefield were teaching their Female High School, which was commenced. Mr. Stickney had charge of the Classical Department. Tuition for English, $5; French and Latin, one or both, $7.

The Whig, in commenting upon a notice that Caleb Cushing was to lecture before the Bangor Lyceum, won-

* Mr. Baker afterward went to Boston and became a professor of music. He was very popular and successful. Many years afterward he was employed to direct the Penobscot Musical Association repeatedly. No bass voice for sweetness, smoothness, and compass, was superior to his.

dered if there was any such thing as a lyceum in Bangor. Literature, it was of opinion, found its votaries here solely among the ladies and mechanics. It complained that it had not more followers; it could not have better. "Temperance and other moral societies," it said, "may rudely stop the current of vice, while literary societies will gently and effectually turn it, by engaging the time and attention of many whose leisure would otherwise make them liable to be led astray."

The friends of Captain S. H. Howes were much elated that the Steamer Bangor made a trip from Boston to Portland—wharf to wharf—in nine hours and twenty-six minutes.

Anthracite was suggested by the Whig to be "an excellent article for family or office fuel," and might be found at Gerrish & Co.'s, in this city, "broken into a convenient size and neatly packed in barrels." The Whig further suggested that it was erroneously called anthracite coal.

Bangor received an occasional notice abroad. A correspondent of the Boston Transcript said:

The society is heterogeneous. There is no esprit de corps, or, perhaps, I may say, no genius loci—no Bangorism. It is only a collection of Yankee Ishmaelites—every man fighting on his own hook, and only mingling with his neighbors, or with some of them, accidentally, as he happens to find the capacity in them to help him push forward to some enterprise in which he has taken or wishes to take stock—a canal to Rutland [Pushaw? Pond, or a railroad to Orono, or a new hotel, or a new meeting-house, or a new steamboat. The best hotel in the State, to say the least—a perfect Ittemont—has been put up since I was here last year. So has one of the largest churches; so has a new bridge. The latter, by the way, is the most public-spirited thing of the kind I have seen—done by two merchants, Messrs. Smith. Private spirit abounds here, as well as elsewhere, so amply that it needs no record or eulogy; but an instance of a different character, so honorable as this, is too much one of the wonders of the times to be passed without a compliment.

The bridge referred to was the Central, next above the Kenduskeag. It was built by Samuel and Edward Smith, merchants and bold speculators, who made and lost several fortunes, and at last died in distant parts of the country poor men. The bridge was a necessity, and probably a greater benefit to the public the time it was built, than to the builders. That it has been indispensable ever since, there can be no question.

The hotel, of course, was the Bangor House, and the church the Hammond Street.

John Hodsdon was Land Agent at this time, and offered for sale the interest of Maine and Massachusetts in Shad Island, Pine Island, and Island No. Six, and a ledge between Oldtown Island and Shad Island, reserving the fishing privileges of the Penobscot Indians.

Mr. Charles Taylor and Mr. Nahum H. Wood severally taught private select schools, in which pupils were instructed in the higher branches.

This was the hop year of Penobscot. On one day in October twenty loads, each averaging about fourteen bales, came into Bangor from the western part of the county. The quantity of this product excited surprise. The raising of it did not continue profitable, and it was abandoned.

Three banks in the city made semi-annual dividends, October 6, as follow:

Commercial, 5 per cent.; Kenduskeag, 4 per cent.; Mercantile, 4 per cent. Stock of these banks was purchased—of the Commercial, 294 shares, at $115 per share; 80, at $120; 20, at $110; 35, at $112; 40, at $119; 20, at $137½; 5, at $150; Kenduskeag, 110 shares, at $110; Mercantile, 50 shares, at $110.

The officers of the Commercial were Henry Warren, President; Samuel Smith, Amos Davis, John Fiske, and Thomas Burton, of Warren, Directors; Edward Richardson, Cashier.

There were forty lawyers in the city and one thousand cases upon the docket of the Court of Common Pleas alone.

Lamps were placed at the corners of the most crowded streets this season.

Every few years some interest was manifested in regard to the improvement of the Penobscot Indians. A correspondent of the Boston Courier gave his views, declaring that their religion—the Roman Catholic—never did and never would raise a people from degradation; that foreign priests, such as they had, could not benefit them; that they must be under New England teachers, who had a heart in the work, and referred to Rev. Mr. Wells, of Boston, as a man competent to do them good; that the Roman Catholic influence must be done away, for they could "never rise with the mill-stone weight of priestcraft about their necks. Never." He proceeds:

They inhabit an island containing about three hundred acres of rich and productive soil—around it flow the waters of the broad and beautiful Penobscot. The country around is rapidly settling, and already two prosperous villages (I might add equal to some of the best in Massachusetts) encircle them within a stone's throw. And look upon that island—not a single foot of earth upon it bears upon its bosom a cultivated plant—the rank and profitless weed grows around their wretched abodes—a fit emblem of the neglected soil. I deny not that there is a church where they can kneel. I dispute not that they have a Latin mass and kiss a rosary or a small relic; I declare not that there is no school-house, where a few scholars may occasionally learn the veriest trifle of knowledge. But I do say that nothing more has been effected. The Rev. Mr. Brewer, now a missionary in Greece, four or five years since [twelve years] labored two months upon this island, but was compelled to leave on account of ill-health, and his influence was also counteracted by Roman influence, which is great, yet he did more than was ever done before, and many of the Indians became attached to him.

The editor of the Whig was of opinion that the Indians were incapable of improvement, and asked, "Is there any single tribe of the aborigines scattered over our broad territory which has made any advances in improvement?" These Penobscots, "living in the midst of refinement, still retain their original distinctness—within sight of a beautiful and populous village, they still cling to their barren island and their filthy wigwams."

He was "far from discouraging any plan that might tend to elevate their morals and happiness," yet he would not "have the Catholic influence over them done away by a law of the State. It is the religion of their fathers, the religion which Ralle taught them—let us leave them the enjoyment of that. It is true that their condition is miserable if there is not another world, yet, paradox though it seem, they are happy."

Some one, not altogether prejudiced against the influences controlling these Indians, suggested that last summer a Protestant Indian preacher of the Marshpee tribe lectured in three of the churches in Bangor, and then visited Oldtown. On his return he stated publicly to a large assembly that "the condition of the Indians at Oldtown was infinitely better than that of his own tribe." The writer adds: "The Marshpee tribe, it is well known, is under Protestant influence. Now, would any Christian be willing to tear away from the Indians their beloved priest?"

This writer had not the ability to reconcile Protestants and Catholics.

The correspondent of the Transcript does not appear to have been remarkably reliable. He stated that one firm in this city had fitted out eighty teams at an expense of $16,000, and was corrected by the statement that the "real cost of outfits for such a number of teams would be about $240,000."

The Directors of the Mercantile Bank were John Hodsdon (President), Cyrus Goss, Waldo T. Pierce, Amos M. Roberts, Willis Patten, Samuel Veazie, Samuel Farrar (Cashier), Samuel Harris.

The Directors of the Kenduskeag Bank: John Wilkins (President), Joseph R. Lambert, George W. Pickering, Abner Taylor (Cashier), Theodore S. Dodd.

The discovery of bituminous coal in Hancock county was announced. Mr. McFarlane found a piece that would burn, and purchased the land upon which it was found. He then made an excavation two or three feet deep, and found a quantity of coal which would ignite and burn freely on the flame of a candle being applied to it. It resembled Liverpool coal in its appearance and smell.

The locality of this discovery is about three miles eastward of the village of Bluehill, upon or in the region of the farm of Mr. James Means. The editor of the Hancock Advertiser said that no doubt could be entertained that, if coal existed in any quantity, it was the foundation of the quarry on that farm. The editor of the Bangor Whig said that he had seen a piece of the coal represented to have been found in the place described, and it freely ignited in the flame of a candle.

The discovery does not appear to have been followed up. It is not improbable that among the throngs of mineral hunters about Bluehill, at some time there may be persons who will investigate the coal theory that Mr. McFarlane inaugurated.

The fertility of the soil at Houlton began to be talked about. A correspondent said: "A man who measures six feet in height relates that he has stood in his field of oats this season, and one of his neighbors has tied them in a knot over his head."

The County Temperance Society, at a meeting in this city in October, took strong ground against the traffic in ardent spirits; against the friends of temperance allowing them to be transported in their vessels or sold on their premises, or being partners in any concern that is connected with the traffic; asserting that all laws sanctioning such traffic were morally wrong, had a destructive influence on public morals and national prosperity, and that, from facts before the community, the friends of temperance had reason to presume that what was sold in shops as wine was not wine, but an adulterated alcoholic mixture, and that they were bound by their pledge to abstain from all such mixtures as drinks. Rev. Thomas Williams was President of this society, and E. Dudley and Albert G. Wakefield Secretaries. Teetotalism had begun to be agitated.

On October 1st the Bangor Savings Institution, which commenced operation April 10, 1833, with Amos Patten, President; John Wilkins, T. A. Hill, James Crosby, Vice-Presidents; George W. Pickering, Jacob McGaw, George Starrett, Thomas F. Hatch, John Fiske, Thomas Drew, Nathan B. Wiggin, and Benjamin Nourse, Trustees; and William Rice, Secretary, reported that the deposits had amounted to $1,998; interest, $37.15; amount withdrawn, $1,052.

Francis O. J. Smith, Democrat, was elected Representative to Congress from Cumberland district; George Evans, Whig, from Kennebec; Gorham Parks, Democrat, Penobscot—his vote was 6,192 to Edward Kent's 4,831, and 145 scattering; Leonard Jarvis, Democrat, Hancock, by 3,742 votes to Elijah L. Hamlin's 3,417, and 216 scattering.

Nathan Weston, of Augusta, was appointed Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, and Nicholas Emery, of Portland, Justice. Albert G. Wakefield, of Bangor, was admitted as an attorney. He formed a copartnership with William Abbot.

The subject of a watch house was agitated. William Emerson, 2d, of the watch was getting great notoriety for catching negroes. There was some difficulty in finding a place to put them.

Rev. Jason Whitman commenced preaching before the Unitarian Society on October 29.

Joseph J. Sager was convicted of the murder of his wife by poison, at Augusta. He was defended by Peleg Sprague, whose argument occupied five hours, to which the large audience that filled Rev. Mr. Tappan's meeting-house gave breathless attention. "He raised all manner of doubts that human ingenuity could devise, and broke forth towards the close in a strain of the most impassionate and thrilling eloquence, which melted every heart and moistened every eye, save those alone of the prisoner at the bar." Judge Parris charged the jury; Judge Westor pronounced the sentence of death. Nathan Clifford, Attorney-General, and James W. Bradford, County Attorney were counsel for the State. Frederick Allen and George W. Bachelder were associated with Mr. Sprague in the defense.

This year Bangor made rapid advances. The famous "land speculation," which commenced here and pervaded the country, gave Bangor a start which made it famous. Above four hundred buildings were erected, among them a Roman Catholic church on Court street, and the Hammatt and Carr block on French street. One of the Brookses, James or Erastus, gave this account of the town in his correspondence:

Buildings are going up yet in all directions, not only in Bangor, but in the whole back country. The hotel is under good way, and will be opened in December or early in January. There is no mistake about this building. The Tremont is as yet its only rival. The carpentering is going down; and judging from what I have seen and heard, it will be as elegantly furnished as any hotel in America. It has drawing rooms, many elegant sitting rooms, a spacious dining room, bathing rooms, and as for the kitchen department, it is the best I have ever seen—I dare say as good as that at the White House at Washington. The theatre-going people are talking of a theatre. The people's ideas are also as magnificent as ever. Projects innumerable are afloat, and many of them, I have no doubt, will be put into execution. The activity, enterprise, and facilities for business are such in this region of the State, that, after all, there is but little exaggeration in what is said about it.

The importance attached to the right of suffrage was illustrated by a young man who, the New York Advocate said, "had come from Bangor, Maine, solely for the purpose of voting," and who voted in the Sixth Ward in that city.

Among the projects proposed was one by Captain Philip Coombs, to relinquish to the city nine acres of land lying in the rear of Broadway, on condition that the city should "at once enter upon and improve this land for the purpose of a public common, by surrounding it with double rows of trees, fenced in, with gravel walks between them, and citizens should purchase the lots in the commons for the purpose of erecting dwelling houses of brick, and not less than two stories high."

The tenure of the judicial office, which was to the age of seventy years, was at this time attacked by the Eastern Republican and defended by the Whig.

The subjects of a market-house and paving or macadamizing the streets were discussed.

In December the Bank of Bangor elected its officers: Samuel Veazie, President; John Barker, James Crosby, George B. Moody, Samuel J. Foster, Directors; William P. Richardson, Cashier.

I. Washburn, Jr., this year opened a law office in Orono.

A good-natured, jolly lumberman called at a lawyer's office to settle a claim upon which he had been sued. On being told the amount of the debt he threw down the sum and said, "Now how much is the stumpage?"

The fame of Bangor reached New Orleans this year. The Bulletin thus remarked about it:

The city of Bangor, in the State of Maine, is among the Eastern wonders of the world. But a few years ago—a very few years—it was but a humble, unimportant village. In 1830 it had not a population of three thousand, we believe. Now it is supposed to have eight thousand inhabitants, and it is the second town in the State in population. But a short time ago the country all around was a wilderness. Now busy and thriving villages are opening up in all directions, and "the wilderness is blooming like the rose."

A Social Library was opened, with five hundred volumes. A Lyceum and Debating Society was organized. Hon. Henry Warren (counsellor at law) was President, Daniel T. Jewett Vice-President, William H. Foster Secretary, Solomon Parsons Treasurer.

The Bangor House was opened on Christmas evening by Martin G. Wood, proprietor, from Providence, with a sumptuous feast, which was partaken of by a throng of invited guests. Dr. Enoch Pond said grace.

The subject of abolishing the death penalty for murder began to be agitated in the State. The Thomaston Republican started the discussion in opposition to the practice. The Bangor Whig defended it.

1835. The Bangor Whig again commenced agitation of the subject of a fortification at Bucksport Narrows at the incoming of this year. It said "the most important portion in the whole State, concentrating more, and more important settlements than any other, with the most extended bay and noblest river, although nature herself had almost rendered it impregnable, and which needs but little aid from without, is left entirely unprotected."

The early settlers of the region above Bangor suffered from many privations, and thought they suffered from some that many people in this day would think fortunate privations. An intelligent woman, who had been a teacher in one community, and afterward a missionary among the Western Indians, when in Bangor this year gave some account of the beginning of that community twenty years before.

Two men, with their wives, settled about a mile apart in the very depths of the forest, about sixty miles from Bangor, in the first or second decade of the century. Apprehending danger from Indians, from wolves and wild beasts, they each procured a horn to sound when assistance should be required. One of them, however, was overfond of another kind of 'horn,' in which he could not often indulge. One day the more abstemious neighbor was taken ill at his work, and went home, and put himself under the care of his wife. It was a cold, blustering day, and the good woman had made a comfortable fire, and just got her husband into a sweat and a comfortable doze before it, when they were startled by a blast of the horn. The good man sprang to his feet in an instant, and notwithstanding the protestations of his wife that it would be the "death of him," started off.

She would not suffer him to go alone, however; their neighbor must not fall a sacrifice to Indians or wolves, and they make no sign. Before they reached the house, they heard alarming vociferations, and hurried their pace. On entering the house, what a scene presented itself! There were the householder and his wife making the welkin ring over a jug of New England rum, which they had procured in some wonderful way, and after indulging sufficiently to make them happy, felt it their duty to blow the horn for their neighbors to come and fight that Indian with them!

The Fire Department, although not extensive, was pretty well managed. It was under Ebenezer French, Esq., Chief Engineer. He was a very efficient officer, and took pride in his position. A fire occurred in a building belonging to Messrs. Hinckley & Egery, founders. Mr. French was there before the engines arrived, and pressing thirty or forty persons into the service, he piled the snow upon the fire so plentifully that the engines had little to do. Some one inquired if there was much danger. "Oh, no," was the reply, "Eben French put it out before the engines got there!" Whereupon the Whig enthusiastically remarked: "We have been near Mr. French on these occasions, and no Newfoundland dog is more at home in the water than this gentleman appears to be in the midst of the raging element."

Messrs. Hinckley & Egery received much commendation for handsomely rewarding the city watchman who discovered the fire.

Along the first days of January the cold was intense. The mercury at one time congealed. It was from forty to forty-two below zero. In Boston the harbor was frozen over below the fort. The Penobscot Bay was frozen over from Belfast to Castine.

Peleg Sprague, United States Senator from Maine, resigned his seat in Congress.

The School Committee established a school in January, exclusively for apprentices and boys.

Captain James Thomas, for whom Thomas's Hill was named, and who had once been the proprietor of it, was at this time in trouble about a plan of certain house-lots which he and Captain Charles Thomas, of the United States Army, had caused to be surveyed by General Joseph Treat, and sold in June, 1831. He went to Washington soon afterward, and on his return this year could neither find his plan nor a record of it, whereupon he made the complaint public that he had made arrangements with the United States Captain Thomas to have the plan recorded; that he did not; that on calling upon him for it he said he had lent it to John C. Dexter, a purchaser of some of the lots; that he called on Dexter, and Dexter said he had lent it to Thomas F. Hatch, who was at one time an Assessor of Bangor; that he called on Hatch, and Hatch said he thought the Selectmen might have mislaid it among other town papers. He took this method to recover the plan and to let the purchasers of the lots know that if they had trouble about the lots in consequence of the loss of the plan, he was not in fault.

The question of abolishing the Court of Common Pleas began to be agitated. Complaint was made of slowness of that very upright judge, Perham. There were one thousand or more actions upon the docket; his court had been in session from the 6th to the 22d of January, and had not disposed of one-sixth of the business! The Whig thought the abolition might make the system infinitely worse, but one thing was pretty sure, it "would strike at the foundation of the means of livelihood of the vast majority of those who call themselves lawyers in our land. We mean the mere collectors of debts, by means of that instrument called a writ, who turn pale at the very sound of a defense, and who, creeping under the protection of a lawyer, shrinks into insignificance when the action which he has brought into court resolves itself into a question of law."

The following named gentlemen were appointed by the City Temperance Society delegates to attend the meeting of the State Temperance Society at Augusta on the 4th of February: John Godfrey, James Crosby, Edward Kent, T. A. Hill, William D. Williamson, Henry Call, Joseph Brown, Amos Patten, Charles A. Stackpole, Dominicus Parker, Joseph C. Lovejoy, John Ham, Joel Hills, Samuel Garnsey, J. A. Poor, Jacob Drummond, Buchan Haskins, Zebulon S. Patten, John Fiske, John Barker, Asa Walker, Jr., N. G. Norcross, J. R. Greenough, Thomas Drew, and Samuel Sylvester.

The Theological Seminary had this year sixty-seven students—twenty-seven in the theological department and forty in the classical.

The first number of the Mechanic and Farmer, a weekly newspaper, edited by John S. Sayward, made its appearance on the 6th of February. It was published in the interests of the mechanics and farmers of the city and region.

On February 6th an initiatory meeting was held at the Baptist Chapel on Harlow street for the formation of a society to supply the lumbermen of the Penobscot Valley with religious services during the period they were in the woods in the lumbering season. It was called the Lumber Missionary Society. The committee of management were Rev. Thomas Curtis, Jacob McGaw, and Joseph W. Mason. Secretary Samuel Garnsey, Treasurer Oliver J. Shaw.

William Hammond, an old citizen, originally from Newton, Massachusetts, died the first week in January at the age of sixty-three.

On the 17th of February Cyrus Hamlin,* a student of the Theological Seminary, lectured upon "The erroneous views of past ages relative to Natural and Mechanical Philosophy." His lecture was highly complimented.

The public was a little excited at this time by a report from Washington that Leonard Jarvis, Representative in Congress from the Washington District, challenged F. O. J. Smith, Representative from the Cumberland District, to fight a duel: that Smith declined to fight Jarvis because "he considered Jarvis no gentleman." The bearer of the challenge, Lytle, of Ohio, in compliance with the code of the duel, challenged Smith, but Smith declined on the ground that he had never injured Lytle: whereupon Mr. Jarvis posted F. O. J. Smith as "most emphatically a Liar, a Scoundrel, a Coward;" and the effect was about like the "falling of water on a goose's back."

Ex-Governor Samuel E. Smith was reappointed to the Judgeship of the Court of Common Pleas, from which he was taken for Governor, in place of John Ruggles, elected United States Senator.

A great sale of timber lands was announced. It was considered remarkable that Township No. 3, Range 13, should have sold for $3.25 per acre. The purchasers were (it was said) Amos M. Roberts, William Emerson, and Isaac Farrar, all of Bangor.

Applications were made to the Legislature this year for the charter of the Franklin (Eastern), Lafayette & People's Bank and the City Bank, in the city of Bangor. There was a seeming necessity for more currency in the city at this time. Speculators were here in large numbers. Transactions in land were frequent and immense. A great heira from all parts of the country was made into Bangor. Business of all kinds had increased. Many had the reputation of having suddenly become wealthy. Many more were stimulated by this to make great efforts to become so. There was not money enough for the transaction of business. It was thought that that might be obtained through the incorporation of new banks; and perhaps some saw their way to wealth clear, through new banks which had no visible means of support.

There were clear-headed men in the Legislature who well understood to what this increase of bank currency would lead. The Representative from Bangor, Mr. Henry Call, was not, however, one of these. He could not see any danger of overtrading in Bangor, or that extravagance particularly abounded there.

But Messrs. Curtis, of Freedom, Barnard, Washburn, and Dumont, of Hallowell, were not under the influence of the excitement upon the Penobscot. In the debate, on motion of Mr. Curtis to postpone the question of incorporating the City Bank until the 1st of July, Mr. Washburn thought there was a strong disposition at Bangor to overtrade and run into extravagance, which the business of the place could not support; that the dockets of the courts were evidence of this, which groaned under their burthens, the bills of cost being estimated at $100,000 a year. People from that city had the modesty to ask to be allowed to issue bills of credit to the amount of $600,000 beyond what the existing banks might issue, and in two adjoining towns the privilege of issuing bills to the amount of $150,000 was asked for, and if all were granted the banks in the county of Penobscot would have authority to issue bills to the amount of $1,350,000.

Mr. Washburn then said that, with $50,000 in specie, the six banks reported for Penobscot county, with a capital of $500,000, might be put in operation—only fifty per cent. in gold and silver to be paid in before discounts were permitted. They were not required to go into operation on the same day. The City Bank would give notice that fifty per centum of its capital must be paid in on Monday. The specie would be borrowed from the older banks in operation. On Monday "the committee appointed by the Governor and Council would count the money and make oath that fifty per centum of the capital stock was actually paid in gold and silver. On Tuesday the same specie might find its way to the Franklin (Eastern) Bank, and the same farce be gone through with there. On Wednesday to the Lafayette Bank, on Thursday to the People's Bank, on Friday to the Penobscot Bank, and on Saturday to the Stillwater Canal Bank." On Monday, perhaps, the specie would be on its way back to the banks from which it originally came.

If every lawyer's office in Bangor were converted into a banking-house, it would not increase the wealth or capital of the city. It might enable the lawyers to carry on "the business of shaving on a large scale;" and there was reason to apprehend that the banks contributed to the multiplicity of suits. Discounts were made freely, business was overdone, the time of payment came, and the money had not come back with which to pay the banks. He referred to the Wiscasset Bank, where the inhabitants were running into the same extravagances they were running into in Bangor, and to the losses that were sustained by the failure of that bank. He referred also to the Eastport Bank and the Castine Bank, which took great pains to circulate their bills in the country when they were about to fail, but would not undertake to say that their directors had anything to do with it.

All the banks were incorporated and put in operation; but not one of them, excepting the Franklin (or the Eastern), of which Amos M. Roberts was President, was in existence many years afterward.

In the discussion above, Mr. Dumont, of Hallowell, explained how banks took extravagant interest. An applicant for money must have it. His necessities were imperious. The bank had discounted to the extent of its ability, the director says, "but if you must have it, to oblige you I will let you have a draft on Boston at sixty days for 2½ per cent.; but it will be a great damage to us to let you have the money even at that rate."

In the winter of 1832-33 commenced the speculation in timber land, which resulted in fortunes to a few, but in disaster to many. Those lands had previously borne a very low price in the market. Some large sales attracted attention, and business men became satisfied that money was to be made in transactions in those lands. They discussed their value everywhere. Amos Davis, Samuel Smith, and other bold speculators, obtained the refusal of lands from the owners by bonds, in which the owners contracted that if within such a time a certain sum—say a quarter of the sum required for the whole purchase—were paid in cash and security given by mortgage of the premises for payment of the rest in one, two, three, and, perhaps, four years, a deed should be given. The lands were valued at from say twenty-five cents to a dollar an acre, and any quantity from one hundred acres to a township of 22,040 acres, excluding the one thousand acres reserved for school purposes, were thus bonded. The bonds were obtained by all sorts of operators, who would get some sort of an estimate and plan by a pretended or actual surveyor or explorer, and go into the market and make a sale to some other speculator for a small advance per acre in cash. The purchaser would then go into the market and perhaps get a small advance also, or he might be disposed to make the purchase of the land actually for an investment.

After the speculation got into full operation, there was great ingenuity exercised to effect sales. Men were employed as explorers to make plans and descriptions of the lands. Surveyors of easy conscience, and pretended surveyors without any conscience, were employed in this business, and plans and descriptions, with the certificates of the explorers as to their correctness, showed fabulous quantities of the best qualities of timber upon tracts so well watered that the facilities for driving the timber to market were all that could be desired. Consequently there was a vast deal of swindling in the transactions at last. Such instances as the following were not unusual. A gentleman made a purchase of a township which by the certificates of men in good standing appeared to contain more than 120,000,000 feet of pine timber. He sold it with his warranty that it contained twenty millions. The purchaser sued him on the warranty. He fell back upon the explorer, expecting, of course, to be sustained by his testimony, and took his deposition. This was its substance:

"Is this your certificate?"

"Yes."

"Is it true that there is 120,000,000 of pine timber upon the township?"

"No."

"How much is there?"

"Perhaps there may be two millions."

Finding that he had been swindled, he compromised with his purchaser by paying him $4,500.

Men often could be found who had their prices, some very large, for these lying certificates, apparently thinking there would be no crime in the transaction until it came to perjury, and probably not then were it not for the prison.

Sometimes honest explorers were deceived in regard to the identity of the township, in some way being led to think they were exploring on a certain number, when they were in fact exploring one of a different number.

A dollar an acre for lands appears to be a trifling sum to some men who are accustomed only to lands worth a hundred dollars and upwards an acre; and when they are taken by a keen speculator upon a tract that he wishes to sell, they are made to see in its timber, its soil, it may be in its rocks even, ten times the value that is asked for it and in the excitement of the time he feels that the $20,000 he has paid for a township on the head-waters of the Penobscot is invested in that which will make him a landed proprietor to be envied, with resources not likely soon to be exhausted.

This speculation in bonds in wild lands extended to bonds of building lots in the town. There was an influx of population which few dreamed would subside. Of course they must have dwelling, and places where to erect them. Many undertook to make their fortunes out of nothing by obtaining bonds of large parcels, dividing them into small lots, and selling or giving bonds of them.

One deacon of a church dealt largely in these bonds, and some of his envious neighbors, thinking that he was getting rich too rapidly, intimated that he was not over-scrupulous in his representations, or, at any rate, that he was becoming altogether too much a lover of mammon. This having been reiterated to his pastor until he felt himself obliged to mention it to his deacon, he took occasion to allude to his transactions by way of inquiry.

"Mr. Pomroy," said he, with a twinkle of the eye and in a tone of some solemnity, "I would that thou wert almost and altogether such as I am, except these bonds."

Mr. Pomroy could not go on with the subject, and left his deacon to such satisfaction as he could gather from so wittily warping the words of St. Paul.

One other genius had laid out a town in the suburbs of Bangor; had his plans of streets and lots, and made sales to ignorant persons, who, when they came to occupy, found the tract, to be sure, but the title to it had never passed to their enterprising grantor.

But to return to the timber lands. Some were sold as high as $4 an acre, which had the appearance of being covered with excellent growths of timber. On being cut, however, this proved hollow, "concussy," rotten, and unprofitable. To the uninitiated all timber was fair. The initiated could soon tell worthless timber. A concussy knot was evidence to satisfy them. This knot was the root of a decayed limb. Exposed to the weather, its bark would fall off; it then gradually became rotten, the rot would penetrate to the heart of the tree and up and down it. Unprincipled speculators would get seemingly sound logs out of many of these trees, and the fraud would not be detected until after the timber had passed through several hands and been subjected to the mill saw or the carpenter's axe.

After the usual amount of deception and swindling attending such excitements, the people learned the unprofitableness of this kind of speculation, and some returned to their old occupations, perhaps not wholly stripped of their means, but somewhat soberer and wiser. Some learned that it was not a sure road to fortune, some were ruined for life, and some, who never had any means or much brains, and had got it into their heads that they were somehow to be enriched if they could only get possession of a bond, on finding their capital on the bursting of the bubble exactly as it was before the inflation, threw up their hands in disgust, and went into the next most profitable business — that of mourners for the loss of what they never had.

This year the City Council by ordinance established a High School for the education of youth of both sexes.

Hon. Allen Gilman was renominated for Mayor by the Whigs, against Levi Bradley, Democrat. In a vote of 715 he was defeated at the first balloting by 82 scattering on March 10, but on the 17th he was elected by a vote of 408 in 762.

The question of abstinence from all intoxicating liquors was thoroughly discussed this year before large audiences in Hammond street vestry. The question of incorporating cider and strong beer into the pledge occasioned most controversy, but invariably the vote was to include them. There was meeting after meeting, and after it had been decided over and over again, meetings were called for a reconsideration of the vote, and always with the same result.

The ladies took the matter of temperance in hand, not as "women's rights women," but as "females of Bangor," and "P. V. McGaw and 758 others" sent a womanly petition to the Legislature, in which they said:

We do not know how to approach Legislators because we have never presumed to interfere with political matters. We know that in such affairs you are better judges than we. But many of us know how to approach husbands, whom we tenderly love, with entire confidence that the woes we feel or dread will be relieved, warded off, or shared by us. Others of us have experienced the delight derived from leaning on the manly wisdom, dutiful affection of virtuous sons—others, too, have looked up to affectionate fathers for assistance, with a degree of confidence that can only be increased when we look to a heavenly father—and many feel happy in the consideration that our brothers, by their noble virtues, will not only sustain the honor of their families but assist to perpetuate the honor and dignity of the State in which we have the pleasure to live. To such husbands, sons, fathers, and brothers we present this petition.

They then entreated the Legislature to manifest their love of country, and affection for wives, mothers, sisters, and daughters by such enactments as will banish from our houses and our State the reproach and misery which the use of ardent spirits constantly imposes, not only upon its consumers, but upon their innocent children and friends. "The amount of woe," said they, "suffered from the tremendous scourge, intemperance, we deem it unnecessary to spread out before you. Its desolations are manifest wherever you turn your eye. The best method of removing this calamity we leave to your superior wisdom."

The temperance feeling at this time was so strong in the city that the enemies of the cause undertook to create a prejudice against it by posting notices calling on its friends to meet at a certain time and place to nominate a candidate for Mayor. The committees of the two temperance societies of the city felt it incumbent on them to give notice that "an enemy hath done this," in order to prevent "a false impression" and to defeat a scheme "to effect an unworthy object," and to denounce it as a hoax.

Hoaxing was fashionable about this time. Some one wrote this note to the editor of the Washington Globe:

FRIEND BLAIR: I enclose you $10 and wish you to send me extra numbers of your Congressional Globe to this amount, to counteract the progress which the — Whigs are making here.

Yours, etc.,

JOSHUA CARPENTER.

Inclosed in this note was a $10 bill of the broken "Farmer's Exchange" bank. The extra Globes came, and the postmaster notified Carpenter that his Globes were lying there idle, and at the same time Mr. Blair sent back the letter and bill. The famous Colonel Carpenter certified on the back of the letter that it was a forgery. How the postmaster and the parties disposed of the Globes and the bill was not made public.

A Youth's Temperance Society was organized. Benjamin Silsbee, President; Allen Tupper, Vice-President; Rufus Upton, Secretary; John M. Prince, Jr., Treasurer; Richard B. Thurston, H. G. O. Morison, R. L. Savage, and the President and Vice-President, ex-officio Committee.

On March 13 the law firm of McGaw, Allen & Poor was formed. Jacob McGaw, Frederick H. Allen, and John A. Poor were the partners.

A difficulty occurred at this time between Mr. Rufus Dwinel and the Kenduskeag Bank. Mr. Dwinel was an enterprising merchant of remarkable temper and will. Because of a want of accommodation from the bank he made a war upon it and undertook to break it. It was thought that the war was neither a benefit to the bank, the public, nor Mr. Dwinel. He declared that the public had decided that the bank was the aggressor. He demanded an apology from the Directors, nothing more; admitted that the public had sustained an injury from the war, and said he should persist in his course unless the apology were made.

Temporary sidewalks were suggested until brick walks could be had. They were a necessity. The soil of Bangor is clayey, and in wet weather the walking was bad indeed.

Notwithstanding the reported sale of Township No. 3, Range 13, to Amos M. Roberts, William Emerson, and Isaac Farrar, at $3.25 an acre, there was complaint that there was an improper manipulation regarding it in the Land office; that it was one of the best, if not the best, timbered townships in the State; that it had been fully explored and was run out into square-mile sections with the desire to accommodate small capitalists and practical lumbermen, but that it was disposed of much below its fair value to favorites through one Henry Warren, a person in the employ of the Land Agent.

The temperance movement had many enemies. Its advocates were sneered at, and sometimes insulted and abused. Hon. Samuel M. Pond, of Bucksport, a decided man and Secretary of the Maine Temperance Society, was happy that, at one time, his own village had become free of rum-selling stores and taverns; but there had been a reaction and bad men were in the ascendant in taverns and grogshops, and drunkenness became rampant. Mr. Pond, of course, was in disfavor. The rum lovers manifested their hate of the good man in scurrilous handbills, and by daubing on his law office the word Rum in large characters, thus really helping the reputation of Mr. Pond and disgracing their village.

It was about this time that Rev. George B. Cheever and the publishers of the Salem Landmark were indicted for publishing the article "Deacon Giles's Distillery," and that those who assaulted Mr. Cheever were indicted.

This year Mr. Ransom Clark conceived the project of Broadway Park. Mr. J. Prescott, civil engineer, made the plan. Lots were laid out around it and sold at good prices. The conditions were that the purchasers should build two-story brick houses. This not done, the lots were, many of them, sold for taxes, and the park continued a common.

In March two large moose were seen quietly traveling in the road near Orono, occasionally leaving it for the woods, but coming back to it in consequence of the great depth of snow.

Here is a description from the Whig of the return of the lumber operators of the past winter to Bangor. It may be taken as a good general description of their return.

The lumbermen are returning from their winter quarters, and their departure is marked by movements somewhat similar to the breaking-up of a muster or ball. The cattle are brought down in droves and carried away to be refitted by food and rest for employment another season. The weary teamsters, with long beards and tattered garments, are emerging from the depths of the forest again to breathe the atmosphere of civilized life, after having been pent up through the dreary winter months, in the camps in the woods. It must be pleasure indeed for them to join their families again, and count their gains while they recount their hardships.

In April the Penobscot Indians received this contemptuous notice from the Whig: "The pleasant weather has brought down these drones, who may be seen in scattered groups along the streets. Their appearance in the spring is as much indicative of a change in the seasons as that of other hibernating animals.

This month Ransom Clark, George B. Moody, and Edmund L. LeBreton advertised the lots on Broadway Park for sale, and Philip Coombs advertised the lots around the city common.

The City Government this year was composed of Mayor, Allen Gilman.

Aldermen: Ward 1, Henry Call; Ward 2, Moses Patten; Ward 3, William Abbot; Ward 4, John Wilkins; Ward 5, John Fiske; Ward 6, John Brown; Ward 7, Samuel Veazie.

Common Council: Ward 1, Charles Hayes, Jesse Wentworth, Rufus K. Cushing; Ward 2, John Barker, Jonathan C. Taylor, Timothy Crosby; Ward 3, Henry A. Head, Edmund Dole, Samuel Garnsey; Ward 4, John Godfrey, John Sargent, John R. Greenough; Ward 5, Nathan B. Wiggin, Edward Kent, Abner R. Hallowell; Ward 6, Franklin Muzzy, Bradford Harlow, Horatio Beals; Ward 7, Samuel Sylvester, Charles Forbes, Marcena Johnson.

Among the subordinate officers elected were: John S. Sayward, City Clerk; James Crosby, Treasurer; John Ham, Street Commissioner; William Emerson, second, City Marshal; Edward Kent, City Solicitor and Agent; John Lancey, Collector; John Lancey, City Constable and Messenger; James Crosby, George Starrett, Abner R. Hallowell, Assessors; Rufus K. Cushing, City Physician; Amos Patten, William Abbot, John Barker, Overseers of the Poor.

The Baptist Society of Bangor held its services on Sunday, April 25, in the Unitarian church.

Mr. F. A. Firmbach, an accomplished musician, gave an instrumental concert of much merit to a Bangor audience. His instruments were the guitar, violin, and flute. He was assisted by the accomplished organist of the First Parish church, Mr. Oliver J. Shaw. Mr. Firmbach sang one German song. His concert was highly complimented.

In May the stock in the Bangor & Oldtown Railroad was partly taken. It was divided into one thousand shares, and it was thought that the cost of the road would be about $250,000. The company was organized July 11, on a call by Rufus Dwinel, Ira Wadleigh, and Milford P. Norton.

The land speculations in Maine had at this time filled the country with excitement. Men flocked here from all quarters. Glowing accounts of fortunes acquired in an incredibly short space of time had been sent abroad. Communications in the newspapers were of the most exciting character and were read with avidity.

A "Young Men's Mutual Reform Society" was in operation at this time, holding its meetings in Hammond Street church vestry.

The editor of the Whig deemed it important to announce that he was writing on May 14 with a quill taken from the wing of a grey eagle which had been recently shot at Bucksport, by Mr. J. McLaughlin, at a distance of seventy yards, with a pistol the barrel of which was only six inches long.

Mr. Henry P. Pratt, of the Calais Gazette, explained to the editor of the Bangor Courier the origin of the "Mung News," which occasioned great excitement about this time. He called on a respectable merchant doing business in St. Stephen, and was assured by him that the brig "Mung" had arrived from Liverpool with goods for him, and that he had received a letter from a merchant at St. Andrews, stating that the brig brought news that the French Chambers had dissolved without making an appropriation for the American claim, and that he had no doubt of its correctness; but that the letter was "a base and infamous fabrication to enhance the value of English shipping at the expense of American interests."

Mr. John Ham, Street Commissioner, on May 16 advertised for two men who are acquainted with road-making, and "one man acquainted with the use of carpenters' tools, who will be employed in laying down sewers and plank sidewalks"!

Mr. H. Manning, from New York, advertised that he would instruct "young ladies, misses, and masters in the accomplishments of dancing and waltzing gracefully," and that, "having long been impressed with the belief that attention to manners and morals should form an important part in the instruction," the strictest attention would be paid to improve the "deportment of the scholars."

The freshet in the river was unusually high this season. The booms were crowded with logs. The editor of the Whig said: "The dexterity of the drivers, as they are called, is really wonderful; we saw a raft of timber, with four men upon it, pass through the breach in the mill-dam works yesterday, and it was a glorious sight!—worth all the theatres, pantomimes, and exhibitions of art in Christendom"!

On May 20 C. & E. D. Godfrey opened a stock of dry goods at 28 Main street; and Samuel Sylvester and Alexander Drummond, as "A. Drummond & Co.," opened a stock of West India and domestic goods at the east end of Kenduskeag Bridge; G. C. Cargill & Co. advertised "spirits and wines."

It was found by Dr. Dickinson that some cases of sickness in town, thought to be occasioned by poison, had their origin in the milk of some cows that had eaten decayed vegetables.

The editor of the Whig, on May 22, gave his knowledge of Castine (St. Castin). He said that he was "a nobleman [son of a nobleman] who commanded a regiment in the south of France [he did not]; was ordered to Quebec about 1690 [1665]; that, for some unknown cause, he came to Penobscot and "married two daughters of Madockawance [one at a time, doubtless], over whom he exercised unlimited control. He constructed a fort upon the peninsula;" went to France about 1712 [1701], and carried with him 200,000 crowns. It is said that he took with him a daughter, who caused much excitement in his native country."

Richard Thurston opened a commission, and S. C. Hemaway a dry-goods store, on the 25th of May.

The Portland Advertiser said that the last Maine Legislature consumed a hogshead of molasses!

The "cattle up country" were reported this spring as in a suffering condition—those that had not died—mere skeletons, meagre and so weak as scarcely to be able to get out to the grass, just starting.

A reservoir was built this year near the First Parish church, and another near Hammond Street church.

The Corban Society was organized, to obtain a fund for the education of the indigent.

A sacred concert was given at the Unitarian church on May 31.

The First Baptist society put a fine organ into their church, from which "rich volumes of sound" were elicited by Mr. Oliver J. Shaw, a master of the instrument.

The Stillwater Canal, at Orono, was built.

The Eastern Magazine, a monthly, edited by Mr. Carter, and published by John S. Carter, appeared in January.

John J. Jerome made his appearance in the commission business this year.

The steamer Bangor brought three hundred passengers the first trip in June, and the hotels were more than filled.

There was one case of small-pox, not fatal, this season.

The Bangor made an excursion to Belfast and Castine on June 9. This vessel was thronged every trip with land speculators. One from Boston was the purchaser of the third or fourth bond of the same tract, and on discovering it, inquired if to sell several bonds to convey the same land at the same time accorded with the prevailing ethics of Bangor! That class of operators came from the West.

At a State land sale, by Head & Pillsbury, at the Bangor House, on June 10, No. 6, ninth range, was sold in mile sections. Eighteen sections were sold. The minimum valuation of the pine was $3 and spruce $1 per thousand. The eighteen sections contained 11,520 acres; their minimum value, $43,546. They sold for $108,796—an advance over the minimum of $65,250. Ira Wadleigh purchased nine sections; Samuel Smith four; Amos Davis three; and Jefferson Sinclair two.

No. 1, eighth range, was sold in quarters. Northeast quarter, containing 5,760 acres, put up at a minimum of $3 per acre, sold for $5; southeast quarter sold at $3.37; northwest at $4.08; southwest at $5.17, to Ira Wadleigh, Amos Davis, Milford P. Norton, and B. H. Cheever.

West half of No. 5, ninth range, 11,520 acres, sold to Ira Wadleigh for $1.15—minimum $1.

Eleven store lots on Fore street sold for nearly $13,000, which a few days before were purchased for $10,000.

Benjamin Goodwin, a prominent citizen of Brewer, died June 10, of consumption, aged forty-six. Mary Blake, wife of General Blake, died on the 9th, aged seventy-three.

The Penobscot Freeman, a newspaper published by Anson Herrick and edited by Asa Walker, Jr., as an anti-Masonic paper, got itself into trouble, first, by accepting the poetical effusion of some novice under the pretense that it was worthy of publication, and then ridiculing it, and next by praising Richard M. Johnson, the candidate of the Democrats for Vice-President, whom the Whigs called the "favorite of the atheists and agrarians."

An out-of-the-State visitor wrote from Bangor, June 10, to the Boston Gazette that he defied any man to live in the atmosphere of Bangor twenty-four hours without being infected with the prevailing fever. He would almost imperceptibly find himself the owner of part of a township, and, with little or no effort, a purchaser could be found who would pay him a handsome advance. A remarkable feature of the speculation was that no one who participated in it lost money! Property to the amount of hundreds of thousands of dollars daily changed hands, and every successive purchaser realized a handsome profit. He could not prophecy how it would be in a twelve-month.

At the law term of the Supreme Court, John Hodgdon, Frederick H. Allen, E. G. Rawson, Augustus J. Brown, Enoch E. Brown, Charles Gilman, and Abraham Sanborn were admitted as counsellors; John E. Godfrey, Moses L. Appleton, and Hannibal Hamlin as attorneys.

D. Parker, William Cutler, and Charles A. Stackpole formed a copartnership as commission merchants, as Parker, Stackpole & Co., May 20.

A correspondent of the Portland Advertiser wrote that every thing had changed in Bangor within eight or ten years. Where there was "a little, dirty, insignificant village, without character and without name, now stands Bangor, which lifts its head in (justly) anticipated greatness, speaks of Boston and New York as sisters," and looks down upon lovely Portland as a country cousin. Eight years before it had but few brick buildings; now it had long ranges of lofty stores, which had as much or more of a city air than anything in Portland. Then there was no communication with the far East, except by a foot-path or batteau; now there was a four-horse stage daily to Mattawamkeag, and three times a week to Houlton; then "a miserable, rickety, two-horse machine," which plied between Bangor and Oldtown, was succeeded by four and six-horse coaches in constant communication between those places, and stock in a railroad was taken up and selling above par. When that road should be finished, a steamboat from Oldtown to the Mattawamkeag would be wanted, "and indeed these down-easters already begin to talk about it, and with them to talk is generally to do." Locks and wing dams would not be necessary to improve the navigation for these people; they would be more likely to "get up a boat to run up all the falls and rapids on the route like their own salmon." Surely they would do this if they could build an engine on the plan of the nervous system of one of the citizens (Sam Smith), "who is the very genius of locomotion incarnate; he is here, there, everywhere, and nowhere all at the same time; breakfasts at home, dining at Portland, and goes without his supper somewhere between Boston and New York, and before his clerk knows he has been absent, he returns, having sold out a concern just before it all goes over the dam together, and is ever "ripe for a trade," either to sell every thing he has got, or to buy any thing anybody else has to sell; a real, double-distilled Yankee, with eye-teeth all sound, where every movement seems to say, "Go ahead." He did not know whether he first regarded the motto, "Be sure you're right."

Meadow Brook bridge, on Harlow street, this year was built of stone and earth, under the supervision of John Fiske, Esq. A substantial and economical, because permanent, bridge.

On June 20th Hon. Martin Kinsley, of Hampden, died at Roxbury, at the age of eighty-one. He was an ardent Whig in the Revolution; was a member of the Constitutional Convention of Massachusetts; was afterwards a Representative, Senator, Councillor, Judge of the Court of Common Pleas in Maine, and Representative in Congress, and was Judge of Probate in Penobscot county at the age of seventy, when he was barred by his age from holding it longer.

Judge Kinsley was born in Bridgewater, Massachusetts, June 2, 1754, "of very respectable parents." The very ingenious Dr. Apollon Kinsley, of Hartford, Connecticut, was his brother. With the patrimony received from his father's estate he pursued the college course in Harvard, then commenced the study of medicine, but abandoned it for trade and politics. He was a citizen of Hardwick, Worcester county. When a member of the Constitutional Convention. He voted against the Massachusetts Constitution because of defects that were afterwards remedied, but supported it cordially after its adoption. He was a member of the General Court almost constantly from either Hardwick or Hampden, in which latter place he resided for more than thirty years towards the close of his life.

He was fond of literature, and produced some specimens of poetry which were published and received with favor. He was benevolent and sympathizing—sustained the claims of the soldiers of the Revolution—voted against slavery, and for the encouragement of domestic industry. He was hospitable, of kindly manners, genial, with a fine flow of spirits, enlivening his conversation with anecdotes. After the close of his business career he united with the Baptist church in Hampden, at the same time assuming the obligation of thorough temperance, which he made a part of his Christian profession. His daughter—a beautiful woman—became the wife of Samuel J. Gardner, Esq., of Roxbury, Massachusetts, at whose house he died.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrews, and Miss Woodward and Mr.

Comer, of Boston, on the 1st of July regaled our citizens at City Hall with a very pleasant concert. "Hark! Apollo Strikes the Lyre," "On the Margin of Fair Zurich's Waters," "The Sea," "Pretty Polly Hopkins," "Chouch and Crow," "Master and Scholar," "Mr. Punchinello," were among the pieces performed. Miss Woodward was delightful in "Fair Zurich," and Comer, although passé as to voice, was as fresh as ever in his old fun.

Isaac S. Whitman, Nathan B. Wiggin, John A. French, Edward Kent, and Eben French caused William Abbott, Esq., to call a meeting to organize a company to build a church on the east side of the Kenduskeag. This was to be a church for a second Unitarian society, on Broadway, of granite. It did not get as far as the corner-stone.

Shaw & Merrill had their furniture warehouse at No. 8 Mercantile Block.

On September 21st William E. P. Rogers sold out his interest in the Whig and Courier to Gamaliel Marchant and Jacob C. Smith. Messrs. Upton—father and son—retired from the editorship, and Mr. Marchant assumed the conduct of the paper.

Bangor was still the subject of comment abroad. A visitor sent the Boston Courier his views. There was not perhaps another place in our vast country "which has so completely outstripped all anticipations by its rapid growth," nor one that will in any way compare with it in "the astonishing accumulation of fortunes within a few years." Men with nothing but industry and enterprise had made large fortunes in a single year. "As you go out into the midst of the busy and driving population, and look upon the bustle, industry, and enterprise which prevail everywhere, you can think of no other description than that 'Bangor is New York in miniature.' Rows of brick stores are going up; public and private edifices are erecting, but the builders were rather capricious in their architectural taste." There were all sorts of orders and disorders, and very many of the buildings were arranged in "admirable disorder." The taste, however, was improving. People are here from everywhere. "They do not know each other," he says, "nor do they meddle with each other's matters at all. Strangers, when they come here, continue strangers to a great extent in every relation of life. Nine chances out of ten, when you ride into this city and inquire for some gentleman who has been doing business here for years, if you don't have your patience pretty much used up by the universal reply, that 'I don't know such a man.'" It was a matter of gratulation among newcomers that they had got into a place where the citizens did not meddle with each other's matters at all. "A state of society," they said, "of all others the most desirable, and the only one which a rational man can enjoy." Commenting upon these views the enthusiastic editor of the Whig said, "The time will come, and that, too, on the right side of fifty years, when Bangor in size, character, architectural taste, and general importance will equal, if not rival, Boston."

James Crosby, Stephen S. Crosby, Timothy Crosby, and Horen Mitchell asked the Legislature to set off that part of lot thirty-four lying in Hampden, to Bangor, where the other part lay.

A drill of military companies in the street on September 24th was highly complimented. There were several; those particularly noticed were "a corps of juvenile infantry," and a rifle corps under Capt. Samuel P. Dutton.

A curious controversy arose in regard to a Justice of the Peace commission. Henry Warren, of Palmyra, applied for such a commission, and Henry Warren, a "lottery-ticket vender," of Bangor, got possession of a commission which the friends of the Palmyra Henry said was his. They charged that the Bangor Henry refused to give it up when informed that it belonged to the other Henry, and therefore did not behave honorably. So all thought.

The grading of the streets of Bangor was in progress at this time. Paving was suggested, and that would "probably be accomplished all in good time."*

The Belfast Journal was enthusiastic about a railroad from Quebec, the Atlantic terminus of which would be at Belfast. Colonel Long had made a reconnoissance by way of Carritunk Falls, and found that the greatest elevation would not exceed two-thirds of a degree in half a mile.

Some excitement was occasioned by the report of the murder of one Samuel Perry, of China, a drover, near the "Pumpkin Tavern." Peleg and Francis Hathorn, and Jeremiah Legg, were before the Municipal Court on a charge of murdering him, and were discharged for want of evidence; and well they might have been, for Perry afterwards turned up unmurdered in Massachusetts, although the Aldermen offered $100 for the apprehension of the murderer.

Charles Hayes, Leonard March, M. P. Norton, R. M. N. Smyth, Allen Haines, and Ransom Clark induced Jonas Cutting, Esq., to issue his warrant for the purpose of incorporating them as a parish, "agreeably to the Canons of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States." The society was organized, and stock was presently taken up for "St. John's Church."

Dr. Shaw established himself in Bangor as a dentist.

On the 25th of September Daniel Webster visited Bangor on business. At this time his reputation as an orator and statesman was at its height, and the people were anxious to see and hear him. A public meeting was held, and John Wilkins, Henry Hall, Moses Patten, Jacob McGaw, Edward Kent, Samuel J. Foster, Isaac S. Whitman, Waldo T. Pierce, N. B. Wiggin, E. H. Allen, William Abbot, Henry Warren, and M. P. Norton, were appointed a committee to invite him to partake of a public dinner.

He accepted the invitation, and the dinner was given to him at the Bangor House on Tuesday, the 28th of September. "Edward Kent, Esq., presided with great ability, and was ably assisted by Messrs. Henry Call, Elisha H. Allen, Henry Warren, John Wilkins, and James Crosby, Esqs."

After several sentiments were disposed of, Jacob McGaw, Esq., responded to a call for a sentiment. He said that "few men live to middle age and participate in all the great transactions of the times without being exposed to the just censure of the public. But there are some persons who, from deep moral principles and deliberate consideration, added to exalted native powers, properly disciplined, who live above the reach of just rebuke, though not above the mean attacks of malignity and envy. This day this numerous assembly beholds and delights to honor a man of this description;" that he inherited "from a father who fought for the liberties of his country that pure spirit which filled the patriots of the American Revolution." Those principles had now become part of the man. "He now stands without a compeer in our nation. Clustering honors now come thick upon him, but have not had the effect to lull to apathy in the lap of indulgence the feelings and the energies of this man—on the contrary, the present visit to Maine gives evidence that he has no wishes other than to be a workingman, and traveling to do good to his fellow man." (He was in the State attending court, and engaged in a suit at law. His name was at the head of the columns of the Whig as a candidate for the Presidency). Mr. McGaw gave as a sentiment:

"Our distinguished guest—Hon. Daniel Webster."

This disposed of, Elisha H. Allen, Esq., arose "in behalf of the multitude about the house" who wished to hear Mr. Webster. Whereupon he was conducted to the balcony and addressed the assembled thousands. He said, after thanking the company for their manifestations of regard:

Having occasion to come into the State on professional business, I have gladly availed myself of the opportunity to visit this city, the growing magnitude and importance of which have recently attracted so much general notice. I am happy to say that I see around me ample proofs of the correctness of those favorable representations which have gone abroad. Your city, gentlemen, has undoubtedly experienced an extraordinary growth; and it is a growth, I think, which there is reason to hope is not unnatural, or greatly disproportionate to the eminent advantages of the place. It so happened, that, at an early period of my life, I came to this spot, attracted by that favorable position which the slightest glance on the map must satisfy every one that it occupies. It is near the head of tide-water, on a river which brings to it from the sea a volume of water equal to the demands of the largest vessel of war, and whose branches, uniting here from great distances above, traverse in their course extensive tracts now covered with valuable productions of the forest, and capable, most of them, of profitable agricultural cultivation. But at the period I speak of the time had not come for the proper development and display of these advantages. Neither the place nor the country were then ready. A long course of commercial restriction and embargo and a foreign war were not to be gone through before the local advantages of such a spot could be exhibited or enjoyed, or the country could be in a condition to create an active demand for its main products.

I believe some twelve or twenty houses were all that Bangor could enumerate when I was in it before; and I remember to have crossed the stream which now divides your locality on some floating logs, for the purpose of visiting a former friend and neighbor* who had just settled here, a gentleman always most respectable and now venerable for his age and his character, whom I have great pleasure in seeing among you to-day in the enjoyment of health and happiness.

It is quite obvious, gentlemen, that while the local advantages of a noble river and a large surrounding country may be justly considered as the original spring of the present prosperity of the city, the current of this prosperity has, nevertheless, been put in motion, enlarged and impelled, by the general progress of improvement and growth of wealth throughout the whole country.

* Luke Wilder, Esq. Mr. Webster had great regard for this gentleman, and suggested that if there were an artist here he would like to have his portrait painted at his (Mr. Webster's) expense. Mr. McGaw procured the services of Jeremiah P. Hardy, Esq., a promising young artist, to paint the portrait; but Mr. Webster, with his characteristic disregard of personal financial matters, neglected to pay for or take the portrait, and it was left upon Mr. McGaw's hands.

*The first street paving in Bangor was in 1881, on Exchange street.

At the period of my former visit there was, of course, neither railroad, nor steamboat, nor canal to favor communication; nor do I recollect that any public or stage-coach came within fifty miles of the town.

Mr. Webster then spoke of internal improvement, the objects of the Constitution of the United States, and matters of polity, occupying perhaps half an hour, and closing with—

There are some things, however, which the country cannot stand. It cannot stand any shock to civil liberty or any disruption of the Union. Should either of these happen, the vessel of the State will have no longer either steerage or motion. She will lie on the billows helpless and hopeless, the scorn and contempt of all enemies of free institutions, and an object of indescribable grief to all their friends.

And he gave this sentiment:

“Civil Liberty: Its only security is in constitutional restraint on political power.”

After the party returned to the table, the president, Mr. Kent, responded to a call for a sentiment. He said that we this day enjoyed an opportunity that we had long desired, that of offering “a simple, but sincere and honest, expression of our respect for the virtues, our admiration of the talents, and our gratitude for the services of our illustrious guest. Disregarding all externals, we offer our tribute to the man. Some men shine by borrowed or reflected light; some depend for their power and brilliancy upon their position; change that and they sink into their original obscurity; there are other minds like the sun that shine on in their own inherent and inexhaustible light, which, although it may sometimes be obscured by the mists and fogs that float in the low and dark places of the earth at an immeasurable distance beneath, still shining in its own calm and exalted sphere, and will soon dissipate the low-born and earthly vapors. While we hope the American people will select this man of our choice for Chief Magistrate of the Nation, we feel that this is not required to place him in the front ranks of men. This station he has already won single-handed and alone. This station is his individual property by right of conquest, and from it he cannot be driven. It was assigned to him by the American people after that memorable contest when he upheld by his single arm the ark of the Constitution, when those to whose custody it was entrusted faltered or fled. I give you—

“Our Guest: If his enemies can succeed in preventing his being President of the United States, they never can prevent his being DANIEL WEBSTER.”

The report says: “This eloquent speech of Mr. Kent was received with the greatest approbation, and the effort was equally creditable to the head and heart of its author; that “the festivities of the day passed off in the most brilliant manner; all were delighted,” “and Mr. Webster received indisputable assurance that he possessed the hearts and hands of the people of Bangor.”

Mr. Nichols, the ventriloquist, made his appearance in Bangor about this time and amused the people.

E. T. Coolidge opened a singing-school. Mr. Wiley, from Dover, New Hampshire, also gave instruction in the same accomplishment.

Mr. Harding, the talented artist from Boston, visited Bangor for the purpose of painting portraits.

And Mr. S. B. Page came into town in order to aid our citizens in the improvement of their oratorical powers.

The steamer Independence, Captain S. H. Howes, arrived at this port on the 8th of October.

Samuel A. Hale, Asa Walker, Jr., and John E. Patten were admitted to practice as attorneys and counsellors in the Court of Common Pleas.

Fifty thousand dollars' worth of hops were received from the adjacent country within a few days in September and October.

On October 10 Lord Rosslyn, Colonel Dundas, and Captain Stewart, of the British Royal Guard, arrived at the Bangor House and left the next morning for Halifax. On the 4th they had a spree in New York with the Marquis of Waterford, broke windows, etc., and were committed to the watch-house, where they spent the night.

Bangor was not at this time favored with many sidewalks. Complaint was made that in wet weather it was difficult to get up and down Harmon street hill; the Street Commissioner was appealed to for a few planks at the side of the street by “a mother with nine children and no chance to send them to school.”

The Mayor having offered a reward of $300 for the dead body of Penny, who was supposed to have been murdered, one Henry Stone, of Boston, brought the live body of Penny to Bangor, with the belief that the reward was for body. Finding his mistake Mr. Stone accused the city government of injustice in not paying him, and appealed to the citizens to pay his expenses.

Martin S. Wood, the lessee of the Bangor House, was requested by the Directors to surrender the house to them. Complaints had been made in regard to the management of the hotel. Mr. Wood then addressed the public. He said that he was induced to leave the City Hotel, Providence, Rhode Island, which “was esteemed and celebrated as one of the most splendid houses on this side of the Atlantic—made so by his efforts—and take a lease of the Bangor House, which he did in June, 1834, and went into possession January 1, 1835; that the winter business was hard; that with the spring came a vast influx of strangers from almost every section of the United States, and with this great patronage came “all the difficulties incident to an overflowing business;” that all went on smoothly until July or August, when some one, dissatisfied with his bill, wrote to the Boston papers denouncing the house as “an irregular concern,” and accusing Wood “of charging three cents for a common sheet of paper,” when the fact was that the gentleman had a sheet of paper that cost two cents and a quill that cost two more, and he was charged with stationery as is usual; that this charge and others equally groundless were “swallowed with avidity by the Directors,” who in the middle of September asked him to leave, which he said he was willing to do if they would buy his stock of wines and groceries and pay him $6,000 for his unexpired lease; that this proposition was rejected for the alleged reasons that he had violated the lease by keeping an irregular house and altering the fixtures, and that there was no lease, or rather, it was void because it had been signed by only Rufus Dwinel—an original director who had quit his “unmanly associates” and sold his interest in the house; that he was then threatened with being “tumbled into the street,” and deputy Sheriff Higgins, armed with a “resolution of the Board voting his ejection,” came into the house and presented it; that he (Wood) informed him that he should not regard it, whereupon he retired after telling him that his backers had an armed force of laboring men, who would compel him to leave; that he stood his ground and should until there was a legal adjudication; that one cause of the complaint of the Directors was that he would not dismiss from his house several intelligent ladies and gentlemen of spotless reputation, who had been “assailed by unprovoked scandal,” but that he had not kept an irregular house, and a “majority of the travelling public would sustain him in the avowal that the Bangor House has been kept by me in a style of elegance and sumptuousness that is not surpassed by any hotel in the country;” that every artifice that malignity could invent had been resorted to to keep him down. His creditors had been advised to rush in with their demands; but he met them; the Directors who boarded at his house trusted themselves to keep him out of his pay; and that, notwithstanding all, he remained in possession of the house October 9, and it would be conducted with the same ability and zeal “that had before distinguished it.”

The first regular meeting of the Lyceum was held on the evening of October 20, and a lecture on the Drama was delivered by Francis H. Upton.

A view of Bangor, drawn by Wallace and lithographed by Pendleton, was offered for sale this month (October).

Mr. Hooper, from Boston, opened a dancing school.

T. S. Harthorn opened a cigar manufactory on Exchange street, at the “sign of the Indian chief.”

“Free Trade” was the name of the packet that at this time plied between Bangor and Boston; McGiath, master.

On October 21 a hand-bill was posted in Boston announcing that “that infamous foreign scoundrel, Thompson,” would hold forth that afternoon at the Liberator office; that it would be a fair opportunity to “snake him out;” it would be a contest between the Abolitionists and the friends of the Union; that $100 had been raised to reward the individual who should “first lay violent hands on him, so that he may be brought to the tar-kettle before dark.”

A mob appeared; George Thompson did not. The Mayor asked the mob to disperse; they did not, but raised a cry for Garrison, the editor of the Liberator, and finding him in a carpenter’s shop in Wilson’s lane, where he had gone for safety, the crowd were proceeding with him towards the tar-kettle, when he was rescued by the Mayor and hurried off to Seventh street gaol for safe-keeping. That mob of gentlemen (?) did not hear the last of that while they were living.

On the day of the mob in Boston four hundred Abolition delegates assembled in one of the churches in Utica, New York, and were attacked by a mob of a thousand persons, who, with fire-hooks, ladders, and ropes, proceeded to demolish the building. The delegates were together about half an hour, in which time they organized a State society, and adopted a constitution. On being disturbed, they adjourned to a neighboring house to finish their business, and were followed by a mob headed by Haydon, the first judge of the county, and Beardsley, a member of Congress, determined to interrupt the proceedings.

Of the railroad to Augusta the Whig said: “Chimerical as the project may appear, it is nevertheless certain that the subject is now fairly before the public, and is receiving a great deal of attention from men able to complete the undertaking.”

About this time the Thompson excitement having reached Bangor, there was a public meeting at the City Hall, to give to such as desired an opportunity to vent their indignation against George Thompson and the Abolition movement generally. Mr. McGaw, Mr. Jewett, Captain Samuel Lowder, and Samuel Upton, Esq., made characteristic speeches. The tone was anti-Thompson, anti-Abolition, anti-“silly-women,” and pro slavery. Some of the speakers were cheered to the echo. Mr. Thompson did not make his appearance. But somehow the Abolition mill kept grinding, notwithstanding the meeting, and probably a majority of the actors in the course of time were drawn into the hopper, and came out in the end “original Abolitionists.”

The New England Review, in its notice of Maine at this time, says:

The principal tributaries of the Penobscot are the Metawankeag, Sabsahegan, Madunkank, Kenduskeag, etc., which water an extensive tract of country. At the head of tide-water, sixty miles from the Atlantic, and thirty from the head of Penobscot Bay, is the city of Bangor, which is the natural centre, and must be the depot of its productions and most of its exchange?

Timber is the great staple commodity of the State. The quantity manufactured is astonishing. Boards are assorted into four qualities, and number from one to four. The present prices at Bangor are No. 1, $23 00 per thousand; No. 2, $20 00; No. 3, $13 00; No. 4, $8 00. Shingles are of two qualities, 1 and 2. The present prices of the former is $4 00, and the latter, $3 50.

The speculation in Maine lands is not mere humbug or moonshine. It is a regular business transaction, and as easily stated in profit and loss account as any transaction whatever. If you ever think of making your fortune in buying Eastern lands, let us give you a hint which will be of service to you—be more careful about the quantity of timber and the facilities for getting it off than the price of the land. Poor lands are always sold for more than they are worth, and good lands for much less than their intrinsic value.

S. S. Southworth was at this time editor of the Whig and Courier.

Mr. Ford commenced a series of lectures on astronomy November 4th.

The county road through Hermon, Newburg, and Dixmont was completed about this time and made the main stage road.

The trial of Isaac Spencer for the murder of Reuben McPhetres commenced on November 5th, before the Supreme Judicial Court, in the Baptist meeting-house. Chief Justice Weston and Judge Emery presided; Albert G. Jewett, County Attorney, and Nathan Clifford, Attorney-General, appeared in behalf of the State, and Jonathan P. Rogers and ex-Judge Mellen for the prisoner; and as the occasion was extraordinary, General Hodsdon, the Clerk, appeared in small clothes. The galleries were occupied by the ladies. The trial occupied three days. The verdict was guilty. The prisoner was sentenced to death, but the sentence was commuted to imprisonment for life. There was a question in regard to his sanity or moral responsibility. He afterward became a maniac, and died in prison.

The "old Town Pump" that had stood "time out of mind" in Mercantile Square, was removed this year.

The Maine Anti-Slavery Society held a meeting at Brunswick on October 28th. Sixteen persons, ten of whom were clergymen, took part in the proceedings. Rev. Messrs. Pomroy, of Bangor; Lewis, of Brewer; and Thornton, of Winthrop, were of the number.

One thousand men were at work on the Bangor & Oldtown Railroad.

Daniel P. Wood advertised boots and shoes for sale at the corner of Main and Hammond streets, and George K. Jewett & Co. advertised dry goods, groceries, and hardware at 7 Main street.

This year the information was received that the Vigilance Committee, Parish of East Feliciana, Louisiana, offered a reward of $50,000 for the delivery to them of "the notorious abolitionist, Arthur Tappan, of New York."

Abner Kneeland was convicted of blasphemy, in Boston, on the fourth trial.

T. A. & J. C. White advertised woolen goods at 16 Main street.

On November 11th Mr. S. S. Southworth, editor of the Whig, in a note apologizing for his absence, remarked that "he entertained the most profound respect for the people of Bangor and the patrons of the Whig and Courier."

The Portland Advertiser suggested the idea of steam communication between England and Boston by way of Bangor. The Whig said "we shall be satisfied with nothing short of a railroad from the British Dominions through this city to Boston."

In this year the subject of the abolition of capital punishment was agitated in the State. At the session of the Legislature in 1835 a joint select committee made a lengthy report on a memorial of the Friends of Vassalboro for the abolition of the death penalty, which was published in the Daily Whig and Courier of November 23, 1835, in which the committee professed to be convinced of the truth of the following propositions:

First—The Scripture imposes no obligation for the continuance of capital punishment.

Second—The spirit of the Gospel clearly forbids any punishment based on a spirit of revenge.

Third—Government has no moral right to take life unless the public safety clearly demands it.

Fourth—The public safety in this State does not demand it in a time of peace.

They, therefore, reported a bill in conformity therewith, except in cases of treason which, after three several readings was referred to the next Legislature.

A concert of sacred music was given at the Methodist church, at the corner of Union and Independent streets, on Wednesday evening, November 25th, under the direction of Samuel Eastman, Esq. The programme embraced sixteen pieces, the last of which was the "Grand Hallelujah Chorus."

Captain W. S. Hunter and Master W. S. Hunter gave a concert of vocal and instrumental music at Smith's Hall on the same evening.

A Bangor man proposed this year that Maine and Massachusetts appropriate public lands for a fund for a railroad from Mattawamkeag to the boundary, to meet a line of railroad and steamboat communication through the Provinces, which was to connect with a line of British packets which it was supposed the British Government contemplated establishing between Canso and the West of Ireland. This enthusiastic Bangorean thought that the consequence of the establishment of this line of travel would be to "fix a great amount of manufacturing capital in Maine." Foreigners who were landed at New York would take this route, and would "see much to invite them to stop and settle" in Maine.

Dr. F. P. Theobald, M. D., established himself in Bangor.

November 27th, John S. Sayward delivered a lecture before the Mechanic Association on the "Cause, Tendency, and Cure of Radical Opinions."

Joseph Bryant removed from Castine to Bangor, and established himself as a general commission merchant this month.

The extensive lumber house of Cram, Dutton & Co. assigned to Waldo T. Pierce and Samuel Smith for the benefit of their creditors.

Jacob Drummond and seven others prepared a law to prohibit the running of any lumber down Kenduskeag Stream more than twenty-eight feet in length. Mr. Drummond was the proprietor of the lower mills on the Stream.

Ephraim Moulton advertised a large stock of groceries, among which were liquors of all kinds.

The Bangor Temperance Association was in vigorous operation.

The "City High School" went into operation this year.

The anti-slavery agitation was increasing. Dr. Deming wrote an essay against slavery. Governor McDuffie, of South Carolina, in his annual message denounced this agitation in the Northern States, and enlarged upon the horrors of amalgamation. "Domestic slavery," he said, "instead of being a political evil, is the corner-stone of our republican edifice."

The Fuel Society to relieve the destitute was organized December 12. Executive Committee: Moses Patten, Dr. R. K. Cushing, Edmund Dole, John R. Greenough, Benjamin Nourse, John Ham, Joseph W. Mason.

Mount Hope Cemetery Corporation was organized.

Joshua Abbe and Hollis Bowman established themselves in the English, domestic, and West India goods business this month.

Lieutenant Henry E. Prentiss, late of the United States Army, lectured before the Lyceum on "Our Means of National Defense." He thought our navy disproportioned to the wants of our commerce, and our army of 6,000 men inadequate to our necessities, composed, as it was, of the most worthless foreigners and few Americans. Our fortifications were rather for show than use. The Military Academy was highly useful. The military pre-eminence of the nation was not desirable. We must be "content to yield the laurel to more despotic governments."

December 17th Reuben R. Stetson married Charlotte T. Herrick, daughter of General Jedediah Herrick, all of Hampden.

Cyrus Emery, Isaiah Stetson, and George Stetson connected themselves in business this month as Emery, Stetson & Company.

The news reached Bangor of the great fire of Wall street, New York, that destroyed property to the amount of fourteen or twenty millions of dollars. The cold was so extreme that the firemen could scarcely work, and the hose froze rapidly; consequently it was impossible to arrest the flames except by blowing up buildings with gunpowder.

December 23d. The Lyceum discussed the "expediency of the course pursued by the Abolitionists."

The Theological Seminary this year procured a subscription of $100,000 for its permanent endowment. The misfortune was that but a small part of it was realized. Philip Coombs, Esq., of Bangor, subscribed $16,666.66.

General William Henry Harrison's name was used by the Whigs in connection with the Presidency. John Tyler was named for the Vice-Presidency.

The Eastern Magazine, edited by Mr. Carter, had a respectable position among the periodicals.

Association. A resolution offered by Thomas A Hill declared that it was reserved to this generation "to express and perpetuate our patriotic sense of obligation to the immortal Washington by a monument that shall endure to the end of time," and a resolution was offered by Edward Kent commending the object to "our fellow-citizens," and a committee of fourteen was appointed to assist in advancing the objects of the association. The monument was commenced and many thousand dollars expended upon it, then it rested until 1874, when it was suggested that the materials be removed to some other locality. The structure was declared an abortion.

On New-Year's day a party with thirty sleighs went to Frankfort. Near the bridge in Hampden one of the horses became frightened, upset the sleigh, ran off the bank, and was killed. The sleigh was destroyed. The gentleman and lady escaped with their lives.

On January 7 there was a juvenile concert at Hammond Street church, under the direction of E. T. Coolidge, the organist of that church. The class was highly complimented.

The Bangor Temperance Association was actively engaged in collecting facts in relation to the use of intoxicating liquors. The members of this association were pledged against the use of all intoxicating liquors, cider included. The resistance to the inclusion of cider in the pledge was long and obstinate. Many evenings were devoted to the discussion of the question, and as often as the question was brought to the vote—as it was many times in different forms—it was decided in favor of cider being embraced in the pledge by large majorities.

The first steam saw-mill ever erected on the banks of the Penobscot River was commenced last year at Turtle Head Cove in Hampden, by a company of Bangor and New York gentlemen. It was this year in full operation and a success. Mr. Haren Mitchell commenced erecting one this year about a mile this side of that, and just below the Bangor and Hampden line.

The "Penobscot Association of Teachers and Friends of Popular Education" was organized in January at East Corinth. Martin Snell, President; E. G. Carpenter and A. Sanborn, Secretaries.

This year the steamer Bangor ran to and from Portland, and the Boston passengers were transferred from one boat to another, much to their dissatisfaction.

A weekly paper, called the Bangorean, was issued by John S. Carter.

Complaint was made that too many of the public schools were kept in the same building. There were "four schools kept in one building." It was thought that "when a great number of children and youth, of diversity of character, were congregated together, much mischief and inconvenience would be the result."

A post-office was established at North Bangor (Veazie), and Samuel E. Marshall appointed postmaster.

The project of erecting a market-house between Kenduskeag and Central Bridges, at a cost of $32,000, of brick and granite, was reported favorably by a special committee to the City Council. They estimated that nine per cent., at least, would be realized annually on the 1836. A meeting was held January 2, at which the Mayor, Allen Gilman, presided, John A. Poor being Secretary, in behalf of the Washington National Monument investment. Messrs. E. & S. Smith, "with characteristic liberality," proposed to throw out land enough from their lot for a street from bridge to bridge.

Hon. Charles Stetson was at this time Judge of the Supreme Court, and had sufficient criminal business for this newly fledged city. It is recorded that he sentenced Martha A. Blagdon, a clothes-line thief, to fifty days' imprisonment in the common jail.

Two companies of United States infantry, under Major Dearborn, from the Houlton barracks, passed through Bangor on its way to Boston, February 14. Lieutenants S. L. Russell, G. W. Patten, J. Bumfrid, and H. W. Wessells, accompanied the command.

The subject of a temperance hotel was prominent early in the year. Its discussion was attended with some grave nonsense. A committee reported some facts which were thought to be important enough to publish, but the question was where? Some thought in the Daily Whig, where they could be published early and read by all; others could not endure the idea that they should be published in a paper that published rum advertisements! It was better to publish them in an exclusively temperance paper—the Temperance Herald, for instance, which was published in a distant part of the State, a paper entitled to them first, in the opinion of its conductors! This was thought absurd, inasmuch as the public that had the most interest in them would not see them under three, four, or six months. The sensible opinion prevailed. Mr. John Ham, Chairman, then reported on the hotel. The committee were unanimously of the opinion that "a first-rate temperance house should and must be immediately opened, and that they had a bond of the Franklin House for $20,000," which the committee thought extremely low, as the premises were extensive and well situated. Mr. Haskins proposed to open a subscription for stock to the amount of $60,000. This was opposed. A subscription was however opened, the $20,000 were divided into two hundred shares of $100 each, and before the close of the month all the stock was taken, and the Franklin House was purchased. Mr. Ham was the principal proprietor.

In the Lyceum the resolve "that judges, like all other servants of the people, should be appointed only for short periods," was debated. The disputants were A. G. Jewett, Frederick H. Allen, and John Appleton. The two latter were afterward judges, Allen of the District Court, and Appleton Chief Justice of the Supreme Court.

News reached Bangor that on February 16 Massachusetts Hall of Bowdoin College was burnt to the ground, with much of the furniture of the students and the whole of the Athenian Library, of three thousand volumes belonging to them.

The Universalist society in February contemplated building a meeting-house; and the Unitarians contemplated building a second house of worship on Broadway, to be called "Granite Church."

The temperance societies throughout the United States held simultaneous temperance meetings on February 23. Mr. Cyrus Hamlin delivered an address in Bangor in the First Baptist meeting-house.

The eastern and western Penobscot Bays were frozen over February 22.

On February 27 the Democrats nominated Amos M. Roberts as their candidate for Mayor. The Whig remarked that it noticed the meeting "to show our friends that however much they may desire to canvass the election of Mayor without distinction of party, it is now impracticable."

The Whig was jubilant over the discomfiture of the vender of "a downright and abominable cheat." He had sold a "skim-milk or white oak cheese, which had been made and pressed until it was about the consistency and heft of lead; it had then been beautified and disguised with a thin covering of curd made of new milk and then re-pressed," so that it had the appearance of a first-rate article. He was up as a "common swindler" at once, and was glad to get off with taking back his commodities and paying costs.

In March Mrs. Mary Crawford, relict of Dr. William Crawford, who was Surgeon and Chaplain in the army of General Wolfe, and attached to his staff at the time he was killed at Quebec, and was for a number of years stationed at Fort Pownall (Fort Point) where he died—died at Castine, at the age of one hundred years and five months. She was the sister of Colonel John Brewer, the original proprietor at Brewer Village.

On March 5 the Whigs nominated Edward Kent for Mayor.

On the evening of the 8th of March the brick building on Hammond street, corner of Patten Court, having an elegant exterior of pressed brick, and in process of repair, was burned out. It belonged to Cyrus S. Clark, and was built by Dexter E. Wadleigh. The walls were left, and the house was rebuilt.

The canvass for Mayor was somewhat exciting. There was opposition to Mr. Kent among the Whigs. At a meeting at the Franklin House, where Ransom Clark presided and John S. Kimball was Secretary, Elisha H. Allen was nominated "in opposition to Edward Kent." Mr. Allen declined to be a candidate.

Peter Edes, the oldest printer then in the United States, and Allen Gilman, Mayor of Bangor, were made honorary members of the Mechanic Association in March.

Mr. Kent was elected Mayor by 232 majority in a vote of 1,308. He received 770; Mr. Roberts, 493; scattering, 45. Whereupon the Whig and Courier shouted: "Van Buren 'buried heels upward' in Bangor!" Ward 7, then called the Bear Ward, gave a Whig majority, and was said to have redeemed itself.

A fair was held March 16, for the benefit of the "Female Orphan Asylum."

The People's Press, a Van Buren paper, first appeared March 14.

The "small bill law," prohibiting the circulation of bills of a smaller denomination than $5, sustained by the Administration party, was very unpopular and very much criticised.

The receipts of the city of Bangor in 1835-36 were $62,552.74; expenditures, $62,592.30. The amount raised for schools was $3,400; High School, $800; for streets and highway, $5,000; poor, $1,500; Fire Department, $1,500. The amount expended for the High School was only $677.30.

The City Government this year was composed of:
Mayor: Edward Kent.

Aldermen: Ward 1, Henry Call; Ward 2, Cyrus Goss; Ward 3, William Abbot; Ward 4, Ezra Patten; Ward 5, Nathan B. Wiggin; Ward 6, Samuel J. Foster; Ward 7, Preserved B. Mills.

Councilmen: Ward 1, Charles Ramsdell, Hollis Bowman, Charles Hayes; Ward 2, Willis Patten, John Meservey, Abner Taylor; Ward 3, Moses L. Appleton, James Perkins, Camillus Kidder; Ward 4, Samuel Wiley, Newell Bean, Stevens Davis; Ward 5, Hayward Peirce, Abner R. Hallowell, John Brown; Ward 6, Bradford Harlow, Nathan Perry, Ebenezer French; Ward 7, Simon Nowell, Charles H. Shepard, William Lowder.

John S. Sayward was made City Clerk; William Abbot, A. G. Wakefield, S. L. Valentine, R. K. Cushing, J. P. Dickinson, Bradford Harlow, and Franklin Muzzy, Superintending School Committee; William Abbot, City Solicitor; R. K. Cushing, Physician; William Emerson, second, Marshal.

East Market Place was laid out this year.

The expediency of establishing a "first-rate permanent library" was suggested.

About the 1st of April some individuals, being disgusted with the obstinacy of the ice in the river, attempted to blow it out with gunpowder. They blew and blew; the ice went up, but it would not go down. A little more sun was required.

The veteran John Holmes, at the close of the Legislature, prepared seven stanzas of a song, which were reported to the members for service. The last stanza was:

And when the lass shall fill her glass,
We'll gratefully incline
To kiss the lip that takes a sip
For "auld lang syne."

The theological students proposed to the City Council that they would form themselves into an "Engine Company," provided the city would furnish them with a first-rate engine.

On April 7th the proprietors of the Temperance Hotel organized by electing John Ham, Henry Little, George Starrett, Charles A. Stackpole, and Joseph W. Mason, Directors. The Directors elected George Starrett President and Charles A. Stackpole Secretary.

The Lafayette Bank was established this year.

A charter having been granted for the Penobscot River Railroad, J. Prescott, civil engineer, made a reconnaissance of a route from Bucksport to Milford, about twenty-eight miles. The excavations and embankments were to be obviated by "timber framework." He estimated the expense of constructing the road, including cars and storehouses, $7,932.17 per mile. He did not consider his estimate exact, but was "satisfied from previous experience that it would not deviate essentially from the truth."

Fine-looking radishes and cucumbers were produced from the garden of Eben French before the middle of April this year.

Mr. John Brown, Street Commissioner, laid plank sidewalks on the principal streets.

A long and interesting report of the Bangor Temperance Association was made by Asa Walker, in which the evils of intemperance were portrayed and commented upon with great ability.

Mr. J. E. Littlefield still continued his "Bangor Female High School." Ancient and modern languages, painting, and drawing were taught, with or without the common studies, at $5, $6, and $7 per week.

The Small Bill law became so obnoxious that towns even determined not to regard it, and authorized their Collectors to receive them on payment of taxes. Ellsworth voted to indemnify in case of prosecution.

The scarcity of money was a subject of "deep and painful anxiety." It was attributed by the opposition to the "unaccountable and unjustifiable war upon the currency of the nation" by the Administration rather than to over-speculation.

An organization, at the head of which was Rufus Dwinel, was established for the purpose of building a shore railroad between Bangor and Oldtown. Work was commenced upon the road, but it was abandoned.

The steamer Moosehead was launched into Moosehead Lake on the 23d of April. It had an engine of forty horse-power, was ninety-six feet long and drew about two feet of water. The first steamer upon that lake.

On May 12 there were lying in the harbor of Bangor seventy vessels—brigs, schooners, and sloops. This was thought worthy of notice.

The Globe Bank was organized May 18. Solomon Parsons, Calvin Dwinel, Samuel Smith, Otis Small, and John Appleton were chosen Directors. The Directors elected Samuel Smith President, and Sidney K. Howard Cashier.

The Penobscot Mutual Insurance Company was organized this year.

Mr. Anson Herrick, publisher of the Daily Advertiser, left Bangor on May 13 for New York. The Whig said that a warrant was out against him. Mr. Herrick afterwards became an Alderman of New York and a member of Congress.

Public military trainings were becoming unpopular. In Brunswick the annual May training was taken advantage of by the students of Bowdoin College, to ridicule the whole thing by a military travesty which was very laughable. The Whig and Courier of May 21, published a long account of it.

In May the Whig said: "The times are evidently growing worse and worse, and those who flatter themselves that the pressure will be transient we very much fear reckon without their host."

On the 21st of May Congress, in the appropriation bill, provided for the expenditure of $75,000 annually for two years upon Fort Knox, opposite Bucksport.

The streets were at this time receiving much attention from the city authorities, and the people were calling for sidewalks. They were disappointed at the tardiness of the Street Commissioners in relieving them "from the necessity of wallowing in the mud." It is not too much to say that the walking for many years, owing to the mud and dirt, was simply horrible. But the Commissioner was doing all in his power to remedy the evil by laying plank sidewalks on the principal thoroughfares.

The mud in the streets was a great obstacle to locomotion, and a source of universal complaint. There being few sidewalks, it was impossible to pass next to the stores and shops, or into them, without being besmeared and burthened with the filth at the lower extremities.

The steamer Independence, a very long steamboat, which had been for some time upon the route from Bangor, was the subject of much controversy, in reference to her speed and strength.

The small bill law went into operation June 1st. It was one of those partisan measures which, while utterly obnoxious to the members of the party in power, showed the utter subserviency of the party itself to its leaders. It was one of the laws which was evaded and treated with contempt by almost every person in Maine.

The celebrated "Helen Jewett," the wife of James Bickford, once of this city, was murdered in New York; and the trial of Robinson, her paramour, created a great excitement throughout the country. The crowd was so great on the second day that the court could not be opened until 12 o'clock. Thirty additional policemen were sworn in to control the crowd. Ogden Hoffman and Hugh Maxwell were counsel for the defense. The testimony was circumstantial, but strong against the prisoner; nevertheless he was acquitted, after an absence of fifteen minutes, by the jury. The verdict was received with long-continued cheers.

The St. John Episcopal Church completed its organization June 14. Its church structure was built from plans by Upjohn. Colonel Benjamin S. Deane finished the outside and Pond & Baker the inside. It is a handsome wood structure in the Gothic style.

A street-sprinkler for laying the dust was introduced this year by subscription of citizens.

A slate quarry was opened in Foxcroft by Mr. Leavitt, and the slate was pronounced worth from $25 to $28 per ton; transportation to Bangor from $6 to $7 per ton. Some specimens of ciphering slates were sent from the quarry to Bangor, and considered the best that had been used here.

Court street was established this year, and a contract authorized to be made with Richard Condon to build it at an expense of not exceeding $1,000.

The building of a market-house was provided for by the city government, provided a loan of money could be obtained at not exceeding six per cent. interest.

The store of A. M. Dunning, of Charleston, was robbed of goods and notes in April. The theft was advertised. In May Mr. Dunning received a letter informing him that the papers would be returned if he would send a sum of money to William Williams through the Bangor post-office. The money was sent. An officer watched and had the satisfaction of arresting Williams when he called for the letter—who, however, proved not to be the thief.

Complaint was made that "during religious services on Sunday afternoon the steamboat arrived at this port with the roar of cannon." This was the steamer Portland, Captain Howes. The person complaining thought the feelings of those who regarded the Sabbath should be respected even by steamboat captains, and asked why the vessel could not have come quietly in "without the unnecessary and frequent discharge of cannon, which served as a signal to the idle and the violators of the Sabbath to rush to her landing-place, to the annoyance of all who prefer the services of religion to the noise of the multitude."

Rum was constantly adding to its victims. William Kern, a shingle-weaver at Pushaw Lake, inspired by liquor bought in Bangor by his son William and son-in-law Thaddeus Trafton, boasted that there was not a man in the State who could throw him. His son William accepted the challenge and threw the old man, and held him while he struggled. A younger son attempted to interfere, but was prevented by Trafton, who struck him on the head with a shingle mallet. He then started to go for assistance, but seeing William beating his father with a club, he went to him and found him breathing his last. Trafton and Kern were tried and convicted for manslaughter, and sentenced by Judge Emery to three years in State prison.

The steamboat fare now between Bangor and Portland was $4. The "Bangor" made the passage to Boston, by way of Portland, in twenty-four hours. Complaint was made of the high fares. It was replied that they were low, compared with fares in other parts of the country. The experiment of a boat was tried with reference to accommodation rather than gain, and that the fare would probably be reduced when the business would warrant it.

The salary of the City Marshal this year was $500.

The news reached here on the 9th that on the Sunday previous much excitement was occasioned in Dr. Channing's church, Boston, by the reading during his absence of an invitation to attend a meeting of the Anti-slavery Society.

Six hundred dollars were appropriated for laying out Mt. Hope Cemetery (public), of ten acres, to be enclosed by fences, and a resolve was passed authorizing a loan of $25,000 at not exceeding six per cent. interest.

The Whig of June 15 contained this announcement :

Died, in this city very suddenly, of apoplexy, Mrs. Sophia, wife of John Godfrey, Esq., aged 49; a woman eminently distinguished for piety and active benevolence.

She was the daughter of Colonel Samuel E. Dutton, who removed from Hallowell to Bangor early in the century.

Owing to difficulties between the proprietors of the Bangor House and the landlord, Martin S. Wood, the house was stripped of its elegant furniture, and ceased temporarily to be a hotel. Mr. Wood converted it into a boarding-house. There was, consequently, insufficient accommodation for the traveling public. Mr. John Frost, however, finding the Franklin House closed, proceeded to put it in condition for the public patronage, and in a measure to supply the wants of travelers.

Moosehead Lake was growing in the public estimation. The "Bangor and Moosehead Lake Stage Company," recently inaugurated, was running a stage three times a week to Munson, within fifteen miles of the lake. A steamer, the Moosehead, had been placed upon the lake for the towing of rafts in the first instance, and then for the accommodation of "pleasure parties, land explorers, and mineralogists and geologists." The lake is forty miles long. A route for a road from the North Bay was being surveyed, and it was contemplated to establish a "a route by stage between Bangor and Quebec." It was predicted that the Moosehead would prove a success. The timber from sixty townships, it was said, would come into the lake, and it was thought the boat would do a large business in conveying lumbering supplies, towing logs, and carrying passengers.

A railroad car for the Bangor & Piscataquis Railroad (which was in process of rapid construction), arrived in the city. It was pronounced "a splendid piece of work, indeed, and comprised elegance, neatness, and, more than all, comfort in its internal arrangements."

The "Independent Volunteers" made a fine appearance in the streets on the 18th June, under the command of Captain Charles G. Bryant.

The business of the city was gratifying. Three hundred buildings were in process of erection. Lumber was sold daily at profitable prices. About one hundred schooners were at the wharves receiving cargoes; it was said that "nothing was done in the way of speculation."

Log-stealing had become so common that it was made by statute a State prison offense; but up to this time the juries could not make up their minds to convict those indicted for it. Public sentiment, however, was "marching on."

Mary Perkins, Clarissa Williamson, Dionisia Hill, Susan Patten, and P. V. McGaw, called a meeting of the members of the "Bangor Female Orphan Asylum" to be held on July 5, to organize under an act of the Legislature enacted April 1, 1836.

The Board of Health was ordered to effect a general vaccination of the city. They assigned the several wards in their order to Drs. R. K. Cushing, S. C. Clark, John Abbott, J. P. Dickinson, J. G. Brown, R. D. Bartlett, and Josiah Deane.

The Rifle Corps, under Captain Wing, appeared in the streets, and was complimented for the evidence it gave of a "high state of discipline and a thorough acquaintance with military tactics."

John Brastow gave notice that the lots in Mount Hope Cemetery (private) were now for sale at $20 a lot.

The Bangor Female Moral Society organized on June 9, having for its primary object "the prevention of licentiousness, by showing in every proper way its fearfully immoral and soul-destroying influence." Other objects were to prevent Sabbath-breaking, profanity, and intemperance.

On June 22, on petition of Ford Whitman and others, an order of the City Council directed the street engineers to "run the lines and place monuments at the angles" of the road running from Broadway Park to Six-mile Falls. An order was also passed for the erection of a high school-house.

This year Ira O. Glover, a genial landlord, took the new and elegant house lately erected at the corner of Harlow and Franklin streets ("New England House," afterward "National House"). It was larger than the Franklin House that he had recently left, he said, and he should endeavor to make it "equal to any in the city." Alas, poor Ira! Time afterward found him keeping a restaurant afterward a bowling alley, and afterward, boarding at the city mansion, where he died. But he was always genial.

John A. Poor, Rufus Parks, John B. Hill, Charles C. Cushman, Samuel H. Blake, and Jonathan C. Everett, Esqs., were admitted to practice in the Supreme Judicial Court at the June Term.

There had been in Bangor for several years a gentleman of great ingenuity and artistic merit, whose modesty had prevented his work with the pencil being properly appreciated. This was J. P. Hardy. From his youth he had applied himself to art; but he had never had an opportunity to derive benefit from association with foreign masters or from studying the works of the more celebrated, abroad. Yet he had accomplished some work which should have given him, and eventually will give him, a high place in the roll of American artists. One of these is a Boy Blowing a Soap Bubble; another, a Lady in a Window, which are wholly original. Another is the Poor Man's Fireside. This year some who had an appreciation of his work, called the attention of the public to his atelier, and awakened some interest; but Bangor was not sufficiently advanced in such matters to render him due credit.

On the 27th of June the City Council passed an ordinance defining the limits within which no wooden building over ten feet high should be erected. The limits extended westerly to Union street; northerly to Columbia street, county land, north line of Franklin House lot, and Penobscot street; easterly to Stetson Square, and southerly to the centre of Penobscot River.

The Mayor, Allen Gilman, treated a building as a nuisance which Dexter E. Wadleigh had removed from one place to another within these limits. Whereupon Mr. Wadleigh, feeling aggrieved, brought his suit against Mr. Gilman for damages, on the ground that the City Council had no authority to pass such an ordinance; and if they had, it was no infringement to remove a building from one place to another. But the court decided adversely to Mr. Wadleigh on both points. Mr. Wadleigh was a bricklayer, and Mr. Gilman a lawyer, who believed "ne sutor ultra crepidam."

The Franklin House having been renovated, was opened by John Frost as a temperance house, on the last day of June. A gentleman who was at the opening said, "Although a temperance house, I never partook of better fare or purer liquor than that produced on the occasion." The house would then accommodate about fifty persons.

Mr. Hill was teaching a private high school in the city this season.

The Fire Department celebrated the Fourth of July by a procession, an "appropriate oration by Asa Walker, Esq., in Hammond Street church," which was listened to with attention, and a pleasure made manifest by frequent applause, and a sumptuous dinner at the railroad station, "provided by Mr. W. H. Vinton in his very best style, and whose good cheer warmed the hearts of about three hundred individuals who sat down."

The sentiments were sensible, and this, a regular, was one of the best:

"The Fair: The only incendiaries that vanquish firemen—a policy of mutual insurance is our sole protection."

Mr. Emerson, the City Marshal, had only sixteen of the outsiders most "ripe for fun" on that day in the watch-house.

News of the death of ex-President Madison on the 28th of June, reached Bangor on the Fourth of July.

Nathan B. Wiggin advertised for proposals to build a brick building for a high school-house.

Mason G. Palmer was appointed Register of Probate, in place of Alexander Savage, who had held the position for about sixteen years.

Captain William A. Howard, who was in command of the boys' company from Hampden that gave so much interest to the celebration of the Fourth in Bangor in 1820, then a boy, now of the United States revenue service, was appointed to the command of the cutter McLane.

A not unusual circumstance in trade occurred about this time. A lot of leather was consigned from Bangor to a merchant in Boston. On the arrival of the leather, the merchant had an order from Bangor for a similar lot of leather. Whereupon, without removing the leather from the vessel, the consignee sent it to his correspondent in the same vessel which brought it from Bangor. Perhaps advertising would have benefited somebody, had the first leather dealer given notice that he had it to sell.

The burning over of six or eight townships of timberlands belonging to Benjamin Brown, Esq., in the neighborhood of the Wassataquoik, so loaded the atmosphere with smoke as to cause one day to be called the "dark day."

Nahum H. Wood taught a private high school this season in Bangor.

The receipts of the Bangor post-office in 1835 were $5,985; Portland, $6,074.

Samuel Call died on July 9, aged fifty-eight. Mr. Call had been long a resident of Bangor. He was an attractive and incisive speaker, and wielded the editorial pen occasionally and acceptably to his party—the National Republican, afterwards Whig.

Hon. William D. Williamson, who was faithful to his party, survived Mr. Call, and at a celebration in Hampden gave the following toast, which afforded his opponents an opportunity to criticise him:—

"Maine, the Marine State: May her Democratic politics be perpetuated, its rulers ever the people's servants, its safety their virtues, and its treasury their pockets."

His critics thought that, as he had admitted that the treasury was the pockets of the office-holders, he ought to be the Secretary of the Treasury.

Rufus Parks, brother of Gorham Parks, member of Congress, and a member of the Penobscot Bar, was appointed Receiver of the Public Moneys for Wisconsin Territory, it was said with a salary of about $3,000.

Chancellor Kent arrived in Bangor on July 13, and took lodgings at the Franklin House.

Leonard Jarvis declined being again a candidate for Congress.

There were now three Democratic papers in the city—the Republican, the Commercial Advertiser, and the People's Press.

John H. Slack was in the city for the purpose of procuring funds for the establishment of a high school or college in Canada. After interviewing him the pastors of the leading churches say, "by his own confession he is acting without responsibility to any man or body of men in Canada or elsewhere, and that, on this account, they cannot conscientiously recommend him to the patronage of the public." Dr. Pond and Mayor Kent concurred. It is needless, perhaps, to say that Mr. John Hancock Slack did not make a successful raid upon the pockets of our citizens.

The distribution of the surplus revenue was at this time agitating the public mind in the State. The acts authorizing its distribution had been passed by Congress, and the question was how it should be divided.

Hon. Gorham Parks had opposed the passage of the act, which was called "the great measure of the season," and said that "he believed there was no one act of his political life which in after times he should reflect upon with more pleasure than his vote against this bill." As might have been expected in high political times, his opponents would not give him credit for worthy motives, yet they thought that the Democrats, in changing him for Mr. Davee, their new candidate, had "missed a figure" and "given up a talented man for one who could never fill his place in the House of Representatives."

On June 27th there was a "great sale of permits, mill privileges, lands, and lots at Stillwater" (Orono). Before the public sale the Stillwater Company disposed of permits to lumber at the average rate of $4.50 per thousand, amounting to $140,000; sales of factory sites and house lots, $60,000. Sales by auction by Head & Pillsbury: Permits, $127,000; factory sites, house lots, etc., $75,942; total $402,942.

The sales exceeded all anticipations. The condition of the money market had rendered a disposition of the property at any rate questionable.

Mount Hope Cemetery was consecrated on Thursday, July 21st. The day was said to be delightful (notwithstanding many ladies were "thoroughly drenched" in a shower), and the exercises were of great interest. In the notice of a delighted observer occurs the following sketch:

The many rustic seats erected beneath the stately oaks and spruce growth were completely filled. A rude platform was erected under the spreading branches of an oak, which was decorated with a variety of wild flowers. On this platform the services were performed, and I more than once observed the silent but eloquent tear steal from the eye as the ceremony proceeded. The singing, under the direction of Mr. Johnson, echoed among the trees, and seemed to lift the soul in rapture and bear it nearer its better home.

The address of Mr. Kent was eloquent and affecting. He spoke of the propriety of consecrating a spot to the memory of departed worth; said that the soul-chilling appearance of our graveyards accorded not with the feelings of our nature; that a spot situated like this, with the beauties of nature scattered on every hand, was calculated to give a chastened and holy calm to the mind, and to lead the thoughts to study nature in her works, and to God as her great author. Every heart must have joined the speaker when he set aside that hill—the extended field, the leafy woods, the calm retreat, and the complaining brook, to the service and as the resting-place of the dead—forever.

The editor of the Whig said that the services “were both gratifying and pleasing, and throughout of a character highly appropriate.” “The address of the Mayor we have heard commented on in the most extravagant terms of admiration, and all fully coincide in the opinion that it was decidedly his happiest public effort.”

The reading of select portions of the Scripture was by Rev. Frederick H. Hedge, of the Unitarian Society.

Consecration prayer by Rev. Swan L. Pomroy, of the First Parish (Congregational) Society.

Benediction by Rev. John Maltby, of the Hammond Street (Congregational) Society.

The following hymns were sung :

[Tune—Bethesda].

Around thy forest shrine,
Eternal God! we bend;
While to yon dome of thine
Faith's breathing tones ascend.
To spread broad,
From Nature's fane,
The choral strain,
To Nature's God.

2.

The whispering wind around,
The glorious sky above;
The trees' sweet murmuring sound,
All, all proclaim thy love.
A thrilling voice
Breathed on the ear,
Checks every fear—
Bids man rejoice.

Where Nature's hues of bloom
In summer beauty reign,
Shall sadness, doubt, and gloom
Breathe here their mournful strain?
Let songs of praise
To God be given;
And high to Heaven
Joy's chorus raise.

4.

To faith, to hope, to love,
This spot we consecrate,
While, raised to Thee above;
Our hearts thy blessing wait
To Thee, we pray,
Our Father, God!
Through Him who trod
Death's silent way.

5.

Our souls shall never fear
The path He blessed, to tread;
But calmly enter here
The chambers of the dead.
Here shall we sleep,
And fear no ill,
While angels still
Their vigils keep.

To Thee! Great King of Kings!
When life's short dream is o'er,
On hope's aspiring wings,
Oh, may our spirits soar,
And swell on high,
That strain to thee,
Whose melody
Shall never die!

1.

Oh, righteous God, through Thy dear Son,
Accept the service we have done;
And make this place on which we stand
A Mount of Hope—a holy land.

This pleasant grove—this verdant lawn,—
While suns shall set and mornings dawn,
Make it the weary pilgrim's rest,
Where angry strifes no more molest.

3.

May all who here shall lay their head
Low on this sacred, silent bed,
The Christian path to glory run;
Nor tire, nor faint, till glory's won.

4.

And that dear dust which here shall sleep
May blessed angels safely keep
Till time shall cease, the morning come,
And trump of God shall rend the tomb.

Then let it rise and upward move,
In deathless forms of joy and love,
Shouting: Oh, grave, thy reign is o'er;
Remorseless Death triumphs no more!

6.

And when the golden sun shall die,
And Time and Death shall be no more,
Oh, may we find, beyond the sky,
The Christian's holy, happy shore.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrews and Miss Woodward, of Boston, gave miscellaneous concerts, which were called “capital affairs.”

There was published about this time an address delivered by A. Sanborn, Esq., before the “Penobscot Association of Teachers,” at Corinth, in October, 1835, of which it was said, that it was “calculated to give a right turn to public sentiment, and to obviate the evils of the present public school system,” and that the “light which it sheds is too important to be ‘hid under a bushel.’”

A canal to connect the Penobscot River with the head waters of Moosehead Lake was at this time recommended.

In July eight State Banks were doing business in Bangor—the Commercial, the Kenduskeag, Mercantile, Bangor, People's, Eastern, Penobscot, Lafayette.

Thomas H. Perty commenced a high school in August, in the building recently occupied by N. H. Wood.

The refusal to take receipts for personal property attached, which was adopted by some creditors, was complained of as a piece of oppression, and a grievance that should be put a stop to. It was replied that the oppression was on the other side; and it was only because the honest creditor was improperly delayed in realizing his dues from those able to pay that this course was resorted to.

Ventriloquism and animal magnetism were at this time represented by Mr. Sutton, of England, and Mr. Poyen, of Paris, respectively.

Mr. O'Connell, the tattooed man, proposed to enlighten the citizens on the subject of tattooing "among the savages of the Carroline Islands," where he had been eleven years taking lessons.

The stringency in the money market had the effect to awaken an interest in the subject of banks and banking, and to start a discussion of the project of a State bank, with the view to relieve the pressure. A writer said that "in our country no State is so rich as to have idle capital which it would loan on favorable terms," therefore we must resort to the older and richer countries of Europe for loans. But no private individual or association of individuals could negotiate a loan, at a moderate interest, in England, Holland, or France; therefore the credit of the State should be employed. This had been done in Louisiana and Indiana, and "under its influence they were rapidly advancing in a career of prosperity."

Monsieur Schafer, from Paris, wished to teach the people French.

The Trustees of the Theological Seminary, through the Mechanic and Farmer, tendered their thanks to Hon. Benjamin Bussey, of Roxbury, for a bell, whereupon that paper said :

We believe that that gentleman gave to the Congregational Society the first bell ever rung in this city, which bell was destroyed by fire and its place supplied by him. The Independent Congregational society are also indebted for their bell to the same munificent donor; as likewise the Baptist Society, (and we are quite sure he paid liberally towards the Methodist bell,) which with the one acknowledged above, make five bells, besides the sum paid towards the Methodist. It is right to ring the praises of such a man.

Mr. Bussey, however, gave but $100 towards the Baptist bell. A lady in Providence gave $28, and Hon. James P. Boyd, of Boston, added $300 and procured the bell.

The Commercial Advertiser and People's Press were respectively condemning and defending the conduct of the established banks in the city, for refusing to supply the President and Directors of the Globe Bank, recently incorporated, with the specie to commence operations. If they commenced by borrowing in that way, it would seem to be rather singular that they would not do as they were done by. But perhaps they had come to realize that another bank would have made too many; that one to a family was enough. It could not have been that they were afraid the specie would not be returned!

The Commercial Advertiser, established by Anson Herrick, was at this time edited by John W. Foote. The People's Press was edited by Thomas Bartlett, Jr.

While these editors were carrying on this bank war Hon. Elijah L. Hamlin published a petition to the Legislature representing that he, with Josiah Towle and seven others (naming them) subscribed a petition for the charter of the Globe Bank, to be located at Bangor; that, soon after the charter was obtained, he learned to his surprise and mortification, that a majority of the interest in the charter had been purchased from those eight persons by Samuel Smith, who was afterwards chosen President of the Bank; that he entertained no doubt that the sale was made in pursuance of a secret arrangement entered into between said parties before the charter was granted, and that the sale was a fraud, and that, having signed the petition in good faith, he had refused to take any stock in the bank, whereupon he prayed that the incorporators might be put upon their oath and show cause why the charter should not be declared void.

At this time the following story was told to illustrate how some banks managed to evade the law in regard to interest: An application was made to one of the banks on the western side of the Kenduskeag for a discount, and was refused unless the applicant would take a draft on a bank in — on the eastern side of the river, and after deducting the usual discount pay one per cent. for the draft. This was thought to be a high rate of exchange between the banks of so narrow a stream as the Kenduskeag.

It was said in behalf of the Globe Bank that it was its intention to change the process of banking in this city, and reduce bank profits; and those citizens were congratulated who were in the habit of getting bank accommodations upon the prospect they had "of obtaining them without making their liabilities payable in Boston, and being compelled to pay percentage on checks to cancel them."

Mr. Hamlin's petition was replied to with peculiar severity by five of the incorporators named by Mr. Hamlin, who said they were ready to meet his charges "with a full denial of their truth;" that Mr. Smith was not elected President of the Globe Bank in pursuance of any sale, and that they did not know of any "false colors" or pretenses under which the charter was obtained. They might have stopped there, but in their excitement they added much more.

Mr. Hamlin, in a longer article, reiterates his charges against some of the incorporators,—some in another article he excuses,—says that "he considers the Globe Bank to be one of the greatest humbugs of the day," etc. To this there was a very lengthy rejoinder, in which his statements were traversed and ridiculed, and with it the parties discontinued their advertisements.

The Democratic party at its county convention in Levant passed this resolution this year:

Resolved, That rotation in office, by selecting men at short intervals, direct from the body of the people, to places of profit and trust, "is a leading principle in the Democratic creed, and the only guarantee for the supremacy of the people."

Mr. George W. Carleton came into the city and essayed to instruct the people in the Real Art of Dancing.

The Rifle Company made its appearance in the streets and were complimented for their commendable appearance, as well as for the evidences of their skill in target practice.

Miss Turner pretty soon followed Mr. Carleton for the laudable purpose of teaching masters and misses, and young ladies and gentlemen, in the "accomplishment of dancing."

The subject of a railroad between Bangor and Portland was agitated, and a public meeting was held at the City Hall August 25 for the purpose of obtaining an expression of the citizens in regard to it. The attendance was of the most respectable citizens, and the expression was strongly in favor of building the road. A committee, consisting of Thomas A. Hill, S. H. Blake, E. H. Allen, Edward Smith, Amos Patten, Thomas Drew, and Ebenezer French, was appointed to confer with Colonel Long, the engineer, in relation to a route from Bangor to Augusta.

A shore railroad between Bangor and Oldtown was located and work commenced this season, but owing to the opposition of land-owners, and exorbitant damages claimed by them, the project was abandoned.

Bangor was rapidly becoming metropolitan, with metropolitan singers, ventriloquists, tattooed men, animal magnetizers, male and female dancing teachers, when on the 29th of August, with its theatre, actors and all, it would seem actually to have become so.

Near the northerly terminus of the Franklin Bridge, the theatre stood. It was a wooden structure of no great magnitude or pretensions to beauty, but it had its stage and scenery, and pit, and parquet, and galleries, and for a while its audiences.

Alfred Herbert, Henry Eberle, and John B. Rice were the managers; and on the evening of the 29th of August they put upon the stage Shakspeare's comedy, "She Stoops to Conquer."

At the opening this address, written by a gentleman of Bangor, was spoken by Mr. Rice:

Where late through forest wild the Indian roved,
Chasing the moose deer wheresoe'er they roved,
A city rose! see, o'er its hundred hills
The lofty spires, and thousand domiciles,
The park—the common and the spacious square.
Where lurked the red man in his savage lair,
And where Orono's tribe, with light canoe,
Pursued the game and raised the wild halloo—
Lo! sails unfurl to catch the coming breeze
And waft our forest treasures o'er the seas.
Old Time, thus far, has bid the world good night—
Be ours the task to ease his future flight;
To hold the mirror up to Nature's sons,
To drive away wichiggins,* blues, and duns;
We hold our "bonds," but are by friendship bound
To all who love the drama's cheerful sound;
Now may this humble, unpretending dome
Be Thalia's, Shakspeare's, Caliope's home;
A home for virtue, genius, talents, sense;
Our patrons pleased, we have our recompense.
Nor bank-bills, specie, have we much to boast,
But while we live will give our standing toast:
Now and hereafter be it understood
No combinations but for public good.
We greet old settlers, and we greet the young,
Though last not least to have their merits sung;
Bangoreans all, if we be not mistook,
"From Captain Noah down to Captain Cook—"
While on "lots" the old their changes run,
The young are well content with "lots of fun."
While rolls the dark Penobscot to the bay
And through all time the night's dispelled by day,
So may the drama, fostered by its friends,
Pursue its course till its glorious ends
Are brought to light, and Shakspeare's storied page
Be taught to wond'ring millions from the stage!
The stage! where Greece and Rome their heroes taught;
While mimic heroes ranged the world of thought;

* Indian term for writ.

When great Napoleon read the Book of Fate,
As Talma thundered lessons for the State.
Where Ocean's time and Forest's rapid stream
Mingle united in the morning beam.
Behold the "Union Market" rise to view,
Unlike the phoenix, who from ashes flew;
O'er rocky bed from bridge to bridge it grew.
May East and West there meet on neutral ground,
No more be rivals in the giddy round.
Long may they meet in Shakspeare's temple here,
At Thalia laugh, to Call'pe lend the ear.
All that we ask is candor, justice, right,
We'll do our best to put dull care to flight.

Judge Stetson, of the Municipal Court, had some business to occupy his attention. Thomas and Simeon Low, old native citizens and fishermen, had acquired a habit of their betters, and taken some drops too much with their associate, George Butler, and in their elevated condition manifested their superiority by divers blows and fisticuffs, and finally by throwing Butler overboard. All this occurred in the river, below High-Head; but all the parties survived, and were constrained to visit the court-room to get His Honor's opinion as to whether such conduct was in harmony with Democratic principles. On learning the facts, the judge decided that there had been too great an exercise of arbitrary power, and that Captain Thomas and his brother should each pay the State five dollars and costs for the indulgence of their aristocratic, or (to Americanize it) Federal, propensities. Captain Thomas paid like a man, but Simeon showed his contempt of the sentence by appealing.

A meeting of the citizens was held on Friday evening, September 3, to devise measures to relieve the distress in the community occasioned by the "present scarcity of money." It was affirmed that the pressure here was greater than in any other city or town, and was attributed to "the unfortunate difficulty now existing among the banks in this city." The chief speaker (George W. Cooley) said that nothing was necessary to enable the banks to extend accommodations to the amount of $200,000 or $300,000, but to bring to an end the war existing between them; and upon his motion a committee was appointed to confer with the directors and ascertain if something could not be done to reconcile existing differences, and to request them to break off their connection with the Suffolk Bank in Boston, and redeem at their own counters. The committee consisted of P. B. Mills, John A. French, Joseph Bryant, William H. Johnson, John True, Thomas Jenness, B. C. Atwood, Nathaniel Hatch, George W. Brown, Walter Brown.

The meeting was criticised as being in the interest of the Globe Bank. This, however, was denied.

After a week devoted to the matter the committee reported at another meeting that they had requested a meeting of a committee from each bank for consultation, and met a committee from six banks, whom they found ready and willing to do all in their power to assist the mercantile community as soon as they could consistently with their own safety.

Mr. Mills thought the chief cause of the pressure was overlooked, which was the withdrawal of a million of dollars from the State on the closing up the affairs of the United States Banks. This money was gone, and its place had not been supplied.

Mr. J. P. Rogers followed with a philippic against the banking system. He believed it to be the cause of all the difficulties, and advised his hearers to fly from it as they would from the plague. It was his opinion that if it was not done away with, it would eventually bring ruin and desolation on the country. But he did not suggest any plan for improvement.

There was great anxiety as to what would be the result of the financial condition. And this, aggravated by a rumor that there was an association in the city that furnished a broker with funds to loan to business men for a large consideration, and that the broker put their paper into the hands of a lawyer holding a high public office, who, as soon as it was collectable, handed writs of attachment to the officers, with instruction to take no receipts for the property attached, thus driving the debtor to resort to the same broker for means of relief!

The political canvass this year was exciting, as usual in a Presidential year; but with Mr. Merchant in the editorial chair of the Whig and Courier there was not great personal bitterness. Robert P. Dunlap was the Democratic, and Edward Kent the Whig candidate for Governor. Thomas Davee was the Democratic, and John S. Tenney the Whig candidate for Representative to Congress. The vote of Bangor was for Dunlap, 449; Kent, 672; Davee, 312; Tenney, 674; scattering, 143.

Elisha H. Allen, Esq., was elected Representative to the Legislature.

Mr. Dunlap was elected Governor, and Mr. Davee Representative to Congress.

The celebrated picture of Adam and Eve, by Dufufe, was on exhibition at the Bangor House.

The subject of the removal of the bodies buried in the cemetery on Main street, below Dennet's Cove, was agitated and their removal deprecated.

Some alarm existed in September because of the prevalence of dysentery, from which there had been several deaths. It was a time of unusual drouth, and the springs and streams were low, and it was thought that the disease was occasioned by the impurity of the water. Boiling it had been attended with salutary results; therefore boiling the water before using it was recommended. Souchong tea was also recommended as a preventive. A remedy was also recommended which it was said never failed of effecting a cure. If the patient be a grown person, let him take half a tumbler of lime-water, ten drops laudanum, and fifteen drops essence of cinnamon—in quantity, a table-spoonful every hour.

John J. Jerome in September opened a merchants' and mechanics' reading-room. Such an institution in September, 1881, had not existed in Bangor for several years.

The large steamboat Independence, which had been for some time plying between Boston and Bangor under Captain S. H. Howes, sustaining an "unsatisfactory character," in the evening of the 28th September, while approaching the city at full speed, was obliged to deviate from her course to avoid a vessel that lay anchored directly across the channel, and in doing so ran upon a rock in the river, off a pier which stood not far from where the easterly end of the Maine Central Station now is. Her false bow was stove in and a large hole was made in her bottom, so that afterward the tide ebbed and flowed in her. There were a hundred passengers on board, who were landed safely. No buoy indicated the location of the rock, and its existence was not generally known.

The town of Plymouth, in Penobscot county, from which Bangor derived some business, was affected with the emigration fever. Forty-one persons left it for the State of Illinois. With one or two exceptions the emigrants were family relations. Thirty-one bore the name of Harlow. Twelve of them were Baptists and constituted a church, having a preacher and a deacon.

The Belfast stage-driver alleged that he put Waldo Bank bills amounting to $1,700 into his outside coat pocket, and while giving his undivided attention to the attractive performances in the Bangor Theatre (the "Forty Thieves" was performed about this time) was relieved of the money by some covetous individual who did not return it. He could account for its loss in no other way. He was arrested on suspicion of having concealed it. The pocket-book that contained the money was afterwards found upon Broadway, rifled of its contents. The driver was released from arrest as a criminal, but was arrested again in an action of trover for the money, as lost by his carelessness. One Frasier was arrested on suspicion of having robbed the driver, and taken before the Municipal Court; but the evidence was not sufficient to detain him.

At a meeting of the Penobscot Association of Teachers, in Corinth, on September 17, a "talented and appropriate" address was delivered by F. H. Allen, Esq., of Bangor.

No prohibitory law being in existence, Mr. Samuel P. Eaton advertised for sale, at No. 30 West Market Place, "Old M. wine, old B. sherry, old P. sherry, brown sherry, old Oporto, old port, old Sicily Madeira, Sicily Madeira, W. H. Sc., W. H. Lisbon, Malaga, Muscatil, and claret, by the bottle and case; Champagne, Joly brand, Key brand, Dance do."

A correspondent of the Eastern Republican gives a notice of Bangor, which contains a fair representation of it as it was at this period. It is as follows:

BANGOR.—I have chosen a home subject for a short homily. There is but one word in the text, yet I shall divide the subject into seven parts, viz: First, Bangor as it was; second, Bangor as it is; third, Bangor as it will be; fourth, Bangor abroad; fifth, Bangor at home; sixth, Bangor as it is not; seventh, Bangor at home and abroad.

My introduction will be short. We live in the city of the East, and feel great concern for its reputation and honor; as a people we have been vilified, abused, misrepresented; and we feel constrained to open our mouths and show our valor in redressing grievances and vindicating the honor of a slandered people.

To the text: First, Bangor as it was. A few years ago it was a wilderness, inhabited by wild animals and wild men. Trees, water, and mud covered the surface of the earth, and the hand of civilization could not be seen. Soon at length a change was visible "the white man had been there"—trees, wild beasts, and wild men disappeared, and phoenix-like, a thriving, bustling village grew up in the twinkling of an eye. Farmers, merchants, lumbermen, mechanics, doctors, ministers, lawyers, and idlers congregated there, and then the Legislature made us a city. Every one was more given to business than pleasure, and thus all grew rich or acquired a competency.

Second. Bangor as it is. It is a place of consequence. In it there are rich men and poor men, honest and dishonest men, honorable men and contemptible fellows, industrious men and loungers, men of talents and education and ignoramuses, men of genuine merit and downright impostors and hypocrites. Bangor as it is does not differ much in these particulars from other places.

Third. It will be the largest city in Maine, and the great centre of business and attraction. [A prescience of the distant future, but true].

Fourth. Bangor abroad. Here we shall be a little non-committal, but remark generally, that the character and genius of our people are not rightly apprehended. Certain malign influences, just now, operate against us—a cloud obscures the clear sunshine, and the darts of calumny fall fast and thick about us, sped from the long bows of our enemies, who are greedy of prey and unconscionable in their demands. There as those, however, that do us justice, who have eyes that will penetrate fog and mist, and who can see pure gold "dimmed by dust and concealed by cobwebs."

Fifth. Bangor at home. We do not like a display of egotism, but "dear unto the heart of man is the land of his birth," and the place of his adoption. Here are genius, talents, enterprise, the materials and elements which, when properly developed, fitted, and applied, with the most favorable location and all the desirable external aids and helps, cannot fail of making eminent, happy, and rich men, and of giving us finally an enviable name and rank where we are now, little known. True, there are many discordant materials to be shifted, much rubbish to be removed—many of our people are strangers to each other—there is among us a pride of the purse, pride of education and profession, pride of having been the first settlers or squatters; but there is little pride of descent, for the parent stock is all about alike, and the loftiest heads do not dare to look as far back as their grandfathers for fear of stumbling against a cobbler, tinker, or tailor.* Every man stands on his own bottom, and throws away the rotten scraps of flesh and bones, and the mouldering dust of those who were born before him.

Sixth. Bangor as it is not. It is not the resort of all the rogues, sharpers, and knaves in New England. It is not justly celebrated for dishonesty and swindling in business matters. It is not on the retrograde and returning to its original nothingness. It is not in a galloping consumption. It is not a place to be avoided by honest and honorable men in the pursuit of wealth, . . . and does not contain more bad citizens than are to be met with in all new places of equal size. It does not contain a bad moral atmosphere. It is not what others have represented it to be, corrupt, depraved, heart and soul.

Seventh. Bangor at home and abroad. At home Bangor has enemies and professed friends, who have done more to injure her reputation and credit than they can make amends for in a long life, and some two or three of the Bangor editors stand in front of the offending. Kindred spirits abroad have caught up the discordant notes of those thoughtless and stupid knights of the quill, and rung them upon every change of the newspaper gamut. Thus Bangor has been wounded and traduced at home and abroad by blockheads and notoriety seekers, who deserve to be ducked in a horse pond for their pains. Thus endeth my discourse.

Dr. Holman during the month of September gave several addresses upon the subject of temperance in Bangor. They were to full houses and pronounced able.

The canvass for President was becoming exciting. General Harrison was in the field against Mr. Van Buren, and was drawing a large support.

The banks declared the following dividends: Globe, none; LaFayette $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. for less than three months; Penobscot 2 per cent. for four months; Eastern 4 per cent.; Mercantile 3 per cent.; Kenduskeag 3 per cent.; People's 3 per cent.; Commercial 4 per cent.; Bank of Bangor 4 per cent.

The subject of a railroad between Bangor and the head of winter navigation was agitated. It now exists.

*Not true about half a century afterwards, when such hold their heads as high as others.

Hon. Ether Shepley was appointed an associate justice of the Supreme Judicial Court.

In the widening of Main street, Hon. William D. Williamson was allowed $400 damages for land taken from him. This sum was not satisfactory, and Mr. Williamson carried the matter into the Court of Common Pleas, where the jury added $150 to the $400. Messrs. Garnsey and Kendrick, in a similar case, were allowed a similar sum.

A railroad meeting was held at the City Hall on the 13th of October, at which it was resolved, "That it is expedient for the State to subscribe for a portion of the stock in a railroad from Bangor to Portland."

The name of "State street" was given by the City Council to what had been known as "East Main street."

The Bangorean, whose editor was Charles Gilman, Esq., was discontinued.

Ebenezer G. Rawson, Esq., was appointed County Commissioner.

At this time there were two thousand five hundred cases on the docket of the Court of Common Pleas, and one thousand six hundred on that of the Supreme Judicial Court in the county of Penobscot. Judge Ether Shepley presided at the October term of the Supreme Judicial Court, his first here, very acceptably.

Samuel Hudson, Surveyor-General of Lumber of the county of Penobscot, grandfather of the mother of Miss Blanche Willis Howard, died in Bangor on the 25th of October, aged forty-two.

In pursuance of an order of the City Council, the remains in the old cemetery at the corner of Oak and Washington streets were removed to Mt. Hope. Among them were those of Monsieur Junin, who was murdered in 1790. The crucifix and ribbon attached that were buried with them were found, and the ribbon was in a remarkable state of preservation. It appeared as if recently made.

The information reached Bangor that, by the request of a meeting of citizens of Portland, held on October 25, the Mayor of that city withdrew his consent that the "Maine Anti-Slavery Society" have the use of the City Hall for a meeting. The use of the Friends' meeting-house was not refused, however, and the meeting took place. There was a strong feeling in Portland against the anti-slavery movement. The meeting was disturbed by rioters. They threw missiles at the house, and shouted and hallooed like maniacs. The effect was to hurt Portland and help anti-slavery.

On October 31 the people of Bangor were shocked to learn of the loss by fire of the steamer Royal Tar in the Bay, off Isle-au-Haut, on the 24th. The vessel was on her passage from St. John to Portland, with a caravan of animals, and ninety two passengers were on board. Thirty people were drowned and two burned to death. An elephant and six horses jumped overboard. The elephant reached the land. The vessel was at anchor when the fire commenced; the wind was blowing a gale, the weather was cold, and the anchor was raised, with a view to running her ashore. The revenue cutter from Castine came to the assistance of the vessel, and was the means of saving many lives; but all the property was lost, estimated at $200,000, including $60,000 in money and notes. The steamship had been in Bangor not long before. The fire was said to be owing to the gross negligence of the engineer. Great sympathy was felt for the captain (Thomas Reed), who did all in his power to save the people. The ship was new, cost $40,000, and was owned in St. John. There were several cases of individual heroism, that of the captain in particular, and several of contemptible meanness and cowardice.

The steamer Bangor was disabled in November by a defect in her machinery, and was taken off the route.

The first flight of snow of the season fell in November, and changed to rain, then to snow again, and melted nearly as fast as it fell. But it at last changed its vacillation, and came in such quantity that there was a foot or more of it upon the ground before it ceased.

Dr. Charles T. Jackson, of Boston, devoted three months this year to the geological survey of Maine, between Thomaston and the St. Croix, and up the St. John as far as the Madawaska River.

On the 1st of November the right of choice of pews in the St. John's Episcopal church was advertised for sale.

The Bangor Glee Club (amateurs) gave an enjoyable concert in St. John's church on the evening of the 7th of November, and was well patronized. The building was about completed from plans by Upjohn, and considered a beautiful church.

The political campaign for the election of President culminated on the 7th of November, in the election of Martin Van Buren President of the United States. The vote of Bangor for electors was: Whig, 516; Democrat, 312.

The subject of a market-house had been agitated for a long time, and by request of the City Council the Mayor obtained the passage of an act by the Legislature, authorizing the erection of a market-house on suitable piers and works over the waters of the Kenduskeag, between Kenduskeag and Central Bridges. The act was approved March 25, 1836. After allusion to the subject by the Mayor (Edward Kent), and various reports by committees of the Council, on August 1, 1836, that body appointed Nathan B. Wiggin, Paul R. Barker, and George Starrett, a Superintending Committee, to contract for laying the foundation for the City Market-house, between the two bridges. The project, the location, and the whole proceedings relative to the matter, were generally discussed, and by some very severely criticised. The estimated cost of the foundation, with exterior walls of split granite, and the building, was $40,000.

One of the critics, in the Commercial Advertiser averred that the undertaking could not be completed without an expenditure of $100,000.

The foundation was built in 1836-37, but no further work was done upon it by the city. It stood unoccupied until 1843, when the southerly end was rented by Messrs. Smith & Jones, Shaw, Ames, and others, who erected a wooden building thereon for a market-house and public hall. This was occupied until 1846, when it was carried away with the bridge by the flood of that year. It was, however, soon replaced by a larger structure, which remained until the foundation went into the possession of the United States Government, who raised and rebuilt the foundation, and built upon it the present substantial Custom-house and Post-office building.

Joseph Chase, of Sebec, was appointed Surveyor-General of Lumber in place of Samuel Hudson deceased. The appointment was sharply commented upon by the Whigs as entirely unfit, made for partisan purposes, and opposed to the wishes of those most interested. The only reason given for his appointment was that he was pleased to appoint no Whig deputies.

The Bangor Lyceum was organized at this time, by the choice of Frederick H. Allen, President; Daniel S. Jewett, Vice-President; Moses Patten, Jr., Treasurer; Abbot W. Paine, Secretary; William H. Foster, Cyrus Hamlin, Peleg W. Chandler, Managers.

Mr. Allen was appointed a Judge of the District Court of Maine; Mr. Jewett, a United States Senator from Missouri; Mr. Patten, a merchant, died early; Mr. Paine, Insurance Commissioner for Maine; Mr. Foster, a merchant, died at middle age; Mr. Hamlin has been in various important positions in this country and abroad, as will be seen elsewhere in this work; Mr. Chandler became City Solicitor of Boston, and one of the ablest members of the Suffolk Bar.

The lecturers announced were: Rev. Frederick H. Hedge (professor in Harvard College and D. D.); Rev. Thomas Curtis, a learned Baptist clergyman, from Scotland; Edward Kent, Esq., (Governor and Judge Supreme Court); Prof. Leonard Woods (President of Bowdoin College); Cyrus Hamlin (D. D.); Thomas H. Perry (teacher); Prof. George Shepard (D. D.); John A. Poor, Esq., (President of railroads); E. L. Hamlin, Esq., (State Senator); Frederick H. Allen, Esq., (Judge); a discussion on the Influence of Theatres upon Society, by Rev. Prof. Pond (D. D.) and Hon. J. P. Rogers (Attorney General).

The Mechanic Association was doing much for the improvement of its members by debates, lectures, and otherwise. One question discussed was whether the city should grant licenses for the sale of ardent spirits; another, should the county establish a house of correction where manual labor should be performed by convicts? The settlement of these questions was in abeyance a long time, but it has been accomplished, and it is to be hoped permanently.

The meetings of the lyceums were crowded, and were of the most interesting character. The opening lecture was by Rev. Mr. Hedge, and was greatly admired. A debate on the moral tendency of theatres, in which Mayors Cyrus Hamlin and Daniel T. Jewett led, interested the audience several evenings.

The Bangor & Piscataquis Railroad was so far completed that its cars commenced running regularly November 30. The Bangor station was on the hill southerly of Meadow Brook, and the course of the road to Oldtown averaged perhaps a mile from the Penobscot River. Mr. Eldridge Harris was its agent. This road was the result of the enterprise of two energetic and adventurous speculators, Edward and Samuel Smith. These persons accomplished a great deal of labor during the few years of their career, were the employers of many men, and the disbursers of large sums of money, but none at last was found in their possession. Some monuments of their enterprise are in existence, but the railroad is not one, "Smith's Block," at the foot of Hammond street, however, is. When at length failure attended all their undertakings, one of them endeavored to obtain some accommodation from the State and was unsuccessful. In the wrath that followed his disappointment, and with longing to gratify a feeling of revenge, he resorted to that able lawyer, Jonathan P. Rogers, for advice. Mr. Rogers listened coolly to the statement of his grievance, and then advised him to take the State into partnership with him.

There was at this time some agitation of the subject of referring the election of the judges of the courts to the people. The organs of the Democrats in Bangor favored, that of the Whigs opposed it. Fortunately the sentiment proved to be in favor of permitting the appointment of the judges of the higher courts to remain in the hands of the Executive.

Captain Luke Wilder, for whom, it will be recollected, Mr. Webster, on his visit to Bangor, expressed such high regard, and whose portrait he caused to be painted by Hardy, died in Bangor on November 24th, at the age of eighty-three. He was born in Lancaster, Massachusetts; was with a company of volunteers under General Stark, and for some time afterward a resident of Salisbury, New Hampshire. He came to Bangor in the latter part of the eighteenth century. He was a man of great kindness of heart, and had the respect and veneration of all with whom he came in contact. He resided for several years in Kirkland—now Hudson.

The agitation of the subject of temperance was having its effect, in keeping the display of liquors from the advertisements and counters of the more respectable traders, and in making some of the less respectable ashamed of their business.

One man, under the promptings of his troubling conscience, thought that though he must sell liquors in order to live by the side of his less conscientious neighbor, he would continue to do it in a way that would be attended with the least evil results. He therefore made the top of the casks containing his beverages a part of his counter, and perforated it with holes that the water with which the glasses of his customers were drained might find its way into the dangerous liquid and modify its destructive qualities. His apology was in this very language:

I know that selling ardent spirits is a great evil. I know that misery flows from it, and I know, too, that the more water I turn into the barrel the less mischief I do in the world. The fact is, I almost abhor myself for being a rumseller, but my next-door neighbor keeps just such goods as I do, and he sells rum, and if I do not furnish my customers with the article, I cannot sell them other goods. Could I be assured that the professed friends of Temperance, who are now in the habit of buying there, would transfer their custom to me to make up my loss on the other side, I would abandon the traffic at once; but I cannot run the risk of depriving myself and family of a living.

Colonel Joshua Carpenter acquired an unenviable notoriety as Sheriff. The newspapers charged him with interfering with jurors, which was denied, and with putting into the hands of his deputies a receipt, with instructions to take no other, which contained this form of agreement:—

And we further agree that we have actually received the property aforesaid of said officer; that it is the property of the said ——— [the debtor], and is of the full value aforesaid; and this receipt shall be conclusive evidence against us of all the premises heretofore or hereafter specified in this receipt, and of our liability to the said officer for the identical property aforesaid, or its aforesaid value in cash, at the option of said officer. And for the further security of said officer, we agree that he shall have a lien on said property, with a right to repossess himself at any time of the same; or to take of the property of either of the undersigned to the value aforesaid, at any time, into his possession for his said security; and that the execution or executions which may be recovered in the aforesaid process may be levied at any time upon the personal property or real estate of any one or more of the undersigned, and satisfied therefrom in the same manner as from the property of said debtor; and that we will waive any irregularity in the mode of advertising or selling any of the aforesaid property, or in the preliminaries to the same. Any balance remaining, after all demands shall have been satisfied, which may then be in the hands of the said deputy, to be restored to us on demand by any one or more of us!

John W. Frost, the editor of the Commercial Advertiser, who wielded a free pen, commented upon the conduct of the Sheriff in a manner that would have disturbed a person of any sensibility.

On the 6th of December Mr. Frost announced the dissolution of his connection with the Advertiser, with the intention of removing to the South. The Advertiser was to assume the name of the Daily Post, and be edited by Thomas Bartlett, Jr. Mr. Frost was a member of the Bar, and a writer of ability.

On the same day occurred the death of Nathaniel Haynes, editor of the Eastern Republican. His health had long been poor. He was a member of the Bar, although he had been little in practice. He was a man of ability, and wielded a trenchant pen. He was a bitter partisan, and much of his severity may have been attributed to the condition of his health.

On the same day A. G. Wakefield, Esq., Secretary of the School Committee, gave notice that candidates for the city high school would be examined in the second story of the back building in District No. 2, on the 15th. Candidates for admission would be examined in "reading, writing, geography, and arithmetic, as far as compound proportion." No scholar under ten years of age would be examined.

A condition of business existed at this time that was discreditable and annoying. The "credit system" prevailed to a provoking extent. It was a practice from the beginning of the town to buy goods on credit, and the new comers readily fell into it. There were many who indulged in this practice who had no other intention than to pay. They could have paid down, but it was a practice of the seller to put a high price upon his wares because of the credit system, and it was of no advantage to the purchaser to pay down. But there were many others who did not have the idea to "pay" in their minds when they purchased, and they would permit their bills to run on from six months to a year, and, unless dunned, would never think of paying. Grievous complaint was at length made that men who were "living in the most extravagant manner," whose houses were "elegantly finished and furnished," who were using "money to shave notes at an enormous discount," would reply, when called upon to pay a small bill of groceries, that they had "no money." That sometimes they would pay by a draft or note upon which the payee would get the money at the bank by indorsing it, and when it became due it would be protested, and come back to the indorser for payment. Men of large property would allow themselves to be sued, and think the delay until an execution could be obtained would be an advantage to them in the business of "shaving." Men were so much in the habit of this that they did not reflect that it was dishonorable. In time, however, there was a reaction. The merchant found that a cash business with less "profit" was far more lucrative than a credit business with great "profits" and little pay, and gradually business reached a healthy foundation.

A meeting of the Bangor Temperance Association was held on the evening of December 19, at which Professor Enoch Pond offered a resolution avowing the expediency of requesting the Legislature to repeal the existing license laws, and to enact a law making the traffic in ardent spirits penal. The experience had always been that license laws were ineffectual to prevent the sale and use of intoxicating drinks by any one disposed to sell or use them. The annual report at this meeting pronounced the Franklin House, as a temperance hotel under the management of Mr. John Frost, a success. The house had been purchased by a committee of the Association for $20,000. An assessment on the stockholders for repairs and furniture rendered the cost of the establishment nearly $25,000. It had been in operation about six months, and was so well kept that it had the patronage of others besides temperance men.

A fire on the 22d of December destroyed the wooden block at the westerly end of Kenduskeag Bridge, owned by Messrs. E. and S. Smith. The Smith Block, in immediate connection with the buildings burned, being fire-proof, escaped with some injury to the easterly wall. The loss by owners and occupants was estimated at $15,000.

A magazine bearing the name of Maine Monthly was at this time in existence, under the editorship of Charles Gilman, Esq., and ably conducted.

On December 19 the death of Captain Samuel P. Dutton, of Bangor, occurred in the city of New York. Captain Dutton was a man of great enterprise, and was connected with the house of Cram & Dutton, when during the unfortunate financial inflation of 1835 it was obliged to succumb.

On the 25th of December Charles Rice, Esq., died. He was a prominent man in the county from the War of 1812, during which he met with heavy losses in shipping and otherwise at the hands of the British. He afterwards held the office of Register of Deeds for the county, and other offices of trust.

The Bangor Theological Seminary, at this time under Professors Enoch Pond, George Shepard, and Leonard Woods, was in a flourishing condition. The number of students was forty-eight. It had an excellent library, consisting of about four thousand volumes.

The Bangor & Piscataquis Railroad Company requested the city government to authorize them to lay their track from their depot to tide-waters. Authority was afterward given, and the cars ran in the centre of Harlow and Exchange street, drawn by horses, and greatly to the annoyance of street travelers.

After the discontinuance of the United States Bank the People's Bank, of Bangor, was selected as one of the deposit banks of the General Government. From some cause the Mercantile Bank this month became a deposit bank.

There was not harmony among the friends of the Administration in this city at this time. Their organs were the Eastern Republican and People's Press, and a warfare existed between them. The history of the party in power is usually a history of selfishness and greed. While there is unanimity in maintaining the integrity of the National organization, much division grows up among local politicians from jealousy on account of the distribution of the "spoils," which threatens utter disorganization, and ends in—harmonious enthusiasm at the next general election.

December 31st. The year closed with the temperature at fourteen degrees below zero.

CHAPTER XXX.

Year Opens Bad Financially—Bank War—Court Dockets—Vaccination—Teachers' Association—Municipal Judge Excitement—Amos Davis Case—Productiveness of the Soil—Total Abstinence—Edward Kent Elected Mayor—Aldermen and Council—Surplus Revenue—Otis Small, Sheriff—City Officers—Lyceum—Post-office Affairs—Theatre—Taxation Avoided—Population—Eastern Credit—Specie Payments Suspended—Geological Survey—Bangor Journal—Habits of the People—Suffolk Bank System—City Appropriations—Fiske's Grievances—Boundary Trouble—Greeley Arrested—Military Pronouncements—Bangor House Difficulty—Surplus Revenue Question—William Lloyd Garrison—Anti-Slavery Society Organized.

1837. The year opened in Bangor with a financially bad aspect. The banks were at war with each other. The Eastern and Mercantile had severed their connection with the Suffolk Bank, and would keep no funds there; and wished the others to follow their example, which they were not inclined to do. And, it is said, their antagonism prevented their making discounts and accommodating the merchants. These banks had a circulation at the opening of the year 1836 of upwards of $350,000, and money was easy; now their circulation did not exceed $175,000, and there was great difficulty in doing business because of the stringency occasioned, as, it was alleged, by the "manner of conducting business," and not, as has been supposed, by "the inability of the banks to sustain themselves through the pressure." It is hardly supposable, if the banks could have, in their belief, accommodated their customers and at the same time sustained themselves, that they would not have done so. The fact is that there was a general dearth of money all over the country, occasioned by a want of confidence, as there always is after a period of inflation and crazy speculation.

What confidence could be had in a business community like that of Penobscot county where the court dockets were laboring under the burthen of from three to five thousand actions, and increasing?

The Penobscot Agricultural Society held its annual meeting on January 2, and before adjourning considered this sentiment: "Eastern Lands: Like good cider or beer, must undergo the process of fermentation. The scum having worked off, farming friends will not object to it."

By the Circular of the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, issued January 3, 1837, the amount of surplus revenue to the credit of Maine was $1,274,451.02.

Mrs. Lemon and sister, with friends, "gave a concert of sacred music at the Baptist church, for the benefit of the poor and needy of the city of Bangor," on the 16th, which was well attended and complimented. Receipts $134.50. The tickets to the concert were twenty-five cents each.

General Samuel Veazie, of Bangor, was elected by the Legislature a member of the Governor's Council.

The City Council paid $986 for the vaccination of the inhabitants. The number of inhabitants on which the operation was successfully performed was 1,972.

The Penobscot Association of Teachers held a meeting at Exeter. An able address was delivered by Hon. S. H. Blake, of Bangor, and a copy was requested for publication.

In this winter of "no currency," many persons who usually had no trouble in paying their rent were at their wits' end as to where they could possibly look for the means. While two tenants were ruminating over their situation, their landlord appeared, and witnessing unmistakable signs of want in their houses, he relieved them somewhat of their trouble and won their gratitude, by bidding them give themselves no anxiety about the rent, for he should not require it of them during the continuance of the hard times. Another gentleman sent a load of wood to his debtor.

The Mechanic Association elected John S. Sayward President, Joseph Kendrick Vice-President, Joseph Wing Treasurer, Samuel Reynolds Secretary, Samuel Ramsdell Librarian.

The Bangor Classical Institute, connected with the Theological Seminary, was under the charge of Louis Turner, A. M., Principal.

Charles Stetson was appointed Clerk of the Courts, and Albert G. Jewett re-appointed County Attorney of the county of Penobscot.

On the morning of February 3, Edward Kent, Esq. announced to the court then sitting, the death of George Starrett, Esq., last evening, at the age of thirty-nine years; and added that "perhaps no man has ever more fully secured the respect and esteem of his brethren of the Bar, and of the whole people, by unbending integrity and indefatigable attention to his duty, aided by talents and acquirements of highly respectable order, and sound, practical good sense." As a token of respect, the court, as usual in such cases, adjourned.

A case of unusual interest was tried at the January term of the Court of Common Pleas, Judge Perham presiding.

The foundation of the case was an indictment against Charles Burlingame, John T. Howard, William Tums, Stover Rines, and his sisters, Mary Ann Rines and Sarah Lane, for conspiracy to destroy the fair fame of Julia W. Rines, the wife of Stover Rines, with a view to deprive her of her interest in her husband's estate.

Rines was a strong, athletic man, of abundance of will, a resident of Oldtown. He had acquired some prominence on the river as a lumberman, speculator, and captain of a military company of millmen, river-drivers, and raftsmen, who wore an appropriate uniform, and called themselves "The Rackareebos." Though an ignorant man, he assumed an air of superiority that gave him a sort of influence among rough people.

This man, having lost his first wife, became enamored of a young lady in Portland bearing the name of Julia W. Talbot, a respectable lady, handsome, without means, and, having been educated in the refined city of Portland, with tastes dissimilar to his. He married her, however, and took her to his home in Oldtown in July, 1835. So far as appears, the first year of their married life was passed pleasantly enough. She was well dressed, and he was proud of her.

After the expiration of a year trouble arose and the case developed the following facts: Rines's first wife had a niece—Sarah Weston—who had lived somewhat in Rines's family, and he had sent her to school. In July, 1836, Rines took his wife to Portland. There he saw his protegee, Sarah Weston, who had grown to be, to him, an accomplished and attractive young lady of eighteen. Instead of remaining in Portland with his wife, he took Miss Weston with him to Bangor, where he left her and went to his home, which he had left about a week before; but Miss Weston appeared there the next day. Afterwards Rines returned to Portland and brought back his wife. On their way they stopped at Augusta over night. After they had retired to their room Rines wanted to see a letter that his wife, while in Portland, had written to a young lady acquaintance. She declined to show it to him. He insisted upon seeing it, whereupon she tore it to pieces. At this exercise of her rights Rines became inflamed with rage and told her that if he had a suitable instrument he would "take her very heart out;" he threw himself on the floor as if unable to control himself because his wife dared resist his will in not showing him a private letter that she thought it not proper for him to see. He, however, succeeded in getting possession of part of it, which he meanly read, and, as he afterward declared, found nothing improper in it. After this there was not any manifestation of affection by Rines toward his wife. The day after they reached home she was taken sick. Her sister told Rines that she must have a physician or she would die. He replied that she would not die; that he would not see her until after she had recovered, (he had seen her the day after she was taken sick), and then he should take an "eternal farewell" of her—that he did not care if she died; that he loved her once, but now he hated her with a perfect hate, and said he would never live with her again, and gave as a reason that she had been unfaithful to him. She recovered. From the time of their return they occupied adjoining rooms and did not live together as husband and wife. She was deposed from her place as mistress of the house and Mrs. Lane established in it. His study seemed to be to mortify her. One Sunday Rines and his wife and Miss Weston prepared for church. Rines took Miss Weston and left his wife, who did not follow them. In the afternoon they all got ready to go, when Rines and Miss Weston conferred together and concluded not to go, and he left his wife to go alone. After August Mrs. Rines confined herself to her room during most of the time. She was enclinte. In September he had heard she had said something about him and Miss Weston, and he told her that if she went out of the house and mentioned his or Miss Weston's name he would horse-whip her within an inch of her life. He said he would sink his property and go to the end of the earth before he would live with her. The others of the accused were at his home, and he was on pleasant terms with them. In December he went to Portland and left his room and bed in possession of Burlingame and Howard, who occupied them during his absence. Mrs. Rines had a sleeping companion—Sarah Elkins. One day during Rines's absence Howard and Mary Ann Rines enticed Miss Elkins to go on a sleigh-ride to see her sister, promising that if she would go she should be brought back early in the evening. In the evening no one went for her, and she was obliged to remain over night. When she returned she complained, and could get only trivial excuses for the violation of their promise. On that night Burlingame had taken the key from Mrs. Rines's door, and she, not finding it, fastened the door with her scissors, and left a light burning when she retired. About midnight she was awakened by a violent breaking in of her door, and to see Burlingame standing beside her bed. She jumped over the foot-board, and, in escaping from the room, encountered Howard at the door, who exclaimed: "Now I've caught you!" She broke away from him, however, and escaped to Mrs. Lane's room in a state of alarm and prostration so great as to excite that lady's sympathy. Rines soon after returned, and his intimacy with these fellows was so marked, and his conduct in regard to his wife was of such a character, as to leave no doubt of a conspiracy between them to ruin her character. There was a great deal of testimony implicating all the accused, except Mrs. Lane, who was acquitted. All the others were convicted.

Several points of law raised by the counsel for the defendants, Messrs. John Appleton and Frederick Allen, were very ably argued pro and con by them and by the County Attorney, Albert G. Jewett, and Edward Kent, for the State, and overruled. Mrs. Rines was admitted to testify, contrary to objection. Exceptions were taken and afterwards sustained by the Supreme Judicial Court. The verdict was set aside, and a new trial granted.

The trial of the case commenced January 18 and closed the 13th of February. During a fortnight the court-room was crowded almost to suffocation. The interest was intense, and the verdict of the crowd sustained that of the jury.

The case was never again tried. Some arrangement was effected, and the case was dismissed. Mrs. Rines removed to Portland, and was divorced. She is now dead. Rines married two wives afterwards. In the war of the Rebellion he got into the Commissary Department at Washington, where he died.

The speculation in breadstuffs was at this time exciting much indignation. A public meeting was held in Bangor "to take into consideration the condition of the flour market, and see what measures could be adopted with regard to it." A committee of five of the best citizens was appointed to report resolutions. The resolutions were long forthcoming.

But "the people" were not indignant merely about the flour speculation; they wanted F. H. Allen, Esq., for Municipal Judge, and had a meeting and nominated him. Unfortunately, they could not vote on the nomination after it was made. The Governor and Council had control of the matter; and the Democratic Bangor Post flew into a passion because "a few rich men," Democratic taskmasters, had got up a petition for Samuel Farrar, Esq. It shouted:—

Democrats, will you tamely submit to this? Has it come to this, that none but rich men, the President and Directors of Banks, are capable of discharging the duties of any public office? Look at your Sheriff [Carpenter], your County Attorney [Jewett], your Clerk of the Courts [Stetson], your Postmaster [Trafton], all exclusive Democrats and VIOLENT opposers of Banks! Yet all of them are Bank Directors.

Come forward, then, if you are men, and resent the indignity cast upon you. If you are SLAVES, stay at home.

But the Governor and Council paid no attention to this; the Governor appointed and the Council confirmed Judge Farrar, and he proved an acceptable Judge.

Amos Davis was at this time a citizen of Bangor, but having been in Boston for some time, he was summoned before G. G. Hilliard, Esq., to give his deposition in an action then pending. To the surprise of the summoning party Mr. Davis refused to testify, whereupon the Justice imposed a fine of $20 for contempt. This he refused to pay and was committed to jail. Mr. Davis's next appearance was before Judge Wilde on a writ of habeas corpus. His discharge was claimed on the ground that he was a citizen of another State. The Judge said that any man might be summoned to give his deposition within twenty miles of his abode. It appeared that Mr. Davis was a citizen of Maine and his family resided there. It does not appear from the papers of the Justice that he had his abode in Boston for any length of time. If it did, whether he had his family with him or not, he would be held; as it did not, he should order his discharge.

It was mentioned as creditable to our soil and farmers, that Mr. Nathaniel Burrill, of this county, raised on "rock upland" sixty bushels of sound Indian corn to the acre, and forty-one and a half bushels of beans to the acre; that Mr. Heman S. Jackson, of Corinth, raised seventy-four bushels of oats to the acre this year; that

Reuben Hall, also of Corinth, had raised on two acres and 142 rods of land, eighty-eight bushels and three pecks of tea wheat; and that Reuben Gordon, of Dutton, had obtained 789 bushels of ruta-baga from one acre; and these were spoken of as specimens of what could be raised in this section.

The Licensing Board of Bangor refused to grant licenses for the sale of ardent spirits; a fact deemed worthy of note by newspapers far and near.

The principle of total abstinence from all that intoxicants was adopted by the State Temperance Society.

The Committee on Building Market-house Foundation reported that they had expended for furnishing and laying stone, $8,291.62; for filling with earth, $2,295; iron work, blasting rocks in the stream, etc., $204.22—$10,650.84, and the contract for laying the foundation was not completed.

The Committee on Building High school House reported the expenditure of $4,800 in the erection of the house, and there remained of the appropriation $200 for fences and grounds.

It was announced that B. B. Thatcher, Esq., a former citizen of Bangor, a lawyer by profession and a literary man, was on a visit to England, that he was at Newport, on the Isle of Wight, at an agricultural festival to which he had been invited, where he was toasted in connection with the United States, and made, a suitable reply which was received with great applause.

Besides the movement for a railroad between Bangor and Portland, and another between Bangor and winter navigation, there was a movement for a railroad between Quebec and Belfast via Bangor; and for another between Quebec and Boston via Bangor. Connection by railroad between all the places now exists, but not by the routes contemplated in 1837.

There had been much feeling in regard to the appointment of Colonel John Carpenter as Sheriff, as well in his own party as out of it, and every lapse in his career while in that office was carefully watched. At last an opportunity came to extinguish him. He was taken before the Municipal Court on a warrant for crime. He appeared in the official costume and with the official "presence" he assumed upon taking the office. But the end of the affair was his official extinguishment, to the gratification of many good citizens.

The American Magazine, in an article appreciative of Maine, said that "more and larger fortunes have probably been amassed in Maine since 1829 than have been won, in the like space of time, in any other State."

Joshua Chamberlain, Jr., was appointed County Commissioner by the Governor and Council.

The canvass in the election of Mayor this year was brief and exciting, but there was little of that personal bitterness that characterized the elections a decade of years before. Edward Kent was elected over Amos M. Roberts by a vote of 719 to 376. The Aldermen elected were: Ward 1, Charles Hayes; Ward 2, Cyrus Goss; Ward 3, George W. Pickering; Ward 4, John Wilkins; Ward 5, Nathaniel French; Ward 6, Bradford Harlow; Ward 7, Samuel L. Valentine.

The Councilmen were: Ward 1, Isaac S. Whitman, Hollis Bowman, Charles Cooper; Ward 2, Joseph Hendrick, Cammillus Kidder, Benjamin Tainter; Ward 3, John A. Poor, Richard Condon, Gamaliel Marchant; Ward 4, John Godfrey, John R. Greenough, Thomas Finson; Ward 5, Andrew W. Hasey, Henry Little, Robert Boyd; Ward 6, Nathan Perry, Eben French, C. B. Holmes; Ward 7, John Short, Samuel Thatcher, Jr., Nathaniel Lord.

The Whigs carried the city, and the Democrats the county in the election of Register of Deeds, Stevens Daias being re-elected over John S. Sayward.

Hollis Bowman was chosen President of the Council. John Williams was elected City Treasurer, William Abbott City Solicitor, John G. Brown City Physician, William Emerson, second, City Marshal, and Ebenezer French Chief Engineer of Fire Department, Richard Condon Street Commissioner.

The Legislature provided that the "surplus revenue" should be paid to the towns and cities of the State in proportion to the number of inhabitants therein respectively. The city voted to receive its share, and appointed John Wilkins, the City Treasurer, agent to receive it. The appointment of this agent was made a party question, and the Democrats voted for Levi Bradley.

Otis Small was appointed Sheriff of the county, in place of Joshua Carpenter, the high-stepping, demi-military Sheriff, whose services had been dispensed with after his unfortunate criminal adventure.

The Street Commissioner of 1836, John Brown, was quite severely criticised because he did not keep strictly within his appropriations; at which he felt aggrieved. The criticisms, doubtless, were of much benefit as a warning to the disbursing officers of all the departments thereafter.

A convention of the Whig members of the Legislature nominated Edward Kent as their candidate for Governor, and appointed James Appleton, of Portland, Elisha H. Allen, of Bangor, and Samuel P. Benson, of Winthrop, to inform him of the nomination. On their doing so, Mr. Kent replied, that if he consulted his individual wishes and private feelings, he should unhesitatingly decline the nomination. It was an office he should never seek, and would most reluctantly accept. But feeling the obligations resting upon every man to shrink from no duty assigned him, he should waive all private objections, and consent.

The nomination was favorably received by his party throughout the State, who felt that the prospect of electing him was not discouraging, notwithstanding the Democratic party was understood to be in a majority.

There was an effort made in the last Legislature to increase the number of judges, that the business of the county might be disposed of. While the subject was under discussion a member remarked that, "If the people of Bangor did not pay their debts, the fact proved their dishonesty, rather than any imperfection in the courts." This led to a consideration of the "credit system," which was alleged to be inseparable from our institutions; doubtless it had been abused; it could not be abolished if it was desirable; it must, therefore, be regulated. "Give us good and wholesome laws in relation to this subject, and let them be impartially and promptly and cheaply executed."

The citizens of Bangor were proud of their Lyceum. In their report of its doings the past winter (1836-37), the managers could not forbear to congratulate their members upon the unanticipated success "which had crowned all its efforts." Ten lectures had been delivered, and five questions debated and finally disposed of. The subjects had been varied, and to all appearance had secured very general interest. The audiences had been full and attentive.

The exercises had been of a high character, and were contributed to mainly, if not wholly, by citizens of Bangor; and the managers affirmed that "few cities of recent growth probably could boast of a greater number of educated men." There were "gentlemen distinguished both for their literary and scientific attainments," who would be willing to contribute to the objects of the institution. The finances were in a prosperous condition, and the Lyceum bade fair to be of great benefit to Bangor; and it proved to be. There are now, probably, as accomplished scholars in Bangor as there were then, and a larger number of them. If there were a similar opportunity, would they not be willing to follow in the footsteps of their predecessors for the entertainment and improvement of their fellow-citizens?

There had been great complaint of the management of the post-office in Bangor. One cause of the complaint was the delay in opening the mails. At length there was a disturbance in the entry of the office of a violent character, that drew from General Trafton, the Postmaster, a long statement in the Whig and Courier, under the head of "Outrage upon the Post-office," in which he called for the names of the rioters, set forth the mischief and injury they had done, and expressed his obligations for "the courtesy and civilities" which he had uniformly received from a very large portion of the citizens of Bangor. The editor of the Whig pronounced the statement a "tissue of falsehoods." That there was some noise in the entry of the post-office he admitted; but it was because of the refusal of the clerks to open the office after the mail was distributed, and the "larger number of our most respectable citizens" who were there became impatient, and, as was natural, somewhat demonstrative. General Trafton was not there, nor his chief clerk, and all seemed to grow out of the tardiness of the boys. There had before been much complaint of the delay in the office in distributing the mail. There was doubtless a lacking of help. This was a difficulty that was not soon remedied. It was a long time before the service attained its present perfection.

The theatre that was opened with so much eclat last year did not come up to its promises. It was announced that it would be re-opened this year. The Whig affirmed that "it was a source of evil last year," and regretted that its pernicious influence was again to be exerted. "We hope, at least, the company will not be such a miserable set as the last. One thing further: Last year the theatre was a nursery of intemperance. Its bar was supplied with liquors of all kinds, and it was freely visited by persons of all ages."

Complaint was made that a few days before the financial year commenced, from thirty to fifty thousand dollars of the bank stock in the Mercantile and Penobscot Banks was transferred to an individual in Boston to avoid its being taxed, and the question was whether such conduct was commendable, or even common honesty? Suppose the holders in Bangor were indebted to the vendee to the amount of their stock, would that change the complexion of the transaction of April 10? The City Treasurer, Mr. Wilkins, communicated to the City Council the fact that he had received from the State the sum of $10,420.58.

The Council passed an order that the money which had been or should be received on deposit from the State be passed to the credit of the city debt and interest fund, and that what was not wanted to meet the present demands on the Treasury be loaned to one or more of the city banks that would pay not less than six per cent. interest.

At the April term of the Supreme Court in York county, Judge Shepley delivered the opinion of the Court that the "surplus money could not be divided among the inhabitants of a town according to families," in the case of Hooper vs. Emery.

In 1837, for the purpose of determining the proportion of the surplus revenue to which Bangor was entitled, a census was taken. From this census all foreigners who had not been in the country five years were excluded. Ward 1 contained 558; Ward 2, 1,109; Ward 3, 1,228; Ward 4, 1,170; Ward 5, 1,609; Ward 6, 976; Ward 7, 1,756; total, 8,406. The foreigners who had not been in the country five years were estimated to be 800; grand total 9,206. By the census taken two years before the population was 7,547, making the increase in two years 1,659.

The credit of the East was in such bad repute that a meeting of merchants in Boston determined that they would not sell goods to go thither on credit. This led to an investigation as to where the balance of indebtedness was between Bangor and Boston, and it was found that Bangor was owing $300,000 to Boston, and that Boston was owing $600,000 to Bangor, making the balance due from Boston to Bangor $300,000. This, accompanied by the fact that Bangor had on hand lumber of the value of $3,000,000, convertible as soon as Boston and the other croakers were able to pay for it, would put Bangor in an exceptional financial condition.

On the 15th May, this year, in convention, the directors of the Kenduskeag, Commercial, Bank of Bangor, Eastern, Penobscot, and Globe Banks resolved that as the banks in nearly all the large towns and cities in the United States had suspended specie payment, notwithstanding they were in possession of their usual amount of specie, it was for their own interest, and the interest of the business community generally, to adopt the same course. They adopted it, not from any want of means, and assured the public that they would not suffer loss and that they should, as before, receive on deposit or in payment of debts current bills of the banks of New England.

Dr. Jackson made his first report on the geology of Maine, which satisfied intelligent legislators that the survey was of infinitely more value than the money expended for it. A Bangor writer expressed surprise "that any objection should have been made in our Legislature to the necessary appropriations for completing the undertaking." The objection came from a similar class of men who, from ignorance, or meanness, or jealousy, are every year doing their utmost to break down the State College, by refusing proper appropriations. They can see more beauty in a dollar than in all the good that can be derived from any intellectual investigation or scientific exploration or educational enterprise that will be likely to cost the State a penny. The pernicious legislation in this State, in such matters, will keep the State a "backwoods" State as long as it continues.

A complete geological survey of the State would doubtless bring to light coal, iron, and various other minerals that would be a source of vast wealth. In the course of Dr. Jackson's investigations a specimen of red slate came into his possession, covered with black oxide of manganese. This indicated to his mind, and he predicted, that iron ore would be found in the locality which produced this specimen. On visiting the spot he discovered an extensive bed of the ore, fifty or sixty rods in width. Legislation which will bring people into the State would seem to be preferable to that which will drive them out of it.

The Mercantile Bank, one of the deposit banks, followed the fashion and stopped specie payments. The other deposit bank,—the People's,—it is said, took advantage of the fashionable condition of affairs and pressed a great quantity of its bills in circulation, while it retained the people's specie. "A Democrat" inquired where the specie was which people ought to have had when the surplus money was divided? "In the People's Bank," he answered. "It is a fact, and the people know it; and when their several agents called upon that bank for their money, it urged upon them their bills, and were thus the means of putting in circulation a great many thousand dollars of paper instead of specie."

The financial difficulties of the day were a God-send to the Whigs, and they could not do otherwise than make them do duty in their behalf. They insisted that the troubles all grew out of the action of the Government in overthrowing the United States Bank and depositing the national moneys in "pet" banks at first, and afterwards, deeming them unsafe, depositing them in the United States Treasury. In vain did the Democrats insist that the stringency was due to overtrading and speculating; the people were told it was the Government tinkering with the currency. And the people will believe anything against the Government, even though by a little exertion of their own mental faculties they will perceive that the fault lies at their own door. But they prefer that the newspapers should do their thinking: especially the opposition newspapers!

The first number of the Bangor Journal, a weekly literary paper, edited by Rev. Dr. Curtis* and his son, and published by Mr. S. S. Smith†, appeared on June 2, and continued a year.

This paper contained much valuable matter, but it was not a popular paper. It contained favorable notices of Dr. Jackson's Geological Report, and an early number contained a sermon from Dr. Curtis, in which he made a reference that may have touched a tender spot. "Speculative habits," he said, "when most successful with the individual, are most corrupting and deleterious in the community. That in many instances they have succeeded is true; and what has followed, generally speaking? The cultivation of the mind, the economy of time obtained by wealth to enrich the intellectual or train the moral powers? Has it brought into the country large libraries; enabled any ten eminent artists to live here within the last ten years, who could not live here previously; inspired even a better taste for any single liberal art or science? Have not the fruits of this success been expended, in plain truth (in many cases), rather on the body than on the mind; on costly entertainments, showy furniture, and ostentatious personal display, rather than on learning, the arts, or anything mental, or moral, or benevolent? Did education become remarkably solid while whole classes of the community were growing remarkably rich?"

This Scotchman could put his questions more calmly than the speculating classes could answer them. There has been at no time in the Bangor history anything like the numerous and "costly entertainments"‡ that were given in the later period of the "speculation times"; and the ambition that existed in the matters of "showy furniture and ostentatious personal display" had not before or has it since been so dazzlingly manifested.

The "Suffolk Bank system" was now complained of as operating injuriously to the business community. By this system the bills of the banks in Bangor were current in Boston at par. By an arrangement of the banks the Suffolk Bank, in Boston, for a consideration, redeemed their bills. Without such an arrangement their bills would have been at a discount out of the State. It was said that the "course of trade" was carrying all our bills to Boston, and they were going immediately to the Suffolk Bank, and, notwithstanding all our banks could do, the balances against them were increasing. This, if continued, must end disastrously; and, as specie payments were stopped, we should have no currency at all. Better have a depreciated currency, which would result from breaking up the Suffolk system, than none; for with that we could buy the necessaries of life, pay debts, and transact business in the State. The question was freely discussed, and several of, if not all, the banks withdrew from the Suffolk management.

The appropriations this year were for highways, $5,-

* Dr. Curtis was a learned Baptist clergyman from Scotland.

† Mr. Samuel S. Smith came to Bangor from the office of Glazier, Masters & Smith, of Hallowell, and was a famous job printer and publisher for more than a quarter of a century in Bangor.

‡ Large parties were given almost every night in the week, and the reigning belles had not sufficient time for sleep.

400; common schools, $5,400; high-school, $1,100; paupers, $4,000; watch, $1,500; fire department, $2,000; salaries, $4,000; contingent, $5,000; total, $28,000.

Dr. J. G. Brown having resigned as City Physician, Dr. Daniel McRuer was elected to that office.

In the spring of this year the salmon, shad, and alewives prepared a representation to the Legislature to the effect that although at their last session they had passed a law whereby they "could more easily pass up the river," yet that they had not half done their work. They now could not get up the river by reason of the obstructions, which they could not see till they got to them for the sawdust; they therefore requested that all the saw-mills be annihilated, as their (the fishes') greater value "as a source of wealth was well known."

Had Commissioner Elias M. Stilwell and his coadjutors been here in that day, the poor fishes would have been induced to let the saw-mills stand, by having secured to them fish-ways for their own especial use, notwithstanding they still have to run the gauntlet through hordes of thieving poachers.

The citizens were again incensed because Mr. Greeley the agent appointed by the County Commissioners of Penobscot County, to take the census of Madawaska, had been a second time arrested and committed to the jail in Fredericton.

The editor of Zion's Advocate, of Portland, wrote from Fredericton on June 17, that he had that day visited Mr. Greeley in the jail; that he was a citizen of Dover, Maine; that the actual dominion of the disputed territory was under New Brunswick; that there were British magistrates there; that there were a few Americans settled there who wished to come under American laws — but the great body of the people were French, to whom the two Governments were indifferent; that Mr. Greeley proceeded to take the census until he reached the house of one of the magistrates, where he was entertained for the night and permitted to go in the morning; that he reached the other magistrate who caused him to be arrested and sent him to Woodstock; but the Sheriff refused to commit him and let him go, and he returned to complete the work of taking the census. A messenger was sent with the information to Governor Sir John Harvey, who, after consultation with the Crown officers, caused him to be arrested and sent to Fredericton jail; that he (the editor) saw Mr. Greeley in an apartment in the jail writing a letter with the door open; that he saw neither jailor nor lock, and that he understood Mr. Greeley was allowed to go about the jail, but not out of the yard unless he would give bail; and that the magistrate who caused his arrest said that the American Government had "stipulated that the actual dominion should remain as it is until the final establishment of the boundary."

This would seem to have been the understanding from the letter of Mr. Livingston, Secretary of State, to Governor Smith in 1831; but the military functionaries were on the alert for an opportunity to distinguish themselves in maintaining the dignity and integrity of the State at all events, and the incarceration of Greeley led the Adjutant-General, A. B. Thompson, to sound the note of alarm by General Order No. 57, dated Augusta, June 27, 1837. It began:

Fellow-soldiers, the soil of our State has been invaded. One of our citizens, while in the performance of duty required by law, was arrested within the territory of Maine and carried to an adjacent foreign province where he now remains incarcerated within the walls of a prison.

The integrity of the State must be preserved. . . . Our citizens must be secure within our limits.

The Commander-in-chief therefore calls upon the militia to hold themselves in readiness to obey such orders as the security of our citizens and the honor of the State may require.

Whereupon Lieutenant-Colonel Colin Campbell declared it his duty to issue what he termed "Militia District Orders" under date of "St. Andrew's, July, 1831, as follows:

The First Battalion of the Charlotte county militia are hereby ordered to be in readiness to march at an hour's warning, either to Fredericton or such other point as may be directed by his Excellency, the Lieutenant-Governor and Commander-in-Chief.

Then followed the response of Major-General Isaac Hodsdon. After referring to the call of the General Order No. 57, and the cause of it, in his Division Circular, under date of July 12, 1837, the Major-General says:

To this call of the Commander-in-chief the Major-General heartily responds, and has great pleasure in believing that the troops of this Division would give a cordial welcome to any orders from the proper authority which would authorize them to establish, in double-quick time, the Northeastern boundary of this State, so far easterly from the "Monument" as to include Fredericton jail. . . . It is a subject of regret that any existing controversies respecting the boundary of this State should be used as an apology for not protecting our citizens in the enjoyment of our liberties against the kidnapping and piratical attacks of a mere province to that Government whose whole national force has more than once been humbled by the military power of the United States.

By the law of nations, the sovereign power may grant letters of marque and reprisal on all persons grieved in time of peace, after request and refusal of satisfaction within convenient time, and by virtue of these may attack and seize the property of the aggressive nation, without hazard of being condemned as a robber or pirate; and if these premises are correct as to the injuries done to property, with how much more propriety may we seize, by way of reprisal, so many subjects of his Britanic Majesty's province as will insure the immediate discharge of Ebenezer S. Greeley, Esq., from his unjustifiable and illegal imprisonment in a British province?

The whole of the circular, which is somewhat lengthy, is replete with the military fire and wrath of the Major-General, who insists that "it is the business of military men to obey orders," and not as soldiers to settle "national controversies and diplomatic questions."

The effect of the various orders promulgated, and arguments embraced in some of them, kept the public mind inflamed, and prepared the way for the demonstrations that culminated, a year or two after this, in that great general muster, and marching and counter-marching, and general drill and general camping-out, called the "Aroostook War."

The matter between the proprietors of the Bangor House and Martin S. Wood was referred, and the award of the referees, as published, was: To Mr. Wood, eighteen months' rent of the premises; a promissory note of $4,000, given to the proprietors; half the amount of taxes on the premises; $1,700 for use and depreciation of furniture; $500 costs. To the proprietors, $85 and half the costs of reference.

Charles G. Bryant and forty others made a petition to the Mayor and Aldermen to call a meeting of the voters to determine whether they would instruct the City Government in relation to the disposition of the surplus revenue, and if so, what disposition the inhabitants would vote to have them make of it.

The committee, to whom the matter was referred, through Bradford Harlow, Esq., its chairman, made a report that, as the Legislature had deposited the money with the city in its corporate capacity, and held its property liable to the repayment, and forbade the distribution or loaning without actual and bona fide security, as the Supreme Court had decided, they were unanimously of the opinion that the board was not by law obliged to call the meeting; that such a meeting would be inexpedient, and that they had no doubt that all reasonable people would be satisfied with their decision. The report was long, fully discussed the question, and was published in the newspapers, and doubtless "all reasonable people" were satisfied.

Although Colonel Carpenter was scotched, he was not killed: for at the Van Buren convention at Augusta, on June 28, he appeared as a delegate from Chester, where he did not reside. He claimed to be admitted as his right. Jona. P. Rogers advocated his claim, but the convention, by a vote of 81 to 101, refused to admit him, and thus the ex-Sheriff was scotched again.

Having disposed of the Colonel and "old Squire Vance," the convention proceeded to vote for a candidate for Governor. At the first balloting there was no choice; at the second Gorham Parks received 167 votes and Rufus McIntyre 137; whereupon Mr. McIntyre expressed his gratification that he was not selected, and moved that the convention make the vote for Mr. Parks unanimous. It did so; whereupon Mr. Parks, in a graceful speech, expressed his regret that the convention had not selected a better man. The nomination of his friend, McIntyre, would have been much more gratifying to him than his own nomination.

The small-bill law had become odious. It was one of those enactments that the people could not sustain. A medium for the transaction of business they must have. Small bills were as much a necessity as coin, for coin in sufficient quantities could not be had, except at a premium, and that made it impossible for many people to have it at all. Small bills, therefore, were a necessity, and as necessity knows no law, the small-bill law was inoperative.

There were two celebrations on the Fourth of July—a Sunday-school celebration and a military celebration.

The former was at Hammond Street church. The spectacle of the large assembly of scholars was very attractive and inviting. Speeches were made by Mr. Kent, who thought that Sunday-school teachers should instil in the minds of their pupils the principles of temperance, and by appeals to their love of their parents and friends and hopes of future usefulness, to convince them of the necessity of making total abstinence from all that can intoxicate a matter of principle; and by Hon. Mr. Redington, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the State Temperance society; and by Jacob McGaw, who said that it was upon the Sunday-school that we must depend in a great measure for safety against such evils and miseries as existed in France at the time of the Revolution in that country, when ignorance and vice of every description prevailed, the Sabbath was abolished, and the country was deluged with the best blood of the nation; and by Rev. Mr. Curtis, who said that the great cause of the Christian religion depended for its future support and glory upon the Sabbath-schools, and enforced the proposition by an exceedingly interesting speech.

This celebration was spoken of enthusiastically, and those who attended it were very agreeably entertained.

The military celebration was by the military companies, and abounded with patriotic ardor. The oration was by Frederick H. Allen, Esq., and was pronounced "able." The Declaration was read by Major John L. Hodsdon. Dr. Hedge made an impassioned and eloquent prayer.

Speeches were made by George W. Cooley and Elisha H. Allen, Esqs., and were cheered by "three times three, particularly the allusion of the latter to 'planting the American banner on the lines of '83!'"

Sentiments relating to the Northeastern boundary were abundant and spicy. That by Mr. J. C. Haynes was comprehensive enough to suit all. "Northeastern Boundary—We will be King of all the Hither Lands, and old John Bull may be King of all the Further Lands."

The celebration was non-partisan, and the local political hatchet was nowhere visible. A "good time" was provided for and enjoyed.

A meeting of the citizens was held on July 8, in which, by resolution, they expressed their dissatisfaction with the law of the last Legislature "restricting the loaning of money to those who can give safe and ample security, [as it] confers a benefit, upon the rich while it defrauds the poor of the patrimony which our father's blood and treasure secured for the benefit of all;" that they were opposed to nullification, and therefore requested their next Representative in the Legislature to endeavor to secure the passage of a law distributing the money among the people." Among the resolutions passed was this admirable one:

That we will not, under any circumstances, require an officer to support the laws, and afterward instruct him to violate them.

Doubtless this referred to the attempt to induce the City Council to distribute the surplus money without requiring security, as had been done in some other cities.

The Northeastern Boundary was constantly agitated. A letter from Caleb Cushing, Member of Congress, to Edward Everett, Governor of Massachusetts, containing a very clear statement of the American claim, was published in the Bangor Daily Whig and Courier of July 18, 1837.

The letter stated that in one of the committee rooms of the Capitol at Washington, there was a very large map of Lower Canada, ten or twelve feet in length, purporting to be published in England, August 12, 1815, by W. Faden, Geographer to His Majesty, and dedicated to the Prince Regent by its author, Colonel G. Bouchette, his Majesty's Surveyor General:

At one extremity of this British map, stamped all over with the seal of official authenticity and royal authority, is a country marked off as usual, and occupying one-half of the width of the map, designated as the "Province of Maine." The words Province of Maine run across the River St. John, and also north of the St. John across the River Madawaska. Towards the St. Lawrence there is depicted a range of highlands, thus designated on the map, "Northeasterly ridge or height of land—and projected where the United States claim the line to be."

South of it (this range) entirely, are the River St. Francis, a main branch of the St. John, on the Canada side; Temiscounta Lake, which is the reservoir of the Madawaska, another branch of the St. John, on the same side, and numerous lake streams flowing into the Temiscounta Lake.

You perceive that on this map the head-waters of the great river St. John and its upper tributary streams, and the extensive region of country watered by them, are placed wholly and universally within the limits of the United States.

Mr. Cushing adds:

Great Britain wants this territory, and having failed once to obtain it by conquest, she is now endeavoring to obtain it by diplomacy, and to transfer the boundary highlands from the northerly to the southerly side of the head-waters of the St. John, and take six million acres of land from the United States.

We of the United States maintain that, from the ascertained point of the source of the St. Croix, the river runs due north to highlands adjoining the tributary streams of the St. Lawrence, and thence south-westerly by such highlands, to the head-waters of the Connecticut. We claim this tract of highlands to be the traditionary line, and the only line which fulfils the requisition of the treaty of peace.*

Major Simon Harriman, whose name has been somewhat conspicuous in these pages, died on the 29th of July, at the age of seventy-five. He was a soldier of the Revolution.

On July 31 plans for a market-house were reported to the City Council, and the report was accepted.

Taking his text from the assertion of some one abroad who had been in Bangor this season, that he had counted the vacant stores and there were "at this moment" 101 destitute of occupants," a writer says that, "taking into view the whole subject connected with its history, no place in the Union is in better trim or freer from debt than Bangor, and talking of business, if we look at Boston and New York, our own city is a queen to them. For the last month (this was in August) our wharves have been constantly thronged by vessels, lading and unlading, and it is even a matter of astonishment to us to witness so much activity among our citizens, whilst at the same time the cry of 'hard times and no money' is kept up."

Notwithstanding all this, Bangor did not continue to progress in the same ratio with Boston and New York. It had much to contend against; it grew slowly; its citizens accumulated wealth, and all, but the population that are ever on the wing, were contented with their lot.

State politics were active. Gorham Parks being the candidate of the Democrats, and Edward Kent the candidate of the Whigs, and both belonging to Bangor, there was much sharp criticism by the organs of the two parties. Mr. Parks having been in Congress and in various public positions, had given his opponents opportunity to question him sharply upon matters in which he had made himself conspicuous, as:

"Who voted in Congress against the distribution of the surplus revenue?"

"Who voted against the appropriations for erecting fortifications on the Penobscot River?"

"Who prevented Governor Lincoln, of Massachusetts, on the floor of Congress from advocating the speedy settlement of the Northeastern boundary?"

And they charged him with opposing Mr. Clay's Land Distribution Bill, and gave as a reason that he was in favor of fortifications and then turned round and voted against fortifications, including several in his own State.

Mr. Kent had made himself prominent on the Argyle question, otherwise the Democrats could not at that time find much in his public life for criticism. They accused him of making an agrarian speech in the Legislature of 1830, but did not make count upon the effect of the criticism. This was not personal, farther than the person was connected with public acts, for which his party as well as himself was responsible.

One charge the Whigs made against Mr. Parks was that he extenuated the crime of Colonel Carpenter. Several affidavits of several respectable citizen were published to that effect, and doubtless it operated against his election. It proved that however sincere a man may be in his belief is not always prudent to express, it especially when it is in opposition to the moral sense of the community, and he is a candidate for office. The following is the affidavit of, at that time, one of the oldest and most respectable and well-known of the citizens:

BANGOR, August, 1837.

I hereby certify that, after the return of Colonel Gorham Parks from Congress, and after Colonel Carpenter had left the office of Sheriff, I heard Colonel Parks say, that he should not have removed him from office for the crime that he was accused of, and that he did not think the crime a sufficient cause to remove a man from office.

WIGGINS HILL.

Sworn to before Enoch Brown, Justice of the Peace.

Other gentlemen made lengthy affidavits that Colonel Parks said that Colonel Carpenter was an honorable and high-minded man, and the laws he was accused of violating ought to be repealed.

Doubtless Colonel Parks was sincere when he said that his friend McIntyre's nomination would have been more gratifying to him than his own.

George Washington Dixon, the "American Melodist," of whom Henry Clay remarked that in his singing of the Marseillaise Hymn, he "could arouse feelings of the loftiest patriotism in the bosom of every lover of liberty," entertained a Bangor audience on the evening of August 15th at the Baptist meeting-house, on Harlow street, with his national, nautical, French, Italian, German, and English melodies, among which was "The Fireman's Call," which he had recently written, and which, it was claimed, "far exceeded the Marseillaise Hymn." He sang it with great power, and some who had never heard the Marseillais Hymn thought it might be superior; the Frenchmen, however, would not admit it. Mr. Dixon had a good voice and sang with effect.

* In another letter published in the Whig and Courier of July 25, Mr. Cushing presented the argument pro and con. A third letter was published in the Whig August 1st, and a fourth in the Whig of August 8th.

He gave a concert afterwards at the theater and from its receipts gave $50 to the Fuel Society.

Captain Howes, of the steamer Bangor, had a grievance which he must needs bring before the public.

He stated that on April 2d, at Bucksport, owing to the drifting ice he could not land his passengers from his vessel on the wharf, but was obliged to land them in a small boat; and as great care was required in such cases, owing to the timidity of women and children, he gave his own special attention to it; that the officers might not be obstructed in attending to their duties, an iron rail had been put around the promenade deck, within which passengers could move at their will, and without which was a narrow space for the officers, and signs were painted on these notifying passengers that they were not to pass outside of the rail, for various reasons connected with the safety of the boat and passengers; that while he was occupied on the outside of the rail with the leaving passengers, and as he was turning for some purpose, he came in contact with S. L. Haynes, who was directly behind him outside of the rail, and the space was so narrow that he came near being pitched overboard; that there were others outside of the rail, and that he requested all to pass inside the rail, and all complied but Haynes, who was directly in front of him, and the space was so narrow that he could not pass him, and he repeated his request that he pass inside the rail; that he paid no attention to it, but looked him directly in the face; that he took hold of Haynes's arm and "told him that he must go on the other side of the rail," and that Haynes instantly gave him a blow on the side of the neck with his fist that came near knocking him overboard.

The Captain detailed certain other circumstances growing out of the affair, showing that he did not forget it, and that he was determined not to have Haynes again a passenger under him; that he on the 5th of August afterward saw Haynes on his boat at Owlshead and ordered him off, giving as a reason his having struck and insulted him at Bucksport, and that Haynes denied it; that he told Haynes he would put him on shore at the next landing; that before reaching Belfast he told him that he could go on shore at Belfast or proceed to Bangor as he pleased, but it was not settling the matter on his part; that he should have accepted an apology, but as he had not given one he should still hold him responsible.

But Haynes concluded to explain. He admitted that he was outside the rail, thoughtlessly, with others; that he was six feet from Howes, and he, in attempting to pass ran against him, who remarked that he came near throwing him into the river; that Howes previous to that requested the passengers to leave the side, and called in a fierce tone, "Clear out! clear out! you have no business here;" that Howes was near the wheelhouse, where there was space for thirty men; that he immediately complied with Howes's order, walking in his usual pace, and remarking that he would thank him to speak in a more gentlemanly manner; that he was then seized by the shoulder and violently pushed, and Captain Howes repeatedly vociferated, "I'll help you." "While he had hold of me," said Haynes, "I turned, and having knocked off a volley of blows, seized him by the coat-collar and shook him until I thought he was not dangerous to go at large; in other words, he was as quiet as a lamb. I did not strike him, although I do not claim credit for forbearance, for I should have done it, could I have done so without knocking him overboard."

Samuel Grant, by affidavit, subsequently confirmed Captain Howes's statement in regard to the affair at Bucksport, and to Haynes's striking the first blow.

The moral of this story is that passengers on board ship, if they would not be guilty of a breach of the peace, or be the cause of a breach of the peace by others, must keep within the limits assigned them, and not trespass on the domains of those who have the responsibility of the safety, not only of the ship, but of all on board it.

As the steamer Bangor is identified somewhat with the history of Bangor, and has been before mentioned in these pages, it is proper that a general statement in regard to her and to her final disposition, should be made here.

The steamer Bangor was built in New York in 1834, expressly for the route between Bangor and Boston. She was about four hundred tons burthen, had fore and aft sails, and was a well-appointed vessel. Captain George Barker devoted a great deal of time in making arrangements for her construction, and in getting her upon the water. She was from 6 o'clock on Tuesday morning to Sunday afternoon making the round trip by way of Portland to Boston, and back by the same route, stopping at Portland during the night. She was a side-wheel boat, painted white, and wood was used in her furnaces. She was popular while in the New England waters. She made her last trip to Bangor in April, 1842, and on the 25th was at Portland. After she was put in condition for a voyage across the ocean, she left on the 15th of August for Constantinople, where she was employed in conveying passengers until the Sultan took a fancy to her and put her into his navy, so metamorphosed in name and appearance that her old acquaintances would have found it difficult to recognize her.

She was commanded for several years, before she left her original route, by Captain Howes, who was popular, except with Mr. Sullivan L. Haynes and a few others. After he left the Bangor he commanded several other boats, none of which came up to his ideas of what a steam packet should be, until he was instrumental in having constructed a very elegant, convenient, and fast boat, called the "State of Maine," which he ran between Bangor and Boston until her owners came to the conclusion that so fine a boat could do better elsewhere. He was born in Yarmouth, Cape Cod, and died March 22, 1849.

The Portland Transcript embalmed the memory of the "Bangor" in the following stanzas:

Staunch old steamer! thou art going
From New England shores away;
From her rivers, swiftly flowing
On their wild and rugged way.

From Penobscot's waters wide,
Where thy fire-winged course was held,

Rapid o'er the sinuous tide,
Thou art going,—fare thee well!

Thou art leaving Christian lands!
Where Marmora's brilliant sand
Sparkles 'neath the Orient sun;
Where the Arda's waters run,
Hasting gladly to the sea;
There, henceforth thy destiny.
Camden hill and Monhegin,
Owl's Head Point and Old Seguin,
Thou art leaving far behind,
On the wings of steam and wind.
Pemaquid and Belfast Bay,
Up where the borough islands lay;
Duck Trap Cove and Megunticook,
All have given their last sad look.

Where the Black Sea's surges roar
On the rough Romanian shore,
'Mid the galliots' gilded prows,
Thou wilt force thy sturdy bows
Up Bosphorus's narrow strait,
To Byzantium's water-gate,
From Belgrad to Ereklire,
From Tartarian Ocracrow
To the Grecian Haero.

Where the knowing Yankees sat,
There the bearded Turk will squat;
Where erst speculators met
On thy deck to "guess" and "bet,"
There Mohammed's followers grave,
Turbaned lord and cringing slave,
In solemn pomp and trousers wide,
Will thy native land deride;
While thy engine strongly works
For those lazy, bearded Turks,
They will call thy builders "dogs;"
"Sons of Shittim," "Christian dogs!"

Tough old steamer, fare thee well!
We may never see thee more,
Or hear again thy merry bell
'Mid the fogs that veil our shore.

Great Chebeague, Hog Isle, and Peak's
Long will miss its pleasant tone,
While 'tis glad'ning Turks and Greeks
On the Bay of Samassanon.

And when before thee quickly rise
Byzantium's domes and minarets tall,
Round St. Sophia's giant size,
Where the Mufti's daily call
Brings "the faithful" home to prayer,
From thy steam-pipe, loud and clear,
Wilt thou, "Bangor," then and there,
Puff one sigh for "Portland Pier"?

Colonel Parks was not exactly satisfied with the effect of the affidavits in regard to his position, that the law against the crime with which Colonel Carpenter was charged should be repealed, or with being stigmatized as "a levelling, destroying, revolutionary Fanny Wright Locofoco," as he was called by the Whig; he therefore, in a long communication to Mr. T. C. Haynes, of the Republican, indignantly demurred to the latter appellation, and said, "I hold her character and principles (if I understand them right, for I have never read a page of her writings, and know them only through the medium of the public press), in utter abhorrence, that I do not yet believe there is a single individual in this city who believes this charge against me. I am for preserving our religious, moral, and political institutions, as they are secured to us by the constitution and laws of our country."

The other charge he did not deny, except, perhaps, by implication. He said that, knowing the provocation of Colonel Carpenter arose from personal and political causes, he "very probably remarked that he would not have been prosecuted but for political reasons, and possibly that if the law was never put in execution but for the gratification of private motive, and not for the furtherance of justice or the punishment of crime, it had better be off the statute book." But to infer from anything he said at that or any other time, that he approved of or justified licentiousness, was unjust to him, "and utterly without foundation in truth, and what neither of the affidavit-makers believes."

A. G. Wakefield, Esq., was one of the gentleman who made affidavit that Colonel Parks in the convention, before him and Jeremiah Fenno, Esq., the other affiant, distinctly stated that the law against the crime with which Colonel Carpenter was charged, without any reserve or qualification whatever, should be repealed; and Mr. Wakefield was sustained in this by Moses Patten, Jr., and William H. McCrillis, Esqs.

But Colonel Parks had a more difficult matter to settle with members of his own party, than that. He had stated to the Democratic Senator in Congress from Maine, Hon. John Ruggles, that he did not know who was to be nominated for Governor of the State, "but one thing he wished to have understood, which was that if Colonel Hodsdon should be nominated, he would oppose his election in every shape and form and at all times and places in which his opposition could be made to bear upon him." On Mr. Ruggles alluding to the doctrine of "regular nominations," he remarked that "he would oppose him at every stage, both before and after the nomination, regular or irregular, be the consequences what they might." He had also said the same thing to Gustavus G. Cusman, Esq., as was affirmed by Henry Warren, the broker.

Adherence to regular nominations was a cardinal doctrine of the Democratic party; and one hundred good men and true, of that party, headed by William Emerson, published a card to the effect that if this fact and another fact, that Samuel Smith, a late Federalist, was one of his most active supporters, had been known previous to the convention at Augusta, they did not believe that Colonel Parks would have been nominated; nor could they, until the matter was fully and satisfactorily "cleared up," give him their support as the candidate of the Democratic party for Governor of Maine.

The effect of the canvass against Colonel Parks was to reduce his vote in Bangor, and to defeat him as Governor of Maine.

Colonel Parks was a gentleman of fine personal appearance, of courteous bearing, and a popular speaker. He was a lawyer, but more a politician than a lawyer. He never particularly identified himself with the interests of the city. He possessed considerable literary taste, but was a greater reader than worker. He preferred official life to office life. He left Bangor finally to take the consulship at Rio, under President Polk, as successor to Governor Kent, and never returned to Bangor to reside.

Thomas Jefferson Forbes, a native of Bangor, son of William Forbes, died at Columbus, Mississippi, August 21. He was a graduate of Brown University, read law with Hon. William D. Williamson in Bangor, and was admitted to the Bar in 1829. He practiced in Levant and in Bangor a few years; but preferring literary employment, he went South, teaching at different places in academies. He finally settled in Columbus in 1835, and became editor and proprietor of the Southern Argus, and distinguished himself by his "ability, learning, and accomplishments." In its obituary notice of him, that paper said:

Mr. Forbes, by the amenity of his manners and the excellence of his disposition, called around him, wherever he went, a large circle of bosom friends; while the high respect entertained for him by the citizens of Columbus was fully evinced on the day of his burial, the funeral procession being as large, if not the largest of any one ever witnessed in this town.

William Forbes, Esq., father of the above Thomas J., came to Bangor in 1800, from Greenfield, Massachusetts, where he was engaged in trade several years, and was compelled to suspend in consequence of the embargo. He bought the Jedidiah Preble truck-house—the first frame house in Bangor—near the "Red Bridge," where he resided with his family many years. In 1803 he was Postmaster of Bangor, under Gideon Granger, and then Postmaster-General. He took a deep interest in education, and gave his children—five sons and two daughters—all the aid in this direction that he could. Two of his sons he helped to professions, Thomas J. and Daniel, who was a physician, and died in charge of a hospital in the War of the Rebellion. Another son—Charles—served in this war three years. His two daughters were educated ladies; one of them became the wife of Rev. Richard Woodhull, and the other the wife of Hon. A. G. Wakefield.

Mr. Forbes was born in Westboro, Massachusetts, in 1763, and died in Bangor in 1846, at the age of eighty-three. His father was a member of the General Court of Massachusetts twelve successive years, and his father fourteen successive years. He was the great-grandson of Daniel Forbes, a Scotch warrior, who came to this country in 1657, bringing with him the old claymore that he had wielded against the English—a weapon that descended to this great-grandson, who did service in the Revolutionary War, which he engaged in at seventeen. Whether he, too, chopped off English heads with this tremendous two-handed weapon does not appear. He, doubtless, would have liked to use it upon Benedict Arnold, whom he, with others, was sent in pursuit of, and whom he saw getting out of an English barge, but was so far off that he could not reach him.

Mr. Forbes, with Amos Patten and Newell Bean, helped to lay the foundation of the Unitarian Society in Bangor, the meetings of which he attended.

Edward Kent was elected Governor and Elisha H. Allen Representative to the Legislature a second time from Bangor, both Whigs. Ebenezer Higgins and Daniel Emery were elected Senators, both Democrats. The Whigs did not have the election all their own way.

Hannibal Hamlin, Democrat, was elected Representative from Hampden, and, with similar enthusiasm to that he has ever manifested for the success of the Republican cause, he labored when in the Legislature to prevent Mr. Kent being inaugurated Governor.

It being the most gratifying victory the Whigs ever had in Maine, they brought a twenty-four-pound gun from Castine, that by it they might express their joy to Democratic neighbors in tones they could not misapprehend. But they professed to some humanity, and to modify somewhat the thunder of the discharge they put the brass pieces of the artillery in operation, accompanied by the ringing of bells, with an occasional interlude by way of refreshment from the brass band. This multi-form music delighted and astounded the hearers from dawn to dark; and no doubt Mr. Emerson, Colonel Hodsdon, and all the politicians who believed in the principle of regular nominations, were impressed and gratified by this form of response to the effect of their action.

The rejoicing was not confined to Bangor. The Whigs all over the country were extravagant in their expressions of joy over the result in Maine—a Democratic State!

Mr. Garrison had been in Bangor and talked to the people upon the subject of the immediate abolition of slavery. There came to be many who believed in the principle, but they did not approve Mr. Garrison's peculiar methods. Denunciation was not agreeable to their ears; they believed in the theory of "easy blows," etc., and they believed in action. Therefore they organized the first "Anti-Slavery Society" of Bangor early in September of this year, "Auxiliary to the Maine State Anti-Slavery Society," and adopted the following resolutions:

Resolved, That this society, in common with abolitionists in general, repudiates the idea of wishing to amalgamate the white and colored races, and believes that whatever evils have resulted from such amalgamation are justly chargeable to slavery itself.

Resolved, That we will never countenance the oppressed in resorting to physical force to vindicate their rights; but could we reach the ear of the slave, would entreat him patiently to endure till his deliverance come.

Resolved, That while we admit and maintain the right of free and full discussion on all subjects, yet, in our judgment, individuals rejecting the authority of civil and parental government, ought not to be employed as agents or lecturers in promoting the cause of emancipations.

Resolved, That we are opposed to harsh, violent, browbeating, unchristian language or manners on the part of abolitionists, and equally so to all vituperations, gag-laws, and mob measures on the part of their opponents.

Resolved, That it is no part of our design to aid in the formation of a political party—our object being exclusively of a moral, philanthropic, and religious nature, such as men of all political sects may unite in, and that we shall consider the object of our association as having been attained, when there shall come to be a deep, universal conviction throughout the land that immediate emancipation is equally the duty of the master and the right of the slave.

Resolved, That the weapons of our warfare are neither bitterness nor wrath, malice nor revenge, but truth and love, which, though moral, are yet mighty, through God, to the pulling down of the stronghold of oppression.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the ladies of this city to form a female anti-slavery society.

The following officers of the society were chosen: John Godfrey, President; Bradford Harlow, Rev. Stephen Lovell, Joel Hills, Joseph Bryant, Timothy Crosby, Charles Plummer, Vice-Presidents; Rev. Swan L. Pomroy, Corresponding Secretary; Thomas H. Sanford, Reording Secretary; George A. Thatcher, Treasurer; John S. Sayward, Prof. George Shepard, Charles A. Stackpole, Anthony Woodard, Albert G. Wakefield, Henry B. Farnham, Charles Greenough, Executive Committee.

This society had interesting meetings and discussed the subject of slavery in pursuance of their object to convert the people to the doctrines of immediate emancipation.

About four years later a large majority of the officers above named came to the conclusion that belief was not action, and that until some aggressive measures were resorted to they had no surety of any emancipation at all. They therefore aided in the formation of the political anti-slavery party called the "Liberty party;" and labored in that until it was merged in the "Free-soil party," and in that until it was merged in the Republican party; and in that until universal emancipation was proclaimed by Abraham Lincoln.

At the meeting of the Penobscot Agricultural Society in Exeter, Mr. Kent addressed the society in the extent and variety of the resources of the State, and ranked the agricultural resources among the first.

Governor Dunlap appointed Asa Redington, Jr., Judge of the Court of Common Pleas, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Judge Smith, and John McDonald Judge of the Municipal Court of Bangor, for the vacancy made by Judge Farrar's resignation.

The following named gentlemen were the officers of the several banks in Bangor this year:

Kenduskeag—John Wilkins, President; George W. Pickering, Elisha H. Allen, Abner Taylor, John Godfrey, Directors; Theodore S. Dodd, Cashier.

People's—William D. Williamson, President; Isaac Hodsdon, Charles Stetson, Jabez True, Albert G. Jewett, Theodore B. McIntyre, Otis Small, Directors; Thomas Drowne, Cashier.

Eastern—Amos M. Roberts, President; John Bradbury, A. Haynes, Samuel P. Strickland, Directors; William H. Mills, Cashier.

Globe—Solomon Parsons, President; Calvin Dwinel, C. Cooper, J. Appleton, Samuel Smith, Directors; Sidney K. Howard, Cashier.

Bank of Bangor—Samuel Veazie, President; James Crosby, Samuel J. Foster, Nathaniel Lord, John Bright, Directors; William P. Richardson, Cashier.

Commercial—John Fiske, President; Henry Warren, Amos Davis, Fred. Lambert, Leonard Marsh, in place of Rufus Dwinel, resigned, Directors; William H. Foster, Cashier.

Penobscot—Isaac Farrar, President; William Emerson, E. G. Rawson, Jona. Farrar, Eleazer Coburn, Directors; John Wyman, Cashier.

Mercantile—John Hodgdon, President; Samuel Farrar, Henry Warren, Oliver Frost, Francis G. Butler, William Weatherbee, Hezekiah Williams, Directors; Samuel Harris, Cashier.

Lafayette—Thomas A. Hill, President; Joseph Carr, Joseph C. Stevens, Stephen J. Bowles, George Waugh, Directors; E. T. Coolidge, Cashier.

The triennial festival of the Mechanic Association occurred on the 18th of October. An address was delivered by Franklin Muzzy, Esq., at the Baptist meeting-house. This address was listened to evidently with great interest by a crowded audience, and was pronounced "remarkably neat and appropriate." Mr. Muzzy was one of the first citizens of Bangor, and afterwards was in the State Senate.

The initiatory steps for the establishment of the county of Piscataquis were taken this year by action of towns and the publication of a memorial to the Legislature, signed by James S. Holmes and 125 others, to have certain towns from Penobscot and Somerset counties incorporated as the new county.

The managers of the Bangor Lyceum, E. L. Hamlin, D. T. Jewett, and Thomas L. Harlow, gave notice that the opening lecture would be delivered by George B. Moody, Esq.; that Dr. Jackson, State Geologist, would deliver a full course of lectures on geology; and that other lectures would be delivered by William Paine, Esq., John S. Sayward, Esq., Dr. McRuer, Hon. William D. Williamson, Rev. Mr. Pomroy, Dr. Barker, Hon. Warren Preston, S. H. Blake, Esq., David Worcester, Hon. Henry Warren, and D. Barstow.

Dr. Enoch Pond, of the Theological Seminary, published an exposition and vindication of the general form of church government adopted by the Congregational and Baptist churches in America and England, which he believed to be more nearly in accordance with apostolic usage and better adapted to secure the great ends of church organization than any other of which he had knowledge.

At the Charleston balloting for Representative to the Legislature, Daniel Chase received 240 votes, D. Chase received one vote, all others 240. The question before the Bangor public was whether any one was elected. The friends of Daniel Chase claimed that he was; the friends of D. Chase and "all others" claimed that Daniel Chase was not elected, for there were other "D. Chases" in the district. When Benjamin Swett was candidate for county Treasurer, "Benjamin Sweet" received votes enough, with those cast for "Benjamin Swett," to elect that gentleman; but the County Commissioners, on the principle that "every tub must stand on its own bottom," decided that Benjamin Swett was not elected, greatly to that gentleman's indignation.

The Municipal Court, Judge McDonald, was entertained by a controversy between Mistress Honner Belcher and Mr. Abram Roundy, of the suburb Barkeville. She had caused the venerable Mr. Roundy to be brought up on two warrants for a breach of the peace. It appeared that there had been a bellicose transaction between the parties, during which the atmosphere became impregnated with soapsuds, dishcloths, old shoes, hot potatoes, and the like feminine implements of warfare, from which the masculine participant appeared to be engaged in defending himself. The sympathies of the court were with him at the termination of the hearing, and it discharged him; and further, to the utter disgust of the Celtic complainant, would not even listen to a proposition to require him to find sureties to keep the peace.

On November 10th there were 168 vessels in the harbor. The larger part of them were taking in lumber for the Western and Southern ports and the West Indies. There was much apparent business in the city; but it had suffered and was suffering from the incubus of debt. The staple—lumber—was selling at low prices, but the citizens were anxious to relieve themselves of their obligations. This year had, in a business point of view, been a trying one to Bangor. The over-speculation of years previous, the dissolving the connection between the Government and the United States Bank, and stopping specie payments, affected business all over the country, and that of Bangor perhaps more than any other place of its size. As much lumber had been shipped as in any former year, it was said, but the prices were twenty-five per cent. less than in the last two seasons previous.

In this month (November) Messrs. Jackson and Hodge, Geologists of Maine and Massachusetts, returned from a reconnoissance of public lands on the headwaters of the Penobscot and in Aroostook, and found, in passing up the Seboois, in several places the new red sandstone, and such as is associated with the coal formation in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and elsewhere. The indications of coal were so great that they did not express a doubt of the existence of coal beds in that vicinity and near township No. 4 in the Seventh Range. They discovered, also, a large bed of iron on crossing the Aroostook river, which they supposed, from the quality and direction, to be a continuation of the vein discovered by Dr. Jackson in the neighborhood of Houlton the last year.

From the occasional discoveries and rumors of discoveries of mineral deposits in various parts of the State the impression has prevailed, for many years, that there are large and rich deposits in various regions. There has been, however, very little effective interest manifested in regard to them. The discoveries on the Seboois should have stimulated a disposition to make a full exploration of the locality where coal is indicated. The importance of veins of coal in this region, as a factor in the prosperity of Bangor, cannot be overestimated. With coal, iron, and slates in its neighborhood, Bangor would not be far into the twentieth century before it would be a second Glasgow.

Mr. Cyrus McKenney confessed to having been made a political victim this year, and to have endeavored to put Samuel C. Clark, Esq., of Springfield, on the road to moral martyrdom. He publicly acknowledged that he had wilfully and wantonly traduced the character of that man; had brought a suit against him for stealing a cow when he had an undoubted right to take her, as he (McKenney) had not fulfilled the contract on his part; that it had never entered his heart that Clark did wrong, as he had before requested him to take the cow; that Clark had befriended him, and he never should have taken the course he did if Clark's political enemies had not put him up to it, and he asked his forgiveness. Mr. McKenney was not the only man whom politics had set down to a "square meal" of humble-pie in the late campaign.

A branch of the Bangor & Oldtown railroad extended the length of Harlow and Exchange streets from the station. The grade between the station and Harlow street was quite steep. On the 30th of November, before daylight in the morning, a car laden with wood in descending the incline overcame the brake by which it had been controlled, and dashed down with tremendous velocity, arousing all on the route from their slumbers, and frightening one of the men in charge with the thought that it would be precipitated into the river. He attempted to jump from the car, and in so doing fell under a wheel that passed over and so seriously injured him that he died on the following day.

The death of Edward Sargent on the 12th of October, at the age of sixty-three, was announced. Mr. Sargent was an old and highly respected citizen.

Reports were coming daily that the Patriots in Canada were in arms. Papineau and O'Callagan, leaders, had taken possession of the old fort at St. Charles, on November 21. On the 25th a Loyalist force from Montreal, consisting of two hundred regulars, came in collision with them and lost four men.

The Revolutionists called themselves "Sons of Liberty," and issued an address to the young men of the North American colonies in which they contrasted their country, after seventy-seven years of British rule, with the "prosperous republics who wisely threw off the yoke of monarchy," and set forth, in detail, their grievances. "Hosts of officers appointed without the consent of the people, to whom they are too frequently obnoxious and never responsible." The trial by jury was a "vain illusion." Immense funds were diverted from their commendable purpose and "made an instrument of corruption." Public lands were sold to or bestowed on speculators beyond seas. Representation was a solemn mockery; a Legislative Council ignorant of the country and not in sympathy with it was imposed on them; and other causes of dissatisfaction. William Lyon McKenzie and others had organized the rebellion in Upper Canada, and Sir Francis Head had offered a reward of £1000 for his apprehension. The rebellion during the year assumed such proportions both in Upper and Lower Canada as to cause considerable alarm.

It was this movement in Canada that took from Bangor its military citizen, who three years before had made himself conspicuous in putting down the mob; and more recently in memorializing the city government with regard to distributing the surplus revenue among the people—Captain Charles G. Bryant. He acquired the title of "Grand Eagle" in that movement, whatever that may mean, and afterward took it to Texas, where he was despoiled of it by the Comanches, who murdered him.

The movement had no sympathy from the Government of the United States, and after the loss of some lives and property it was crushed out.

The Methodist chapel on Union street was dedicated on December 12th.

The Anti-Slavery Society of the city passed some resolutions relating to the murder of Elijah P. Lovejoy at Alton, Illinois, the editor of an anti-slavery paper, and condemnatory of the institution of slavery, which the Whig published "as a matter of courtesy," not holding itself "responsible for any sentiment they embody."

Abner Taylor was declared elected County Treasurer by the County Commissioners, in consequence of informalities in the returns from Dover, Exeter, and other towns which gave large majorities for Levi Bradley, the opposing candidate.

The Bangor Sacred Music Society entertained a fine audience at the St. John's church on the evening of the 25th, with choice music executed "admirably well." Christmas was not so generally celebrated up to 1837, in Bangor, as it has been in later years. Holidays had not become of frequent occurrence. Fourth of July and Thanksgiving were the only two established days of relaxation, though the boys had begun to trespass on Fast Day. The Episcopalians and Roman Catholics always celebrated Christmas. Now the people appear to have come to the conclusion that enjoyment of the highest quality is not to be gathered from "all work."

A railroad between Bangor and Frankfort was contemplated. A favorable route had been found that would accommodate the Hampden villages, and it was confidently predicted that the road would soon be completed. Frankfort had not the enterprise of its neighbor, Bucksport, which town has not only a road but has got to pay for it, while Frankfort has still to use the old stage coach.

The year 1837 closed without there having been any unusual calamities to record within the year. On the 15th of December a block of five wooden stores adjoining the Hatch House was burned, and the noted hotel came near being consumed, but that misfortune was not to occur until a later day.

The citizens generally were gratified that Edward Kent had been selected to the highest position in the State, not merely because of his political, but on account of his moral worth. He was a man who had acquired their confidence, and they felt that the interests of the Commonwealth would be safe in his hands.

There was much effort made by the Democrats in the House of Representatives to prevent his inauguration—informalities in the returns being the basis of their labor; but the Democratic Supreme Court would permit no technicalities to set aside the unquestioned expression of the people, and on January 6th a committee of ten from the House and five from the Senate was appointed to announce his election to Mr. Kent. Messrs. Dennet of the Senate, and Codman and Parris of the House, delegated by the committee, immediately proceeded to Bangor and performed their duty. Mr. Kent resigned the office of Mayor, and at 2 o'clock in the afternoon of that day left town for Augusta, "amidst the roar of artillery and the cheers of his fellow-citizens."*

CHAPTER XXXI.*

THE SUBSEQUENT HISTORY OF BANGOR.

Events of 1838-1840-1841-1842-1843-1845-1846—The Great Flood—1847-1848-1849: The Cholera year—1850—Statistics of Lumber Surveyed at the Port of Bangor 1851-1853 1854—First Superintendent of Schools Appointed—1855—Norombega Hall and the Post-office Built—1856-1858-1859-1861-1862-1863-1864-1866-1867-1868-1869-1870-1871-1872-1873-1874—Several Notable Fires—1875-1876-1877—A Noble Deed of Charity—1878-1881.

1838. The Girl's High School was established this year. The Principal received a salary of $700 per annum.

The fire-engine "Bangor," built by Messrs. F. Muzzy & Co., was purchased. About the same time three other fire-engines were built here.

1840. The members of the Fire Department were now paid the munificent salary of $1 apiece per year, and this was in lieu of the cost of caps, clothing, etc., which the firemen were expected to furnish for themselves. The entire expense of the Department for the municipal year was but $652.10.

The report of the public schools of the city for the last academic year showed fifty-one pupils in the Boys' High School—David Worcester, Principal, at $800 a year; sixty-four pupils in the Girls' High School—A. G. Wakefield, afterwards City Solicitor and Mayor of the city, Principal, at $700 per annum; and nineteen other schools, with an attendance of 23 to 115 pupils each. Total attendance, 2,566, of 2,921 in the city entitled to admission. Cost of schools, $6,175.08. A select school for girls, kept by Mr. J. E. Littlefield, had seventy-six students; and an apprentices' school, in charge of F. L. Washburn, had seventy-two.

1841. An incendiary fire on Harlow street March 5 destroyed the iron foundry and machine-shops of Messrs. Hinckley, Egery & Co. and Muzzy & Co., with a loss of $15,000.

An addition to the Almshouse was built. The cost of the institution for the financial year 1841-42 was $6,063.90.

The Universalist society was organized this year.

1842. The ex-Firemen's Association was formed October 20, consisting of about forty members. James Littlefield was President, J. E. Leighton Vice-President, William L. Parker Secretary, and John B. Williams Treasurer.

The First Baptist Church was organized September 1, in North Bangor. Its meeting-house was built during the fall and early winter, and dedicated in January following. The Rev. B. D. Small was installed as pastor May, 1843, and remained such until October, 1845.

An arrangement was made between the city and county this year for the partial use of the Almshouse by the latter as a house of correction.

The Fire Department now possessed five engines, nine hose-carriages, two thousand four hundred feet of hose, and thirteen pipes, a hook and ladder carriage, and a good supply of other equipments.

The city debt was now $154,830.06.

* This and the following chapters of this division are not from the pen of Judge Godfrey.

1843. The Bangor Mercantile Association was organized November 30, and incorporated February 5 of the next year. George W. Pickering was President, Jabez True Vice-President, Jere Fenno Secretary, and Francis M. Sabine Treasurer, with a full corps of Directors and Arbiters. By 1848 its library was said to contain three thousand volumes, with Thomas Smith in charge as Librarian. In 1844 the library had seven to eight thousand volumes, with eleven daily papers and twenty-five others in its reading-room.

The Bangor Young Men's Bible Society was organized in December.

1844. This was a great year for the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Bangor. Penobscot Lodge No. 7 was chartered February 14, and organized in March, Kenduskeag Lodge No. 12 in May, and the Katahdin Encampment No. 4 in September. All speedily became flourishing institutions.

A valuable cabinet of minerals was presented to the Girls' High School this year by its Principal, Mr. Woolson.

1845. The First Congregational church, in North Bangor, dedicated its meeting-house in April. This society had been organized in June, 1838, with just a dozen members for the beginning.

The Second Baptist church, at the corner of Wall and Independent streets, was organized September 12.

The order of Sons of Temperance got a good lodgment in Bangor this year. Cynosure Division, No. 1, one of the earliest in the State, was instituted August 19. The next year Crescent Division No. 29, and the Eleusinian Temple of Honor No. 2, were instituted, October 18, 1847, Relief Division No. 92, in North Bangor, was formed.

Three school-houses were erected—one on Main street, one on the Avenue Road, and one in District No. 2, in the country. The rooms in the High School were replastered and newly seated, and other school buildings received a general repairing. The number of children of school age now in the city was 3,589, of whom 2,495 were in the public schools, with an average attendance of 1,780. The schools numbered 34, with 36 teachers.

The Penobscot Steam Towboat Company was incorporated February 21, 1845, and built the same year the tug-boat "Tarratine," at a cost of $11,000.

A special census of the city in September exhibited 5,862 male population, 5,888 females; total 11,690.

1846. Following the introduction of the reformatory order of Sons of Temperance the year before, came the Daughters of Temperance this year. The Central Union No. 3 was instituted October 7, and the next year, May 11, and August 10, 1847, Coronilla Union, No. 9, and the Grand Union, respectively, were formed.

THE GREAT FLOOD.

This was the year of the tremendous flood in the Penobscot and Kenduskeag Streams, which inflicted a great and memorable loss upon the people of Bangor. The account written at the time by the Rev. Dr. West, an Episcopal clergyman then residing here, in a private letter to a distinguished clerical brother in New York City, remains to this day the best published account of the disaster; and we gladly give place to it here:

To the Rev. Dr. Tyng, New York.

Rev. and dear Brother:—We have passed through a scene within the last two or three days which will deeply interest and impress you. Our city has met with a calamity unparalleled in its annals, and perhaps unequalled, in proportion to its population and means, by any in our country. We have been inundated by the river in consequence of what is called here an ice-jam. The history of the matter is briefly as follows:

It sometimes happens that the ice in the river breaks above, while it remains too strong at the outlet to admit of its passing down. The consequence is the accumulation of a dam of ice which completely fills the river from bank to bank, and heaps up sometimes to the height of from fifteen to thirty feet, and thus forming a reservoir of water above it, which overflows the banks and inundates the country around.

The present winter has been a remarkable one in the mode of the formation of the ice. After the river was first frozen over, the ice continued to form in cakes or sheets, and to flow down the rapids to the still and frozen portions, and these were drawn under. This continued until the submerged sheets were stopped by rocks or shoals; then the accumulation went on until the bed of the river became consolidated to an astonishing thickness. Around the piers of our great bridge it was cut through to the depth of about fourteen feet. Thus the entire bed of the river seemed to have become, at least except the channel, an almost solid body of ice.

A few days ago the river began to break up for about thirty miles above the city, while it continued firmly bound for about twelve miles below. There were several different spots where the jams or ice dams were found; and when they broke away they came rushing down with the force of a mountain torrent, until the strong ice below resisted their progress. These jams came down one at a time, and, lodging against another below, kept increasing their magnitude. The two most formidable jams were within seven miles of the city, in the vicinity of the two largest and most important ranges of saw-mills. Those which formed above, when they broke away, passed through at Oldtown and Stillwater with little comparative damage other than carrying away the bridges and adding to the size of the jam below.

The first movement was the raising the two principal ranges of mills from their foundations by the rise of the water. After this the first jam that passed down swept away the Basin mills, which belong to a New York company, and which rented for above $10,000. They next carried away a large range of mills belonging to some of our most enterprising citizens, and which rented for $15,000 per annum. One of the proprietors thus lost about $50,000. The mills in these two ranges contained about fifty saws, were possessed of the most unfailing water power, were recently fitted up with the best improved machinery, and performed last year about one-third of all the business on the river.

The jams thus worked their way down gradually, carrying destruction to bridges and small houses, and other buildings on the banks, until they were all concentrated in one immense mass of four miles in length, of great height and depth, and filling the river, which varies in width from one thousand to fifteen hundred feet from bank to bank.

Above the jam the water was twenty or thirty feet above its usual height, filling up the rapids, and making a dead level of the falls.

The first injury to the city was from the breaking away of a small section of the jam, which came down and pressed against the ice on our banks. By this twenty houses in one immediate neighborhood, on the west bank of the river alone, were at once inundated, but without loss of life. This occurred in the daytime, and presented a scene of magnificent interest. The effect of this small concussion upon the ice near the city was terrific. The water rose instantly to such a height as to sweep the buildings and lumber from the ends of the wharves, and to throw up the ice in huge sheets and pyramids. This shock was resisted by the great covered bridge on the Penobscot, which is about one thousand feet in length, and this gave time to save much property from impending destruction. But, meanwhile, another auxiliary to the fearful work had been preparing by the breaking up of the ice in the Kenduskeag River. This river flows through the heart of the city, dividing it into two equal portions. The whole flat on the margin of the river is covered with stores and public buildings, and is the place of merchandise for the city. The Kenduskeag runs nearly at right angles with the Penobscot at the point where they unite. The Penobscot skirts the city on the eastern side, and on the banks of this river are the principal wharves for the deposit of lumber.

I must mention another circumstance to give you a just idea of our situation. There is a narrow spot in the river, about a mile below the city, at High Head, in which is a shoal, and from which the greatest danger of a jam always arises, and it was this that caused the principal inundation.

The next incident occurred at midnight, when the bells were rung to announce the giving way of the ice. It was a fearful sound and scene. The streets were thronged with men, women, and children, who rushed abroad to witness the approach of the ice avalanche. At length it came rushing on with a power that a thousand locomotives in a body could not vie with; but it was veiled from the eye by the darkness of a hazy night, and the ear only could trace its progress by the sounds of crashing buildings, lumber, and whatever it encountered in its pathway, except the glimpses that could be caught of it by the light of hundreds of torches and lanterns that threw their glare upon the misty atmosphere. The jam passed on, and a portion of it pressed through the weakest portion of the great bridge, and thus, joining the ice below the bridge, pressed it down to the narrows at High Head. Meanwhile the destruction was in progress on the Kenduskeag, which poured down its tributary ice, sweeping mills, bridges, shops, and other buildings, with masses of logs and lumber, to add to the common wreck.

At that moment the anxiety and suspense were fearful whether the jam would force its way through the narrows, or there stop and pour back a flood of waters upon the city, for it was from the rise of the water consequent upon such a jam that the great destruction was to be apprehended. But the suspense was soon over. A cry was heard from the dense mass of citizens who crowded the streets on the flat, "The river is flowing back!" and so sudden was the revulsion that it required the utmost speed to escape the rising waters. It seemed but a moment before the entire flat was deluged; and many men did not escape from their stores before the water was up to their waists.

But the ruinous consequences were, providentially, the loss of property rather than life. The whole business portion of the city was inundated; and so entirely beyond all reasonable estimate was the rise of the waters, that a very large proportion of the stocks of goods in the stores were flooded. Precautions had been taken in the lower part of the city to remove goods from the first to the second story, and yet many who did so had the floors of the second story burst up and their goods let down into the water below; while in the higher portions, where the goods were piled upon and about the counters, the waters rose above them and involved them in a common destruction. Others, who did not remove their goods, suffered a total loss of them.

Thus far, however, the devastation was confined to the least valuable part of the wealth of the city. The lumber on the wharves constitutes the larger portion of the available property of the city; and here a kind Providence has spared the devoted city, and by one of those singular methods by which a present evil, which seems to be the greatest that could be inflicted, is the means of averting a greater one; for it was the occurrence of the jam which, while it inundated the stores, appeared to be the means of saving the lumber. The pressure of the ice against the wharves and lumber was so great as to wedge it in with immense strength and formed a sort of wall outside the wharves, from which the jam, when it started, separated and passed out, leaving the lumber safe, though injured.

After the ice stopped, things remained in this situation during the next day, which was Sunday—the saddest and most serious Sunday, probably, ever passed in Bangor. Few, however, could spend the day in worship. All that could labor were employed, while the flood kept rising, in rescuing what property could be saved from the waters, and in taking poor families from their windows in boats.

The closing scene of this dreadful disaster occurred on Sunday evening, beginning at about 7 o'clock. The alarm was again rung through the streets that the jam had given way. The citizens again rushed abroad to witness what they knew must be one of the most sublime and awful scenes of nature, and also to learn the full extent of the calamity. Few, however, were able to catch a sight of the breaking up of the jam, which, for magnitude, it is certain, has not occurred on this river for more than one hundred years. The whole river was like a boiling cauldron, with masses of ice upheaved as by a volcano. But soon the darkness shrouded the scene in part. The ear, however, could hear the roaring of the waters and the crash of buildings, bridges, and lumber, and the eye could trace the mammoth ice jam of four miles long, which passed on majestically, but with lightning rapidity, bearing the contents of both rivers on its bosom. The noble covered bridge of the Penobscot, two bridges of the Kenduskeag, and the two long ranges of saw-mills, besides other mills, houses, shops, logs, and lumber enough to build up a considerable village. The new market floated over the lower bridge across the Kenduskeag, a part of which remains, and, most happily, landed at a point of the wharves, where it sunk, and formed the nucleus of a sort of boom, which stopped the masses of floating lumber in the Kenduskeag, and protected thousands of dollars' worth of lumber on the wharves below.

So suddenly and so rapidly was all this enacted, that it seems impossible to believe it to have occurred without loss of life. Yet such appears to be the happy result.

The individual losses are very great. Some have lost their all, and many from five to fifty thousand dollars each; yet the aggregate will be swelled, by a first estimate far beyond its real amount. From what I have already seen, I think there is no reason whatever for the friends of Bangor abroad to entertain any distrust respecting its recovery and progressive prosperity.

Very truly, your friend and brother,

JOHN WEST.

Bangor, Maine, March 30, 1849.

The Bangor Courier of a contemporaneous date has in its columns a recital of various interesting incidents, from which we cite the following:

We could not bring ourselves to believe that the market-house, in which we had our office, would be removed. We were induced to move our materials at the earnest solicitation of friends, and under their strong advice. We felt all the while as though the alarm would soon be over, and labor resumed in the old premises, and therefore a clumsy article here and another there were left, until the value of the aggregate was about $200, the removal of which we thought we had wisely avoided. The market moved off majestically, but with gentle dalliance, until it plunged forward from the bridge into the fast receding current of the stream, when it righted with a ship-like propriety, bearing aloft a beautiful flag-staff—emblem of Liberty, erected in honor of Henry Clay, the beloved and whole-hearted patriot and orator, who in private station receives the highest attentions and sincerest regards of the American people—and sped its way onward to the ocean, until, happily bethinking how many little articles it contained which would be so missed and mourned, it settled down with a determination to proceed no further. We visited the wreck in the evening, and, fearing it might prove our last, we bore away several pamphlets and documents as prizes. At an early hour yesterday morning we paid it another visit, when, in company with our office hands, and the kind help and timely suggestions of personal friends and a few strangers, we succeeded in securing every article of value. There happened to be one case of type left in one of the racks which had ridden out the perils and roughness of the voyage without spilling a type.

One of our citizens—a Kennebecker, by the way—was particularly zealous in saving the Whig flag-staff, declaring it should long remain to bear aloft the flag of freemen.

The whole river seems to have been an entire mass of ice, partly solid and partly porous. The sudden rise of the river excited alarm, and its sudden subsidence, at the rate of about two feet a minute, caused astonishment.

There is in the upper side, and near the middle of Exchange street, a large cake of ice more than five feet thick. On Broad street there are ice-balls twenty-five feet in diameter, and scattered about in every direction are thousands of smaller masses.

It will be difficult for people who did not witness it to realize that all the business part of the city was a pool in which large vessels might sail—that Exchange street and Main street, and others lower down, were deep canals for half their length, and that Central street was a running river. But such things were, and hundreds of stores were under water! Boats were in requisition, and various contrivances were resorted to in the effort to turn an honest penny. Among them we noticed one fellow had taken the Wall street sign and fastened it upon the stern of his boat, in order to popularize his boat and route. The scene in the vicinity of the steamboat wharf or at the Rose Place is truly astonishing—such heaps of ice thrown in wild confusion, furnishing a capital idea of icebergs from the Northern Ocean.

It is quite wonderful, considering the suddenness and extent of the rise of the water, that no more lives were lost in this vicinity. There were some families in great peril. A family living at the Point, between Brewer Village and the river, were alarmed by the approach of the flood, and started, several women in the number, for higher land in the vicinity, but, before reaching it, the water was up to their armpits. They reached what was then an island, and were compelled to remain during the night. A family living near Crosby's ship-yard could not escape, and were taken off in a boat by one of the neighbors.

Twenty women and children, as the water flowed over the plain at Brewer, fled to a school-house, but could not return, and were obliged to go back upon the hills and remain until the water subsided.

General Miller, at the post-office, with his clerks, had a cool time of it. They were all at work when the flood suddenly came upon them, and filled the office to the depth of four feet. The General started and held the door for the clerks to dodge out and escape up stairs; but Calvin lingered behind for some minutes, when the General called loudly to know what detained him.

"Oh," said he, wading along with the water up to his armpits, "I stopped for the purpose of stamping these paid letters," at the same time holding up a bundle.

The actual amount of property lost in the city by this flood is estimated by pretty good judges at between two and three hundred thousand dollars. This falls severely upon some of our citizens, but the heaviest losses come upon those able to ride out the storm.

1847. Following the good example of their elders of both sexes, the Sons and Daughters of Temperance, the juvenile "Cadets" were organized in Bangor this year. Dirigo Section No. 4 was instituted in October; and in May of the succeeding year Quincy Section No. 6 was opened in North Bangor.

The great structure across the Penobscot, owned by the Bangor Bridge Company, which had been swept away by the freshet of 1846, was rebuilt this year, upon Howe's improved patent (truss plan), at a cost of $31,000. The original bridge had been constructed in 1832, upon Town's patent lattice-bridge plan, by Messrs. Damen & Godfrey, for $40,000.

Bangor was this year made a port of entry by the Federal authorities. Mr. William C. Hammatt was the first Collector.

The Mercantile and Eastern Banks were re-incorporated, and the Kenduskeag Bank of Bangor, with a capital of $100,000, was incorporated this year.

The Union Street Methodist Episcopal church was formed this year, from the Summer Street Mission Society, and was known for several years as the Summer Street church.

The Central Congregational church is also a child of this year, dating from April 1.

A brick residence for the Superintendent was built this year at the Almshouse, costing about $2,500, and the artificial pond in front was excavated.

1848. The Penobscot Musical Association was organized this year. The Musical Directors of the Society, from its formation to 1864, were Professors B. F. Baker, G. W. Pratt, L. Marshall, and L. A. Emerson, of Boston; I. B. Woodbury and B. F. Bradbury, of New York; and G. F. Root, of North Reading, Massachusetts. Associate Directors—N. D. Gould and E. H. Frost, Boston; S. Wilder, Bangor. The twenty-first yearly session was held in Bangor September 29 to October 2, 1868, and was an occasion of considerable interest.

Four new public school-houses were built by the city—a rather large one at Mount Hope, the others comparatively small.

A special census of the city, taken by the School Board, showed 2,288 people, including 873 children of school age in the First Ward: 1,843 and 592 in the Second; 2,113 and 840 in the Third; 1,731 and 615 in the Fourth; 2,428 and 1,133 in the Fifth; 1,964 and 724 in the Sixth; and 1,013 and 437 in the Seventh. There were also in the city 748 cows, 605 horses, and 235 swine.

1849. This year steamers of moderate size began to run on the Upper Penobscot, from Oldtown to Winn. In the Brief History of Bangor, prefixed to the City Directory for 1851, the following comments upon this fact are made:

The beautiful and picturesque river and forest scenery in that region, the pleasures of a summer trip to the woods and mountains of the interior, and the fresh air of the country, draw many visitors from abroad to the vicinity of Bangor during the warm season. A voyage up the Penobscot and a tramp to Katahdin make a most healthful and pleasing summer excursion. Travelers visiting Moosehead Lake and the ponds and forests in its vicinity, on hunting or fishing excursions, pass Bangor. The number of hunters who wend their steps thitherward increases each year.

This branch of the steam navigation of the Penobscot was suspended some years ago.

This was a cholera year in Bangor. Mayor William H. Mills, in his address to the City Council in the spring of 1850, thus commented upon its events:

This loathsome disease fell upon us suddenly, filling the public mind with much of alarm; and well it might. When the air we breathe is charged with death, and it is altogether problematic whether he that went out in the morning would not be brought back ere night a corpse—such is the time, if any, when men walk softly.

At this distressing period the City Council was called upon for extraordinary services and sacrifices—calls that were met with great promptness and disinterested devotion. And, where all acted nobly, I hope I shall not be charged with partiality should I name Messrs. Bowman, P. B. Mills, and Wingate, of the Board of Aldermen, and Mr. Emerson of the Common Council, to whom any encomiums that I could give would fall short of their just due.

There were others, not connected with the city government, who threw themselves into the breach, to alleviate the distresses of suffering humanity. But to Mr. Farnham, the City Marshal, who was also Health Officer, the palm must belong. On him, in personal detail, the whole of this onerous duty devolved; which was done calmly, but with great promptitude, in season and out of season, by day and by night—services which money could not have purchased, and all done with a readiness and disinterested straightforwardness, that were really surprising. Such services will not soon be forgotten by the citizens of Bangor.

And our physicians—who, if common report spoke the truth, were not, all of them, knit together, as were the hearts of David and Jonathan—now united; men of all parties and ranks seemed to fraternize, and the only strife among them was to see who would fly into death's presence first. Ready at all times to rush to the bedside of the dying—and that, too, in almost every case without the slightest hope of a pecuniary reward—conduct so magnanimous could not fail to bring upon them, too, the spontaneous encomiums of their fellow-citizens.

There were 161 deaths by the dread destroyer in this city in a very short time—most of them of persons from abroad. The venerable William Abbot, Mayor of the city, died in office, and was succeeded by Mr. Mills.

A spacious and elegant building was put upon the Bruce lot this year for the Select School for Girls.

The building for the Free-will Baptist Society at North Bangor, was erected this year.

1850. The Market-house foundation, near the Kenduskeag Bridge, was sold by the city to the United States Government for $10,000, which was nearly its cost.

The City Hall, otherwise the old Court-house, was removed to its present site and enlarged and repaired. The basement was fitted up for the use of the police, and with a police-court room, and a large safe was put in for the Clerk and the Treasurer. The present hall was formed in the upper story.

The statistics of sawed lumber surveyed at Bangor for the nineteen years from 1832 to this year, inclusive, are as follow: 1832, 37,987,052 feet; 1833, 45,442,566; 1834, 25,624,718; 1835, 73,416,065; 1836, 46,619,921; 1837, 64,720,008; 1838, 85,392,177; 1839, 89,806,630; 1840, 71,726,622; 1841, 77,091,793; 1842, 111,317,201; 1843, 113,798,619; 1844, 121,130,974; 1845, 171,688,737; 1846, 140,085,012; 1847, 191,136,292; 1848, 212,932,499; 1849, 160,418,808; 1850, 203,754,201; total, 2,044,089,895. In six years it had nearly doubled; in eleven years it had trebled; in fourteen years it had more than quadrupled; in sixteen years quintupled, and in the next year it had increased over 560 per cent., as against the measurement of 1832.

St. John's Commandery, No. 3, Knights Templars, of Bangor, was chartered September 17, of this year.

1851. The brick church, occupied by the Unitarian society, on the corner of Main and Union streets, opposite the Bangor House, was burned November 30, with a loss of about $18,000.

The Merchants' Mutual Marine Insurance Company was incorporated this year.

1852. Gas was introduced.

The city debt was now about $120,000, having been reduced $40,000 in ten years. The municipal expenses were about $70,000 a year. The local taxes the year before, including what was necessary to pay $14,000 in temporary loans, was $85,078.30—the largest the city had ever had.

A fire occurred this year in Drew's Block, at the east end of Kenduskeag Bridge, involving a loss of $3,500.

1853. The Custom-house and Post-office building, constructed of granite, were in course of construction this year. It was hardly finished before 1855.

The ground for Pine Grove Cemetery was purchased in March for $1,000. It included about thirty acres. The city spent $1,200 more this year for surveying, building stone fences, and making roads and other improvements. The next year a neat fence of paling was put up on the front, at the Carmel road, at a cost of $250.50.

1854. A few cholera cases occurred the last of September on Front street, mostly among the Irish residents. There were seventeen deaths.

The first Superintendent of Schools for the city was appointed, under an ordinance of Council creating the office. The Rev. Philip Weaver, a member of the School Board, was appointed, and served for two years at a moderate pay, but with excellent results, especially in securing larger attendance upon the schools. There were now in the city 5,510 children of school age, of whom 3,560 attended the summer schools, and 4,170 were pupils in winter.

1855. Norombega Hall was built. The corner-stone or St. John's Roman Catholic Church, on York street, was laid August 15, by the Right Rev. David W. Bacon, D. D., Bishop of Portland.

The same year, November 15, the church edifice erected by the Methodist Episcopal Society, on Union street, was dedicated, with sermon by the Rev. William F. Farrington. The building cost $15,000. The lady members of the church raised money for the purchase of the organ by their own exertions.

The Bangor Council, Royal and Select Masters, in the Masonic order, was chartered May 3.

1856. The Penobscot & Kennebec Railroad, now a link of the Maine Central lines, went into operation.

The charter of St. Andrew's Lodge, No. 83, Free and Accepted Masons, dates from February 6 of this year.

1858. The Bangor Mutual Fire Insurance Company was incorporated.

1859. The Bangor Cornet Band was chartered in June.

The valuation of the city for taxation was now $6,015,601, against $3,899,218 in 1850, showing an increase in nine years of $2,116,383. At least $2,000,000 worth of timbered land in this State and the Provinces was also owned in Bangor.

1861. The first steam fire-engine used in the city was built by the Portland Company, and received in October; cost $2,700. It was manned by seventeen men. The Chief Engineer was now paid a salary of $500. Many incendiary fires and attempts at conflagration occurred this year.

1862. The Universalist church building, which had been commenced in June, 1860, was finished late this year, and dedicated December 16. It was erected at a total cost, including organ, of $20,000. The building is of brick, in the Romanesque style, ninety by sixty-four feet, with two towers ninety-six and one hundred and forty feet high respectively, each surmounted by a spire. The vestry, or lower audience room, is sixty by forty-three feet in dimensions, and has sittings for three hundred and fifty persons. Above this is the main audience room, handsomely frescoed, with one hundred and twenty pews and sittings for about six hundred people. The church occupies a commanding position on Park street, near Centre, at the head of East Market Square, looking down Exchange street.

The Union Insurance Company of Bangor was incorporated this year, with a capital of $200,000.

1863. The First National Bank of Bangor was organized September 15 of this year—the pioneer institution here under the new law. The Second National Bank followed the next year, as also the reorganization as a National bank of the old Kenduskeag Bank of 1832. The Traders' Bank was similarly reorganized in 1865, and the Merchants' National Bank was also formed. The Farmers' Bank, which had been operating as a State bank since 1853, became the Farmers' National Bank in 1868.

The demands created by the war and other causes compelled the city this year to make a loan of $64,000. It was taken mostly by the citizens, at six per cent. Much of it was appropriated to the payment of bounties to soldiers, and to extinguish a temporary loan of $13,000.

A census was taken in 1863, by a gentleman of this city, of the shade-trees in Bangor. He found more than 4,000 within the corporation limits and outside of fences.

1864. The Bangor Historical Society was incorporated in March, and organized in May, with the Hon. Elijah Hamlin, President; the Rev. Charles C. Everett, Vice-President; the Rev. Samuel Harris, D.D., Corresponding Secretary; Elnathan F. Duren, Recording Secretary; and Judge John E. Godfrey, and Drs. John Mason and James C. Weston, Executive Committee.

June 17 the Soldiers' Monument was dedicated in Mount Hope Cemetery.

The valuation of the city was: Real estate, $4,349,247; personal, $2,726,686; total, $7,075,930. Tax 2.4 per cent. Number of polls, 2,726.

The Boys' and the Girls' High Schools were united this year. Professor Robert P. Bucknam, Principal of the school, died, much lamented by his pupils and friends.

The school-house in the Central District was destroyed by fire, through ill feeling caused by its removal from the east to the west side of the Kenduskeag.

July 14 a great fire occurred in Tewksbury's shipyard in Brewer, destroying $8,000 worth of property, largely owned by citizens of Bangor. The Fire Department of the city was in prompt attendance, and rendered such assistance as it could.

1866. The spacious engine-house on Harlow street, accommodating two steamers, with hose-cart and other apparatus, was built by the city this year, at a cost, including lot, of $18,500. A large reservoir, with a capacity of 65,000 gallons, occupies one-third of the basement.

The dam at Treat's Falls was surveyed by the holders of the old charter of 1828, under which the dam had been built, but not in a manner that brought it within the charter. No important change was at once made in it, however.

An addition of three acres was made to the cemetery on the Pushaw Road, at a cost of $199.68. The tract was thereafter known as Maple Grove Cemetery.

An ordinance was passed by the Council authorizing the appointment of a truant officer, who should arrest children growing up without education and place them in the public schools.

On the 13th of May Merrill's mill and other property on Broad street was burned, with a loss of $10,000.

1867. About 8 o'clock one evening in January, Mrs. Ann McDonald, wife of Hugh McDonald, was murdered on one of the public streets, the assassin escaping without discovery. She was not known to have an enemy, and the cause of the crime was a mystery.

September 9 a disastrous fire occurred on the Franklin Street Bridge, which burned the planing- and grist-mills of Messrs. Grover & Stevens, a sash and blind factory, and a carriage factory, the property of B. M. Thomas, with a total loss of $39,200, and no insurance. The fire losses of the year amounted to $50,950, with insurance only $5,950.

May 20 the City Council resolved to accept a trust fund of $6,500 for the Bangor Mechanics' Association, which was invested by the city in Bangor & Piscataquis railroad bonds. In 1874 $8,000 more were received for the same purpose, together with a legacy to the association of $4,000, by the late Franklin Muzzy, which was similarly invested.

The Hibernian Mutual Benevolent Association was organized February 24. By 1871 its membership amounted to 160, and two years thereafter it numbered 250.

1868. A society of the Grand Army of the Republic, B. H. Beale Post, No. 12, was organized January 1, 1868. The office of the Associate Inspector-General for the Department of Maine was also here for a time; and, at another period, the office of the Commander of the Department was here.

The amount of lumber shipped from the port of Bangor during the decade ending with this year, for the several years, was as follows: 1859, 178,046,440 feet; 1860, 201,349,527; 1861, 131,091,210; 1862, 160,062,983; 1863, 190,672,269; 1864, 174,436,272; 1865, 169,881,023; 1866, 237,147,606; 1867, 206,483,358; 1868, 220,794,766. About half a million feet of the lumber shipped during the last four years had been subjected to the process known as "Burnettizing." The estimate of short lumber shipped in 1868 was: Shingles, 152,703,000; laths, 112,458,000; clapboards, 5,144,000; pickets, 3,678,000.

1869. Another great fire occurred on New Year's Day at the West Market Square, which burned all night, and destroyed the stores of Conner & Fuller, of Hayward & Co. (who lost $57,916), George W. Ladd (loss $28,000), Emery Wing & Co. ($20,000), F. F. Farrington ($12,000), Fogg & Bridges ($16,619), and Thomas A. Taylor ($9,500). The aggregate loss was $200,963.67, of which $137,597.67 was insured.

On Thanksgiving Day Miss Deborah B. Hersey died of consumption. She had been for twenty years a teacher in the public schools, and for twelve years in the select school for girls, on Abbott Square.

This year ten vessels, with a tonnage of 2,332, were built at Bangor. The next year but 1,230 tons, or a little more than half of the tonnage of 1869, were built.

The Bangor Association for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals was organized in April. President, Joseph Carr; Vice-Presidents, Joseph S. Wheelwright, Samuel D. Thurston, George K. Jewett, Joseph C. White, Isaac R. Clark; Treasurer, Ebenezer T. Fox; Secretary, O. H. Ingalls; Directors, P. B. Mills, S. P. Bradbury, George Stetson, William P. Wingate, E. F. Duren.

The amount of long lumber shipped from Bangor this year was 190,840,908 feet.

The building for the Children's Home, on Thomas's Hill, was erected this year.

The Penobscot Savings Bank dates from February of 1869.

1870. The long lumber shipped from the port this year amounted to 202,014,192 feet, of which about 4,000,000 were "Burnettized."

The Jameson Guards, a local military organization, (Company G, Maine Volunteer Militia) was organized this year. Captain, Daniel White; First Lieutenant, James A. Dean; Second Lieutenant, George F. Goldthwait.

The National Insurance Company, of Bangor, was organized July 25th, with a cash capital of $200,000. The Merchants' Marine Insurance Company, capital $150,000, was incorporated the same year.

Clark & Bowman's block was partly burned this year. The building was damaged to the amount of $4,800, and goods therein $3,000; insurance $6,800.

1871. The new county jail was finished, with the county workshop.

The European & North American Railroad was opened to Vanceboro. President Grant and many other dignitaries from the States and Provinces were present, and went to the terminus. The President was very handsomely received there and at Bangor.

A fire occurred at Pickering Square, by which E. P. Baldwin and others lost about $9,000, mostly insured.

The amount of long lumber shipped this year was 227,491,975 feet.

1872. The Bangor Insurance Company was incorporated in February, with a capital of $200,000.

On the 10th of October spontaneous combustion caused a fire in Michael Swartz's block on West Market Square, which caused him a loss of $37,000 on the building and $92,000 on stock in trade; insurance $70,000. Messrs. Fogg & Bridges lost $25,000, Webster Treat $6,600, William E. Mann $3,000, O. F. Knowles $1,500, W. H. Adams $1,000, and others smaller sums.

The corner-stone of the St. Mary's (Roman Catholic) church was laid September 15, the Right Rev. Bishop Bacon officiating.

The session of the Maine Educational Society was held in Bangor the latter part of the same month, and awakened much interest.

The Home for Aged Women was incorporated.

Norombega Lodge, No. 5, Knights of Pythias, was chartered April 24, 1872.

The amount of long lumber shipped this year was the largest ever known, being 246,453,649 feet. The following is a detailed statement of the lumber sold in 1872:

Pine, 37,750,000.....	$ 658,718.00
Spruce, 176,933,649.....	2,353,217.53
Hemlock, 23,370,000.....	222,015.00
Total sales of long lumber.....	$3,233,950.00
Clapboards, 3,643,000.....	$ 94,718.00
Laths, 150,677,000.....	263,684.75
Pickets.....	25,680.00
Shingles, 121,264,000.....	363,792.00
Staves, 798,000.....	7,980.00
Total sales short lumber.....	755,854.75
Total lumber sold.....	$3,989,805.28

1873. The long lumber shipped this year footed up 179,202,353 feet.

1874. The public libraries were consolidated this year, and the rooms now occupied by the Mechanics' Association Library, on Kenduskeag Bridge were occupied by the united library.

The Bangor Reform Club, an institution which was one of the outgrowths of the celebrated temperance crusade of this year, was organized September 10, and incorporated December 28, with Dr. H. A. Reynolds, the since noted lecturer and "red ribbon" reformer, then of this city, as President; W. A. Longley, J. J. Richardson, James Barnabee, Vice-presidents; S. L. Stevens, Secretary; G. S. Walker, Financial Secretary; E. Allen, Treasurer. This society still maintains a vigorous existence, holding public meetings every Sunday, and other meetings frequently.

The Woman's Temperance Crusade was formed as a local society the same year, and has since steadily kept up its work. Its meetings Sabbath afternoons are held jointly with the Reform Club.

The West Bangor Chapel (Congregational) society was organized April 2.

The long lumber shipped from this port in 1874 amounted to 176,786,932 feet.

Two notable fires of this year occurred—one in the station of the European & North American Railway, on Exchange street, which destroyed the roof and attic, costing the company $8,717.16 to replace them; and one April 18, in the row of storehouses in the rear of Exchange street block. This was an incendiary fire, and caused a loss of more than $70,000, which was largely insured. Messrs. Babb & Lane's loss was $25,000; Kimball & Sanford's $12,000; William P. Hubbard's $10,000; and there were some smaller losses. December 15 another large fire occurred, losing for G. W. Fielding $10,000, Hariman & Carter, $8,000, and others various sums, the total being about $51,000.

1875. June 27 a fire invaded Bragg & Foster's stores, on Pickering Square, causing a loss of $8,350, which was fully insured, and others, also insured, losses of about $8,500.

The fine Grammar School building at the junction of Union and Fourth streets, was built this year, at a total cost of $32,170, except the furnace and heating apparatus, which cost $5,700.

The city authorities accepted a trust fund of $25,000 for the Home for Aged Women, paying yearly interest on the same; also $1,000 from the estate of Dr. McRuer, devised to the Bangor Fuel society.

The Bangor Art Association was organized February 11. Dr. Augustus C. Hamlin, President; Clarence L. Dakin, Secretary and Treasurer.

Amount of long lumber shipped from the port of Bangor this year, 154,663,129 feet.

1876. The quantity of long lumber shipped from Bangor this year amounted to 115,121,191 feet.

The Bayard Lodge, No. 294, Free and Accepted Masons, was instituted May 31.

1877. A noble deed of charity was done this year, in the contribution of $10,000 in money and goods in a very few hours, and the dispatching of a train load of food to the sufferers by the great fire at St. John, New Brunswick.

On the night of February 7, Mr. G. W. Merrill's store, on Pickering Square, was burned; loss, $5,582; insured, $5,000. Some others sustained losses.

The city now had a debt of $800,000, and liabilities incurred in aid of railroads to the amount of about $2,000,000 more. In 1850 the debt was but $128,000. Hon. Elijah Hamlin, father of Dr. A. C. Hamlin, the Mayor of 1877, was then Mayor of the city.

1878. The Burnettizing Works, engaged in the preservation of wood against decay by a peculiar process, were burned on the 3d of April, with a loss of about $18,000. They were situated on the Hampden Road, at the edge of the city, and have never been replaced.

In the winter of this year the ice industry first became important in and near Bangor.

The Bangor Council, Royal Arcanum, was instituted July 18, 1878.

1881. A profound sensation was produced in this city, as elsewhere throughout the country—and, indeed, the civilized world—by the shooting of President Garfield at Washington City, July 2, by the assassin, Charles J. Guiteau. Meetings were held soon after the occurrence and also upon the death of the President, September 19, to express the sense of grief and indignation felt by the community. On the day of the funeral, September 26, obsequies were appropriately observed in the City Hall and the Central Congregational church. All these services were largely attended. A considerable fund was afterwards subscribed for the Garfield Monumental Fund.

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE CHURCHES OF BANGOR.

The First Parish Congregational—Hammond Street Congregational—The Central Congregational—The Independent Congregational (Unitarian)—West Bangor Chapel—Crosbyville Chapel—The First Baptist—First Free Baptist—St. John's (Roman Catholic) Parish—St. Mary's (Roman Catholic) Parish—First Methodist Episcopal—Union Street Methodist—Universalist—Other Churches.

THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

This is the pioneer religious society of Bangor. A good part of its earlier history has already been related by Judge Godfrey. By the fall of 1811 it began to be earnestly desired by the few Congregationalists of the place that a church of their faith should be formed here; and, although they were but a feeble band, in point of numbers, they courageously took the matter in hand, and went forward to form what in the fullness of time became a strong, vigorous, and influential organization. These prime movers were Deacon William Boyd, and Messrs. William Hasey and Stephen S. Crosby, who bore letters from the Congregational church of Orrington, and William D. Williamson, the well-known lawyer and historian, who had been a member of the church at Amherst. The decisive steps were taken November 26, 1811, when these gentlemen agreed to enter into a covenant with each other as a church, with certain articles of faith almost identical with those adopted at Fitchburg, Massachusetts, in 1798. It had been previously agreed to call the Rev. Harvey Loomis, a graduate of Williams College two years before, and a young man of 26, who had been preaching temporarily at Norridgewock, to the pastorate of the new church. His services had been secured, and he was to be installed on the day of organization.

The church was fully constituted on Wednesday, November 27, 1811. Miss Sarah Harrod, who had personal recollections of the day, and herself became a member in 1815, communicated the following, many years afterward, in a letter to a friend in Bangor:

The day the church was organized was a business meeting; at that time they drew up the articles and signed them. Then came the ordination in that same upper room. A church meeting followed, when the sisters passed examination and were voted in. The next Sabbath was communion. The church meeting was appointed to be attended one month from that time, and continued for four or five years a monthly meeting.

The ministers present at the organization of the society were the Rev. Messrs. Fisher of Bluehill, Blood of Bucksport, Mason of Castine, Johnson of Belfast, and Gillet of Hallowell. Two other visiting brethren, named Spaulding and Wason, probably laymen from the Bucksport church, seem to have been present; and it is said that two more clergymen, the Rev. Messrs. John Sawyer and H. May, were also in attendance. The number of visitors was thus over twice as great as that of the members of the infant society.

"Father Fisher" was already a man of fifty-six years, and called by this venerable title; but he survived to nearly double that age, dying at last in Bangor at the age of one hundred and three, his funeral being attended at the first church October 24, 1858. He was not only present at the birth of the church, but he successively attended the ordinations of Mr. Pomroy in 1825, and Mr. Little in 1849. In his diary occur the following entries:

November 26, 1811. With Mr. Blood, Mason, Spaulding, and Wason, was to Bangor. Arrived opposite Bangor about 3 P. M. On account of ice in the river, left horses in Orrington and crossed in small boats to Bangor. Council formed to gather a church, and prepare the way to ordain Mr. Loomis. Gathered a church of four male members, examined and approved the candidate, and assigned parts.

27th. Met with the Council at Mr. Garland's; procession formed; ordination proceeded. Parts as follows: Singing; prayer by Rev. Jonathan Fisher; singing "Ascension" hymn; sermon by Rev. Mr. Gillet; church instituted; call renewed and accepted; ordaining prayer by Rev. Mr. Sawyer; charge by Rev. A. Johnson; right hand of fellowship by Rev. Mr. Blood; concluding prayer by Rev. Mr. Mason; exercises closed by singing "Denmark."

As the Mr. Garland named does not appear as a member of the church, it is possible he was keeper of a public house at which the people assembled and the procession was formed. The place of meeting is not mentioned in the old annals; but as Miss Harrod states that the first communion service* was held the next Sabbath, and as this service is known to have been in a school-house then standing near the present corner of Pine and State streets, it is probable that the original meetings were held in the same place. The first meeting entered in the records, however, was held in the "Academy," a building remembered to have stood near the original county Court-house, on Hammond, near Main street.

The recollection of Miss Harrod is that "the sisters passed examination and were voted in" at the church meeting immediately following the ordination; but according to the church roll they were not received as members until March 11, 1812, when Mrs. Hannah Boyd, Mrs. Crosby, and Mrs. Hannah Crosby entered from the church at Orrington. Until then, for a period of about three months and a half, the church seems to have consisted of the original male quartette. Mrs. Eliza Kendrick was added April 8, 1812, from the church at Rochester, and the same date Mrs. Mary Gould was the first member received by profession, or "from the world," as the phrase of the old record is. Then, May 13th, came two male members by profession—Messrs. Stephen Kimball and Samuel E. Dutton; and subsequently the same year, mostly by letter, Mmes. Experience Harlow, Mary Carr, Mary Allen, Hutchins, Betsey Low, Eunice Dresser, Marcie Dutton, Almira Carr, and Elizabeth Little. The first white child born in Bangor, Mary, wife of Andrew Mayhew, was received November 10, 1813.

The first deacon of the church was William Boyd, who had already been a deacon in his former church. The next was Stephen S. Crosby. Other deacons in the first thirty years of the church were Eliashib Adams, George W. Brown, Bradford Harlow, Alexander Drummond, Albert Titcomb, James Allen, and George A. Thatcher, some of whom, as Deacons Thatcher and Titcomb, are yet living.

Soon after organization, the stated place of meeting of the church, in the absence of convenient public buildings, became a small room or hall over James Crosby's store, on Exchange street. The next summer an attempt was made, but without success, to secure a sufficient subscription to build a meeting-house; and when, early in 1813, the old Court-house, now the City Hall, was so far finished that a part of it could be occupied, the congregation removed thither for worship. In 1822 a church building was completed for it—a frame house, standing upon the site still occupied by the society, and the first house of worship erected in Bangor. April 7, 1830, it was burned by an incendiary, who is said to have confessed shortly before his death that he did the deed in revenge for the excommunication of his wife. Services were held in the Baptist church until a new and better building, constructed of brick, was put up, and dedicated July 30, 1831. This is the edifice still in honorable and useful service, with important improvements, and the introduction of an excellent plan of ventilation, in the latter part of 1859. This also received a severe scorching in a neighboring fire the next year.

In 1815 the society received as a present the first church bell rung in Bangor. The following acknowledgment appeared in the Weekly Register a few months after:

In July last Benjamin Bussey, Esq., of Boston, presented to the First Congregational Society in Bangor a Bell for their Meeting-House.

The bell was cast by Colonel Paul Revere [clarum et venerabile nomen!], weighing 1,095 pounds, and was raised to the Belfry in Bangor in July. Its sound, in favorable weather, distinctly fills a circle of twelve miles in diameter.

Travelers remark that it affords a better sound than is common, and similar to that of bells most approved of.

The Selectmen of Bangor embrace your paper as a medium through which respectfully and publicly to acknowledge the favor done said inhabitants by the generous donor, and to express their gratitude to him for his liberal present.

Bangor, Feb. 15.

The Rev. Harvey Loomis, first pastor of the church, had been a contemporary at Williams College of the celebrated missionary band, including Samuel J. Mills, Gordon Hall, and James Richards; and his name is inscribed among the five heroes of the haystack prayer-meeting, upon the monument erected at its site near Williamstown, to commemorate the birth of foreign missions in America. He came to his work in Bangor with the influences of that memorable period fresh within him. He served his church with great acceptance and success for more than thirteen years; and his pastorate had an ending which is one of the most interesting traditions of the community. He had selected as his text for the morning service on the opening Sabbath of 1825 the words of Jeremiah xxviii. 16: "This year thou shalt die." He entered his pulpit in wonted health; but, then and there, with his discourse of warning at hand, and before he had even spoken the opening service of the hour, he was stricken by the death angel. He died at his post, with his armor on. The Historical Sketch of the church, published in 1856, says:—

The sermons of Mr. Loomis were short, pithy, pointed, direct, aimed at the conscience, and delivered in an interesting and impressive manner. While under his pastoral care, 143 persons were added to the church.

It was during his pastorate that a very remarkable revival of religion occurred, beginning in November, 1814, and lasting for no less a period than three years.

A manuscript book of historical memoranda, anonymously prepared, and found among the records of the church, comprises the following concerning the succession of pastors and preachers, and some other matters:

When Mr. Pomroy was first settled, there was but one church. The Seminary professors and students attended all the meetings, and among these Dr. Smith had become very much endeared to the people. Then the excellent and fervent Mr. Gallagher was here for three years, and was a very efficient help. Dr. Hamlin was here three years, and was as wise then as now. Mr. Dole was another valuable worker, like "a volcano covered with ice." Mr. Bradford Harlow, Mr. John Barker, and Deacon Adams were all prominent men—Mr. D. Pike too. There was a rapid influx of population which filled up the meeting-house, and which was not checked until 1837.

The following additional notes are extracted from the Historical Sketch before mentioned:

Rev. Swan L. Pomroy was ordained pastor of this church August 31, 1825. Rev. Doct. Payson, of Portland, the celebrated Edward Payson, preached the sermon.

At the communion-season in March, 1828, an interesting and powerful revival of religion commenced, which continued a number of months, and a large number of persons were added to the church.

In March, 1831, there appeared to be an unusual attention to the subject of religion, and a series of meetings were held, continuing six days, with great interest and a manifest blessing.

In the year 1834 there was considerable religious interest in the city and large additions to the church, both by profession and by letter.

During the years 1836 and 1837, there were considerable additions to the church.

About the commencement of the year 1840 there began a powerful revival of religion, which continued several months. It was deep, thorough, still. More than ninety persons were added to the church during the year, by profession alone.

In April, 1845, Mr. Pomroy expressed a desire to be released from his labors, for the period of a year or more, for the purpose of improving his health by traveling. To this request the church and parish consented. During the absence of Mr. Pomroy the parish was supplied by Rev. Professor Shepard.

September 22, 1846, Rev. S. L. Pomroy arrived in this city, after an absence of about sixteen months in Europe and Asia, and resumed his pastoral labors.

During the summer of 1848 there was quite an interesting state of feeling in the congregation, particularly among the young, and more than twenty persons expressed a hope in Christ.

September 27, 1848, Rev. Mr. Pomroy, having been elected one of the Secretaries of the Board of Foreign Missions, and having decided to accept that office, communicated his intentions to the church, with a request that a council should be called to advise in the matter. This request was complied with, not without expressions of regret on the part of the church and of attachment to the pastor. A council was accordingly called, which at length came to this result, that it was the duty of Mr. Pomroy to accept the appointment. October 15 Mr. Pomroy preached his farewell sermon, having been the pastor of this church more than twenty-three years, during which time nearly six hundred persons were added to the church.

The pulpit was supplied after the dismissal of Mr. Pomroy, and until Mr. Little was ordained, by Rev. Professor Smith, of the Theological Seminary. On the 6th of May, 1849, Mr. George B. Little, of Andover Theological Seminary, preached his first sermon to this church with the view of becoming its pastor. On the 26th of the same month the church voted unanimously to extend to him a call to settle over them. On the 21st of June Mr. Little accepted the call of the church, and on the 11th of October was ordained. The sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Thurston, of Searsport.

In the spring of 1852 there was a very interesting revival of religion in the city, the blessings of which this church was permitted, in a good degree, to share, as a result of which nearly fifty persons were added to its membership by profession.

Mr. Little left the pastorate of this church October 21, 1857.

The pastors since have been the Revs. Edward W. Gilman, from January 13, 1859, to October 4, 1863; Lyman S. Rowland, November 16, 1864, to July 9, 1867; Newman Smyth, ordained March 3, 1870, and dismissed April 29, 1875; and S. Lewis B. Spear, June 5, 1879, to May 5, 1881. Many able men have also served the parish during the intervals of pastorates, or as occasional preachers.

The total membership of the church, from its organization to October 1, 1881, numbered 1,146. At the latter date it had 286 members, with a Sabbath-school of sixty-seven.

The churches of Bangor colonized from this society, in whole or in part, were the Hammond Street, to which forty-seven female and twenty-six male members were dismissed November 28, 1833; the North Bangor, four members, in May, 1838, and the Third, or Central, nine members, March 31, 1847. A secession from the church occurred, in the spring of 1881, and the formation of an independent meeting, by reason of troubles in the pastorate and dismissal of the Rev. Mr. Spear.

The following interesting notes concerning the early Sabbath-school are contributed by Miss Harrod's letter:

So many children attended it very soon became necessary to remove to the Court-house, and in April, 1815, it commenced there, Deacon Adams the Superintendent. He took charge of the boys below, and I had the girls and some small boys in a room above. For a time all the lessons were given from the Westminster Shorter Catechism. The summer that Mr. D. Pike came Deacon Adams resigned to him his office.

The school was then reorganized, divided into classes, and many teachers became necessary. The school at its first commencement was attended at the close of the afternoon service—which at that time was thought best, as it was given up in the fall and opened again in the spring. Mr. Pike changed the time to the morning, before service, and continued it through one season. The following spring he (Mr. Pike) changed it to noon time (that is, immediately after the forenoon services), and found many more attended. In 1817 he thought it best to continue it through the whole year. When he came, Bible classes were introduced, and the teachers' meetings, all through his life, were exceedingly interesting and instructive. They (the teachers' meetings) were held weekly, on Friday evenings.

It is a fact well worth perpetuating that the articles of faith and covenant of this church have been adopted by the church at Constantinople, Turkey, probably through the influence of the Rev. Dr. Hamlin, who was formerly here.

HAMMOND STREET CONGREGATIONAL.

The industry of Deacon E. F. Duren has supplied the following Historical Sketch of this church, in the Manual published some years ago:

The Hammond Street Congregational church in Bangor was organized December 5, 1833. The occasion of forming it was the inability of the people to obtain seats in the First church. A committee of ten appointed at a meeting of the First church January 17, 1832, to whom the subject was referred, reported on the 7th of February following, unanimously in favor of organizing a new church. November 28, 1833, was observed as a day of fasting and prayer by the First church, and in the afternoon of the same day seventy-three of its members (twenty-six males and forty-seven females) were dismissed for the purpose of organizing the new church.

The following is a list of the pioneer seventy-three: George W. Brown, Sophia (Hammond) Brown, Sophia H. Brown [Smith], John M. Prince, Eleanor C. (Eaton) Prince, Joseph C. Lovejoy, Sarah (Moody) Lovejoy, Alexander Savage, Priscilla S. (Thomas) Savage, Mary G. Savage, Charles Rice, Miranda (Hammond) Rice, Josiah Deane, Betsey P. (Chandler) Deane, Hannah A. Chandler, Sarah M. (Chandler) Winslow, Francis Roberts, Ruth (Russell) Roberts, John Sargent, Ann (Alexander) Sargent, Abner Taylor, Harriet Hammond, Edmund Dole, Judith (Thurston) Dole, Jonathan Webster, John Webster, Abigail A. Webster, Sarah (Webster) Drummond, Moses Patten, Sally (Whittier) Patten, Thomas A. Hill, Elizabeth (Carr) Hill, Elizabeth A. (Hill) Poor, Jane S. Hill, George Starrett, Martha (Burgess) Starrett, Caroline L. (Storer) Morrill, Timothy Crosby, Lucy M. (Heywood) Crosby, Olive Crosby, William D. Williamson, William Davenport (Rev.), Elizabeth S. (Poor) Davenport, John Thurston, Zadock Davis, Samuel Wiley, Stephen Holland, Benjamin Wyatt, David Hill, Pascal P. Learned, Mary (Goodale) Nourse, Sarah J. Nourse, Susan (Wilder) Bruce, Jane A. (Gray) Valentine, Clarissa (Call) Osgood, Ruth (Fisher) Ingraham, Betsey H. (Clark) Savary, Elizabeth (Brown) Billings, Sarah (Howard) Smith, Emeline Smith, Marcia (Page) Dutton, Abigail Dutton, Sophia (Dutton) Godfrey, Mary D. Godfrey, George W. Pickering, Hannah (Nevers) Crosby, Sabra (Warren) Bailey, Sarah R. (Edes) Rider, Electa (Beaman) Lancey, Mary (Porter) Webster, Mary (Allen) Webster, Sarah Holland.

At a meeting of these individuals November 29, a Council was called, to meet December 5, in the vestry of the new meeting-house which had already been built; and a committee was appointed to prepare articles of faith and covenant. This Council was composed of the First church in Bangor, First and Second churches in Brewer, the Congregational churches in Bucksport, Hampden, and Orono, and Rev. Messrs. Jotham Sewall, John Sawyer, Enoch Pond, and Alvan Bond. The Council agreed to the organization of the church, and a public meeting was held for that purpose in the meeting-house of the First church. A call was given, March 21, 1834, to Rev. John Maltby, of Sutton, Massachusetts, to become the pastor, and it was accepted, and he was installed July 23, 1834. The meeting-house, built of brick, was dedicated the same day. In 1853 the walls of this first house were raised and lengthened; and a spire took the place of the two towers and the whole interior of the house was refitted, including new pews, organ, pastor's study, and vestries. Services of re-dedication were held February 17, 1854.

During Mr. Maltby's ministry, twenty-six years, 578 were received to the church, 322 by profession, 256 by letter. He died while absent from home, at Worcester, Massachusetts, May 15, 1860, at the age of sixty-five.

The second pastor, Rev. Edwin Johnson, was installed October 16, 1861. Having received a call from the Congregational church in Baltimore, Maryland, which was accepted, he was dismissed by Council November 7, 1865. Fifty-three were added to the church during his ministry, 29 by profession, and 24 by letter.

The third and present pastor, Rev. Solomon P. Fay, was installed November 9, 1866.

This church has enjoyed eight special revival seasons since its formation.

The whole number of members received to this church since its organization, to December, 1870, is 869; by letter, 431; by profession, 438; dismissed to other churches, 356; deceased, 168; excluded, 24. The number of baptisms, 410—children, 243; adults, 167.

The total amount of collections for the various benevolent objects of the church, to December, 1870, is $49,170.

In 1847 the Central church in Bangor was organized, to which 23 members of Hammond Street church were dismissed in the first six years of its organization.

The Hammond Street Sabbath-school was organized December 5, 1833. Five hundred and twenty teachers and 4,365 pupils have been connected with the school. It has had 12 superintendents and 12 secretaries.

The church has been represented in 72 Ecclesiastical Councils for the ordination and installation of pastors; in 16 for the ordination of missionaries and evangelists; in 40 for the dismissal of ministers; in 15 for the organization of churches; in 9 convened in cases of difficulty in churches.

Ten members of this church were ordained ministers when they became connected with it; 37 have been ordained since uniting with this church, seven of whom were children of the church, and the others were members of the Theological Seminary; seven of these have been ordained missionaries to foreign lands.

There has been a Maternal Association which has met the first Wednesday afternoon of each month since 1834. Also a female prayer meeting which has been held every Saturday afternoon since the church was organized.

The Rev. Dr. Enoch Pond, President of the Theological Seminary, in his sermon at the funeral of the Rev. Mr. Maltby, indulged in the following strain of eulogy:

To those who have been under the ministry of Mr. Maltby a quarter of a century, or more, it may seem superfluous that I should say aught as to the character of his preaching; and yet I may be indulged in a few remarks. Mr. Maltby was decidedly popular as a preacher, in the earlier part of his ministerial life, as is evident from his repeated and favorable calls to a settlement. And yet my impression is that he was constantly growing as a preacher, and that he continued to grow, even to the last year of his life. This was the natural result of his habits of study, and of close observation and experience. His sermons have been less wordy and metaphysical than formerly. They have been more condensed, more simple, direct, and practical, and for that reason the more pungent and impressive.

Mr. Maltby's best efforts as a preacher have been at home among his own people. He has been called often to preach abroad upon great public occasions, and has always acquitted himself satisfactorily. And yet, owing to a native modesty and diffidence, or to some other cause, he has never appeared so well abroad as at home. You, my brethren of this church and congregation, who have been accustomed to hear him from Sabbath to Sabbath,—you best know his value as a preacher, and you know that for clear and fervid presentations of Divine truth, for earnest and glowing appeals to the conscience and the heart, and for a thrilling, startling eloquence, enough often almost to take us from our seats, our pastor has rarely, if ever, been excelled. I have heard a great many preachers in my day, and among them some of the most distinguished preachers in the land, but I have never heard a more stirring, effective dispensation of Divine truth anywhere than I have often heard in this house, and from the lips of our late pastor.

But Mr. Maltby's great excellence as a minister, after all, was not in his pulpit performances. He was a most watchful, faithful, devoted pastor. He had those qualities of mind and heart which best fitted him to be a pastor,—kindness, gentleness, benevolence, sympathy,—and all these associated with intelligence and judgment, and with a solemn sense of responsibility, as a watchman for souls. As a shepherd he tenderly cared for his flock, and for all of them; the old and the young, the rich and the poor, the honored and the despised. He watched for the spiritual interests of his people, and suffered no inquiring, desponding soul, whether saint or sinner, of which he had any knowledge, to be neglected. He sought out the sick and the afflicted, visited them, and remembered them in his prayers. How often have we heard him, in our public meetings and on the Sabbath, praying for the afflicted among his people, with a particularity and an earnestness which showed how deeply he was interested for them. Only a few Sabbaths ago,—the last time that he ever stood in his desk, and when he was too feeble to stand here at all,—he offered up one of these remarkable prayers.

In his visits among the people Mr. Maltby sought, not only a social, but a spiritual acquaintance with them,—with their difficulties, their fears, their conflicts,—that he might the more skillfully dispense to them the word of life, and give to every one his portion of meat in due season. For the youth of his flock he felt a very special interest, and missed no opportunity to enlist them on the side of virtue and religion. How often did we see him in the Sabbath-school, standing up as a father in the midst of his children, encouraging the teachers, and pointing the pupils in the way to heaven.

Deacon Duren kindly supplies the additional notes:

The successful pastorate of Rev. John Maltby, its first pastor, continuing twenty-six years, closed by his lamented death, May 15, 1860. Five hundred and forty-eight had during that time been added to the membership of the church—three hundred and twenty-two on confession of their faith, and two hundred and fifty-six by letter from other churches.

While without a pastor the pulpit was supplied for several months by Rev. Henry Storer, of Searboro; Rev. H. Q. Butterfield, now President of Olivet College, Michigan; by Professors George Shepard and Samuel Harris, of Bangor Theological Seminary, and for shorter periods by others; while Dr. Pond, who has been the friend and helper of the church since its organization, was ever ready to supply the pulpit, attend social meetings, and perform needed pastoral labor.

The second pastor, Rev. Edwin Johnson, was installed pastor October 16, 1861. Sermon by Rev. George Leon Walker, of Portland; installing prayer, Dr. Pond; charge, Rev. Prof. S. Harris, D. D.; right-hand, Rev. E. W. Gilman, of the First church, Bangor; address to the people, Prof. George Shepard, D. D. Having received a call to the Congregational church, Baltimore, Maryland, which he accepted, he was dismissed by Council, November 7, 1865. Fifty-three were added to the church during his ministry—twenty-nine on confession of faith and twenty-four by letter. Mr. Johnson graduated at Yale, 1846; Yale Theological Seminary, 1850; was pastor of the First church, Jacksonville, Illinois, 1851-57; of Bowdoin street church, Boston, 1857-61. He has been pastor at Baltimore, Maryland, and Bridgeport, Connecticut, and is now resident at Morrisania, New York, and in charge of a young ladies' high school.

In November, 1865, a call was extended to Rev. John S. Sewall, now Professor in the Theological Seminary, and in April, 1866, to Rev. Samuel H. Lee, now of Oberlin, Ohio, to the pastorate; both of which were declined.

The third pastor, Rev. Solomon Payson Fay, was installed November 9, 1866. Sermon by Rev. Alexander McKenzie, of Augusta; installing prayer, Rev. Dr. Harris, of the Theological Seminary, Bangor; charge, Rev. L. S. Rowland, of First church, Bangor; right-hand, Rev. G. W. Field, of the Central church, Bangor; address to people, Rev. Smith Baker, of Orono. During his ministry three hundred and two were added to the membership of the church—one hundred and eighty on confession of faith and one hundred and twenty-two by letter. Mr. Fay graduated at Marietta College, Ohio, 1844; Andover Seminary, 1847; pastor at Hampton, New Hampshire, 1844-54; Congregational church, Dayton, Ohio, 1854-59; agent American Tract Society, Boston, 1860-61; pastor Congregational church, Fall River, Massachusetts, 1861-63; supplied Salem Street church, Boston, 1863-65. He was dismissed by Council from this church December 19, 1879. He has supplied for about a year the Village church, Dorchester, Massachusetts, and was installed its pastor November 2, 1881.

While without a pastor since 1879, the pulpit has been supplied by Rev. Charles L. Mills sixteen Sabbaths; Rev. William Greenwood, eight; Rev. E. C. Winslow, four; Rev. C. Wallace, D. D., nine (each of whom added more or less pastoral work); supplied also by Professors in the Theological Seminary thirty-three Sabbaths, and by others from one to three Sabbaths each.

On the 24th of October, 1881, the church and society by a joint committee appointed by them extended a call to Rev. Henry L. Griffin, of New Britain, Connecticut, and a graduate of Yale College, to be their pastor. The call was accepted, and Mr. Griffin shortly after entered upon his duties.

The whole number of members received into this church to the present time, November, 1881, is 1,079; by letter, 497; by profession, 582; dismissed to other churches, 472; deceased, 238; excluded, 23—making the present number 346. Of these are resident members, 272; non-resident, 74. The smallest number in any year was 73 the first year; 127 the second year; the largest number was 388; average for the forty-eight years, 304. Of the number who constituted the church in 1833 (65 members) only three remain. The native place of 696 members was Maine; New England States (165 of them in Massachusetts), 279; Middle and Western States, 33; foreign lands, 71; total, 1,079.

The annual meeting of the church is held on the last Wednesday in December, when the history of the church for the year, the amount of its benevolent contributions, letters and reports from non-resident members, in memoriam of deceased members, etc., is presented.

The amount of contributions for benevolent purposes for the forty-eight years is $63,112. From 1878 the weekly system of giving in envelopes, has been adopted.

The church has sent delegates to the annual and semi-annual meetings of the Penobscot Conference of Congregational churches. It has been represented in 93 councils for the ordination and installation of pastors; in 21 for the ordination of missionaries or evangelists; in 54 for the dismissal of ministers; in 16 for the organization of churches; in 11 convened in cases of difficulties in churches.

The church edifice was built of brick in 1833, and dedicated July 23, 1834. Sermon by Rev. John Maltby, pastor-elect, who was installed in the afternoon of the same day. In 1850 a neat chapel was built in the rear of the church edifice, which was occupied instead of the damp vestries in the basement, until the meeting-house was remodeled in 1853. The walls were then raised and lengthened; a spire took the place of the two towers, and the whole interior of the house was refitted, including new pews, organ, pastor's study, and vestries. Services of re-dedication were held February 17, 1854. Sermon by the pastor, Rev. John Maltby; dedicatory prayer, Rev. G. B. Little, of the First Church. In 1875, the interior of the audience-room was re-painted and frescoed, at an expense of $700. During the three months it occupied, services were held in the vestry. On the 10th of October the house was re-opened with appropriate services.

The following is a list of the officers of the society:

Moderators—John Godfrey, at the first meeting 1832-33; also in 1845-47-49; T. A. Hill, 1834; W. D. Williamson, 1835-38, 1840-41; James McGaw, 1839; G. Wheelwright, 1842-44; Otis Small, 1846; Walter Brown, 1850-52; J. T. K. Haywood, 1853; W. H. Mills, 1854-57-61-63-66; G. W. Pickering, 1858; J. L. Hodgdon, 1859-60; Charles Hayward, 1862-64-79; A. Noyes, 1865-67-70-74-76; D. Wheeler, 1871-72; W. Mann, 1873-77; William Flowers, 1875; T. W. Vose, 1878-80; E. Neally, 1881.

Clerks.—W. Thurston, 1833-36; Charles H. Hammond, 1837; Charles Godfrey, in 1838; Henry Dutton, 1839-44; Joel Hills, 1845-46; R. Potter, 1847-49, '59-62; Z. S. Patten, 1850-52; E. A. Upton, 1853; H. A. Butler, 1854-55; G. H. Starrett, 1856-58; J. H. Perkins, 1865-67; J. N. Chandler, 1868-69; E. B. Nealley, 1870-76; J. F. Kimball, 1877-78; G. S. Dole from 1879.

Treasurers.—George Starrett, 1833-36; J. A. Poor, 1837; J. McDonald, 1838; E. F. Duren, 1839-45; W. H. Mills, 1846-48; J. Chapman, 1849; J. E. Littlefield, 1850-74; A. L. Bourne, from 1875.

Officers of the Church.—Deacons—George W. Brown, 1833 to his death in 1850; George Starrett, 1833 to his death in 1837; Zebulon Smith, 1837-46; J. E. Littlefield, 1840 to his death in 1876; E. F. Duren, 1840-45, and 1854 to the present time; J. McDonald, 1846-47; J. S. Wheelwright, 1847-53; J. McGaw, 1850-54; E. D. Godfrey, 1850-53; S. D. Thurston, from 1863; J. T. Tewksbury, 1863 to his death in 1872; A. L. Bourne, from 1873; William P. Anderson, 1873-74; George Webster, from 1873.

Scribes—William Davenport, 1833-35; J. E. Littlefield, 1835-40; E. F. Duren, 1840-42-43-45; R. Potter, 1842-43-46-47-48-50; E. Valentine, 1845-46, and December, 1850-51; J. A. Hatch, 1847-48; E. D. Godfrey, 1851-52; J. S. Johnson, 1852-53; E. F. Duren, from 1853 to this time.

In addition to the Parish Circle and Literary Club, the ladies have special organizations. A Missionary Society was formed by them in 1835; Dorcas Society in 1847—both of which are now merged in the Missionary Circle. A Tract Society was organized in May, 1865; Maternal Association in 1834. Prayer meeting Saturday afternoons. The Bangor Rill is a missionary organization for the children of the Sabbath-school. All arms of the church are quite efficient.

The Sabbath-school was organized December 5, 1833. Six hundred teachers and five thousand pupils have been connected with it.

Superintendents.—George W. Brown and George Starrett, 1833-35; John M. Prince, 1836-37; John McDonald, 1838; Louis Turner, 1839; Frederick Lambert, 1840-41; Charles Godfrey, 1846-54; W. H. Mills, 1855-58; S. D. Thurston, 1859-62; E. F. Duren, 1863-71; A. L. Bourne, 1872; George Webster, 1873-76; J. M. Daggett, from 1877. Mary B. Allen, Assistant Superintendent juvenile department, 1872-78; Mrs. J. A. Kimball, from 1878.

Secretaries.—William Davenport, 1833-34; S. P. Dutton, 1835; E. F. Duren, 1836-41, and 1843; J. E. Littlefield, 1842; John M. Prince, Jr., 1844; Henry S. Brown, 1845-46; John B. Foster, 1847 and 1854; W. H. Mills, 1848-49; J. A. Hatch, 1850; E. F. Duren, 1852-59; J. H. Perkins, 1860-62-63; A. L. Bourne, 1861; W. E. Mann, 1864-66; Charles M. Griffin, 1867-69; George Webster, 1870-72; S. Alden, 1873; John F. Kimball, 1874-79-80; John H. Kerr, 1875-78; John H. Dole, from 1881.

THE CENTRAL CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH.

In the early part of 1847 the subject of the formation of a new Congregational society began to exercise the minds of members of the churches of that faith in Bangor, and several informal meetings for discussion were held. On the 23d of January, under the State law, an application was duly made to John E. Godfrey, Esq., a justice of the peace in this city, looking to the incorporation of the Central Congregational Society of Bangor. This was signed by Messrs. Eliashib Adams, John McDonald, William G. Hardy, W. S. Dennett, Charles W. Jenkins, Asa Walker, Romulus Haskins, Bradford Hallow, John Barker, A. H. Roberts, James Allen, Joel Hill, William Hall, and R. Thurston.

In pursuance of the preliminary proceedings, the society was fully organized at a meeting held February 2, 1847. Deacon E. Adams was elected Moderator, and Mr. Asa Walker Clerk. Messrs. John McDonald, Charles W. Jenkins, and Romulus Haskins, were elected Assessors, and likewise appointed Parish Committee for the year. Deacon James Allen was made Treasurer and Collector. Deacon Adams was chosen Auditor. It was voted that any person might become a member, for the time being, under the approval of the Parish Committee, by entering his name for that purpose in the parish books. The committee was instructed to procure, as soon as may be, a suitable place for holding a separate meeting, and to procure preaching for such a meeting. The hall in the new market-house was accordingly secured, and the earlier services of the church were held here. Some ineffectual attempts were made during the next four or five years to purchase or lease a lot and erect a house of worship; and, at the fifth annual meeting of the society, held March 15, 1852, it was resolved, "that the present prospect of success is not, in our judgment, sufficient to warrant the continuance of our labors, and that, in effect, the further maintenance of public worship in that place must rest with the other Congregational churches of the city." A committee was appointed to present the resolutions to the other societies, which in due time reported as the sense of those bodies that "the Central Congregational Church Society ought to be sustained," and "that said church and society ought to have and must have a house of worship, and that we will help them to erect it." Invigorated by this encouragement, a new committee, consisting of Messrs. Joseph S. Wheelwright, Charles W. Jenkins, Romulus Haskins, Carlostin Jewett, and Henry S. Brown, was appointed to make fresh inquiries relative to the purchase of a lot, and it was also authorized to employ an architect to make a plan for a meeting-house. Upon their report a vote was taken in favor of purchasing the lot on Exchange street owned by Mrs. Mitchell and others, and the committee was instructed to obtain subscriptions for its purchase. It was soon afterward voted to buy instead one or two lots on Freuch street, owned by Mr. Nathaniel Lord, where the church building now stands; although the committee was presently given the option of purchasing either the southern part of these or the lot first named. The committee on lots was made a building committee, with J. S. Wheelwright as chairman, and instructed to procure the requisite plans and advertise for proposals for the erection of the edifice, as soon as the subscriptions should amount to $9,000. They met with good success in the procurement of subscriptions; the property on French street was purchased; and the erection of the house now occupied for worship by the society went rapidly forward.

A somewhat unique resolution was passed March 14, 1853, "that the Parish Committee be authorized, if they see fit, to engage some person deemed competent to teach a singing-school in connection, or otherwise, with the other Congregational societies, for the benefit of our singing, and to pay the expense out of the contingent fund." Some years afterwards another vote was passed, "that, when we adopt the new books, the congregation be respectfully requested to unite with the choir in singing all the hymns."

By 1853 the membership of the Parish had increased to forty. Twenty-five were added at one vote March 23, 1863. March 12, 1878, the number who had been or were members to that time was 112.

March 28, 1859, the use of the meeting-house was offered to the First Parish, while the church building belonging to the latter was in course of repair.

March 23, 1874, a debt incurred by the Sabbath-school, to the amount of $300, was assumed by the Parish.

The first preacher to the church was Professor George Shepard, D. D., of the Theological Seminary, who served the society very acceptably and ably for sixteen years, resigning his acting pastorate at last March 23, 1863. He received at various times from $800 to $1,000 per year for his services. Resolutions of cordial appreciation, and a memorial from the ladies of the parish, were presented to him upon his retirement.

The Rev. George W. Field, of Boston, was called to the pastorate April 4, 1863, and accepted, at a salary of $1,500 per year, which was increased to $1,800 at the annual meeting of 1865, in 1867 to $2,500, with the grant of six weeks' vacation every year, and in 1872 to $2,720. It was maintained at the latter rate until 1879, when it was reduced by $250, and has since been kept at $2,500. Mr. Field is still serving the society with great efficiency and success.

INDEPENDENT CONGREGATIONAL (UNITARIAN) CHURCH.*

The origin of our society as a liberal organization dates back to a time prior to the birth of Unitarianism in America. As you probably know, although the new leaven of liberal thought had been for a long time perceptibly working in the older settlements of New England, notably Boston and vicinity, rending almost every parish and village with fierce theological controversy, it was not until Dr. Channing's famous sermon was preached at the ordination of Mr. Sparks in Baltimore, in 1819, that the real break occurred, and that the Unitarian church of America came into a recognized, and we might say a then abhorred existence. Just one year previous to this open rupture between the two antagonistic schools of thought,—that is, in 1818,—we find from the record that the prevailing restlessness and dissatisfaction with the old order of things had reached the remote settlement of Bangor, and it took the form of a secession from the only Congregational church existing in the place.

Contrary to the usual course of things in Massachusetts, where in very many cases the liberal party outnumbered their opponents, forced them to secede, and retained the church property, here the little band of liberal thinkers became exiles from their old religious home. The conflict which preceded their exile seems to have been a bitter one, in which theological controversy ran high, and the odium theologicum was intense.

The aim of the other party seems to have been the establishment of a religious test, doubtless with the idea of bringing about the exclusion of the new thought and its adherents. Against this thoroughly un-Protestant proceeding the real Protestants rebelled, and finding themselves in a minority, withdrew. With what feeling this was done, you may gather from the record. Not with the intent to revive old feuds, nor recall painful recollections, but simply to give an idea of the prevailing spirit and temper of that time of eager controversy, in the heat of which doubtless many things which never should have been uttered, were said upon both sides, I will quote the original bond of association:

WHEREAS, the peace and good order of society depend in a great measure upon the harmony existing between the various denominations of religious people; and whereas, it is provided by the constitution of this Commonwealth that there shall be no subordination of one religious sect or denomination to another; and whereas, in our opinion, the sentiments and conduct of the present Congregational Society in the town of Bangor are uncharitable, intolerant, and oppressive, tending to establish a religious test and to destroy that quiet, peace, and harmony which is of essential importance to the well-being of mankind; therefore we whose names are undersigned, desirous of preventing the evils which necessarily result from the conduct above mentioned, and of promoting religion upon consistent and liberal principles, do hereby agree to form ourselves into a society to be called the Independent Congregational Society of Bangor.

To this remarkable bond of association there were signed twenty-one names, many of which were the names of men who, by the weight of their character, their public spirit, and business integrity, stood high in the estimation of their townsmen, and gave a decided impress to that spirit of individuality and sturdy common sense which our community in an eminent degree still retains.*

The new society, homeless and feeble, evidently had a hard struggle for existence. For five years there are on record but two important business meetings, held respectively at the houses of Joseph R. Lumbert and Wiggins Hill. At the latter three new members were admitted, who signed a paper agreeing to unite themselves to the Independent Congregational Society for the support of the rational doctrines of liberal Christianity.

In 1823 the society seems to have attained the dignity of a regular parish, as there appears the first formal call for a parish meeting at the Court-house, now the City Hall, where Sunday services were occasionally held, that place having been the early home of every religious society in the city.

*Extract from a sermon preached in the fall of 1877, by the Rev. A. M. Knapp. Most kindly copied and furnished by Thomas W. Baldwin, Esq.

* The association was formed March 25, 1818.

During the first fifteen or twenty years of its existence, though there was no rapid increase in numbers, the accessions to the society were for the most part men of even more sterling worth, of even more influence and standing, than the original twenty-one, some of whom could not remain under the odium which attached to the new organization.

In 1824 a committee was chosen to provide a house for worship. But how poorly provided the society was for such a pecuniary burden may be gathered from the fact that in that year the sum appropriated for the support of the ministry was $120. The next year the sum was doubled, and for quite a number of years thereafter there was a steady increase, until the salary voted indicated what was in those times positive affluence.

There is no mention of any step taken toward building until, in 1827, a part of the present lot of land was given to the society by Isaac Davenport, for the erection of a brick church. This was a doubly acceptable gift, providing, it would seem, not only the land, but also the impetus needed; for in two years more, in 1829, the church was completed, which, singularly enough, though it fronted on Main street, was always known by the name of the Union Street Brick Church, that being also the name by which the corporation called itself. The confusion which might result from the use of the two names, "Independent Congregational Society" and "Union Street Brick Church," the former being an unincorporated body, was in 1852 remedied by a new incorporation under the first name, the two old associations deeding to the new all the property held under their respective names.

The so-called Union Street Brick Church was a plain, commodious structure, the largest and finest then in the city. It was dedicated September 3, 1829, by services in which Rev. Mr. Huntoon, of Canton, Massachusetts, and Rev. Mr. Frothingham, of Belfast, took part.

The call to a minister to settle with the new society followed close upon the completion of the church. On the 7th of November it was unanimously voted to extend a call to the Rev. Benjamin Huntoon, of Canton, Massachusetts.

Mr. Huntoon remained pastor four years, administering his office and performing his duties to the satisfaction of all, and endearing himself to all by his kindly ways. He resigned, in 1833, on account of ill health.

The pulpit now remained vacant for two years, the usual difference of opinion in an independent society manifesting itself in regard to candidates, until in 1835 a call was given to Mr. Frederic H. Hedge, of Cambridge, a young man of thirty.

During the fifteen years of Dr. Hedge's ministry the growth and prosperity of the society seem to have culminated. In numbers, wealth, and influence it was a power in the community. Though under him the strength and prosperity of the society culminated, yet also under him it saw its period of greatest depression. It was in his pastoral that the great bubble of speculation burst, and financial ruin came upon almost every family in the city.

In 1847 Dr. Hedge obtained leave of absence for a year, for the purpose of visiting Europe. In the following year, extensive repairs being made upon the church, the Universalist society offered the use of their house, an offer which was gratefully accepted, and as a mark of appreciation of the kindness, a clock was presented to our hospitable neighbors. Two years after the pastor's return from Europe, in the fifteenth year of his ministry, he received and accepted a call from the Westminster society in Providence, Rhode Island, and his resignation followed, his people parting from him with the deepest regret, and with many expressions of their love and appreciation.

Only six months intervened before a call was given to Rev. Joseph H. Allen, of Washington, D. C., then a young man of thirty. His pastorate continued six years. In him the scholarly tone of thought and life given by his predecessor was continued; and the society, having recovered in some degree from its financial embarrassments, continued as prosperous and successful as could be expected. Its prosperity, however, received another most severe check in the total destruction of the church by fire on the morning of Sunday, November 30, 1851. Only the communion service, part of the pew furniture, the pulpit, and the Sunday-school library, were saved from the wreck.

From the many proffers of use of churches, the society deemed it best to accept that of their old friends, the Universalists, with whom they were then and have ever been in the pleasantest relations.

The misfortune under which they labored, there being no insurance on the property destroyed, was not permitted to discourage the people. With characteristic energy, measures were immediately taken to rebuild. A building committee was chosen, the lot was greatly enlarged by the purchase of more land, and in September of 1853, about twenty months after the destruction of the former church, the present exquisitely proportioned and beautiful edifice was finished, and furnished with a taste and judgment which in those days had not been excelled.

No very heavy debt was incurred, and in the whole history of the society there has been no stain upon its financial honor; it seems never to have been burdened with any debt which it was not within its power, with very slight effort, to liquidate. Generous liberality seems to have marked the course of its prominent members, thus showing that they kept true to the original articles of association, which declared for religion upon consistent and liberal principles.

In May, 1857, closed Mr. Allen's pastorate, after seven years of the untiring labor and devoted zeal which have ever marked his character and services.

After two more years of the dreary experience of hearing candidates, and after an unsuccessful call to the Rev. Mr. Frothingham, of Portland, the society heard with such great satisfaction the very youngest sermons of Mr. C. C. Everett, then a young man of thirty, a student in the Cambridge Divinity School, that, he not being able to consider a call while connected with the school, they waited nearly half a year for his release, and then had the fortune to secure as their pastor one who, besides giving them for ten years the blessing of faithful and devoted service and valued friendship, has also won for himself a world-wide reputation among scholars and men of letters, for work which is destined to live with ever increasing influence — work, too, performed under every possible discouragement and physical disability. The relation of pastor and people was so thoroughly harmonious that nothing but his appointment to a professorship at Harvard could, in all probability, have sufficed to sever the bond.

After the resignation of Mr. Everett, with that extraordinary disposition which the society has constantly exhibited to repeat its history, an interval of two years of candidating elapsed, until in September, 1871, your present pastor (Rev. Arthur May Knapp), then a young man of thirty, was called.

Mr. Baldwin adds a note to bring the history from the time of Mr. Knapp's pastorate to the present :

In February, 1874, Mr. Knapp asked for a leave of absence for six months on account of ill health, which time he spent in traveling in Europe.

In the summer of 1877 extensive repairs were made on the interior of the church, and at the opening of the church after their completion, Rev. Mr. Knapp preached the sermon from which the foregoing extract is taken. In February, 1879, he closed his pastorate.

In February, 1880, Rev. S. J. Stewart, of Fitchburg, Massachusetts, was called to fill the pulpit for one year; and so great satisfaction did he give that in November, 1880, a permanent call was given him, which he accepted.

WEST BANGOR CHAPEL (CONGREGATIONAL).*

In 1833, when the village was known as Barkerville, some who believed that here was one of the by-ways where their Master would have them go, to invite people to the gospel-feast, held meetings in the school-house, which was then located on the Webster road, near the corner of Lincoln street. The members of the Theological Seminary took an active part in the work; among them Rev. Dr. Hamlin, afterwards a prominent missionary in Turkey; Revs. John D. Paris and Elias Bond, missionaries at the Sandwich Islands, and Rev. George F. Claffin, a missionary to Africa.

In 1848 two young men, members of Hammond Street society, afterwards active members of the church, J. Evarts Pond, and Henry W. Rice established a Sabbath school, which was the origin of the present school. It was held at first only from May to October, but for the last twenty-five years every Sabbath. In 1858 there was a regular organization of the school. Darius E. Adams, now a devoted pastor at Ashburnham, Massachusetts, was the first Superintendent; William G. Duren, Secretary, who has been connected with the school as teacher, Secretary, Manager, or Superintendent for twenty-five years, with unwearied devotion and constancy. Dennis C. Fink was its second Superintendent, afterward a faithful minister, who died in New Boston, New Hampshire, June 22, 1871, aged thirty-nine. Deacon S. D. Thurston and Deacon W. P. Anderson were Superintendents a few months each, the latter until he removed to Boston; Deacon A. L. Bourne, Superintendent five years: N. W. Littlefield from 1880. Teachers from Hammond Street and other churches, and the Seminary, have been present each Sabbath, and done good service.

The Sabbath-school and religious services were held in the school-house on Webster street, and in Allen Street school-house when that was built, in 1849, all in the neighborhood meeting together. In 1872-3 some opposition began to spring up, and the result was that a part of the time the Sabbath-school and meetings were held in private dwellings. All felt the need of having a Christian home. There were forty families represented, and there being no church edifice in the vicinity, many were unable to attend public worship, and the school-house was not large or convenient enough to accommodate all who desired to.

Accordingly the present neat chapel was built in 1873-4, and dedicated April 2, 1874, Professor Barbour, and Dr. Pond, of the Seminary, Rev. G. W. Field, Rev. S. P. Fay, and Rev. J. E. Pond, of the Congregational churches, Rev. Dr. Butler, of the Baptist church, and Rev. A. Prince, of the Methodist church, taking part in the service. A hymn was written for the occasion by Mrs. J. E. Littlefield, and a poem by Mrs. D. M. Dunham. Mr. and Mrs. Dunham, Mr. and Mrs. H. Doughty, Mr. and Mrs. William G. Duren, with efficient helpers, took a leading interest in the work. Much of the material was donated and money contributed by friends, and nearly every one in the vicinity gave a portion of their services to aid in building. The lot was paid for by three gentlemen respectively connected with the three Congregational churches of Bangor, and they were appointed trustees of the property (though the enterprise was not considered denominational).

The changes which have been wrought in the general condition of that part of the city bear testimony to the influence of the efforts to promote its moral and religious interests. There is a change in its outward appearance. There is thrift and order and quiet where there were once shiftlessness, disorder, and confusion.

The West Bangor Chapel Association was organized June 5, 1880, and by-laws were adopted. The following are the officers: Rev. J. E. Adams, Deacon A. L. Bourne, James A. Dole, Charles E. Seeland, Edward H. Bailey, Standing Committee; William G. Duren, Secretary; Pierre McConville, Treasurer; E. F. Duren, Auditor.

CROSBYVILLE CHAPEL.

A missionary enterprise, conducted as an undenominational effort, but in which the Congregationalists of the city took chief interest, has been undertaken of late years in that quarter known as "Crosbyville," on the Hampden road, below the City Farm. It culminated in the latter part of 1881, in the erection of a neat chapel for public worship—a building very creditable to the neighborhood, and one which gives promise of the organization therein, at no distant day, of a flourishing religious society.

* By Deacon Elnathan F. Duren.

FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH.*

Nine persons, members of the Baptist churches, had become residents of Bangor, who, in their private dwellings, were often together for prayer; occasionally enjoying a communion season with the church in Hampden, of which they became members - but chiefly attending upon the preaching of the town minister, of course, if, as provident men, they looked for any benefit from their religious money, which was legally claimed for his support.

In December, 1817, the Rev. Isaac Case, on a missionary tour, visited these brethren, and baptized two persons, Edward Sargent and Sarah Randall, supposed by some to be the first persons baptized in town. Resulting from that visit was the appointment of a meeting for the organization of a church.

Accordingly, on the afternoon of the 25th of January, 1818, a few neighbors were seen quietly gathering in a room then occupied by Thomas Bradbury, in a house owned by a Mr. Seward, in the rear of the present Penobscot Exchange, which was the service which we now commemorate. The presiding officer was the venerable Elder Buck, of Orland; Nathaniel Parker, of Hampden, was clerk; and Elders Dexter, of China, Case of Readfield, and Ruggles, of Carmel, with deacons from distant churches, sat in council with them. Before them sat eleven disciples, meeting a singular embarrassment at the very threshold of their undertaking. Unfortunately their letters of dismission, expected from distant churches, had not arrived; and, therefore, in apostolic independence of all ecclesiastical authority (perhaps the most distinctive principle of their denomination), it was decided that each should give an account of personal religious experience, and that they should be recognized as a church, if satisfactory evidence was given to the council, and to one another, of a special work of grace in their hearts.

Satisfactory evidence having been obtained of the conversion of those professed disciples, all stood in a circle with joined hands, as the covenant was read, when Elder Case exhorted them to faithfulness in the Christian walk, and then commended to God in prayer the little household, thus in primitive simplicity organized, which ventured to assume a name as the Baptist Church of Bangor, and to open its apparently uninviting door for the welcome of heaven-bound pilgrims. The organization having been completed, Mr. Nathan Fiske immediately presented himself as a candidate for membership, and on the following Sabbath was baptized; after which the little band, just equal in number to that with the Master when the sacred rite was instituted, assembled for the first time around the table of the Lord.

Popular prejudice still remained, hardly credible now; which, happily, none of any sect would countenance at the present time, for which none now living are accountable. Quite difficult for us to believe the fact that here, at that time, a man who otherwise would have had urged upon him the honors of the community, was rudely pushed into the ditch on Sunday, because one coming from a Baptist meeting was not supposed to have any right to walk the same path with those of the standing order. And women are remembered who went with drooping heads and veiled faces, because to be known going to their place of worship was no slight humiliation.

And the pittance of money which they could spare for religious purposes being still expected for the support of the town minister, to provide for one of their own, and to obtain a respectable place of public worship, being utterly impossible,—we are quite certain that nothing less than most decided convictions of duty could have led that little church, in its penury, to venture out into the cold world, so like its Master, without where to shelter its head. From its birthplace it might have been followed, now to an old school house on State street; and now to a place once known as "Leavitt's Hall," near City Point, then known as "Budge's Point;" sometimes to a school-house on the hill opposite the First Parish church; sometimes to one on Union street; driven at times to an unfinished upper room in that private dwelling (so difficult of access) now standing nearly opposite the Hammond Street church; and at length to the old City Hall. When attempts had been made to obtain land on which to build, others of more ability immediately purchased it, to deprive them of any permanence.

In one year after the organization of the church, Rev. Otis Briggs was invited to the pastorate, which office he nominally filled about two years (somewhat longer, preaching a part of the time, while Preceptor of Hampden Academy), never having been installed, but referred to in the records as the "Elder" of the church. Mr. Briggs was a graduate of Brown University, of the class of 1808. He was ordained as pastor of the church in North Yarmouth, July 23, 1816, where he remained two years, and commenced his ministry here in the spring of 1819. He was afterwards pastor of the First Baptist church in Hampden eight years, and three years of the Second church in that town. In 1838 he was appointed agent of the American Baptist Home Mission Society, and on a journey in that service, after an illness of four days, during which he calmly closed his worldly affairs, sending affectionate messages to his family, and speaking of his hope in his Redeemer and his readiness to depart, he suddenly died at the house of a friend in South Carolina, October 1, 1842, aged fifty six years.

The records of the Maine Baptist Convention (which was organized in 1824) show that missionaries of its appointment preached here for a few weeks or months, at different times; among whom were William D. Grant, Ezra Going, H. B. Dodge, and Daniel Bartlett.

Thus the church pursued an uneven journey, with almost disheartening feebleness, till 1828, when there dawned one of the brightest, most memorable seasons in all its history. The singular faith and courage which seemed to prelude the new era may be suggested by the fact that land had at length been secured, and arrangements made for the erection of a sanctuary, the estimated cost of which was more than all the property of the members. The plans of that house were spoken of as indications of insanity. Days of fasting and prayer were of somewhat frequent occurrence. Unexpected and generous friends soon were found, prominent among whom were Messrs. N. R. Cobb, of Boston, and Nicholas Brown, of Providence. As a pleasing indication of more kindly popular feeling, it appears that Benjamin Bussey, Esq., of Boston, to whom the Selectmen of Bangor had presented a vote of thanks for his donation of a bell for the Congregational society in 1816, now (twelve years later) united with John P. Boyd in bestowing upon this society the same favor.

At a meeting of the Maine Baptist Convention in Thomaston, in October, 1827, the chairman of the committee to distribute the meagre domestic missionary funds, in a special plea for as large an appropriation as possible towards a missionary for Bangor, set forth the condition of this promising village in such an interesting manner that Deacon Joshua Adams, of Thomaston (or "Owl's Head," as the fathers would say), immediately arose and pledged the support of a missionary at Bangor for eight weeks. The Rev. J. S. Smith was found all ready for the service, even longing for it before it was proposed.

The place of baptism so frequently visited before the native banks of the Kenduskeag were changed into city wharves, was spoken of as near the hay scales on Exchange street, not far from the house where the church was organized.

The first regularly settled pastor was Rev. Thomas B. Ripley, who had been a pastor in Portland twelve years. He arrived in Bangor in season to preach the dedication sermon, the 16th of April, 1829, from the text, 1 Chron. 29: 3—"I have set my affection to the house of my God."

The interesting services of that occasion were participated in by Rev. Dr. Pomroy, of the First Parish church; Rev. Greenleaf Greeley, of the Methodist church; Rev. Mr. Briggs, of Hampden; and Professors Adams and Smith, of the Theological Seminary. The Bangor Register of that date said: "It was gratifying to witness the harmony which seemed to pervade the feelings of the different denominations; and it is believed the friends of religion had much enjoyment."

The installation of Mr. Ripley took place on the 10th of September, 1829, in connection with the fourth very interesting anniversary of the Penobscot Baptist Association which was held here;—the sermon being preached by Rev. Alonzo King, of North Yarmouth, from the text James 5: 20—"Let him know that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins."

The First Baptist Society was duly organized on the 17th of October, 1828, and during all the years since it has acted most efficiently and in perfect harmony with the church.

This was the period also when the Sunday-school, after fitful signs of life while following the hard fortunes of the church, came into vigorous action by the organization of a Sunday-school Society, as another co-ordinate and profitable branch of the service.

After five years of growth and consolidation, during which a book of hymns for social worship, the articles of faith, and church covenant (compiled by the pastor) were adopted, and nearly one hundred persons added to the church, the happy and successful pastorate of Mr. Ripley terminated in 1834.

On the 30th of September, in the same year, occurred the installation of Rev. Thomas Curtis, from England. The sermon on that occasion was preached by Rev. William Hague, of Boston. Dr. Curtis remained pastor about three years, during which time a very interesting revival was enjoyed and about seventy were added to the church.

In the spring of 1838 Rev. Adam Wilson was welcomed to another three-years pastorate—to be, after faithful preparatory work, an active participator in another of those heavenly refreshings never to be forgotten by those who shared its blessings, during which more than fifty were baptized and added to the church.

In the autumn of 1841 commenced the pastorate of Rev. Jeremiah Chaplin, from Hamilton, New York, during whose ministry, by the addition of goodly numbers, the church reached that interesting measure of strength and heroic purpose which constrained a colony of its enterprising sons and daughters to become the pioneers of the Second Baptist church in this city.

Early in 1846 the continued ill health of Dr. Chaplin made it necessary for the reluctant church to accept his resignation.

On the 27th of August, 1846, was another deeply interesting ordination and installation service in this house—when a sermon was preached by Rev. Dr. Sears, of Newton; a solemn prayer offered by Father Drinkwater; a hand of fellowship extended by Rev. Mr. Porter; an address by Rev. Mr. Granger—and thus commenced the twelve interesting years of ministry of Rev. Samuel L. Caldwell, D. D.

The next evening after the organization, and more than ten years before the installation of a pastor, Royal Clark was unanimously chosen the first deacon, who so honored that office forty years, till his death. Ten years after the first election Anthony Woodard was chosen; and at a meeting in Cram's Hall, by the laying on of hands was solemnly set apart to the office which, save for an intermission of about seven years, he held till 1868.

Samuel Garnsey, in 1848, allowed himself to be promoted from the society to become a standard-bearer in the church.

These veterans, esteemed for long and steady fidelity, for safe judgment, wisdom in council, and many years of watchful regard for Zion, have at length, in accordance with their own earnest wish, associated with them in office Arad Thompson, Alfred O. Stewart, and James M. Dickey.

The others, who for limited periods have served as deacons, have been I. Chamberlain, R. Talpey, Z. Rogers, and F. Shepherd.

This house, costing originally $10,000 and so much toil and sacrifice, has twice received thorough repairs; the first in 1835, when the lofty galleries, from their ancient sacred height, were brought in the region of common people below, and an organ, costing $1,000, was welcomed, which, after its excellent service of more than thirty years, has just been displaced by one costing less than $3,000.

Wearry with climbing to the attic vestry—situated in one particular, as some perhaps thought, too far toward heaven for earthly worshippers, and after years of trial finding the basement vestry as much too low—in 1852 the praying ones were very happy to enter the new chapel, built and furnished by the cheerful contributions of more than $2,000.

Four years later this house received its most complete and satisfactory refitting, when its entire interior was made anew, at an expense of about $5,300; at which time the most desirable arrangement was reached of having the pews all owned by the society—bringing to an end the perplexities about pew taxes and subscriptions—the money being since raised by those who only do themselves the kindness of securing a seat.

Professedly connected with it in the fellowship of the church, have been in all 767 members—not, of course, to remain together an unbroken family, but each in his place to stand as a soldier awaiting orders. Besides the colonies going out to North Bangor in 1842, and to the Second church in 1845, others have been continually pushing abroad from this spiritual home to distant cities and towns, in nearly all parts of the world.

Thus far Mr. Small. He came into the pastorate August 19, 1858, upon the retirement of the Rev. Mr. Caldwell. Most interesting anniversary services were observed January 25 and 26, 1868, at which were present ex-pastors Ripley, Wilson, Caldwell, and many other venerable children of the faith. Mr. Small's pastorate closed the same year, and he was succeeded in 1869 by the Rev. Francis T. Hazlewood, who is still (at the close of 1881) acceptably serving the church.

FIRST FREE BAPTIST CHURCH.*

Under the labors of Rev. John Lamb, of Brunswick, Maine, a church was organized in Bangor, in the City Hall, January 23, 1836, with twelve members, eight of whom were males. Rev. Silas Curtis, then of Augusta, and still living, assisted in the organization. Jotham Parsons was chosen Deacon, and John I. D. Sanford Clerk.

The church did not call a pastor, that not being usual with the denomination at that time, and within the year we find the names of Revs. J. W. Holman, Dexter Waterman, Samuel Hutchins, and Daniel Jackson as officiating in its ordinances, while eighteen were added to its membership.

In 1837 the church united with the Exeter Quarterly Meeting, at a session held in Charleston. In 1838 Ammi R. Bradbury, a member of the church, was ordained to the work of the ministry, and in 1839 another member, Moses M. Smart, was also ordained by the Quarterly Meeting, at Springfield.

These brethren, with Revs. A. Bridges, C. S. Pratt, M. Shepherd, K. R. Davis, and A. Caverno, constitute the more efficient list of ministers for the remaining years of the church's existence, the labors of the two latter being especially fruitful in additions to its membership.

Soon after its organization the church left the City Hall and worshiped in school-houses, using one on the corner of French and Cumberland streets for the most part, till May, 1841, when it returned to the City Hall for a season. Later in the year its public meetings were suspended for want of a place to hold them, but in April, 1842, the old Methodist meeting-house on Union street, near Pickering Square, was obtained, and there its wanderings ceased.

March 1, 1843, the First and Second Bangor, the First and Second Hermon, with the Oldtown, Argyle, and Carmel churches, united in the formation of what is known as the Bangor Quarterly Meeting, which was organized and held its first session with the First Bangor church. At this time and a little later, under the labors of Rev. A. Caverno, the church was more vigorous than at any other period in its existence, its membership reaching ninety-one.

But not far from this time the Millerite excitement made discouraging havoc among its members, and some disaffection with the pastor arose in 1844, which resulted in his resignation and commencing to hold separate meetings. This led to serious trials, the calling of a council whose decisions were unsatisfactory, and the final hopeless division of the church and loss of its visibility, its record terminating abruptly March 29, 1845.

But prior to this time eighteen members of the old church, who had been dismissed therefrom by letter, regarding its condition as hopeless, united in calling a Council consisting of Revs. John N. Rines, Moses Shepherd, and Jabez Fletcher, and Deacon Josiah Howe, which assembled at the meeting-house on the 28th of January, 1845, and organized them into what was then called the Summer Street Free Will Baptist Church. Ira Chamberlain was chosen Deacon, and J. M. Lougee, Clerk.

At the next regular meeting Hiram Skillin united by letter, and being ordained the 29th of May following, served the church for some time as its pastor. Within the year quite a number of the members of the defunct church united with this, and its growth was steady and vigorous.

Rev. H. Skillin left in September, 1846, and after a few weeks' supply by Rev. John Lord, Rev. Phillip Weaver became its pastor in May, 1847, and in July following the church united with the Unity Quarterly Meeting, with which it remained connected till June, 1879, when it withdrew and joined the Exeter Quarterly Meeting. The Bangor Quarterly Meeting subsequently became extinct.

In 1849 Daniel Lary and Jefferson Higgins were chosen deacons.

Upon date of August 31, 1849, we find this entry in the records: "The Asiatic cholera has made its appearance in this city." September 2 this appears: "On the Sabbath twenty-seven cases and seventeen deaths." On the 3d, "Brother George McClure fell a victim to this fatal disease after a sickness of twelve hours," and on the 14th, "Brother Samuel Norton died of cholera, after a sickness of six hours."

March 11, 1850, the name of the church was changed from "Summer Street" to "The Free Will Baptist Church of Bangor," and Edmund H. Fogg was chosen Clerk, a position which he held upwards of twenty years.

About this time a very comfortable but unwisely located house of worship was built on the corner of York and Pine streets. In October, 1854, Rev. Mr. Weaver closed his labors with the church, leaving it in a somewhat low and discouraged state, though his pastorate had been for the most part successful. No meetings were held during the winter following.

But in April, 1855, Rev. M. H. Tarbox, a young brother full of zeal, who had recently graduated from the Bangor Theological Seminary and knew the condition and wants of the church better than any one else, determined to devote himself to its interests, being most heartily co-operated with by some of its members. As a first step it was determined to arise and build in a more inviting locality, and a suitable site was secured on Essex street, near State. Into this work Mr. Tarbox entered with great energy, and as a result we read in the records of December 20, 1856: "Had opening exercises in the vestry of our new house of worship, on Essex street, and it was a time of rejoicing and thanksgiving to God."

This house was completed and dedicated to the worship of God at a session of the Unity Quarterly Meeting held therein December 2, 1859, and is the present house of worship of the church, being in good repair and amply sufficient for years to come.

Rev. Mr. Tarbox resigned in May, 1862, having labored faithfully and sacrificingly for a little more than seven years, and proved, under God, the most successful pastor the church ever had.

The names of Revs. C. S. Perkins and J. Mariner follow as supplies till December, when the church settled Rev. J. S. Burgess, who remained till October, 1865, when he accepted a call to Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

Rev. E. G. Chaddock supplied to good acceptance till July, 1866, when Rev. W. G. M. Stone, of Wisconsin, was called to the pastorate. He remained, however, but a year, and then accepted a call to Providence, Rhode Island, to be succeeded by Rev. S. E. Root, for a year, when the supply system was again invoked, first in Rev. A. P. Tracy, who did good work as long as he was able to remain, being in school; and then in one Thomas Cooper, a student in the Seminary, recently from England, and not a member of the denomination. This proved to be the most dark and trying period in the history of the church, which it came near concluding.

But in the summer of 1869 Rev. S. D. Church, a very devoted and able minister, was settled over the church, and it slowly began again to rise. The spring of 1871 witnessed some revival interest and the addition of several members.

Mr. Church remained till the spring of 1872, giving nearly three years of arduous labor to the pastorate, and was followed by another noble worker, Arthur Given, who was ordained over the church at its request, by the Unity Quarterly Meeting, December 6, 1872, and remained till February, 1875.

In April of this year S. C. Whitcomb, a young brother who had found the life that is in Christ in this church, and had completed a full course in the Bangor Theological Seminary, was dismissed from the church with its benediction to enter upon the work of the gospel ministry in other fields, he having been called to the pastorate of the Dover and Foxcroft Free Baptist Church.

About the same time Rev. James Boyd began his labors with the church, which were continued three and one-half years, closing in the autumn of 1878.

February, 1879, Rev. R. L. Howard, the present pastor, received a call from the church, and was settled over it. Its present outlook is encouraging and vigorous; its stated meetings of worship are well attended, and its Sabbath school flourishing. It has one member now in the Theological Seminary, in the middle year, who is a licentiate and preaching with good acceptance—George N. Howard, son of the pastor.

Among the many workers of the church, who have contributed largely to its permanence and success, the name of Deacon H. Fogg should be mentioned, who became connected with it early in 1845, and as Clerk, Deacon, and Sunday-school Superintendent, in person and purse, served it untiringly, till called from labors to rewards in August, 1877. The whole city, as well as the church, mourned his departure, and his memory is blessed.

The present officers of the church are F. O. Buzzell and H. J. Preble, deacons; H. J. Preble, Clerk; A. P. Chick, Sunday-school Superintendent, and O. S. Sands, Assistant Superintendent. Its present resident membership is one hundred, and non-resident sixty.

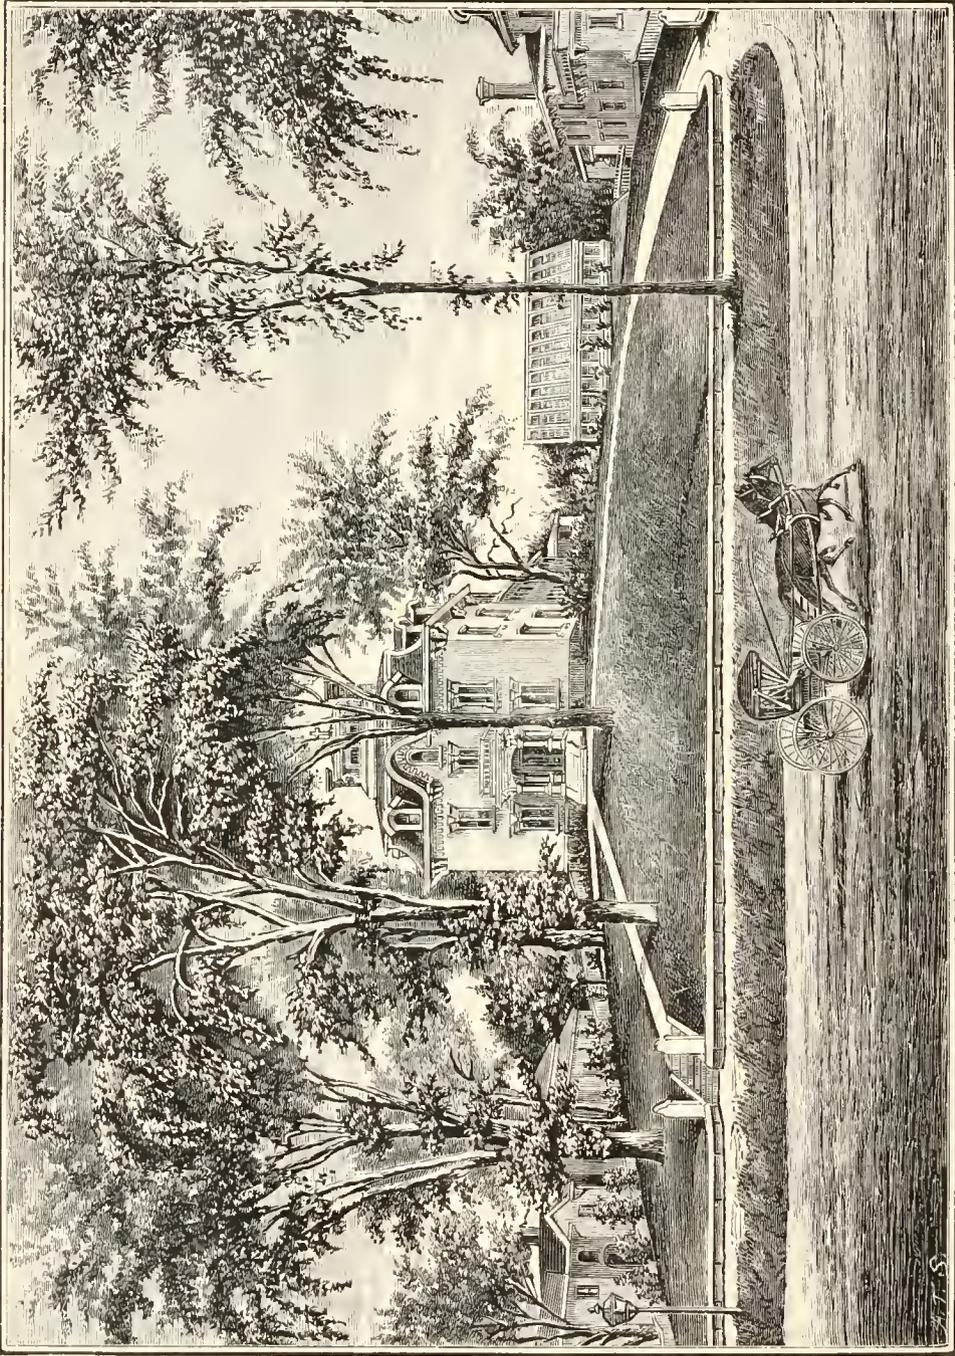

ST. JOHN'S (ROMAN CATHOLIC) PARISH.*

Some Catholic families settled in the town of Bangor at a very early period in its history. It is certain that as early as 1810 there were Catholics living in the town. In 1825 the Bishop of Boston, the Right Reverend Bishop Fenwick, visited the place and gave some of those beautiful exhortations which those who heard them never forgot. The Catholics of the town were visited from time to time by the priests of Oldtown, among others Rev. Virgil Barbour, a convert from the Protestant ministry to the Catholic Church. In December, 1828, James Conway celebrated the first mass in the town, for a small congregation, in the house of James Carr, on Court street, now the residence of Gorham L. Boynton. The following year a dwelling on Broad street was used temporarily as a place of worship. The same year a lot for a school was purchased on Court street.

In 1832 Rev. Patrick McNamee was permanently placed in charge. Rev. Michael Lynch succeeded him in 1836, and in the summer of the same year he commenced the erection of St. Michael's church on Court street, which was dedicated the following winter.

Rev. Father Lynch was succeeded by Rev. T. O'Sullivan, who took charge of the parish in December, 1839. He remained in charge for fourteen years. During his pastorate the number of the Catholic population increased so considerably that an enlargement of the church was necessary.

In 1853 Rev. John Bapst, S. J., was placed in charge of all the missions east of the Penobscot, with Bangor as his residence. Besides Bangor, he attended Winterport, Rockland, Thomaston, Ellsworth, Machias, Eastport, and other Catholic settlements of Eastern Maine. At this period Bangor had a Catholic population of six thousand, more than one-third of the whole population. A larger church was necessary. A lot on Broadway was purchased. It is an index of the bigotry of the time on the part of some that so much opposition was manifested to the erection of the church on this lot that the site was changed. In 1855 was laid the corner-stone of St. John's Church. It is a model of beautiful architecture, and even to-day is justly regarded as one of the finest churches in the Eastern States. Approaching the city from the Penobscot River, you see this noble edifice in its massive proportions, conspicuous beyond all other buildings of the city.

Rev. Father Bapst's ministry was attended with marked success. Regarded as a martyr for his Catholic principles from his ill-treatment at the hands of the people of Ellsworth, he held the esteem and love of his people. Associated with him in this wide field of labor were some of the most eminent members of the present Fathers. Among others should be remembered Rev. James C. Moore, S. J., Rev. Eugene Vetromile, S. J., and A. F. Crampi, S. J., afterwards President of Holy Cross College, Worcester, Massachusetts.

The administration of Rev. John Bapst closed in September, 1859. Rev. Henry Gillen succeeded him. Rev. Father Gillen established schools for girls. In 1865 he erected the convent on Newbury street and introduced the Sisters of Mercy. After Rev. Father Gillen Rev. James Murphy was in charge for a short time. Rev. Eugene Vetromile next succeeded. In 1869 Rev. Clement Mutsaers was appointed pastor. During Rev. Father Mutsaers' pastorate the parish was divided, and the new parish was called St. Mary's.

In May, 1874, Rev. Edward McSweeney was placed in charge of the parish, who continues to discharged the duties of the position. In the years of the panic Bangor suffered severely in its business and trade. When the prospect seemed the gloomiest for the city the pastor of St. John's purchased the beautiful Schwartz estate, situated on State street, and established the present Academy. It is one of the most conspicuous sites in the city, and well located for an institution of learning. A large and flourishing school is now the reward of what was regarded by some as a rather hazardous undertaking.

It must be said of the Catholic people that they have been generous in supporting religious and educational institutions. In early days they underwent much petty persecution, but they have manfully adhered to the teachings of their religion. As to the virtues that adorn a well-regulated city, they will compare favorably with the people of other communities.

At various times benevolent and temperance societies have been organized and have done much good among the people.

The present pastor, Rev. Edward McSweeney, has commenced the erection of a new parochial residence which will be an ornament to the place.

ST. MARY'S (ROMAN CATHOLIC) PARISH.*

Prior to the spring of 1872 the only parish and Catholic church in Bangor was St. John's, on York street—(preceded by St. Michael's, on Court street.) In May of that year St. Mary's was set off from St. John's, with Rev. J. W. Murphy as new pastor. His first task was to provide a place of worship, and he engaged the City Hall, where services were held every Sunday for (length of time I do not know) more than a year, till the basement of the new church was finished and furnished with seats and temporary altar. Before the project of forming a new parish was proclaimed, a lot on Cedar street had been purchased by Rev. Clement Mutsaers, then pastor of St. John's—at a cost of $2,000. The ground had been used hitherto for a gravel pit. Subsequently two lots more were purchased east of the site of the church at about the same price ($2,000 for both). The corner-stone of St. Mary's was laid by Rt. Rev. D. W. Bacon, Bishop of Portland, in September, 1872. During these ceremonies a startling accident occurred, in the breaking down of the platform, upon which were many people. It fell but a short distance, however, and nobody was seriously hurt.

The church was dedicated on the 8th of December, 1874. Bishop Lynch, of Charleston, South Carolina, preached the sermon on the occasion. The church was built when building materials and labor were extremely costly, and cost in all, grounds included, about $65,000. Its present debt is $20,000. Rev. J. W. Murphy was transferred, in June, 1880, to the rectorship of the Cathedral in Portland, and was succeeded in St. Mary's by Rev. M. C. O'Brien, the present pastor. The territory or district embraced in the parish is Bangor west of the Kenduskeag, Hampden, East Hampden, Hermon, and Carmel—in each of which towns (especially Hampden and Carmel) there are some Catholic families, attended from St. Mary's.

The Hibernian Mutual Benevolent society is composed of Catholic men of both parishes. St. Mary's Temperance society has not met for a year, though it had a numerous society in 1876. Nevertheless it can not be said that intemperance has increased; a much larger number than were ever organized into a society being pledged by the priest, privately or in presence of others, to total abstinence.

THE CATHOLIC SCHOOLS.*

The tourist in Maine will find much to attract him in the little city of Bangor, on the Penobscot, which in its more prosperous days gloried in the proud title of the "Queen City of the East." In a pleasant, secluded spot on the river bank, almost hidden by trees, stands the original convent of St. Xavier's, a fine, commodious brick building, now used as the parochial school-house. In 1865 the Sisters of Mercy were introduced by Rev. H. Gillen, for the purpose of conducting the education of girls. The schools, which were opened immediately after their arrival, were filled to overflowing; an academy, attached to the convent, numbering 120 pupils, and the parochial schools averaging an attendance of three hundred. The evening school, for the benefit of adults, was also largely attended. To counteract the effects of profane literature on the minds of the young, a circulating library was commenced, and continues to be highly appreciated. Silently, but surely, it has done its work of instilling principles of truth and virtue into souls who would otherwise have drunk in the poisonous draught of immoral reading.

In 1879 the Sisters removed to their beautiful and spacious convent on State street (purchased by Rev. Edward McSweeney), which affords superior advantages for a boarding-school and day academy. The location is unsurpassed for health and beauty, and offers every inducement for out-door exercise, so necessary for the physical welfare of pupils. A mild, but firm government is maintained, based upon those Christian principles which are the source of all true refinement, and which alone insure the happiness of the pupil in after life. Pupils of all religious denominations are equally received, and all interference with their religious convictions scrupulously avoided.

FIRST (PINE STREET) METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

This is the pioneer Methodist society in Bangor. There had been preaching by missionaries and visiting brethren of this faith and order at intervals here for nearly thirty years—at least ever since the sermons of Rev. Timothy Merritt in Bangor in 1799. Bangor was subsequently a charge or mission station in the Hampden Circuit; but not until the Bangor Circuit was formed in 1827, was the present Pine Street Society organized. Its original church, however, was built on Summer street; but in 1837 this primitive edifice was abandoned for the brick structure still occupied, with extensions and modifications in the course of the years, on Pine street, at the corner of Somerset. The roll of pastors of this church, under the itinerant system, has been a long one, and is honorable as it is long. Ten years after going to Pine street, the society suffered the loss of its members connected with the Summer Street Mission, who then formed a new church. Rev. N. G. Axtell is now (1881) Pastor.

UNION STREET METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

This is the society that was an offshoot, as just before noted, of the Pine Street church. It was organized in 1847, and was originally known as the Summer Street church, having grown out of a mission of the parent church on that street, which had become known as the Summer Street Mission Society, holding preaching services in the old Methodist church there. While occupying on Summer street the Rev. Messrs. H. M. Blake, John Atwell, C. D. Pillsbury, H. C. Tilton, and C. H.

A. Johnson successively served the church. In 1854 Summer street was abandoned for the present location at the corner of Union and Clinton streets, where a neat frame building was put up, partly under the pastorate of Rev. J. C. Prince. It was dedicated November 15, 1855, with sermon by the Rev. William F. Farrington. The entire cost of the edifice was $15,000, the ladies of the church furnishing the organ. A portion of its roll of pastors since is constituted of the Revs. J. P. French, William T. Jewell, William F. Farrington, B. F. Tefft, D. D., Benjamin Foster, T. B. Tupper, B. S. Arey, B. A. Chase, W. W. Marsh, Cyrus Stone, and G. N. Eldridge, the present pastor (1881).

UNIVERSALIST.

This society in Bangor was organized about 1841, and so has lived through a generation. In 1844 a church building was erected for it, upon the same site, on Park street, near Centre, now occupied by the church. This building was used for more than eighteen years, or until the present edifice, begun in 1860, was completed and ready for occupation. It was dedicated in December, 1862.

The first pastor of this church was the Rev. D. J. Mandell, who came to it in 1838 and served it about one year. Rev. L. L. Saddler was the next pastor, beginning in January, 1840, and continuing about two years. For about the same period the society was without a pastor, when the Rev. H. R. Nye was settled, and remained until June, 1850. The pastors since have been Rev. Amory Battles, January 1851 to March 1872—by far the largest pastorate the church has had; Rev. S. Goodenough, November 1872; and Rev. W. H. Jewell, the pastor now in charge.

OTHER CHURCHES.

The early history of St. John's Episcopal church is given in several places in the later chapters of Judge Godfrey's Annals, and the origin of the Second Baptist is noticed above in this chapter. No additional information has been afforded in answer to our inquiries.

The remaining religious societies of the place are the Christian and the Advent Christian churches. We regret that we have been unable to obtain any historical data whatever concerning them.

The charitable institutions of this city, although not numerous, are of very excellent character, and eminently creditable to the intelligence and practical philanthropy of its people. Some historical facts concerning the City Farm or Almshouse—enough for the purposes of this work—are embraced in the preceding chapters. The oldest of the other charities is the Bangor Female Orphan Asylum, now

THE CHILDREN'S HOME.

The establishment of this asylum by act of Legislature occurred in March, 1839. The corporation was made up of ladies who arranged for its support by each one pledging to it the sum of one dollar yearly. A constitution was adopted and laws framed, after which a Board of Managers, numbering fifteen ladies, were chosen, whose duty it should be to care for the institution and forward all plans for its growth as rapidly as their means would allow.

The first officers chosen were: Mrs. William D. Williamson, President; Mrs. Judge Preston, Vice-President; Mrs. Frederick Hobbs, Secretary, and Miss Caroline Webster, Treasurer. The Managers were: Mrs. William B. Reed, Mrs. Samuel Farrar, Mrs. Nicholas G. Norcross, Mrs. Charles K. Miller, Mrs. Benjamin Plummer, Jr., Mrs. Amos Davis, Mrs. C. J. W. Haynes, Mrs. George W. Merrill, Mrs. E. B. Lincoln, Mrs. P. H. Coombs, Mrs. E. P. Baldwin, and Mrs. John Bradbury.

This society had its beginning four years before in a sewing circle which was called "The Union Female Education Society." Its object, as given by its Corresponding Secretary, Mrs. Benjamin Plummer, in a letter to Richard H. Vose, of Augusta, Maine, was "the elevation and amelioration of the condition of destitute and degraded women in the city and vicinity." The same letter states that they were hoping for a time when they should have sufficient funds to found a charitable institution which should have for its object the education of the poor and ignorant and the reclaiming of fallen ones. There is a record first of a concert being given with this end in view, and Mrs. Lemon is mentioned as having sung "The Star of Bethlehem" with great feeling. Following this, a lecture was given by Mr. Asa Walker, more recently of California. In March, 1836, a fair which realized $1,200 was held at the Bangor House. This amount was placed at interest for the above-mentioned purpose.

After the lapse of a few months, for various reasons, the object of the original association became somewhat modified, and instead of a place of reform for adults, it was thought best to turn attention to the care of female children. In time destitute children of both sexes were admitted, and the Orphan Asylum became the Children's Home

From the Secretary's Report, dated August 30, 1868, and signed by Emma J. L. Duren, we glean the following statements:

Thirty years having passed away, are the names of Mrs. Hobbs, Mrs. Bradbury, and Mrs. Merrill, still on the list of Managers, and many of the original members of the organization still actively engaged in its support.

By the unremitting industry of the various members of the society, and the willing contributions of not a few of the citizens of Bangor, a sufficient sum was gathered together to purchase the house on Fourth street in which the family have since remained.

The primary object being the instruction and support of destitute female children, its care was principally devoted to orphans. During 1839, the first year, there were nine such children in the family, under the care of Miss Lawrence, afterwards Mrs. Moses Wingate. Miss Folsom succeeded Miss Lawrence, and not only filled the position of Matron, but taught the children as well, for the four and a half years that she remained, in a most faithful and efficient manner, thus meriting and securing the commendations of the society for her unselfish devotion to her duties. This lady afterward left her charge to marry Deacon Skinner, of Brewer, and Mrs. Quimby had charge for six months. In the year 1844 Mrs. Norton entered the place and was Matron for four years, and since her time the names of Miss Cutter, Miss Newcomb, Miss Quinn, Miss Stewart, Miss Nason, Mrs. Wing, Mrs. Kelton, Mrs. Smith, Miss Wasgatt, and Miss Webber are recorded as filling the position for longer or shorter spaces of time. Of these Matrons, Mrs. Wing was at the post for the longest period, and was proverbial for her great neatness and industry. Two were married in the Asylum, the Managers giving each a little parting attention in the shape of a wedding. Miss Cutter became the wife of Mr. Isaiah Cobden, and afterward a resident of Greene, this State. Miss Nason married Mr. Dillingham and removed to Hampden. Mrs. Wing became a resident of Newport, Maine.

Previous to 1863 the size of the family had remained not far from its original, but it now became much increased and it was necessary to employ an assistant. While Miss L. J. Wasgatt and her sister had the care of the family, during 1865 and 1866, there were from twenty to twenty-seven children, which number continued up to 1868, the time of this report. During the stay of these sisters, the Misses Wasgatt, nothing was omitted in their efforts to bring the institution up to a high standard in morals and manners; but there was not enough help to give the establishment proper care, and, since that date, under Miss L. E. Webber as Matron, a cook and nursery girl have been in constant employ, and at a more recent date a seamstress has been found necessary. These aids, not exclusively devoted to their departments, are all under the direction of the Matron, and, with the assistance of the older children, carry on the household work, which was found to be extremely difficult formerly, because of the wretched condition of the house.

Since the establishment of the Home, the object of the institution has been ever kept in view, and one hundred and eighty-one children have here found protection and loving care, for longer or shorter periods of time. First, there have been those wholly or in part orphans, who have been given to the Asylum. These, being entirely under the control of the Managers, have almost invariably been adopted into families, and every possible pains has been taken to secure for them the best of homes. The practice of binding them out for service was long ago given up, and recently there have been more applications for children for actual adoption than the institution can supply. Not a few of them have been restored, in time, to parents or relatives, when it was well ascertained that they had become able to undertake again their care and support.

A second class of children coming under the direction of the Managers of the Asylum are such as have parents who cannot or will not care for them, or who have so ill-treated them as to render their escape from them a necessity. To the last-named the Home has indeed been a haven of refuge.

Eleven children of soldiers have been included in the family at different times, most of them orphaned during the late war. For them aid has been received from the Sanitary Fund for Soldiers' Orphans, through the aid of Mr. G. K. Jewett, and also State aid from a fund of which Mr. D. Brastow, of Brewer, is one of the trustees.

Now and then we have had children boarding in the establishment. In such case the mother, by being relieved of the care of the child, finds it possible to do nearly all that is necessary for its support. It is thought best to encourage the parent, under such circumstances, in her efforts to retain the guardianship of her off-spring.

A third class — and perhaps concerning these have come up the most perplexing questions — is made up of little girls whose board has long since ceased, and whose parents refuse to sign the papers of adoption that shall forever give them into the hands of the society. The question is constantly before us, Shall these parents continue to impose the care of their children upon us and yet refuse to give us full power for the guidance and disposal of the children, that can come alone by our becoming the legal guardians of the same? On the other hand, can we dismiss these helpless beings from this temporary home, if nothing more, with the certainty before us that only wretchedness and vice can be their lot? This has many times been a puzzling problem. It has, however, been the unanimous policy of those in charge to keep the children under moral and religious influences as long as was in their power, thus hoping to form a habit of life and a preference for the pure and good that might in after times aid them when under temptation. And it has been a subject of the deepest gratitude that, so far as the subsequent lives of the inmates can be ascertained, they have not disappointed the hopes and expectations entertained for them. Some have yielded — almost necessarily, we might say — to hereditary tendencies, but many are leading useful and honorable lives.

The officers of the institution have always tried to feed the children with plain but wholesome diet, to clothe them neatly, with regard to health and comfort, and to train them up to become helpful and self-governing. They were, at first, taught at the Home, but subsequently were sent to the city schools. The Hammond Street church and Sunday-school is the one they have most frequently attended, although the institution is in no way a denominational affair. All the religious societies, in fact, do their part in its support.

Concerning the health of the children the Secretary says:

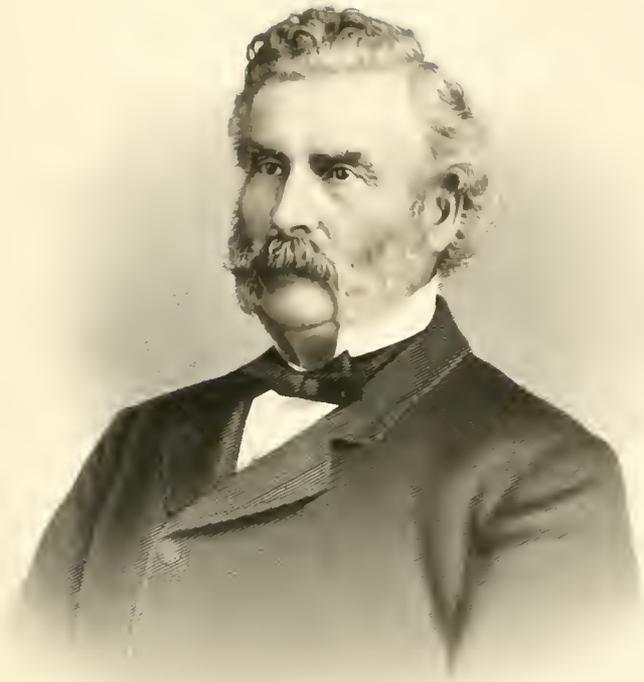

The health of the family has been truly remarkable. For ten years not a death occurred, and the first was that of a child during the prevalence of the cholera, who was admitted sick and, as it proved, already stricken with that fatal disease. Several other deaths occurred during the sickly season which followed; and now, since 1860, has been a period of uninterrupted health. Eight little bodies lie in a pleasant lot at Mount Hope; the row of simple headstones, each bearing a different family name, often attracting attention, while a beautiful marble scroll lately erected in the center of the lot tells the touching story of "The Children's Home."

This is the most precious property of the Asylum, and was earnestly longed and labored for by one of the managers. From the annual report of 1864, we quote the following paragraph in relation to the lot:

The past summer the Mount Hope corporation very generously gave us a burial spot near the soldiers' lot. It has been graded, eight bodies removed, and stones set in granite erected. These expenses have been paid by different gentlemen of the city. This has been accomplished through the influence of one of the managers, Mrs. George W. Merrill, who has performed all the labor of collecting and attending to other business relating to it.

For the constant support of the inmates, the most untiring energy and indomitable zeal have been brought into requisition. The most reliable source of income has been the yearly tax of $1.00 upon each member of the society. But this has seldom exceeded $300 a year, and of late the expenses have been not less than $1,500. Sometimes they have reached nearly to $2,000. After the Asylum had become established, one of the Board of Managers, Mrs. Jeremiah Curtis, collected $1,000, which was afterward increased to $1,150, and placed the amount at interest. Of course the interest was meagre, but even so small a sum, coming in regularly, was better than being dependent entirely on charity. From time to time the society has given concerts and tableaux, and there have been held fairs, festivals, etc., which have always been enough to cancel all immediate demands. A book, "Voices From the Kenduskeag," was published at one time in its interest, and life-memberships have been solicited, church collections taken up, and every possible method adopted by which there was any hope of gathering in funds or supplies for the children. And they have never suffered, though there have been times when every way had been employed, and finally, from some unexpected source, came the much needed supply. Upon Mrs. Curtis removing to New York she still remembered the Asylum, and a gift of $100 has been received from her hand.

The property of the corporation consists of the house and lot on Fourth street; the lot at Mount Hope cemetery; the fund already mentioned, which, invested in United States bonds, has yielded about $90 yearly for the current expenses; and a very fine Wheeler & Wilson sewing machine, given by Mr. George Stetson, the only article possessing much value in the house.

Of the active and efficient friends of the institution, several have been removed by death. In 1841, Mrs. Amos Davis; in 1862, Mrs. S. F. Hersey, and in 1865, Mrs. John S. Kimball. The husbands of these ladies have always evinced a strong interest in its welfare, and have contributed nobly to its support.

In the year 1861 the time of the annual meeting was permanently changed from May to the first Tuesday in January.

Affixed to the Secretary's report we read the names of forty-five life members, beginning with two in 1839, and adding nineteen during 1868. (This number has since been increased to more than 250.)

The ceremony of laying the corner-stone of the new Childrens' Home took place on Wednesday afternoon of the 2d of September, 1868. At the laying of the corner-stone a large assembly of people were present, and everything passed off as planned, in a most enjoyable and suitable way. The Knights Templars, to the number of forty-five, preceded by the Bangor Cornet Band, escorted the Blue Lodges of Masons to the location of the building, on Thomas's Hill. On the ground a platform had been erected, upon which were seated the Matron and children of the Asylum, assistants, Board of Directors, speakers, etc. The exercises consisted of introductory remarks from General S. F. Hersey, president of the day; prayer by the Rev. Amory Battles; historical sketch of the institution by the Secretary, Mrs. E. L. Duren, read by Rev. S. P. Fay; a hymn, "The Children's Greeting," written by Mrs. S. B. Littlefield, and sung by the children; reading of the contents of the box deposited under the corner-stone; music by the band; laying the corner-stone by the Free Masons, under the direction of D. G. M. Samuel Bradford; music again by the band; singing by the choir of the Hammond Street church; address by Rev. George W. Field; remarks of Mr. C. P. Roberts, Superintendent of Public Schools, and the benediction by Rev. Dr. Pond.

From the very excellent address of Rev. George W. Field we quote, here and there, a few of his choice expressions:

The munificence of the noble woman and her husband who gave the first impulse to this movement, and the promptness with which the public responded to their generous proposition, and even went beyond it, may be taken as evidence that our people can be as large-hearted, and I trust always mean to be as large-hearted, in their public works, as they have the credit of being free and even extravagant in their private expenditures. The compliment which an ancient writer conferred upon Rome, that its public buildings, its temples, and its palaces were spacious and magnificent beyond compare, while the private residences were cheap and unadorned, is a compliment which I should not care to have applied, in both of its parts, to our city, or to any other city in which I was interested. . . . And now the first purely charitable edifice of our city is about to be built in a style of which we shall have no occasion to be ashamed, and which shall serve as a hint to all succeeding hospitals and asylums of our city, that because they are charitable institutions they need not therefore be contracted or untasteful in their conditions. It is an excellent thing to have made a good beginning, to have established a good precedent. And we trust that this Children's Home, rising in goodly proportions on this conspicuous site, may be a proof to all coming generations that the citizens of Bangor propose to carry the same large and open-handed spirit which has been characteristic of them in other relations, into their benevolence also. And for this we are glad. . . . It is well that you should call upon the ministers of Christ to utter the name of their Master over this corner-stone, and to invoke his blessing upon the work here begun. This structure would not have been but for Him. Such things never were before the time of Christ, and they are to be found now only where his religion has gone. In all ancient Greece and Italy, refined, polished, cultured as they were, in some classes beyond anything which modern society can rival, yet we cannot find traces of one single almshouse, or hospital, or asylum, or refuge of any sort for the suffering poor of either sex or any age. Not one chiseled stone can be found on all those classical plains which speaks of an effort to relieve the sufferings and elevate the condition of the humble classes. Splendid ruins can be found, indeed, on every hand, which the beholder never wearies of gazing upon, but none of them the ruins of buildings which were consecrated to any benevolent purpose. . . . It is a curious fact that in the city of Ephesus, where John wrote that sublime definition, "God is Love," was founded the first hospital of which we have any knowledge. An active benevolence was made the corner-stone of the new faith, and gradually developed itself into the numberless charities of Christendom. . . . Upon no class did Christ expend such sympathy and affection as upon the little ones.

And so much did he honor the condition of childhood that he said: "Except ye become as little children, ye can in no wise enter into the kingdom of Heaven,"—that is, unless you unlearn your selfishness, your hard ambition, your earthly cunning, your envious rivalries and competition, and become loving and kind, simple and sincere as little children, who have no art and no selfishness, you cannot pass the threshold of the spiritual life. . . . I have been requested to express the grateful sentiment of this community towards the several parties whose labors and charities have been instrumental in bringing about the result of this day. . . . In this circle of benevolent ladies we would especially designate as worthy of honor at this time, her whose name, Mrs. Joseph Kendall, has already been read in your hearing as the one who laid the foundation of this Orphan Asylum in the Sewing Circle, which she originated for the benefit of the poor in the very infancy of the city, and which her tact and perseverance gradually converted into a society for the relief of orphans.

Not least among the benefactors of the Asylum, it seems to me, is he who has bestowed upon it the beautiful lot where the building is about to be erected. . . . Thanks to Mr. James Smith, Jr., for his most desirable donation. But most of all do we owe honor and gratitude to the memory of her whose dying benevolence lies at the foundation of this whole monument. . . . We would pay also our tribute of sincere respect and gratitude to the husband of the deceased, her fitting companion and helper in all her plans of beneficence, and especially in the liberality which has brought about the result which to-day we celebrate. . . . It is stated on the plate deposited under the corner-stone that this building is erected from funds placed by Mrs. Sarah Pitcher, daughter of Leonard and Martha L. March, in the hands of her husband, F. W. Pitcher, for religious and benevolent purposes. . . . Our prayer is that the number of such instances may be multiplied, and that the time may come when wealthy families, instead of being gratified by it, will find themselves dishonored to have their members die without leaving something generous for "religious and benevolent purposes." One word more. It is not to be supposed that the deceased or her family would have bestowed so large a sum on this institution if it had not been for the expectation that the citizens of Bangor would put forth corresponding exertions to make the institution what it ought to be—a model institution. In accepting the donation we tacitly pledge ourselves to this—we virtually promise that their expectations shall not be disappointed through any indifference or neglect of ours. . . . And if any motive still more tender were needed, you might find it in the thought that the dear God accepts what is done in a right spirit for these little ones as a personal favor, and will say at last, "Inasmuch as ye did it unto them, ye did it unto me."

The new building was completed and occupied in October, 1869. The next calendar year was begun with thirty-three inmates—twenty-seven girls, six boys. Twenty-seven more entered during the year; but the number of the household was maintained nearly uniform by the discharge of twenty-six. Twenty of the inmates were soldiers' orphans. The prevalence of this element at the Home during the years after the war brought it presently, and very hopefully, under the paternal eye of the Commonwealth. In his message to the Legislature in July, 1874, Governor Dingley said: "The Bangor Children's Home is eminently deserving of the contributions of a generous people; and, so far as it cares for indigent orphans of soldiers, it should receive aid from the State." The year before it had an appropriation from the State Treasury of $1,000; in 1874, 1875, and 1876 the grant was $2,000; the next year it fell to the former sum; and in 1880 it was but $750. The Home has been the object of numerous other benefactions; among them, in 1874, $500 were received from the estate of the Hon. Henry E. Prentiss; in 1876 $1,000 under the will of the late Samuel Larrabee; $1,000 from General Samuel F. Hersey, besides a considerable sum to be paid under his will in future; and in 1880 $1,000 from the estate of Mrs. March. Many collections have been taken and entertainments given for its benefit during the years of its history; and there is a constant inflow of vegetables and other contributions in kind for its support. Several lots for burial purposes have been given by the Board of the Mt. Hope Cemetery corporation. At the last report, January 4, 1881, the Home had permanent funds as follow: Loan to the city of Bangor, $40,000; Bangor city bond, $1,000; Maine Central Railroad bond, $1,000; notes, $300; making a total of $42,300. The interest on the invested fund had realized $2,400 the previous year to the Home.

Fifty-four children had been cared for in the Home during 1880, sixteen of them soldiers' children; fourteen had been received during the year, and as many returned to parents or placed in situations; so that the number, forty, in the institution January 1, 1880, was precisely duplicated at the end of the year. From the organization of the Home to January 1, 1878, 373 children were cared for therein.

Mrs. Walter Brown was then President of the Home; Mrs. H. G. Pitcher, Vice-president; Miss Kate B. Walker, Treasurer; Miss Mary L. Patten, Secretary; Miss Julia A. Sibley, Matron.

A school for the children was started in the Home on the 15th of July, 1870, by Miss Longfellow, from the Lancaster Industrial school, and has since been quite steadily maintained, under various teachers. The forenoon is devoted to the common branches of study, and the afternoon to sewing, repairing garments, and sundry household duties.

Steam for warming the building was introduced in 1875, and the Holly water service the next year.

HOME FOR AGED WOMEN.*

A paper, of which the following is a copy, was circulated in this city September 30, 1869, and was signed by forty-six ladies and fourteen gentlemen:

The occasion of this Centennial Anniversary of Bangor's history is, in all respects, the fitting time to inaugurate measures for relieving the infirmities of age; and to this end the undersigned, with their associates, agree to organize a society in this city, and its object shall be to care for and relieve the wants, alleviate suffering, and make provision for the comfort of destitute aged women, and further agree to be governed by such rules and regulations as may be hereafter adopted.

The subject continued to be agitated and to ripen in the public mind until the winter of 1872, when a published call for a meeting of those interested was made. It was held February 1, 1872, when it was resolved that the time had come to establish such an institution, and that measures should be taken to secure it. The organization was completed at another meeting, held in the City Hall March 4 next following.

The following appeal was published soon after:

The ladies who have in view the founding of a Home for Aged Women in our city, would now bring the subject before you, asking you patiently to hear and weigh the facts in the case.

This is no sudden enterprise, but one which has been long desired by many, and which has been delayed until now only by the fear that the time was hardly ripe for its accomplishment. We have now decided to wait no longer. We reflect that time is short, and that what each of us does to lighten the burden of human woe, must be done quickly. We remember that while we, timid and irresolute, hesitate to take the first step, some helpless ones, whom this charity is designed to bless, are suffering; and we feel that timidity and irresolution must now be laid aside.

There are aged women in Bangor left without natural protectors and, in many cases, without resources. They have filled their places and acted well their part in the scenes of active life in times long past; but the lapse of years has despoiled them of their vigor, death has robbed them of their friends, and the rushing, hurrying world has left them behind. There remains to them only the memory of happier days, the ever-increasing infirmities of advanced life, and, saddest of all, a constant, wearing anxiety for the future, only made endurable by their trust in God.

From such anxious, saddened hearts, the prayer is ascending: "Cast me not off in the time of old age; forsake me not when my strength faileth. Now also, when I am old and gray-headed, O God, forsake me not."

We believe that God answers these prayers, in part, at least, by putting into the hearts of His children to plan and work for these helpless ones, and that the labor to which we pledge ourselves, and the charities which flow through this channel, are but the carrying out of His wise and beneficent purposes. It has been well said that he is a benefactor of his fellow-men who makes two blades of grass grow where only one had grown. How much more is he a benefactor who roots out from human hearts the poisonous weeds of foreboding and despondency, and makes to flourish and blossom in their place the sweet plants of hope and cheerfulness! In this noble work we ask you to take part.

It is a fact, proved beyond doubt, that generous action opens and enlarges the heart, and prepares it for still greater generosity. The question arises, "Is it necessary to go through a long, hard struggle before this Home can be placed on a sure basis?" We think not. If individuals of means will feel an interest in the undertaking, and immediately and generously aid us, we can soon have our Home for Aged Women—a quiet haven, where they can enjoy the comforts of life, freedom from corroding care and anxiety, the companionship of each other, and where we can go and be to their lonely hearts, so far as possible, sisters and daughters.

And while we urge large giving on the part of men of means, we would have no man, woman, or child withhold a contribution because it must be small. Happily, the requirement is that a man give "according to that he hath, and not according to that he hath not."

Dear friends, our plea is before you, and in a few days we shall visit you individually, to receive what you see fit to bestow. We come to you, not with dread, lest we should be looked upon as unwelcome and disagreeable intruders, to whom a pittance must be given in order to be free from their presence, but we come cheerfully, hopefully, feeling sure that you will meet us in the same spirit in which we come, and that you will give us your cordial sympathy and co-operation.

MRS. JAMES McLAUGHLIN,
MRS. SAMUEL F. HERSEY,
MRS. GEORGE W. PICKERING,
MRS. J. B. FOSTER,
MRS. WALTER BROWN,
MRS. ISAAC S. WHITMAN.

*Compiled from an historical sketch of the institution, accompanying its first pamphlet report, published in 1881.

The institution was incorporated at the Legislative session of 1872, with the following charter:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives in Legislature assembled, as follows:

SECTION 1. J. S. Wheelwright, Walter Brown, G. W. Merrill, A. W. Paine, I. S. Whitman, I. R. Clark, S. P. Strickland, Sarah Q. Brown, Almira McLaughlin, Sophia A. Whitman, Patience C. Plummer, Margaret B. Holton, Ruth W. Strickland, Mary L. Patten, Adrianna M. V. Merrill, Nancy Wyman, Mary Pickering, Eliza A. Staples, Mary Phillips, Fanny W. Ingalls, Eliza H. Fifield, and their associates and successors, are hereby incorporated by the name of the Home for Aged Women, for the purpose of providing a home for aged women at Bangor.

SECTION 2. The said corporation may take by purchase, devise, or otherwise, any real or personal property, and hold the same for the purposes aforesaid, to any amount not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, exempt from taxation, and may manage and dispose of the same according to their discretion.

SECTION 3. Said corporation shall have power to prescribe the terms of admission for members, may elect such officers as they may deem necessary, and adopt such by-laws as shall be necessary or expedient for the management of its affairs, not repugnant to the constitution or laws of this State or of the United States.

SECTION 4. The four corporators first above named are authorized to call the first meeting of the corporation, at such place within the City of Bangor as they may choose, giving seven days' notice at least of said meeting, by publication in the Bangor Daily Whig and Courier.

SECTION 5. This act shall take effect when approved.

Approved February 16, 1872.

The next year the corporation voted to raise the sum of $25,000, to be deposited with the city of Bangor as a perpetual trust fund, interest payable semi-annually, in order to secure the permanency of the institution. This sum was subsequently obtained and paid, and the City Council by a resolve passed in 1875, voted to receive the same into the city treasury as a permanent loan, paying an annual interest thereon of $1,500.

The following subscriptions and donations were received then and subsequently:

Woman's Friend Society, $2,163.52; Henry E. Prentiss, $1,500; Franklin Muzzy, $1,000; Samuel F. Hersey, $1,000; Samuel Larrabee, $1,000; George Stetson, $500; Isaiah Stetson, $500; Walter Brown, $500; Moses Giddings, $500; William H. McCrillis, $500; A. D. Manson, $500; Isaac S. Whitman, $500; James McLaughlin, $300; Joseph S. Smith, $100, Frank Hinckley, $100; Samuel P. Strickland, $100; Hastings Strickland, $100; Henry A. Wood, $100; F. A. Wilson, $100; Mrs. Mary A. Bullock, $250; Mrs. Leonard March, $100; Joseph S. Wheelwright, $250; J. G. Clark, $250; T. W. Baldwin, $250; J. B. Foster, $250; Hannibal Hamlin, $250; David Bugbee, $250; Mrs. Mary A. Hinckley, $200; Mrs. Mary Ham, $200; George L. Phillips, $200; M. L. Drummond, $100; William B. Hayford, $100; Arad Thompson, $100; I. S. Johnson, $100; James S. Rowe, $100; Charles Hayward, $100; Albert Emerson, $100; E. S. Coe, $100; Hugh Ross, $100; G. W. Merrill, $100; A Friend, $100; Mrs. R. W. Strickland, $500; Mrs. Noah Woods $1,000; Mrs. A. R. Cutting, $1,000.

In addition to the above the corporation has been greatly aided by annual subscriptions, life members' subscriptions, bequests, the sewing circle, fairs, exhibitions, and small donations, and was thereby enabled to complete the Trust Fund of $25,000. Hon. Samuel F. Hersey left the Home by will $5,000, payable in 1890.

By the commutation of this legacy the corporation has been helped to pay the balance due for the homestead and to accumulate a sustaining fund, so that the Home may well now be considered a permanent institution. Five hundred dollars were also left to the Home by Mrs. Ruth W. Strickland, a former member of the Board of Managers.

The Home was opened for inmates July 20, 1874, in a leased house on the corner of Essex and Garland streets. In October, 1876, the corporation purchased the present commodious residence, No. 145 State street. This Home was dedicated with appropriate religious services on the 16th of October, 1876. An addition of ten new sleeping and other rooms were made in the summer of 1880. Apparatus for steam-heating was introduced about the same time.

In 1876 a gift to the Home was made by the trustees of Mt. Hope Cemetery Corporation of a valuable and large burial lot. The remains of two beneficiaries of the Home are therein deposited, with appropriate headstones above them.

The principal officers in the original Board of Managers were as follow: Joseph S. Wheelwright, President; Mrs. James McLaughlin and Mrs. John B. Foster, Vice-Presidents; Mrs. Elbridge C. Hincks, Treasurer; Miss Mary F. Prentiss, Secretary.

Mr. Wheelwright is still President of the Home, and has been of eminent service in its foundation and maintenance. The Vice-Presidents are Mrs. Almira McLaughlin and Mrs. Caroline R. Mason; Secretary, Mrs. Francis H. Noble; Treasurer, Isaac S. Whitman. Miss Sarah E. Patten is Matron.

There have been in all sixty life members, upon payment of $25 each. Of these, fourteen are dead. The receipts of 1880 were $6,742.98; expenditures, $6,032.72.

At the time of the publication of this report, in the late autumn of 1881, the Home had fifteen inmates. The names of these, and of two others deceased, are as follow: Entered in 1874—Miss Mary A. Giddings, age 55; Mrs. Sarah Atkins, 66; Mrs. Eliza B. Merrill, 81; Miss Julia A. Orcutt, 58 (died August 16, 1877); Miss Nancy C. Blagdon, 75 (died November 15, 1876). Entered in 1875—Mrs. Lavinia Pierce, 79; Miss Mary A. Freeman, 66; Mrs. Philinda B. Breed, 74. Entered in 1876—Mrs. Elizabeth Skinner, 70; Miss Augusta Messenger, 73; Miss Charlotte A. Gallison, 54. Entered in 1877—Mrs. Betsey Partridge, 69; Mrs. Nancy Pomroy, 77. Entered in 1880—Mrs. Harriet A. Billings, 57; Mrs. Mary T. Trueworthy, 83. Entered in 1881—Miss Mary C. Pearson, 55; Mrs. Abbie E. Smith, 60.

BANGOR YOUNG MEN'S BIBLE SOCIETY.*

The predecessor of this association was the Penobscot County Bible Society. This, an auxiliary of the American Bible Society, was the first in the county for circulating the Bible. It was inaugurated in May, 1828. Joseph Lee, of Milo, was President; Rev. S. L. Pomroy, Bangor, Corresponding Secretary; Romulus Haskins, Bangor, Recording Secretary; George W. Brown, Bangor, Treasurer. Rev. Dr. Proudfoot, of Salem, New Hampshire, was General Agent of the parent society. Local agents were employed "to visit the various townships of the county, and to ascertain by faithful enquiry how many families were destitute of Bibles." A donation of Bibles was granted by the parent society for newly settled places. In 1832-33 auxiliaries had been formed in most of the townships. An agent had visited all parts of the county to form local associations, and to prepare the way for a general supply of Bibles and Testaments. He occupied 114 days, traveling 2,850 miles, and formed fifty small societies. Bibles and Testaments were supplied to each of these. During the short period of its active service it forwarded to the American Bible Society $2,000 for books and $100 donations. Revs. Joseph Lane, Sylvester Holmes, and Mr. Bacon were General Agents of the parent society, and occasionally visited the county.

The County Bible Society having for several years ceased to act, it was proposed that the young men of Bangor should unite and enter upon the work anew. Accordingly a meeting was held October 23, 1843, in the vestry of the Methodist Chapel. Colonel Henry Little was appointed Chairman, William Sandford Secretary. Prayer was offered by Rev. John Maltby. The agent of the American Bible Society, Rev. Joseph Lane, was present and explained the need of some active organization. It was voted to organize as the Bangor Young Men's Bible Society. A committee was appointed to draft a constitution—Asa Walker, Esq., William H. Dow, and Nathaniel French. A committee also to nominate officers—Revs. Maltby and Pomroy (Congregational), Hobart (Methodist), Caverno (Free Baptist), and West (Episcopal). Each of these committees to report at an adjourned meeting.

November 3, 1843. Met according to adjournment, in the vestry of the First Congregational Church, at which a constitution was adopted and the following officers were chosen: Charles Godfrey, Jr., President; Isaac A. Hatch, Vice-President; Asa Walker, Secretary; William H. Dow, Treasurer; E. F. Duren, Depository.

*By Deacon E. F. Duren.

The Presidents of the society during the thirty-eight years of its existence have been: Charles Godfrey, Jr., 6 years; J. A. Hatch, 3; J. Burbank, 2; F. M. Sabine, 2; J. Conant, 2; E. H. Fogg, 3; W. P. Wingate, 2; A. S. Weed, 2; T. A. Seavey, 2; S. D. Thurston, 2; G. A. Thatcher, J. Fenno, J. F. Kimball, each 1; G. R. Smith, 9, and now in office.

Secretaries—Asa Walker, 7 years; O. R. Patch, 3; W. Sandford, 2; J. T. K. Hayward, 1; A. S. Weed, 2; F. F. French, 1; E. H. Fogg, 1; R. S. Morrison, 1; F. E. Shaw, 2; J. L. Crosby, 2; N. L. Perkins, 2; W. E. Mann, 1; J. F. Kimball, 2; J. H. Hayes, 2; J. W. Torrens, 9.

Treasurers—William H. Dow, 3 years; J. S. Wheelwright, 4; E. F. Duren, 17; W. G. Duren, 5; F. M. Sabine, 8, and now in office.

Depositaries—E. F. Duren, 34 years; W. Lewis, J. N. Davis, and E. D. Godfrey, each 1; T. K. Smith, 1, now in office.

The object of this society is, first, to supply every destitute family in this county and Aroosook county with a copy of the Holy Bible, without note or comment, and to afford facilities for the people to supply themselves by purchase; and secondly, the transmission of its surplus funds to the parent society at New York, to aid in distributing the Word of Life to the destitute throughout our own and foreign lands.

The churches in these counties are invited to become branches of this society, sharing its privileges and labors; and where there is no organized church the officers of each town and plantation are desired to correspond annually, at least, with this society, that all may be supplied with the Holy Scriptures.

Various and appropriate means, all more or less successful, have at different times been employed to secure the object of this society. Local depositaries have been established at convenient and central points; Bibles and Testaments have been placed in responsible hands for distribution; colporteurs have been employed; Bible distributors have been commissioned; the co-operation of clergymen and others has been solicited; and explorations of territory within our limits have been made as frequently as possible and to the greatest practicable extent.

Circulars have from time to time been sent to the churches—particularly in 1851 and 1861—suggesting the appointment of a committee to enquire into the wants of the destitute, to ascertain when an exploration was best made and with what results, collect funds from such as are willing to contribute, and report to the committee of this society.

Bangor was the first place canvassed by the Society, which was undertaken by its officers in 1844, soon after its organization. In 1846 the hotel steamers and public buildings were more fully supplied; in 1850 and 1862 the city was supplied by colporteurs. Deacon Stephen Smith, of Garland, was a very acceptable and efficient colporteur in different towns of the county, serving for a longer period than any other, between 1854 and 1864. Messrs. Chamberlin, Tenney, Richards, Ricker, Emerson, Douglass, Hobbs, Keeps, Tarbox, Rea, Torrens, Mansfield, and Rogers have also been employed by the Society at different times. Efficient aid has been rendered by the agents of the parent society — Revs. J. Lane, J. Young, D. Sewall, J. E. Soule, R. Woodhull, S. H. Merrill, Thomas Smith, C. C. Cone, and W. H. Gilbert.

The hotels between Bangor and Houlton have been supplied with the Scriptures, also the lumber camps from time to time. In 1845-46 it was estimated that four thousand lumbermen were probably without a copy, and the American Bible Society made a grant of fifteen hundred Bibles, which were committed to this society for distribution. A gentleman of Bangor voluntarily supplied twenty camps. A Bible society organized in Aroostook county during its active existence supplied a portion of the field which had been under the care of this society.

Seamen and vessels have been supplied, also asylums, jails, poor-houses, Sunday- and common schools. In 1861 all the soldiers enlisted for the war from this county and Aroostook were supplied with a Bible, Testament, or Testament and Psalms. They were presented by different clergymen of the city to the several companies, and were gladly received. Two of the books came back bearing the indentation of the bullet, which providentially prevented its piercing the life of the soldier, and to many it was a lamp to their feet and a light to their path. To all calls for the Bible this society has ever been ready to respond.

Eighty-six thousand copies of the Scriptures have been circulated by this society, of which twenty-three thousand were donated.

The amount paid by this society to the parent society for Bibles and Testaments from 1843 to 1881 is $16,120; donations $1,000. Amount of Bibles and Testaments donated by this society $3,147; contributions received to prosecute the work of the society $8,900. Expenditures $2,410.

At the anniversaries of the society the report of the secretary has presented the work of the year, and addresses have been made by the pastors and others of the city and vicinity. At five of them there has been one written discourse. At the others, three or more short addresses. At each there have been appropriate devotional exercises by ministers of different denominations, and music by the choirs.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

Several tentative efforts were made in the city, during a number of years, to found a branch of the Young Men's Christian Association, but without definite result until December 21, 1880, when a meeting of those interested was held in Concert Hall. Mr. Pierre McConville was in the chair, and Henry F. Thurston was Secretary. Remarks were made by Messrs. Main M. Preble, Rand, Lincoln, Weatherbee, and others, and the meeting adjourned to meet on the 30th of December. The second assembly was had in the vestry of the Third Congregational church, with about twenty-two persons present. Prayer was offered by the Rev. Mr. Field, remarks were made by a number of gentlemen, and a committee, consisting of Messrs. Rand, Eldridge, and Swenson, was appointed to draft a constitution. This committee reported at a meeting held the second evening thereafter, New Year's evening, 1881; and the report, after some discussion and amendment, was adopted.

The constitution, as now in force, provides for active, associate, sustaining, and honorary members—the first comprising evangelical church-members, or persons giving evidence of sound conversion. They pay $2 per year, and only these are allowed to vote and hold office. The second class includes men of good moral standing; the third, those who will aid the work by payment of a stipulated sum ($5) yearly; and the fourth, those who pay a certain sum ($20) as life members. The officers are a President, seven Vice-Presidents, a Recording Secretary, a Corresponding Secretary, and a Treasurer, who together constitute an Executive Committee. These officers are to be chosen, so far as practicable, from the several evangelical churches in the city. The Finance Committee is formed of the Executive Committee, with one member from each evangelical church. The officers are elected annually by ballot. Five members make a quorum of the committee, and nine a quorum of the association. "No member shall neglect the work of the Association, or the duties assigned him, without giving a seasonable and reasonable excuse to the society, to be by him approved and reported at the next business meeting." "Any name may be struck from the roll of membership for continued neglect of duty or proven immorality, by a majority vote in regular business meeting;" and "no person shall be honorably discharged from the association without giving reasons which shall be approved at a regular business meeting." The annual meeting is held upon the first Saturday of January. All meetings are to be opened and closed with prayer. One thousand five hundred copies of the constitution have been printed.

The association, according to the roll of members at this writing, consists of Messrs. P. McConville, Adelbert P. Chick, W. Rand, Alfred Winn, W. L. Miller, W. B. Dole, A. W. Main, Edwin Granger, Edgar L. Brown, Alf Swenson, Henry Vance, Henry B. Dunbar, Everett S. Baker, John K. Lincoln, Charles S. Pearl, A. T. Stetson, R. A. Jordan, W. J. Weatherbee, F. D. Lincoln, I. M. Case, F. A. Curtis, Frank L. Goodwin, James Purr, Frank A. Smith, Edward C. Frost, William S. Boyd, John W. Todd, S. Lewis B. Speare, George W. E. Barrows, H. H. Rich, Charles A. Barbour, John F. Kimball, J. Albert Dole, C. A. Averill, M. G. Prentiss, Thomas A. Hieskell, Lawrence T. Smyth, H. A. Williams, J. M. Frost, William H. Perkins, S. S. Greenyer, R. F. Morgan, George S. Hall, Edwin C. Brown, Harold W. Springer, W. L. Crosby, John F. Stevens, Otis Gilmore, John A. Pond, A. C. Sawyer, J. M. Dickey, Arthur L. Hopkins, Fred L. Beverly, James L. Heywood, N. Wilmot Littlefield, James B. Barnaby—fifty-six members, all told.

The officers of the Association elected at the first meeting were: Pierre McConville, President; F. A. Curtis, W. J. Weatherbee, W. Rand, J. A. Boardman, Vice-Presidents. Subsequently, when the number of Vice-Presidents was enlarged, Messrs. Charles A. Barbour, J. A. Dole, and I. M. Case were elected additional Vice-Presidents; Mr. E. C. Frost was also made a Vice-President, in place of Mr. Curtis, resigned. A. T. Stetson, Secretary; Mr. Alfred Winn was afterwards chosen Secretary, on the resignation of Mr. Stetson, who was elected Corresponding Secretary when that office was created. Henry Dunbar, Treasurer.

The "Grangers' Hall," on Kenduskeag Bridge, was presently secured for the uses of the Association. The "Grand Army Hall" was afterwards rented, and is now occupied by the society. It has been neatly fitted up, largely with articles purchased from the B. H. Beale Post No. 12, of the Grand Army of the Republic, and supplied with all necessary conveniences. As soon as a hall was secured, the association began to hold Saturday evening prayer-meetings. A public Gospel and praise meeting is now held on Tuesday evening of each week; a social, religious, and business meeting of the association on Friday evening, and an "open-air Gospel meeting" is held under the auspices of the association, in good weather, on the slate wharf at the foot of Broad street, every Sunday afternoon at 3 o'clock. The first public meeting was held at the hall on the evening of Tuesday, March 22, 1881, and was very well attended. The first open-air meeting was held in Park Square, Sunday afternoon, May 15, with a half-hour prayer-meeting previously in the hall. A valued member was lost May 25, in the person of Mr. John F. Kimball, for whose memory some cordial and appreciative resolutions were passed by the association on the 27th.

THE MECHANICS' ASSOCIATION.

The early history of this, the most notable, and undoubtedly most useful society, not distinctively religious, in the city of Bangor, is well detailed by Judge Godfrey, at intervals in the preceding chapters. The story of its organization and earlier years need not here be repeated. It will be remembered that it dates by incorporation from February 12, 1828; its organization was completed April 15, 1828. The same year its constitution and by-laws, with a list of early members, were printed in a rude little pamphlet by "Burton & Carter, printers, Bangor." The preamble says:

The mechanic powers, combined in their operation, have been generally admitted as the source of all those inventions and arts which have given to society its wealth, conveniency, respectability and defence:—Societies having for their object the promotion of these powers, and the amelioration of the distresses of the unfortunate, cannot fail to exert a salutary influence upon the community.

To effect these desirable ends, the present associates agree to be governed as a society by the following Rules and Regulations:

A good preamble, truly. The name of the society was then, as Judge Godfrey correctly puts it, the Bangor Mechanic Association. The roll of membership of 1828, with statement of occupations, can hardly fail to be of interest now:

James Tilton, tanner; John Williams, saddler; Edward Sargent, house-wright; Zebulon Smith, watch-maker; Jacob Garland, cooper; Henry Call, copper-smith; Stephen Giddings, mason; Nathan B. Wiggin, John Sargent, house-wrights; David Meryman, mill-wright; Samuel Moore, hatter; Preston Jones, Edmund

Dole, cabinet-makers; Bradford Harlow, pump- and block-maker; James Burton, Jr., printer; Amaziah S. Moore, painter; Benjamin G. Campbell, tin-plate worker; Preserved B. Mills, tinner; Horatio Beale, painter; Stephen Gilman, cabinet-maker and carver; Edward H. Bayley, turner; Nathaniel Lincoln, carpenter; John S. Sayward, saddler; John Reynolds, tailor; William Emerson, cordwainer; William Seward, house-wright; Nathaniel Pierce, joiner; Ezra S. Brewster, printer; Reuben Bayley, Salmon Niles, house-wrights; Calvin Osgood, joiner; Andrew Maxfield, mason; William Robinson, house-wright; Gardner Brooks, chair-maker and painter; John Brown, house-wright; Joseph N. Downe, house-wright; Samuel Fellows, Samuel Eastman, David McDougal, blacksmiths; A. A. Dillingham, baker; Thomas Hancock, wheelwright; Gilman Merrill, John S. Carter, painters; Allen Clark, clothier; Isaac Hodsdon, Robert W. Yallalee, blacksmiths; Benjamin Richards, house-wright; Dexter E. Wadleigh, mason; Michael Sargent, Leonard L. Morse, Asa Davis, house-wrights; Gilbert Wallace, cooper; Isaac Bayley, blacksmith; George W. Maxim, house-wright; Joseph Wing, hatter; Cyrus Brown, house-wright; David Hill, cabinet-maker. Edward Sargent, James Tilton, John Williams, and Henry Call, with their associates, were designated as incorporators in the act of incorporation.

The original organization does not seem to have contemplated the formation of a library, except as "books as connected with mechanics" might be presented to it; or of a museum, except as "models of machines of new inventions" or drawings of machines which might also be given. All "shall be in the care of the secretary, subject to the direction of the Government [the Board of officers] and the inspection of the members." Near the close of 1829, however, the matter of a library came into agitation, and a committee appointed to consider the disposition of surplus funds, reported that an amount not exceeding $65 might well be expended for books and $15 for periodicals. The report was adopted. Gregory's Dictionary of Arts and Sciences, in three volumes, and three more of the old Encyclopedia Americana, with the accompanying book of plates, were accordingly bought; and subscriptions were made to the Library of Useful Knowledge and Silliman's Journal of Arts and Sciences. The seven books named formed the nucleus of the present fine collection. It was little suspected then what a superb local institution might in half a century grow out of this modest initial effort.

Among the curious objects presented to the association was the old printing press, formerly owned by the printer Peter Edes, and the first brought into the Penobscot Valley. It was purchased by a number of members of the society, and accepted at a meeting April 13, 1843. This venerable and interesting relic of old-time "black art" is now deposited in the chapel of the Bangor Theological Seminary.

A revision of the constitution and by-laws was adopted April 12, 1839, Article VII. of which says decisively that "the association shall collect and establish a library, museum of curiosities, and a cabinet of minerals, for the use and benefit of the members, their apprentices and families; which . . . shall be enlarged and improved from time to time, as the state of the funds will admit."

The new constitution was published to the world in 1839, and again in 1852, when a list of members was appended. There were now remaining in the society nine members of 1828, one of 1830, five of 1831, four of 1832, ten of 1833, fourteen of 1834, three of 1835, three of 1836, four of 1838, seven of 1839, seven of 1840, eleven of 1841, six of 1842, six of 1843, seven of 1844, ten of 1845, nineteen of 1846, four of 1847, seven of 1848, five of 1849, eighteen of 1850, eighteen of 1851, and two of 1852;—one hundred and seventy-nine in all.

Before 1860 the association had accumulated a fund of $600 and a library of several thousand volumes, with an attractive though not large museum. The money was lost mainly in an effort to give the local public a course of first-class lectures; but the library was kept together pretty well, and was well used. The average number per year, during the decade 1856-66, of books taken out by members and their families, was 2,072—in one year 2,585, and in another, the smallest, 1,337. The library has since greatly increased, especially by the addition from the Mercantile Library in 1874, and now contains about 16,800 volumes. Of these more than fourteen thousand are in circulation; the rest are reference books.

For many years the association exerted a marked and beneficial influence in the city. The school system, especially, owes much to it. During the last fifteen years the work of the society has greatly changed. Instead of meetings for discussion and mutual improvement, it now devotes its energies solely to the maintenance of the library. The trust fund for its support amounts to $12,000, the interest of which goes to the repair and purchase of books.

In the latter part of 1866 it was voted to open a subscription for a trust fund for the benefit of the library. This was done, and with eminent success. Franklin Muzzy and Thomas N. Egery headed it with $1,000 each; Willard Cutter and nine others gave $200 apiece; thirteen $100 subscriptions were made; and smaller sums were added to the total amount of $6,535. In May following the City Council accepted the subscription as a trust for the association, and the amount collected ($6,468.65) was invested in the securities of the United States. Upon the death of Mr. Muzzy in 1873 $4,000 were added to the fund under his will—which, with other sums, makes up the present trust of $12,000, held for the benefit of the library. Mr. Muzzy was mainly instrumental in raising the original subscription, and much of the success of the library is considered due to his exertions.

The early meetings of the association were held in Cram's Hall, on West Market Square. December 19, 1828, it was voted to remove to the hall of the Baptist meeting-house, where the association remained until April, 1834, when the "Mechanics' Lecture-room" in the third story of the Mercantile Block, Mercantile Square, was obtained and fitted up. In October, 1856, the first meetings were held in the new hall of the association in Granite Block, East Market Square. Upon the transfer of the Mercantile Library collection, the final removal was made to the present spacious quarters in the Kenduskeag Block, at the end of Kenduskeag Bridge, which had formerly been occupied by the Mercantile Association. The library had generally been kept in the hall of the Mechanics', except while in Mr. Sayward's shop. The old-time courteous and accommodating Librarian, Mr. Daniel Holman, one of the members of 1846, is still in charge. Any resident of Bangor, whether a member or not, may draw books from the library, on payment of $2 per year; and non-residents may also take books, at $4 a year, or may make more temporary arrangements. Any person may consult the library in the room, and such has always been the rule. The pages of this History owe much to the liberality of this arrangement, and the kindness of the Librarian and his assistant. This library is a most beneficent public institution.

The following-named gentlemen have served as Presidents of the association: James Tilton, 1828-30; John Williams, 1831-32; Henry Call, 1833-34; John Brown, 1835; Franklin Muzzy, 1836; J. S. Sayward, 1837; Samuel Ramsdell, 1838; A. R. Hallowell, 1839; P. B. Mills, 1840; James R. Macomber, 1841; N. B. Wiggin, 1842; O. S. Beale, 1843; William S. Mitchell, 1844; E. T. Fox, 1845; A. Leighton, 1846; William H. Perry, 1847; J. M. Lander, 1848; P. B. Rider, 1849; Rufus Prince, 1850; William Hall, 1851; J. Fogg, 1852; Edward Wiggin, 1853; T. H. Morse, 1854-55; J. W. Strange, 1856-57; Isaac Small, 1858-59; A. W. Benson, 1860; Charles Sawtelle, 1861-62; William S. Potter, 1863-64; M. Schwartz, 1865; Willard Cutter, 1866-69; Byron Porter, 1870-71 and 1874; George A. Davenport, 1872-73; C. B. Brown, 1875; F. M. Lawrence, 1876; Scott Dunbar, 1877-78; Bernhard Pol, 1879-80; G. W. Merrill, 1881.

Librarians: John Sargent, 1830; John S. Sayward, 1830-31 and '33 (Mr. S. had the library at his shop on Exchange street, and opened it every Saturday afternoon); James Burton, 1832; Reuben Bagley, 1834-35; C. H. Wing, 1836; Samuel Ramsdell, 1837; T. H. Morse, 1838; O. S. Beale, 1839; Moses Saunders, Jr., 1840; E. T. Fox, 1841; P. B. Rider, 1842; W. H. Perry, 1843; J. C. Mitchell, 1844; H. S. Brown, 1845; A. L. Perry, 1846; O. P. Sawtelle, 1847; Willard Cutter, 1848-49; L. W. Rogers, 1850-51; Daniel Holman, 1852-56, 1867 to this time; G. W. Orff, 1857; A. W. Benson, 1858; William S. Townsend, 1859-64; W. L. Seavey, 1865; W. H. H. Pitcher, 1866.

THE BANGOR MERCANTILE ASSOCIATION.

A meeting of the merchants of Bangor was called November 2, 1843, to take into consideration the forming of a society to be called the Bangor Mercantile Association. The meeting resulted in the association being formed, and the first choice of officers took place November 30, 1843, as follows: James Crosby, President; Thomas H. Sandford, Vice-President; Charles Hayward, Secretary; Francis M. Sabine, Treasurer; Isaiah Stetson, William H. Dow, Ezra Jewell, Waldo T. Pierce, Ephraim Moulton, Directors; George W. Pickering, Amos M. Roberts, John True, Solomon Parsons, James Jenkins, Board of Arbitration.

The association was incorporated by act of Legislature February 5, 1844.

At this time there was a small library in the city called the Bangor Social Library. The association proposed the purchase of the library, and during the year 1844 succeeding in obtaining it, or the use of it, on some terms not recorded. But evidently they still remained two distinct libraries; for the Librarian's Report for 1856 records that 275 volumes were added to the Mercantile Library and twenty-six to the Social Library. In April, 1858, a union seems to have been made of the two, on condition that all members of the Bangor Social Library Association be admitted to equal privileges in the Bangor Mercantile Association, which was probably done at that time, as there is no further mention of the Social Library.

The association held their meetings and had their library in various rooms; but for several years their library and reading-room was in Bowman's Block, over the Whig and Courier office, Kenduskeag Bridge.

There is no mention of a Librarian previous to 1847. Mr. Thomas Smith was appointed that year, and held the office till April 1, 1869, at which time he resigned, being quite advanced in years. E. H. Carr was appointed in his place.

January 27, 1871, the Mercantile Association moved their library, reading-rooms, etc., to the new rooms fitted up for them in Kenduskeag Block.

May 23, 1871, they voted to change the name of their association to the Bangor Library Association.

In 1870 the association was involved in debt, and therefore considered the matter of transferring their property to the Mechanics' Association, on condition that the latter would assume the liabilities of the Library Association, and also admit all the citizens of Bangor to the use of their books and the privileges of membership. By December of that year the association was $3,500 in debt, and on the 15th of the month they voted to transfer their entire library and all other property of the association to the Mechanics' Association. January 27, 1874, the transfer was accomplished.

At the last meeting of the Mercantile, July 10th following, a final statement of the financial standing of the association showed that all indebtedness had been cancelled, and that a balance of $357.35 had been passed into the treasury of the Bangor Mechanics' Association, with assessments further amounting to more than $100. The thanks of the association were tendered to the reporting officer, Treasurer F. M. Sabine, who had held the office from the organization of the association in 1843, a period of thirty-one years of gratuitous service. It was voted that all books, papers, etc., of the society (records of treasurer and secretary) be turned over to the Bangor Mechanics' Association; and the association adjourned to meet no more.

WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE UNION.*

In 1874 the pioneers of the Women's Christian Temperance Union were among the women of Bangor whose hearts the stories of their sisters' thrilling deeds in the West had kindled to a like warfare of love.

They were a part of the earnest, determined band which, in March of that year, formed themselves into "The Women's Temperance Crusade," in response to the following paragraph in the Daily Whig of March 3—the first summons to the new movement:

A meeting is to be held in Temperance Hall at 2 o'clock next Thursday afternoon, to organize a praying band of ladies who will visit the saloons in the city after the manner of similar organizations in the West.

Some of them were among the most active and energetic workers in that time of inspiration and of hope, as well as among the small number, fervent and faithful, who might well be called the prayer-mothers of that association. One of them has been spoken of as "the grand, fervent, and maternal presence to whom all hearts spontaneously turned for a leader;" and one was the devoted, efficient, and gifted secretary,—first of the Crusade, and then of the Union,—whose "labors more abundant" from that time to this have filled the whole of her heart and her life.

Within a year and a half from the organization of the Crusade, the Reform Club, of men redeemed from the spells of the poison-cup through the influence of this mother-society, had taken an engrossing place in its charities and labors, and the devoted desire to "stand by our fallen brothers" seemed to eclipse that radiant zeal for the removal of the tempting demon which had been the first inspiration of the Crusade.

Our little handful of pioneers, regretting the narrowed scope of a work whose possibilities were daily broadening before them, and drawn anew by the tidings of the Woman's National Union, then just entering upon its comprehensive warfare, began—first individually, and then collectively—to see some important things waiting to be done which no existing organization even attempted; and conscience said to them, "These things may be the very work appointed of God for you."

While cordially approving and sympathizing in the work of the Crusade, and wishing them a hearty God-speed in its continuance, they could not bear to be themselves unfaithful to the light they saw, by turning away from the many avenues of work which opened before them. They longed, among other things, to try what their feeble efforts might do, if sustained and energized by a Higher Power, to arouse the churches to a keener appreciation of the terrible curse, and a more earnest and systematic participation in the warfare against it, than it seemed to them then existed; "they longed to lend hand and soul to their sisters in other States, whose battle is so hard and faithful against the legalized traffic in death;" and many other longings filled their hearts and beckoned them on.

They believed also that two associations could carry out these desires, in addition to doing the work of the Crusade, far better than one; but the struggling, half-defined hope within them pointing to a new organization, was indulged only in the spirit shown to be still existing by the first annual report: "We remain in friendly and unaffected good will towards all the associations which are unselfishly laboring for the removal of the great curse. It is designed not to antagonize, but to supplement and fulfil."

The decision, however, to form another organization was not hastily made, nor without deliberation and prayer. For many weeks after this partial revealing of a new way, they met weekly for prayer and conference. Courage came with prayer. Their hope grew stronger daily and their purpose clearer. Their first quickening thought had come in the early winter; but the month of May had almost dropped its last blossoms, and the decisive step was not yet taken. If they unconsciously waited for a sign, such as was given to holy men of old on occasions when their faith strode less like a conqueror than in those days it was wont to do, such a token came.

At this crisis, when the embryo power seemed all ready to speak and move—and did not—but waited for the Almighty to breathe into it a living soul, these ladies learned that the "Women's International Temperance Conference," which had been appointed for June 12, at Philadelphia, had received, as yet, no greeting from the State which aspires to be leader in the noble work of law, and that no one of her daughters had been commissioned as a delegate. This was the "dew on the fleece" that confirmed their shrinking hearts. For had they not acted now, and formed themselves into a body authorized to send such delegate, their State, with her splendid record for temperance shining on her statute books, would have had no representation in one of the noblest of the world's conventions.

Pressed by this urgent motive, they hastened at once (June 6, 1876), to organize themselves into a new association, and to give it the name of "The Women's Christian Temperance Union." Immediately after, according to the record of the Corresponding Secretary, "they elected and qualified as a delegate to the 'International Conference,' Mrs. Benjamin Plummer, whose understanding testimony to the efficacy, both of our noble law and of the "Women's Movement," was eagerly listened to and could not have been spared from the conference, as the only voice raised there for the Commonwealth which has so many years been banner-bearer in the great social reform, and for the city which, first in New England, reflected the light of the Western beacon-fires."

After addressing a letter of sisterly greeting to "The Women's Temperance Crusade," and establishing their weekly business meeting and an open prayer-meeting, to which they hoped to draw many other temperance-loving Christians, the little "Union" was fairly launched upon its work.

Using the Corresponding Secretary's annual reports as the substance of our story, we will give a sketch of this work for the five years of its existence, joining her record of '76-'77 on to our imperfect beginning, at the month of July:

In July we began a series of prayer and conference meetings with the churches, which proved a blessing to ourselves and, we believe, a boon to those who received us. We sought to carry our work of prayer and of Christian endeavor against the great evil into every church, to be strengthened by their sympathies, and perchance to speak a word of awakening, if any careless sons and daughters were too much at ease in Zion.

In this plan we were met with courtesy and God-speed by nearly all the pastors. In the meetings they joined with us heart and voice, and the doors were opened to us of all the Protestant churches except two, in which women's speaking is much against the traditions. We held nine such meetings between July 23 and January 14.

The round of the churches having thus been made, in February the Union invited the pastors to co-operate with us in establishing a monthly union prayer-meeting of all the societies. Their co-operation was promised, and on Monday evening, February 19th, the first such meeting was held in the Union Street Methodist church, and we looked forward to another course of happy and successful effort in this direction.

These meetings were, however, unexpectedly prevented by the Rev. G. F. Pentecost's visit to the city at that time. His religious meetings "awoke a greater interest than has been seen in the place for many years, absorbing the attention of the churches, as well as bringing in scores of the hitherto indifferent.

The multitude of meetings which resulted from this visit left no room for the monthly prayer-unions.

The Union held this year, besides the meetings just named, and those held weekly, four public meetings at City Hall, two of which were for lectures by the brilliant lecturer, Professor George E. Foster, of Fredericton, and by the popular speaker, Mrs. Abby S. Doutney, of Massachusetts; occasional prayer-meetings at private houses, and one at the jail.

Another series of gatherings also, of a different nature, are yet to be added, viz., mission meetings at the Maine Central Depot, commenced on Sunday afternoon, May 6th.

"The work has been continued for the succeeding Sundays," says the Secretary on June 6th, "some clergymen and some singers giving us most welcome aid. We have had meetings of deep interest, and in those throngs of young hearts hungering for the bread of life we find a call to gratefully devote to the service of God and humanity, in this Mission, more of time, of strength, of whatever gift may be ours, than ever before."

During the summer of 1876 the members of the Union commenced visiting the rumsellers of the city (the visitors, at one time, never exceeding two in number); for they felt that—

For that chiefest robber who robs his brother of his soul, if he is chief of sinners, he most needs our redeeming love. . . .

This effort of Christian charity was begun August 29, 1876, and sustained at irregular intervals till May 1, 1877, when it was made a regular weekly business. Those who visit are sustained by the prayers which are offered for them at home, and are led on by the unspeakable pity which sees precious manhood, time, and all divine gifts squandered in the gambling, profanity, drunkenness, idleness, degradation, and despair of these dens of iniquity. Our pledges have been accepted by some whom we find there, as well as by many others.

The Union commenced the work of tract distribution in the City Soup-house in January, 1877.

Temperance documents and papers, religious tracts, and a variety of interesting reading matter were procured by gift and purchase, according to our means, and received at the Soup-house with greatest pleasure by the children, by the countrymen, and in short, by all classes. A weekly distribution was continued there till the Soup-house was closed, April 7th.

This work soon expanded into a more general distribution.

Several of the religious publishing houses gave us freely of their issues, which, with temperance and other papers, have been systematically distributed in the jail and lockup, in rum-shops, and sailor boarding-houses, and in some business streets.

The police-station was visited with coffee and the pledge for the unfortunate waifs, thrown in there day to day by the "crime of crimes," from March 4 to April 8, when other workers became interested and undertook the mission.

In active support of the national work we have tried to contribute our mite, having sent 118 subscriptions to the newspaper organ of the society. We have had the satisfaction of witnessing the growth of a marked interest in the State and National work.

Our financial support rests on a basis exceedingly simple—it being to pass the hat at our public meetings, and to put our hands in our own pockets in the interval. If our public meetings were more frequent, and our pockets deeper, our work could greatly expand. With our time and strength all claimed by the direct work of temperance, we have not undertaken to earn money by entertainments, or by personal solicitation.

We know what it is to be footsore and few, to be poor and perplexed, but we have not yet found out what it may be to lose our courage and our faith. In the cold weather we have carried to our place of meeting sticks of wood in mystic wrappers on our arms, and bundles of shavings, invisible, under our shawls, and the altar-fire within has never burned low.

Our growth as a society has been steady and gratifying, our membership having more than doubled since the first trembling ten of us launched our Mayflower.

At the close of the next year (1877-78) the Secretary, after recording the continuance and prosperity of the weekly business and prayer meetings, says:

Our report of last year records the opening meetings of the Maine Central Depot Mission. This has to tell of its successful continuance till the end of September. This mission was no holiday task, in our inexperience, in the imperfect accommodations and distance of the place, the heats of the season, and the roughness of the material we are attempting to mould. But we feel our toils repaid when we count up some of the known results; besides the cases of individual light and blessing confessed to us, the many names there given to the pledge, and the fervent entreaties to us to "come and hold some more meetings!" . . . We have learned that patience and practice will sharpen even such dull tools as we confess ourselves to be, and that it pays to make acquaintance with the "elbow-heathen." . . . Our congregation at the depot was gathered from those who seldom or never enter any other such meeting. We have been assisted in these meetings by words in season from some of our pastors, and from non-resident pastors, and by the voices of several of our favorite singers.

Our visiting at the rum-shops and distribution of temperance literature in shops, streets, or wharves, etc., was continued till November. The visits were of the same painful interest as ever, and of the "souls rescued from their sinful way" we do not count with certainty even one for every dram-shop; but though our harvest may be not many sheaves, yet is already enough to richly repay our labors. . . . Many thousand pages of our literature have been distributed thus.

In December and January wall-pockets were put up in the railroad depots, conveniently disposed for ticket-buyers, which were weekly furnished with five to eight hundred pages of reading matter, of a style both entertaining and useful, and this was continued till April. We have heard of passengers on out-going trains profiting by the gift to speed the slow hours; but in all these distributions we trust that much more good is wrought than can possibly come to our hearing.

At all our meetings we furnish the National Leaflets, or some other tract, chiefly educational, as recommended by the Woman's National Union; and we have also complied with their plan in the appointment of our own Literature Committee, who have made a promising beginning in the further work laid out.

The appointment of the 13th of December as a national day of prayer, made by the Chicago Convention, found us most happy to obey the call. Such days of union and unison of voice and spirit are the fitting feasts of a cause so full of brotherhood as is the temperance movement of the present day.

The Sunday before, December 9, seven of the ten Protestant preachers then occupying pulpits in the city had made temperance the subject of discourse, in response to the invitation which we had extended to them from the National Union;—an auspicious precedent.

No month has passed since the close of the Depot Mission without some presentation of our cause to the public ear, either by words of our own, or of able speakers, or by lectures in aid of our working fund. In October we had an enthusiastic meeting at Pine Street church, the speakers being Mr. and Mrs. D. W. Hunt, of Indiana; in November a highly interesting and instructive address from Rev. Dr. Hamlin, upon "Islam and Wine," at Hammond Street church; in December the prayer and mass-meetings in City Hall; in January the excellent lecture by Rev. Mr. Bolton, on "The Three H's that Win," in City Hall, for the benefit of our treasury; in February the admirable address upon "Woman and Temperance," delivered in the Unitarian church by Mrs. Eliza K. Churchill, of Providence; in March a literary lecture by the same speaker, for which tickets were sold, from which we hoped to derive a profit.

April 28 we began a second series of meetings with the churches, upon a plan differing from those of the first year in giving special prominence to the Bible reading, the central thought of which is followed up by the speakers as the controlling thought of the evening.

These have been among the most effective meetings we have had. The record is not complete without the mention of the meeting of June 7, 1877, which opened the year, at which the natural gladness of an anniversary in good work was enhanced by the sympathetic and encouraging address of Rev. Professor Barbour, and the enthusiasm of Rev. Mr. Angier.

Near the commencement of the record of the year 1878-79 the Secretary says:—

Following our anniversary meeting of last June, which owed much to the earnest addresses of two of our faithful temperance men,—Rev. Dr. Hamlin and Rev. Mr. Bolton,—the special meetings of last summer were those of the Maine Central Depot Mission.

After a series of memorable experiences in the preliminaries, these were commenced on June 30, the "hot Sunday," and continued four weeks. We had great difficulty in procuring seats, and owing to the lack of shipping and sailors in the port, and to other causes, our congregation was not of the same character as the previous season, nor such as we especially hoped for. Some good work was done there, and not in vain, we trust, but the Mission was not as successful as it should have been to justify our continued outlay, and was therefore closed.

In October we succeeded in procuring the services of Miss Lucia E. F. Kimball, of Chicago, Superintendent of the Sunday-school work of the National Union, who held a series of effective meetings and created an interest in the subject of Sunday-school temperance work, such as was greatly needed in our churches, and will prove, we trust, not a quick-growing and quick-withering plant on shallow soil, but a strong and living tree, rich in fruit for time and eternity.

Preparatory to her coming, the Union had invited thirteen Sunday-schools to join in a temperance concert on Sunday afternoon, October 20, at Hammond Street Church, where Superintendent Daggett had arranged the presentation of one of Miss Kimball's concert exercises, "The Test of the Rechabites."

Miss Kimball addressed the children at this meeting, winning their ears, eyes, and hearts at once with her lessons and her object-teaching, and that evening delivered a thoughtful and suggestive lecture on "Temperance Training," at the First Parish Church. The following evening, by invitation from the Union, a conference of pastors, superintendents, teachers, and "all interested," was held at the Baptist Chapel, and addressed by Miss Kimball, who presented the simple and serviceable "Plan" of the Woman's National Union, for systematic temperance work in Sunday-schools, and persuasively urged its adoption. She also spoke in the City Hall on Tuesday evening, the 22d, upon "Gospel Temperance Work in Chicago."

The plan of the systematic temperance lessons was so new to our Sunday-schools that the work of securing its adoption has proved, as we were warned it would do, one requiring time, much personal labor, and reiterated explanation, as one after another becomes interested to inquire into it.

In furtherance of the work begun by Miss Kimball, the Union held two more conferences, participated in by many of those interested, who missed the first one, and has since appointed a committee of its own members to take the work in charge. These have labored diligently, but this work is great enough for twice their number.

But this year goes out with bright omen and definite advance, with the news that one of our churches has joined in the national system,—the Second Baptist having notified us of their intention to assign the quarterly lesson, appoint the Secretary, and carry out the further suggestions of the Plan, so far as practicable. This is heartily encouraging. . . . Several Superintendents, while declining to establish a regular temperance lesson, have promised to give some time to it. . . . We have distributed many specimens of the admirable lesson-leaves prepared by Miss Coleman, and are confident that they will win their way.

December 23, the day ever memorable as that on which our gentle "Mother Thompson," of Hillsboro', first led forth her crusade band to deliver the loved ones and close the rum-shop door, we thankfully marked with a commemorative service, held in the Baptist Chapel. By invitation, the Women's Temperance Crusade united with us in the services.

The preceding Sunday had been designated at Baltimore as our "National Temperance Sunday," and four of our city pastors had accepted our invitation to preach a temperance sermon that day,—two others being prevented by Christmas services, taking an early opportunity thereafter to address their people on this subject.

With profound thankfulness must we temperance women confess our debt to the clergymen of Bangor, who have been and are a tower of strength to the cause. We have leaned upon their faithfulness, and not found it wanting.

January 2 and 3 saw the fulfillment of long cherished desires of our Union, in the assembling in this city of the Massachusetts convention called by the State Union, in aid of which we had been glad to be enabled to offer a promised address from our eloquent Canadian friend, Professor George E. Foster, and the use of City Hall. Our citizens hospitably opened their homes in entertainment of our visitors, and the Women's Crusade joining us in welcome to the delegations, it was to us all an occasion of pleasure and profit, and gave a good impulse to the work in this community.

January 5 Professor Foster delivered a lecture for our society, entitled, "Reforms and Reformers," compact of his strong logic and fit illustration, to a large and attentive audience, at the First Methodist church.

The Union held three Bible temperance meetings in churches this year, occasional saloon and station visiting was done, a few private prayer-meetings were held by invitation, and the Month of Prayer was observed by additional weekly prayer-meetings, with special subjects. Also, the members united in five scientific temperance readings, for their own benefit.

Early in February a piece of work was given us to do of a kind wholly new in our experience, in the circulation of the "Petition of the National Union for relief and inquiry." This petition, asking Congress to do its utmost to keep the drink traffic out of the country, and to establish the commission of inquiry thrice passed by the Senate and smothered in the House, was welcomed as the embodied voice of many soul-felt hopes and prayers, and we girded ourselves for our first step in the path at the end of whose long vista shines a glorious goal.

The blanks came late, and we had but five days in which to circulate them, and one of these was stormy. We took our bows and arrows and went a-hunting. Homes, stores, counting-rooms, and workshops we invaded, and came out rich in trophies and experience.

Six hundred and twenty-eight signatures were secured, a little more than one-third of which were women. Seven of our city pastors signed,—we had not time to see them all,—Seminary professors and a Presiding Elder; prominent members of all the learned professions—except the editorial—and of almost every honest occupation; office-holders, bankers, merchants; the comprehending ones who said, "Now you are striking at the root—amen," and those who, though hopeless for their own lifetime, yet were glad to do their duty; the white-haired, reverend scholar of nearly four-score years and ten, and the youth to whom our talk was the first hint of a glorious possibility that lies before his coming ballot. One sheet contained the names of seventeen of the grand jury, then in session, and the sum of them all was a weighty representation of the character, intelligence, and enterprise of the city, as well as of its social refinement and culture.

Among the resolutions adopted by the State Convention, none has called us to action with a more profound sense of its importance than that which urges the introduction of exact teaching upon the nature and effects of alcohol into the public schools, as one of the most effective safeguards against the drinking habit.

The movement in England, and its success in Sweden, are constant encouragement to us, if we needed more than its utter reasonableness to urge it here. A prompt indorsement was given to the suggestion in the sermon of one of our leading clergymen soon after the convention, and the proposition continues to meet with emphatic approval from growing numbers of our most thoughtful people.

Upon the election of the new Board of Superintending School Committee, at the end of March, we made the formal request that they would introduce the study of scientific temperance into the public school course in such a way as to reach the greatest number of scholars—proposing Richardson's Temperance Lesson Book for the high school, and the Catechism on Alcohol for the intermediate and suburban grades. The board met our delegation in a conference at their committee-room, April 8, heard our plea with courteous attention, and have had the text-books under examination, but we are not informed what their decision will be for the next school year.

April 22 we held a mass meeting in City Hall, in support of the movement for scientific temperance teaching, which was well attended by an intelligent audience, and addressed by several of our most able and experienced educators, in strong advocacy of the idea. We had weighty support in Professors Hamlin, Sewall, and Paine, Hon. A. G. Wakefield, and Rev. Mr. Spear.

In the important department of the literature work, progress has been made during the year. Ninety subscriptions have been sent to the newspaper organ, Our Union—our premiums amounting to $10.70.

In July we began a canvass with Mrs. Wittenmeyer's History of the Woman's Temperance Crusade, the book of which Rev. Dr. Hamlin has said—and we may give credence to such an expert: "There is no book of modern times, I am quite sure, which exhibits so much of human nature in all its shades, from sootiest black to purest white. It is a book which every lawyer, legislator, voter, physician, and minister should read. It exhibits courage never equaled at Plevna, benevolence and humility unsurpassed on earth, and devilry right out of hell." Nine copies have been given away, and forty-two sold, at a net profit of $13.75.

In this kind of money-getting we feel that we are spending our strength on a two-edged weapon, and directly promoting the cause in the circulation of the book. For there is nowhere to be found an arraignment of the monstrous traffic so biting as this plain, unvarnished story of its acts toward women. . . . Upon the other literature there is no profit to our purse.

Holding no public meeting in March, we called upon the excellent leaflet, "Let the Church Awake," to speak for us, and distributed nine hundred and twenty-five of these in the different churches. We have distributed about eight thousand three hundred pages of these and other tracts during the year. We have also sold since January one hundred and eleven books and pamphlets, besides twenty packets of Union leaflet, and five of children's tracts.

The only remaining extracts which will be given from this year's report refer to the following facts: In September, 1878, a Sheriff well known to be a friend of the drink-traffic, was elected; and in March a Mayor, who, it was generally supposed, would not enforce the prohibitory law, and who confirmed the supposition by saying in his inaugural—after quoting a few lines from the city charter touching the duties of the Chief Executive Magistrate: "If I can cause the regulations of the city to be executed and enforced, I shall feel that I have done my whole duty in this respect, and do not propose to magnify my office by going beyond the limits marked out in the city ordinance."

But we have been told that our work is a failure. The charge is a serious one, and so often made, summons us at this beginning of another year to seriously consider the situation, and if we are in fault, to amend our methods.

Then, after "considering the situation," and eloquently painting the effects of this unchaining of the insatiate demon, the Secretary continues:

Is this, then, our failure? But our will and taste have not been consulted in the matter. It is some one's failure. It is shameful and sorrowful. Being but women, we continue to pray.

We confess our feebleness; we have indeed failed to attain the full measure of our desires. But when a grand work for humanity appeals, implores for helpers, and reels under the mailed fist of the smiter, then that criticism which simply stands apart and blames its weakness—not that trembling effort which does its faithful best to uphold the bruised and shaking limb—is the failure.

But we are told our work "is a failure, because men talk temperance and vote rum!" Ah! this is the oldest story of all, that has echoed down to us from creation's dawn—man's sin is woman's fault. Truly the blood of Adam still flows in the veins of his sons.

We see failure, but we see success also. We see the stains fading from faces we are wont to meet, and heads held erect that were hung down. We see a new energy and higher life in temperance organizations, and a deeper and broader thought of what this reform means. May it grow abundantly.

We have seen a quiet and happy quickening of spiritual life in some of our churches, and lives blessedly won from the service of appetite to the service of God. One church has, for a part of the year, set apart one service in each month for temperance. And when the church shall be awake in all her members, we shall hear no more of failure.

And more than these, we, standing within these walls, as women do, see tokens in many a home of the growing care, and thought, and love of women for this cause, which is woman's cause as none other has ever been—except that which was born in a manger at Bethlehem. And this growing care is full of hopefulness, for when temperance is loved, and served, and taught, as it should be, in the home, the sons will not love and serve the poison in the streets.

We are thus introduced to the work of the year 1879—80 :

The year's labor has been carried on, according to our ability, in each of the three great branches into which the national movement has resolved itself; the religious, the educational, and the legal.

Under the first head we must name our own most prized weekly prayer meetings, without whose cheer we should be unable to face our difficulties and continue in the warfare. These are open and free to all who may like to join us.

We have held forty-four prayer meetings, including three of national appointment or significance, viz: October 17, for the Indianapolis Convention; the Crusade Anniversary, December 23; and for temperance throughout our land, January 2; to supply the omission of the subject from the following week of prayer. The last named meeting was held in City Hall, forenoon and afternoon, with a change of subjects and leaders each hour, and a new Bible lesson.

In the sphere of religious work will be reckoned our Sunday-school effort, which has made progress. Last June one exercise of fifteen minutes in one school was all the specific temperance teaching we could learn of in the Sunday-schools of the city for several months. This year we have reports showing active temperance work in many of the schools, and the beginning of an awakening in some others. There is every encouragement to press forward.

Of the eight schools which the Secretary says have done some temperance work in the past year, we will quote the record of the three most favorable :

The Second Methodist, four quarterly lessons, and one concert. First Congregational, four quarterly lessons, five opening exercises of fifteen minutes each, one concert, one address before the school, twenty-two copies of "Youths' Temperance Banner," and a growing interest. Second Baptist, four quarterly lessons, four concerts, two addresses before the school, eleven copies of the "Banner" used, and much interest among both teachers and scholars.

The Union lesson-leaves (Miss Colman's) have been used in five of these schools and have received high praise from superintendents and teachers.

The educational work of the year was begun in what is doubtless the proper quarter—at home—ten meetings of our own members being held last summer for scientific reading, and one to read the "Maine Law."

Our cause has a rich, worthy, and convincing literature, and we believe the old method of "precept upon precept, line upon line," has not lost its virtue. Forty-nine books, ninety-one pamphlets, one thousand five hundred and fifty lesson-leaves, and two thousand and thirty-seven pages of tracts have been sold, three thousand five hundred and twenty-two pages distributed by Union funds, and about one thousand pages given as specimens, for which the national and local committees have paid.

That scientific temperance instruction must be given to the children in the public schools of America, is no longer an open question. The problem to-day is to overcome the inertia of school committees in the shortest possible time.

But we have taken a lesson from our brothers' books, and observed that when they wish any line of public policy pursued they elect to office such men as will pursue it. Finding, as the weeks passed into months, that the School Committee were not likely to introduce the study of temperance, and feeling that every consideration of humanity was for it (and nothing against it but superstition, inherited from a dark age of philosophy, which named brandy "water of life"), the resolve was taken in our meeting of July 31, to petition the Legislature of Maine to give women the privilege of voting for School Committees, as seven other States had already done. When we are among their constituents they will take more interest in the book.

The proposed movement for school committee suffrage for women was submitted to the State Union at the next annual meeting in October, unanimsly adopted as a branch of the State work, and petitions to the Legislature issued in December for general circulation. But the disturbed condition of affairs at the capital soon induced the committee to suspend the canvass, and postpone the appeal to the Legislature another year. The petition was received with much favor in this city, in the brief period it was in circulation, and we believe it will be numerously signed when the canvass is resumed.

Meanwhile we have continued our efforts to persuade committees, by other arguments than the ballot. Our first work in this direction this year was a lecture from Professor George E. Foster, entitled, "Formative Influences, or the Place of Temperance in Education." This was delivered September 21, at a union meeting in Central Church, conducted by the pastor, assisted by Rev. R. L. Howard. The lecture, luminous with fine logic and elevated feeling, was not only an able argument for temperance in the schools, but was in itself an educative influence of rare quality, and was listened to with keen enjoyment by a large and appreciative audience.

The State annual meeting, held in this city soon after, afforded our public another opportunity for consideration of the educational movement, in listening to the exquisite address of Mrs. Mary H. Hunt, of Boston.

April 13 we again procured the assistance of Mrs. Hunt, who delivered a lecture on "Forces that Have Shaped Destiny," in City Hall. It was well attended and full of unanswerable persuasion to the introduction of the study.

The next day Rev. Mr. Spear courteously opened his house for a parlor conference, to which we invited the School Committee, and a number of other friends, to confer with Mrs. Hunt upon practical aspects of this most vital movement against the drink system. Two of the committee were present, and expressed themselves at the close in a manner most cheering to our hopes.

On April 20 we sent the petition* to the School Committee, officially signed for our society, with the added request that they would give us a hearing at an early date. We have, as yet, received no reply to either request, but we still look hopefully forward to the beginning of the school year in September.

We have this year made greater use of the printing press than ever before in our efforts for the education of the community in temperance work. Our last annual report was unable to find entrance into the columns of the daily papers which had hitherto published such reports, owing, we supposed, to the criticisms made upon the Mayor's course towards the Prohibitory Law. We, therefore, after waiting three weeks for the usual publication, decided to print it ourselves as a "Temperance Extra," and July 5 issued two thousand copies, eighteen hundred of which were distributed in this city, and two hundred over the country. It seemed to be an attractive form of publication, and many copies were ordered from our own and other States.

The success of the attempt was a suggestion to try again. During the summer it was observed that the news columns of the Whig were unusually laden with exhibits of the results of free liquors.

The idea took shape that a resume of the principal fruits of the traffic as they had happened to be brought to the attention of one newspaper man, would be instructive reading to the citizens of Bangor, who bear the burdens of all this vice and crime. The Union accordingly resolved, in January, to issue a sort of reprint from the Whig, and before this was out some temperance work was done, in which the public manifested much interest, and of which they had in the daily press no candid or adequate report. Our second Temperance Extra, March 1st, had, therefore, a full freight of matter, and more than full. Too small though, it was, with important articles crowded out, prepared in many difficulties, paying its way with desperate exertions, and falling far short of our wishes, the little paper achieved so much of success that, at home, it pleased none of the enemies of our cause and was very gratifying to our friends, and abroad the children of intemperance cry for it, and hundreds of copies have been sent to order to every quarter of the compass, from Maine to "Kansas."

To meet the expense of our paper we depend upon the advertising, and some friends of the cause who had nothing to advertise offered donations of money, which were not refused.

It remains to speak of our effort in the direction of the law. The details of our action and experience in this field have been given in the Temperance Extra at greater length than they can be here, but we must attempt a concise summary of its cause and course, and relate the sequel, for the occasion is memorable.

The Secretary then gives the fact which has been already alluded to here, viz: That the Mayor who was inaugurated in the last year had declined to enforce the prohibitory law,—and continues,

In less than three months from his declaration, there were one hundred and twenty places where liquor was openly sold, and a demoralized social sentiment in regard to drinking had become conspicuous, which seemed to sympathize and keep pace with the official disregard of the law. . . . The Whig of February 4th stated that "there are more prisoners in the county jail bound over to await the action of the Grand Jury, than has been known for several years."

By autumn of last year this condition of affairs was the frequent subject of comment from our own citizens and from visitors, and protest and appeal against the nullification of the prohibitory law welled up from the friends of temperance on every hand. In November the Union resolved to petition the Mayor and Aldermen to enforce the law according to the statutory commandment, and in December eight of our members, assisted by four friends, circulated petitions to that effect for signatures of citizens. Nearly thirteen hundred men and women signed this petition, a large majority of them with heartfelt expressions of sorrow, shame, or indignation at his unchecked license of the drink-traffic in defiance of the State law.

Our petition was presented to the Mayor and Aldermen in a special meeting January 23d, and arguments in its support offered by two members of the Union. No answer was given at that meeting of the Board, which was a small one, but another was appointed to consider whether the prayer should be granted or not. By invitation from the Mayor some of our members again appeared before the Board January 27th, and the principal argument was repeated. A strong body of political and official supporters of the Mayor was in attendance.

Having been warned that it would be well to have some friends there, the Union had invited a few temperance men to lend us the support of their presence. To the five who, by unimpeachable testimony, sound argument, keen and pertinent questioning, turned our Thermopylae into a Bunker Hill,—annihilation impending into a presage of victory,—the cause of temperance owes a debt not small nor soon to be forgotten. For, though the day's triumph was unquestionably on the side of the most Greeks, yet we do not fear to trust the discussion to the serenity of the world, secure that where the personal popularity, political drill, and official weight, which were so strong against us, are not felt, it will be conceded that our petition deserved success if it did not achieve it. And there is no permanent defeat to a right cause. After Bunker Hill, Yorktown.

About a week after this "hearing" an official reply was made to the petition through the columns of the Whig, which, of course, was a denial of the request. It is pleasant to state that this reply was accompanied by a minority report of two Aldermen recommending that the petition be granted.

If any one in future years should be called upon to continue this hasty story of the Bangor Union, for some other good book, God grant that the Secretary's prophecy may shine over the page as a triumphal announcement—"after Bunker Hill, Yorktown!"

The Union's labors since the closing of its fourth year in June, 1880, must be concisely told, not only because our space is nearly exhausted, but because, though work has been carried on with diligence and fortitude not exceeded in any previous years, yet much of it has been of such character as yields few finished and concrete results for the reporter's pen.

July 1st Temperance Extra No. 3 was published, containing the annual report:

Of public meetings, the first was the anniversary, observed in City Hall, on June 15th, the others were an interesting lecture from Miss Lucia E. F. Kimball, of Chicago, in Hammond Street Congregational church, September 27th, on "The Necessity of a National Quarantine Against the Liquor Traffic;" a temperance Bible reading at Union Street Methodist Episcopal church, November 21st; another at Essex Street Free-will Baptist church, November 28th; and a third at Brewer Methodist Episcopal church, held by invitation from its pastor, December 19th. A parlor conference was also held with Miss Kimball, September 27th, at which she organized the Young Women's Christian Temperance Union, which has held a few meetings for scientific reading, and given two successful entertainments for the public.

In September we were cheered by the announcement that the Superintending School Committee had voted the introduction of Richardson's Temperance Lesson Book into the High-school. For this reward of our two years' perseverance, we gave thanks; and were encouraged, upon the publication of Miss Colman's "Alcohol and Hygiene," in November, to ask for its introduction into the Grammar schools as a text-book. This request has not yet been complied with.

But the work of this year which has most fully absorbed the hearts and energies of the Union, was a temperance coffee-house, which was opened early in January. There is opportunity enough for the saving mission of one of these beneficent institutions, though such an opportunity as could only exist in our prohibitory State through the misgovernment of our rulers.

We have room but for a flying glance at this work, with no details of its interesting and valuable experiences. A fund of $150 was given by friends of the cause for us starting, and the experiment was sustained for eight months with brave patience and an ever-growing conviction of the blessed usefulness of such a work, and then closed October 1st, with the announcement to the public that it would not be reopened in the same place, which was unfavorable, both for location and for rent.

A recent letter from the Secretary sums it up as follows:

Although this period was too short to develop financial success out of our inexperience, and against many adverse influences, yet it was long enough to demonstrate the value and benefit to the cause of having a headquarters or bureau, known as a place where temperance influences were always to be found; and long enough to make a good beginning of the development of that essential idea that the respectable part of the community can effectually cripple, and eventually conquer, the liquor traffic, by withdrawing all business patronage from the trade, and that until such withdrawal is heartily entered upon, religious, legal, and educational suasions will still lack an ally necessary to success. We found a class of patrons, appreciably large and capable of exerting great influence, who were forbidden, either by taste or principle, to patronize the rum shops while a temperance restaurant was within reach, and we found in the coffee-house an opportunity for the development and extension of this class. But though this work will continue to be needed for a long time, yet it is one that requires for its continuance a financial strength, or a business experience, which the Union could not furnish.

But, in spite of this indefinite delay of cherished hopes, we think those who have thoughtfully read this sketch will believe with us that "the fire within which had never burned low" in 1877, will, in 1881, still warm and light these women of the Temperance Union; if to victory, for the quickening of their hopes and endeavors, and the good of humanity; if to defeat, for the kindling of the new fervor and courage which defeat also inspires in the God-born soul of man, and the good to their fellow beings which disappointment and temporary defeat only make more sure and glorious.

WOMEN'S CHRISTIAN TEMPERANCE CRUSADE.*

When the women of the West lifted their voices in prayer and supplication to Almighty God for strength to go out and battle against the liquor traffic, the echoes of the conflict reached our own good State, stirring the hearts of many, and an earnest desire was felt to join forces against a demon who was filling our land with so much sin, misery, and shame.

True, our own good State of Maine had a prohibition wall around it. Yet we knew the enemy had scaled the wall, battered down its gates, bringing in his emissaries, establishing them in dark places behind curtains; day and night his work goes on, sending to a premature grave the most gifted, the brightest intellects of our land.

At length a call was made to the women of Bangor to come forward and join hands in the work. From this movement a society, known as the Women's Christian Temperance Crusade, was formed, being the first of the kind in the State.

The call was made in February. A permanent organization was not effected until March 26, consisting of a President, Secretary, Treasurer, with a Vice-President from each church. Then commenced the work in earnest.

A club of young men was formed during the summer, called the Crusade Club, to help the ladies in their work. This was of short duration, and rendered but little service.

In the meantime the Women's Crusade were visiting the police station, carrying hot coffee and the pledge, trying earnestly to induce these unfortunates, made so by the use of strong drink, to seek a higher and better life by signing the pledge.

Their efforts in this direction met with good success, and many date their reform from that place of confinement.

All places where liquors were sold were visited, and urgent appeals made for the discontinuance of the same.

The city was thoroughly canvassed for signatures to the total abstinence pledge.

Appeals to the churches for united effort met a favorable response. Mass meetings were held in the largest halls, and they were filled to overflowing, hundreds signing the pledge. For a time victory over the liquor traffic seemed an easy thing. Soon came a reaction. The zeal and enthusiasm seemed to give place to an indifference. It was not all sunshine for this band of women workers. They had much to encounter, many hard places to climb. Public speakers for their meetings were obtained with much difficulty, though the clergymen of some of the churches stood nobly by them through all.

After mature deliberation they decided to take the platform themselves, and no more earnest or eloquent speakers could they find than were found in their own ranks, because their hearts were in the work. Meetings were held in the jail, books and papers freely distributed, and good results have followed this brain-fight of the work. Families that were suffering through intemperance were visited, children clothed and made ready for the public and Sabbath-schools; nothing was omitted that would where Crusade work could be done.

September following the Bangor Reform Club was organized, which is so well known throughout our State as being the first of the kind ever formed. Dating their reform to the Crusade work, they became an able ally to it.

After the formation of the club the Crusade conceived the idea of a reading room for the benefit of the club, believing a room of this kind, furnished with good books and papers, and otherwise made attractive by pictures and little decorations to give a home-like appearance, would be a safeguard in the hour of temptation, besides placing in their hands good reading matter not otherwise obtained. With woman's energy this was accomplished, and December 25th, same year, they presented to the Reform Club the free and exclusive use of two rooms for one year, as a Christmas gift, paying for the services of a janitor to take care of the rooms.

Since the expiration of the first year the running expenses of these rooms have been equally borne by the Reform Club and the Crusade, always employing a janitor to take the care of the rooms. Five years ago a public prayer meeting was established in these rooms for every Sabbath evening, and is kept up at the present time with an increased interest, the rooms filled to their utmost capacity; and in no other meeting will you find more thoughtful, earnest Christian reliance on the Arm that is mighty to save than in the Sunday evening prayer meetings held in the Reform Club Reading-rooms.

Thus the work goes on. The same spirit is manifested by the Crusade in rescuing the "fallen" as at the commencement of the work. Public meetings are held at the City Hall weekly, also prayer and business meetings at the Reform Club Reading-rooms. But to estimate the work on the good results that follow, and have followed, one must visit the homes of those that have been rescued—saved from intemperance by this movement, and listen to the story from their own lips, witness the joy and happiness of families now living in comfort and peace, where once all was want, darkness, and misery.

Work on, nor think of rest,
Though dark and drear the way may be,
This is God's holy mission work,
And He will comfort thee.
Reach down, though filth and rags are there,
Art better than God's Holy Son,
Who touched the leper's unclean robe
And victory won?

THE BANGOR REFORM CLUB.

This is another of the temperance societies growing out of the great movement of 1874, during which (September 10) it was organized. It was incorporated December 28th of that year. It had a membership of 246 at the close of its sixth year, and 84 members were added during the next twelve months. Receipts during the financial year 1879.80 $848.18, expenditures, $751.-

* By the favor of Mrs. S. J. Pickard, of the society.

79. In 1880.81, $461.76 and $525.36. Mr. Christopher A. Page, of the County Treasurer's office, is President of this meeting; Samuel L. Stevens, Secretary and Treasurer.

There are about seven other temperance societies in Bangor, including those attached to the Catholic churches and the reform orders. The following notes are kindly supplied by Deacon Duren:

Bangor Temperance Society, organized in 1828; Bangor Division of the Sons of Temperance, No. 14, instituted December 26, 1857; Independent Order of Good Templars, Union Lodge No. 3, instituted 1861; Floral Lodge No. 19, August 22, 1862; Pharos Temple of Honor, instituted June 28, 1866; Templars of Honor and Temperance, Honora Council, No. 3, instituted June 5, 1867; Crystal Social Temple, No. 1, instituted February 7, 1879.

B. H. BEALE POST, NO. 12, GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC.

This society, now one of the strongest, wealthiest, and most flourishing in the State, was chartered January 6, 1868, early in the history of the Order in this State. Its original members were John F. Appleton, A. B. Farnham, Charles Hamlin, C. L. and S. H. Downes, E. E. Small, W. H. S. Lawrence, M. H. Andrews, W. H. H. Wilson, J. A. Fairbanks, G. A. Bolton, John H. Neal, A. L. Chick, M. P. Nickerson, A. L. Spencer, John D. Cowley, S. W. Thaxter, Jasper Hutchings, George Webster, Daniel White, George Fuller, D. C. Morrill, Eugene Sanger, W. H. Pritchard, George Varney—twenty-five.

The first corps of officers mustered as follows:

General Daniel White, Post Commander; General Charles Hamlin, Senior Vice-Commander; Colonel Augustus C. Hamlin, Junior Vice-Commander; Lieutenant Horace M. Wing, Adjutant; Sergeant Melville P. Nickerson, Quartermaster; Colonel E. F. Sanger, Surgeon; Sergeant W. H. S. Lawrence, Officer of the Day; George E. Stewart, Officer of the Guard; Otis Gilmore, Chaplain; W. H. H. Wilson, Quartermaster Sergeant.

The following-named constitute the roll of Post Commanders from the beginning:

Daniel White, 1868; George Varney 1868-9; B. H. Beale, 1869; D. C. Morrill, 1869-70; Edward E. Small, 1870; Jasper Hutchings, 1870; Charles Hamlin, 1871; Edward E. Small, 1872; J. F. Godfrey, 1872; Herman Bartlett, 1873; Rufus P. Peakes, 1874; John W. Torrens, 1875; Augustus C. Hamlin, 1875-9; A. B. Farnham, 1880; Christopher V. Crossman, 1881.

The Post had its first hall in the third story of the Exchange Block. It then moved into the upper floors of Strickland's building, and finally into the third story of Dow's Block, where its elegantly appointed rooms are now situated. It has about 276 members. Memorial Day (April 30) has been regularly observed by it every year since its organization; and also the Fourth of July, whenever the city has a celebration. It made a conspicuous figure in the demonstration upon the visit of President Grant to the city, at the opening of the European & North American Railway.

December 6, 1881, a notable fair was opened at Norombega Hall for the benefit of the Post. It continued several days, and was a great success, netting a handsome sum to the treasury.

BANGOR HISTORICAL SOCIETY.

This society was incorporated in 1864. On May 3, 1864, it was organized. Hon. Elijah L. Hamlin was elected its first President; Rev. Charles Carroll Everett, now Professor in Harvard College, Vice-President; Rev. Samuel Harris, late President of Bowdoin College, now Professor in Yale College, Corresponding Secretary; E. F. Duren, Recording Secretary; Isaiah Stetson, ex-Mayor of Bangor, Treasurer. The society has some collections in its cabinet. It has not been very active since President Hamlin's decease. It has had two meetings the past year, at one of which several papers of interest were read. It promises more activity in the future. The officers now are: John E. Godfrey, President; E. F. Duren, Recording Secretary; Rev. Professor John S. Sewall, Corresponding Secretary; Dr. Thomas U. Coe, Treasurer; Hon. Edward B. Nealley, Oliver H. Ingalls, Esq., Henry Gale, Esq., Frank H. Clergue, Esq., Captain H. N. Fairbanks, Executive Committee.

THE BANGOR BOARD OF TRADE and Manufactures was organized at a meeting of citizens of Bangor and Brewer, held in the former place April 1, 1872, of which Mayor Wheelwright was Chairman. Its objects are in general similar to those of Boards of Trade in other cities. The Board was chartered in 1878. Its first officers were: Moses Giddings, President; B. F. Tefft, Secretary; S. C. Hatch, Treasurer; Reuben S. Prescott, Charles Hayward, Thomas N. Egery, E. R. Stockwell, J. C. White, J. S. Wheelwright, Andrew Wiggin, John Holyoke, Vice-Presidents; G. W. Merrill, Franklin Muzzy, M. Schwartz, C. W. Roberts, H. B. Williams, C. B. Brown, J. S. Jenness, I. M. Bragg, and David Bugbee, Executive Committee. The Bangor Board of Trade and Manufactures was merged in the Bangor Board of Trade, re-organized January 13, 1879; R. S. Prescott, President; J. D. Warren, Secretary. It has met with tolerable regularity, and in 1879 published a volume of statistics and other information, which still possesses considerable value.

THE BANGOR BOARD OF UNDERWRITERS was organized November 18, 1867; D. M. Howard, President. Re-organized as the Bangor Board of Fire Underwriters, May 7, 1872; J. S. Chadwick, President; Charles P. Wiggin, Secretary of both Boards to the present time. The Bangor Board of Marine Underwriters, organized in 1872.

THE BANGOR FUEL SOCIETY

was organized for the purpose of furnishing relief to the suffering poor, December, 1835. Eighty-seven citizens subscribed a fund for that winter of almost $400. It has since continued its work by annual contribution, and has distributed fuel to the value of about $26,000 to October, 1881.

THE SOCIETY FOR PREVENTION OF CRUELTY TO ANIMALS was organized April, 1869, with 150 members, and has done a good work with other associations, in correcting all abuses coming within the statute, and is still at work.

SUNDRY ASSOCIATIONS AND SECRET ORDERS.*

The Bangor Female Charitable Society was organized in 1820; the Corban Society, in 1825; Bangor Band, 1859; St. John's Band, 1877; Bangor Horticultural Society, 1868; Bangor Art Association, 1875.

Masonic.—Rising Virtue Lodge, No. 10, organized in Hampden, September 16, 1802; Elisha Skinner, first Master. In 1808 it was removed to Bangor. Mount Moriah Chapter, R. A. M., No. 7, was chartered January 18, 1827. Bangor Council of Royal and Select Masons, No. 5, chartered June 28, 1848. St. John's Commandery, Knights Templars, chartered September 17, 1850. St. Andrew's Lodge, No. 83, chartered February 6, 1856. DeBouillon Conclave, No. 2, Knights of the Red Cross of Constantine, instituted May 5, 1875.

I. O. O. F.—Katabdin Encampment, No. 4, chartered September, 1844; Penobscot Lodge, No. 7, organized February 15, 1844. Oriental Lodge, No. 60, organized 1851.

Knights of Pythias.—Norombega Lodge, No. 5, organized April 24, 1872.

Royal Arcanum.—Bangor Council, No. 123, instituted July 18, 1878.

Knights of Honor.—Bayard Lodge, No. 294, instituted May 31, 1876.

The Hibernian Mutual Benevolent Association was organized February 24, 1867.

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE WATER WORKS.*

Legislative Authority—Act Accepted by the People—The First Board of Water Commissioners—Report of the Engineer—Report of the Board—Estimates—Contract with the Holly Manufacturing Company—Location at Treat's Falls—The Work Begun—Progress to January 18, 1876—To January 1, 1877—Completion of the Works—Operations of 1877-78—Of 1879-80—Of 1880-81.

The act of Legislature, for supplying the city of Bangor with water, was approved by Governor Dingley February 22, 1875. Its first section provides that "the city of Bangor is hereby authorized to take, hold, and convey into, about, and through the city of Bangor, from any point in Penobscot River that may be deemed expedient, between the foot of Treat's Falls, in Bangor, and the head of McMahon's Falls, in Veazie, water sufficient for the use of said city and the inhabitants thereof, for the extinguishment of fires, domestic uses, and creating steam; and may flow, take, and hold, by purchase or otherwise, any lands or real estate for laying and maintaining aqueducts or pipes for conducting, discharging, disposing of, and distributing water, and for constructing and maintaining reservoirs, dams, and such other works as may be deemed necessary or proper for raising, forcing, retaining, distributing, discharging, or disposing of said water, and for the erection of any works for said purposes, and for sinking wells or making excavations for the filtration of water."

* Important aid has been derived in the preparation of this sketch from the documentary History of the Bangor Water-works, published by the Water Board in 1877.

By the amendments of 1876 the clause in this section reading "for the extinguishment of fires, domestic uses, and creating steam," was struck out, and the words, "for all municipal and domestic uses," were inserted.

The city is authorized to erect and maintain a dam across the river of not more than twelve feet high above mean high tide, for the retention of water for these specified purposes. Bonded or script indebtedness of the city might be created, for the exercise of the powers granted by the act, to the amount of $350,000; any bonds issued to be made payable in thirty years from their date, with interest at six per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually. The provisions of the act, so far as the water-service is concerned, might be extended to the town of Brewer, with the assent of its inhabitants at any legally called meeting.

March 8 of the same year, at the regular annual municipal election in Bangor, the provisions of the act were accepted by the people by a vote of 2,776 yeas to 79 nays. Eight days thereafter, at the request of the Water Board, $1,000 were appropriated at a special meeting of the City Council for a preliminary survey of the site proposed in the act for the location of the water-works.

Messrs. George Stetson, Gorham L. Boynton, and Luther H. Eaton, had been designated in the act as the original Board of Water Commissioners, to hold office respectively, in the order named, three, four, and five years. On the 4th of May, 1875, however, Mr. Boynton resigned in a modest note, and the City Council unanimously chose Mr. William T. Pearson to fill the vacancy.

Mr. Eaton, of the Board, was designated as the Engineer of the works. On the 17th of March, with a sufficient corps of assistants and laborers, he began the preliminary survey contemplated by the action of the Common Council the day before; and in his first report to the Board, submitted June 3, he said:

These examinations embraced five separate and distinct points, namely: At Treat's Falls; at Spratt's Point, so called; at Webster's Point; at Howard's Ledge, and at the Orcutt Pitch, so called. The three first were made thoroughly, embracing quite a large area of the river bottom; the two last to a more limited extent. The results of these surveys have been presented to you in the form of plan and profiles for your consideration. An examination by a line of proved levels was made of the height of the apron of the Veazie mills above mean high tide at Webster's Point, and was found to be twelve feet and three inches. The height of mean tides may be found, upon a more extended observation, to vary somewhat from that assumed at this time; but not largely. The height of the water in the mill pond was found to be twenty-four feet above mean high tides; this was previous to any rise having taken place in the river from spring rains or melting snows. The height of the track of the European & North American Railway, at Webster's Point, was found to be seventeen feet and four inches; at Treat's Falls, nineteen feet and four inches above the mean high tides. The elevation of Mount Hope Cemetery, near the Soldiers' Monument, was found to be thirty-seven feet, and the traveled road in Brewer, across the flats, from eighteen feet and nine inches to twenty-three feet above mean high tides, with but a short distance of the lowest elevation; not taking into consideration a distance of about one hundred feet, where a small brook crosses—in that it was found to average about ten feet.

In view of these ascertained facts, it is the opinion of your engineer that a dam may be erected eight feet above the indicated mean high tide, without sensibly injuring the power at the Veazie mills, or flowing to an injurious extent the land of proprietors upon the river above the dam.

His report was in favor of Webster's Point as presenting "the best physical features for a site for a dam." Twenty-three and three-fourths acres of land would there be available for further development of the works and water-power, against thirteen and one-fourth at Treat's Falls or Spratt's Point. He thought that the dam could be erected here, with head-gates, sluice, and fish-way, and race-way for pumping house, complete, for $150,000.

At the same date—June 3, 1865—the Water Board reported to the City Council, giving also their opinion that "the site at the Webster farm is the most eligible." The President of the Holly Manufacturing Company, at Lockport, New York, and Mr. Holly himself, added their judgment in favor of this site. This company offered to construct and furnish everything necessary for the introduction of the water into the city, except the dam or power for working the pumps, for $195,000; and on the 15th of July a contract was closed with it for buildings, machinery, piping, etc., in accordance with a resolve passed June 30, expressing as "the sense of the City Council of Bangor, that the Water Commissioners proceed at once to contract for a system of water works, and also for the erection of a dam, not to exceed twelve feet above mean high tide, and do all other things necessary to be done for the purpose of supplying the city with water for municipal purposes."

Colonel J. T. Fanning, an hydraulic engineer, who had been employed to put in the water-works at Manchester, New Hampshire, was engaged to assist Engineer Eaton in making plans and estimates; "and his practical experience," says the Board in its first report, "was of great service in making an estimate of the expense and for laying the pipes, etc." Mr. Emery, a practical builder of dams, and constructor of those at Waterville and Augusta, was induced to come to Bangor and submit his opinion of the best method of constructing the dam here, and estimate of the expense. The wooden dam constructed by him at Waterville was personally inspected by one of the Board. A majority of the Board, accompanied by one of the Aldermen of the city, subsequently made a tour of inspection to the water-works of a number of the Eastern cities—specially, it would seem, to compare the two systems of supply, by gravitation and by direct force, as in the Holly system. Their decision was reported June 30, in favor of the latter.

Colonel Fanning's estimate of the cost of introduction of the water, through about seventeen miles of main and street-piping, but not including the dam or power to operate the pumps, was $270,000. Mr. Eaton estimated the cost of dam, shore connections, wing-dams, head-gates, flumes, and fish-ways, at $150,000; Mr. Emery of the dam alone at $85,050.97. Both plans contemplated a dam built of timber, filled entirely with stones, making a solid mass of timber and stone, with boiler-plate iron on top for protection against ice and other drift, and constructed in a most thorough manner for strength and durability, having stone and masonry at the shore connections, where exposed to decay. The Board accordingly reported the entire first cost of the works as likely to reach $450,000. It was further estimated that the average annual receipts from water-rates the first four years would be $27,931.68, or 6.2 per cent. upon the total cost of construction.

In preparation for the beginning of the work, the Water Power Company already existing in Bangor agreed to transfer its franchise to the city, and the owners of a large part of the shores and adjacent grounds on both sides of the river near the proposed site of the dam, made a donation of all necessary lands and shores that might be required for the works or for the sites of mills and manufactories at the dam.

June 5, 1875, another appropriation was made by the City Council, of $1,000 for the further prosecution of the survey, and a loan of the city's credit to the amount of $350,000—all that was allowed by the act—was authorized.

It was finally determined to adopt the site at Treat's Falls, which is nearer to the city than Webster's Point, allowing some economy in the use of main-pipe, and providing, it was thought, a better site for a pumping-house. Operations in preparation for the site of the buildings were here begun promptly by the Holly Company, and a contract was made with a Philadelphia house for the full amount of pipe required. This was delayed in manufacture and transmission, and did not arrive until late in November. Upon arrival of the first cargo, trenching and pipe-laying in the streets were begun. The verbal pledges of the company that Bangor laborers would be employed, were faithfully kept, as also all written parts of the contract.

By the 18th of January, 1876, 76,672 feet of main and smaller pipe had been laid, leaving but 279 feet under the contract to be put down. An additional order had been given the company, however, for 14,450 feet of pipe, of which 11,349 had been laid, or 88,021 (over sixteen and three-fifths miles) in all. The whole contract amount would have been laid before the ground froze hard, had the pipe been delivered by the time agreed in Philadelphia—the 15th of October.

About one-half of the dam had been finished, except gravelling. The shore approaches, constructed of heavy stone masonry, were nearly finished on both sides of the river. Another dam-builder, William A. P. Richardson, of Turner's Falls, Massachusetts, had been engaged upon this work from the beginning, to much advantage. The entire length of the dam was to give nine hundred feet of over-fall, with a sluice or roll-way for the passage of boats, rafts, logs, or other lumber, as required by the act of the Legislature.

The works were sufficiently advanced to be in full operation night and day, with four plunge-pumps. They were so far operated by steam, awaiting the use of the water-wheels. The Board had received $287,001, of which $285,000 were realized by the sale of the city bonds; and had expended $274,648.47, of which $180,036.72 had been paid to the Holly Company. The Board reported an additional estimate of $50,000 for necessary parts of the work, making the total cost half a million of dollars.

In accordance with this and other recommendations of the Board, an act was procured at the pending session of the Legislature (approved February 11, 1876) to amend the act of 1875, and accepted by the people by a vote of 2,449 to 129. It authorized the raising of $500,000 upon the credit of the city, for the purposes of the works, and made other important changes, including the limitation of the term of service of the original Board of Commissioners to the 1st of January, 1877. At that time Messrs. Stetson, Pearson, and Eaton made their final report, in which they say :

The works contemplated at the outset, viz., the supplying of the city with water through a series of pipes by means of direct pumping, has been accomplished, and tested to a strain on the entire system equal to a gravitation pressure of four hundred and sixty feet in height, and has now been in operation for a year, driven by the steam engine purchased of the Holly Manufacturing Company as a reserve in case of accident to the water-wheels, or that from clogging with anchor ice they may be rendered temporarily inefficient. The dam has been completed, with the exception of the fishway now in process of construction on the Brewer end; this will require some six weeks more to complete. The sluice or roll-way provided for the passage of rafts and lumber was found from defective plan to work badly, and in the high freshet of last fall was injured to such an extent that it has been found necessary to reconstruct a large portion of it. This work is now about to be commenced, and it is hoped that the repairs will be completed before the rise of the river consequent upon the spring rains. The Board of Commissioners found themselves unable to agree upon the proper manner to construct this roll-way, and called to aid them at arriving at the best plan upon which to build it, such of our citizens and others as were supposed to have practical knowledge of sluices, mainly lumber merchants, millmen, and raftsmen, together with the master workman upon the dam; and after listening to various propositions, instructed the master workman or dam builder to construct the roll-way as in his judgment, after giving due consideration to the various suggestions of the persons consulted, would best serve the purpose for which it was intended. This resulted as above stated, unsatisfactorily.

The fish-way is being built on plans furnished by the State Commissioners under authority vested in them by the statutes of the State, and is believed to be well adapted to the very important interest it is intended to subserv. The expense of the structure has been very materially increased in consequence of being obliged to construct it at the inclement season of the year in which it is being built, resulting in a large degree from delays forced upon the Board of Commissioners by action of parties beyond their control, delaying the resumption of work upon the dam some four to six weeks after the proper season has arrived to recommence; since the resumption of the work it has been pushed vigorously with all the force that could be economically employed.

The pump-room is now being prepared for heating by steam, which will be accomplished in a few days, when the use of steam as a motor will be dispensed with, and the water wheels, which are now ready, will be used instead; a low pressure of steam will be maintained upon one of the boilers sufficient for heating purposes only.

The capacity of the cylinder pumps is three million gallons in twenty-four hours, though they may be driven to a much larger performance than that in case of exceptional demand for water. The capacity of the rotary is sixteen gallons per revolution, and with the wheels running at a rate of speed to supply with the cylinder pumps three million gallons per day, this would give about two million five hundred thousand gallons in twenty-four hours additional, or in other words it has a capacity of about five-sixths of the cylinder pumps.

The pressure maintained at the pumps when the wheels are attached will be ordinarily one hundred and ten pounds per square inch, which is sufficient for domestic service upon the highest ground in the city, and affords abundant pressure for fire purposes in the lower and business portions of the city. There has been found no lack of power at any time to meet the sudden emergencies from fires; and in no instance has fire been allowed to spread from the building in which it has taken, and in only one instance has a building been burned to the ground.

The filter, originally designed to be a single chamber fifteen feet wide by one hundred and fifty feet long, was enlarged to one of two chambers, each twelve and one-half feet wide by one hundred and fifty feet long, with a separate room for section chamber of twelve and one-half feet wide by forty feet long, and so arranged that one chamber may be closed and drained for cleansing, leaving the other in service; so that there need be no resort to unfiltered water. This entailed an additional expense of about $3,000.

The dwelling, which is being finished off over the machinery-room of the wheel-house, for the occupancy of the engineer and his assistant, will be ready to be occupied about the 1st of April, and will afford a commodious tenement.

The original contract with the Holly Company for piping had been much enlarged, and pipes had also been laid by the Commissioners; so 20.541 miles of main- and sewer-pipe were now down. Twenty-two more hydrants had been set than were in the original plan. The drinking-fountain had been erected on the southerly approach to the post-office, and two other fountains, for man and beast, were on hand, but not set. The total cost of the work so far was $447,022.66, of which the Holly Company had been paid, upon its contract and for extra service, $196,126.58. It was thought that $40,000 more would complete the works. Water-rates to the amount of $4,325 had been paid into the city treasury.

In the official year 1878-79 1,782 feet of mains were added to the facilities of the works. Services to the number of 1,058 were taken by the people in 1877-78, and 1,224 in 1878-79. In December, 1878, the dam was injured by the ice during a freshet, and an appropriation of $8,000 was made the next year to repair it and to build a new log-sluice. Only $5,473.28 were expended at the time, however.

In the fiscal year 1879-80 $14,928.65 were realized from the water-service, against $13,325.04 the previous year. One thousand nine hundred and one feet of main pipe had been laid, and one new hydrant set, with twenty-five additional services.

In 1878-79 260,544,130 gallons were pumped during the year, being a daily average of 713,819. In 1879-80 a total of 240,099,860 gallons was pumped, and in 1880-81 370,651,782, or an average per day of 1,015,484. On some days more than 1,500,000 gallons were used. One hundred and ten service-pipes were added the latter year, making an aggregate of 1,458, which earned $25,855.87 to the credit of the works. Two piers and an abutment were built this year, at a cost of $974.81. The engines of the Maine Central Railroad were now supplied by the Holly water.

masters of Bangor—Collectors of Customs.

The following is a complete, and it is believed an accurate roll of the chief officers of the city, from the date of its incorporation to the present time. We are indebted for the material portions of it to a compilation published by the city in a neat pamphlet in 1881.

1834-35. Mayor, Allen Gilman. Aldermen: Asa Davis, Moses Patten, Samuel Call, John Wilkins, John Fiske, John Brown, Frederick Wingate; City Clerk, Charles Rice. Common Council: President, Solomon Parsons; Clerk, John S. Sayward; Ward 1, Abner Taylor, Anthony Woodward, Solomon Parsons; Ward 2, Wiggins Hill, Timothy Call, Jonathan C. Taylor; Ward 3, George W. Pickering, Samuel Lowder, Elisha H. Allen; Ward 4, John Legro, Jr., Thomas Finson, Joseph Abbott; Ward 5, George Wellington, Nathan B. Wiggin, Edward Kent; Ward 6, Paul R. Barker, Bradford Harlow, Messenger Fisher; Ward 7, Eben French, second, Charles G. Bryant, P. D. Parsons. James Crosby, Treasurer; Newell Bean, Collector; Edward Kent, City Solicitor; Ebenezer French, City Marshal; Benjamin Young, Jr., Harbor Master. Municipal Court: Charles Stetson, Judge; Reuben S. Prescott, Recorder.

1835-36. Mayor, Allen Gilman. Aldermen: Henry Call, Moses Patten, William Abbott, John Wilkins, John Fiske, John Brown, Samuel Veazie; City Clerk, John S. Sayward. Common Council: President, Edward Kent; Clerk, Charles G. Bryant; Ward 1, Charles Hayes, Jesse Wentworth, Rufus K. Cushing; Ward 2, John Barker, Jonathan C. Taylor, Timothy Crosby; Ward 3, Henry A. Head, Edmund Dole, Samuel Garnsey; Ward 4, John Godfrey, John Sargent, John R. Greenough; Ward 5, Nathan B. Wiggin, Edward Kent, Abner R. Hollowell; Ward 6, Franklin Muzzy, Bradford Harlow, Horatio Beale; Ward 7, Samuel Sylvester, C. H. Forbes, Marcena Johnson. James Crosby, Treasurer; John Lancey, Collector; Edward Kent, City Solicitor; William Emerson, Marshal; John Ham, Street Commissioner.

1836-37. Mayor, Edward Kent. Aldermen: Henry Call, Cyrus Goss, William Abbott, Ezra Patten, Nathan B. Wiggin, Samuel J. Foster, Preserved B. Mills. John S. Sayward, City Clerk. Common Council: Charles Hayes, President; Charles G. Bryant, Clerk; Ward 1, Charles Ramsdell, Hollis Bowman, Charles Hayes; Ward 2, Willis Patten, John Meservey, Abner Taylor; Ward 3, Moses L. Appleton, James Perkins, Camillus Kidder; Ward 4, Samuel Wiley, Newell Bean, Stevens Davis; Ward 5, Hayward Peirce, Abner R. Hollowell, John Brown; Ward 6, Bradford Harlow, Nathan Perry, Ebenezer French; Ward 7, Simon Nowell, Charles H. Shepard, William Lowder.

Ford Whitman, Treasurer; John Lancey, Collector; William Abbott, City Solicitor; William Emerson, Marshal; John Brown, Street Commissioner.

1837-38. Mayor, Edward Kent. Aldermen: Charles Hayes, Cyrus Goss, George W. Pickering, John Wilkins, Nathaniel French, Bradford Harlow, Samuel L. Valentine. City Clerk, John S. Sayward. Common Council: Hollis Bowman, President; William E. P. Rogers, Clerk; Ward 1, Isaac S. Whitman, Hollis Bowman, Charles Cooper; Ward 2, Joseph Kendrick, Camillus Kidder, Benjamin Tainter; Ward 3, John A. Poor, Richard Condon, Gamaliel Marchant; Ward 4, John Godfrey, John R. Greenough, Thomas Finson; Ward 5, Andrew W. Hasey, Henry Little, Robert Boyd; Ward 6, Nathan Perry, Ebenezer French, Caleb B. Holmes; Ward 7, John Short, Samuel Thatcher, Jr., Nathaniel Lord. John Wilkins, Treasurer; John Lancey, Collector; William Abbott, City Solicitor; William Emerson, second, Marshal; Richard Condon, Street Commissioner; Prescott P. Holden, Harbor Master.

1838-39. Mayor, Rufus Dwinel. Aldermen: Charles Hayes, Camillus Kidder, Warren Preston, John R. Greenough, Nathaniel French, Bradford Harlow, Frederick Hobbs. City Clerk, John S. Sayward. Common Council: William Payne, President; William E. P. Rogers, Clerk; Ward 1, Charles Cooper, Cyrus Arnold, Theophilus B. Thompson; Ward 2, Joseph Kendrick, Augustus J. Brown, George Savage; Ward 3, Charles Brown, William Bartlett, Jr., William H. Foster; Ward 4, Nathaniel Hatch, Richard Condon, Benjamin Young; Ward 5, Henry Little, Timothy H. Morse, William Paine; Ward 6, Ebenezer French, Caleb B. Holmes, Nathan Perry; Ward 7, Nahum Warren, William P. Wingate, Benjamin S. Dean. Nathaniel Lord, Treasurer; Hollis Bowman, Collector; William Paine, City Solicitor; William Emerson, second, Marshal; Richard Condon, Street Commissioner; Prescott P. Holden, Harbor Master.

1839-40. Mayor, J. Wingate Carr. Aldermen: James Crosby, Cyrus Goss, Peleg Chandler, John Wilkins, Paul R. Barker, Bradford Barlow, Samuel L. Valentine. City Clerk, John S. Sayward. Common Council: Isaac S. Whitman, President; William E. P. Rogers, Clerk; Ward 1, Samuel Veazie, Isaac S. Whitman, Preserved B. Mills; Ward 2, Jefferson Cushing, Walter Brown, Albert Holton; Ward 3, William H. Foster, George Fitts, David Hill; Ward 4, Samuel H. Dale, Samuel Morison, Theodore S. Brown; Ward 5, Nathan B. Wiggin, John McLaughlin, Eleazer C. Baker; Ward 6, Nathan Perry, Henry Lovejoy, Daniel Stone; Ward 7, William P. Wingate, Matthew S. Randall, Prescott P. Holden. Nathaniel Lord, Treasurer; Hollis Bowman, Collector; Jonas Cutting, City Solicitor; Samuel Nelson, Marshal; William P. Wingate, Street Commissioner; P. P. Holden, Harbor Master.

1840-41. Mayor, J. Wingate Carr. Aldermen: James Crosby, William Emerson, David Perham, John Wilkins, Joshua W. Hathaway, Bradford Harlow, George Wheelwright. John S. Sayward, City Clerk. Common Council: Isaac S. Whitman, President; John W. Snow, Clerk;

Ward 1, Isaac S. Whitman, Cyrus Arnold, Preserved B. Mills; Ward 2, Henry Call, Theodore B. McIntyre, Joseph Stewart; Ward 3, Henry B. Farnham, Albert Dole, David Hill; Ward 4, Samuel H. Dale, John E. Godfrey, Andrew Eveleth; Ward 5, Eleazer C. Baker, Timothy H. Morse, Benjamin C. Campbell; Ward 6, Nathan Perry, Messenger Fisher, Josiah Towle; Ward 7, Norman Smith, Samuel P. Dresser, William P. Wingate. Isaac S. Whitman, Treasurer; Hollis Bowman, Collector; Jonas Cutting, City Solicitor; Samuel Nelson, Marshal; William P. Wingate, Street Commissioner; Samuel H. Dale, Harbor Master.

1841-42. Mayor, Bradford Harlow. Aldermen: James Crosby, Isaac Farrar, David Perham, John Wilkins, Jonas Cutting, Nathan Perry, George Wheelwright. John S. Sayward, City Clerk. Common Council: William Paine, President; George W. Snow, Clerk; Ward 1, Isaac S. Whitman, William Paine, John Sargent, Jr.; Ward 2, Theodore B. McIntyre, John Hodgdon, Jefferson Cushing; Ward 3, Albert Dole, Henry B. Farnham, Samuel F. Fuller; Ward 4, Andrew Eveleth, Allen Haines, Alvin Haynes; Ward 5, Japheth Gilman, Asa Walker, Amos M. Roberts; Ward 6, Josiah Towle, Messenger Fisher, William Hammatt; Ward 7, George A. Thatcher, Charles A. Thaxter, Nahum Warren. Gustavus G. Cushman, Judge Police Court; Hollis Bowman, Treasurer and Collector; Jonas Cutting, City Solicitor; Samuel Nelson, Marshal; William P. Wingate, Street Commissioner; Samuel H. Dale, Harbor Master.

1842-43. Mayor, Bradford Harlow. Aldermen: James Crosby, John Hodgdon, David Perham, Alvin Haynes, Amos M. Roberts, Nathan Perry, Benjamin S. Deane. John S. Sayward, City Clerk. Common Council: Allen Haines, President; George W. Snow, Clerk; Ward 1, John McLaughlin, James Jenkins, John Sargent, Jr.; Ward 2, Joseph Stewart, Ivory Small, John Meservey; Ward 3, Charles Hayward, Jabez True, John O. Kendrick; Ward 4, Allen Haines, John W. Garnsey, Jonas Ames; Ward 5, Asa Walker, Japheth Cilman, Sylvanus Rich, Jr.; Ward 6, William Hammatt, Joseph Bryant, Josiah Towle; Ward 7, William P. Wingate, George K. Jewett, Matthew S. Randall. Hollis Bowman, Treasurer and Collector; Jonas Cutting, City Solicitor; Samuel Nelson, Marshal and Harbor Master; William P. Wingate, Street Commissioner.

1843-44. Mayor, Bradford Harlow. Aldermen: James Jenkins, Otis Small, Jacob Drummond, Gorham L. Boynton, Amos M. Roberts, Nathan Perry, John S. Chadwick. Richard F. Webster, City Clerk. Common Council: Charles Stetson, President; George W. Snow, Clerk; Ward 1, Nathaniel Lord, Robert R. Haskins, Preserved B. Mills; Ward 2, John Meservey, George W. Cummings, George W. Ingersoll; Ward 3, Charles Hayward, John True, Benjamin Swett; Ward 4, Alvah Osgood, Alvin Haynes, Samuel Wiley; Ward 5, Sylvanus Rich, Jr., Samuel P. Strickland, Charles Stetson; Ward 6, William Hammatt, Ebenezer T. Fox, Ansel Leighton; Ward 7, William P. Wingate, George K. Jewett, Mark Trafton. Hollis Bowman, Treasurer and Collector; John Appleton, City Solicitor; Edmund Holt, Marshal;

William P. Wingate, Street Commissioner; Israel Snow, Health Officer and Harbor Master.

1844-45. Mayor, Jacob Drummond. Aldermen: George W. Ingersoll, William Emerson, Charles Hayward, Solomon Parsons, Sylvanus W. Robinson, Joseph Bryant, Benjamin S. Deane. Richard F. Webster, City Clerk. Common Council: John S. Sayward, President; George W. Snow, Clerk; Ward 1, Nathaniel Lord, William S. Mitchell, Robert R. Haskins; Ward 2, Albert Holton, George Savage, William A. Blake; Ward 3, Joseph W. Boynton, Henry V. Poor, John Decrow; Ward 4, Jonas Ames, Hastings Strickland, Alvin Haynes; Ward 5, Sylvanus Rich, Jr., Ezra Jewell, John M. Lander; Ward 6, John S. Sayward, Thomas Drew, James R. Macomber; Ward 7, Matthew S. Randall, Prescott P. Holden, Asa Walker. Hollis Bowman, Treasurer and Collector; George W. Ingersoll, City Solicitor; Simon F. Walker, Marshal; William P. THE POSTMASTERS.

We may add here, perhaps as well as anywhere, a full list of Postmasters of Bangor since the establishment of the office here. In January, 1801, Bakley Emerson was Postmaster until January, 1805, with the exception of six months in 1804, when William Fobes was in the office; Horatio G. Balch, from January, 1805; William D. Williamson, from 1810; Royal Clark, from 1821; Mark Trafton, from 1822. From 1836 it became a Presidential appointment. Mark Trafton was re-appointed in 1836; Charles K. Miller, 1839 to 1848, and in 1866; Isaac C. Haynes, 1848 and 1853-56; J. Wingate Carr, 1861-65; George Fuller, 1867-71; Colonel Augustus B. Farnham, from 1871 to this writing.

THE COLLECTORS OF CUSTOMS

at Bangor have been: Daniel Emery, 1847-49; William C. Hammatt, 1849-53; George P. Sewall, 1853-57; Dudley F. Leavitt, 1857-61; William P. Wingate, 1861-66, and 1871-75; Charles W. Roberts, 1866-67; John H. Rice, 1867-71; Ebenezer T. Fox, 1875-79; and Joseph S. Smith, 1880 to the present time.

HON. HANNIBAL HAMLIN.

This renowned citizen of Bangor, for at least a generation the foremost son of the Penobscot Valley, is not, somewhat unhappily for it, a native of this county, but of Paris, in this State. He is of old Massachusetts stock, grandson of Eleazer Hamlin, commander of a company of minute-men when the American Revolution was gathering head, and is son of Dr. Cyrus and Anna (Livermore) Hamlin, of Livermore, Oxford county, to which Deacon

Livermore, Mrs. Hamlin's father, had given the name, he being a principal proprietor of it. Upon the Doctor's appointment as Clerk of the Oxford county courts, he removed to Paris, the shire-town, where he thenceforward made his home until his death in 1828. Here Hannibal Hamlin was born, the youngest of six sons, August 27, 1809, the same year in which his great associate upon the Presidential ticket, the late Mr. Lincoln, was born. His elementary education was conducted in private schools in Paris, and at the neighboring Hebron Academy. He was nearly ready for college at fifteen or sixteen years of age, when the declining health of his brother Cyrus compelled the retirement of Hannibal from the schools, to labor in his stead on the farm. He shortly also undertook the survey of the township owned by his father and others in the north wilderness, which was successfully accomplished, though in the face of many difficulties and privations. At about the age of eighteen he began to study law with his brother Elijah, who was practicing in Eastern Maine, but was again recalled to the farm by the death of his father, and remained upon it the next two years. He then bought a half-interest in the Jeffersonian, a newspaper at Paris, where his associate in business was Horatio King, afterwards First Assistant Postmaster-General. He wrote in both prose and poetry for its columns, and learned to set type and print the paper, continuing his labors of "composition" with both pen and composing-stick, for some time after he sold his interest to William King in the fall of the same year. The next January he resumed legal studies, at first with Joseph G. Cole, Esq., since Judge of the District Court of Maine, and then with Messrs. Fessenden, Deblois & Fessenden, of Portland, the last of whom was afterwards colleague of Mr. Hamlin in the United States Senate, and also Secretary of the Treasury. He was admitted to the Bar at Paris in January, 1833, and argued and won a case the same day. The next April he removed to Hampden, Penobscot county, where he opened an office and resided for about twenty years. He commanded a large practice almost from the beginning, and maintained it with remarkable energy and success until public duties absorbed his time and attention. Since his return to the Federal Senate in 1851 he has practically abandoned the profession. During his Hampden residence and since, he has been often called to the platform for addresses upon literary, political, and other topics, which he handles with accustomed ability and versatility of talent.

Mr. Hamlin's first public service of note was as Representative of Hampden to the State Legislature during five successive terms, 1836 to 1840, inclusive. He was then attached to the principles and policy of the Democratic party, and soon became one of its leaders in the House, and otherwise an influential member. He was chosen Speaker in his second term, 1837, when but twenty-seven years old, and was re-elected to that post in 1839, and again in 1840, at the close of each period of service receiving the unanimous thanks of the House. The latter year he was the candidate of his party for a seat in Congress, but shared the common Democratic defeat in Maine and throughout the country, induced by the popular enthusiasm of that year in behalf of General Harrison, the Whig candidate for the Presidency. He was beaten, however, in a total poll of fifteen thousand, by a majority of less than two hundred. It is said that his joint canvass of the District with his opponent, Elisha H. Allen, still also a resident of Bangor, was the first instance of the kind in New England politics. Two years afterwards he again ran against Mr. Allen, and was this time triumphantly elected. He soon made a considerable figure in the National Legislature for a new member, and during his second session made an able and truly eloquent speech against the resolution for the annexation of Texas, on the ground that it was a scheme for "the strengthening of the Slave Power," "for extending and perpetuating slavery." He was returned to the House in 1844, and made Chairman of the important Committee on Elections, and also a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs. In his speech on the bill to establish a territorial government in Oregon he again announced, most explicitly and emphatically, his opposition to any scheme having a view to the extension of slavery. He anticipated the famous Wilmot Proviso at this time (the session of 1846-47), by offering a similar clause as an amendment to the "Three Million Bill." With this session his service in the lower House of Congress was closed, and he consented again to take a seat for a single term in the State Legislature as a Representative for Hampden. The next year, in the spring of 1848, Governor Fairfield, one of the United States Senators from Maine, having died, Mr. Hamlin was appointed to his place by Governor Dana, he being then only in his fortieth year. He served under appointment the remaining four years of the unexpired term, and was then returned for the full period of six years by the Legislature, although the pro-slavery wing of his party in that body refused to support him. His discussion of all important topics in the Senate was clear and able; but the "irrepressible conflict" was now thickening, and he was soon to take a yet more distinguished place in American politics. June 12, 1856, after the Democratic National Convention at Cincinnati, he formally abandoned that party in a speech in the Senate, resigning his place as Chairman of the Committee on Commerce. He has since been a steadfast Republican, without variableness or shadow of turning. The same month in which this speech was spoken he was nominated as Republican candidate for Governor of Maine, and was elected by more than double the majority to that time ever given a gubernatorial candidate in this State. He resigned his Senatorship to be inaugurated January 7, 1857, but within ten days was re-chosen Senator for the full term, resigned the Executive chair, and resumed his seat in the Senate. Yeoman's service was here to be done during the struggle over the Lecompton constitution of Kansas, and other exciting issues of the period; and he did it. May 18, 1860, at the Republican National Convention in Chicago, he was most unexpectedly nominated as the candidate for Vice-President of the United States, upon the same ticket with Abraham Lincoln, of Illinois. He served with his wonted ability in the chair of the Senate, also rendering invaluable aid in the counsels of the Government during the civil war, until the close of his term, March 4, 1865. During this time, in the spring of 1862, he removed from Hampden to Bangor, where he dwells when at home, in a modest residence on Fourth street, near Hammond. The same year that he ended his Senatorial term he was appointed Collector of the Port of Boston; but resigned in 1866. He remained in private life a few years, but was again called into the public service in 1869, by a return to the United States Senate. He was re-elected in 1875, and at the close of his term, six years afterwards, was appointed by President Garfield Minister of the United States to the Spanish Court, and was unanimously confirmed by the Senate. After a period of rest he made a visit to the home of his childhood at Paris, and sailed for Madrid in October following, where he is now performing the duties of his distinguished position. He was Regent of the Smithsonian Institution 1861-65, and was re-appointed in 1870, holding the position since that time.

Mr. Hamlin was first married in 1833, at Paris, to Miss Sarah Jane, born November 2, 1815, daughter of the Hon. Stephen Emery, Judge of Probate for Oxford county, and since Attorney-General of the State and Judge of the District Court. The children of this marriage were George Emery, born September 30, 1835, died July 14, 1844; Charles, born September 13, 1837, graduate of Bowdoin in 1857, admitted to the Bar October, 1858, practiced law at Orland, Hancock county, till he entered the army during the late war, in which he served as Major of the First Maine Heavy Artillery, Assistant Adjutant-General and Inspector of Artillery, and was discharged in September, 1865, as Brevet Brigadier-General, since residing at Bangor as an attorney, and for some years Register in Bankruptcy; Cyrus, born April 26, 1839, who also became a lawyer, practiced at Kittery, York county, entered the army as an aid-de-camp on the general staff, served with General Fremont and as one of the first Colonels appointed to the Corps d'Afrique, attained finally the rank of Major-General, and died at New Orleans, August 28, 1867, of disease contracted in the service; Sarah J., born January 7, 1842, married Colonel George A. Batchelder, and died June 28, 1879; and George E., born February 24, 1848, died September 6, 1849. Mrs. Hamlin died April 17, 1855; and in September of the following year her husband led to the altar her half-sister, Miss Ellen Vesta Emery, whose natal day is September 14, 1835. The children of the second marriage are Hannibal Emery, born August 22, 1858, a graduate of Colby University, in the class of 1879, now a law student at Harvard University; and Frank, born September 26, 1862.

GOVERNOR KENT.

The Hon. Edward Kent, LL.D., was in his day for many years one of the most distinguished citizens of Bangor, where, and throughout the State which he served so faithfully and well, his memory is cherished as one of the most treasured heirlooms of the present generation.

Governor Kent was a native of New Hampshire, born in Concord January 8, 1802, youngest son and sixth child of William Austin Kent, a native of Charlestown, Massachusetts. His mother was born in Sterling, in the same State, and was a sister of the Hon. Prentiss Mellen, the first Chief Justice of Maine. His three brothers all became useful and prominent men, and two of them are still living. Three of his sisters married well-known New England clergymen, and the fourth the Hon. James H. Bingham, graduate of Dartmouth and classmate of Daniel Webster.

Young Kent, after due preliminary training, entered Harvard College, and was graduated in 1821, when but nineteen years old, in the class to which belonged Ralph Waldo Emerson, Hon. Josiah Quincy, Congressmen C. W. Upham, of Massachusetts, and R. W. Barnwell, of South Carolina, and Judge Edward G. Loring. His fine scholarship entitled him to membership in the Phi Beta Kappa Society, which admitted less than one third of his class of fifty-nine. He read law with the celebrated Chancellor Kent and with Benjamin Orr, a very eminent Maine lawyer of that time; and under them acquired a thoroughly competent preparation for his professional career. He came to Bangor in 1824, on a prospecting tour, determined to settle here, and in September of the next year, when but twenty-three years old, he boldly and alone swung out his "shingle" in the brisk little town as an invitation for business. He soon became popular, and was presently elected by his young fellow-townsmen as Foreman of the fire company formed to man the new "Washington" hand-engine, which the town had just bought. He also obtained a fair share of the local business (there were then but six lawyers besides himself in Bangor), but took some of his time for political discussion and writing for the village newspaper. He manifested a lively interest in the struggle of the Greek patriots for independence in 1827, and served as Secretary of the meeting held here to promote their cause, besides doing other efficient work in their behalf. In 1829 he delivered the Fourth of July oration in Bangor—"a chaste and eloquent production," says the contemporary record. In the former year he was admitted to practice as Counsellor of the Supreme Court of the State, under the rule then prevailing that no attorney should be admitted Counsellor until he had practiced two years in the Court of Common Pleas. He was appointed the same year, being then but twenty-five years of age, Chief Justice of the Court of Sessions, and held the bench for nearly two years.

Governor Kent's first legal partnership was with Hon. Jonathan P. Rogers, of Bangor, Attorney-General of the State 1832-33. About the former year this firm was dissolved, and a new one formed as Kent & Cutting, the junior partner of which (though the senior in years) was Hon. Jonas Cutting, Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court from 1854 to 1875. After filling several minor official stations, he was elected a Representative from the Bangor District to the State Legislature, where he served in 1828-29. He was chosen in 1836 the second Mayor of the young city, and re-elected with an increased ma-majority the next year. Although yet scarcely in the prime of life, he was nominated in the first year of his Mayoralty as a Whig candidate for Governor. Although unsuccessful in his first canvass, he was triumphantly elected the next year, and after a sharp Legislative and judicial struggle over the returns in an effort to prevent his inauguration, he was inducted into office late in January, 1838, his inaugural message being greatly complimented by the Whig organ at the State capital. He served one year, and was again a candidate for the Executive chair in 1840, against three opponents, one of whom was the Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, of the same county (then residing at Hampden), who was the candidate upon the Democratic ticket. There was no election by the people, but Mr. Kent was chosen by the Legislature the following winter, and served another year at the helm of State. The next year he was a member of the important Committee sent by the Legislature to Washington to represent the interests of Maine in the pending negotiations concerning the Northeast boundary. Soon afterwards he recommenced practice in Bangor, again in association with Mr. Cutting. This partnership continued until he was appointed United States Consul to Rio Janeiro by President Taylor in 1849. He remained abroad four years, and then returned to his practice, with which his brother George, now of the Treasury Department at Washington, and about eighty-two years of age, presently became associated. On the 11th of May, 1859, he was appointed by Governor Morrill a Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court, and was re-appointed by Governor Cony in 1866, at the expiration of his seven-years term, leaving the bench finally in 1873, in his seventy-first year, with his powers unimpaired. He traveled with his family one year in Europe, and then, notwithstanding his advanced age, resumed practice in Bangor, undertaking a number of notable cases between 1874 and the year of his death. In 1875 he was a member of the Constitutional Convention of the State, and his last public service was performed with distinguished honor as its President. He died at his home in Bangor, May 19, 1877, aged seventy-five years, four months, and eleven days.

Governor Kent's first wife was Sarah, daughter of Nathaniel Johnston, of Hillsborough, New Hampshire. Of this union were born one son, James, who died at Rio Janeiro; Charlotte, who married an English resident in Rio, and also died there; Kitty, who survived her mother's death but two years; and others who died young. Mrs. Kent died in 1853, soon after their return from South America; and in 1855 the Judge remarried, this time being united to Miss Abby A., daughter of the Rev. Otis Rockwood, of Lynn, Massachusetts, who still survives him, and resides in Boston, Massachusetts. They had one son—Edward, named from his father, now an undergraduate in Harvard College, and a young man of superior ability and promise.

HON. JOHN APPLETON.

The Hon. John Appleton, of Bangor, Chief Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court of Maine, is a native of the Granite State, born at Ipswich, in New Hampshire, on the 12th of July, 1804, only son of Jonathan and Elizabeth (Peabody) Appleton, of that town. He was deprived of maternal care and instruction when at the tender age of four years, by the death of his mother, which occurred in 1808. His one sister, Eliza Appleton, grew to maturity, and was married to Mr. George Gibson, the father of Charles A. Gibson, Esq., now of Bangor, who was their only child.

After due attendance in the elementary schools of the time at his home, young Appleton took his preparatory course for college also at New Ipswich, in the Academy there. In due course he entered Bowdoin College, and was graduated with credit from that institution in the class of 1822, when he was but eighteen years old. He began to read law with George F. Farley, Esq., of Groton, Massachusetts, and afterwards pursued his studies with his relative, the celebrated Nathan Dane Appleton, in Alfred, the shire-town of York county, Maine. He was admitted to the bar, however, in his native State, at Amherst, New Hampshire, in 1826, when scarcely more than of age. The same year he removed to Dixmont, in Penobscot county, and opened an office for law practice. He remained there, however, but a few months, and then removed to Sebec, then also in Penobscot, but now in Piscataquis county, where he located in the fall of the same year. For six years he remained in this then remote and sparsely settled country, and finally, in 1832, came to Bangor to make another beginning of business; and here he found a permanent home, in which he has resided during the last half-century, much of the time aiding largely to give it name and fame. In his first year at Bangor he formed a partnership with Elisha H. Allen, Esq., under the firm name of Allen & Appleton. This relation in business existed until 1841, when it was dissolved by the election of Mr. Allen to a seat in the Federal Congress. He is now, after a long and honorable career, ex-Chancellor of the Sandwich Islands, and Minister of that country to the Government of the United States.

Judge Appleton had subsequently a partnership with John B. Hill, Esq., of Bangor, and then with his brother and former student, Moses L. Appleton, Esq. The latter association was maintained for a number of years, until it was necessarily broken by the appointment of the subject of this notice to the Supreme Judicial Bench. He had already in his profession reaped a full share of success, with its attendant reputation and honors; and in 1841, on the fifth day of March, he had been appointed Reporter of Decisions for the court of which he was ten years afterwards to become a member. He served about one year, and was the compiler and editor of volumes XIX. and XX. of the State Reports—volumes which are highly esteemed in the profession. May 11, 1852, Mr. Appleton received his first appointment as Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court, in which body he has served with distinction for now thirty years.

He was re-appointed at the expiration of his term, and on the 24th day of October, 1862, upon the retirement of Chief Justice Tenney, he was elevated to the headship of the Court. He was re-appointed Chief Justice September 17, 1869, and again September 20, 1876, now serving his third term of seven years each, which will not expire until September of 1883.

For some years the energies of Justice Appleton were devoted in part to the preparation of a treatise on Evidence, which was published at Philadelphia, in 1860, and has had a very wide circulation and reputation. He is still remarkably vigorous in mind and body, although in his seventy-eighth year, and bids fair to round out a full century in eminent honor and usefulness.

Judge Appleton was married February 6, 1834, to Sarah N. Allen, who died August 12, 1874. His second wife was Annie V. Greeley, to whom he was united March 30, 1876. General John F. Appleton, a prominent lawyer in Bangor and a distinguished officer in the late war, deceased August 12, 1874, was the oldest son of the first marriage.

CONGRESSMAN LADD.

The Hon. George W. Ladd, Representative in Congress from the Fourth or Bangor District of Maine, was born in Augusta, September 28, 1818, son of Joseph Ladd, an immigrant from New Hampshire ten years before. His father was an extensive merchant, lumberman, and vessel-owner, and in his later years added to the first-named business a branch in Florida, where he died in 1835. His mother was the oldest daughter of Theophilus Hamlin, of Augusta, an immigrant from Massachusetts in 1784. She was a lady of unusual energy and mental power, and joined her husband cordially in his liberal schemes for the education of their child. George enjoyed the advantages of private instruction, as well as attendance upon the public schools. In due time he was sent to the University at Kent's Hill, in this State, but his preparation for college was completed under the Rev. J. H. Ingraham, the famous writer of religious novels. Financial considerations, however, obliged him to check his progress on the classic road, and he soon after effected an engagement as a druggist's clerk in his native town. It is this circumstance alone that has caused him to be familiarly known as "Dr. Ladd" from that day to this. He remained with the firm, of which the junior member was an older brother of his, for six years. It was a profitable period for him, as giving him excellent opportunities for mental growth and for acquaintance with men and affairs. His business abilities were already much developed at the age of eighteen, when he was entrusted with the sole management of an extensive drug store. He removed to Bangor two years later, in 1838, where he opened a drug store on his own account, and remained in the business with marked success for fifteen years, receiving valuable aid from his uncle, the Hon. Luther Severance, for a quarter of a century the able editor of the Kennebec Journal. During his earlier residence here, in 1843, Dr. Ladd was united in marriage to Miss Marcia D. C. Ingraham, daughter of his former tutor, grand-daughter of the Hon. Daniel Cony, and niece of the Hon. Ruel Williams, United States Senator from Maine in 1837-42.

Dr. Ladd was one of the pioneers of the railway interest in Maine, giving it for years his best energies and enthusiastic support. His speeches and printed articles on this subject attracted marked attention, and were widely circulated. He began in politics as a Whig and an ardent admirer of Henry Clay. He was a member of the Whig State Committee for several years. Upon the break-up of that party in 1856, he practically retired from the political field until the Presidential canvass of 1860, when he again came to the front as a prominent member of the "Constitutional Union" or Bell-Everett party. That organization and the Douglas wing of the Democracy were co-operating to avert, if possible, the threatened disruption of the Union, and thus earned from their opponents the ironical but very honorable title of "Union Savers." At a large joint-meeting of the parties in Bangor, Mr. Ladd was presiding officer. In the next Presidential campaign he supported the claims of General McClellan for the Presidency, and rendered the Democracy of Maine efficient service. In 1866 he was one of its delegates to the National Union Convention in Philadelphia. Two years thereafter he was the nominee of the Democracy of the Fourth District for Congress, but they were then in a minority, and he was defeated. In 1878, however, being renominated, this time by both the Democratic and the Greenback conventions, he was elected by a majority of nearly three thousand, in a total vote of about twenty-three thousand. Just ten years before the Republican candidate in the same District had been elected by a majority of nearly five thousand, which had been pretty closely kept good by that party down to Dr. Ladd's election. His most notable speech in the XLVIth Congress was one of considerable power on Wood's "Funding Bill," which was much read and quoted at the time. He was Chairman of the Committee on Expenditures in the Post-office Department and a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency. In 1880 he was renominated and elected to Congress by a majority of 880, on the largest vote ever polled in the District. The next February, near the close of his first term, he delivered a strong speech in the House on the registry of foreign shipping, which was greatly applauded as a true representation of the great shipping interests of Maine and New England.

A biographical sketch of Dr. Ladd, prepared for the forthcoming book, "Public Men of Our Times," from which the materials of this notice are mainly drawn, closes with the following remarks:

Dr. Ladd has business capacity, and the forty years of his business life in Bangor have been marked by the closest application. Ambitious to obtain wealth, he sought it through the legitimate channels of labor and forecast, rather than by the doubtful expedients resorted to by the speculator and adventurer. His personal integrity was never questioned. An extensive reader, particularly of history, he has devoted much time and thought to the subjects of finance and political economy generally. As a public speaker he is fluent, self-possessed, bold in attack, and quick of repartee. His devotion to his public duties, his uniform courtesy, and his fidelity to the interests of his constituents, render him deservedly popular, and his friends indulge the hope that many years of public life and usefulness are yet reserved for him.

HON. LEWIS BARKER.

The Hon. Lewis Barker, member of the Executive Council of the State, and long a prominent attorney and political leader in Eastern Maine, is of an old English family, which has been traced back to the beginning of the twelfth century. It is not certainly known when his ancestors reached America, but it was at least two hundred years ago, when they are found occupying farmsteads at Exeter, New Hampshire. On the mother's side he is of the Peases of Parsonfield, among the earliest settlers of that part of Maine. He was born in Exeter, Penobscot county, which was named by his father and associates from the old home in the Granite State. His natal day is February 18, 1818. He was the fourth son and seventh child of Nathaniel and Sarah (Pease) Barker, who were married in Exeter, and lived there the whole of their married life. His father was killed by an accident in Bangor in 1823, at the comparatively early age of thirty-eight. The mother survived until January 6, 1880, when she passed away forever from the old home in Exeter, at the remarkable age of ninety-one.

Among the brothers of Mr. Barker are the Hon. Noah Barker, one of the most prominent citizens of Corinth, whose public services are elsewhere duly noticed in this History; and the late David Barker, Esq., who was also a native of Exeter, and resided there all his days as an attorney, frequently relieving his severer labors, however, with the composition of a class of simple, popular poems which earned him from William Cullen Bryant the appellation of "the Burns of America." Among the best known and widely circulated of his writings are "The Empty Sleeve," "The Under Dog in the Fight," "The Covered Bridge," and others, which all the English-reading world knows by heart. In 1876, after his death—which occurred two years before—his works were collected and privately published, under the editorship of the subject of this memoir, with a biographical sketch by Judge John E. Godfrey, of Bangor. The feeling and eloquent eulogy pronounced by Judge Peters before the Penobscot Bar formed a part of the biography. Although printed only for private circulation, the work was much viewed in the Independent and other leading journals of the day, sometimes at great length, and numerous offers have been made by publishing houses for its republication for the general market; which it may be hoped, in the interest of popular poesy and general literature, will one day be permitted.

The young Lewis was trained mainly in the stern school of the world. He received some formal education in the rude district schools of his childhood, with four or five terms at intervals at Foxcroft Academy, during the Principalships of Dr. Stevens and Professor Ropes, 1830-34. From the age of fourteen, however, he "did for himself." He boarded two miles from the Academy, working and "doing chores" for his board, and walking to and fro in all weathers. When sixteen years old he began to teach school in a district adjoining his home, and for seven years taught more or less in that and other schools of Exeter and elsewhere. His opportunities were improved, however, in perfecting himself in his studies and reading somewhat widely. About 1838 he began studying law with the Hon. A. G. Jewett, of Belfast, but then of Bangor, and formerly United States Minister to Peru; and then with Messrs. Kent & Cutting, the head of whom was Governor of the State and afterwards became Justice of the Supreme Judicial Court, as did also Mr. Cutting, the two sitting together upon that bench—a quite unique fact in the history of the profession. With them he completed his elementary studies, and was admitted to the Bar of the State in 1841. He began business at once in Stetson, adjoining his old home, and remained there in successful and widening practice for thirty years. He then removed to Bangor, where he has since been prominent in the legal profession of the county and of Eastern Maine. He is now head of the flourishing firm of Barker, Vose & Barker, whose members are himself, Thomas W. Vose, Esq., (admitted to the partnership in 1876), and Lewis A. Barker, only son of the head of the firm, who was admitted in 1875, after an undergraduate course at Union College and a professional training at the Albany Law School.

Mr. Barker, many years after coming of age, took little more interest in politics than to do his duty at the polls, and in a quiet way in the local party councils. The outbreak of the war found him a comparatively obscure, unobtrusive country attorney. He had thus far steadily supported the Democratic party, but, moved by the new issues created by the war, and discontented with certain partisan aspects of the situation, he became an ardent working Republican, and very soon was well-known in the politics of the county and State. For the first time in his life he developed an extraordinary oratorical faculty; and his services as a Union and Republican speaker were early in request in many States. Substantially abandoning his profession for the time, he gave himself and his best efforts to the great cause, and speedily won enduring fame for the pungency and power with which he pressed his arguments and appeals upon the people. He has in later years been called to the stump in New York State in every Presidential campaign since and including 1864; and has also spoken often and effectively for his party in all the New England States, in Pennsylvania, Ohio, and other leading sections of the country. Countless complimentary notices, from the press and from distinguished contemporaries, have been given him in the course of his remarkable career of the last twenty years, from which a good-sized volume might be made up.

Mr. Barker's services were also soon in demand by his fellow-citizens as a legislator and public officer. In 1864 he was sent by his constituency of the Stetson, Plymouth, and Newport Representative District to the State Legislature, and served in the House that session; then in the Senate in 1865-66; and was returned to the House the next year, when he was made Speaker of that body, and served during the term. In 1870 he was again in the House, and with that closed his legislative service. He was on the Judiciary Committee of one or the other body every term of service, and Chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee both terms. He was also on the Elections and other important committees. In 1880 he was chosen by the Legislature a member of the Executive branch of the State Government, in the Governor's Council, and rendered invaluable aid as confidential adviser to Governor Davis, who had been his law-student in Stetson, and had just become the Chief Magistrate of the State under peculiarly embarrassing circumstances, after the great struggle over that office in the winter of 1879-80. During the whole of the conflict Mr. Barker was Chairman of the advisory committee of his party, and rendered very great aid in bringing about the result of Republican victory. He is still serving with the Executive Council. Mr. Barker was a Representative to the National Republican Convention of 1868, which nominated General Grant for the Presidency; was one of the committee that went to Washington to notify the General of his nomination; and was made at the convention a member of the National Republican Committee for Maine for the next four years. He was again a National delegate, to the Chicago Convention of 1880, which nominated the late General Garfield to the Presidential chair, and was on the committee on resolutions, which prepared the Republican platform of the campaign.

Mr. Barker was married August 2, 1846, to Miss Elizabeth, third daughter of Colonel Frances Hill, of Exeter, and Mrs. Elizabeth (Wasson) Hill. The mother is of the family to which belongs the celebrated thinker and writer, Mr. David A. Wasson. She is still living. They have had but two children, of whom the eldest was Evvie, born May 11, 1848, and died November 3, 1872. She was regarded by her friends as a lady of great promise, and won considerable repute as a writer for the public press, in both prose and poetry, two pieces of hers attaining large and probably enduring fame—one, the poem beginning—which has been set to music and widely sung, and is considered one of the sweetest things in the language. The other, "Angel Whispers," has also been generally published as a fugitive piece in the newspapers of the country. The second and only surviving child is Lewis Amasa Barker, Esq., previously mentioned as a member of the well-known law firm, who was born August 12, 1854. He was married October 14, 1875, to Miss Maggie, daughter of the late Moses L. Appleton, Esq., a leading member of the Bar in Bangor in his day, and brother of Justice Appleton, of the Supreme Judicial Court. They have one child, a son, who is also named Lewis, the third of the family line bearing that cognomen.

HON. HENRY LORD.

This gentleman, a prominent business man of Bangor, President of the Board of Trade in that city, and ex-Speaker of the House of Representatives in the State Legislature, is a native of the place, "to the manor born" May 7, 1847. His parents were Charles E. and Caroline Lydia (Weston) Lord, old residents of Bangor. Their son Henry was educated in the public schools of the city, and also went for a time to the Bucksport Seminary. As soon as he was of age, however, he began his business career as a clerk for Mr. Thomas I. Stewart, a prosperous shipping broker and general commission merchant in Bangor; but in due time, having received a good training under Mr. Stewart, he set up an independent establishment in the same business and at the identical stand where he has since remained and now is, at No. 21 Exchange street.

Mr. Lord not only began his business life in early manhood, but also entered into politics almost as soon as he became a voter. Adopting from the beginning the principles and policy of the Republican party, he quickly became active and prominent in the organization of that party in his native city, and after a few years began to receive public office at its hands. He held several ward offices prior to 1872, when he was elected a member of the City Council from the Third ward, and was continued in that body by successive re-elections for three years. During his second and third years he served, by the suffrages of his fellow-members, as President of the Council. In the fall of 1876 his field of action as a political leader and legislator was enlarged. He was elected by his party as a Representative in the State Legislature from the Bangor District, and was returned to the same house the next year, during which his business and general ability and integrity secured him the high position of Speaker of that chamber—the third office in the State.

Mr. Lord, previous to his more active business career, had read a course in legal study with Messrs. Peters & Wilson (now Wilson & Woodward, the head of the former firm having become a judge of the Supreme Judicial Court), and with Colonel Jasper Hutchings, then and for some years since the Prosecuting Attorney for Penobscot county. Although he finally chose his life-work in another vocation, and was never admitted to the practice of the law, he has found the knowledge attained by his studies of much value to him in his legislative service and in his business, especially in maritime affairs, in which he has been largely concerned. He is quite extensively interested in shipping, having an interest in a large number of coasting and sea-going vessels, of a considerable part of which he is either agent or managing owner.

Among other local honors bestowed upon Mr. Lord, he was in the spring of 1881 chosen President of the Bangor Board of Trade. He also served for some years as a member of the city School Committee, and is a Director of the Mechanics' Library Association. He is now in the prime of his manhood, in good health and most energetic, efficient action in whatsoever will advance his business interests or aid to build up the community in which his life has been spent.

The religious faith of Mr. Lord is that of the Universalists, although he is not in membership in their church. He has twice been elected Vice-President of the Maine State Convention of Universalists.

CAPTAIN CHARLES A. BOUTELLE.

This distinguished gentleman, the senior proprietor and editor-in-chief of the Bangor Daily Whig and Courier, is a native of the Pine-tree State, born at Damariscotta, February 9, 1839. When he was but nine years old, in 1848, his parents removed to Brunswick, where he was given a good common-school and academic education. His parents wished him to add a collegiate course; but his father was a prominent shipmaster, and the boy had imbibed a taste for "a life on the ocean wave," which took him early to sea on the vessel of the elder Boutelle, under whom he passed early through several grades of the seafaring profession. He had been on the deep already about nine years, although now but twenty-four years of age, when, upon his return from foreign parts, in February, 1862, he found his country at war. His patriotic instincts led him at once to offer his energies to the Government in that arm of the service for which he felt best fitted; and upon the recommendation of leading commercial houses in New York City, backed by Senator Fessenden and Congressman (now Judge) Walton, of Maine, he was appointed by the Secretary of the Navy as Acting Master, his commission dating from April 8, 1862. He was assigned to the war-steamship Paul Jones, of the South Atlantic Squadron, and served upon it during the blockade of Charleston, participating in the attacks upon Fort Sumter, the occupation of Port Royal by the Federal forces, and the clearance of the Carolina and Georgia Sounds along the coast from the rebel cruisers and gunboats with which they were infested. He also bore honorable part in dangerous shore duty, as at the battle of St. John's Bluff, Florida, and at the capture of Jacksonville, where he commanded a battery of marine howitzers, co-operating with the land forces under Colonel Hawley of the Seventh Connecticut and Colonel Good of the Forty-seventh Pennsylvania infantry regiments. He was then transferred to the squadron engaged in the blockade of Wilmington, where he rendered chief aid in the capture of the Nutfield and the Wild Dayrell, two swift blockade-runners. In the spring of 1864, being then sailing-master and ordnance officer of the gunboat Sassacus, he was in the terrible and close engagement of that vessel with the powerful rebel ram Albemarle, which occurred May 5 of that year, an engagement characterized soon after by a correspondent of the Army and Navy Journal as "one of the most unusual and remarkable naval conflicts of this or any other war, in which the contending forces were so markedly disproportionate, and the result so contrary to preconceived ideas of 'iron-clad' invincibility, that it may justly claim to take an historical position on the same page that records the brilliant exploits of Decatur and John Paul Jones." The Albemarle was beaten off and badly disabled, and her consort, the gunboat Bombshell, with four rifled guns, a large quantity of ammunition, and a full complement of officers and men, was captured. Captain Boutelle's services were conspicuous in this action. Lieutenant-Commander Roe, of the Sassacus, in his official report said:

I take great pleasure in testifying to the fine conduct of Acting Masters A. W. Muldaur and C. A. Boutelle. These officers were as cool and fearless as at a general exercise. I respectfully recommend each for promotion to the grade of Lieutenant, deserved for good behavior and ability before the enemy in battle.

Mr. Boutelle was accordingly promoted by Secretary Welles, within three weeks afterwards, to the highest grade which a volunteer officer could then obtain in the navy, an honor conferred for this special reason upon few during the Rebellion,—that of Acting Volunteer Lieutenant, "in consideration," the Secretary wrote, "of your gallant conduct in the action with the rebel ram Albemarle on the 5th inst." He was assigned to the command of a light draught gunboat in the Louisiana waters, but was presently transferred, at his own desire, to the fleet of Admiral Farragut, which was about to attack Mobile. He volunteered to lead the movement upon the defenses, and his was the first vessel to force the obstructions below the city. Upon the retreat of the rebel force, he followed it for some distance up the Tombigbee, and captured a cotton laden steamer and a crew from the rebel Admiral Buchanan's flag-ship. He subsequently held for a time the position of an Acting Commodore, in command of the naval forces in Mississippi Sound, occupying the waters from Lake Pontchartrain to Mobile Bay. After some further service in the South until the close of and after the war, he was finally discharged, at his own request, when near the end of four years of distinguished service, and left the navy January 14, 1866. He afterwards commanded a steamer running between New York and Wilmington, and then accepted an engagement with a prominent shipping commission house in New York City. He had a strong bent for journalism, however, and had already written much in various ways for the newspapers. In the spring of 1870 the proprietors of the Whig and Courier, at Bangor, offered him the post of managing editor of that influential journal. He accepted for a trial of three months, and at the termination of that period consented to a permanent engagement. May 15, 1874, the establishment was bought by himself and his present partner, Mr. Benjamin A. Burr, he remaining editor and Mr. Burr taking charge of the publishing department. The history of the Whig and Courier under their conduct is well known through all the Penobscot country. Mr. Howard Owen, in the series of articles on American Journalism, in the New York Telegram, said the following in the forty-fourth number, which was devoted to the Bangor Whig and Courier:

The newspaper men of the State concede to Captain Boutelle a position in the foremost rank of the profession. His style of writing is chaste and cultured, as it is pointed and vigorous. Never striking at a fallen foe, he aims ponderous blows at error in all its forms, while truth and the right, as viewed from the solid and unmistakable Republican platform on which he has ever stood, never had a more earnest, devoted, and stalwart defender. In the habit of forming his own opinions, his editorials come out fresh and sparkling from the mint of his own unbiased thought, without waiting to draw ready-made from the metropolitan press, as editors of less breadth of thought find it most convenient to do. This independence and fearlessness have given to the Whig a commanding position and influence rarely attained by a newspaper published in a city the size of Bangor.

An editorial reference to the article, in the same number of the Telegram, comprised the following handsome compliments:

An apt illustration of the fitness of the polemic temperament for the press is presented to-day in our history of the Bangor Whig and Courier. The present prominence of that paper is due less to the honorable record of nearly half a century behind it than to the half-dozen years of Charles A. Boutelle's administration. It will be noticed that Captain Boutelle has displayed the instinct for fighting in every profession or vocation to which he turned his hand, in actual war and in politics. In the conflict of ideas wherein he now bears a leading banner, he has always been a noted and stalwart fighter. All his preceding exertions, tending to develop his talent for aggressiveness, for championship and leadership, qualified him for his present work. When he stepped into the ranks of journalism he was a journalist ready made.

In the canvass of 1880 Captain Boutelle was the choice of his party as a candidate for Representative in Congress; and although he was pitted against almost hopeless odds, he made a very gallant fight, and came out of it with a highly flattering, though not otherwise successful vote.

WILLIAM H. BROWN, M. D.

Dr. William Hammond Brown, ex-Mayor of Bangor, and long a leading practitioner in the city, belongs to one of the oldest families in Eastern Maine. On his mother's side, as his name may hint, he is a Hammond. His maternal grandfather, Captain William Hammond, from whom the Doctor is named, was the original proprietor of most of the tract now occupied by Bangor, on the west side of the Kenduskeag, and from him Hammond street is named. He was a soldier of the Revolution, his commission being signed by General John Hancock, and now in the possession of Dr. Hammond. His daughter Sophia was the wife of Mr. George Washington Brown, who came from Concord, Massachusetts, to Bangor about 1805, and engaged in trade as a merchant in the firm of Taylor & Brown, who occupied a modest frame store on the ground now covered by the elegant Wheelwright & Clark Block. To Mr. and Mrs. Brown were born five children, of whom William was the fourth, and the second son. The oldest brother, George W. (named from his father), is a lawyer in St. Louis, where he has been practicing for many years; the youngest brother, Reuben Howe (also family names), lived in Boston for some time, and died there about ten years ago. The oldest sister, Sophia, married Professor D. S. Talcott, late of the Theological Seminary in Bangor, and is now dead; the younger sister, Mary, became Mrs. George W. Pickering, wife of the well-known business man in West Bangor, and is now also deceased. The venerable mother survived until November 4, 1881, when, at the age of ninety-one years, she departed this life at the residence of her son, the subject of this sketch.

William Hammond was born on what is now High street, in this city, June 14, 1822. He attended the public schools to some extent; but at a select school attached to the Seminary in his early days he was fitted for college. He entered Bowdoin in 1838, and was graduated with honor four years thereafter. He began to read medicine at once with Dr. John Mason, one of the most famous of the old practitioners in Bangor. During three courses he attended the lectures in the Medical Department of Harvard University, at the same time enjoying the advantages of the Tremont Street Medical School, in Boston. He received his diploma from Harvard in 1850. He had thus spent nearly nine years in faithful and well-directed study before applying for his medical degree. Not satisfied with this, he went abroad and engaged in clinical work and further study under the great masters of London and Paris. He received his instruction in surgery mainly under the celebrated Velpeau, and pursued his medical studies at the French capital with the eminent Drs. Valleix, Trouseau, and Ricard. He also spent several months in Dublin, in studying diseases of the eye under Dr. William R. Wilde, Oculist to the Queen, and at the lying-in hospital known as the Rotunda, then in charge of the eminent obstetrician, Dr. William McClintock, where he made special studies in obstetrics and gynecology. This very thorough preparation over, he returned and made a final entry upon American practice. Before going abroad he had spent about three years in the profession, in Massachusetts and at his old home, and returned to Bangor for the recommencement of his business. In 1857, his health having failed him in Bangor, by reason of overwork and the severity of the climate, he removed to St. Louis, where he recovered his health and secured a large practice, which he maintained until the outbreak of the war. He then found residence in the border city quite too unpleasant for a Yankee, and turned his face once more to the familiar hills of the Penobscot, among which his life has since been spent, in the active and successful practice of his profession. He has preferred to remain alone in its pursuit, and to cultivate a general practice, rather than specialties, although when in Dublin he intended to become an oculist. Singular to say, also, he has never had more than one student in medicine, and that one Dr. Henry A. Reynolds, later the famous temperance lecturer, and recently founder of the town of Reynolds, in Dakota.

Although somewhat in public office, Dr. Brown has never striven to be prominent in politics, or to take position as a leader. The first ticket he voted was a Whig one; but he has been an unswerving Republican from the inception of Republicanism. In 1854 his fellow-citizens placed him in the Common Council of this city, where he served one year, and then went abroad. He was returned to the City Council in 1878, as a member of the Board of Aldermen; but at the expiration of his term was elected Mayor of Bangor, and served so acceptably that he was renominated and re-elected to the same post in 1880. He is the only native of the city who has ever thus far been elevated to this distinguished position.

During the late War of the Rebellion his medical abilities were in request as a member, under appointment of the Governor, of the State Board for the Examination of Surgeons, before whom candidates for the medical staff of the army were required to appear. He is a member of the Maine Medical Association, and has long been a leading member and for two years President of the Penobscot County Medical Association, of which he was one of the founders. He has been a Free and Accepted Mason for over twenty-seven years, and is now a member of St. John's Commandery of Knights Templars, in Bangor, and of the subordinate societies.

Dr. Brown was united in marriage June 12, 1851, in Leicester, Massachusetts, to Miss Anna Eliza, only daughter of John and Ann (Jenkins) Woodcock, a worthy couple of that place, of which the father was a native and a child of one of the oldest families. Dr. and Mrs. Brown have two children—Annie Loise, who is with her parents home; and May Hammond, who is married to Professor John L. Stoddard, of Boston, the celebrated tourist and popular lecturer. She has invariably accompanied her husband in his tours of travel, and has thus enjoyed rare facilities for seeing the world.

DR. E. F. SANGER.

Eugene Francis Sanger, M. D., a prominent practitioner in Bangor, and a medical officer of celebrity during the late war, was born on the 18th of October, 1829, in Waterville, Maine, oldest son of Zebulon and Charlotte (Wayne) Sanger, and the second of four children. The father was then engaged in that city as a merchant and lumber operator. He was of Dutch ancestry, but the family had been in America for some generations, settling originally at Framingham, Massachusetts. The name is a very rare one in this State. On his mother's side the Doctor shares somewhat remotely the blood of the renowned Revolutionary general, Anthony Wayne. Eugene's early schooling was for a single term in the public schools of Waterville; he then entered the Institute there, and afterwards the Academy, where he completed a preparation for college. He was almost ready for college, indeed, when but thirteen years old; but his health breaking down, he was unable to complete his preparation until two years afterwards, when he entered Waterville College, now Colby University. He spent three years here with credit, and then went to Dartmouth for his senior year. He was graduated from this famous old school with the class of 1849. He then returned to Waterville, after a time visited Virginia, and while there made an engagement as a tutor in the family of Lawrence B. Washington, on the old estate in Westmoreland county, where General George Washington was born. He remained with the Washingtons a single winter and then returned home. He had already begun to read medicine in a private way, and looked forward to the life of a physician. At Waterville he entered the office of Dr. N. R. Boutelle, and with him finished his preparatory studies. He had meanwhile taken one course of lectures in the Medical Department of Bowdoin College, and another at the Jefferson Medical College in Philadelphia, from which he took his diploma in March, 1853. After this very ample preparation, he began practice in the responsible post of Assistant-Surgeon in the United States Marine Hospital at Chelsea, Massachusetts. In the fall of the same year (1853) he was appointed Assistant-Surgeon of the Charity Hospital at New York city, on Blackwell's Island, serving in the various medical departments of the public institutions on the Island. He was a little more than a year in these, and then received an appointment as Assistant Physician in the Children's Hospital on Randall's Island, also near New York City. He declined this flattering appointment, however, and went to Europe instead, where he pursued his professional studies and inquiries in the renowned hospitals of Edinburgh, London, and Paris. In about six months he returned to this country, and in May, 1855, settled as a practitioner at Ellsworth, in this State. He remained but two years here, however, and then removed his office to Bangor, where he has since remained in profitable and successful practice, except when absent during the late war. On the 24th of June, 1861, Dr. Sanger was commissioned by Governor Washburn as Surgeon of the Sixth Maine Regiment, with the grade of Major. He served in the medical department of the Army of the Potomac until November 9, 1861, when, after due examination, he was commissioned Brigade Surgeon, his commission being signed personally—not stamped, as afterwards—with the signature of President Lincoln. Out of thirty examined for nine vacancies for this post, he was the third commissioned. On his original appointment, when Surgeons were examined by a State Board, he had been the first commissioned, and was one of but two commissioned as full Surgeons among twenty-five examined. The physician examined next before him had been already appointed by the Governor, was wearing a showy uniform, and was a large, "beefy" fellow. The Doctor is small and wiry; and when the Board came to pass him, the remark went around, "This is a case of Brain against Beef!" He continued to act as Regimental Surgeon, however; but was attached to the staff of General Hancock as the medical officer of his command until he was ordered to the Department of the Gulf.

In April, 1862, Dr. Sanger reported to General B. F. Butler, at Ship Island, and was assigned as Brigade Surgeon to the command of General Phelps, of Vermont. After the capture of New Orleans, he was made Medical Purveyor of the Department of the Gulf and Surgeon in charge of St. James Hospital, in the city. He was then assigned to duty as Medical Director of the defenses of New Orleans under General Sherman, and was Surgeon-in-chief of General T. W. Sherman's division during the siege of Port Hudson. It was upon his report that a number of rebel doctors were ordered out of the Federal lines, notwithstanding their declaration that their presence in New Orleans was absolutely necessary to the treatment of yellow fever. The Doctor reported that they were not necessary, and they had to go. He was presently assigned to General Franklin's (afterwards General Emery's) corps, the Nineteenth, as Medical Director, and was with it during the Western Louisiana and Red River expeditions. During the latter, after the retreat from Pleasant Hill, he, in pursuance of a promise made to our wounded men, skillfully penetrated the rebel lines, though under fire, with a small guard and an ambulance load of medical supplies, and actually got back to that place, forty miles distant, was met by a flag of truce (the enemy thinking the whole Federal force had returned), was admitted to the hospitals where the Federal wounded lay, ministered abundantly to their necessities for several days, and finally re-entered the Federal lines safely, after serious difficulties and detentions. This feat was hardly paralleled by any other event in the medical service during the war. He was on the staff of General Franklin in the battle of Sabine Cross Roads, when that officer was wounded in the leg and his Judge Advocate had both legs shot off. He had afterwards, in his capacity as Medical Director, the charge of the hospitals at Natchez, and also of the hospital steamers on the river. His next assignment was in July, 1864, as Surgeon in charge of the Government hospital at Annapolis Junction, near Washington; and then to the medical charge of the Elmira prison for rebel captives, from August to December of the same year. He long afterwards wrote an elaborate and convincing defense of the management of this prison, in answer to the attack upon it by General Hill, of Georgia, from his place in the Senate chamber—which defense was widely copied and commended in the Northern papers.

After Elmira, Surgeon Sanger became Medical Director of the Department of Michigan under General Hooker, and was in charge of the Harper General Hospital in Detroit. Finally he reported to General Thomas at Nashville, just after the siege of that city by General Hood, and was made Medical Director of the District of East Tennessee, with general charge of the hospitals on Lookout Mountain. He was once assigned as Medical Director of the Department of Arkansas; but another appointment was substituted for this. His experience with the army was thus very full of important executive work. In September, 1865, he was finally mustered out of the service, and returned to Bangor, where he promptly resumed practice, in which he has since remained steadily, without special incident. His practice has been large and lucrative, especially in the department of surgery. Under Governor Chamberlain's administration he was Surgeon-General on the Executive staff, with the grade of Colonel. During the war, while at Chattanooga, he was breveted Lieutenant-Colonel in the Medical Staff of the army.

Dr. Sanger is reputed to have the largest surgical practice of any surgeon east of Portland. In this department of practice his services are in demand all over Eastern Maine. Besides the usual professional round of duty, Dr. Sanger has contributed numerous papers to medical periodicals and the Transactions of the Maine Medical Society. Among the topics treated are the Resection of Joints, Abscesses of the Lungs, Litholapaxy, Malpractice, etc. The last-named paper was published in pamphlet form, was widely circulated, and obtained much reputation. Some of his cases of exsection of the elbow, during his service with the army, are noticed at length in Dr. Culbertson's prize essay on the Excision of the Larger Joints of the Extremities, published in 1876.

The doctor is a Republican in his political faith, but has not aimed at prominence in politics. He was a member of the Common Council in 1870-71, and has been Pension Surgeon at Bangor, by appointment of the General Government, since 1868. In 1876 he was chosen President of the State Medical Association. He is an honorary member of the Detroit Academy of Medicine, also of the Baltimore Medical and Surgical Society. He is now Surgeon of the Second Regiment of State Militia.

Dr. Sanger was united in marriage in Boston, Massachusetts, December 9, 1857, to Miss Emily Fay, daughter of Sabin and Caroline (Fay) Pond, of Ellsworth, Maine. They have had three children, all living—Mary Lottie, born March 27, 1859; Sabin Pond, born September 14, 1861, now a student in Harvard College; and Eugene Boutelle, named from his father and his father's medical preceptor, born February 20, 1871.

DR. SUMNER LAUGHTON.

Sumner Laughton, M. D., is a native of the Pine-tree State, born in the ancient town of Norridgewock, Somerset county, April 5, 1812, just before the outbreak of the last struggle with Great Britain. He was the youngest child in a family of eight, most of whom lived to venerable age, one of his brothers, John, dying but a few months ago aged ninety years. He was of English stock, and his father, John Laughton, was one of the early settlers of Norridgewock. His elementary education was received in such primary schools as the time and place afforded; but he attended a private academy in Norridgewock, kept by the Rev. Mr. Brimblecom, thence in 1828 went to Bloomfield Academy, where he remained until the fall of 1829, when he returned to Norridgewock and took a select course of studies under the tuition of the celebrated Rev. Josiah Peet. In 1830 he entered as student the office of Dr. John S. Lynde, of Norridgewock, father of Mr. John H. Lynde, a former editor of the Bangor Whig and Courier. At the same time he continued his classical studies with a law student in the office of Judge Tenney. In the summer of 1831 young Laughton came to Bangor and studied with Dr. Samuel Bradbury, whose student he remained until Dr. Bradbury's death in 1833. He had, however, meanwhile attended the Medical Department of Bowdoin College, from which he was graduated with the degree of M. D. in March, 1834. After the death of Dr. Bradbury, he pursued his studies during the vacations with Dr. Elibu Baxter. He had meanwhile practiced for a few months, as the habit of medical students not infrequently was in those days, about 1833, in the present town of Passadumkeag. After graduating he established himself in Orono as a practitioner, and remained there two years, when he removed to Foxcroft, then in Penobscot, but now in Piscataquis county. Here he practiced successfully for a somewhat longer period, but in 1849 he decided to remove to Bangor, where he had visited the hospitals for cholera patients the summer before, and on whose behalf he had volunteered his services. Here the entire remainder of his nearly half-century of professional life has been spent. He has had a very wide and varied general practice, performing not a few of the great operations in surgery, in which his business has been large. He is now the oldest physician in Bangor in continuous professional life, and very likely in the Penobscot Valley, although not the senior of some in point of age. He is still in practice, though of late years he has restricted himself to counsel and calls by day, declining night service. He has always had a high place in the profession of the county, since his removal to Bangor, and was for a term or two President of the Penobscot Medical Association. He has never, until last summer, when ill health compelled it, taken a vacation of any length, except occasional visits to Boston and to the hospitals of New York and Philadelphia.

Dr. Laughton was an old-time Whig in the days of Whiggery, but became an Abolitionist and then a Republican upon the organization of that party. He was a member of the lower branch of the City Council from the First Ward in 1864-5 and 1865-6; but never was smitten with the mania for office-seeking, and had no ambition for public life. When Mr. Greeley was nominated for President, he received the support of Dr. Laughton; and since that campaign the Doctor has not been conspicuously identified with any party. He is a member of the First Baptist church in Bangor, is a Royal Arch Mason, and was Past Grand of a Lodge of Odd Fellows in Foxcroft, which expired during his residence there.

Dr. Laughton was married in 1835, January 27th, to Miss Mary Ann, daughter of Nathaniel and Matilda (Young) Parker, of Hampden, who is still living in a fairly hale old age. They have had four children—Frances Parker, born January 15, 1836, in Orono, now wife of Benjamin H. Mace, Esq., of Bangor, County Attorney for Penobscot; Edward Sumner, born in Foxcroft the 18th of September, 1838, and now residing in Calais, Maine, where he has practiced dentistry for nearly twenty years; Henry Herbert, deceased; and Frederick Malvern, born May 3, 1844, who is the subject of a sketch below. Mrs. Mace, of this family, is well-known in the literary world, in which she has had a reputation for more than twenty years. One of her earlier poetic pieces has a very wide fame—"Only Waiting," which was published anonymously when she was but about sixteen years old. A more ambitious effort, which has been rewarded, not only by enduring popularity and fame, but by the honor of illustration in an elegant edition by Fredericks, is her poem of "Israfil," published in Harper's Magazine for May, 1879. A great many other pieces, mostly in poetry, have been contributed to Lippincoff's, the Atlantic, and other magazines, and to the leading newspapers of Boston, some of which have won her many compliments from her compeers in the fields of literature, as well as from those who have been delighted by the sweet singer. A number of them are treasured permanently in the cyclopædias and compendiums of literature which have been published in this country.

HON. FREDERICK M. LAUGHTON.

This gentleman, a prominent attorney in Bangor, and the only Mayor of the Democratic persuasion elected on a Democratic ticket the city has ever had, is a native of Foxcroft, Maine, born, as above stated, May 3, 1844, youngest child of Dr. Sumner and Mary A. (Parker) Laughton. He was five and one-half years old when his parents removed to Bangor, and took his first formal education in the public schools of this city, going through the entire course of elementary study as then organized, and passing through the High School, whose curriculum he finished in 1860. His preparation for college had thus been completed; but the failure of his eyesight compelled him to rest from study for some years, and he finally determined to go on with readings in law instead of the classics. He began in the office of his brother-in-law, Benjamin H. Mace, Esq., in 1864, and remained therein until the fall of the next year, when he entered the Harvard Law School, from which he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Laws, at the commencement of 1866. In the meantime, at the October term of court, 1865, he had been admitted to the Penobscot Bar, which enabled him to graduate at Harvard after but one year's residence. He returned to Bangor, and at once formed a partnership with his brother-in-law, under the firm name of Mace & Laughton, their office being in the same block (Wheelwright & Clark's) where Mr. Laughton now is. In 1871 this partnership dissolved, and each opened an office in another place for separate practice. Mr. Laughton went into the building then known as Bass's Block, where he remained about two years, or until the spacious and pleasant rooms he now occupies, and had long desired, became vacant, when he secured them, removed his office, and has since continuously remained there. October 1, 1880, he took into partnership Frank H. Clergue, Esq., who had been a student in his office, where Mr. Clergue's preliminary professional education had been taken altogether, after graduation at the State College. He had practiced for a year alone, with much success and popularity, before his partnership with Mr. Laughton. This firm is still maintained, under the name and style of Laughton & Clergue, which enjoys a large, varied, and successful practice.

Mr. Laughton early swung away from the political faith of his father, and has been a consistent and unswerving Democrat since his life as a full-fledged citizen began. He soon became well known in the party, though not attempting to make himself at all conspicuous in its counsels or campaigns, and was elected in 1868, when but twenty-four years of age, a member of the Common Council from the First Ward of the city. He was returned the next year; and in March, 1875, after a somewhat close and heated canvass and two trials at the polls, he was elected Mayor by a majority of about one hundred against a customary majority of the opposition of four to six hundred. He served his term without special incident, except the introduction of the water supply into the city, and retired at its close. He has since not been in public life apart from the regular course of his profession, which brings him at times, as other lawyers, before the eye of the community.

Mr. Laughton is unconnected with any of the religious organizations. He is a member of the Order of Free and Accepted Masons, in which he is a Master Mason and a member of Rising Virtue Lodge, No. 10, in Bangor; is also an Odd Fellow, a Past Grand Master of the State, and two years a Representative from the Grand Lodge of Maine to the Grand Lodge of the United States; and a Knight of Pythias, in which order he is a Past Grand Chancellor of the State, and likewise Past Supreme Representative, an honor which entitles him to permanent membership in the Supreme Lodge of the World. These associations seem, for the present at least, quite to satisfy the social side of his nature, since he yet remains in the enjoyment of single blessedness.

CALVIN SEAVEY, M. D.

Dr. Calvin Seavey, the oldest practitioner by continuous service in Bangor or in Penobscot county, is himself a native of this region, born near the south border of Exeter, June 15, 1809. He was the seventh child and fourth son of the Rev. Reuben and Polly (Pease) Seavey, of that town for many years. The father was one of the earliest settlers in Exeter, only two whites having been chopping there in the woods before he entered. He was a Calvinistic Baptist minister and a farmer, preaching for a number of years in later life to the church at North Newport, where he was residing at the time of his death in the year 1829. The mother survived until 1872, when she departed this life at the advanced age of ninety-one. Her third child, Reuben, brother of Dr. Seavey, was the first-born of white parents in Exeter town. They had sixteen children—eight sons, and as many daughters—most of whom lived to maturity; and there was only one pair of twins among so numerous births.

Calvin's elementary education was received at the fireside until he was fifteen years old, when he began attending the common schools of the town in the winters, laboring diligently on the home farm and for hire elsewhere during the warmer seasons. He had not, until he was twenty-one years old, more than six weeks' schooling in any one year. The next day after he became of age he re-entered the town school, then taught by Miss Julia Barker, sister of the Hons. Lewis and Noah Barker, and in the fall attended another kept by E. F. Crane, Esq., who is still living in Kenduskeag. He began to get some reputation as a scholar, and was presently invited to take the winter school in Carmel village. He taught it with a success that surprised him and his friends, and he was engaged for three consecutive terms, when he declined further engagement, and began the study of medicine. In the intervals of teaching the winter schools at Carmel he had studied during several terms at Foxcroft Academy, and by the fall of 1834, when he was twenty-five years of age, he had an excellent preparation for college. He decided, however, to commence professional study without further delay; and the following spring he entered the office of Dr. Paul Ruggles, of Carmel, brother of his first wife. He was two years with Dr. Ruggles, and then read for one year with Dr. Daniel McRuer, of Bangor, attending during the winters three courses of lectures at the Maine Medical College, at Brunswick, from which he was graduated with the degree of Doctor of Medicine May 18, 1837. The same spring he settled in Stetson, not three miles from his birthplace, for general practice, and remained sixteen years. He had a very extensive circuit of professional visiting in what was then a rather sparsely settled country, probably twenty-five miles from his residence in each direction, and thus into Piscataquis, Somerset, and Waldo counties, and often much further. His favorite practice was surgery, in which he achieved much success; and these facts led to his calls more frequently from a distance than came to some of the country physicians. Notwithstanding his large and lucrative practice, Dr. Seavey decided to remove to a more congenial field in Bangor. He came to the city in May, 1853, and has since resided and practiced continuously here. He has retained his ancient enthusiasm for surgical practice, so important in a lumbering country, and has probably performed more operations in the same period than any other surgeon in Maine since Dr. Green died. He has had, moreover, the usual general practice of local physicians, but in a very large and successful degree. Although now seventy-two years old, he yet remains in the full exercise of his professional talents for the benefit of his suffering fellow-men. He is a member in good standing in the Penobscot County Medical Society, the Maine Medical Society, and the American Medical Association, before one or the other of which he has frequently read papers and engaged in discussions upon professional topics. He has steadily refused to accept official honors in any of these societies, having a decided dislike to conspicuousness. In 1870 he delivered before the Maine Medical College a lecture on The Natural and Moral World and their Phenomena, which attracted much attention, and was printed in pamphlet form. He has several times been invited to address the Alumni Association of the Jefferson Medical College, at Philadelphia, and accepted once, when he pronounced an interesting address upon the history of the College, with biographical sketches of a number of its professors. This effort won him much applause, and led to subsequent invitations, which he declined. Dr. Seavey is himself an alumnus of Jefferson, having spent parts of eight or ten winters in study and investigation there, and finally taking his examination and a second degree of M. D. in 1871, when he was sixty-two years old. For many years he has made a habit of taking a few weeks' vacation in January and February, not for touring and junketing, but for careful observation and study in the hospitals of New York and Philadelphia, particularly in the Bellevue Hospital in the former city, and at the Pennsylvania Hospital, of Philadelphia, with which the Jefferson Medical College is connected. He is not likely ever to feel too old to learn, and still keeps up his knowledge of Latin and other scholastic attainments, with much pleasure and profit. At the commencement of Bowdoin College in 1863, Dr. Seavey had conferred upon him, in recognition of his scholarship and professional success, the honorary degree of Master of Arts. He is the founder of the Seavey Anatomical Museum, in the Medical Department of that college (or the "Maine Medical School," his alma mater, to which he is still warmly attached. He gave this Museum $1,000 in gold, and has since added benefactions, with which his own valuable collection will presently be included. He also gave $500 to build the Memorial Hall upon the college grounds. He has ever taken just pride in the literary institutions of the State, and has given liberally to aid them, showing thus his faith by his works.

The doctor is a Republican in his political faith, but has had no ambition for leadership in the party, still less for office-seeking or office-holding. He is a member of the Independent Congregational (Unitarian) Society in Bangor, and has not cared to connect himself with any of the secret societies.

Dr. Seavey was first married in Carmel, October 1, 1836, to Miss Ann W., daughter of the Rev. Paul and Mercy (Dexter) Ruggles, the first settlers of that town. He had by her two children—one son and one daughter—of whom the former only is living, Paul R. Seavey, Esq., of the Bangor Whig and Courier, and a well-known popular lecturer. Mrs. Seavey died six weeks after the birth of her daughter, her death occurring in November, 1838. The doctor was remarried December 24, 1839, his second wife being Miss Mary Ann, daughter of the late Henry Hill, Esq., of Exeter. He had five children of this marriage, in order as follow: Henry Hill, who became also an able physician, and at a very early age, being a demonstrator of anatomy at Michigan University when scarcely twenty years old, and subsequently Demonstrator at the Bellevue Hospital, and at the Maine Medical College four years, but dying when only thirty-four; Henrietta Ellen, who was born in April, 1847, and died in July, 1879; Jerome Harris, died at three years of age; Jerome Aden, deceased at two years; and Clyminia Spaulding, died at three years. The mother died in the year 1871; and the doctor was married for the third time in July, 1877, to Miss Emma, daughter of Warren Weston, Esq., of Brewer, who is his present wife. They have had one child, a son, named Calvin Gross Seavey, from his father and an excellent friend of his in Philadelphia, the celebrated surgeon, Dr. Samuel D. Gross. This son was born November 4, 1879, and died nine months afterwards, July 26, 1880.

The Hon. Noah Barker, of Exeter, a lifelong friend of the Doctor, has kindly sent the compilers of this work an additional biographical sketch, from which we are able to make but the following extracts:

High upon the list of our "self-made men," who have arisen by their own untiring efforts from obscurity, penury and destitution, to the comforts and enjoyments of refined society, even to the highest distinction in their professions, stands the honored name of Dr. Calvin Seavey.

"Is there for honest poverty
That hangs his head, and a' that?"

If such there be, Dr. Seavey belongs not to that class of "fools" alluded to by the "ploughman poet." Honest poverty he considers no disgrace to any man, and especially to him who has struggled through it and extricated himself from its pinching grip. Often has the writer of this sketch listened to the Doctor while, with tearful eyes and quivering lips, he would speak of the poverty and wretchedness of the family during the early years of his childhood, and feelingly allude to the hardships and sufferings endured by his honored parents in procuring the bare necessities of life, and the means to keep the children from a state of actual starvation!

The doctor is now past seventy-two years of age, and is still vigorous and in perfect health. His professional business is very extensive, and at no time of his life has he had a more active practice than at present. He is now living happily in his old age with his present young, accomplished, and much beloved companion.

In closing this brief sketch of Dr. Seavey, it may be proper to add that he is noted for his good old Saxon pluck, no less than for his kind-hearted generosity, seeming to admit the sentiment that—

"There is nothing on earth like 'true grit,'
It will raise up the feeble and clinical;
Take a man, as it were, from the pit,
And uplift him to Fame's highest pinnacle.
So the Doctor ignores the word 'fail,'
With an eye far above 'water-level,'
And determines to 'weather the gale,'
In defiance of Fate or the Devil!"

HON. NOAH WOODS

was born in Groton, Middlesex county, Massachusetts, September 26, 1811. His mother died in the autumn of 1816, leaving seven children, two of whom were younger than Noah; in consequence whereof, early in 1817, he was taken to Baldwin, Cumberland county, State of Maine, to live with an uncle, William Fitch, Esq., whose wife was his father's own sister. His uncle had a large farm, was also owner of timber-lands and saw-mills in his vicinity, and was engaged more or less in the lumber business. When very young, the services of Noah were called into requisition in taking care of stock, working on the farm, and as he grew older, in addition thereto, in assisting in all the varieties of lumbering operations from cutting, hauling, and driving logs to manufacturing them and taking care of and marketing the lumber. The mills were located on the Northwest River, in that part of Baldwin now in the town of Sebago, and before the days of the Cumberland & Oxford Canal the lumber from them was hauled to Sebago Lake, rafted, and taken across the lake to Chadbourne's Landing, in Standish—there taken out and hauled by ox-teams to Portland, about fifteen miles. In all the work incident to getting the lumber from the forest to Chadbourne's Landing he participated more or less. When the Cumberland & Oxford Canal was opened, his uncle was ready with his canal boat, and was amongst the very first in making the passage across Sebago Lake and through the new canal to Portland. Noah Woods was one of his crew on this trip, a common sailor before the mast on the lake and behind the horse on the tow-path on the canal. In the course of his first season of the canal he made several trips on his uncle's boat, and won quite a reputation for himself as a boatman. In the spring of the next year, 1830, having become dissatisfied with his situation and prospects at his uncle's, and rather liking a boatman's life, he withdrew unceremoniously from his long-time home and associations, and hired out as a boatman with Luther Fitch, Esq., who had built a new boat and was just commencing business as a trader at Northwest River. This movement cut him off entirely from all the home he had, and during his engagement with Fitch the canal boat was his home. In the autumn of 1830 he went by invitation to live with his cousin, William Fitch, Jr., who resided in Sebago, very near his father's. Here he remained during the winter, taking care of the cattle and attending the district school. The term was short, and when it closed, by solicitation of many of his school-mates, he opened a private school, which was fairly well attended and was continued about six weeks. This was his first effort as a teacher, and his pupils pronounced it a success.

His opportunities for obtaining an education had been limited to an attendance from ten to twelve weeks in a year at a little backwoods country school. At his uncle's he had access to desirable, valuable books, and acquired a taste for reading, and during the winter evenings and whenever a spare moment could be found by daylight or pine-knot light, it was given, as a rule, to his books. In the spring of 1831 an effort was made by William Fitch, Jr., and others, to induce him to return to his uncle's, which would have been successful but for an invitation from Major Thomas Perly, of South Brighton (now Naples), to enter into his employment, and in the summer to take charge of a new canal boat then on the stocks. Major Perly was a wealthy man, and had an interesting and highly intelligent family about him, some of his children being very near the age of Noah, and he was not very long in deciding to take up his abode there. Until 1839 he had no other home. For four seasons in succession he managed the Major's canal boat acceptably to him, and in the autumn of 1832, having accumulated a little money, he entered the academy in North Bridgton, continuing there until the boating season opened in the spring of 1833. Again in the autumn of that year he returned to the academy, and in the winter of 1833-34 took the school in his old district in Sebago and boarded at his uncle's. The older pupils here were his former schoolmates and acquaintances, but his success as a teacher was marked, and the result was that for four more winters in succession he kept the school, and in the autumn of 1837 kept a ten-weeks' term of high school in the same house. His career as a boatman terminated in the autumn of 1834, and after that, when not engaged in teaching, his time was spent at the academy in North Bridgton until the spring of 1838. In the summer of 1836 he taught school in Machias, Maine, and in the autumn of that year was assistant teacher in Bethel Academy one term, and in the spring of 1837 was employed there again one term. In the spring of 1838 he entered the office of Charles Washburn, Esq., in Harrison, Maine, as a law student, remaining there until autumn. The winter following he taught the district school in North Bridgton, and in April, 1839, entered the office of Hon. John S. Tenney, of Norridgewock, Somerset county, Maine, as a law student. In the spring of 1841 he was admitted to the Bar in that county, and at once opened an office as a practicing lawyer in Gardiner, Maine. In the autumn of the same year, having previously become managing agent for the owners of a township of timber land in the eastern part of the State, a partnership in the law business was arranged with Charles Danforth, Esq., now Judge Danforth, of the Supreme Judicial Court. The partnership continued most amicably until 1855, when, in consequence of an accumulation of business upon his hands outside of the profession, Mr. Woods withdrew.

In February, 1844, he was married to Miss Sarah W. Ballard, of Gardiner, who died in the spring of 1845. The first public office held by him after his establishment in Gardiner was that of Superintending School Committee, to which he was elected in the spring of 1845, and to which he continued to be elected up to and including the spring of 1862. In October, 1846, he was married to Miss Harriette E. Blish, of Hallowell, Maine. The same year and in 1847 he represented the town in the Legislature. Gardiner became a city in 1850, and in that year he was a member of the Common Council, President of the Board, and also City Solicitor. In 1862 and 1863 he continued to be City Solicitor, and was also Chairman of the Board of Assessors and of the Board of Overseers of the Poor. In 1854 he was elected Mayor, and by successive elections held that office up to and including 1858, and again in 1861 and 1862. From 1854 to 1863 he held the office of President of the Oakland Bank, and during much of the same period was Secretary and Treasurer of the Great Falls Paper Mill Company. In 1861-62 and 1862-63 he was a member of the State Senate. In February, 1861, his wife died, and in December, 1862, he was married again to Mrs. Frances A. Blake, widow of the late William A. Blake, Esq., of Bangor, Maine; and in May, 1863, took up his residence in Bangor. Early in 1864 he was appointed by Mr. McCulloch Comptroller of the Currency and National Bank Examiner, and had assigned to him the States of Maine and New Hampshire. At the end of two years an Examiner for New Hampshire was appointed in that State, but he retained the office and performed its duties in Maine until 1869, when, in consequence of the pressure of railroad work, he resigned. In April, 1865, he was appointed a Trustee of the State Reform School, in which position he was retained eight years, and during the whole period was President of the Board. In March, 1864, he was elected Clerk and also Treasurer of the European & North American Company, and in the following July entered upon the duties attaching to said offices. This was the beginning of his career as a railroad man, having had up to that time no practical knowledge of railroad matters. April 9, 1868, he was elected a Director of said company, and retained these offices without interruption until December, 1872, when, upon the consolidation of the European & North American Railroad Company with the European & North American for extension from St. John westward, he was made a Director in the consolidated company, and also Clerk and Treasurer, and all these positions he continued to hold until the failure of the consolidated company, and the taking possession of its railway and property by B. E. Smith, Esq., as Trustee of the consolidated bondholders. Thereupon he was appointed his agent and cashier. At his displacement a year later by the Trustees of the Land Grant bondholders he became the Cashier under the new dispensation, and continued in this position until October 13, 1880. Upon the organization of the new company, at that time he was chosen a Director, and later on was appointed President and also Treasurer, which positions he still holds.

GENERAL SAMUEL VEAZIE.

General Samuel Veazie, who for many years bore so important a part in the business affairs of Bangor and its neighboring towns, was born at Portland, Maine, April 22, 1787. He was the son of John Veazie, whose father, Rev. Samuel Veazie, came to reside in Harpswell from Nantasket in 1767. In his boyhood he was apprenticed to the trade of baker, until he arrived at the age of maturity, when he reasoned, from the experience of his master, that the road to wealth did not run in that direction, and hence concluded to seek some other employment. He adopted a seafaring life, and at once enlisted as a sailor, before the mast, at $8 per month wages, in the West India trade. In making his bargain, however, he secured, in addition, certain rights of stowage both ways, and subsequently made purchase of other or extended rights of the same kind. These privileges he so skillfully utilized and turned to so good account in the way of ventures, that in the course of a few years he had earned and accumulated sufficient money to purchase the whole of a vessel of two or three hundred tons.

After three or four years of this kind of life, he entered upon a new course as manufacturer and vender of cigars and tobacco in its various forms. Soon after adopting this trade, he removed to Topsham, as a place more favorable to his work. There he gradually added other articles of merchandise to his stock, until he became a general trader in all sorts of goods ordinarily kept by country stores. In this, as in almost everything else to which he turned his attention, he met with flattering success and encouragement. An amusing anecdote is told of him in connection with this part of his history. For some time after his removal to Topsham, he was accustomed to make his purchases of goods at Portland. Having resolved to extend his custom to Boston, he took, on board his vessel up, a lot of oars for sale, upon the proceeds of which he relied to procure the means of paying for his goods, at least in part. Of other traders on board he enquired the name of some one who would be likely to purchase his articles. They jocosely gave him the name of a leading dry goods merchant on Kilby street. On arrival at the wharf he made quick tracks to the store of the party recommended. The latter at once saw, in the person of the young applicant, a shrewd and promising customer, and without hesitation entered into his views, procured a purchaser for his oars, sold him what he desired of his own stock, and introduced him to others, so that he was able to go home with a good variety of goods and a fine credit. And on comparison of bills, on his voyage back, they found that his prices were decidedly the most advantageous of any secured by the members of the whole company.

While living in Topsham he gradually extended his business so as to embrace various other branches, in all of which success seems to have always attended his efforts. In navigation he continued to retain his interest, as well as in ship-building. To this he added an interest in lumbering, which also proved profitable. This led to his becoming the sole or principal owner of the Androscoggin Boom, which he managed with his usual success. The vessels which he owned he usually, to a large extent, freighted with his own lumber to the West Indies, always finding a good market there and ready return freight.

His skill and energy in business are well illustrated by a story, which he used afterwards to relate, of the way he "came it over" the British in the War of 1812. A vessel of his was obliged, by stress of weather, to take shelter in a harbor on the coast of the Bay of Fundy, where it was detained by the military authorities, as a prize from the enemy. Young Veazie at once hurried to headquarters, where he procured orders for the release of the vessel, and started off to deliver them with all the speed that the means of conveyance at that day afforded. He arrived in season to get his vessel under way before countermanding orders reached the local authorities, and he was safe.

While living at Topsham the General was largely identified with all the social, religious, and political interests of the town, and was ever liberal in their support, as also he was in all matters having in view the moral and natural improvement of the place. His contemporary citizens, fellow-workers with him, and many a tree and other monuments, still left as witnesses, will attest the truth of this remark. His agents and sea-captains were selected with such care, and were so treated while in his service, as ever to bear willing testimony to his integrity and honorable conduct. During the War of 1812 he was a loyal citizen, lending his aid and influence as best he could for his country; and being then in the ranks of the militia, he gradually worked himself up from the office of Ensign until he reached the highest rank of General, a rank which gave him his well-known appellation for the remainder of his life.

After several years of such active life in Topsham, he very naturally sought a wider field for his ambition and enterprise. His interests in the lumber business necessarily turned his attention to the headquarters of that activity on the Penobscot. In 1826 he became the purchaser of the Jackson Davis mills and privileges at Oldtown, which introduced him to the principal manufactory of lumber on that river. He gradually enlarged his purchases, until he came at last to own the entire privilege and all the mills at Oldtown Falls, on the west side of the river, a title which he continued to hold until death. The mills were several times wholly or partially destroyed, but on every occasion were promptly rebuilt, so that at his death all were left in good running order. The mills were the principal industry of the town, and to him are justly credited the activity and enterprise which ever during his whole life characterized that village.

While procuring the title, the Williams mill privilege was offered for sale at auction. Veazie and Wadleigh being equal owners of the balance of the shore, it became a matter of a good deal of importance which should secure the title thus offered for sale. Both of course appeared to bid. At about $30,000 Wadleigh ceased bidding, though the auctioneer did not. The game was continued until Veazie was run up to $40,000, when the property was struck off to him at that price. Having detected the cheat, he refused to pay any more than the bid he first made after Wadleigh stopped. This led to a lawsuit, which came off at Augusta, when the suggestion was made by the presiding justice that the result must be as Veazie contended, unless the auctioneer was authorized to announce the bids as he did. This made it necessary to have the auctioneer's testimony and a consequent haste to know what that testimony would be. Both parties started by "express" for Bangor where the auctioneer resided. They both arrived in town at about the same time, but Veazie had the advantage of knowing where he lived. He consequently saw him first, and the auctioneer was all right. He was "not authorized," and Veazie gained his case.

General Veazie removed to Bangor in 1832, taking up his residence in a house on the west side of Harlow street, a few doors north from Abbott Square. Shortly after, he built what is known as the "Veazie Homestead" at the corner of York street and Broadway, where he continued to live until his removal to Veazie. While building his house, Mr. Crosby commenced erecting his on the next lot above, which was of course on a little higher level. As this might give his neighbor a commanding advantage, the General concluded to add an additional third story to his house, as he "would not be looked down upon by anybody else."

After his removal to Bangor, he continued the same general course of life as before, though on a much more extensive scale. As connected with his lumber industry, he came to own at first one-half, and finally the whole of the Penobscot Boom and its charter, a property which proved to him one of great profit and value. As sole corporator, much amusement was occasionally caused in court circles by the exhibition of his records, which show him holding corporation meetings all alone at his house, voting himself President, Clerk, and Director, and transacting all the essential and usual routine of corporate life. Though often led to deliberate upon certain proposed action, yet, very generally, the final vote was unanimous upon its adoption or rejection. A serious question was raised at one of the court trials whether the corporation was a "sole" or "aggregate" one in its character. The owners of the boomed logs, however, were very generally of the opinion that, whatever doubt there might be on that question, there was none whatever upon the other, that the corporation was soul-less.

As mill-owner he came to be the largest of any man in Maine. After securing the title of all the mills on the falls in Oldtown, some nineteen in number, he bought out the "Corporation Mills" at North Bangor or Veazie, consisting of twenty more, and also the Basin mills at Orono, embracing thirteen others, making fifty-two in all. Those at Veazie he gave to his son John, but the others he continued to own until his death.

About the time of his removal to Bangor, the railroad was built from Bangor to Oldtown, one of the very first railroads in America. In 1850 the track was extended across his land to the river at Oldtown, which led to a grave lawsuit on the question of damages, which was tried before a jury on the premises, and resulted in a verdict for $17,000. Other suits followed, which finally resulted in a purchase of the road and charter by Mr. Veazie, on such favorable terms that it became one of the General's most profitable investments. This road he continued to operate until he died. The necessity of having a railroad up the valley of the Penobscot impressed itself on his mind, and he placed himself in the way of helping it on and sharing largely in its benefits. At his own expense he built the bridge across the river, at the head of the falls, and run his cars to Milford. Unexpected difficulties came in the way, which prevented the road being extended beyond that point before his death. The European & North American Railroad coming to be built soon after, along the shore from Bangor, his heirs sold out their road and franchise to it, and thus ended the whole thing.

General Veazie was never a very active politician or office seeker, and hence had little to do in that line. During a single term he was a member of the Governor's Council and afterwards for two years an Alderman of the city. At another time he was a prominent candidate for Representative to Congress, but was unsuccessful.

Early in the General's business life at Bangor he became interested in banking, and having become principal holder of the stock of the old Bank of Bangor, he became its President, and almost its sole manager. On the expiration of its charter he sought to have it renewed, but at the suggestion of the bank committee, the new bank was incorporated by the name of the "Veazie Bank." This he managed with great skill and success all his life afterwards, so that it came to rank among the firmest and most reliable institutions of the kind in the country, its bills being ever of the safest character. Travelers to the South and West and elsewhere always regarded themselves well fortified against accidents of travel if only duly supplied with Veazie Bank issue, a fact which, in days of State Bank circulation alone, was one of no small significance and importance.

The town of Ellsworth having, by the failure of its two banks, suddenly found itself deprived of all bank facilities, General Veazie established a branch of his bank there, and run it until the National bank system came into vogue.

After the war commenced and silver currency disappeared from circulation, the want was, in the eastern part of Maine, largely supplied by fractional scrip put into circulation by the General, over his own signature, to the amount of $70,000, in denominations of ten, twenty-five, and fifty cents, respectively. The scrip was universally accredited and received wherever offered, and afforded great relief to the community, until the Government interfered to do the same thing on a larger scale. Quite a large amount is still out, held probably, where not lost, by curiosity-seekers, or as mementoes of the past. The scrip contained, in its corner, a very well executed likeness of the General, which was said to afford, by well understood tests, a sure proof of the genuineness of the thing. The scrip is still redeemable at the Veazie Bank counter, and an occasional piece makes its appearance.

For particular reasons the General refused to go into the National Bank arrangement, and hence never took out a charter under it. He claimed the right to circulate his State Bank notes as currency, notwithstanding the prohibitions of the National act. The result was that the Government called upon him to pay the ten per cent. tax on his circulation, which he refused. Other State Banks, similarly situated, joined with him to test the question before the United States Courts, Hon. Reverdy Johnson and Caleb Cushing being employed as counsel. His bank was made to lead off as party, and it was in his case that the Supreme Court of the United States gave their decision supporting the constitutionality of the law, and the consequent binding character of the tax. Thenceforth and thereupon all State Bank circulation in the United States ceased.

Under the old State Bank system the banks were often accused of overstepping the limits provided by law for their circulation. The Veazie Bank was not free from such a scandal, but on the contrary, it was called upon by the Legislature, on one occasion, to defend itself against the charge. The General made his personal appearance and "owned up," excusing himself on the ground that the people would have his bills, and when they got them refused to bring them back, and so he was obliged to issue new bills to meet the demand and wants of the bank and people too. He was dismissed with a caution, but it was not known that he ever adopted any new rule of conduct.

While this same State Bank system was in existence the Suffolk Bank "plan of redemption" was also in vogue, requiring all other banks to keep a sum of money in their vaults free from interest, for the purpose of redeeming their bills as they found their way to its counter. General Veazie could not see why he should be called upon to do so, and in common with many other country banks, regarded the plan as an imposition and unjust, and so refused to obey. The result was that the Suffolk Bank, in all such cases, would make "a run" on the offending banks for the purpose of their subjugation. But the General was not thus to be conquered. Having procured to be passed an act of the Legislature giving banks a certain time within which to pay their bills, when so presented, the Veazie Bank availed itself of the time allowed, much to the annoyance of the Suffolk. Having acknowledged the demand, the bank would send a manager to Boston or elsewhere, and by exchanging securities possess himself of checks on the Suffolk Bank, which, within the days of grace, he would present at the Suffolk and demand the specie and therewith pay their own bills, thus compelling the Suffolk, not only to hold the bills for the specified time, but at last furnish the specie wherewith to pay them. A recent writer on the subject remarks that "one of the most strenuous opponents of the Suffolk Bank system was the Veazie Bank of Bangor."

The State having granted W. B. S. Moor and his brother the exclusive right of steamboat navigation on the Penobscot above Oldtown, General Veazie being of opinion that there was money in it, and holding the act illegal, himself built a boat and put it on the river in opposition. This led to litigation to determine the constitutionality of the exclusive act. After passing through the courts of this State, the case went to Washington, where it was argued before the full court and decided adversely to the General, the court holding the act constitutional, and thus settling the grave question how far the Legislature had exclusive jurisdiction over navigable waters. Being thus defeated he took his boat to pieces, transported it to California, reproduced it there on the Sacramento, and operated it to great advantage, far more than compensating him for the loss of his case in Maine.

It was one of General Veazie's characteristics that, while ever ready to grant to others their legal rights, he was always equally persistent in claiming his own. He was hence often involved in lawsuits, several instances of which we have already cited in this sketch of his life. Among the most famed of all suits in the eastern part of Maine was one which arose between him and Wadleigh respecting their rights to certain mill privileges at Oldtown, and in which Daniel Webster and Jeremiah Mason were enlisted as counsel, the former by Wadleigh and the latter by the General. The suit never had any legal termination by judgment, but quietly subsided, and all disputes were finally settled by Veazie purchasing all of Wadleigh's interest, more or less, in the shore and falls.

Very numerous suits were afterwards waged between the General and the owner of the next privilege below, which lasted for many years and with varied success. The questions being, many of them, unsettled at his death, were finally adjusted by his heirs purchasing the lower privilege and mills, and thus quieting all controversy.

Many other suits of importance besides those mentioned are to be found on the dockets of our courts, all the way along the course of his life, some of very grave importance; but space will hardly allow any more particular description of them here. It was ever a rule of the General always to accept a tender. He was once, by advice of counsel, persuaded to vary his rule and refuse a tender made. He lost his case, however, and never afterwards repeated the experiment.

In 1854 General Veazie removed from Bangor and took up his residence in Veazie, a small town incorporated the year previous, from the territory of Bangor, taking its name from him. His removal did not interfere with or interrupt his business in any respect, except as it took all his personal property from the tax lists of the city and gave it to the new town thus brought into existence. He erected a new house within its limits, about four miles from his former home, and there made his legal residence for the remainder of his life. He died in Bangor, at his winter home, on the 12th day of March, 1868, at the age of eighty-one years, lacking only a few days. He left, of course, a large estate, which his heirs inherited as an intestate estate, which was administered upon by his grandsons, Charles V. Lord and Alfred Veazie.

While living at Topsham he married Susanna Walker, of that town, who was born March 29, 1792. Their marriage took place July 3, 1809, and she died June 27, 1852. By her he had five children, two of whom died young. The others were as follow, viz: Jones P. Veazie, born June 2, 1811; married Mary Jane Winslow, and died February 16, 1875. John W. Veazie, born October 30, 1812; married Ruth Maria Bartlett, and is still alive in 1881. Frances A. H. Veazie, born July 18, 1818; married Nathaniel Lord, and died April 21, 1866.

After the death of his wife Susanna, General Veazie married Mrs. Mary C. Blanchard, May 17, 1859, who still survives.

GENERAL S. F. HERSEY.

The Hon. Samuel Freeman Hersey, long a wealthy and active business and public man in Bangor, and Representative of the Fourth District of Maine in the XLII^d and XLIII^d Congresses, was a native of Sumner, Oxford county, Maine, born April 22, 1812, son of James and Oliver (Freeman) Hersey. Both his grandsires, James Hersey and Samuel Freeman, were soldiers of the Revolution; and he thus came of patriotic, as well as martial stock on both sides. His father was a farmer, and Samuel was born in the first farm-house built by him at Sumner. He was a constant attendant at both summer and winter terms of the school until about his sixteenth year, when he was obliged to take his part in the work of the farm in summer and attend school only in the winter. He was afterwards a pupil at Hebron Academy and at the Buckfield Grammar School, where he met the blooming maiden who subsequently became his first wife. He was of studious habit, and had a keenly perceptive and receptive mind. He was thus often at the head of his classes, and always very near the head. He was not a prig or a "dig," however; but was thoroughly cheerful and genial in disposition, and as prompt upon the playground as at the recitation bench. Most of his leisure hours were devoted to reading, especially in history and travels. For novel-reading he had never any taste. At school his text-book in parsing for several years was Pope's Essay on Man; and the views of the book, as well as its language, made a marked impression upon his young mind, and were largely influential in determining the liberal views of theology and man which he afterwards entertained. In his eighteenth year young Hersey began to teach school, and had country schools in charge thenceforth for three winters. He was highly successful in this vocation, but had an ambition to become a merchant. He accordingly left the old homestead in 1832, and came to Bangor, where he took a clerkship in a store, with no compensation but his board. He remained about a year in this position, when, becoming of age, he determined to make a venture in business for himself. He had saved $100 by the closest economy during his minority, and, joining this with about as much capital in the hands of an elder cousin, Mr. W. R. Hersey, the two embarked in storekeeping at Lincoln, in this county, in early April, 1833. They did pretty well for three years, when the financial crash came, and they lost almost all their previous gains. Samuel bought out his cousin, who had become disheartened, and continued the business alone. Meanwhile he was married, January 5, 1835, to his school-boy love, Miss Eliza Ann Stowell, of South Paris, to whom he was very tenderly attached. She died in 1836, September 8, the same year of the dissolution of the copartnership, leaving him no children. The next year he engaged in a small way in trade at Milford; but was chiefly occupied in managing a large lumber operation for other parties. In 1838 a partnership was formed with Mr. Jesse Fogg for storekeeping at Milford and Bangor, Mr. Hersey conducting the store at the former place and Mr. Fogg at the latter. This firm endured for twelve years, or until 1850. They presently added lumbering to their mercantile business, and made large profits.

In 1842 Mr. Hersey, now less than thirty years of age, was called to represent his fellow-citizens of Milford in the State Legislature, which he did with conscientious fidelity and ability. Upon his return from Augusta he took up his residence at Upper Stillwater, where he had rented for three years all the mills in the village. Here he was made Postmaster. In the spring of 1844, having disposed of his Upper Stillwater interests, he removed to Oldtown, and in October of the same year he made his final home in Bangor, where he thenceforth resided to the day of his death, nearly thirty years afterwards. His first residence was in a brick dwelling on Harlow street. In 1850 the firm of Fogg & Hersey was dissolved, and the junior partner aided in the formation of the new house of Nay, Davis & Co., of which Messrs. Thomas L. Nay and Robert Davis, Jr., were members. This copartnership lasted prosperously, with some changes in its component parts from time to time, until September, 1863, when General Hersey, having already amassed large wealth and feeling burdened with the cares of his estate, and also the management of a large business, retired from active participation in Bangor affairs. He had, about the year 1854, made heavy investments in Western lands, and he frequently made long journeys to look after them. Although he disliked these absences from home, to whose pleasures he was greatly attached, he found some compensation in the handsome returns these investments yielded him. The towns named Hersey, in Michigan, Minnesota, and other Western States, take their designations from his large properties in and about them. His heirs still hold large tracts of these lands, which have in general become very valuable.

With all his busy employments, General Hersey found time to do the State some service. In the years 1852-3 he was a member of the Executive Council of the State; in 1857 again a member of the House of Representatives in the Maine Legislature; in 1860 a delegate to the National Republican Convention in Chicago, which nominated Lincoln and Hamlin, and was one of the few New Englanders in the Convention who were original Lincoln men. He was again a delegate in a National Convention in 1864—that which met in Baltimore and nominated Lincoln and Johnson. In 1864-5 he again served his county in the lower branch of the State Legislature. He was also a member of the State Senate in 1867 and 1869. He was also at least once named by his friends in the canvasses for nomination as Governor.

During the war he gave one son to the Union cause, and himself rendered active aid in raising the Second Maine Regiment, the First Maine Heavy Artillery (in which his son was an officer), and many other commands. He was appointed Assistant Paymaster-General of the State at the outbreak of the war, and personally raised the money with which the Second Maine and other regiments were paid before taking the field. For these services he received no compensation beyond what would defray his expenses and losses in disbursing. In September, 1872, he was elected Representative in Congress from the Bangor District, and was rechosen in 1874. His health, however, was rapidly giving way, and after several months of suffering he passed tranquilly away at his home in Bangor, February 3, 1875. Eulogies upon his life and character were delivered in the House of Representatives, of which body he was then a member, by Messrs. Hale and Frye, of Maine, and Dunnell, of Minnesota; and in the Senate by his fellow-townsmen, Mr. Hamlin, and by Senator Morrill, of Maine. The remarks by these distinguished gentlemen were thoroughly sympathetic, and their eulogies most cordial and apparently sincere. Mr. Hamlin's were especially noticeable for their exalted estimate of his character and career.

General Hersey was a very earnest member of the Universalist church in Bangor, of which he was the main stay. He was abounding yet judicious in his charities, in one period of three years giving away nearly $8,000. He gave to Westbrook Seminary in a single donation $5,000, and Hersey Hall there is named from him.

He had no children by his first marriage. July 11, 1839, he was again married, this time at Milford, to Miss Jane Ann Davis, of Sidney, Maine. She, too, died January 17, 1862. Of this marriage were born Roscoe Freeman Hersey, at Milford, July 18, 1841; Jane Eliza, born at Upper Stillwater August 4, 1843, died in Bangor, February 14, 1847; Dudley Hall, born at Bangor

December 24, 1846; Eugene May, born in the same place November 10, 1851; and Edward Lewis, born also at Bangor April 29, 1854. The General's third wife was Miss Emily McClellan Sanborn, of Bangor, whom he wedded March 17, 1871, and who yet survives him. They had no children.

HON. THOMAS N. EGERY.

Thomas Newhall Egery, probably the oldest iron-worker in the Penobscot Valley, and principal member of the Hinckley & Egery Iron Company, in Bangor, is a Massachusetts man by birth. His native place is Hardwick, Worcester county, Massachusetts, where he first saw the light April 20, 1809. He was the fifth son in a somewhat numerous family, comprising seven sons and two daughters, children of Thomas and Clarissa (Washburn) Egery, who occupied a farm in Hardwick. The Egerys are of North of England blood, two brothers of the name emigrating to America some time before the Revolution, one of them settling on Cape Cod and the other coming to Wiscasset, Maine. They were ship-carpenters, and soon found abundant opportunity for the exercise of their handicraft in this country. His mother was one of the old American stock of Washburns, to which the celebrated Massachusetts men of the name belonged, they being second cousins of Mrs. Egery.

Young Thomas was educated altogether in the rude common schools of his day in Hardwick, which he abandoned for the yet sterner but more instructive school of the great world when he was in his sixteenth year. His winter terms had not averaged more than two and one-half months each; and he was obliged, by the necessity of aiding in the support of the family, to remain at home in the summer and take his place as a hand in the field. At the age of seventeen he began as apprentice in the town (now city) of Worcester, to a blacksmith, Mr. William A. Wheeler, with whom he completed an apprenticeship; and then, about the time he became of age, he entered as journeyman in the machine-shop of Messrs. Washburn & Goddard, the senior of whom was later the head of the great wire-works firm of Washburn & Mowen. Mr. Egery still believes that his plan of commencement is the best for him who would become an expert machinist—to begin in the blacksmith's shop. He remained in the Worcester shop about one year after the completion of his apprenticeship, and then emigrated to Maine, where he settled temporarily in Bucksport, laboring for about one year (1831) in the blacksmith's shop of Muzzy & Wing, the head of which firm was Franklin Muzzy, Esq., then of Bucksport, but since of Bangor. Mr. Daniel B. Hinckley, owner of the foundry in connection with the machine-shop, removed his establishment to Bangor in the spring of 1832, and was joined by Muzzy & Wing with their machine-shop and the hands therein, including the subject of this sketch. This was the first foundry and machine-shop to be operated in Bangor.

Young Egery ceased here to do journey-work, and opened a blacksmith's shop for house-work and millwork next the foundry, especially to execute a contract he had taken for making the iron doors and shutters for the new (the present) Court house. He still remembers most gratefully and pleasantly the kindness and courtesy he then, a youth of but twenty-three years, experienced from the County Commissioners with whom he negotiated—Messrs. Thomas N. Hill, John Godfrey (father of Judge John E. Godfrey), and Thornton McGaw, Esq.,—which greatly helped him to self-confidence and to a good start in business. They advanced him $1,000 of the public funds wherewith to purchase material and machinery, and otherwise gave him substantial encouragement. He joined with him in this work Mr. Hinckley, who was also from his native town and had been instrumental in bringing him to Maine. The young firm was entitled Thomas N. Egery & Co. They performed their work on the contract to general satisfaction, making the windows and shutters which still, after the lapse of nearly half a century, do good service upon Penobscot's temple of justice. They continued to do such work for several years, with iron fences and verandas and bank vaults, most of which manufactures Mr. Egery put up with his own hand, and can point with some pride to a great deal of his work still in use about the city. In 1838 the foundry of Mr. Hinckley and the shop of Thomas N. Egery & Co. were united, Mr. Egery becoming an equal partner in the new firm, which bore the name and style of Hinckley and Egery. The boundary difficulty, or "Aroostook war," was pending the same year, and the new firm was soon busily employed, night and day, in casting cannon-shot and in forging the irons for the "Aroostook boom," several tons of which went into the obstruction placed by the State authorities in that river, to keep the logs cut by New Brunswick trespassers upon our lands from running across the line into acknowledged foreign territory. This spasm of war preparation was soon over, however; and the firm resumed the even tenor of its way, prosperously and reputably maintaining itself, and widening its operations and enlarging its works from time to time. In 1850 Mr. Egery joined the tide of emigration then setting to the golden shores of California. He went thither by the Isthmus route, while a steam engine and other plant of a foundry and machine shop were dispatched in a sailing vessel "round the Horn." Messrs. Hinckley & Egery with this started the second establishment of the kind founded on the Pacific coast, at San Francisco, of which Mr. Egery took personal charge for about sixteen months, in connection with the young men named just below. He then returned to Bangor; but the firm kept its interest on the Pacific about two years longer, when it was sold to Messrs. Daniel B. and Barney Hinckley, nephews of the Bangor foundryman, the eldest of whom is still in the business in San Francisco.

When the War of the Rebellion broke out, Mr. Egery was summoned to Augusta by Governor Washburn; and, as the result of conferences there and with others at Boston, he agreed for his firm to undertake the rifling of the old-fashioned cannon in the State and on the coasts of Maine, which were brought here from several quarters for that purpose. New machinery had to be constructed for this work; but it was rapidly and well done, and in such manner as to elicit the praise of the State authorities, as may be seen by reference to the report of General Hodsdon, then Adjutant-General of Maine. During the war, in 1864, Mr. Hineckley died, a partnership thus ending which had endured harmoniously and successfully for thirty-two years. His name is still retained in the title of the Iron Company, in honor to his memory. After his death the firm of T. N. Egery & Co. was formed, consisting of Mr. Egery, his brother-in-law Mr. George W. Gorham, and Mr. F. F. French. In about six years, or in 1870, the joint-stock company, as now known, was formed, with Mr. Egery as President, Mr. F. F. French as Secretary and Treasurer, and Mr. Gorham as Superintendent. Of late years Mr. Egery has been gradually retiring from the more active pursuits of the business, and has left the Presidency to younger hands. He still, however, gives much personal attention to the business, and has general care also of the Piscataquis Iron Works, in which he has an interest. Notwithstanding his engrossing employments, he has done some public service. In 1875-76 he was a member of the Board of Aldermen in the city government, from the Sixth Ward, and in 1872 was elected a Representative in the State Legislature, on the Republican ticket, from the Bangor District. In each instance a re-election was offered him, but was declined on account of his business. He was brought up in the Congregational faith, and has been most of his life an attendant upon churches of that order, but is not formally a member. Although in his seventy-third year, he enjoys remarkably good health, of both body and mind. For nearly the long period of half a century he has been closely identified with important interests in Bangor; and few indeed are left who were his contemporaries here in business life in 1832.

Mr. Egery's first wife was Miss Sarah Edith Gorham, of Bangor, to whom he was united in 1833. They had six children, two of whom are still living—Clara W., now Mrs. Charles Gibson, of Bangor; and Sarah Edith, wife of Charles C. Prescott, also of Bangor. Mrs. Egery died in 1851, while her husband was on his return from California. His second wife was Mrs. Nancy O. Wright, of Boston, Massachusetts, who is still living. They were married in November, 1853, and have one child—Mary Annie, wife of Eugene M. Hersey, of Bangor, son of the late General Samuel F. Hersey.

JOHN PRESCOTT WEBBER.

This citizen of Bangor, one of the heaviest land owners and general business men in Eastern Maine, is a native of the State, born at New Portland, Somerset county, on the border of Franklin, June 23, 1832. He was the fourth son and youngest child of a family of eight, the offspring of Israel and Hannah (Prescott) Webber. The mother was sprung from the same family to which belonged the Prescotts of Bunker Hill and other historic fame. His father was for many years a seafaring man, in the merchant marine; but finally abandoned the sea on account of rheumatism and other infirmities, and spent the later years of his prime and old age in Somerset and Penobscot counties, dying at North Bangor about 1868, going to his grave "like a shock of corn fully ripe." The mother preceded him in death by six years. They were a very worthy couple, eminent in their piety and integrity, and brought up their family with judicious care and fidelity. They had been comparatively wealthy upon his retirement from the sea, but through the machinations of sharpers and others with whom his simple and kindly nature came in contact, his property was lost, and his later years were rich only in faith and good works. The sons early became self-supporting, and some of them are reaping the rewards of their early discipline in large fortunes. Isaac, the second son, resides in Denver city, is a grain and stock-dealer, and a man of large wealth. The Hon. Franklin R., the next in years, an ex-member of the State Senate, is also independently rich—is a prosperous merchant and extensive land owner in St. Albans, near Skowhegan, and a rising man in every particular. John P., the subject of this sketch, has also done remarkably well in life. He attended the country schools in childhood, and obtained the rudiments of a fair business education; but was a pupil very little after he was thirteen years old, except in the great instructive school of the world. At the age of nine he faced the problem whether he should be bound out by the Selectmen of Kenduskeag, where the family then resided, or strike out for himself. With the independence of his nature he determined upon the latter, and walked from Kenduskeag to New Portland, where he lived and worked on his brother Isaac's farm for a year and a half, and then returned to Penobscot county. He now became virtually the head and business manager of the family. Taking the school-teacher of the district to board, he had no little difficulty in collecting the board-bill from the Town Treasurer of Kirkland (or Hudson), now the Hon. Charles Beale, to whom the bill was presented, on account of his youthful appearance. By the time John was seventeen he had accumulated, by various labors and petty trading, the sum of $300, which he took to Boston to invest in goods for a country store. He maneuvered industriously among the cautious merchants at the Hub for nearly a week, before he could obtain credit for any purchase beyond his $300. At last Mr. Henry Callender, of the firm of Nash, Callender & Co., wholesale grocers and provision dealers, took an interest in the clear head and shrewd business character of the boy, as evinced by his inquiries and remarks, and not only gave him full credit himself for all purchases desired, but vouched for him elsewhere, until he had bought $6,000 worth of goods. The indebtedness on this was promptly paid at maturity, as all obligations Mr. Webber has since incurred have been met. With his new stock John started a store in Ripley, Somerset county, and prospered from the beginning. He took his brother Franklin into partnership shortly, and the two are still associated in a large land ownership and business. His brother drew out of the partnership in two or three years, and went into business in St. Albans, while John set up a store at Exeter, in this county.

It is an interesting fact that the brothers, contrary to the general practice of such relations as partners, were thoroughly harmonious and congenial in their association, without a word of serious difference; and they were so nearly of a size and figure that either could wear the other's clothes as well as his own, and one was accustomed to put on the other's, if he was going from home, and the other had the better.

After Exeter, Mr. Webber engaged in store-keeping at East Corinth, having meanwhile visited the West, and started a broker's and land office in Red Wing, Minnesota, which proved very profitable. In the winter this office was closed; but he would return in summer and re-open it. When the bottom of such business dropped out in the crisis of 1857, he made a final closure there, retaining, however, large property interests in the new State, and devoted himself to the business at East Corinth. In 1864 he sold out his stock and removed to Bangor, where he began operations in land and lumbering. He had saved $30,000 from the wreck of a fortune which he had rapidly accumulated in the West. With this he bought a township in Piscataquis county, on Ripogenus Lake—No. 3, Twelfth Range; sent into the woods the next winter a force of thirty men and twelve horses, and put into the lake as a result of the season's labor logs to the amount of 1,200,000 feet, which netted him $8,000 in his very first operation in the north woods. He has cut from six to ten million of feet almost every year since, upon his several properties in Somerset, Piscataquis, Penobscot, Aroostook, Hancock, and Washington counties. From first to last he has probably owned, partly in association with his brother, at least 150 townships in these counties. Much of this has been sold, but he retains ownership of three to four hundred thousand acres, more than seventy-five thousand of which have been purchased within the last year. He has also operated somewhat in the manufacture of lumber; but he now has only mills in the town of Lincoln, most of the wild lands of which he owns, and also the mills on Dead Stream, in Alton, which he has recently acquired. With the latter he bought ten thousand acres in the western part of Alton, running the whole length of the town, and about one thousand in Hudson, belonging to the same tract. He pays taxes in more than a hundred townships.

Mr. Webber has been a member of the Hammond-street Congregational church about five years, having been an attendant there nearly all the time since he came to Bangor. He was an old-line Whig in politics, but has been a steady and strong Republican from the beginning of Republicanism. He has not cared, however, to be known as a worker "in the machine," or in the least to engage in office-seeking.

He has resided on Ohio street, at No. 17, nearly the whole time of his residence here; but he has recently purchased the Larrabee estate, on Broadway, to which he will remove by and by. He is still in the prime of his manhood, with his business energy and intelligence unimpaired, and has the prospect of many years of successful and honorable accumulation.

Mr. Webber was first married in March, 1851, to a very charming young lady, Miss Annie Sophia, daughter of the late Hon. Bradbury Robinson, of East Corinth, formerly State Senator from that district. Of this marriage were born three children—Charles Prescott, born December 23, 1853, now the head of the flourishing firm of C. P. & F. R. Webber, mill owners and dealers in short lumber and lumbermen's supplies at No. 74 Exchange street, Bangor; Frank Roscoe, born March 17, 1856, junior partner in the above-named house; and Frederick, born in May, 1858, and died at the age of six years. Mrs. Webber died in Bangor, August 9, 1869, much lamented by her host of friends. October 12, 1871, her husband was remarried, this time to Miss Caro Holmes, daughter of Eben Blunt, Esq., head of the former house of Blunt, Hinman & Company, of Bangor, then among the heaviest lumber-dealers in the city. He has three children also by this marriage—Jane, born December 5, 1874; John Prescott, Jr., named from his father, born January 13, 1879; and Channing, whose natal day is January 9, 1881.

COLONEL FRANK D. PULLEN.

Frank Dexter Pullen, named from his father and paternal grandfather, is a native of that part of old Waterville known as West Waterville, in this State, born April 5, 1843, second son of Franklin C. and Drusilla (Hussey) Pullen. The Pullens are old settlers of Kennebec county, having dwelt there for several generations; his mother's people have also been long resident in the Kennebec Valley. When Frank was eight years old he lost his own mother, and he, with the other children, was faithfully and tenderly brought up by the wife (whose maiden name was Martha Cunningham) whom the elder Pullen married in 1856. His formal education was received in the public schools of Waterville, he meanwhile assisting upon his father's farm as he grew old enough; but at the early age of sixteen he left the schools forever, and entered the Dunn Edge Tool Companies' Scythe and Axe Factories at West Waterville, now the largest establishment of the kind in the world, to learn the trade. At first, as a boy, he was a general helper and messenger; but it was the intention of the Superintendent of the works, Mr. John U. Hubbard, now head of the firm of Hubbard, Blake & Co., of the same place, also a very heavy house, to teach young Pullen, who was a great favorite with him, the whole round of the business. During his second year in the establishment, however, the war of the Rebellion broke out; and the boy's patriotic instincts led him, although he had just turned his eighteenth year and was but barely old enough to be received, to enlist in the military service. He became a member of Company G, Third Maine Regiment (General O. O. Howard's original command) which company was recruited altogether from the colleges of Waterville, except ten or twelve young men who were received by special favor. He was borne on the rolls of this company during his entire period of enlistment, three years; but was soon put upon detached service of various kinds in the commissary and quartermaster's departments, and with the Adjutant-General of the brigade. During his last year he served in the postal department of his brigade, whose letters and other mail matter for the several companies and regiments he handled with great fidelity. Notwithstanding his service in departments which would have allowed him to remain in the rear without disgrace, he was always in the fight when his regiment was engaged. He participated in all the battles of the command, beginning with the first Bull Run, continuing through the heaviest campaigns of the Army of the Potomac, and ending with the affair at North Anna, in the last days of May and first of June, 1864. He got through all safely, but suffered a great deal from sickness, as he had entered the service a slight and not over-healthy youth, ill-adapted to the hardships and privations of war. He nevertheless stuck to the work bravely, although once given up for dead of diphtheria, and a prayer being said over his remains by one of the army chaplains; and never once took a furlough to go home on account of sickness or for any other reason, nor did he lose any time in hospital except during the terrible illness just mentioned, which brought him near to Death's door.

His period of service over with the Third Maine, Mr. Pullen went back to the Army of the Potomac, and remained with it, and in business in Baltimore for about a year, or until the close of the war. He then returned to Waterville, intending to go back and engage in permanent business in the Monumental City; but his plans were changed by a casual visit to Bangor in September, 1865. As a consequence of this he made an engagement as clerk with a brother of his stepmother, Mr. James Cunningham, who is still in business in this city. After a few months in this and other employments, Colonel Pullen was encouraged by a seafaring friend of his to open a clothing store for sailors and other customers. In April, 1867, he accordingly started a new establishment of this kind on Exchange street, at the precise stand where he now is. In this business he has steadily remained since that year, enlarging his stock year by year until his store has grown to its present large proportions, occupying two Nos., 17 and 19, of Exchange street, from basement to attic of the three-story building. He began almost entirely without capital, and with a stock that required only a little corner, about eighteen feet square, of his present spacious quarters, for its exhibition. By industry, integrity, and strict attention to business he has built up a trade that is certainly second to none of the kind in Bangor,—if indeed, it does not lead the clothing business in the city—all this in the space of less than fifteen years.

In the winter of 1874-75 Colonel Pullen and Captain S. H. Barbour, of Brewer, with two or three others, built the little steamer May Field, as an experiment in the trade with Bar Harbor, which was just getting into notice as a watering place. This modest venture, running to Sedgwick and Bar Harbor two trips a week, was successful in a surprising degree; and in the winter of 1878-79 a larger steamer, the City of Bangor, was built, and the Bangor and Bar Harbor Steamboat Company was formed, in which Colonel Pullen is Secretary and one of the Directors, and General Agent of the line, as he has been from the beginning. The business continued to grow, and still another steamer was required. In the winter of 1880-81 the Queen City was built, and the three vessels have during the last season had a very heavy trade, paying the stockholders handsome dividends.

Colonel Pullen has, of course, retained a lively interest in military affairs, and was long borne on the roll of the Jameson Guards as an honorary member, and assisted in its maintenance as best he could. He was one of the original members of the B. H. Beale Post, No. 12, of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Bangor, organized soon after the war, and has since been one of the most active of its members and supporters. In the winter of 1880-81 he was appointed by the Governor Commissary-General of the State, with the rank of Colonel, in which position he is now serving.

Colonel Pullen is also a Free and Accepted Mason, in which he is a member of St. John's Commandery of Knights Templars, Mount Moriah Chapter, and Rising Virtue Lodge, all of Bangor. He is also an Odd Fellow in the Oriental Lodge and the Katahdin Encampment; a member of the Knights of Pythias and of the Knights of Honor; and is connected with several of the open societies and clubs of the city. In a number of the organizations with which he is connected, he was a charter member.

Since he came to the city, Colonel Pullen has been a very active worker in the ranks of the Republican party, especially in the First Ward, where he has labored effectively against a tremendous opposition majority. He has never, however, been in anywise an office-seeker, nor has he manifested any ambition for political position, except as he could serve the interests of his party, as a member of the City Committee and in the various conventions of the State, county, city, and Congressional district. He has been content to remain an influential and laborious private of his party.

Colonel Pullen was married June 23, 1868, in Bangor, to Miss Hattie E. Johnson, of that place. They have resided for some years at the Penobscot Exchange.

ADOLPHUS J. CHAPMAN, ESQ.

This gentleman, a well-known lawyer and Federal war-claim solicitor of Bangor, is a native of Newburg, in this county, born on Independence Day, 1837. He was a seventh son, born of the union of William and Eliza (Morrill) Chapman, who occupied a farm in that town for many years. Both are now dead. The mother was daughter of Thomas Morrill, an old resident of Newburg, who died there at the age of eighty-four. Senator Morrill, of this State, is of the same blood. William and Eliza Chapman had a family of thirteen children, of whom Adolphus was the ninth. Nine of the brothers and sisters are still living, all in Maine but two, who reside in California. Thomas M., the oldest, and Augustus P. reside in Oldtown; the former being quite noted as an inventor, particularly of a saw-filing machine, which has attained popularity. Horace H. Chapman lives in Rockland, a harness-maker and merchant; Milton C. resides in Newburg, on a farm about two miles from the ancestral home; Charles D. is an Orrington farmer and nurseryman. They have three sisters—Elizabeth, now wife of Captain George W. Orne, of Cape Elizabeth, near Portland; and the two sisters in California.

The young Adolphus received his elementary education in the public schools of Newburg and the Hampden Academy, to which he went at about the age of fifteen, and remained in attendance several terms, when he retired with a fair academic education. He had little taste for farm life, but during his earlier manhood engaged in various clerkships, in teaching penmanship, and in other temporary employments. In 1859 he went to the West, first visiting Minnesota, where he remained until the next spring, engaged in lumbering and as a writing-master. He next settled in Davenport, Iowa, where he was a student in Pratt's Commercial College, a young man in his twenty-fourth year, when the War of the Rebellion broke out. He enlisted at once as a private soldier in Company C, Second Iowa Infantry—Captain Brewster's company, raised in Davenport, and among the earliest recruited in the State. He was with his regiment in Fremont's army at St. Louis, at Bird's Point, Pilot's Knob, and other points. After about seven months' service he was taken sick of a dangerous fever, the results of which compelled his discharge from the army. He returned to the parental roof in Newburg, and assisted for a time in the labors of the farm; but in the winter of 1862-63 he obtained a situation as engrossing clerk in the office of the Secretary of State, at Augusta, and was on duty in this capacity during the Legislative sessions of two years. In the winter of 1864-65 he transferred his services to the Provost-Marshal's office at the State capital, and while there was offered by Governor Cony a commission as First Lieutenant of Company E, Fourteenth Maine Infantry, accepted it, and took the field at once. Upon arriving at Savannah and reporting for duty, he received immediate promotion as Adjutant of the Regiment, and served in that capacity until August 28, 1865, when the regiment was mustered out of service, and he returned with it to his native State.

In the spring of 1866 Lieutenant Chapman resumed business, this time opening a variety store at Winterport. In August following, having abandoned the store, he entered the office of Charles P. Brown, Esq., of Bangor, to read law. He remained with him five years, as student and clerk, then purchased his extensive war-claim business, and opened an office on his own account, having meanwhile, in 1871, been admitted to the Bar of the State. His first office was over the present telegraph headquarters in Brown's Block, West Market Square. He continued here to practice law and prosecute claims against the Government until 1879, when he removed to the spacious and pleasant office he now occupies on the second floor of the Taylor Block.

Lieutenant Chapman has been a steady Republican from the organization of the party, but has not cared to be active as a politician or to be in any way an office-seeker. The attempt to remove the artillery from the Bangor Arsenal in the winter of 1878-79, to be used in sustaining the Garcelon-Smith Government at Augusta, brought him to the front, however, and he rendered efficient aid in preventing the removal, personally checking the further movement of one of the loaded wagons. In February following, a paralytic shock disabled his left side, and within a week three additional but lesser shocks disabled him completely for about five weeks, and his side has never yet fully recovered from their effects. He is not a member of any of the religious or secret organizations, although he is a quite regular attendant upon public worship, and entertains liberal views of theology.

Mr. Chapman was united in marriage in Newburg, by the Rev. Mr. Thomas, of the Christian Church, to Miss Linda H., youngest daughter of Nathan and Mary (Judkins) Doane, of Newburg. They have but one child living—Lillie Adolph, born in June, 1866. They, however, lost two children—a daughter named Caledonia, and an infant who died unnamed. Mr. Chapman and his family reside in a pleasant home on Ohio street, in West Bangor.

FLAVIUS O. BEAL.

This gentleman, lessee and landlord of the Bangor House, and also owner of the excellent line of Tallyho coaches to Mt. Desert, is a native of Monmouth, this State. His father, Samuel Beal, was from an old family of that place, and himself a native of it and a farmer. His ancestry was English. His mother, whose maiden name was Maria Antoinette Warren, was also born in Monmouth. They both died, within four months of each other, in 1848, when the subject of this sketch was but seven years old. They left a family of two sons and one daughter, of whom Flavius Orlando was the second-born. His natal day was June 2, 1841. He attended the public schools of Monmouth until twelve years old, when he was sent to the Towle Academy at Winthrop, and remained there five years, in which time he acquired the rudiments of a fairly liberal education. He then went to Augusta, where he took charge of a large milk farm for Mr. William Chisholm—an important position for one of his years. At the expiration of about twelve months he went to Portland and learned the trade of brush-making. He remained in this work for two years, or until the War of the Rebellion broke out, when he promptly enlisted in Company E, of Portland, Captain Shaw, in the First Maine Regiment, recruited for three months service. After the expiration of its term he was considerably engaged in recruiting and other duties connected with the war, but, October 10, 1862, he began service as a baggage-master on the Maine Central Railroad, running from Portland to Bangor and back. For eight years he handled trunks and valises, and checked baggage, when he was promoted to the post of conductor on the road. He was for a year on what was then known as the "Shoo Fly" train, from Augusta to Bangor, which he took out and back regularly. When this train was discontinued he handled temporarily the mixed trains between Waterville and Bangor, and then the night train from Bangor to Boston, which he accompanied through. He held this important post until he left the road at the expiration of four years from the beginning of his conductorship. He then settled down in Bangor in June, 1874, buying the livery stock of Mr. O. M. Shaw, who was keeping the Bangor House, in whose stables the livery was then, as now, kept. About a year afterwards he bought also the livery stable of Mr. Abram Woodward, near the Penobscot Exchange, and ran that as a branch establishment for three years, when he closed it out and brought the stock to the principal stable on the west side. Some time before this, after Mr. Shaw retired from the Bangor House, and during the eight months of Harrison Baker's charge of it which followed, Mr. Beale kept the entire stables of the house for livery and boarding, and for transient business and coaching. He had been prospered in his business, and in the summer of 1878 he started again the enterprise of running a stage-line to Bar Harbor, on Mount Desert, which had been suspended for several years. This he has maintained with great success and popularity, particularly in the warm season, and now has the contract, for four years, of supplying Bar Harbor with mail twice a day. He joins with this a profitable livery business at that place during the three months that tourists most frequent it. His coaches constitute a favorite line, being preferred by many to the sea route to Mount Desert, and travelers are quite enthusiastic in its praise. To serve his coaches better in getting and delivering the mail, Mr. Beale in the summer of 1881 put a beautiful little mail-wagon on the road in Bangor, for the transport of mails to and from the post-office.

January 24, 1878, Mr. Beale leased the Bangor House, and conducted it successfully for fourteen months and one week, when he re-leased it for the period of three years, which will expire the 1st of April, 1882. His management of this house has given it great fame, and the traveling public accord it a very large and profitable patronage. When he took the establishment, it was much neglected and dilapidated; nobody had ever made any money keeping it, and it was generally regarded in the city as an "elephant" on one's hands. He soon put it in apple-pie order; added thirteen new rooms to its accommodations, and has made it a reputable, successful, and profitable venture from the beginning. Mr. Beale is as yet in the prime of his years, and has the prospect of a long, honorable, and lucrative career. He was made a Free and Accepted Mason in 1874, in a Waterville lodge, of which he is still a member. He is a supporter of and attendant at the Independent Congregational or Unitarian Church, opposite his hotel, where the pastor of the church is a boarder.

Mr. Beale was married December 7, 1865, in Freeport, Cumberland county, Maine, near Portland, to Miss Lucy Jane, youngest daughter of Reuben and Sarah (Brown) Randall, of that place. They have had no children.

LEMUEL NICHOLS, JR.

This gentleman, for the last ten years keeper of the Franklin House livery stable in Bangor, was born in Lisbon, Androscoggin county, Maine, on the 25th day of June, 1828. He was the son of Lemuel Nichols, a native of Durham, Maine, and a farmer at Lisbon, also engaged often in teaming and removing buildings. At the early age of four, young Lemuel removed with his parents to Augusta, where his father engaged in the business of saw-milling. Here the boy came near meeting his death one day, by getting badly jammed between a pile of boards and a pile of joists, but escaped without permanent injury. Two years after the removal he lost his mother by death. The father is still living at the advanced age of ninety years, and makes his home in Bangor, in remarkable health and activity for one of his years. His son and namesake received his little schooling mainly in Augusta and places where his father subsequently lived—Harmony, Maine, and Bangor. He has been doing for himself, however, ever since he was ten years old. He worked first on a farm and in care of horses with the Hon. Mason W. Palmer, in West Corinth, for two and a half years, getting only his board and clothes for pay, but retaining a very pleasant recollection of Mr. Palmer and his family; he then went to East Corinth, three miles distant, where he engaged with William B. McLaughlin, then keeper of the East Corinth hotel, but later of the Franklin House, Bangor, to take care of his stable at $6 per month "and found." He remained six months with Mr. McLaughlin; and as an illustration of his temperate habits and careful economy at this time, it may be stated that in the whole half-year he used up but $1 of his wages, and the entire balance of $35 coming to him at the close. It may as well be mentioned here that Mr. Nichols has never drunk intoxicating liquor of any kind nor smoked or chewed tobacco—a truly remarkable case of abstinence for a man in his line of business. He then engaged with Mr. William S. Ordway to take care of the stage horses at East Corinth, and part of the time to drive the stage on the upper end of the route between Bangor and Brownville. He was now getting $9 a month, $3 more wages, and not quite so hard work. He was with Mr. Ordway, in this employment, for about eighteen months, when he went into other business. For one summer he drove a team for Mr. Willard W. Harris, now of Portland, then a store-keeper and mill-owner at Guilford, Piscataquis county, hauling lumber to Bangor, before the construction of the railroad.

By and by Mr. Nichols took an engagement with the stage proprietors, Messrs. Thomas Norcross & Son, who had the Bangor & Moosehead Lake stage line, and made one of their stopping places at West Charleston, where the head of the firm resided, and the son, Israel B. Norcross, attended to the business in Bangor. Mr. Nichols hired to do similar work at West Charleston to that he had done at East Corinth, during part of the time, but mostly taking care of the stage horses. He staid with the Norcrosses about one year, and was married while in their employ. He returned to Guilford village, where he kept the hotel for a while, and then sold out and went back to East Corinth. Here he again engaged to take care of horses, being the first to have charge of the stable of the Parker House, which was then a new hotel, and had just been opened on the Fourth of July, 1849 or 1850. Here he bought his first horse—a pretty good one, a tough nag, which he got for only $65, in that day of comparative cheapness. He has since owned a great number, at one time, just at the outbreak of the war, having nearly one hundred in his possession. This one horse at East Corinth he kept for hire, thus making a humble beginning of his now extensive livery business. He began keeping house at this place, and by and by bought two more rather cheap horses, and began running an accommodation open wagon from that place to Bangor three times a week. This he kept on the road about two years, and then bought Jack Mayo, of Kenduskeag, off the same road, and ran into Bangor daily with a four-horse team and a coach for passenger business only. After a time, about 1857, he got the mail contract from Bangor to Moosehead Lake. By this date he had bought the Parker House, at East Corinth, and was conducting it himself. He had previously had experience as a landlord in the same place, at the East Corinth Hotel, which he leased and kept for two years. After he got the Parker House he had profitable stage lines from that place to Bangor and also on the Moosehead Lake route, and made money rapidly. He built a fine, spacious public hall, connected with the Parker House, in 1860, which is still the best hall in East Corinth, and still bears the name, from him, of Nichols Hall. The next year he doubled the capacity of the Parker House stable, so as to accommodate one hundred horses at once. The carriage-house connected with the stable was situated under his hall, and was of a size to correspond with the bigness of his new stable. He had also now a good livery business, which added handsomely to his profits. In 1864 he sold out his hotel and furniture to James Knowles, his accommodation stage to E. H. Hunting, who still runs it to Bangor, and his Moosehead line to J. P. Webber, now the wealthy Bangor lumberman. He took in the trade with the last-named Mr. Webber's fine house in East Corinth, which burned to the ground six days afterwards, and brought him not a dollar of insurance. He thereupon removed to Newport, where he bought the Shaw House and began a new career as landlord, at the same time running a mail stage line from the Maine Central Railroad at Newport to Moosehead Lake. He kept the Shaw House one and one-fourth years, and sold it to Charles Sawyer, who has since kept it. He then came to Bangor and bought the livery business of O. M. Shaw, in the old Billings stable, on Main street. He presently, in February, 1866, bought out the Dwinel House, now the City Hotel, and changed its name to the Nichols House. The fates were against him here, however; and he closed up this business and removed to Dexter in the fall of the same year, where he re-engaged in livery and stage business, running again to Moosehead Lake from the end of the branch railroad, now built to Dexter. He staid in that place about five years, during which he operated in real estate and house-lots considerably. He kept the livery and stage business at the old Witherell place, opposite the Dexter House, considerably enlarging the stable and building on a spacious carriage-house. The handsome sign, "Nichols Place," which he put up there, remains to this day. Adjoining the Dexter House he built the fine business block now owned by E. C. Nichols, of Bangor, which he sold to Mr. Nichols for $7,800. He bought a large tract adjoining the town from Nathaniel Bryant, laid it off in lots, and built two dwellings upon them. Beech street, in the east part of the village, was laid off at his instance, and runs through his former property. He still holds some real estate in Dexter; but mainly sold out there in 1871, and made his final removal to Bangor, where he has since steadfastly remained. He leased his present stand and the livery, hack, and boarding business of the Franklin House stables, of his old employer's son, Henry McLaughlin, who, with his father, was keeping the Franklin House. In the spring of 1881 he became the owner of this valuable property, for which he paid $10,000. Every year since 1857 he has had important mail contracts, and he is now interested in eight or nine routes of this kind. One of them is run by his son, Mr. Frederick W. Nichols. Another son, Charles W. Nichols, assists him as clerk in the stable.

Mr. Nichols was married, as before stated, during his first residence at East Corinth, on the 19th day of March, 1848, to Miss Martha Ann, daughter of Elauson and Philena (Chandler) Edmunds, of that place, where the father was an harness-maker. Their daughter, however, Mrs. Nichols, was born at Farmington, Maine, in 1830. She has proved a strong, able, and very faithful and laborious helpmate of her husband from the day of their marriage unto this present. They attend the First Baptist church regularly, and aid liberally in its support, although not members of the society. They have had four children, all living—Minnie Frances, now Mrs. Sidney Keith, married at Dexter in the winter of 1871—72, wife of an engineer on the Maine Central Railroad, a very smart and trustworthy man, now residing in Bangor; Frederick Waldo, before mentioned, who was married about six years ago, and has a small family; Charles Willard, also married in the spring of 1881; and Henry Lemuel, now eighteen years old, and of Boston, where he is connected with a grocery store.

Mr. and Mrs. Nichols occupy a pleasant residence in East Bangor, at No. 57 Centre street. Two of Mr. Nichols's brothers, John Nelson and Willard, respectively next older and younger than he, are buried in the cemetery at East Corinth; and his widowed sister Rebecca, Mrs. J. M. Tenney, formerly of London, New Hampshire, now resides with him in Bangor.

ABEL HUNT.

Mr. Abel Hunt, the well-known undertaker of Bangor, was born in Camden, Maine, April 19, 1835. His father, Simon Hunt, was a native of Concord, Massachusetts. He moved from there to Camden, Maine, about 1806, and was one of the pioneer settlers of that region. He was a saddler by trade, and carried on the harness business in that place till his death, which occurred when he was in the eighty-first year of his age. His memory is perpetuated in the beautiful elms which he planted in that town, and which give such a charm to the village. The venerable wife of this good old man is still living. Her maiden name was Hannah Rogers, a sister of Captain Thomas Rogers, one of the early steamboat captains on the Penobscot.

In the old town of Camden Abel spent most of his school days, closing his school life with a few terms at Gorham Academy. He learned the harness business in his father's shop, but did not follow it long. He early developed an enthusiasm for progressive ideas, and, in company with another young man, took hold of a patent right, and in endeavoring to push it upon the market he gives his experience quite laconically: "We made some money and traveled some; but it paid more in experience than money."

It was not until about the year 1860 that ready-made coffins or caskets were introduced into the vicinity of Camden. In connection with his other business Mr. Hunt conceived the idea of purchasing a small stock for sale. After corresponding for some time he learned that he could buy best in Cambridge, Massachusetts. What a change the business has since undergone! Now no undertaker is so remote from the lines of travel but that he is often visited by salesmen of all kinds of funeral furniture and mortuary goods.

Mr. Hunt relates that when he started to sell coffins as a retailer, he used to deliver most of them in company with his father, who was the actual undertaker, in the evening, using a wheelbarrow for conveyance. The feeling of the people at that time was that they were engaged in a mean business. In December, 1873, Mr. Hunt removed to Bangor and entered into a partnership with Enoch H. Tibbitts. At the end of two years Mr. Hunt bought out Mr. Tibbitts and took a lease for ten years. They had an agreement in regard to the business which has been the cause of a controversy in which considerable money has been spent.

The business which Mr. Hunt has built up in Bangor is the result of persistent energy and close application to it. The changes have been radical during the last ten years, but Mr. Hunt has ever kept up with them and never allowed himself to be "left." For a time he has had to combat the prejudices of the people against embalming, but the public opinion is gradually working in his favor and he is enabled to adopt it more extensively every year. Mr. Hunt is now pleasantly situated, with a certain and growing professional career. He possesses a liberal mind and follows with great interest the course of modern progressive thought. His appreciation of the best in literature and art is acute, and he is an eager reader. His love of nature is keen, and he sees beauty where men of coarser nature would pass unheedingly. His most prominent character is hopefulness. Hope is to him like the air he breathes, and no matter what reverses and petty annoyances may befall him he still maintains a brave, hopeful spirit, which joined with all his tact and executive force carries him to a successful consummation. He has a wide, generous nature. His conversation is free and natural, and he attaches those with whom he comes in contact with the bonds of a hearty friendship. He believes in enjoying life, but rather in a calm and hearty way. To the afflicted he shows sincere sympathy. He is ever on the alert for improvements in his business, and was the first in his profession to introduce embalming in the State, and was recently called to Moosehead Lake to embalm and care for the bodies of Mr. and Mrs. Haines, who were drowned there.

Mr. Hunt married Miss Eveline K. Knight, December 17, 1866. Their family consists of four children—Walter Reid, Ralph Hudson, Edward James, and Eva Sawtelle. His portrait appears in this work.

CHARLES D. BRYANT.

When Bangor was a mere hamlet, there came here, when but a lad, Charles D. Bryant. His father, Robert Bryant, a son of John Bryant, was born in Hollis, in the District of Maine, as this region was then called, September 20, 1775. His mother's maiden name was Olive Davis, a native of Saco, Maine, born in 1783. Charles D. was the fourth child of a family of eight children. He was born in Scarborough, Maine, July 16, 1813, and came to Bangor in 1820, when but seven years old. This was the year that Maine became a State. The condition, size, etc., of Bangor at that time may be learned by referring to the history of the city elsewhere. The people were poor, and it was with difficulty that Mr. Bryant could provide his family with necessary food and raiment; yet he struggled manfully on, assisted and cheered by his good wife. In 1827 he bought a small farm in Hermon, getting in debt for it. This farm contained fifty-seven acres, with but little cleared. Here Mr. Bryant moved, living for some time in a log house. For this place he was to pay $4 per acre.

In the spring of 1829, when Charles D. was sixteen years of age, he told his father if he would fit him up with a few clothes, he would go out to work and pay for the farm. After a time the outfit was provided, and Charles started out with a heart full of gladness that he could now help his father. This outfit consisted of one pair of striped bed-ticking pants, one linen jacket, two coarse cotton shirts, minus collar and bosom, one pair of coarse brogan shoes, and two pairs of stockings. He soon found employment, for he was able to convince any one that he could work and was anxious to do so. He worked eight months at $8.00 per month for a Mr. Billings in Newburg on a farm, and during the winter made shingles. The next year again worked for Mr. B., and again in the shingle swamp during the winter. In this way he toiled on. At one time he worked for Captain Lowder and helped build the house on Hammond street where Mr. Lowder lived and died. Thus in time he paid for the farm and all interest then accrued, making his father a comfortable home and relieving him of a great load of care and anxiety. We wonder how many boys in Bangor to-day would do the same! When he had thus paid off all indebtedness on his father's place, he found himself without any education, save such as he had picked up at odd moments. He could not feel satisfied with this, and so determined to go to school. To do so he worked evenings at sawing wood, and did chores for Mr. Lowder, thus earning enough to pay his board and tuition at a private school, at $5 per quarter, for ten quarters. This he now wisely says was the best thing he ever did in his life. After this he worked for Benjamin Bussey (under Mr. Lowder, as agent for him) exploring and surveying; also working at this for other parties. In 1836 he married Miss Avis L. Taylor, and in 1838 moved to Thomaston, where he was employed as agent for Benjamin Bussey, of Roxbury. In 1844, after the death of Mr. Bussey, he returned to Bangor and settled in Hermon, where he cleared up a farm, though much of the time employed as explorer and surveyor of timber-lands for other parties. In 1854 he sold his farm and moved to Bangor, where he has since lived. For fifteen years he was employed by the late S. F. Hersey, and since Mr. Hersey's decease by the "estate," as manager of the large business of the Hersey estate. Mr. Bryant has had two sons and one daughter, all of whom are deceased, except his youngest daughter. By economy and industry Mr. Bryant has acquired a competency; yet he says the happiest day he ever knew, so far as money or property had anything to do with it, was when he had money earned and paid for his father's farm, and had one hundred dollars of his own.

Mr. Bryant truly says "industry and economy, combined with promptness in business, are the foundation of success in business." Mr. B. has proved the truth of this adage. (Had we space, we should like to enter more into details of the life of this self-made man; but our limits forbid.)

JONES P. VEAZIE.

A prominent man in Bangor was Jones P. Veazie, a son of General Samuel Veazie. He was born in Topsham, Maine, June 2, 1811, and died February 18, 1875. He was twice married, and had by each wife two sons and one daughter. As a member of the firm of Lord & Veazie, in Bangor, he was a well-known and respected merchant, and continued in business with his partner and brother-in-law, Mr. Lord, until the death of the latter. Mr. Veazie then became interested in shipping and other business, in which he employed his capital and finally founded a large lumbering business with Mr. Levi Young, in Ottawa, Canada, which has been eminently successful. Mr. Veazie was a man justly esteemed for his social, liberal, and truthful characteristics, and had the continued respect of all with whom he had dealings. In his business and social life he was outspoken in his sentiments, and was one of the earliest anti-slavery men in Bangor, contributing by his means in the establishment of the Bangor Gazette in 1842. He lived to see the glorious work of emancipation, to which he had given much thought and labor, as well as means, carried forward to its full fruition, until the country he loved was in truth the home of the free.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

SETTLEMENT NOTES.

General Joseph H. Smith, the present Collector of Customs in Bangor, was born in Wiscasset, Maine, November 27, 1836. His father, Jacob Smith, was a native of Epping, New Hampshire, and married Julia A. Lambert, daughter of Luke Lambert, Esq., of Bath. He lived some years in Wiscasset, but moved to Bath in 1844. He was a lawyer, and widely known in that part of the State. Jacob and Julia Smith had six children, of whom Joseph was the third son. He attended school in Bath and "finished off," as it was sometimes termed, with a few terms at old Garland Academy. This old academy is justly proud of the many noted men who finished their education (if we may properly use such a term) within her walls. On leaving school he entered the counting room of the iron foundry in Bath as book-keeper. Here he remained two years, at the end of which time he came to Penobscot county and entered the employ of William Jameson, of Upper Stillwater, as clerk in his lumber office. He remained in the employ of Mr. Jameson about two years. In 1856, when twenty years of age, he went west and became traveling agent for the St. Croix Lumber Company, of Stillwater, Minnesota, selling their logs and lumber. He remained with this company two years and then went to Lyons, Iowa, and set up in the lumber business for himself, remaining in Iowa until the breaking out of the civil war. Feeling that it was his duty to enlist, and that he would prefer to represent his native State, he came to Maine and enlisted as a private in the Third Maine Infantry, Colonel O. O. Howard commanding, June 30, 1861. Soon he was promoted to Lieutenant, and on November 14 commissioned as Captain of United States Volunteers, and assigned to staff duty with General John Sedgwick, who then commanded a brigade. January 1 he was promoted to Lieutenant-Colonel of United States Volunteers, and assigned to duty with the Second Army Corps, General D. M. Couch commanding. October 27, 1864, he was brevetted Colonel for gallantry displayed at the battle of Ream's Station and Boydtown Plank Road, Virginia. This was on the recommendation and request of General

W. S. Hancock. On the 9th of April, 1865, he was promoted to the rank of Brigadier-General of United States Volunteers by brevet, on recommendation of Major General A. A. Humphreys. At the close of the war he was offered a position in the regular army, but declined, and was honorably mustered out. At the close of the war the General came back to Stillwater, in this county, and engaged in building mills and the manufacture of lumber. He moved to Bangor in 1868, but continued in the lumber business until 1878 at Upper Stillwater, at which time his mills were burned. In June, 1869, he was nominated, commissioned, and confirmed as Collector of Customs for this District, which position he has since held. General Smith married Miss Georgia A. Reynolds, February 24, 1859. She was a daughter of Eri Reynolds, Esq., of Chicago. Mrs. Smith died November 2, 1859, and in September, 1866, Mr. Smith married again, his present wife being a daughter of Freeman Clark, of Bath, Maine, Agnes by name. They have one son, Joseph S., and one daughter, Hortense Louise.

The Hon. Silas C. Hatch, son of the late Silas Hatch, of Bangor, was born March 28, 1821, commenced mercantile business in Bangor in 1845, and continued in trade until September 1, 1870. He was educated at the Bangor schools and at the Gorham Seminary; was fourteen years a member of the city government, serving seven years in the Common Council (several years as President), and seven years in the Board of Aldermen; was eight years one of the City Assessors, filling that office the past year; member of the Executive Council in 1871-72-78, and State Treasurer in 1874-75-76. It is believed that the State never had a more able and intelligent financial officer. He was one of the few officials in the Treasury Department who have made themselves thoroughly familiar with its details. In 1856 he was Presidential Elector on the Fillmore ticket. He was a member of the Legislature from Bangor in 1873-74, and again in 1881-82, serving as Chairman in 1881, on the part of the House, of the Committee on Financial Affairs, and of Ways and Means, and as a member of the Committee on Education. Some of the best years of his life have been devoted to the public service, and no man enjoys in larger measure the respect and esteem of his fellow-citizens.

Hon. Newell Blake, a retired merchant and manufacturer of Bangor, and ex-State Senator from the county of Penobscot, is a native of New Hampshire, born in Kensington, April 26, 1810. He came to Maine in 1842, settling in Oldtown as a merchant in the firm of Stone & Blake. He had already been in business at his native place for three years, and had been married in Boston, Massachusetts, to Miss Phebe Jordan, of that city, but a native of Maine. After a period of twenty-three years in Oldtown, during a small part of which time he was interested in a line of steamers on the St. John, he removed to Bangor and began the manufacture and shipping of lumber, with Mr. Hosea B. Emery, as the firm of Emery & Blake. Upon the death of Mr. Emery, Mr. Blake sold out the mills and business, and himself, in 1870, beginning to feel the weight of years, retired from active business life. While a citizen of Oldtown, in 1852, he was elected on a mixed Free Soil, Whig, and disaffected Democratic ticket to the State Senate, in which body he served during the terms of 1853, 1854, and 1855. He was a member of the Committee on Mercantile Affairs and Insurance, a very important committee, and was Chairman of the Committee on Accounts and Claims. During one session he was Chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs. Thus and otherwise well qualified for public life, upon retirement from business he entered the service of the city of Bangor; was a member of the Common Council in 1870-72, and during these three years was President of that body. In 1873 he was elected from the Fourth Ward as Alderman, and the next year was chosen Mayor of the city, and served a little more than one term, delivering two messages to the Council, as there was no choice of Mayor the next spring after his election. For three years he also served on the City Board of Assessors, during two years being Chairman of the Board. Mrs. Blake is also still living. They have had no children.

Lewis F. Stratton, the present Sheriff of Penobscot county, was born October 1, 1830. His father, Paul Stratton, a native of Albion, Kennebec county, married Sarah Ann Frazier. Their family consists of ten children, all of whom are living. Their names and residence are as follow: Mary, wife of George B. Robertson, of Bangor; Eliza, widow of Josiah Snow, Mattawamkeag; William, now living in Chester; George H., of Brainard, Minnesota; Jane, wife of James H. Snow, of Mattawamkeag; Eunice, widow of the late James P. Crowell, Orono; Ellen, wife of O. T. Hooper, New York; Martha J., wife of William Jewell, of Gorham, New Hampshire, and Guilford D., of Gorham, New Hampshire. Mr. Stratton is still living, being now eighty-five years old. Mrs. Stratton died in 1879. Lewis Stratton spent his early life on a farm, receiving a common school education. He first engaged in business for himself at lumbering and farming at Mattawamkeag, at the age of twenty-one or twenty-two, and continued to reside in Mattawamkeag until 1879, when he was elected Sheriff. Since then he has resided in Bangor. In 1854 he, with his father, built the first hotel in Winn, and in 1851 his brothers built the Katahdin House in Winn. Mr. Stratton married Miss Sarah Bunn, daughter of Luther and Phebe Bunn. They have one son, Albert O., now in business in Mattawamkeag. Mr. Stratton has served in all the town offices of his town, having been Selectman, Constable, Collector, School Committeeman, etc. In 1875 and 1876 he was chosen to the Legislature. He is now serving his second term as Sheriff.

General John L. Hodsdon, one of Bangor's present oldest residents, has been in the practice of law, except at intervals, since 1838. He was lieutenant of the Bangor Independent Volunteers in 1834, at the age of eighteen, and has held the military commissions of Aide-de-camp, Orderly officer to the Major-General of this military division; captain of the Bangor Light Infantry, Colonel of the Bangor Regiment, Brigadier-General, Major-General of this division under two Legislative elections and commissions, Adjutant-General of the State, and ex-officio Acting Quartermaster-General, Commissary-General, Paymaster-General, and Inspector-General of the State of Maine, under seven annual successive legislative elections, from 1861 to 1867, inclusive. During the three months of the Aroostook war, in the winter and spring of 1837, he served in the field as Aide-de-camp and Orderly officer to his step-father, who was Major-General commanding all the troops in the expedition. In 1853-54 he was Judge of the Police Court in Bangor. The father of General John L. Hodsdon was Jeremiah Littlefield, of Hallowell, who died of yellow fever in 1818, on his passage home from New Orleans. In 1820 Isaac Hodsdon, then of Corinth, Captain in the Thirty-third Regiment United States Infantry in the War of 1812, adopted John, adding his own name to that of Littlefield. General Isaac Hodsdon had a wide and honorable reputation as a military man and politician throughout the State. He died at Corinth in 1864, aged eighty-four years. The children of General John L. Hodsdon are Mrs. Alfred Veazie and Mrs. C. A. Bouteille, of Bangor; and John L. Hodsdon, of Boston, Massachusetts. Mrs. John L. Hodsdon is the daughter of Abraham True, Esq., who died at her home in May last aged eighty-eight years. Mrs. F. W. Hill, of Exeter, is a sister of Mrs. Hodsdon, and Dr. J. F. True, of Auburn, Maine, and Joseph N. True, of New Haven, Connecticut, are her brothers. General Hodsdon's sisters are Mrs. W. H. Lunt, of Evanston, Illinois, deceased; Mrs. J. L. French, of Hallowell, Maine. His only brother, Nathaniel Littlefield, of Hallowell, Maine, is dead.

The Bangor Light Infantry, of which General Hodsdon was formerly captain, was organized in 1853, and in respect to personnel, uniform, and equipment was never surpassed by any military organization in New England. It numbered some eighty-five muskets, and comprised among its members many of the leading, most prominent and honorable citizens of Bangor. It entered the Second Regiment of Maine Volunteers, in the service of the United States, in May, 1861, as company A, under Colonel Jameson, under a two years' enlistment, and served its term with honor.

General Daniel White, of the firm of White & Fairbanks, soap manufacturers of Bangor, is a son of Daniel and Lucy White, of Winterport, Maine. Mr. White was a native of Nashfield, Massachusetts. Daniel and Lucy White has eleven children, of whom Daniel is the second son. He was born September 12, 1833. His father was a sea-captain, but owned a farm, on which Daniel, Jr., was brought up. On becoming of age he engaged in the furniture business, in which he continued three years. He went to California in 1855 and engaged in mining, remaining one year, when he returned to Bangor and engaged in the jewelry business, in which he continued till the breaking out of the war in 1861. In 1861 Mr. White raised Company I, Second Maine Infantry, and was with this company for two years, when he returned at the expiration of the time of service of the regiment. He then raised a company for the Thirty-first Maine and went out again as captain of the company. He was promoted to Colonel in 1864 and taken prisoner at the mine explosion in front of Petersburg, and held as prisoner seven months when he was exchanged. In 1865 he was breveted Brigadier-General and remained in service until the close of the war. He is now Colonel of the Second Maine Regiment. During the summer of 1881 he took a trip West, spending the summer, and on his return engaged in the manufacture of soap with J. A. Fairbanks. Their office and factory is located on Morse's Lane, Bangor. Mr. White married Miss Anna S. Rich, daughter of William Rich, of Monroe, Maine. They have two children: Grace and Gertrude.

The late Edward E. Small, of Bangor, was a son of Isaac Small, a mason of that city. The family of Isaac Small consisted of three sons and one daughter. Edward E. was the second son. He was born in August, 1844, and at the age of seventeen entered the army and remained until near the end of the war. After returning he engaged as book-keeper for Babb & Strickland in their lumber office. He was with them about nine years, when he was made United States Pension Agent here and held the office until it was removed from Bangor. After this he went into the insurance business with Mr. Clark, and afterwards with Wiggin & Williams under the title of Wiggin, Small & Williams. He was in this business at the time of his death, September 23, 1881. Major Small, as he was called, was captain for a time of the Loyal League, a company quite noted at the time of the trouble at Augusta in 1879. At the time of his death he held a position on the staff of General Chamberlain as Division Quartermaster, with the rank of Major. For several years Major Small was chairman of the Republican City Committee. Mr. Small married Miss Ella I. Severance, daughter of Samuel and Betsey Severance, of Bangor, and at his death left one daughter, Flora Lillian. He was always interested in everything of an educational nature, and was highly esteemed by all who knew him.

Captain James P. Lansil is a son of Charles V. Lansil, who was born in Bordeaux, France, in the year 1768, where he lived about eighteen years, when he emigrated to this county, and settled at Cape Cod, Massachusetts. There he lived about twenty four years, and then moved to Bucksport, Maine, then to Sunkhaze, and then to Bangor, Maine, where he died in the year 1831, aged sixty-three years. His occupation was that of sailor. His wife was Ruth C. Paine, born on Cape Cod in the year 1778. She died in the year 1837, aged fifty-three years. James P., the sixth child, was born at Bangor, September 30, 1816. His life has been passed at sea mostly, he being captain of a vessel. The other members of his father's family were: Thomas P., Mary P., Betsey, Charles V., Asa P., Ephraim P., and George W. James P. Lansil was married on the 4th of February, 1838, to Martha Colby, who died in October, 1855. He was a second time married December 27, 1857, to Mrs. Thankful S. Mitchell. The names of children by his first wife are: George, unmarried, resides at Bangor; John F. died in the year 1867; Elbridge T., living, resides at Bangor; Francis S. died in the year 1867; Arthur J., married to Annie Douglass; Oscar, married, and resides at Saratoga Spring, New York; Edward P., married to Fannie S. Carr, and has one child; he is at present at sea with his family. Captain Lansil has a good residence on Lincoln street, Bangor, where he is living as retired ship-master.

George Stetson, President of the First National Bank in Bangor, was born January 25, 1807, in Hampden, in this county. His father, Simeon Stetson, was a farmer and trader, and came from New Ipswich now Randolph, Massachusetts; was born in New Ipswich, and moved to Hampden in 1804. George Stetson was the fourth son and fifth child in the family. He received a common school and academical education in Hampden, and assisted his father on the farm and in the store. On becoming of age he took charge of a mill in Hampden and engaged in trade. Here he lived until about 1832 when he moved to Bangor and in 1835 engaged in the West India trade together with his brother Isaiah and Cyrus Emery, Esq., under the firm name of Emery, Stetson & Co. Mr. Emery dying the firm was changed to Stetson & Co., and continued some years, since which they closed the business. They also owned a mill on Kenduskeag Stream and manufactured lumber quite extensively. They sold their mill about three years ago, since which time he has given his time to the bank business and looking after his interests in timber lands. Mr. Stetson has been a prominent man here for many years, serving as Chairman of the Board of Water Works, President of the Union Fire and Marine Insurance Company, and President of the Old Market Bank, now the First National Bank. He also was a Representative in the Legislature during the war. Mr. Stetson married Adeline Hammond in 1845. She was a daughter of Elijah Hammond, of this city. They have four children, three sons and one daughter: George H., in Kenduskeag, Maine; Edward, a lawyer in Bangor; Isaiah K., with his father and brother in the wholesale ice business, and Mary A. at home. Mr. Stetson is a man very widely known in this section of the State, and takes a very prominent position among the leading citizens of Bangor.

Moses Giddings, of Bangor, one of the prominent and wealthy citizens of the place, was born in Bangor September 29, 1816. His father, John Giddings, was a mason and built the first brick building in the city. He was well known here, and for many years was one of the leading builders. He married Joanna Trafton and lived here in 1812, at the time of the commencement of the war. He had four children, one son and three daughters, viz: Moses, Hannah F., deceased, wife of O. H. Ingalls; Abbie T., and Nancy, who died in early life. Mr. Giddings died in 1823. Moses Giddings received but a common school education, limited at that, for his father died when Moses was but seven years old so that he early had to look out for himself. He clerked in a store when a young man, and in 1846 embarked in the lumber business for himself. He formerly cut and manufactured, but now deals principally in timber lands.

At one time he was engaged in navigation and owned a half interest in the first ship that was captured by the Sumter in the late war. Mr. Giddings formerly built and owned vessels. He has been chosen to represent his ward in both branches of the city government, and is President of the Bangor and Piscataquis Railroad; also President of the Merchants' Marine Insurance Company, and has been one of the trustees of Colby University for over thirty years. His first wife was Miss Mary Shirley, to whom he was married in 1850, and who died in 1851. His second wife was Miss Ernestine Chase, married in 1854 and died in 1869. By her Mr. Giddings's children were: Frederick C., now of Bluehill, Maine; Mary S., deceased in 1866, and Madeline. In 1877 he married Mrs. Sarah E. Sabine, with whom he is now living.

Hon. Francis M. Sabine, of Bangor, was born in Boston in 1811, but resided in youth in Hampden. Here, at the public schools and Academy, he received a good rudimentary education. At the age of seventeen he went to Eastport, where, after four years' clerkship with a mercantile firm, he went into similar business for himself. He was married in 1834, and in 1835 removed to Bangor and at once resumed his former business. Owing to the notably wide-spread business depression and consequent failures, he found, at the end of two years, that his assets were inadequate to pay his debts. Happily for all concerned, his creditors extended payment on old demands, gave new credit, and were ultimately paid in full. In the course of his mercantile career of thirty-six years, he engaged to some extent in other pursuits, among which was the manufacture of brick, and also farming. For the latter he had a natural inclination, which he gratified for twenty-seven years. Seventy acres, of a farm of one hundred and sixty, he converted from a very rough condition into beautiful grass-fields. The average annual crop of hay of this farm was one hundred tons. Twenty cows yielded an annual gross income of $1,200. The net income of this farm during the six years previous to its sale was eight per cent. The past ten years Mr. Sabine has been President, Treasurer, and Manager of the Bangor Mutual Fire Insurance Company, which offices he still holds. He took an active part in establishing the Bangor Mercantile Library Association, and for thirty years was its Treasurer and ex-officio a Director. In the first year of the late war he received from Governor Washburn, unsolicited, a commission as Assistant Quartermaster-General, with orders from time to time for special service. The first was to issue to the Second Maine Regiment of Volunteers (the first to leave the State for Washington), an entire equipment for actual service. Another, in 1862, was to manufacture and issue the uniforms for the eight regiments of volunteers for nine months' service. He took a leading part in the organization of the Freedmen's Aid Association, and served as its President. Through the generosity of the citizens of Bangor, the effective labor of our ladies, and the successful result of a course of lectures, this association contributed largely to the needs of these newly enfranchised people. He has served the city as a member of the Board of Aldermen, and on the School Committee, Board of Assessors, and Overseers of the Poor. He is a member of the board of directors of banking and other business corporations, and a trustee of several estates. In politics he has been a Republican from the formation of the party—was previously a Free-soil Whig. In religion he is a Unitarian. For forty-six years he has been a member of the Bangor Independent Congregational society, and for thirty-three years Superintendent of its Sunday-school. He has also been an active member of the Maine Conference of Unitarian churches from its formation, and was for three years President of the conference.

Frank H. Williams is a son of James W. Williams, of Bangor, where he has always resided. James W. Williams married Elizabeth T. Freese, daughter of Andrew Freese, of Bangor, and has three children, viz: Frank H., Lillian C., now Mrs. George B. Wiggin, of Bangor, and Fred J., also of Bangor. Frank Williams first engaged in business in Bangor as a clerk for the firm of Freese & Wiggin, becoming a member of the firm that succeeded them. The present firm is Wiggin, Small & Williams. Mr. Williams is also a member of the firm of F. H. Williams & Co., of Boston, doing a brokerage business. Mr. Williams married Miss Louie A. Thompson, daughter of Captain Benjamin Thompson, of Bangor.

The first representative of the Gallupe family to settle in this country was John Gallupe, who came from England with his father and two brothers and settled in Stonington, Connecticut. The father went back to England and was killed in battle. All the Gallupes in this country originated from two of these sons—one dying a bachelor. The sons were John, Thomas, and Nathaniel. John Gallupe had a son by the name of Thomas, who was the grandfather of Dr. William Gallupe. This name is spelled several different ways, but however it may be spelled, it is believed to have been originally the same. Thomas Gallupe had a son by the name of Benjamin, who married Sally Park for his second wife. She was a daughter of Nehemiah Park. His family by both wives consisted of twelve children, all born in Plainfield, Connecticut. Dr. William Gallupe was the sixth son of this family, all of whom are now deceased except one beside himself. Dr. Gallupe commenced the study of medicine in September, 1826, and graduated in 1830 from the medical department of Dartmouth College. In 1840 he became convinced that homeopathy was the better and more desirable practice, and therefore adopted it. When he came here in 1844 there were but few homeopathic physicians in Maine. At this time he had been in practice of his profession fourteen years in Concord, Massachusetts, Plainfield and New Ipswich, New Hampshire. There was at that time great opposition to homeopathy in this country. There were not then twenty persons within ten or fifteen miles who would employ any but the old school physicians. The doctor seems to have successfully combatted this prejudice, for since then there have been from six to ten homeopathic physicians here and three are established here now, all of whom seem to be successful. Dr. Gallupe is now living with his third wife. He has two children living, having buried a son, who was a noted telegraph man, in 1876.

Dr. George P. Jefferds, undoubtedly the most prominent and well known of the homeopathic physicians of Bangor, is a native of Kennebunkport, in this State, born May 7, 1816. His preparatory education was received at Phillips Academy, Andover, and Limerick, Maine. He entered Bowdoin College in 1834, and was duly graduated in course. From the fall of 1839 to the end of the academic year, in 1842, he was in charge first of the Alfred Academy, Maine, and then of Nashua Academy, New Hampshire. He then matriculated in the medical department of Harvard University, but was graduated finally in medicine with high honor, in 1845, from the Bowdoin Medical School. He opened an office in his native town, beginning fortunately with the large practice of a physician who had just retired. His system was of the old school until 1850, when he became a convert to homeopathy. He practiced as a follower of Hahnemann for a little more than ten years longer in Kennebunkport, and then removed to Bangor, where he soon commanded an extensive and reputable practice, which has steadily widened and become more profitable with the years. The Doctor is the subject of a sketch in the Biographical Cyclopædia of Homeopathic Physicians and Surgeons, which closes with the following worthy tribute: "Dr. Jefferds is a highly accomplished scholar, and a man of great natural powers. He has brought to his profession his largest energies, and the success he has won is the legitimate consequence of this ability and application."

Dr. Alfred Walton, of Bangor, is a son of Samuel and Sarah (Brown) Walton, who came from Belfast to Oldtown in 1830. Samuel Walton was for many years a merchant in Oldtown. He had six children—four sons and two daughters. He died on his way home from California in 1851. Dr. Alfred Walton was born June 22, 1832. After finishing his common school education he followed the sea a few years, and then went to California, where he remained two years. On returning from there he built a mill in Alton, this county, and was engaged in the lumber business seven years. In 1862 he went into the army. He had previously been studying medicine, and was chosen Hospital Steward in the Eighth Maine Regiment. He remained in the army until the close of the war, and then returned to Oldtown. He then entered the medical department of Bowdoin College, was graduated in 1867, and settled in Oldtown, where he practiced until 1869, in which year he came to Bangor, where he has since lived. Dr. Walton married Electa M. Reed, daughter of Deacon Joseph H. and Abigail Reed. Mrs. Walton died very suddenly in May, 1881.

Dr. Daniel Hennessy, an allopathic physician and surgeon, of Bangor, was born in Bandon, Ireland, December 25, 1838. His father, Bartholomew Hennessy, married Margaret McCarthy, and has five children, viz: Bartholomew, of Botsford, New Brunswick; John, also in Botsford; Daniel; Elizabeth, deceased wife of John Hartnett, of Bristol, New Brunswick; and Jeremiah, of Botsford. Mr. and Mrs. Hennessy are both living in Botsford, and Daniel was brought up on a farm in that place. After completing his common school education he attended school one year at Mount Allison Academy, at Sackville, New Brunswick, and from there he went to St. Dunstan's College at Charlotte, Town, Prince Edward's Island. He was here two years and then entered the office of Dr. Carritte, of Shediac, New Brunswick, remaining with him for two years, and then took a course of lectures at Geneva Medical College, New York, spending the time of two courses. During this time he spent eighteen months in De Camp General Hospital, near New York City. After completing his course at the college he attended lectures in New York at the Eye and Ear Infirmary and the private Lying in Institute in Madison Avenue. In 1869 he commenced practice in Point Debut, New Brunswick, where he remained four and a half years. In 1873 he came to Bangor, where he has since lived. He married Alessandra Stewart Bliss, daughter of Rev. Donald M. Bliss, rector of Mount Whatly, New Brunswick. To this couple have been born three children, viz: Wilfred Augustin, Sarah Margaret Madeline, and Mary Alessandra. Dr. Hennessy has had a large experience in hospital practice and is a skilled physician and surgeon. His office is at No. 29 Main street.

Dr. John K. Lincoln, one of the leading dentists of Bangor, was born in Worcester, Massachusetts. He is a son of Augustus and Maria (Davis) Lincoln, natives of Massachusetts, who lived in Boston for a time, where some of their children were born. Mr. Lincoln owned an iron foundry in Boston, but afterwards purchased a farm. Mr. and Mrs. Lincoln had five children—four sons and one daughter, viz: William H., now in Millbury, Massachusetts; Albert W., also in Millbury; Charles D.; Maria W., now Mrs. Barzilla Mills, of Rutland, Massachusetts; and John K. Mr. Lincoln died in Rutland in 1879. Mrs. Lincoln died in 1841. John K. Lincoln was born July 5, 1841, in Worcester, Massachusetts. He received a common and high-school education and went to Biddeford, where he studied dentistry. He remained in Biddeford about six years, when he removed to Augusta and opened an office there, continuing in practice for five years, when he came to Bangor and entered the Theological Seminary, at the same time opening an office and placing it in the hands of N. S. Jenkins. He completed the course and graduated in 1862, and was at once appointed Chaplain of the Twenty-second Maine Volunteers, stationed at New Orleans and Baton Rouge. He remained with the regiment about nine months, when he received a severe hurt from being thrown from a horse into a deep ravine. He fell forty-five feet and received a severe fracture of the skull which caused him to be unconscious for nine days. From this severe injury he has since suffered, though better now than for years. He was sent home to Bangor and in 1863 had so far regained his health as to be able to open his office again, going into partnership with Mr. Jenkins. Since then he has remained in Bangor in the practice of his profession of dentistry. He married Olive Dame, of Saco. They have two daughters and one son, viz: Nellie M., Mary A., and Frederick D. For many years Mr. Lincoln was not able to see plainly enough to read on account of the injury to his head, not being able to see but a portion of a word at a time. He could see small words but only part of a long one at one time or without moving his paper. On this account he has been unable to preach. His present place of business is No. 2 Wheelwright and Clark's Block. He lives at 129 Cedar street.

Dr. Ralph Kneeland Jones was born at Stockbridge, in the county of Berkshire, in Massachusetts, on Sunday, July 13, 1823. He was the son of Samuel Jones of that place, a lawyer, and a graduate of Yale College. Through his father, who was the fifth of the same name, he was descended from the Jones family of Saybrook and Hebron in Connecticut, and through his mother, from the Connecticut Gilberts and Champions. Fitted for college at the schools and academy at Stockbridge, he was admitted to Williams College, but did not join his class. After teaching for a short time he decided to adopt the profession of a physician. He pursued his medical studies with Dr. Henry I. Bowditch, of Boston, and at the Medical School at Pittsfield, Massachusetts, and the Harvard Medical School at Boston. In the autumn of 1847 he received the degree of M. D. from the latter school, and, after a year's service as house physician in the Massachusetts General Hospital, settled for the practice of his profession at West Needham, now Hellesley, Massachusetts. A year later he removed to Vineyard Haven (then called Holmes' Hole), on the Island of Martha's Vineyard. On November 4, 1853, he was married to Miss Octavia Avon Yale Norris, of that village. In 1857 Dr. Jones removed to Bangor, Penobscot county, Maine, and has ever since lived here, and has been actively engaged in professional work. In the years 1862, 1863, and 1866 he was City Physician of Bangor. In 1862 he was appointed an Examining Surgeon of Pensioners, being one of the first to receive such appointment, and since the organization of the Bangor Board of Examining Surgeons in 1870, he has been its President. In 1863 he received the appointment of Surgeon in the First Regiment of Infantry in the Maine State Guards. The Penobscot County Medical Association chose him as its President in February, 1867, and again in November, 1874. In 1874 he delivered the oration before the Maine Medical Association at its annual meeting at Portland. Dr. Jones has four sons living—Henry Champion, Gilbert Norris, Ralph Kneeland, Jr., and Eliot Norris. The first and oldest is at present (November, 1881) Assistant in Botany in Harvard University, Cambridge, Massachusetts.

Dr. Melvin Preble, of Bangor, is a son of Winn Preble, a native of Bowdoinham, Kennebec county, Maine. His mother's maiden name was Lucinda Williams, daughter of Samuel Williams, Esq. Winn Preble was in former years a merchant in Bangor, though now retired. He has six children living, viz: H. C. Preble, of Bangor; Edwin, of Garland; Melvin; Marilla M., wife of Henry A. Swett, of Gloucester, Massachusetts; Hiram J., of Bangor, an attorney of this city; and Lucinda W. They lost two in early life. Dr. Melvin Preble was born July 10, 1848. He attended the common and high-school at Garland, and then went to Massachusetts and attended the Medical Department of Harvard University for one year; then went to Brunswick, Maine, and attended the Maine Medical College, from which he was graduated in the class of 1866. After graduating he spent some time in the Medical Hospitals in Boston. He commenced the practice of medicine in California, where he went in 1866. On account of loss of health he returned to Maine and after recovering his health sufficiently he commenced practice again. Since then he has lived in Bangor and practiced his profession. The doctor enlisted in the First Maine Cavalry in 1864-65, and was detailed on special duty. First he was in the Commissary Department, and afterward Chief Clerk in the mustering office at Etrics, Virginia. During the summer of the year 1865 he was detailed, together with Sergeant Chandler and a Miss Truman, of the village, to open and teach a free school, for the benefit of the children and people of the place. This being a free school was largely attended and served to show that the Union soldiers and officers only wished the people well and desired to do them good. At the close of the term the teachers received the commendations of the officers of our army and the people of the town. The doctor was appointed as city physician during the years 1862 and 1863. This was the year that the small-pox raged here, and though the doctor was himself disabled and had to go on crutches from a broken leg caused by being caught in the falling wall of a burning building, he notwithstanding this managed to make as high as sixty calls a day and had excellent success. Dr. Preble is not married. He has a large practice and is successful in his calling.

Dr. Daniel W. Maxfield, a dentist of Bangor, was born December 15, 1835. He is a son of Andrew and Lavinia (McGrath) Maxfield. Andrew Maxfield was a native of Westbrook, formerly Falmouth, near Portland, Maine. He was a son of Daniel Maxfield. Lavinia McGrath was born in Bangor, as was also her mother and her grandmother. Andrew and Lavinia Maxfield had seven children, and Mr. Maxfield had three daughters by a previous marriage. The names of his children by his second wife were: Daniel W.; Joseph, deceased; Sarah, deceased; Joseph N., Frank C., both of last named now living in Bangor; Anna F., deceased; and Charles S., now in Bangor. Mr. Maxfield was a mason, and built the first house on Essex street above State. He came to Bangor in 1823. He was one of the first Abolitionists in the city. He died November 3, 1880. Mrs. Maxfield is still living, being seventy-three years of age. Daniel Maxfield, after receiving such an education as is to be obtained in the common and high schools of Bangor, entered the office of Dr. P. Evans, dentist, with whom he remained twelve years, learning the profession and practicing it under the direction of the Doctor. In 1875 he opened dental rooms for himself at 2½ Strickland's Block, where he has ever since been located. He married Addie M. Prince, daughter of Grant Prince, of Albany, Oxford county, Maine. They have two children living, viz: Hattie L. and Frederick E. The Doctor has served as Councilman in the City Government here.

Bertram Lewis Smith, Esq., a well-known attorney and counsellor-at-law in Bangor, is a native of Exeter, in this county, born November 20, 1857, oldest child of William and Rosina (Foss) Smith. His father was a farmer in Exeter. He was trained in the common schools of his native town, and at the Exeter High School, under private tutors at the Maine Central Institute at Pittsfield, and the Bloomfield Academy, where his classical and general education was completed at the age of seventeen. He had begun to teach in the country schools when he was only fifteen, and taught thenceforth every vacation until his own formal education was completed, and one final term after he left Bloomfield. The next spring, in 1875, he came to Bangor and began to read law with Judge Whiting S. Clark, a leading practitioner here then, and now in Des Moines, Iowa. He remained with Judge Clark during all his elementary professional course, and was admitted to the Bar at the August term, 1877, of the Supreme Judicial Court, sitting in Bangor, before he was twenty years of age. He began practice alone the next winter, in West Waterville, and remained there about fifteen months, or until the spring of 1879, when he was offered a very eligible partnership with General (now Governor) Harris M. Plaisted, and finally removed to Bangor. He was associated with General Plaisted and F. H. Appleton, Esq., in the preparation of the voluminous Digest of the Decisions of the Supreme Courts of Maine, which appeared under their names with his as associate compiler. The partnership of Plaisted & Smith was maintained with great success until May, 1881, when it was dissolved by reason of the senior partner's election as Governor of the State. He has since practiced alone, as successor to the firm of Plaisted & Smith. He was a member of the Common Council of the city during the official year 1880-81; has been Chairman of the Greenback County Committee during three campaigns and still holds that responsible position; and was a delegate from Maine to the National Greenback Convention of 1880, in Chicago, and represented the party of the State on the Committees on Permanent Organization and on Rules and Orders. In March, 1881, he was appointed by Governor Plaisted Reporter of Decisions in the Supreme Court; but the name was withdrawn some time afterwards, at the request of Mr. Smith. As yet but twenty-four years of age, in the prime of his young manhood, with many influential friends and the prestige of a successful career thus far, he has the promise of long and distinguished professional and general usefulness.

James Donigan was born in Boston, Massachusetts, March 15, 1848. His father, Thomas Donigan, had eight children, five sons and three daughters, seven of whom are still living, viz: Mary E., James W., Bernard E., Sarah A. (now Mrs. C. E. Lawrence, of Boston), Ella A. (now Mrs. Watkins, of Providence, Rhode Island), Thomas H., of Bangor, and Albert F., of Orono, Maine. James W. Donigan, the second of these sons, after completing the course of the graded schools of Oldtown, went to Lewiston, where he worked in the factories to obtain the means to attend the Maine State Seminary (now Bates College). He afterward attended the Maine Conference Seminary. He commenced the study of law in the County Clerk's office in 1869. In 1870 he entered the office of Charles A. Bailey, Esq., where he continued his studies, and was admitted to the Bar at the April term in 1872. Mr. Donigan has been a teacher for many years, both while pursuing his law studies and after his admission to the Bar. August 17, 1874, he was married to Miss Carrie A. Starrett, daughter of David J. Starrett, of Thomaston, Maine. They have one child—Cato M., now three years old. Mr. Donigan is at present located at No. 55 West Market Square.

D. M. Hall, editor and publisher of the Dirigo Rural, in Bangor, is a son of Daniel Hall, of Nobleboro, Lincoln county, Maine. His grandfather, also named Daniel, was a native of Jefferson, Lincoln county, Maine, though he lived principally in Nobleboro. Daniel Hall, 2d, father of the subject of this sketch, married Miss Lucinda Hall, daughter of Isaac Hall, and moved to Hermon in 1834, where he has since lived. Mr. and Mrs. Hall have had six children—Daniel M.; Lucinda S.; Isaac S., station agent at Maranocook, Maine; Olive T., deceased; George W., now in Minnesota, an attorney, graduate of Colby University, now admitted to practice in the United States Courts; and one that died in infancy. Mr. and Mrs. Hall are both living in Hermon, this county. Daniel M. Hall was born September 17, 1836, in Hermon. He spent his boyhood on the farm, receiving such an education as the common schools afforded. Desiring to get a better education as he grew older, he attended an academy and fitted himself for a teacher, which vocation he followed for several years during the winter, carrying on the farm during the rest of the year. For two seasons he was employed as a surveyor in Aroostook county. In 1874 he moved to Bangor and started the paper which he has since conducted—the Dirigo Rural. This is the only agricultural paper east of the Kennebec River, and, under the able management of Mr. Hall, is one of the best papers in the State. Mr. Hall married Miss Maria O. Pike, daughter of Silas S. Pike, of Carmel. They have had one son named Milton D., who is now deceased. Mr. Hall, while living in Hermon, served as Selectman and Superintending School Committeeman.

One of the oldest and most widely known business houses in Bangor is that of Wheelwright, Clark & Company. Mr. Joseph Wheelwright, the senior member of the firm, is a son of George Wheelwright, a native of Kennebunkport, Maine, who came to Bangor in 1834. He had three children, two sons and one daughter, viz: George A., now residing in Wells, Maine; Mary, wife of C. P. Felch, of Chicago, and Joseph. Mr. Wheelwright was for some years a Custom-house officer in Kennebunkport. Joseph Wheelwright was born April 18, 1821, in Kennebunkport, Maine. After receiving such an education as the common schools of that time gave, he came to Bangor and entered the employ of Thomas Furber as a clerk, remaining with him three years. Mr. Furber failed in business and Mr. Wheelwright bought out the business. Since that time Mr. Wheelwright has been in business here. In 1840 the style of the firm was George Wheelwright & Son, being then the only clothing house in the city. This was the year of the celebrated Aroostook war, and their entire stock of clothing was sold in one day. Mr. George Wheelwright died in 1845 and the business was continued by J. S. Wheelwright until 1850, when Mr. J. G. Clark was associated with him. In 1872 Mr. J. G. Blake and George Wheelwright were admitted as partners and the business has since been conducted under the present firm name. In 1859 they erected what then was and still is the most elegant store in the city, which they occupied for their large wholesale and retail business until 1878, when they removed to Phoenix Block, and now confine themselves to wholesaling exclusively. The sales of the house the first year were only $13,000, but have constantly increased until now their sales amount to nearly $500,000 per annum. Doubtless few persons in the city are aware how large and important a manufacturing establishment this has become. They now give employment to over two hundred persons. Mr. Wheelwright married for his first wife Miss Susan A. Webb, of Weymouth, Massachusetts. She died in 1876. By her he has three children, one son and two daughters, viz: George W., one of the firm; Ella, wife of H. A. Saxton, of Bangor; Carrie, now Mrs. H. E. Russegue of Framingham, Massachusetts. Mr. Wheelwright has been a member of the city government in both branches and twice, in 1872 and 1873, was the Mayor of the city. In 1874 he was sent as Representative to the Legislature, and in 1875 and 1876 was a member of the Senate. Mr. Clark, of this firm, is a native of Wells, Maine. He is a son of Thomas Clark; was born in 1829, and came to Bangor when a boy, and engaged as clerk with Mr. Wheelwright. He has been with him either as clerk or partner since that time. He married Hattie Brown, daughter of Joseph Brown. She died several years since, leaving one son, Lewis, now in Harvard College. Mr. Clark married for his second wife Miss Anna Clark, daughter of Isaac R. Clark of this city.

The firm of Leighton, Davenport & Co., gas-fitters, has been established under the present name but about four years. Mr. Leighton's father, Anson Leighton, came to Bangor in 1832. He was born at Falmouth, now Portland, March 2, 1812. His parents early moved to Norway, Maine, where his father died, leaving a widow and two children—Anson and Ichabod E. Anson lived from the time he was four years old until he was fourteen with a Mr. Gordon—including a few years with the Shaker family at Poland, Mr. Gordon being then connected with that family. He was afterwards apprenticed to a Mr. North, of Westbrook, where he learned the tinsmith's trade. On coming to Bangor he went to work for the well-known firm of Campbell & Mills, where he remained until 1834, when he formed a partnership with Mr. Charles H. Wing, under the firm name of Leighton & Wing. Their shop was at the east end of Central Bridge, then just built. Mr. Wing withdrew in 1837, and his brother, I. E. Leighton, became connected with him about one year. Mr. Leighton then remained alone until about 1840, when he removed to the present place of business, corner of Exchange and York streets. At that time he formed a partnership with Mr. Samuel Lunt, under the name of Lunt & Leighton. Mr. Lunt withdrew in 1847 and his brother again became connected with him, remaining until 1862, when he withdrew. Mr. Leighton carried on business alone until 1864, when he admitted to partnership Mr. G. A. Davenport, who had worked some years in the establishment, and his son, Horace W. This firm continued until the death of Mr. Leighton, December 5, 1877. He married Eleanor W. Saunders, daughter of John and Martha Saunders, of Bangor. She is still living. To this couple have been born four children—Mary J., now Mrs. George S. Chalmers; Maria L., wife of Mr. M. G. Trask; Martha L., deceased; and Horace W. Horace W. Leighton, youngest son of this family, is now a member of the firm carrying on the business at the old stand. He was born June 5, 1846, in Bangor, and has been engaged in the gas-fitting business since finishing his education.

Mr. George A. Davenport, of the present firm of Leighton, Davenport & Co., is a native of Hallowell, Maine. His father was a farmer and brickmaker, and George A. was brought up on the farm. At the age of eighteen he went to Hallowell, and learned the stove and tin plate business, remaining there four years. He came to Bangor in 1854, and went to work for Wood, Bishop & Co. for two years, and then went to work for Mr. Leighton. He has been ever since connected with the firm, being admitted as a partner in 1864. In 1878, on the death of Mr. Leighton, Mr. Manly G. Trask was taken in as a member of the firm, and so continues to this time. Mr. Davenport married Miss M. Louise Brown, daughter of Buckley Brown, of this city. They have five children—Etta L., Helen C., Lottie M., Albert H., and Mattie M. Mr. Davenport has been a member of the City Council.

Manly G. Trask, of the above firm, is a native of New Sharon. His father was a farmer, and Manly G. was brought up on the farm. On becoming of age, he came to Bangor, and engaged in the business of photography which he continued about twelve years. In 1870 he went into the hardware business, in which he continued until 1877, when he became a member of the firm of Leighton, Davenport & Co. Mr. Trask married Miss Maria L. Leighton, daughter of Anson Leighton, and has one daughter—Mattie L. Mr. Trask has been for several years connected with the City Government, having been three years a member of the Council, and two on the Board of Aldermen. When he was a member of the Council he was for two years President of that body.

The firm of N. H. Bragg & Sons, the well known iron and hardware dealers of Bangor, has been established under the present name since 1871. Norris H. Bragg is a native of Dixmont, in this county, where he was a blacksmith until 1854, when he came to Bangor and established the business as now conducted in company with Sumner Bassford. They continued in business until 1861, when Mr. Bassford went out and Mr. Bragg continued alone until 1866, when he admitted his son, Norris E., to a partnership. They continued until 1867, when Mr. Bragg died and Norris E. Bragg continued the business alone until 1871, when he took his brother into partnership and conducted the business under the old name by adding to the sign, making it N. H. Bragg & Sons, under which name it now stands. Norris H. Bragg married Sophia Crocker, daughter of Nathaniel Crocker, of Dixmont. As stated above, he died in 1867. Mrs. Bragg is still living. Their family consisted of two sons who grew up, viz: Norris E. and Charles F., the present members of the firm. Norris E. married Annie R. Tefft, daughter of Benjamin Tefft, of Brewer. They have two children—Norris F. and the baby, not named. Charles F. married Florence Wingate, daughter of William P. Wingate. They have two children living—Franklin E. and Agnes W. The place of business of this firm is at No. 4 Broad street.

The Neally family is of Scotch-Irish descent and traces its genealogy back to one Andrew Neally, who in 1730 objected to the hiring of a minister. They have a very complete chart of the family. Charles Neally, of Bangor, was born in Hampden and came here about 1836. He has always been engaged in the lumber and provision business, and is widely known over the lumber region of Maine. He married Angeline P. Cummings. Mrs. Neally died in 1856, and Mr. Neally married for his second wife Mrs. Sarah J. McGrath. Mr. Neally has three children, viz: Melvin, of Brewer; Herbert E., also of Brewer; and Edward R., of Bangor. Mr. Neally's place of business is 96 Exchange street.

Mr. Charles Hayward, head of the house of Charles Hayward & Co., wholesale dealers in flour, groceries, and provisions, 110-14 Exchange street, is a native of the Pine Tree State, born in Readfield, Kennebec county, April 7, 1812. At the age of twenty, on March 11, 1832, he reached Bangor and began at once as clerk in the retail grocery store of Mr. Stephen Goodhue; in about a year changed to the grocery store of Nathaniel Goodhue, and after two years with him to the similar establishment of Messrs. J. & J. True, at No. 50 West Market Square. After more than five years in their service he was admitted, in August, 1840, as a member of the firm, which then took the name of J. & J. True & Co. Three years afterward Mr. Jabez True was bought out by his partners, and the firm was changed to True & Hayward. Various other changes have occurred with the years. The latter became head of the house, then bearing the title of Hayward & Harris, in 1855. The latter went to Boston three years after, disposing of his interest to Mr. Hayward, who continued the business alone until October, 1860, when he received as partners one of his old clerks, Mr. George Varney, and also Mr. Charles V. Lord, when the house took the name it now bears, but with a somewhat different composition. Colonel Varney remains with the concern, but Mr. Lord's place has been taken since the war by Mr. Wilbur F. Brann. The business remained on West Market Square till the great fire of January 1, 1869, which completely destroyed the building (the individual property of Mr. Hayward) and very nearly all its contents, except the safe, books and papers of the firm. After temporary occupation elsewhere they removed to their present spacious and convenient quarters on Exchange street. Mr. Hayward has for thirty years been a trustee of the Bangor Savings Bank, and on the death of George W. Pickering, six years ago, he became its President. He has also been long associated in the management of the Kenduskeag National Bank. Although a consistent Whig and since Republican, he has always objected to office-seeking or office-holding; but in 1841-42 deemed it a duty to accept service as a member of the Common Council; in 1844 as member of the Board of Aldermen, declining an offered re-nomination; and in 1847 as Mayor of the city, serving one term, and again declining re-election. He was again in the Board of Aldermen, serving two years, 1871 and 1872, and has been Chief Engineer of the Fire Department, and in many minor positions of public trust. He has long been an attendant upon the Congregational church, but is not a member of any religious organization. He was married May 19, 1847, to Miss Amanda M. Leslie, of Bangor. They have three children—Charles Leslie, residing in Bangor; Olive M., now Mrs. Charles W. Rolfe, of Portland; and Laura M., now Mrs. William H. Murphy, of Detroit, Michigan.

Hon. John B. Foster, member of the firm of W. P. Hubbard & Co., commission merchants and flour, grain, and feed dealers at No. 8 Pickering Square, Bangor, is a native of Petersham, Massachusetts, born in June, 1819, and removed to Maine about 1836, when he was seventeen years old, to make his own way in the world. He engaged in a store in that part of the then Levant, now the site of Kenduskeag village, in this county, and remained there two or three years, when he removed to Bangor, where he has since been prominent in the business circles of the city. The various firms of which he has been a member were Foster & Upton, in which the late Elias A. Upton was a partner; Foster & Hayward, the junior member being J. T. K. Hayward, now of Hannibal, Missouri, where he has become eminent in railway and other business; J. B. Foster & Co., in which he was associated with Joseph W. Freese, since deceased; and finally is now in the firm of Messrs. W. P. Hubbard & Co. He served in 1870-71, as a State Senator from Penobscot county, and was President of that body the latter year. He had previously served in the lower House as a Representative from Bangor, for two years. In 1878 he was a member of the Executive Council of the State. He was the originator of the Bangor Merchants' Marine Insurance Company, and its President for several years. He was married about 1845, to Miss Catharine, daughter of Jacob McGaw, Esq., of Bangor, and has had three children, of whom two survive.

Messrs. Caldwell, Sweet & Bro., leading druggists of Bangor, at No. 2 Main street, have one of the newer establishments of the city, founded by the senior partner in January, 1875. He had been for a number of years a clerk in the city drug stores—first with B. F. Bradbury, and then with J. F. Patten. He and his brother are both natives of the city, sons of Abel S. and Abbie B. (Clark) Sweet, who had removed separately, while each was single, from Atkinson and Damariscotta, respectively, to Bangor, where they were married. Caldwell was prosperous in the business from the beginning. Starting with but a total capital of five hundred dollars, in partnership with N. S. Harlow, as Harlow & Sweet, in a drug-store just opposite his present place of business, he sold out his interest at the expiration of about two years, and engaged in the same line of trade under the old Harriman House, on Main street, since burned, where he had as a partner Mr. Isaiah S. Emery, the firm name being Sweet & Emery. They were burned out in December, 1874, which dissolved the partnership, Mr. Sweet taking the entire interest. The next month, as before stated, he started in alone, with a brand new concern, at No. 2 Main street. In March, 1877, he received into partnership his brother, Abel S. Sweet, Jr., who had had some experience with him in the business. Their trade has steadily increased, and they now have one of the finest drug-stores in Eastern Maine, with perhaps the largest prescription business in the city, and a very excellent general trade; they are also largely in the wholesale trade, commanding purchasers not only from the Penobscot, but the Piscataquis and Aroostook Valleys, and other parts of the State. Both are still young men in strong, energetic health of mind and body, and are bound to a prosperous future.

Messrs. Adams Bros., manufacturers of silk and stiff felt hats, and dealers in buffalo and fancy robes, hats, caps, and furnishing goods, at No. 5 Bowman's Block, Bangor, began with a new establishment in the Granite Block in 1869. The firm is composed of Nathaniel G. Adams and W. H. H. Adams, of an old Bangor family, and both natives of the city, sons of Ebenezer Adams, a prominent house-builder in his day, who constructed most of the leading business blocks in this city. He is still living at the venerable age of eighty-seven. W. H. H. Adams had been for some years engaged in similar business with Messrs. V. L. Catlin & Co., of Bangor, a firm now out of trade here. The new house formed by himself and brother prospered, and the business was gradually enlarged from its very small beginnings until, about two years after the opening, it was advisable to remove to a better stand and larger quarters on the Kenduskeag Bridge, where they have been doing a safe and active business during the last ten years. Its demands compelled them a few months ago to still further enlarge their store-room, and they now have one of the most spacious and elegant establishments of the kind in the city. Their manufacturing department is carried on in the same building, on the floor above their salesroom. For several years they have added to their business the manufacture of Odd Fellows' regalia, and are about to enter also upon the making of the elaborate and beautiful uniforms worn by the Order of Knights Templars.

The first representative of the Clayton family in this country was John Clayton, who came with Burgoyne's army, and was with it taken prisoner at the surrender of Yorktown. He had three sons—Jacob, John, and Bartholomew. Bartholomew Clayton, the youngest son, married Mary Tarr, of Salem, Maine. They had ten children, six sons and four daughters, all of whom lived to maturity except one. The names of the living are Charles, of Bangor, Maine; Matilda, now Mrs. G. Whitney, of Boston, Massachusetts; William Z., of Bangor; Rufus M., of Minnesota; Harriet, now Mrs. Chamberlin, of Massachusetts; Marietta, now Mrs. Davis, of Hyde Park, Massachusetts; Colmore P., of Minnesota. Edmund B., who died at Andersonville Prison, was a brother of those above named. Charles Clayton married Ellen Towne, of Vermont. Mr. Clayton settled in Bangor in 1870, having previously lived in Boston, Hartford, Chicago, and Philadelphia. On coming to Bangor he engaged in the leather belt business, which he has followed from boyhood. He makes all kinds of belts, together with all kinds of boot and shoe leather, his place of business being 46 Exchange street. He employs six hands on an average.

Timothy Sullivan is the son of Michael Sullivan, of County Cork, Ireland. He had five children, of whom Timothy is the second son. Timothy Sullivan was born in 1823 in the Parish of Milltown. He came to Bangor in 1844 and commenced life as a laborer; went to California in 1852, where he remained four years and a half, and, returning to Bangor in 1856, he engaged in the grocery and provision business, which he has since followed. In 1859 he married Julia O'Brien, from Cork, Ireland. They have three children—Michael, Nellie, and Mary, all of whom are living at home. His store is at 13 and 15 Exchange and Washington streets, Bangor.

F. C. Brackett is the son of John Brackett, who came here from Wolfboro, Massachusetts. He had seven children, three sons and four daughters, six of whom grew to maturity—Naomi, now Mrs. I. W. Grant, of Boston; Laura, now Mrs. P. B. Emerson, of Michigan; O. J., now of Nevada City, California; Rilla, now Mrs. G. A. Kerswell, of Boston; F. C.; Mary, deceased. Mr. F. C. Brackett was born in Hermon, Maine, July 26, 1853. On becoming of age he came to Bangor and engaged in the manufacture of beer and soda water, in which he continued until 1878, when he bought out the Bangor Ice Company, and has continued in the ice business ever since. In 1873 he married Lizzie Drinkwater, daughter of Jefferson Drinkwater, of Bangor. This family of Bracketts originally came from England. There were three brothers, who came over together. Mr. Brackett does the largest ice business of any firm in the city, supplying principally the local trade and shipping some to other places.

Charles Woodman, a man well-known in the business circles of this county, was born in Fryeburg, Maine. He was formerly a resident of Burlington, where he and his brother Andrew, now deceased, were the principal merchants for many years. Mr. Woodman has resided in Bangor during the past fifteen years and has been largely interested in the manufacture and sale of lumber. He is also interested in the timber lands of the State. Deacon Benjamin Woodman, father of Charles Woodman, was one of the earliest settlers of Burlington. He was noted for his honesty and integrity and for his zeal in building up Christian institutions.

The firm of Parker & Peaks, boot and shoe manufacturers, of Bangor, was established in 1867. They began business in a small way, but by close attention to their business, coupled with integrity and business ability have built up the largest boot and shoe manufactory in the city or in this part of the State. Their manufactory is located on Exchange street, Nos. 33 and 35. They now occupy a two-story building but are about to double their capacity by adding another story and basement to their establishment. They at present employ about one hundred hands and this year will manufacture about six thousand cases of boots and shoes. Their trade embraces all New England and most of the Western States.

One of the largest cloth and clothing houses in Bangor is that of Robinson & Arey. These gentlemen are well known to this vicinity, having both been with Wheelwright, Clark & Co. for many years. They bought out the retail and custom department of that firm in 1879 and now occupy the fine rooms on Taylor's corner, in the Wheelwright & Clark block. They occupy three stories of the building and employ from forty to fifty girls in the manufactory department. They carry a large stock of ready-made clothing and cloths. Both are young and energetic men and they are doing a large business in their line.

The firm of Fuller & Stanford, wholesale grocers, was formed in 1867. Mr. Fuller, the senior member of the firm, is a son of David Fuller, of Lewiston, formerly from Massachusetts, who married Sally Garcelon. They had ten children, five sons and five daughters, all of whom grew up to adult life. Mr. Fuller was a mechanic and farmer, and David, Jr., was brought up on the farm. He is the seventh child and fourth son of the family, and the only son living. He was born July 4, 1812. Mr. Fuller, on becoming of age, engaged in lumbering, farming, milling and mercantile business in Carmel, this county, where he lived until about 1854, when he came to Bangor and engaged in the hotel business in which he continued about four years. In 1858 he went into the lumber and wholesale grocery business with Mr. Hopkins. He also had as a partner Mr. Drummond, and for a time Mr. Hopkins. The present firm has continued since 1867. Mr. Gordon Stanford, the junior member of the firm, was born in Lyndon, Vermont, in 1844, and is a son of John Stanford. He came to Bangor in 1863 and engaged in the dry goods business which he continued until the present firm was formed in 1867. This firm handle groceries, flour, grain, etc. Mr. Fuller married Elvira Dennett, from Hallowell. They have one daughter, Augusta, wife of Mr. Stanford, his partner.

A. H. Merrill, proprietor of the Brownsville slate quarries, originally came from New Hampshire. He first settled in this State at Belfast. From Belfast he moved to Piscataquis county, where he has lived about sixty years. He married Persis Poor Greenleaf, daughter of Captain Eben Greenleaf, of Williamsburg, Maine. They have eleven children now living, having lost two. He has associated with him in the slate business four of his sons, viz: Adolphus, Frederick, Arthur, at the quarry, and Henry A., at Bangor. This quarry has been opened thirty-five years. They now employ from one hundred to one hundred and fifty men and are now putting in new machinery to develop another quarry which will another season employ at least fifty more men.

The firm of J. S. Ricker & Co., wholesale and retail crockery dealers at No. 3 Main street, Bangor, was formed in 1877. Mr. Ricker, the senior member of the firm, was born in New Portland, Maine. His father, Tobias W. Ricker, was a farmer, and married Martha D. Snow. They had five children, of whom Josiah is the second. He has one sister living, Mrs. Dunbar, of Cherryfield, Maine. Josiah S. Ricker was born June 8, 1826. He received a common school and academic education, and on beginning business life for himself came to Bangor and went into the dry-goods store of J. C. White & Co., on Main street. He remained with them six years, when, with E. P. Prince, he opened a crockery store on Main street. This firm continued about three years, when Mr. Ricker bought out Mr. Prince and continued the business alone until 1862, when he formed a partnership with Mr. R. Ireland. They remained together until 1869, when Mr. Ireland went West and Mr. Ricker did business alone until 1876, when a partnership was formed under the present firm name, Mr. E. Lyon being the junior partner. They do a very large business, both wholesale and retail. Mr. Ricker has been connected with the city government at different times. He married Miss Miranda B. Lyon, daughter of Judge Lyon, of Bangor, formerly of Waterville, Maine. They have no children. During the war Mr. Ricker was in the State service as captain of Company B, Maine State Guards, of the First Regiment Maine State Volunteers. He was for three months in the United States service with his company. Mr. Lyon, the junior partner, is a son of C. E. Lyon, of Bangor, a native of Waterville. C. E. Lyon is the well-known dry-goods man on Main street. He has three sons—Charles A., William R., and Edward E. Edward E., the youngest, was born July 9, 1853. He received a common and high-school education, and on becoming of age first engaged as clerk with George W. Ladd in the wholesale grocery business, where he remained seven years. In 1877 he formed the present partnership with Mr. Ricker. Mr. Lyon married Almeda C. Crosby, daughter of John H. Crosby, November 15, 1877. They have one son—Alpheus Crosby.

Mr. John S. Kimball, of the firm of John S. Kimball & Son, is a son of Stephen and Rebecca (Sawyer) Kimball, of Bangor. Stephen Kimball was a son of Jesse Kimball, of New Hampshire. Stephen Kimball came to Bangor in 1800. He was a house carpenter, and brought his tools in bags slung over his horse, coming through the woods from the Kennebec. He built the Judge Kinsley house in Hampden, still in existence. Mr. Kimball married Rebecca Sawyer, daughter of Rev. John Sawyer, who was so widely known here for many years. He was one of the founders of the Seminary here, and was widely known on account of the zeal he manifested in the upbuilding of educational and Christian institutions. Stephen and Rebecca Kimball had thirteen children. The names of those who grew up were Jackson S., Rebecca H., John S., Stephen J., and Charles P. All these are now deceased except Charles P., who is in California, and John S. Mr. Kimball was in trade here for many years. He died July 13, 1852, at the age of seventy-one. John S. Kimball was born July 21, 1813, in Bangor. He worked during his early life on the farm which his father owned near the city, though the family lived in town. On becoming of age he entered the store of N. G. Norcross, in Bangor, where he remained with Mr. Norcross, and afterward with Norcross & Mason until 1832, and afterwards clerked for Barker & Mills, and was engaged in business, closing out during the panic in 1836, and again clerking for several years. In 1850 he went to Boston and engaged with C. H. Ham & Co., lumber dealers, as bookkeeper, where he remained three years, when he came back to Bangor and engaged as clerk with Mr. J. B. Foster and continued in this position three years when he bought a half interest in the firm and it became J. B. Foster & Co. In 1858 he bought Mr. Foster's interest and continued the business until 1871, taking in his son as a partner. In 1871 he sold out and went into the insurance business, in which he is now engaged under the firm name of John S. Kimball & Son. His place of business is 128 Exchange street. Mr. Kimball married Miss Sarah S. French, who died in 1865. Mr. Kimball is now living with his third wife. His second wife was Abbie C. Scates, of Waterville, who died in 1870. His present wife's name was Mrs. Samanth I. Dadd. By his first wife he had four children, viz: John F., deceased; James F., now in Medway, Maine; Samuel S., with his father in Bangor, and Edwin, who died in infancy. By his second wife he had one son, Charles E., deceased.

One of the largest dry goods establishments in Bangor is that of E. C. Nichols. Mr. Nichols was born in Corinth, Maine, December 9, 1838. His parents, Humphrey and Marcia (Tyler) Nichols, had seven children, of whom E. C. is the fourth son. His father was a farmer and he spent his early life on the farm, receiving a common school and academic education. In 1857 he came to Bangor and entered the store of S. & J. Adams as clerk, where he remained one and one-half years, but his health failing he went out of the store and traveled through the country peddling goods. This he did not only as a business but to regain his health. After regaining his health he went to Lowell and entered into a machine shop, but not liking the business he remained but a short time. After this he taught school in Bradford. In 1859 he came back to Bangor and clerked for Silas S. Drew one year. He also worked for J. P. Bass one year and then went into business with J. T. Rines. This firm, under the name of Rines & Nichols, continued four years when Mr. Nichols sold out his interest and bought out A. Kirkpatrick & Co. He carried on business alone about four years, when, his health failing him again he went to New York and entered the Hygienic establishment, where he spent the winter. He liked the system so well that he went back and studied for the practice of medicine. His business needing the care of a competent man he took in Mr. Kirkpatrick and his brother, W. E. Nichols, as partners, while he remained in New York until business called him back here and forced him to remain and give up medicine. Mr. Nichols married Sarah Tyler for his first wife. She died in 1876 and he married Ellen Morrill. He has one daughter, June by name. Mr. Nichols employs about twenty-five hands most of the time. He manufactures largely and employs ten salesmen in his large store on Main street.

James D. Glynn, of the firm of Glynn & Reynolds, book and stationery dealers, is a son of John and Bridget (Fay) Glynn, both born in Ireland. They had nine children, of whom James D. is the oldest living. He was born November 11, 1855, in Bangor. His parents came here in 1840. After receiving a common school education in the schools of Bangor, James commenced life for himself in the store of D. Bugbee & Co., in this city, where he remained thirteen years. In July, 1881, he opened with Mr. Reynolds a wholesale and retail book and stationery store at 142 Exchange street. Mr. Glynn married Lena M. Lutz, daughter of Jacob J. Lutz, of this city. Mr. Glynn is a young man of ability and the firm is already doing a fair share of business in their line.

Mr. David Bugbee, senior member of the firm of David Bugbee & Co., booksellers, stationers and book binders, 5 Strickland's Block, was born in Pomfret, Vermont, and having become in different places master of the several branches of his trade as book-binder and blank book manufacturer, came to this city in June, 1836, and set up business in a chamber in Smith's Block, No. 17 Central street. The following year he moved to the ground floor, occupying the front for a stationery and book store on a small scale, and the rear for his bindery. He was the first to introduce here metallic pens, which were then coming into use and disputing the field with the old goose quill. He was also first to sell newspapers at his counter, and at one time was disposing of two or three hundred copies of the Boston Daily Mail. The original wooden block on Kenduskeag Bridge, on the site of that the firm is now in, was burnt in 1836; and when it was rebuilt, two or three years after, Mr. Bugbee moved into his present location in which his stock was a little watered by the great flood of 1846. In October, 1849, the entire block was destroyed by an incendiary fire, Mr. Bugbee losing everything in the store and bindery, amounting to $14,000, with only $4,000 insurance. Before the roof fell in he had secured a store in Phillips & Witherly's block on Exchange street, and in five days was restocked. The block was soon rebuilt and he moved back into it. In 1854 Mr. E. F. Dillingham, for seven years a clerk in the store, became a partner, forming the present firm. In 1870 they were again driven out by fire, which so far destroyed the block that it was remodeled and much improved, the firm in the meantime and until re-occupying, sojourning at No. 20 Main street. The stability and success of this establishment are due to those virtues of steadfastness, diligence and prudence, which have of late years been growing rare, and with what disastrous results are too apparent. The senior member commenced with nothing but his trade and his pluck has followed it without change, excepting enlargements from time to time, for forty-five years; always holding his business well in hand, and never being afflicted with ambition for a spread. Whether these qualities are worth anything, we leave the success of the establishment to speak for itself. The junior member has also been the "left bower" of the establishment.

Bangor can boast of having some first-class hotels. The Exchange, as kept by Smith & Thayer, is one of the best. This house, or a part of it, was built by Zadoc French in 1827. When completed it then seemed so large that it was called "French's Folly," for it was then thought to be by far too large for a town like Bangor. Since then it has been greatly enlarged from time to time, and is now often crowded to its utmost capacity. The house is owned by the estate of Abraham Woodard. Mr. Woodard kept the house for over thirty five years. After his death, in 1876, Mr. Smith managed it for the estate for three years, when it was leased to the present proprietors. Mr. Smith is a native of the State. His father, William Smith, was formerly of Exeter, and also lived in Waterville. He was a farmer, and spent his early life on the farm. He received such an education as the common schools afforded, and early began life as a clerk in a hotel at Orono. From Orono he went to Augusta and engaged as clerk in the Stanley House, where he remained till 1864, in which year he became connected with the Exchange as clerk for Mr. Woodard, remaining until the death of the latter in 1876. The management of the house was then placed in his hands until it was leased by himself and Mr. Thayer, in 1879. Mr. Smith married Miss Melvina Seidlinger, of Waldoboro. Their family consists of one son and one daughter.

Whitman M. Thayer is also a practical hotel man, having been for many years connected with the best hotels in other portions of the State. He was born in Sidney, Maine. His father's name was Barnabas Thayer. In early manhood he followed the carpenter trade for a time, and at one time was a butcher. He commenced his hotel life in the Franklin House, in Augusta, with a Mr. Longfellow. He finally sold out to Mr. Longfellow and leased the Kennebec House, which he kept four and one-half years, when it was burned. Mr. Thayer then went into the saloon business in Augusta, in which he continued about two years. In 1864 he bought the Mansion House, and kept it until 1877, when it was burned. He became connected with Mr. Smith and the Exchange in 1879. Mr. Thayer married Miss Sarah J. Reynolds, daughter of Milton Reynolds, of Sidney. They have one son and one daughter, both at home.

The firm of Dole & Fogg, as at present called, proprietors of the Bangor Planing and Moulding Mill, has been established about fifteen years under the present name, though Mr. John Dole had been for many years previous carrying on the business. John Dole was a native of Limerick, Maine. He came to Bangor in 1837, and remained here about ten years, then went to New Hampshire and lived eight years, coming back here again in 1855. The mill was built by Albert Dole in 1854. John bought out his brother and continued it until 1866, when Mr. Fogg was taken into the firm. Mr. Dole married Harriet Cook, of New Hampshire. They have two sons, George E. and William B., both with their father in the mill and office. Mr. Fogg also came here from Limerick about 1843. Since then he has lived here. This firm employs from thirty to forty men.

The Wiggin family originally came from New Hampshire. Andrew Wiggin, the father of Andrew Wiggin of Bangor, married Susan Dame of Durham, New Hampshire. They had two children, twins, born four months after Mr. Wiggin died. Mr. Wiggin had also by a former wife and three children. The name of Mr. Wiggin's twin sister was Susan. She married Jacob Frost of Gorham, Maine. Andrew Wiggin came to Bangor when a boy, in 1827. After learning his trade of carpenter and builder he began business for himself. In 1836 Mr. Wiggin married Elizabeth A. Dean, daughter of Colonel B. S. Dean, of Bangor. They have seven children now living, having lost one in infancy. Their names are Rudolph R. of Bangor; Sullivan B. of Ellsworth; Clara, now Mrs. Brooks of Portland, Maine; Susan D.; Andrew Jr., now with his father in business; Hannah E., now Mrs. Jewell of Portland, Maine; and Nettie C., now at home. Mr. Wiggin carries on quite a large business, employing from five to twenty men according to the season.

The largest factory for the manufacture and re-cutting of files in the State is that of Job Collett, on Exchange street, foot of York. Mr. Collett was born in Milksham, Wiltshire, England. His father, Thomas Collett, came to the United States when Job was a child. Thomas Collett and Jane (Marks) Collett had nine children of whom Job was the youngest. His father carried on the file business in Lowell, Massachusetts, and Job was early instructed in all the details of the business. His father came to Bangor to dispose of some files and was so well pleased with the opening for business here that he sent his son James here to open a shop. The shop was opened in 1844, and run by James until he was taken sick in the spring of 1845, when his father came to assist him. They then opened a hardware store in connection with their shop. James died the next year, 1846, and soon after Mr. Collett went to Connecticut, leaving Job to conduct the business here. Soon after this Mr. Woodbury was admitted to a partnership in both the hardware and file business. In 1852 Mr. Collett bought out Mr. Woodbury, and has since continued the file-making business alone, Mr. Woodbury continuing the hardware business. When this business was opened here it was thought that first-class goods in this line could be purchased only in England, but Mr. Collett has proved to the people using files that this was a mistake. His business has been constantly on the increase.

He at first only re-cut files, but in 1856 he began to make the "slim taper" saw file, a new pattern introduced by him. It is one of the most popular styles in the country. He now makes every description of file from the minutest, weighing only two ounces to the dozen, up to seventy-two pounds to the dozen. He now employs from eighteen to twenty hands, and makes about six thousand dozen files per year, which sell for $18,000. Through all the vicissitudes of business Mr. Collett has always been enabled to do a safe business and pay one hundred cents on the dollar. Mr. Collett looks after and superintends his own business instead of trusting it to others. He married for his first wife Miss Julia M. Leathers, daughter of Isaac Leathers. She died in 1852, and Mr. Collett married Miss Elizabeth A. Sawyer, of Newburg, for his second wife. He had one daughter by his first wife, Jennie M., deceased, and three children by his present wife, viz: Charles T., Carrie M., and Henry E.

Henry A. and Charles C. Wood were practical tin-plate and sheet-iron workers, and commenced the manufacture of tin and iron ware and selling stoves in Providence, Rhode Island, in 1835. They moved to Bangor in 1839, starting their business at No. 2 Mercantile Block, under the style of Henry A. Wood & Co., the firm continuing till 1851, when William H. Bishop, the foreman of their work-shop, became associated with them under the name of Wood, Bishop & Co. C. C. Wood retired from the firm in 1854 on account of ill health, and went West. V. S. Palmer then became a partner, but retired in 1855, when the firm name became Wood & Bishop, continuing such till 1864, when John F. Colby, their book-keeper and salesman, was admitted partner, and the firm again became Wood, Bishop & Co., which has continued unchanged since that time. Edwin Bishop, of Dover, Maine, became a partner in 1865, and retired in 1869, when Charles H., son of Henry A. Wood, was admitted. The firm now consists of Henry A. Wood, William H. Bishop, John F. Colby, and Charles H. Wood. The firm occupied the stores at the head of Mercantile Block until 1872, when they bought at public auction the store now occupied by them. In 1867 they bought of Messrs. Eastes & Whittier their foundry property, including patterns, tools and machinery, which they have much improved and enlarged, increasing its production three-fold over its former business. They employ about sixty men at the foundry and in the manufacture of tin and sheet iron ware. Their trade extends all over our State, and they sell largely in New Hampshire and Vermont. Camp cooking apparatus has long been a specialty, and there are few lumbermen in our whole country that cannot testify to the excellence of their wares and their adaptation to the purpose designed. They have orders for these goods from all the States where lumber is cut. Their stove trade has steadily increased from 1839—their foundry being exclusively devoted to this manufacture and wares appertaining to it—and they find it impossible to supply their orders. Their stoves have heretofore been designed for burning wood, but as this is becoming exhausted and coal is taking its place, they are adapting their manufacture to the change, and are producing new and beautiful styles of cooking, office, parlor and other stoves for burning coal.

The history of Morse & Co.'s mills goes back into the last century. William Hammond and John Smart built a saw-mill on the site in 1795. [A saw-mill is said to have been built some years before by William Potter at the falls near "Lover's Leap."] This subsequently, and probably, directly passed into the hands of William and Charles Rice and Obed Haynes, the latter probably building the grist-mill, as it was known as "Haynes's Mill." These parties in 1812 sold a portion of the privilege to John Holt, of Hampden, for a fulling and carding mill, from whom to Morse & Co., it came successively through Allen Clark, Mr. Hodgman, and E. O. Pendleton. John Pearson became the proprietor, excepting the fulling and carding mills, in 1814, when they were known as "Pearson's Mills." In 1832 Captain Jacob Drummond came to this city, buying in and continuing in partnership with Pearson till 1851, when he bought out Pearson, the mills then becoming known as "Drummond's Mills." Deacon Alexander Drummond carried on the grist and plaster mills for many years for the proprietors, and Jacob, before his death, gave him one-fourth of the property. Jacob Drummond was Mayor in 1844, and died in 1852. L. J. Morse and H. P. Oliver carried on the saw-mill under lease from the Drummond heirs several years previous to 1858, and from 1858 to 1866, the same, associated with Frank Hight, (Morse & Co.) run the mills in the same manner. In 1856 a steam engine was put into the grist-mill, and in 1858 the old saw-mill was torn down and rebuilt and steam power put in. In 1860 Morse & Co. purchased the McQuesten mill, near Lover's Leap, built by John Webster, and in 1864 put in their salt works there. They had carried on this mill several years previous to 1860 on lease. In 1866 Morse & Co. took Orin Oliver and Ralph W. Morse into the firm, and bought out the Drummond heirs. E. O. Pendleton also joined the firm at the same time with his carding-mill interest, which he sold to the concern in 1873, since which time he has leased the same. Ralph W. Morse died in 1870, and Walter L., son of L. J. Morse, entered the firm in 1874. Upon buying out the Drummond heirs they tore out the old grist-mill and rebuilt it, putting in a larger engine to run it, and to afford power for various mechanical industries occupying the block, among which are the furniture manufactories of G. W. Merrill & Co., Webb & Nason, axe and shave factory, and E. H. Tibbetts, coffin-maker. By successive purchases they have acquired the title to all the shore property about their mills, extending to Meadow Brook on the mill side, and much of the opposite shore, affording ample room for present and prospective needs. Their mills are thoroughly fitted up, and have surplus power and accommodations for additional industries. They use steam-power supplementary to their water-power. No logs now come down the Kenduskeag Stream to either of their saw-mills. The upper mill opposite "Lover's Leap," which manufactures salt, salt boxes, and shingles, receives its stock of lumber—poplar, bass, and spruce—in the winter season by land transportation; and the lower saw-mills are supplied with logs coming down the Penobscot River and rafted up the stream to their mills, where they are taken up over the dam by machinery and stored in the mill-pond. The salt manufactured at their works is of excellent quality and is rapidly extending its sale, having the whole market at the north, and finding its way to some of the border Provincial towns, and reaching into the western portion of the State. Of the seventy-five thousand bushels of salt received at this port the past year, they imported about forty thousand. The last year's product of their salt-mill was one hundred and forty thousand boxes of the several sizes, equal to one hundred and fourteen thousand boxes of twenty pounds each; while the plaster-mill annually produces from two thousand to three thousand tons. During the summer season they employ from sixty to seventy men, and probably half this number in the winter when their saw-mills are shut down. This firm also has an interest in the Bangor Foundry & Machine Company, and a half interest in the firm of A. H. Thaxter & Company, Exchange street, the heaviest house in the city in corn, and dealers also in flour and shorts. The trade in this city and vicinity is largely supplied with meal ground at their mill. For enterprise this firm is second to none, as is apparent in the enlargement of their business as indicated above, the senior members having grown up in the establishment and being identified with it by hard labor and sagacious management.

B. N. Thoms, one of the oldest carriage manufacturers in Maine, was born January 5, 1816, in Falmouth, Maine, though his parents soon moved to Portland. He is a son of Benjamin and Sarah Thoms (nee Sarah Lunt). They had ten children, all of whom except one lived to maturity. Benjamin N. is the fourth child and third son of this family. At the age of seventeen he commenced to learn his trade with Moses & Freeman, of Portland, where he worked two years, when he entered the factory of Stevens & Emerson, who manufactured carriages exclusively, with whom he remained about two years, when he went to Augusta, Maine, and entered the employ of E. G. & J. P. Wyman. He remained in Augusta seven years, during the first of which he worked for the Wymans, but in 1839 he bought out E. G. Wyman and became a partner in the firm under the name of Wyman & Thoms. He came to Bangor in 1845, and engaged in carriage blacksmithing, in which he continued about seven years. In 1852 he opened a carriage manufactory in connection, so that since then he has been engaged in the manufacture of all kinds of carriages. He married Lydia P. Wharff, daughter of Isaac B. Wharff, of Guilford, Maine. To this couple have been born eight children, only three of whom are living. The names of the living are Helen A., now Mrs. Whitman, of Bangor; Charles F., who also lives here and works with his father and brother in the factory; and Henry B., who is in company with his father in the business. Their factory is located on Harlon street, Bangor, where they employ from ten to fifteen men. Mr. Thoms has been one of the Council from his ward, and is well and favorably known as a fine business man.

The firm of Dole Brothers, of Bangor, consisting of the two brothers, M. B. and J. Albert, was formed in 1865. Their father, Albert Dole, was a native of Limerick, Maine; he moved to Bangor in 1832. He had four sons and three daughters, viz: Albert Henry, Sarah F., and Mary Elizabeth (all of whom are now deceased); William B., of this town; J. Albert, also of Bangor; Olive M., now Mrs. Horatio Blood, of this city, and John Henry, also in the city. J. Albert Dole married Miss Emma H. Drummond. They have one daughter, Miriam. William B. Dole married Mary Wyman Leighton, of Portland, Maine. They have one son, Arthur W. The Dole Brothers have large furniture warerooms on Hammond street. They manufacture much of their furniture, employing about eighteen men the most of the year. They manufacture the Dirigo School Desk and Folding Seat, which they invented and patented. This is one of the oldest enterprises of the city. It was founded by Edmund Dole in 1810, and is now in the hands of the third generation. It is one of the most complete establishments in the State. J. Albert was first lieutenant in the First Maine Heavy Artillery during the civil war.

Jonathan F. Parkhurst is the son of Hale Parkhurst, of Unity, Waldo county, Maine. Hale Parkhurst had seven children, three by his first wife and four by his second, Jonathan being the oldest son of the family. He was born February 27, 1829, in Unity, Waldo county. On becoming of age he went to California and remained two years. He then came back and bought cattle in Missouri and Arkansas and drove them to California, continuing at this business two years. He then came home and went into trade in Unity Village, Maine, also having stores in China and Freedom. He came to Bangor in 1866 and started the saddlery business, continuing one year, and then opened in connection with this the trunk business, in which he is still engaged. He has the largest trunk factory in Maine. His place of business is No. 20 Central street, where he has a large and well-filled store. He married Mary Fowler, of Unity. Mrs. Parkhurst died, and Mr. Parkhurst married for his second wife Susan A. Haskell, of Knox, Maine. He has three children, two girls and one boy, viz: Mary L., Fred H., and Esther B.

One of the prominent photographers in Bangor is Mr. F. C. Weston, who came to this city in 1868 and engaged in business. His father, Wesley C. Weston, was a native of East Corinth and had two children, F. C. and Sanford. Mr. Weston has a fine suite of rooms in the business part of the city, located at No. 2 Smith Block. He married Miss Nellie E. Simpson, of Hudson, New Hampshire. They have no children. Mr. Weston is well supplied with all the requisites for first-class work.

William I. Currier, the senior member of the firm of Currier & Hook, has lived in Bangor over forty years and is well known. He has been in the business of sail-making for many years. In 1864 Mr. George Hook came in as a partner. They deal also in flags, cordage, and sail-makers' stock. They employ from six to ten hands on an average. They do quite a business in selling material, as well as in the manufactured article.

Mr. M. Gilligan came to this country when about twelve years of age. His father, Peter Gilligan, of Ireland, had three children, Michael, William, and Laughlin. Michael learned the tailor's trade and in 1834 began business for himself in Bangor. He continued this business until 1862 when he sold out and went into the army as a sutler with the First Maine Heavy Artillery, and continued till the close of the war. At the close of the war he came back to Bangor, where he had always had a house and property, and engaged in commercial business, continuing wholly in this until 1876, when he opened his select family boarding-house on Hammond street, which he still manages. In connection with this he is in the employ of the Sanford Steamship Company. He married for his first wife Mary J. Lord, a daughter of William Lord, of Portland, Maine. He had five children by her, all of whom are deceased. Mrs. Gilligan died in 1864. Mrs. Gilligan married for his second wife Georgiana Washburn, of Saco.

Pierre McConville was born in Carlisle, England. His father, James McConville, had six children, of whom Pierre is the eldest. Mr. McConville came to this country in 1869, locating in Philadelphia where he remained until 1853, when he came to Bangor, and on his becoming of age engaged in his present business of shipping and commission merchant and ship broker. His office is at 28 Exchange street, Bangor. He married for his first wife Mary A. Halliburton, of Hampden, who died in 1866. Mr. McConville married for his second wife Clara E. Dudley, daughter of John Dudley, Esq., of Hampden. He has one child by his first wife, and one by his second, viz: Lillie H. and Bessie D., now at home. Mr. McConville has served as Justice of the Peace and Notary Public. He was the first President and one of the originators of the Young Men's Christian Association of this city, which was organized last January.

D. M. Clark is the son of Edwin Clark, who was born in New Bedford, Massachusetts. Edwin Clark married Mary McRuer, daughter of Dr. Daniel McRuer, of Bangor. They had three children, two sons and one daughter—Ardelia B., deceased, wife of Colonel A. B. Farnham, of Bangor; Daniel M., and Donald C., of this city. Daniel M. was born August 10, 1851, in Bangor, where he has always since lived. He is now and has been for four years engaged in the livery business, his stable being located on French street. He has a large stable and keeps sixteen horses with first-class carriages.

John A. Kelley first came to Bangor in 1846 from Boston. Mr. Kelley's father, Patrick Kelley, never came to this country. He had six children, of whom John is the youngest. John was born in 1827 and came to this country in 1845, locating first in Boston as a journeyman tailor. Here he lived till 1846, when he came to Bangor. Since then he has lived twelve years in Oldtown. His present place of business is at 73 Exchange street, where he has a good store and employs several men and about twenty-five women.

One of the fine places of business in Bangor is the wholesale and retail establishment of W. S. Nickerson.

Mr. Nickerson was born November 30, 1847. His father, Elijah N. Nickerson, had five children, two sons and three daughters—Sarah L., now deceased; Annie, now Mrs. A. W. Pitman, of Bangor; W. S.; I. L., now of Denver, Colorado, and Lydia F., in Boston. Mr. Nickerson has always lived in Bangor, commencing as clerk in the store he now occupies, with Blood & Rowe, in 1865. The firm finally dissolved and Mr. Rowe continued the business until 1879, when Mr. Nickerson purchased his interest, in which business he has since continued. His store is located at 121 Exchange street. Mr. Nickerson married Miss Addie F. Milliken, daughter of Joseph Milliken, of Bangor. Mrs. Nickerson died in December, 1880. Mr. Nickerson has two daughters—Nellie M. and Josie M.

The senior member of the firm of Charles York & Co., meat, fish, and grocery dealers, Mr. Perley G. York, was born in Standish, Maine. He married Elizabeth A. Mitchell, of Monroe, Maine. They have three children, two sons and one daughter—Charles, of Bangor; Ida M., now Mrs. James Milliken, of Bangor; Albert H., who lives with his father. Charles York, who has the entire charge of the business in Bangor, married Miss Annie B. Treat, daughter of Robert and Amanda Treat, of Hudson, Maine. They have no children. Mr. York came to Bangor in 1861, and engaged in farming, which he followed three years. He then went into a hotel, the Broadway House, in which he continued until 1868, when he went into the meat and provision business, in which he has since continued, having associated with him his son Charles. Their place of business is at Nos. 9 and 11 Granite Block, East Market Square, where they have one of the largest and best stocked places of this kind in the city, and are doing a large business in their line. They have recently enlarged their business by adding a large cold air blast refrigerator, the largest this side of Boston used in the retail business.

The branch of the Lincoln family of which Matthew Lincoln is a descendant, sprang from Stephen Lincoln, who came to this country in 1638. Matthew Lincoln's grandfather, Matthew Lincoln, was a native of Hingham, Massachusetts. His father, Isaiah Lincoln, was born in Sidney, Maine, and removed to Corinna in 1815, where he died in 1872. Matthew Lincoln was born November 18, 1821, in Corinna, where he lived until 1854, engaged in milling and merchandising. He came to Bangor in 1854 and engaged in the lumber business, in which he has since continued. He married Elizabeth Hanson, of Palmyra, Maine. They have one son now living, having lost one. Mr. Lincoln is largely interested in real estate in the city of Bangor. He has in his possession an heirloom of the family, a Bible, printed in 1599, printed twenty-one years before the King James revision.

The firm of Lowell & Tibbetts, house carpenters and builders, was formed in 1876. G. F. Lowell was born in North Bucksport, Maine, December 6, 1833. He settled in Bangor in 1861, where he has since lived. He married Susan M. Stubbs, of North Bucksport. They have three children, viz: Ida N., Gracie G., and Lena N. Mr. A. F. Tibbetts was born in New Sharon, Maine, March 25, 1829, and settled in Bangor in 1853. He married Sarah Tracy, daughter of Samuel Tracy, of West Gouldsburo. They have seven children—five daughters and two sons. This firm employs about twenty-five men, and do a larger business than any other firm in the city.

The firm of E. H. & H. Rollins do a general planing business, and manufacture moldings and gutters at their mill in Brewer. The senior member of the firm, Edmund H. Rollins, is now deceased, but Henry continues the business under the old firm name. They came originally from New Hampshire in 1849, and first engaged in trade in which they continued for fifteen years. In 1862 they built the mill on the Kenduskeag, which they ran until 1870. In 1869 they built their mill in Brewer, where we now find H. Rollins & Son. They employ about twenty-five men, and do all kinds of work in their line. It is a well arranged mill, and one of the prominent establishments in Brewer.

Archibald L. Boyd, of the firm of A. L. Boyd & Son, was born in Bristol, Maine, August 30, 1827. His father, James Boyd, was a farmer. He married Sarah Chamberlain, by whom he had six children—four sons and two daughters, viz: Elizabeth, deceased; John, deceased; Caroline, deceased wife of Captain Henry Treat, of Bangor; James H., now in Kingman, Maine; Archibald L.; and Rodney, who follows the sea. Mr. Boyd died in 1857. His wife died in 1871. Archibald L. Boyd was raised on the farm, and on becoming of age, or rather at the age of twenty, went into the tin plate trade in Bangor, and worked with Henry Call and Leighton Brothers. Afterwards he worked at the trade in Machias and Boston. In 1851 he came back to Bangor and engaged in the fruit and confectionery business with his brother Rodney. Their first place of business was in the old market building. There they remained until 1854, when they moved to No. 6 Hammond street. In 1875 they moved to their present place, at No. 11 West Market Square. They keep a large and well selected stock in their line. In 1876 Mr. Rodney Boyd went out, and Mr. A. Boyd took in his son as partner. Mr. A. Boyd married Martha J. Eustis, daughter of Captain Joseph Eustis, of Bangor. Their family consists of five sons—Joseph F., in company with his father, James H., Archibald W., George E., in Boston, and Edward F.

Mr. C. G. Sterns, of Bangor, the well-known lumber dealer, is a son of Samuel and Emma (Johnson) Sterns, of Brookline, Massachusetts. He went to Brewer in 1809 and built mills there. For many years he carried on a large business there at tanning and currying, boot and shoemaking, ship-building, lumbering, and general merchandising. He had ten children, of whom five are living, viz: Clara R., now Mrs. B. Goodwin; Eliza A., widow of the late Benjamin F. Fowls, of Brewer; Hannah, wife of Willis Patten, of Brewer; Mary M., wife of O. H. Herriman, of Brewer; and Charles G., the latter of whom was born April 13, 1812. He learned the tanner's trade and sawed lumber in his father's mill in Brewer. In 1840 he went into company with his father, who died in 1841, and he carried on the business alone until 1848, when Deacon Daniel Sargent, second, became partner with him under the firm name of C. G. Sterns & Co., which afterwards became Sargent & Sterns. In 1864 they dissolved, Mr. Sargent taking the Brewer Village mill and Mr. Sterns the Roberts steam saw-mill at East Hampden, which the firm had purchased in 1863. About this time Mr. Sterns established his office in this city, and in 1865 moved here. In 1866 the present firm of C. G. Sterns & Co. was formed, consisting of Mr. Sterns, his two sons Samuel and Ezra L., and Mr. E. Wheelden, all practical lumber men. Their mills are located at Turtle Head, about three miles below Bangor, where Mr. Thomas Egery built a steam mill in 1836. This was purchased by Mr. Roberts and Hinckley & Egery in 1854, who improved it and erected by its side another and larger mill. The present firm have improved both, increasing their capacity and expending on them $30,000. Seventy-five men are employed about these mills. They produce from twelve to fifteen million feet of long lumber, seven million lath, six hundred thousand staves, besides clapboards, etc. Their principal market is in New York and Philadelphia. The firm lumber largely, cutting about two-thirds of their logs. Mr. Sterns married Margaret L. Lunt, daughter of Deacon Ezra Lunt, of Newburyport, Massachusetts. Two of his sons, Ezra L. and Samuel, are in business with him.

Among the first settlers of Penobscot county was Jonathan Pickard, from Rowley, Massachusetts, of English descent. His wife was Mary Killburn. He first purchased land on the banks of the Penobscot River, what is now known as Hampden lower corner. Entering into the lumber business, he purchased land heavily timbered in that section of the town now known as West Hampden, and there made his home. This homestead was retained in the Pickard family until 1878. After some years in the above business he engaged in farming. His family consisted of six sons and one daughter. Jonathan, the eldest son, settled in Newburg and followed the occupation of farming; Ephraim, in Hampden, also a farmer; Joseph, settled in Freedom as a merchant; Thomas and Joshua, in Belfast, also merchants. Thomas was for many years owner and proprietor of the Commercial House. Mary, the daughter, married Thomas Taylor and settled in Hermon. Daniel remained on the homestead, his father and mother residing with him, both living to a good old age. He was one of the founders of the Baptist church at West Hampden, and for many years, and at the time of his death, was a deacon in the same, and one of its most generous and earnest supporters. He married Anne Whitney. They had seven children, only one of whom is now living—Edmund, the youngest, who resides in West Hampden. The homestead passed into the hands of the second son, Amos Pickard, who made it his home until 1866. He married Sarah J. Carter. During his residence in Hampden he held the various town offices of trust and responsibility. He was a member of the Maine House of Representatives in 1848 and 1860; a member of the Maine Senate in 1849 and in 1850. He also occupied the responsible place of Clerk of the Committee on Finance and Appropriations of the United States Senate from 1861 to 1872, inclusive. In 1867 Mr. Pickard moved to Bangor, making that city his home, where he was held an honored and valued citizen. He was elected Representative from that city to the Maine Legislature in 1879. He died April 6, 1880, leaving two children, a son and a daughter.

Professor Daniel Smith Talcott, D. D., of the Bangor Theological Seminary, was born March 7, 1813, in Newburyport, Massachusetts. His father, Daniel Smith, was a native of Hartford, Connecticut. (The name Smith being so common, the Professor, by act of Legislature in 1863, took the name Daniel Smith Talcott, Talcott being an old family name.) Daniel Smith was a druggist by trade and spent his business life in Newburyport. He married Abigail Jewett. Their family consisted of four children, who grew up. Their names were Daniel; Abbie, married Rev. D. A. Wasson, of West Medford; Elizabeth, married Henry H. Hall, of Santa Barbara, California; and Caroline, deceased wife of William A. Kimball, of Lawrence, Massachusetts. Mr. Smith died in 1877 aged ninety years. Mrs. Smith died in 1866. Daniel T., the subject of this sketch, received his collegiate education at Amherst College, from which he graduated in 1831, and Andover Theological Seminary, from which he was graduated in 1834. From 1833 to 1836 he was instructor in Hebrew at Andover, and pastor at Sherburne, Massachusetts, from 1836 to 1838. He became Professor of Sacred Literature in Bangor Theological Seminary in 1839. On account of failing health he was obliged to resign his chair in 1881. He received the degree of Doctor of Divinity in 1853 from Colby University, and subsequently from Bowdoin College. He was married in 1840 to Sophia Hammond Brown, daughter of Deacon George W. and Sophia Hammond Brown. Mrs. Talcott died in 1866. Their family consists of three children—Frances Sophia, Elizabeth Smith, and Rowland Mather, all unmarried.

Isaac Arthur Hatch was born in Horton, Nova Scotia, August 23, 1819, and removed to Bangor, Maine, when about six years of age, his father's family being among the first settlers and most prominent families in Bangor. His mother was from an English family and a lady of great refinement. Young Hatch was educated in the public and private schools of Bangor, and with the exception of a year in a counting-house in Boston, resided in Bangor until the year 1860. From seventeen until twenty years of age he was clerk in one of the principal dry goods stores in the city. At twenty he became a member of the firm of Reed & Hatch, afterwards Hatch, Thompson & Co., and then I. A. Hatch & Co., for nearly twenty years doing a large and successful business. In this place he was Vice-President of the Young Men's Bible Society 1843-48, and President in 1849-51; was Scribe of the Hammond Street Congregational church 1847-48; and Secretary of the Sabbath-school of that church in 1850. In 1860 he removed to Boston and was associated with the large dry goods house of Palmer, Waterman & Hatch. After a successful business, and at the expiration of the company partnership in 1868, he retired from the retail trade, and invested in the manufacture of hosiery and fancy woolen goods, and is at the present time largely interested in the production of these goods, and in the woolen commission business in Boston, under the firm name of I. A. Hatch & Co. In 1844 Mr. Hatch was married to Miss Elizabeth Parsons Chandler, of Newburyport, Massachusetts, a lady of great culture and refinement. She died in November, 1857, leaving two daughters, Laura Elizabeth, now the wife of S. F. Wilkins, Esq., of Boston, and the authoress of two popular Sabbath-school books. The second daughter, Ida Annette, a very promising and beautiful girl, died suddenly in March, 1875, aged nineteen years. In 1860 Mr. Hatch married Miss Harriet S. Jenkins, daughter of the Hon. John Jenkins, of Falmouth, Massachusetts. Mr. Hatch's residence is now at Newton, Massachusetts. He was an active member of the Hammond Street church, Bangor, from 1846. In 1853 he transferred his relation to the Central church, Bangor, and for several years was Superintendent of the Sabbath-school. In Boston he was member of the Shawmut Congregational church. In 1867, when he exchanged his residence to Newton, Massachusetts, he united with the Elliott Congregational church.

Reuben S. Prescott, of Bangor, was born November 8, 1805, in Northwood, New Hampshire. His father was Josiah Prescott, a farmer, a descendant of James Prescott, who came from England and settled at what is now Hampton Falls, New Hampshire. He was of the great family of Prescott to which William H. Prescott, the historian, belonged. At the age of thirteen he became an assistant and clerk in a store, where he continued until he came to Maine in 1826. In 1827 he established himself in Exeter, in this county, where he remained until 1833, when he removed to Bangor, where he has since resided. While in Exeter he was elected Town Clerk, and represented the class one year in the Legislature. The year after his removal to Bangor the town was converted into a city, with that important appendage, a municipal court. Of this court he was appointed Recorder, an office to which he was well adapted, although not a lawyer. He was in the office five years and performed its duties very satisfactorily. Mr. Prescott's business has been that of an auctioneer and commission merchant. In it he has been successful. In all his business he inspired such general confidence that has been placed in many positions of trust, where integrity, business capacity, and sound judgment were required. He was for about twelve years an assessor of taxes in Bangor; was Assistant Land Agent of the State; was Public Administrator of the county; and was Commissioner on the State Valuation in 1860 and 1870. He has been more frequently selected as an appraiser of large estates than any other person in the county, as the probate records of the last quarter of a century indicate; and his services have been in demand not only in his own county but elsewhere in the State and out of the State—in Portland, Augusta, Rockland, Saco, Concord, New Hampshire, and many other places—to appraise furniture in hotels, on a change of landlords or proprietors, and other property. He has held the office of Justice of the Peace and Quorum more than fifty years, and was President of the Bangor Board of Trade from January, 1873, to January, 1881, when his resignation in the previous October was accepted. From the fact that Mr. Prescott was earning his livelihood at so early an age as thirteen, with strangers, his school advantages must have been limited, yet he found time to qualify himself for a successful business career. Always interested for the prosperity of his neighbors and the community, he has favored all movements tending thereto. Disliking litigation he has frequently used his good offices to prevent it, and thereby has been the means of saving useless expenditures, and perpetuating friendships. He has applied himself, always successfully, to accomplish what he has undertaken, and is a fine specimen of a self-made, self-reliant American citizen.

Elnathan Freeman Duren (popularly known as "Deacon Duren"), son of Elnathan Duren, of French descent, and Elizabeth Freeman, of English origin, was born in Boston, January 14, 1814. He resided in Boston and Billerica, Massachusetts, six years; in Cornish, New Hampshire, four years; at Portland, Maine, from 1824, with his grandfather, Hon. Samuel Freeman, and, after graduating at the high school, entered as clerk in the book-store of William Hyde, going with him to Boston, 1831-33. August, 1834, he established himself as a book-seller and publisher in Bangor, which has been his residence to the present time, except in 1846-48, when he was connected with the publishing house of Hyde, Lord & Duren, in Portland. He has been called to various positions of trust and labor in religious, benevolent, and other associations—among them the office of Scribe and Deacon of the Hammond Street Church, Bangor from 1840; Secretary, 1836-49, and 1852-59; and Superintendent, 1842-45, and 1863-71, of the Sabbath School; Secretary and Chairman of the Committee of Publication of the General Conference of Maine, from 1855; Secretary of the Penobscot Musical Association, from its organization in 1848 to this time; and Secretary of the Bangor Historical Society, from its organization in 1864, etc. He was married in 1836, May 30, to Mary Clark Hyde, daughter of William Hyde, of Portland. Their children are Freeman Hyde, William Griffin, and Charles M. Duren.

George M. Fletcher, the well-known marble dealer, of the firm of Fletcher & Butterfield, of Bangor, was born in Wilton, Maine, May 17, 1841. He is a son of David and Sarah (Stickney) Fletcher. David Fletcher was a native of Wilton. He had six children—Lizzie A., widow of the late Gilbert L. Heald, of Wilton; Lucy C., married John D. Hardy, of Wilton; George M.; Abbie J., wife of Morrill N. Young, of Nashua, New Hampshire; Mary C. married Dr. A. D. Adams, of Wilton, and Walter B. Mr. Fletcher died May 26, 1876. Mrs. Fletcher is living. George M. Fletcher attended school winters, and finally attended an academy for a time. He taught school for several winters. In 1863 he enlisted and remained in the army until the close of the war. In 1866 he returned to Wilton and traveled for a season for Hiram Holt & Co., scythe manufacturers. In 1867 he came to Bangor and engaged with M. S. P. Bradbury, marble dealer, as traveling salesman. He remained with Mr. Bradbury for nine years and in 1876 he bought the establishment and took in as a partner Mr. Benjamin F. Butterfield. They have since continued the business under the title of Fletcher & Butterfield. This firm have a branch shop at Dover in this State. They usually employ twelve men and do all kinds of work in their line at their large shop on East Market Square. Mr. Fletcher married Miss Ella A. Butterfield, daughter of Samuel and Betsey Butterfield. They have five children—Alice M., Fannie M., Gilbert F., Flora B., and George W.

A. W. Dudley, the well-known dairyman and farmer of Bangor, was born in Chesterville, Franklin county, Maine, January 4, 1830. His father, Joseph Dudley, married Ruth Davis, of Readfield. They had five children—Mary Jane, wife of L. B. Greene, of Auburn; Susanna, deceased; Juliette, deceased; Albion W. and Octavia, deceased. Mr. Dudley was a farmer all his life. He moved into Bangor in 1835 and settled in the neighborhood called Sherburn District. Here he lived until his death in 1875. Albion W. Dudley was raised on the farm. He received but a common school education, and left the schools at eighteen, working on the river in the saw-mills and rafting lumber. In 1850 he went to Minnesota and spent two years and more. On returning to Maine he found his father in poor health and felt it his duty to remain with him. For the last eleven years he has been engaged more exclusively in farming and dairy business. He owns one of the finest farms in the town, known as the old Sherburn farm, to which he has added one hundred acres. Mr. Dudley keeps a large dairy, usually wintering over thirty cows besides other stock. Mr. Dudley married Miss Lizzie A. Jordan, of St. Albans, Maine. She died in 1865, leaving four children—Harris C., in Burlington, Vermont; Ella F., Elmer L., and Lizzie A. Mr. Dudley married for his second wife Jane McClure, of Milo, Maine. He was for three years Street Commissioner of Bangor.

Samuel Hale is a son of Samuel Hale, a native of Bradford, Massachusetts. He was for a number of years a stage contractor in Portland, Maine, where he was widely known. He married Mary White, a native of Maine. They had eight children. Mr. Hale had six children by a former wife. The names of his children by his second wife were Samuel; Edwin, now in Brooks, Maine, and who is blind; Elizabeth, deceased; Julia, now Mrs. Lowell, of Bangor; Harriet and Joseph, deceased; Charles, in Augusta; and Ann Maria, wife of Henry G. H. Niebuhr, of Princeton University. Mr. Hale died July 10, 1840. Mrs. Hale died March 12, 1871. Samuel Hale was born February 9, 1806, in Wiscasset, Maine. After becoming of age he first engaged with Mr. Nat. Mitchell in a grocery and hardware store in Portland when fifteen. He was with Mr. Mitchell five years and then went into the hardware business for himself, having as partner T. B. Brooks. This firm continued three years when they dissolved, and Mr. Hale went into the post-office in Portland as assistant clerk, where he remained about four years, and, his health failing, he went to the West Indies and remained one year and a half. His health being improved, on his return he came to Bangor and engaged in the dry goods and grocery business, in 1832 or 1833. About this time he married Persis R. Carpenter, who came from Barry, Vermont. Mr. Hale continued in business until 1837, the year of the great financial crash, in which he was broken up. He then went to Buffalo, New York, and engaged in trade for two years. He then went into the hog business; his hogs dying with the cholera, he soon left that and returned in 1840 to Maine. He then engaged as clerk in Portland, and afterwards engaged in trade again, and again failed. He then took a mill in Waterford and run it six years. From here he went onto a farm in Waterford and remained six years. He then lived in Norway village two years, and in 1861 moved to Bangor, where he has since lived. He was with Horton in the music business one and a half years, and then with his brother in the jewelry, sewing machine, and music business. In 1871 he moved to his present farm, about five miles from the city. He was obliged to do this on account of the loss of sight of one eye. Mr. and Mrs. Hale have had two children—Helen, who married E. Kilgore, and lives in Norway, Maine, and Georgia, deceased wife of James L. Page.

William H. McCrillis, of Bangor, was born in Wakefield, New Hampshire, November 4, 1813. His parents, John and Abigail (Kimball) McCrillis were natives of New Hampshire. Mr. McCrillis was a physician. His father, David, was of Scotch-Irish descent. The first members of the family came to this country about 1730, and settled in the neighborhood of Londonderry, New Hampshire. John and Abigail McCrillis had three children—Louisa, deceased, William H., and Harriet S. The latter married Rufus W. Griswold, of New York, who is deceased. Mrs. Griswold resides now in Bangor with William H. William H. ness. In 1877 he was appointed as policeman and has been on the police force since that time. Mr. Allen married, in 1878, Annie J. Murray, of this city, daughter of Thomas Murray. Their family at present consists of one son, Frederick by name. During his diving operations Mr. Allen was engaged in Lowell and Boston, Massachusetts, besides in the Penobscot Valley. While engaged in this business in the Penobscot River he found and raised two large cannon that were sunk by the British in a vessel that ran aground and sunk in 1779. One of these went to Massachusetts and one was sold by him to Dr. Field, to be presented to the Maine Historical Society.

Willard Cutter, of Bangor, the well-known carpenter and builder, was born in Sebec, Maine, May 2, 1822. His father, Jeremiah Cutter, married Mary Brown. They had eight children, six sons and two daughters. Willard, the third child and second son, was brought up on the farm in Sebec, and received a common school education. He came to Bangor when he was about eighteen years of age and went into the shop of Thomas B. Brown, of Bangor, where he thoroughly learned the trade of carpenter and builder. He remained with him three years, and then commenced business for himself. He has since lived here, except three years in California. He is one of the leading builders of the city and now employs from ten to fifty men. Mr. Cutter married Hannah W. Heald, of Eddington, daughter of Joseph Heald. They have three children, two sons and one daughter.

Joseph D. Robinson, the well-known hay and produce man in Bangor, is a son of James Robinson, a native of Dorchester, Massachusetts. His father was a merchant in Boston, and married Rachel Howe. They had ten children, of whom Joseph is the second son. He was born November 20, 1825, in Dorchester. On becoming of age he engaged in the West India goods business on Long Wharf in Boston, in which he continued until 1860, when he went into the coal business in Boston, continuing in this till 1869, when he came to Bangor and engaged in the hay and navigation business, principally in the hay business. Here he has since lived. He married Mary E. Robinson, daughter of Gad Robinson, of Bridgeport, Massachusetts. They have five children—George E. in Boston, Frederick H., also in Boston, Miriam, Joseph D., Jr., and Arthur K. Mr. Robinson's office is on Lower Broad street, where he may generally be found. He is the largest dealer in hay in the city.

Hartford Pond, of Bangor, was born in Brewer, now Holden, in this county. His father, Abiah Pond, was a native of Wrentham, Massachusetts. Abiah Pond married Cynthia Clewly, daughter of Isaac Clewly, an old Revolutionary soldier. Abiah and Cynthia Pond had twelve children, of whom Hartford is the youngest son now living and the eight child. Mr. Pond was a farmer and by trade a shoemaker. Hartford Pond was born July 16, 1826. He spent his minority on the farm, but on becoming of age he engaged in the lumber business, working for John K. Mayo, of East Orrington. He worked in the saw-mill six months, when, by an accident, he lost all the fingers on his left hand. In 1848 he came to Bangor and engaged as grocery clerk for his brother, Benjamin B. Pond, for whom he worked two years, at the end of which time he engaged with Mr. Churchill, and afterwards worked as clerk in the store he now occupies for many years. In 1866 he bought the business and stock in trade, and has since been in business here. He married for his first wife Sarah J. Demeritt, who died about 1856, leaving one son, Charles G. Mr. Pond married for his second wife Nancy F. Buzzell. Mr. Pond was a member of the Common Council in 1875 and 1876. He was a member of the Board of Aldermen in 1877, and again re-elected to the Council in 1879.

He was a steamboat captain on the Penobscot River and Bay, and died July 6, 1876. Mr. Snow married Elizabeth D. Savage, of Bangor. Their children were three sons and one daughter, viz: Albert F.; George F., now freight agent of the European & North American Railroad in this city; Charles L., with Hincks & Neally, of this city, and Mary S., a teacher in the grammar schools of this city. Albert F. Snow after obtaining an education in the common schools of the city, went to sea and spent about two and a half years. In 1870 he entered the employ of the European & North American Railroad Company, remaining with them for five years, at the end of which time he engaged with the Maine Central Railroad Company as freight cashier. Mr. Snow, though a young man, has served as member of the Common Council of the City of Bangor, and at that time was the youngest member.

Jefferson Crocker is a son of Daniel and Martha J. Crocker, of Somerset county, who were among the early settlers of that county. He married Jane Smart, of Parkman, and had four children: Louise, Jefferson, Henry, and an infant, two of whom are living. Mr. Crocker died in his eightieth year. Jefferson Crocker was born July 4, 1829. He lived on a farm until the age of sixteen and afterwards was engaged in a saw-mill about seven years, when he engaged in his present business, running a wool pulling factory. He has been also engaged in buying and selling produce, also a meat market. He married Laura A. Stevens, born January 22, 1845, daughter of John and Lucy B. Stevens, of Bangor, December 20, 1864, by whom he had four children: Grace E., born July 30, 1866; Leonard J., born January 9, 1868; Ralph H., born June 12, 1871; Laura L., born January 30, 1875, all at home. In 1879 Mr. Crocker's buildings were burned without any insurance, the loss being $4,000. Fire broke out at 11 A. M., and at 2 P. M. he had timber hauling and carpenters at work on a new building. In three weeks from the time of the fire, he occupied his new building.

Victor Brett, City Clerk of Bangor, was born in Oldtown, October 17, 1851. He is the only son of Judge E. C. Brett, well known in this county, a sketch of whom appears elsewhere. He graduated at Westbrook Seminary in 1868, and then entered Tuft's College, from which he was graduated in 1872. In 1873 he entered the Albany Law School, and graduated in 1874. After his graduation he entered the office of Wilson & Woodard, of this city, and studied law with them until the fall of 1875, when he was admitted to the Penobscot County Bar. He then entered upon the practice of law and followed it until 1876, when he was elected City Clerk, which office he has since held. Mr. Brett married Miss A. Lillian Ames, daughter of Charles Ames, Esq., of Bangor. They have one son, Howard by name.

A. S. Sands, Superintendent of the City Farm and Almshouse in Bangor, was born in Sebec, Piscataquis county, Maine. His father, Captain Benjamin Sands, was born in China, Maine, in 1808. His grandfather came from Cape Cod, Massachusetts. A. S. Sands was born June 9, 1838. He spent his early life on a farm. He has been Superintendent of the City Farm since he came to Bangor in 1877. He has two brothers in Bangor. H. S. Sands came here in 1865, and with S. O. Proctor kept a wholesale grocery store. Later he kept the Hammond Street Bakery, and at present keeps a produce store on Central street. O. S. Sands came to Bangor about 1874, and has since kept a grocery and produce store.

William P. Dickey, the well-known hardware dealer in Bangor, is a son of George and Lucy L. (Patch) Dickey, of Bangor. Their family consisted of five children—Lucy J., deceased, wife of Rev. J. A. Haskell; George A., with Jordan & Marsh, Boston; William P.; Annie, now Mrs. H. A. Bridges, of Providence, Rhode Island; and Nellie, wife of J. H. Snow, of Bangor. Mr. Dickey has followed the business of builder in Bangor for many years. He is still living, as is Mrs. Dickey. William P. Dickey was born in Bangor April 22, 1843. On becoming of age he engaged in the hardware business in 1859 with O. P. Sawtelle. This firm continued about three years, when Mr. Dickey sold out to Mr. Sawtelle and opened a store for himself, soon after taking in his uncle, O. R. Patch, of New York, with the title of W. P. Dickey & Co. They continued about four years, Mr. Patch being a silent partner. At the end of this time Mr. Patch withdrew and Mr. Dickey has since continued the business himself. The building he now occupies was the first brick store built in Bangor. Mr. Dickey carries a very large stock of hardware, besides paints and oils, sash, doors and blinds, etc. He married Miss Eliza Foss, daughter of Joseph B. Foss. They have two sons and one daughter and have lost one son.

John S. Jenness, who now carries on the hardware business at the old stand of Jenness & Son, is a son of Thomas Jenness. This house dates back to 1833, when Mr. Jenness and Mr. March came here, the former from Deerfield, New Hampshire, and the latter from Portsmouth. They at first occupied a store at No. 2 City Point block, which was then just completed. In 1835 they removed to the present location, No. 12 West Market Square. In 1839 they dissolved, and Mr. Jenness carried on the business alone; but in 1841 a change was made, Horace Jenness taking No. 12 West Market Square, and Thomas opening a new hardware store on Exchange street. In 1843 these stores were united at No. 12 West Market Square, Horace selling out, and Joseph J. Dearborn, of Deerfield, New Hampshire, associating with Thomas, the firm name being Jenness & Dearborn. This firm continued till the fall of 1850, when Mr. Dearborn returned to Deerfield. Mr. Jenness was then alone till May, 1864, when his son, John S. Jenness, was associated with him under the firm name of Thomas Jenness & Son. The latter succeeded to the business on the death of his father, in August of the same year, continuing the same style. The hardware business has undergone much change during the last forty years. In the first years of their business the larger portion of their stock was imported, and Sheffield and Birmingham goods filled their shelves. American manufactures during this period have developed and become able to compete with a superior quality of goods which now have the market. This establishment deals largely in window glass, carrying a complete assortment. They also make a specialty in fine cutlery, both of English and American manufacture, and carry a full line of sporting goods. No other store east of Portland deals in bolting cloths. They make a specialty of oils. Mr. Jenness married Mary True, daughter of Joseph True, of Deerfield, New Hampshire. They had two children—Sarah D., now Mrs. James F. Rawson, of Bangor, and John S., the present proprietor.

Joshua K. Sherman, the well-known groceryman of Bangor, was born in Provincetown, Cape Cod, Massachusetts, December 29, 1833. His father, Michael Sherman, was a carpenter, and moved from Massachusetts to Hampden in 1843, where he spent the latter part of his life. He married Miss Paulina Knowles, of Provincetown. They had two children—Joshua K., and Paulina K., deceased. Joshua Sherman followed the sea until 1868, when he was thirty-five years old. That year he came to Bangor and engaged in the grocery business with Mr. F. T. Hall. They occupy two numbers—28 and 30 on Center street, where they keep a very large and choice stock of goods. Mr. Sherman married Jennie P. Phillips, daughter of John Phillips, of Hampden. They have one son, Philip by name.

James Dunning is a son of John Dunning, of Frankfort, Waldo county, who was one of the early settlers of the township, emigrating in an early day from Brunswick, Maine. He married Theodosia Blaisdell, and by this union had thirteen children—John, Jane, James and Alexander (twins), Francis, Theodosia, Sarah, Susan, Caroline, Robert, Charles, and Nancy. He was a tanner and currier by trade; was in the War of 1812; died at the age of seventy-seven in Bangor. James Dunning was born April 3, 1813, in Frankfort, now Winterport. At the age of thirteen he came to Bangor to learn the tanner and currier trade of James Tillon, and worked with him one year, after which he went to sea two years. He then engaged in mercantile business as clerk for L. B. McIntyre, with whom he remained five years, and came to Bangor with him as clerk in 1833, remaining two and one-half years longer, after which he engaged in business for himself in dry goods, groceries, and crockery. He went to Boston and bought his stock of goods, getting credit to the amount of $11,000. He owned the first vessel that went to California after the gold excitement, rigged the vessel, loaded it with 149 passengers, and named it the Gold Hunter. The voyage was a successful one. He freighted her twice with passengers, and afterward he, with two other gentlemen, took the contract to build the Bangor & Kennebec Road, fifty-five miles in length. They raised a subscription of $500,000 to build the road. He afterwards raised the subscription to the gas works, and in the meantime started a Farmers' Bank, running said bank over twenty-four years, paying the stockholders twelve and one-half per cent., and closed the business two years ago, paying the stockholders $120 per share. He was Colonel of militia; at the commencement of the war he was in Washington; came home and got up the first company of volunteers, and afterwards helped organize six or seven companies. He married, for his first wife, Charlotte A. Hook, of Castine, by whom he had five children—James F., James H., Mary E., George E., William H. His first wife died February 22, 1876, and he married again—Julia Palmer, daughter of John Palmer, of Bangor—March 26, 1877. He served as Representative in the State Legislature two terms.

Joseph F. Leavitt, the popular General Ticket Agent of the European & North American Railroad, was born in Levant, in Penobscot county, on the 12th of May, 1842. He is the only living son of William F. and Clara (Brackett) Leavitt. His grandfather, Joseph Leavitt, was a native of Stratham, New Hampshire. William F. Leavitt was a lumberman, and moved to Bangor when Joseph was a lad four years old. He died in Bangor March 26, 1853. Mrs. Leavitt is now living here with her son. Their family consisted of seven children, viz: William F., Jr., Ann S., Clara E., Joseph F., Ann B., Angelica C., and Susan M., all of whom are deceased except Clara and Joseph. When but sixteen years old Joseph Leavitt entered a dry goods store in this city as clerk. He worked for Stickney & Roberts; also for Thompson & Hiehorn. He worked for these parties six years. In 1864 he went to Nashville, Tennessee, where he was connected with the United States military railroad in the Engineer's office. He remained here until the close of the war in 1865, when he went to Boston and engaged with a dry goods jobbing house as salesman and traveling agent. At the end of two and a half years he came to Maine to settle an estate in Bucksport and close up the business. Here he took charge of a tannery belonging to the estate and continued the business of the tannery for one and a half years, when he came to Bangor and became connected with the European & North American Railroad as book-keeper. In May, 1873, he was appointed General Ticket Agent, which position he has since filled to the entire satisfaction of the company. He is now Clerk of the corporation. Mr. Leavitt married Mary A. Margesson, daughter of the late William Margesson, of Bangor.

Joseph G. Dummer, of Bangor, is a son of Joseph and Elizabeth (Winslow) Dummer. Joseph Dummer was a native of Byfield, Massachusetts. He was a cabinet-maker by trade, and for many years carried on that business in Hallowell, Maine. He had a family of seven children, viz: Elizabeth, wife of the late Samuel Cunningham, of Bucksport, Maine; Abigail, deceased; Mary, wife of G. Whitman, of Bath, Maine; Martha J., deceased, wife of Hugh J. Anderson, of Belfast; Daniel, deceased; Joseph, deceased; and Shubael, deceased. Joseph G. Dummer was born January 4, 1813. About 1868 he came to Bangor and engaged in the meat business, which he followed for a time, and then went into the grocery business. In 1873 he went into the livery business, in which he has since continued. Mr. Dummer married for his first wife Mary P. Peabody. She died in 1852, and he married for his second wife Sarah Jordan. By his first wife he has three daughters, and by his second wife one—Mary, wife of Joseph M. Hodgkins, of Bangor; Maria, wife of Charles G. Perry, of Presque Isle, Maine; Elizabeth, at home; and Sarah, wife of Fred Appleton, of Bangor.

Fred W. Gould, of Bangor, was born in the town of Bangor December 22, 1850. His father, Addison Gould, was a farmer, and came to Bangor from Dexter. He was a farmer, and Fred spent his early life on the farm until he was eighteen, and then went to Massachusetts and became a conductor on a horse-car. He came back to Bangor and engaged in the crockery and house-furnishing business for about two years, when he went into the business of dyeing and coloring. He followed this about six or seven years and then opened his present restaurant and oyster house at No. 35 Mercantile Square, where he has since kept an eating-house. Mr. Gould married Miss Maggie J. Wortman, daughter of Thomas Wortman, of Boston.

Albert F. Merrill, of the Bangor Flouring Mills, is a son of Nathan L. and Eliza (Wiggin) Merrill. Nathan L. Merrill was a native of Stratham, New Hampshire, and came from there to Corinth, Maine, when a young man, and engaged in lumber business. In 1855 he came to Bangor and engaged in the manufacture of lumber. He had five children, viz: Nathan and Freeman, who now live in Newport; Charles H. and Benjamin Franklin, in Cambridge, Maine; Esther O., wife of W. A. Whitteman, of Illinois; and Albert F., who was born September 3, 1839. He lived in Corinth until about fifteen years of age when he came to Bangor. After becoming of age he went to New Hampshire and took charge of his father's lumber wharf there. He remained in New Hampshire until 1868 when he returned and went into the lumber-mill with his brother Charles. They remained together about one year, after which A. F. managed it alone about eight years. In 1878 he sold out and purchased the flour-mill, where we now find him, on the Kenduskeag Stream, about a mile from the post-office, and called the Bruce Mills. Since purchasing this mill Mr. Merrill has enlarged it and built a new house. He married for his first wife Abbie Littlefield, of Wells, Maine. She died in 1869 leaving four children, Frederick H., Charles and Albert (twins), and Abbie L. Mr. Merrill married for his second wife Miss Hattie M.

Thomas. They have two children—Percy and Hattie E. Since residing in Bangor Mr. Merrill has been one year a member of the city council.

Edwin P. Ferguson, of Bangor, is a son of Ivory Ferguson, a native of Elliot, York county, Maine. He married Abigail Goodhue, daughter of John Goodhue, one of the early settlers of Dixmont, who came from Massachusetts. Mr. Ferguson was a hatter by trade, though after settling in Dixmont he gave his attention to farming and became one of the most successful farmers and stock raisers in town. He died in Hampden in 1869. Mrs. Ferguson died in 1843. The surviving members of his family are: Sarah J. and Samuel T., both living in Minneapolis, Minnesota; Dennison G., of Plymouth, Maine; Ira G., of Marion, Dakota Territory; and Edwin P. The latter married Mary E. Coffin, who died in 1855. Their children are: Willis E., of Portland, Maine; Susie A.; Minnie A.; Ernest S., of Bangor, Maine; Everett J., deceased; and Samuel G. Mr. Ferguson first settled in Dixmont on the old homestead, but moved to Bangor in 1864. He is engaged in farming and stock raising, and has a good farm not far from the city.

George A. Thatcher, father of Benjamin B. Thatcher, came to Bangor in 1822 from Warren, Maine, where he was born in 1806. He has always been identified with the interests of Bangor, and held for many years the office of member of the Board of Assessors. In early years he was in the lumber business, and is now the only living resident of the business men of the time when he came here. He has been Deacon of the First Congregational Church since 1840. He married Rebecca Jane Billings, daughter of Caleb C. Billings, one of the oldest and most prominent business men connected with the early history of the city of Bangor. She was born in 1813 and is still living. The following are the children of the above: George P. Thatcher, of San Francisco; Frederick A., died very young; Charles A., (died in 1864, while in the service of his country, in command of the United States gunboat Gazelle, on the Mississippi River, near the mouth of the Red River; killed by guerrillas. He was acting Captain in the volunteer navy at the time of his death); Benjamin B. Thatcher, of Bangor; Caleb B. Thatcher, of Bangor; Sarah Frances, died very young; Henry Knox Thatcher, of Bangor. Benjamin B. Thatcher, son of George A. and Rebecca J. Thatcher, was born in April, 1839. He married Mary Ella Walker (daughter of James Walker, Esq.), in 1866, who died in 1875. Their children were George Thoreau and Lottie May. In 1877 Mr. Thatcher married Charlotte P. Walker (daughter of James Walker, Esq.), who is now living. He has always lived in Bangor and been connected with the lumber business since 1858; was clerk and book-keeper for Eddy, Murphy & Company from 1861 to 1866, and then succeeded to their business, under the firm name of N. C. Ayer & Company, and afterwards of Cutler, Thatcher & Company, until 1876, since which time he has been carrying on the same business alone. He was a member of the Board of Aldermen in 1877; was elected Representative to the Legislature in 1880 and still holds that position.

Warren A. Bragg, of the large wholesale grocery house of Thurston & Bragg, was born in China, Kennebec county, Maine, October 30, 1838. His father was a farmer. Warren A. remained on the farm until he came to Bangor in 1863, with the exception of three years which he spent in Minnesota. In 1863 he opened the store with which he has since been connected. At first he did only a retail business. In 1864 he took in Mr. W. T. C. Wescott, and the firm became Bragg & Wescott. They did business together until 1877, when they closed up business. Mr. Bragg then opened again, and took in Mr. W. L. Thurston as partner, and the firm became Thurston & Bragg. They gradually worked into the wholesale business, and during the last ten years they have done only a wholesale business. Their business now has increased until they have one of the largest wholesale houses in the city. Mr. Bragg married Lydia J. Hilt, of Augusta. They have two children—Willard L. and M. Florence, both now at home. Mr. Bragg has been a member of the city government for several years.

The first representatives of the Emery family in this country were John and Anthony, of Romsey, Hampshire county, England, who came over in 1635 and settled in Newberry. Anthony Emery had a son, James by name, born about 1630, and who lived in Kittery; his wife's name was Elizabeth. He had five sons, the youngest of whom, named Job, was born in 1670. Job Emery had four sons and seven daughters. His second son, Joseph, married Mehitable Stacy. Their family consisted of seven sons and four daughters. His second son, John, was born in Kittery, Maine, in 1730, and was one of the first settlers in Brewer, in 1773. He had three sons and ten daughters. His sons were John Emery, and James (who was drowned when a young man), and Nahum. John Emery married Abigail Wasgatt, of Mount Desert, Maine. They had twelve children, nine sons and three daughters. Thomas Emery, the eighth son of this family and father of Noah Emery, married Mercy Wasgatt. He followed the sea for many years, and then engaged in the lumber business. He built the first steam saw-mill in Penobscot Valley. He was a man well known, and at one time represented Hampden in the Legislature. He died in 1848. His family consisted of eight children, seven daughters and one son. But three of the daughters are living—Julia A., Mrs. Buker, of New York; Charlotte, Mrs. Sewall, of Hampden; and Elmira, Mrs. Goddard, of Boston. Noah Emery, the only son of this family, was born April 2, 1825. He spent his early life on the farm, and then went to sea. He has for many years been a ship master, and sailed principally from New York. He retired from sea life in 1867, and now resides in Bangor. He married Mary Ellen Pomeroy, daughter of Arad H. Pomeroy, of Hampden.

One of the largest and most successful lumber dealers in Bangor is Mr. William T. Pearson, who was born in Corinth, May 27, 1821. His father was a farmer. When sixteen years old William T. Pearson came to Bangor and went into the store of his brothers, M. & O. Pearson, for a time, and in 1843 started a grocery store in Mercantile Square, which he continued till 1845. In the spring of 1846 he commenced as a surveyor of lumber, which he followed till 1853. The reputation which he acquired in this line secured his appointment to the important position of Surveyor-General, which he held in 1850 and 1851. In the latter year he surveyed 16,672,762 feet, the largest amount ever surveyed here by any one person in one season. In 1853 he commenced the manufacture and wholesale trade of lumber. He manufactured at the Basin Mills two years, at Oldtown six years, and at Veazie two years. In 1864 he purchased the valuable mill privilege at West Great Works, which had been occupied by the well-known Dwinel Mills, which were burnt a short time previous, and erected thereon one of the largest blocks of mills on the Penobscot. These mills were burned in the spring of 1881. They are now rebuilding these mills. In 1873 he associated with him as partner his nephew, Edgar C. Pearson. Mr. Pearson's father was one of the early settlers of Corinth.

Henry Brown was born in Winslow, Maine, April 23, 1832. His father was a native of Frankfort, and his mother of Winslow, where both died aged eighty and eighty-five years. Henry Brown left Winslow in 1849 and engaged in lumbering on the Penobscot River. At present he is Superintendent of the Dirigo Mill. He married Emma E. Ordway, daughter of William Ordway, February 5, 1864, and has had four children—Alice, deceased; Harry, Hattie May, and Gertie. Mrs. Brown died, and for a second wife he married Vesta M. Reid, daughter of Harry and Lovina (Trafton) Reid, May 12, 1881. Mr. Brown was Selectman in Oldtown four years, and represented that class in the State Legislature three years. He enlisted in the war in 1861, serving as first lieutenant about two months, and was then promoted to captain. He resigned in May, 1863, on account of ill health. He now resides in Bangor. The other members of his father's family were Edward, Catharine, Job, and Hiram.

John Patten was born in Hermon, on the place now occupied by him and his son, in 1811. He lived with his father until the age of twenty-one, when he took charge of the farm, and has been engaged in farming and lumbering ever since. The farm was cleared from a wilderness by his father assisted by his sons. They suffered the privations the early settlers were subject to, and the father died on this place December 13, 1850. John Patten took care of his parents till their death. He was married, December 24, 1829, to Cynthia A. Neally, daughter of James Neally, of Monroe, who was of military fame. By this union three children were born—Calista E., born July 12, 1849, married Henry C. Norris, of Hermon, and is now living in Hermon; Charles N., born December 21, 1852, now living in Hermon on the old homestead, married Etta Ward, of Hampden, December 25, 1879, and has one child, Lillian May, who was born October 6, 1880; Dora E., born December 26, 1855, married John Miller, of Newburg, now living at Newburg, and has one child, Lina A., born August 5, 1879, at home.

Mr. Silas D. Jones, the well-known clothing dealer of Bangor, is a native of Bowdoin, Maine. His father was Benjamin Jones, a tailor by trade, who lived many years in Bath. He married Elizabeth Hogan, a daughter of William Hogan, a Revolutionary soldier who fought all through that war, and died at Bowdoin. Benjamin and Elizabeth Jones had four sons—Charles, deceased; Benjamin, now in New York; William, deceased, and Silas. Mr. Jones died in 1835; Mrs. Jones died in 1855. Silas D., the youngest of this family, was born April 2, 1824, in Bowdoin. He received a common school education, and early learned the tailor's trade. He came to Bangor in 1842, and engaged with Mr. Wheelwright as cutter and taking charge of their clothing department. Afterwards he became one of the company, and continued with them for about twenty years in all, the firm name being Jones, Clark & Co. In 1865 Mr. Jones dissolved partnership, and went into business with Mr. Fifield, under the title of Jones & Fifield, for one year. He then went into business with his brother, the firm being Jones Bros., until 1870. From 1870 to 1873 he did business alone, and then took in his sons as partners, under the firm name of Jones & Sons, which has since continued. Their present place of business is Nos. 1 and 2 Kenduskeag Bridge. Mr. Jones married Sarah C. Woodbury, daughter of Collins Woodbury, Esq. They have four children—B. Frank, of the firm; Storer W., also of the firm; Alice Maud, and Annie W. Mr. Jones has been a member of the Board of Aldermen three years, and is a member of the Water Board now.

Among the many prominent lumbermen of the Penobscot Valley is Mr. Isaac M. Bragg. He is one of the very oldest dealers in lumber here and shipped the first load of lumber ever sent out of this port, in the ship Bremen, of Bremen, Germany, in 1859. Vessels of smaller burden had been loaded here before this, but this was the first ship. He also chartered the first two ships that were ever loaded here, with deals, one being the Tri-mountain, for Liverpool, England. Mr. Bragg is a son of Isaac and Hannah (Meigs) Bragg, of China, Kennebec county, then Harland. Isaac Bragg was a manufacturer of plows. He had seven children, three sons and four daughters, of whom Isaac M. is the fourth child and second son. He was born November 16, 1812, in China, Maine. He received such an education as the common schools of that time afforded, which was, to say the least, meager. At the age of nineteen he entered the store of Mr. Foster, of Orono, where he remained two years, then went away to school to obtain a better education. After attending the Academy at China two terms he returned and went into business with Mr. Foster as partner, remaining this time two years, when he sold out to Mr. Foster and came to Bangor and engaged in the grocery and West India trade. He gradually worked into the lumber commission business which he has since followed. Mr. Bragg has been in both branches of the city government at different times. In 1839 he married Miss Sarah A. Babcock, daughter of William Babcock, of St. Andrews, New Brunswick. She died in 1844 and Mr. Bragg married again in 1850 Miss Augusta A. Taylor, daughter of Abner Taylor, of Bangor. Mr. Bragg has two children, one by each wife, Carrie A., now Mrs. W. E. Mann, of Bangor; Florence A., married James C. Buzzell, of Bangor. From the small business of two ship loads of deals, shipped in 1859, that business in Bangor increased to nineteen ship loads in 1864 or 1865. Mr. Bragg is widely known in connection with lumber shipping business here.

Charles Hight, the well-known bookseller and stationer of Bangor, was born in Athens, Maine. His father, William Hight, Jr., was a farmer and born in Athens. His grandfather was William, and he also was a native of New Hampshire. He was one of the first settlers in Athens. William Hight, Jr., married Elvira Horn. They had but two children, Charles and Frank, twins. Mr. Hight is now living in Bangor to be near his sons, who are both in business here. Charles Hight was born November 25, 1832. He spent his early life on the farm and attended the district schools and the academy in the village. On arriving at the age of twenty he came to Bangor with his brother and entered the store of McLure & Co. Here he remained about two years when he went into the book and stationery business with Mr. O. R. Patch. About 1874 they added the jewelry business formerly carried on in their store by Mr. Weeks. In 1877 the firm took in Mr. Pfaff, who has charge of the jewelry department. Their present place of business is No. 3 Smith Block. Mr. Hight married Miss Adelaide Hill, daughter of the late Henry Hill, of Bangor. They have one daughter, Lillian by name. Mr. Hight was at one time a member of the City Council.

Edward C. Snow, of Bangor, was born in Orneville, Maine, January 28, 1846. His father, Jesse Snow, was a millwright and a native of Bowdoinham, Maine. He married Eliza F. Mayo. They had four sons, viz: Charles W., now residing in Northampton, Massachusetts; Edward C.; George H., now in Bangor; Olin H., with Edward C., in Bangor. Mr. Snow is still living with his sons in this city. Edward C. Snow before becoming of age came to Bangor and engaged with Samuel B. Stone as salesman. He continued with him one year and then engaged with Rines & Nichols in the same capacity. He was with them until 1872 when he went into business for himself. He continued in the dry goods business three years, having as a partner Henry A. Mayo. In 1875 Mr. Mayo died and Mr. Snow went into the manufacture of ladies', misses', and children's fashionable garments, also the manufacture of mens' shirts. His place of business is at No. 16 Main street. Mr. Snow warrants all his work. He married Miss Kittie Averill, daughter of William Averill, of Orono. They have four children, viz: Ned C., Mary W., Maud E., and Annie.

Hugh Ross, of this city, is a native of Belfast, Maine. He is a son of Hugh and Elizabeth (Clifford) Ross. His grandfather was also Hugh, a native of Shapleigh, Maine. Hugh and Elizabeth Ross had nine children, of whom Hugh, Jr., is the fourth. He was born in Belfast October 30, 1821. At the age of fourteen he left the farm and entered the store of his brother John C. Here he remained nine years, and in 1845 came to Bangor and engaged in the ship-chandler business, which he continued until 1856. In 1852 he went into the steamboat business. He has had since then the exclusive towing and excursion business of the river. In 1873 he took in as a partner Gilbert Howell. Mr. Ross married Anna Gilkey, daughter of Philip Gilkey, of Belfast. They have five children, viz: Grace, wife of Stuart M. Buck, of West Virginia, a coal dealer; Walter, now with his father; Anna, Ralph, and Mary. Mr. Ross is a man very widely known in the entire Penobscot Valley.

Alden F. Hilton, Chief Engineer of the European & North American Railroad, is a native of Alna, Lincoln county, Maine. His father, Stephen Hilton, married Lydia Jewett. They had eight children, six of whom grew to man and womanhood, viz: Hartley A., now residing in Alna; Mary E.; Alden F.; Olivia C., wife of W. H. Williams, of Campello, Massachusetts; Laura E., now Mrs. Elbridge McKinsley, of Whitefield, Lincoln county, Maine; Henry C., now in Boston. Mr. Hilton is now living in Alna. Alden F., the second son of this family, was born November 19, 1841, in Alna. He spent his early boyhood on the farm, obtaining such a common school education as the schools of the little town afforded. When he was twenty-two he entered the Maine Wesleyan Seminary at Kent's Hill, and was graduated in 1868. During the time he was pursuing the course there he taught school some. Soon after graduating he was employed as Assistant Engineer on the European & North American Railroad, with which company he has remained ever since. Having a natural taste for the business, he was in 1872 elected to the position of Chief Engineer. Since his connection with the road it has grown from a short line of twelve miles to one hundred and fourteen miles in the main line, besides the various branches. Mr. Alden married Alma A. Lewis, of Whitefield, Maine, November 8, 1880.

Albert F. Field, contractor, builder, and slater, of this city, is a son of Ambrose and Sarah Field. He was born August 21, 1850. He received a common school education in Bangor, and at the age of fourteen, in 1864, he enlisted in the Fourteenth Maine Volunteers. Being old-looking for a boy, he was accepted, and served one year, and was mustered out with the regiment in the autumn of 1865. On coming back to Bangor he went to sea, and was gone one year. In 1867 he began to learn his trade with Charles B. Brown, of this city. He remained with Mr. Brown, and served a three-years' apprenticeship. At the close of his apprenticeship he engaged with Mr. Brown, and worked for him five years. In 1875 Mr. Brown retired, and Mr. Field, with Mr. Robertson, bought him out, and continued the business until 1878, when they dissolved, and Mr. Field has since conducted the business himself. In 1870 he married Miss Sarah E. Spear, of Rockland, Maine. They have three sons, viz: Charles P., Frank A., and Willie K.

W. F. Whiton, of Bangor, of the firm of W. F. Whiton & Co., is a son of Thomas J. Whiton, who came here from Boston in 1834. He was a native of Hingham, Massachusetts. Mr. Whiton, on coming to Bangor, associated with Stephen Badger and Mr. Lovejoy in the manufacture of carriages and coaches of all kinds then made. Lovejoy soon went out of the firm, but Whiton & Badger continued the business until 1844 or 1845, when Mr. Badger retired, and Mr. Whiton continued the business alone until about 1850, when Mr. Phineas Yeaton was admitted. The firm then became Whiton & Yeaton, and so continued until the death of Mr. Yeaton in 1869. In the last-mentioned year W. F. Whiton purchased the business and has since continued at the old stand. The buildings have been enlarged from time to time, until now Mr. Whiton employs from twenty to twenty-five men and turns out all kinds of light work. Thomas J. Whiton had three children, two sons and one daughter, viz: Thomas H., who died in early life; Adeline E., and Walter F. Walter F. was born January 21, 1842. He was early trained in the business and has always followed it. This firm is the largest of its kind in this county.

Among the prominent manufacturing establishments in Bangor is the large pottery of Persson & Soderberg. This establishment, named the Bangor Stoneware Company, is of only a few months' growth, and already has become one of the prominent interests of the city. Mr. Persson came from Sweden to Massachusetts, and from there he went to Gardner. He learned his trade when a lad, and has always worked at the business. His partner is also a practical potter, having worked for many years in Sweden at the business, as well as elsewhere in this country. Their pottery is on Patten street, where they manufacture every article that could be expected in their line. They already employ nine men. This is by far the largest concern of the kind in this part of Maine.

Albert W. Benson, Ticket Agent at Bangor of the Maine Central and other railway lines to the east and west, is a native of Waterville, born June 23, 1851, oldest son and child of George B. and Elvira M. (Cornforth) Benson, of that city, where his father is connected with the great scythe and axe factory. His early education was received in the public schools of Waterville and during three years at the Lewiston High-school. He also served an apprenticeship in one of the cotton mills in the latter place, and became an expert machinist. After he left the schools he was diverted, however, to other business, and began telegraphing at Fairfield, in the station of the Maine Central Railroad, with which road he has been connected ever since, with the exception of less than a year spent in the employ of the Western Union Telegraph Company, at Lewiston. He came from Lewiston to Bangor in 1871, as an operator for the Central, and in 1873 took post in the ticket office, where he has since steadily remained in the faithful discharge of the responsible duties connected with his place. Mr. Benson was married on New Year's Day, 1875, to Miss Sarah G., daughter of Gilman P. and Sarah M. Smith, of Bangor. They have two children—Kate Lillian and Frank Smith Benson.

In 1870 he came to Bangor and engaged in the grocery and provision business, at which he has since continued. In 1872 he married Miss Annie E. Wood, daughter of Daniel and Betsey Wood, of Bangor. They have one daughter, Charlotte L. by name. Mr. Cates has held the office of Councilman one term in this city. He is at present Trustee and Secretary of the Bangor Mechanic Library Association. His present place of business is No. 47 State street.

Arthur L. Hopkins, of Bangor, is the son of Joel and Cecelia Hopkins, of Orrington. Joel Hopkins is a son of Joel Hopkins, of Bucksport, Maine, who is now living in Brewer. Joel and Cecelia Hopkins had but one child—Arthur, who was born in South Orrington. In the year 1867 his father moved to Brewer, and Arthur went to work as a clerk for O. D. Holt & Son, where he remained three years, then he worked one year for Mr. J. K. Mayo. In 1877 he entered the employ of George Bowen, Esq., at No. 12 Exchange street. He remained with him two years, when he bought him out, and has since continued the business at the same place. He married Ida M. Washburn, daughter of B. Washburn, of Bangor. He keeps a full line of groceries and provisions, also ship-chandlers' stock.

Jacob Stern was born July 17, 1844, in Hesse Cassel, Germany. He is the son of Nathan Stern, who had five children, one son and four daughters. Jacob Stern served an apprenticeship of three years to learn the mercantile business, his father paying $100 a year to the firm and his board. At the end of three years, on graduating with a class of five hundred he received the first diploma. He then went to Berlin and entered a large dry goods wholesale house, and traveled through Northern Germany for three years, at the end of which time he returned to his native place to be drafted, being then twenty years of age. On account of nearsightedness he was exempted. In 1865 he came to New York, but failing to find a situation to suit him, he came to Bangor and entered the employ of Mr. F. Meinecke, with whom he continued three years, when he bought Mr. Meinecke out and has continued the business since. In 1876 he married Miss E. W. Walker, daughter of James Walker, of Bangor. They have two children, one son and one daughter (twins), viz: Philip and Catharine. Mr. Stern's present place of business is Nos. 37 and 39 Main street, Bangor, where he has the largest retail store and keeps the largest stock in his line—French, English, and German fancy goods and small ware—in the city.

G. W. Spratt, who was born in the town of China, Kennebec county, Maine, is a son of George and Susan Spratt. George Spratt married Susan Crowell. They had seven children—six sons and one daughter—George W.; Pharron P., now in Clinton, Maine; Theodore B., deceased; James B., went away and was never heard from; Allen C., now of Levant, Maine; Henry W., now of Orrington, Maine; and Persis W., widow of Walter Robinson, of Brewer. George W. Spratt, the oldest of this family, was born July 24, 1822, and moved with his father in 1842 to the town of Levant. Here his father and mother spent the remainder of their lives. When twenty-four years of age he went to Calais, Maine, and engaged in the livery and staging business. Mr. Spratt lived in Calais until 1858, when he moved to Bangor, where he has since lived, continuing in the same business. He also has a farm in connection with the livery. Mr. Spratt married Harriet B. Marston, daughter of John and Hannah Marston, of Falmouth, Maine. To this couple have been born eight children, six of whom are living, viz: Caroline M., George, Will, Lizzie E., Mary R., Susan P., and Hattie W. Mrs. Spratt died in 1866. Mr. Spratt was married again in 1867 to Mrs. Maria M. Johnston (nee Maria M. Young), of Waterford, Vermont, who had one daughter, Virginia H.

Terrence F. Cassidy, of Bangor, is a son of James and Ellen Cassidy, of Ireland. They had nine children, six sons and three daughters, viz: James, Terrence, John, Mary Jane, Ellen, Barney, Thomas, William, and one that died in infancy. Terrence F., the second son of this family, was born September 22, 1849. He learned the blacksmith trade when a young man in Bangor, Boston, and California. He first settled in business in Bangor in 1870, where he has since lived, working at his trade of blacksmithing, giving especial attention to shipsmithing business (cant dog manufacture). Mr. Cassidy married Margaret Landers, of Bangor, daughter of Patrick and Temperance Landers. They have two children living, viz: John W. and Mary J. They have lost one daughter, Nellie by name. Mr. Cassidy is at present Councilman from this ward. He was first lieutenant in Company C, Ninth Maine State Militia, from 1877 to 1879. His present place of business is on Front street, Bangor.

Otus D. Maddox, of Bangor, is a native of the State. He is a son of John Maddox, who was a carpenter by trade. He married Mary K. Gould. Their family consisted of nine children, four sons and five daughters, of whom Otis D. is the oldest son. He was born in Unity, Maine. He married Jane Mears, daughter of Elder Mears, of Morrill. Mr. Maddox first went to Belfast, Maine, with his father when quite a lad. At the age of thirteen he went to sea, and followed the sea for about eighteen years, when he left that occupation and engaged in shoemaking in Belfast. In 1859 he came to Bangor and continued the business. He had previously worked here. Mr. Maddox has two sons—Fred and Charles, both now in Bangor. He has for many years been connected with the fire department in Bangor. He was for several years assistant engineer, and is now chief engineer of the very efficient department here.

David H. Smith, of Bangor, is a son of James and Mehitabel (Jones) Smith, of Bangor. James Smith kept a meat market here for many years. He was one of the early settlers in Bangor, there being but two stores and one church here when he came. He is still living. Mrs. Smith died in 1869. They had six children, viz: James, Jr., deceased; Eliza Jane, deceased; Charlotte, wife of P. B. Burleigh; Warren, deceased; David H.; and Elbra Augusta, now Mrs. A. B. Sutton, of Orono. David B. Smith has always been a farmer, and lived in Bangor. He has a fine farm only three miles from town. Mr. Smith married Olivia McCorison, of Bangor. They have but one child, Grace H.

Charles H. Adams, of the firm of Lunt & Adams, is a son of Charles K. and Mary E. (Bailey) Adams, of Bangor. Charles K. Adams is a native of Concord, Massachusetts. He came to Bangor in 1826, and is now in the carriage painting business here. He has five children, viz: Emma J., Lizzie H., Charles H., Frank A., and George K. Charles H. Adams was born January 6, 1859, in Bangor. After attending the schools (common and high) of the city, he clerked for E. C. Nichols & Co. for three years, then for J. P. Moore four years. In 1880 he formed the present partnership with Mr. Lunt in the fancy grocery business. They are both young, energetic men, and are already receiving a fair share of trade in their line.

George L. Phillips, the bakery man on Exchange street, Bangor, is a son of George and Rachel (Lincoln) Phillips, who had six children, of whom George L. was the third. His father was a teacher, and at one time was engaged in trade in Bangor. George L. was born in 1811, in this city. On becoming of age he opened the baker business, which he has since continued. He is the oldest business man on Exchange street, having been located where he now is since 1839. He, with his brother, built the block where he is now located in 1846, it being the first brick block on the street between York and State streets, on the east side of the street. Mr. Phillips has seemed to live and prosper on "bread alone." He married Lucinda Knowlton, of Northport. They have one son living, now in the medical college in Boston.

The well known dealer in stock and dressed meat in Bangor, Mr. Lorin A. Davis, came from Exeter, in this county, to Bangor in 1879. He is a son of the late Richard Davis, of Exeter, who was a farmer and drover. Mr. Davis spent his early life on the farm in Exeter. He early began to deal in stock, and since coming to Bangor he purchased the slaughter-house formerly owned by James Smith. This he has enlarged and greatly improved until he now is able to dress about fifteen thousand sheep and fifteen hundred cattle, with hogs and calves in proportion. He ships his mutton mostly to Boston, and some beef, though he sells most of his beef in the home market. Mr. Davis imports many of his sheep from the Provinces. He has, in this business, become widely known, not only in Penobscot county, but all over Eastern Maine. His slaughter-house is furnished with all the latest appliances for the proper handling and care of meat. Mr. Davis married Miss Joanna Chase, of Brooklyn, New York. They have one daughter.

Elijah W. Hasey is a son of William Hasey, who came to Bangor when twenty-one years old, in 1782. He was born in 1761. He married Prudence Webster, of Bangor. They had ten children, viz: Martha, Ebenezer, Andrew W., Margaret, Susan, Jane, Rebecca, Hannah, William, and Elijah, all of whom are deceased except the latter. Mr. Hasey always followed farming, though in his early days he lumbered some. He died in 1850, at the age of eighty-nine; Mrs. Hasey died in 1852, aged eighty-six. Elijah W. Hasey was born May 16, 1809, in Bangor. He has always lived in this town, following the business of lumbering, farming, hotel-keeping, the livery business, etc. He is now engaged in farming. He married for his first wife Hannah B. Martin, of Newport. She died in 1865. By her Mr. Hasey had twelve children, viz: Frances, deceased; Thomas B., deceased; William H. Harrison, also deceased; Prudence W., wife of Arthur A. Pond, of Minneapolis; Hannah B., deceased; Ambrocine, wife of George Follett, of Haverhill, Massachusetts; Nancy J., deceased wife of A. Randlet, of Massachusetts; Elijah, now of Minneapolis; Charles E., in Minneapolis; Ward B., in Minneapolis; Annie, deceased; Emma, wife of George Crosby, of Bangor. Mr. Hasey married for his second wife Mrs. Carlisle Leadbetter, who died in 1871 or 1872. He afterwards married Mrs. Julia Hodgson, of Kenduskeag, who is still living. Mr. Hasey is living on his farm, about five miles from Bangor on the Pushaw road.

Isaac M. Currier, of Bangor, is a son of William and Nancy (Henderson) Currier. They had eight children, of whom Isaac is the oldest. He was born October 29, 1816. His father was a manufacturer of linseed oil; he died when Isaac was six years old, and he was brought up by his grandfather on a farm until he was fourteen years old. At that age he started out for himself, and learned the joiner's trade and mill work; he worked as millwright for about fourteen years in Bangor and Winterport. In 1845 he bought a tannery at East Orrington, which he carried on about eight years and then sold out. In 1859 he built the tannery in Bangor, since which time he has lived here and carried on the tannery business. Mr. Currier married Almatia Ware, of East Orington, daughter of Captain Warren Ware. She died in 1866, and he married for his second wife Miss Helen A. Saunders, of Bangor. By his first wife he had six children, all of whom are deceased. Mr. Currier has been connected with the city government as Alderman and Councilman for several years; he is well known in this vicinity.

Charles E. Perry, of Bangor, is a son of John and Susan L. (Paul) Perry. John Perry was a native of New Hampshire. During the latter part of his life he followed the sea. He had four children, viz: Mary E., wife of A. J. Quinzy, of Bangor; Charles E.; Leland H., now in San Francisco, California; Orel F., of Bangor. Charles E. Perry, the oldest son of this family, was born October 12, 1840, in Bangor. He has followed the meat business, though at present he does not slaughter, but buys and ships meat largely. He married Mary A. Wentworth, daughter of Captain E. Wentworth. They have three children, viz: Charles E., George B., and Fred H. Mr. Perry was for two years a member of Company G, Second Maine Volunteers, and was discharged for disability in 1863.

Alonzo Morton, of Bangor, is a son of Thomas and Hannah (Westcott) Morton. Thomas Morton is a native of Gorham, Maine. He followed the sea during his younger days, but during his latter life he was a farmer. He had six children, viz: Harvey, Ann, Emily, Lucinda, Alonzo, and Charlotte, all of whom are deceased except Alonzo. Alonzo Morton was born September 27, 1815. He spent his early life on a farm in Jackson, Waldo county, Maine, where he settled as a farmer, and lived on the old homestead, which he still owns, though at present living in Bangor. Mr. Morton came to Bangor in 1866, and purchased the farm where he now lives, on the Fuller road. He owns in all, here and in the old place in Jackson, over five hundred acres of land. Mr. Morton married Miss Mary Croxford, daughter of John Croxford, Esq., of Jackson. They have four children living: Irving, living on the old place in Jackson; Everett, also on the old farm; Cora W.; and Asa C., of Lowell, Massachusetts. Mr. Morton has been connected prominently with public town affairs in Jackson, serving many years as Selectman. In 1864 he was elected to the Legislature and served one term there. In 1876 and 1877 he was a member of the city council.

Lysander Palmer, of Bangor, is a son of Henry O. and Rebecca (Ridout) Palmer, of Exeter, this county. Henry O. Palmer is a farmer, and still lives in Exeter. Mr. and Mrs. Palmer had ten children, of whom Lysander is the third son. Their names are: Charles H., in Exeter; James W., now of Bucksport; Lysander, and Augustine, in Exeter. The daughters were: Jenett, wife of Calvin Buzzell, of Exeter; Amarette, wife of Charles Davis, of Exeter; Mary Frances, now Mrs. Silas B. Warren, of Bucksport; Clara, married to John Brown, of Exeter. Lysander Palmer was born August 23, 1842. He was brought up on the farm in Exeter. On becoming of age he purchased a farm in Exeter and settled there, where he lived until 1871, when he came to Bangor, and bought the farm where he now lives, out two and one-half miles from the city. He married Abbie Andrews, daughter of John Andrews, of Exeter, for his first wife. She died in 1876, leaving one son, Fred L. Mr. Palmer married, for his second wife, Alice E. Partridge, daughter of Daniel Partridge, of Bucksport. They have one daughter, Nettie.

Elijah Smith, of Bangor, is a son of James and Barbara (Braddock) Smith, of Dixmont, Maine. They have six children, viz: Elijah; Ann, wife of Joseph Chadbourn, of Saco, Maine; Augustus, of Bangor; Sarah, in Dixmont; David, deceased; and Mary. Mr. and Mrs. Smith are now living in Dixmont, this county. Elijah Smith, the oldest son of this family, was born October 29, 1829, in Dixmont. He worked out when he was seventeen for $55 for twelve months, with the privilege of going to school three months in the winter, and spent $35 of this for a cow for his mother. He worked out as a farm laborer for eight or ten years, working in the lumber woods winters. He first settled in Dixmont, where he lived about five years, then went to Jackson and lived one year. From Jackson he went to Corinth and bought a farm, where he lived five years. From Corinth he came to Bangor in 1869, and bought part of the place where he now lives. He has since added to this until he now owns two hundred acres of fine land, all within two miles of Bangor. Mr. Smith does the largest business at killing and shipping beef cattle of any man in the county. He has one of the best arranged slaughter-houses in the State. He annually does a business in this line of about $35,000. He married Ann D. McCorison, daughter of Lemuel McCorison, of Exeter, who died March 3, 1881, leaving two children, one son and one daughter—Sanford C. and Carrie.

Alexander H. Chase, of Bangor, is a son of Peter and Susanna (Royal) Chase. Peter Chase was a native of Newburyport, Massachusetts, and came to Bangor in 1820. He was born in 1772, and died in 1863. Mrs. Chase was born in 1788, and died in 1862. Mr. Chase followed farming and lumbering for a business. Alexander H. Chase, their son, married Jane C. Farrar, October 18, 1838. She died September 21, 1844, and Mr. Chase married again, in 1846, Lavina Baston. Mr. Chase has three sons and three daughters, viz: Susie J., in Bangor; Marietta, now Mrs. Leavitt, of Newburg; Alexander K., of Texarkana, Arkansas; Edward M., of Boston; Annie L., now Mrs. Gilman, of Bangor; and J. Colby, of Bangor. Mr. Chase is engaged in farming and manufacturing.

W. F. Shaw, dealer in boots, shoes, hats, caps, etc., at No. 20 Main street, Bangor, is a son of Thomas H. and Temperance Shaw, of Portland, who had four children, viz: Adelaide B., now Mrs. Walter Emerson, of Bangor; William F.; Estelle A.; and Elizabeth F., deceased. William F. Shaw was born December 29, 1840, in Bangor. After finishing his school life he went to Boston and lived ten years, where he was employed as book-keeper for C. & M. Cox, wholesale dealers. He was with R. Hoe & Company also two years before engaging with C. & M. Cox. He has always been engaged in the boot and shoe business, either here or elsewhere. He commenced business for himself in Bangor, in 1873. Mr. Shaw married Lizzie A. Wright, daughter of Elbridge G. Wright, of Boston. They have one child—Bertha W. Walter K. Shaw, son of Elisha Shaw, was born in Newport, Maine, August 29, 1857. He came to Bangor in 1879, and engaged in the wholesale boot and shoe and leather business with Mr. D. Dudley, and his father as silent partner, under the firm name of Dudley, Shaw & Company. They have a large store on Main street, and are doing a successful business. Mr. Shaw is not married.

HON. DANIEL SARGENT.

This gentleman, for forty-three years, was a resident of Brewer Village, and long one of the most prominent and successful lumbermen in the Penobscot Valley, is of old Massachusetts stock, his great-great-grandfather, William Sargent, coming from England in 1642, to Amesbury, where many of his descendents have continued to reside. Daniel himself was born at Amesbury, February 3, 1811, youngest of a family of five sons and three daughters, children of Ichabod B. and Ruth (Patten) Sargent, who occupied a farm in that town. He assisted in the work of the farm in his boyhood and young manhood, attending the common schools about three months in a year until he was sixteen years old, when he was a pupil at the Amesbury Academy for two short terms. At eighteen years of age he began to teach school in his native town, and for five successive winters wielded the birch. He remained with his father and labored diligently the remainder of the time until his father's death, and then till 1838, when he emigrated to Maine. Meanwhile, however, he had filled some positions of public trust, as a member of the Board of Superintending School Committee of Amesbury, and as Treasurer and Collector of the town. He was there married, February 19, 1835, to Susan Hopkins Patten, daughter of Robert and Rhoda (Sargent) Patten. Mrs. Sargent is still living, in good health of mind and body for her years. They have had four children—one daughter and three sons, viz: Susan Patten Sargent, born at Amesbury, January 12, 1836, and still residing with her parents; Harlan Page Sargent, also born at Amesbury, June 22, 1838; Daniel Allston Sargent, born in Brewer November 9, 1843; and Albert Paine Sargent, also born in Brewer, July 12, 1850. All the children are now living.

The father of Mr. Sargent died in 1836. Daniel carried on the farm for two years, when, in November, 1838, he removed to Brewer Village, where he has since continuously resided. He here opened a general grocery store at once, although he had intended to recommence farming, and soon, with others, engaged in vessel building. He remained in the business until 1846 alone, and then accepted George O. Goodwin as a partner, under the firm name and style of Sargent & Goodwin. This copartnership existed until 1854. Meanwhile, in 1848, Mr. Sargent had bought an interest in the saw-mill of Mr. Charles G. Sterns, and a new firm was formed called Sargent, Sterns & Co., for the grocery and milling business. In 1853 the partners purchased the "Bruce Mills" at the Cove, thus increasing their operations very largely. The next year Mr. Goodwin's interests were bought out by his partners, and Messrs. Sargent & Sterns remained together in the manufacture of lumber and in storekeeping for fifteen years. In 1862 they purchased the steam saw-mill in Hampden, now owned and managed exclusively by Mr. Sterns. Two years thereafter the firm of Sargent & Sterns was dissolved, and a division of the mill property made, Mr. Sargent taking the mills and premises at Brewer, and Mr. Sterns the Hampden property, which he still owns. During many years of their partnership they added to their business ship-building, in company with Master Simon Moulton, Captain Daniel Shedd, George V. Goodwin, and others.

After the dissolution of Sargent & Sterns, Mr. Sargent continued in the business alone for several years. In 1867 he bought the saw-mill and water-privilege at East Orrington, and in 1871 added the steam saw-mill on the river at Orrington. He now manufactured about nine million feet of lumber a year. The latter mill and the extended adjacent shore property were sold in 1880 to the Arctic Ice Company of Bangor. Upon the same stream as supplies the East Orrington mill (the Segeunkedunk), at the Cove in Brewer Village, Mr. Sargent's mill is situated near the identical spot where Colonel John Brewer, one of the original settlers and for whom the town was named, in 1783 built the first saw-mill in what is now Penobscot county. The property consists of a dam at the outlet of the Brewer's Pond in Orrington about four miles distant, which dam is 850 feet long, and including one hundred acres of the adjoining land; this dam is one hundred and five feet above high-water mark in the Penobscot River; also the dam at the foot of the meadow at East Orrington, with the perpetual right of flowage of 850 acres of meadow; the saw-mill at East Orrington, with a fall of sixteen feet; the privilege in Brewer, on the old Stern dam, upon which a grist-mill was erected in 1875, with a fall of fourteen feet; and the two saw-mills at the Cove, where there is a further fall of seventeen feet. Some interesting details are furnished by Mr. Walker Wells in his Report on the Water Power of Maine, in which he notes of the powers on the Segeunkedunk: "Freshets harmless; stream very constant; in full working condition even when the mills on the Penobscot are stopped for want of water."

In 1872 Deacon Sargent admitted to the business, as partners, his two sons, Harlan and Daniel, who had for a number of years been assisting in its management. The new firm name was D. Sargent & Sons. At the beginning of 1881 the father retired from the firm and from his more active business life, and the other two members now carry on the business under the name of D. Sargent's Sons. In 1876 the late firm became pioneers in the now somewhat extensive business of putting up and shipping ice on the Penobscot. They erected temporary ice-houses, and that year housed about six thousand tons. In 1879-80 they erected other buildings with a total capacity of sixteen thousand tons. The firm of D. Sargent's Sons still carry on the ice and lumber business with profit and success.

It is an interesting fact that Deacon Sargent, although now quite advanced in years and otherwise retired from business, still continues the grocery business, and retains his interest in the old store, his youngest son, Albert P., being associated with him and attending to the details of the concern.

Mr. Sargent was one of the original members of the Congregational church formed at Brewer Village in 1843; was chosen a Deacon of the church the same year, and has remained continuously in that office, having long been Senior Deacon. He has always contributed liberally for the support of the Gospel, and donated the lot on which the parsonage is built. When the church edifice and parsonage were erected he was Chairman of the Building Committee in each instance. In 1847 he bought what was then known as the "Judge Perham place," from which the old mansion was removed, and put up in its stead the spacious and elegant home in which he has since resided, occupying one of the most commanding and beautiful sites on the Penobscot, from which the city of Bangor and a reach of the noble river for three miles are plainly in view.

Deacon Sargent was originally a Whig, but has been a Republican since the organization of that party. He has not aimed, however, to be a political manager, much less an office-seeker, but in 1873 served the people of the Brewer and Orrington district acceptably as Representative in the State Legislature. He has also repeatedly served on the Board of Selectmen and the Superintending School Committee of the town.

MAJOR HIRAM RUGGLES.

This venerable gentleman, now a retired farmer and lumberman in comfortable circumstances at Carmel village, is of an old Massachusetts family, his parents and their ancestors residing the last century in Hardwick, Worcester county, in that State. The Rev. Paul Ruggles, his father, a Baptist minister, was born there in 1772, and at the age of twenty-four, in 1796, was married to Miss Mercy Dexter, of the same place. They came to Maine two years afterwards, an ox-sled bearing to the wilderness their little stock of furniture. They had then but one child, their first born, John D. Ruggles. They came to Hampden, in this county, but shortly pushed up into Hermon, where they staid some time with a family named Garland. About the 1st of May, 1798, finding no road yet cut into the tract now called Carmel, Mr. Ruggles made a "dug out," and with his wife and their effects paddled up the Sowadabscook to a point near the mouth of the beautiful stream still called from him Ruggles's Brook. They were the first white settlers in the town. Here in the wilderness they built their rude cabin, and here the rest of their family was born, in the locality now known far and wide as the Ruggles place. They had in all ten children who grew to maturity—six sons and four daughters, and a son who died in childhood. The father was the first preacher of the Baptist faith in this region. In 1806 he organized from the people of Carmel and vicinity a church of that order, and was very active in preaching in it and elsewhere throughout a wide tract of Eastern Maine. He was the first Baptist minister to deliver a sermon in Bangor, and in about nine years he preached no less than 1,200 discourses, and was also mainly instrumental in gathering the Newport, Stetson, Exeter, Hermon, (now Second Hampden), and Charleston Baptist churches. He died in the prime of his years, at home, May 21, 1820, leaving a blessed memory.

The mother was a faithful and true helpmate of her husband, and remained in widowhood for more than fifty years, dying at last June 8, 1870, in the house of her son, Major Ruggles, at the great age of ninety-three.

Hiram was born in Carmel October 14, 1813, the sixth son and ninth child of Paul and Mercy (Dexter) Ruggles. His early education was received altogether in the schools of his native town, where his formal training began and ended in the plain, simple, "college of the people." He has always had an ambition for learning, however, and by diligent reading and study has so improved his later opportunities as to become a well-informed and thoroughly intelligent man. At an early age the family came to depend in some measure upon him, and he was called to much hard labor upon the farm in his boyhood and youth. He remained steadily at home with his widowed mother, being the main business manager of the household after he was seventeen, and making no change in his relations with it when he became of age. He never lost the hope of further education in the schools until he was about twenty-five years old, when he married and finally settled down upon the old place as its proprietor, his mother residing with him then and to the day of her death. He remained a farmer here, except as he was summoned from time to time into more public life, until 1853, when he decided to remove to the village. He disposed of his farm, and engaged as a lumber operator, cutting and manufacturing, with a general store at the village in connection with his business. He became quite largely employed thus, finally coming to own an interest, entire or partial, in almost every mill in the town. He pursued his various operations very successfully, winning by industry and integrity a moderate fortune, upon which he at length retired in 1877.

The abilities and popularity of Mr. Ruggles early prompted his fellow-citizens to call upon him for public service. He was not much more than of age when he became an official participant in the affairs of his native town. He was Chairman of the Carmel Board of Selectmen when but twenty-three years of age, and has ever since been more or less occupied with the management of the town's business. In 1839, when he was but twenty-six years old, he was appointed by Governor Fairfield a Justice of the Peace and of the Quorum, for a term of seven years; and in 1860 he was made a Trial Justice. For three years, 1850-53, inclusive, he served as one of the County Commissioners of Penobscot county. In 1846 he was elected a member of the State Legislature as a Representative from Carmel and Hampden; and seven years thereafter, in 1853, he was chosen State Senator from the Ninth District, which returned him in 1854 to the same body. In 1863 he was elected by the Legislature a member of the Executive Council, and enjoyed the unprecedented and since not repeated honor of four successive re-elections to that distinguished post. He thus served one year with Governor Coburn, three years with Governor Cony, and his last year with Governor Chamberlain. During this service, October 10, 1865, he received the unsolicited appointment as Postmaster at Carmel village, and served the people thus for two or three years. In 1867 he was appointed a member of the very important commission on the Assumption by the State of the Municipal War Debts. Upon the organization, in 1862, of the Fourth Internal Revenue District, which included Penobscot county, he was appointed Deputy Assessor of the District. He resigned this upon election to the Executive Council, but in 1869, April 7th, he was recalled to more responsible duties in the same office by appointment as Assessor. March 25, 1873, he was promoted to the Collectorship, and upon the consolidation of his District with another he was made Collector of the new one, with his office in each instance in the Government Building at Bangor. Upon a further consolidation of districts he was legislated out of office, and upon his retirement received the following handsome compliment from the Bangor Whig and Courier of July 3, 1877:

It is safe to say that the Government of the United States retains in its service no officer who stands higher in personal character, integrity, and public respect than the gentleman whose official relations were terminated on Saturday last.

This closed Major Ruggles's official life of nearly forty years. Besides the positions named, he had often been nominated by his fellow-partisans to similar or other public places. He was a Democrat down to the Administration of President Pierce; but was among the earliest in Maine to break with his party on the slavery question, and he aided to organize the Republican party in the State, with which he has since steadily and consistently acted. His return to the Senate in 1854 was upon an independent ticket, as a pronounced anti-slavery man; and he there carried out his principles in casting the one decisive vote which finally made the Hon. W. P. Fessenden United States Senator.

It may here be mentioned that Major Ruggles's military title is due to his faithful service with the old-time militia, in which he was made Ensign in 1837, subsequently Adjutant, a Captain in 1841, and finally Major the next year.

Major Ruggles has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal church since 1838, has been in its official boards almost the whole time, and when the system of lay representation was introduced, he was made a delegate to the Baltimore Quadrennial Conference in 1876. He has taken a very cordial interest in denominational education, and is a Trustee of and the Treasurer of the East Maine Conference Seminary at Bucksport, to which he has been a liberal benefactor. He also gave a large sum in one amount to the Wesleyan University at Middletown, Connecticut, and has otherwise, and in many ways, been generous in his benevolence. He is also a Free and Accepted Mason, a member of the Lodge at Carmel and of the Chapter in Bangor.

Major Ruggles was united in marriage on the 12th day of December, 1838, in his twenty-sixth year, to Miss Lydia H., third daughter of Eben C. and Delia (Hoxie) Hinckley, of old Maine and Massachusetts families, the father being lineally descended from Governor Hinckley, of colonial fame. They have had two children—Gardiner H., the subject of a sketch below; and Annie E., deceased, aged twenty-seven years, wife of Edward S. Rich, of an importing firm in Boston. Major and Mrs. Ruggles have no children surviving.

LIEUTENANT G. H. RUGGLES.

This noble young man, one of the most valuable and heroic sacrifices made by the Penobscot Valley, or indeed the whole State of Maine, in the cause of the Union, was born at the old homestead in Carmel, December 5, 1840. He attended the common schools of the town and labored on the farm until about eighteen years of age, when he went to Waterville to enter a preparatory school in that city, with a view to a collegiate course. He was never very strong, however, and did not physically bear well the confinement and burdens of study, and so determined not to undertake the more arduous scholastic career. After a period of rest he became a student at the seminary at Bucksport and remained there several terms. He taught school for two terms in Bucksport and Orland, respectively; but had not undertaken the special studies of any profession as yet when the country called her sons to arms. He was not twenty-two years old and not a very stalwart man in health and strength when he enlisted in Company F., of the Eighteenth Maine Regiment, afterwards the First Maine Heavy Artillery. The position and personal influence of his father would easily have secured him a commission from the beginning; but he declared his fixed purpose to commence in the ranks. He was soon made a Sergeant, however; on the 28th of February, 1863, promoted to be First or Orderly Sergeant; and on the 18th day of January, 1864, he received from Governor Cony a commission as Second Lieutenant of his Company. In this capacity he was with it in the terrible charge of the Federal troops upon the Confederate breast-works in front of Petersburg, June 18, 1864, a short, sharp, and awfully fatal action, which left but thirteen men of the company fit for duty. Lieutenant Ruggles had already, in the heavy battle at Spottsylvania, been slightly wounded in the neck, but was not long delayed from the frequent skirmishes and greater actions in which the army was engaged in that bloody campaign. He was often under fire but escaped without serious harm until this day of doom. Then, says the report of General John L. Hodsdon, Adjutant-General of the State in which his memory is commemorated, "while nobly cheering his men in the charge upon the fortifications at Petersburg, he fell dead at the head of his company, pierced by an enemy's bullet." The command with which he charged was repulsed, and the dead and seriously wounded by necessity were left behind. The enemy refused to recognize flags of truce for their recovery, and it was impossible to bring in his remains. His body lies where many of the bravest and best of fallen soldiers have desired to lie—where he fell, at the post of duty. His death caused a most profound sensation of grief at his old home and wherever he had become known. Mr. John H. Lynde, then editor of the Bangor Whig and Courier, who knew him intimately and had formed a very high esteem for him, inserted this feeling and appreciative notice in his paper:

Young Ruggles enlisted as a private in Company F, from the purest motives of patriotism, and received promotion entirely without solicitation. An only son, surrounded by all the comforts of life—with influential friends to secure advancement—seemed to be strong reasons why he should remain quietly at home. But he felt that duty called him to the field—that the country needed his services—and was willing, if necessary, to lay down his life to perpetuate the free institutions for which our forefathers fought and bled. He was a soldier and a gentleman in its broadest sense. He was about twenty-four years of age. His loss will be deeply felt in the home circle and in the community where he formerly lived.

The Adjutant-General of the State commemorated his deeds and his memory more permanently in his report, in a notice of some length, from which we extract the following:

During all the weary months that his regiment was stationed in the fortifications around Washington, his activity for the welfare of his men knew no abatement, and when the order was issued for the command to advance to the front, he with his comrades most gladly responded, that they might thus enter upon active service.

Lieutenant Ruggles was a good scholar, a true gentleman, and a brave soldier. Gallant, cool, and reliable, he enjoyed the confidence of his superior officers and the love of his men. Although buried in an unknown grave, his deeds and character are embalmed in the memories of mourning relatives and a grateful people.

The young lieutenant had given unusual promise. Although of a quiet and retiring disposition, he possessed an acute mind and a rare facility of expression, which occasionally surprised even his friends with the wit and wisdom of his sayings. Like his father, he had a marked native aptitude for affairs, was exceedingly well informed in history and public questions, and would, undoubtedly, had he lived, have done eminent service in civil life to his State and country. From boyhood he had kept a diary, which is unusually interesting for its record of current events and of opinion. He was thoroughly companionable and genial, and of eminent purity of speech and character, so that his friends had no fear of the evil influences upon him of the customary demoralizations of the camp. He died as he had lived, a typical young American citizen, enduring all hardships, and encountering all dangers for the sake of his country and of humanity.

How sleep the brave, who sink to rest,
By all their country's wishes blest!
When spring, with dewy fingers cold,
Returns to deck the hallowed mould,
She there shall dress a sweeter sod
Than Fancy's feet have ever trod.
By fairy hands their knell is rung;
By forms unseen their dirge is sung;
There Honor comes, a pilgrim gray,
To bless the turf that's o'er their clay;
And Freedom shall awhile repair,
To dwell a weeping hermit there.

GOVERNOR D. F. DAVIS.

The Hon. Daniel Franklin Davis, late Governor of the State of Maine, is a native of the Commonwealth which has so honored him. He was born at Freedom, Waldo county, Maine, on the 12th day of September, 1843, the second child and oldest son of the Rev. Moses Franklin and Mary (French) Davis. Mr. Davis was a minister of the Christian Church, and had charge of several small societies of that faith and order at and near Freedom. He had been a preacher from the age of nineteen, and remained such to the day of his death in March, 1874. He was one of the pioneers and leaders in the Christian Church in Eastern Maine. He was of English descent, the progenitor in America, Colonel James Davis, immigrating to New Hampshire some time in the seventeenth century. His descendants settled largely in that State and in Massachusetts. The mother was related to the Brewsters and the Frenches of the old Colony of Massachusetts Bay. She is still living with her relatives in Corinth.

Young Davis was trained in the common schools, mainly in Stetson, to which town his father removed in 1854; but more effectively at the school of the fireside, where his father, who had been a teacher, assisted by the mother, gave him invaluable instruction. He kept up his studies also while at the work of the farm, in which he had to engage much at home and elsewhere, as the family were in limited circumstances. He effected an entrance into the Academy at East Corinth in 1863, but had been there but a few weeks when he left school to join a company of troops for the war then being raised at his old home. He enlisted as a private soldier October 15, 1863, and served until January, 1865, at the close of the war. He had kept up his studies to some extent in camp, and now entered the Academy at Corinth, where he was a pupil for about a year, interrupting his course only to teach a school himself in the winter. He then attended at the Kent's Hill Seminary for about a year and a half, teaching again of winters. He had also during this time some very competent private instruction under Professor Sawyer, of the Corinna Academy.

In the winter of 1867-68 Mr. Davis began to read law with the Hon. Lewis Barber, then a resident of Stetson, and was admitted to the Bar of the State the next year. He commenced practice in East Corinth on the 29th of August, 1869. After holding some local offices and taking the stump from time to time for the Republican party, he was elected to the lower House of the State Legislature in 1874, and took an active part in legislation and the discussion of pending questions. Four years thereafter he represented Penobscot county in the State Senate, where he took a leading position. The same year (1878) he was more actively in the Republican canvass than ever before, speaking in several counties of Eastern Maine. In 1879 he was nominated as a candidate for Governor on the Republican ticket. He received a majority of 46,000 votes over the Democratic candidate and 21,000 votes over the Greenback nominee, and was elected Governor by the Legislature. In that campaign he addressed more than one hundred audiences, in his own State and others, being called to much political service of the kind in Ohio and Massachusetts. He was re-nominated in 1880, and was constantly in the field from the Fourth of July until the day of election. The Greenback and Democratic parties having fused, the election was very close; and in the number of votes cast he was only about 130 votes behind his competitor, the present incumbent, General Plaisted, of Bangor. He has since devoted himself to his profession. In January, 1881, he opened an office in Bangor, in partnership with Charles A. Bailey, Esq., of Oldtown, which is still maintained.

Governor Davis was married in East Corinth, New Year's Day, 1867, to Miss Laura B., only daughter of William and Mary (Ireland) Goodwin, of that place. Her mother was also the child of a minister of the Christian denomination. They have had eight children, five of whom are still living. Two others died in infancy, one unnamed, the other named Bertha; and still another, Winter S. Davis, died in April, 1876, aged about two years. The surviving children are William Franklin, now thirteen years old; Frederick Hall, a lad of ten years; Margaret Ellen, aged five; Edmund Ireland, three years old; and Willis Roswell, who is still an infant. All the children were born in East Corinth.

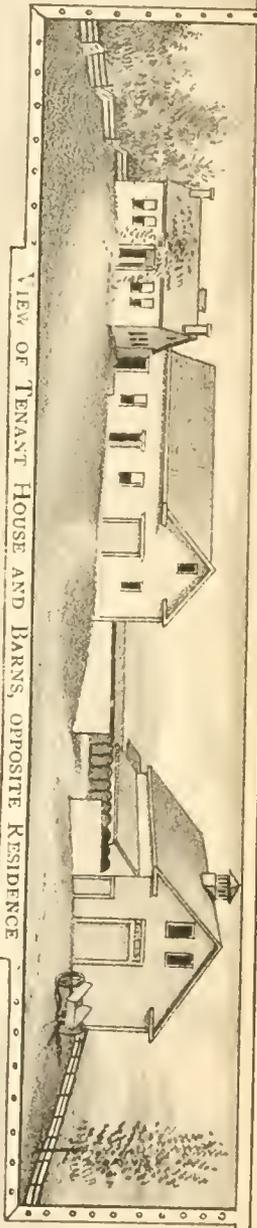

HON. JOHN MORISON.

Robert Morison was born in Portland, Maine, April 6, 1778, where he resided until twenty-two years of age. In the year 1800 he moved to Livermore, Oxford county, and settled on a farm. He remained in Livermore until 1815, when he moved to Reedfield, where he purchased a farm and remained in Reedfield until 1821, when he sold out his farm, and in March, 1822, he moved to Sebec, and in company with his brother William purchased a mill-site and erected a saw- and grist-mill and engaged in the mill business until his death, which occurred in 1838.

Mr. Morison married Sallie Kent, a native of Reedfield, in the year 1801. His wife died October 7, 1875, at Sebec. He was the father of eight children, four boys and four girls: Sibyl, who married Daniel Packard, and lives in Dover. Ruth, married Warren Kent, and lives in Sebec. Robert was twice married; his first wife was Asenath Gillman; she died, and he afterwards married Abigail Dow, and resides in Sebec engaged in farming. Alvin, married Sallie Pittman, and died in Sebec. Alice, married Benjamin P. Gillman, and resides in Orono. Charles was twice married; his first wife was Mary A. Lowney; she died, and he afterwards married Emily Herrick; he died in Corinth in 1855. Sarah, who married John Hellier, died in Bangor.

Hon. John Morison, the subject of this sketch, was born September 14, 1817, in the town of Livermore, Oxford county. In 1821 he moved to Sebec with his father, where he received a liberal education. He remained with his father until twenty-one years of age, and was taught the mill business in all its branches. When eighteen years of age he was chosen second lieutenant of a company of militia at Sebec; he was afterwards promoted to first lieutenant, and afterwards to the rank of captain. At the age of twenty-one years he started out in business for himself, with no capital but his brain and muscle. He found his father's estate embarrassed, and an aged mother and one sister to support. He went to work by the day, month, and year, as the opportunity offered itself; saved his money, and cleared the old homestead of its indebtedness, and left it as a home for his mother, where she lived until her death, which occurred in 1875. In 1847 he went to Orono, where he purchased the Island Mills property. The same year, in company with other parties, he purchased the township of land on the Passadumkeag River now known as the Morison and Gillman town. It contains thirty-two thousand acres of heavy timber. He remained in Orono until 1856, when he sold his mill property to James Hamilton, came to Corinth, purchased the beautiful farm—a view of which is on the opposite page, and in 1858 he moved on the premises, where he now lives, surrounded by all the comforts that heart could wish, and enjoying the blessings of a well-spent life. He is now engaged extensively in the lumbering business, and has in his employ from one hundred to one hundred and fifty men every year. He has been one of the contractors on the West Branch for four years. In 1861 he was elected by the towns of Corinth, Kenduskeag, Hudson, and Alton to represent them in the State Legislature, and in 1873 and 1874 he was elected State Senator. While a member of the House he was a member of the Committee of Interior Waters and Committee on Manufactures. While in the Senate he was Chairman of the above committee, also member of Committee on Indian Affairs and Fisheries. He also has held the office of Selectman of Corinth for four years. In politics he was originally an old-line Whig, and became a member of the Republican party, of which he is now an active member. He was one of the Trustees of the West Penobscot Agricultural Society four years; and in 1873, when the Central Penobscot Agricultural Society was chartered, he was chosen its President. He served as Trustee of the State Agricultural Society three years, and is now one of the Directors of Penobscot Lumber Association, and is also one of the Directors of the West Branch Log-Driving Company; he has also been President and Director of the Passadumkeag Boom Association.

He was twice married. His first wife was Emily Lowney, a native of Sebec. She died in Orono in 1848. He afterwards married Eliza J. Ford, a native of Sebec, and is the father of six children: William Harrison, died in Corinth at the age of twelve years; John Ambrose, died in Corinth when thirteen years of age; Horace Bray, lives at home; Fannie Britton, died when two years and six months old; Frank Pearl, and Abner Ford live at home.

HON. JOHN THISSELL.

Richard Thissell was born in Beverly, Massachusetts, where he lived several years. He was a seafaring man, and followed the sea many years. He abandoned the sea, moved to New Salem, Massachusetts, gave up his seafaring life, and turned his attention to farming, where he remained a few years, when he sold out, purchased a farm in Newbury, New Hampshire, then almost a wilderness, where he cleared up a farm and remained in that vicinity the balance of his life. He was twice married. His first wife was a Miss Lovett. She died in New Hampshire. He afterwards married Sarah Withington. They had eleven children. Richard married Mary Chase. He died in New Hampshire. Hezekiah L. married a lady from Connecticut and died in New York. He was a soldier in the War of 1812, and afterwards commanded a company in the Mexican war, after which he was appointed agent of the United States in Florida for the protection of the property of the Government. Hannah, deceased; Apphia, deceased; Sarah, deceased; Rachael, deceased; William, deceased; Josiah, lives in Minnesota; John, living; Rachael, 2d, deceased; Thorn-dyke, deceased.

Hon. John Thissell, the subject of this sketch, was born in Fishersfield, now called Newbury, New Hampshire, December 31, 1804. He lived in New Hampshire until he was twenty-one years of age, where he received a common school education. His business has always been farming, and he is one of the most successful farmers in the State of Maine. In 1831 he came to Corinth and settled on the East Ridge, on the farm now occupied by Stephen H. Worth. He cleared up the farm and erected the buildings now occupied by Worth. In 1869 he purchased the farm on which he now lives, and moved on to it the same year.

In politics he was originally a member of the Democratic party, but became a Republican at the organization of the party. He is a man highly respected by all, and has been repeatedly chosen by his party to fill many honorable offices, having held the office of Selectman of Corinth for nearly twenty years, and was chairman of the Board nearly all the time he held the office. In 1848 he was elected by his class, consisting of Corinth, Charleston, and Bradford, to represent them in the State Legislature. While a member of the Legislature he served on several important committees. In 1859 and 1860 he was elected State Senator from his county. While in the Senate he was chairman of the Committee on State Lands and State Roads, State Prison, and was also member of several other important committees. He was also a member of the State Board of Agriculture for three years. He is an active Christian, having professed religion in 1841. He became a member of the Free-will Baptist Church, and since that time has contributed liberally to the support of the gospel. He was twice married. In 1831 he married his first wife, Allaseba B. Ramsdell, a native of Lunenburg, Massachusetts. She died in Corinth, and was the mother of two children. He afterwards married Mrs. Abby True, a native of Montville, Maine, his present wife.

He is the father of two children—Charles T., who married Mariett French and lives in Corinth, engaged in farming; Henry W., died in Corinth at the age of twenty-seven years.

When Mr. Thissell started in life his sole capital was what Providence had given him—a strong constitution and an active brain. He started in life in the midst of a vast wilderness, but by industry and economy has succeeded in securing for himself and family a large fortune. He always took an active part in educational matters. During the term of his office as State Senator he secured a grant of one-half township of land for the support of the Corinth Academy.

JOSIAH CROSBY

was born November 24, 1816, in Dover, New Hampshire, and is the son of Oliver Crosby and Harriot Chase, his wife. The family removed to Atkinson, Maine, in 1820. Josiah was fitted for college at Foxcroft Academy; entered Bowdoin College in February, 1832, at the second term of the freshman class; was graduated with the class in 1835, and took the degree of A. M. at Bowdoin in 1838. He remained at home some months in ill-health and then studied law one year with Hon. Alfred Johnson, at Belfast, six months with Hon. Frederick Hobbs, at Bangor, six months with Hon. Charles P. Chandler, at Dover, and was admitted to the Bar in Piscataquis county in September, 1838. He practiced law with Mr. Chandler, in copartnership six months, then moved to Levant (now Kenduskeag); tarried there a year and a half, and then removed to Exeter, from which place he removed to Dexter in January, 1845, where he has remained to the present time, practicing in the courts of Penobscot, Piscataquis, and Somerset counties, and in the United States courts for Maine.

He was married February 15, 1844, to Henrietta Hill, daughter of Henry Hill, Esq., of Exeter. By her he had two children who died in earliest infancy. His wife died December 28, 1846. For his second wife he married Mary Bradbury Foss, daughter of Simon Foss, of Dexter, February 27, 1849, born March 22, 1834, by whom he has nine children, eight of whom are now living, as follows: Henrietta Hill, born February 18, 1850; May May 1, 1852; Oliver, January 29, 1856; Simon Percy, September 24, 1858; Josiah Willis, May 29, 1862; Annie Cornelia, February 9, 1866; Philip Sidney, February 4, 1869, died July 25, 1870; Charles James Fox, December 12, 1871; Clara Ingersoll, March 23, 1878.

Henrietta Hill, educated in part at Antioch College, was married in 1871 to Humphrey M. Blaisdell, a surveyor in Fairmount, Martin county, Minnesota, where they now reside. Oliver, a graduate of the State College at Orono in 1876, married Lizzie Wood, of Dexter, in 1878. He is a machinist, and they now reside in St. Paul, Minnesota. The other children are unmarried. May is in the Treasury Department at Washington, D. C. Simon Percy is in his senior year at the State College. Josiah Willis entered the freshman class at Bowdoin in 1868, and the others are at home.

In politics Mr. Crosby was always a Whig until the Republican party came into existence, which, in a small way, he aided in forming, and remained an earnest member of the party to the present time. In 1857, 1863, and 1865 he was a member of the House of Representatives of Maine from the class composed of Dexter and Corinna. In 1867-68 he was a member of the Senate from Penobscot county, serving on the Judiciary Committee during the years of his membership of either House, except in 1868, when he was President of the Senate. He always took an active part in legislation and occasionally wrote out his speeches, which were published—one in 1857 in opposition to the bill to create an additional Judge of the Supreme Judicial Court (the purpose of the bill being to restore Judge Davis). In 1863, aided materially by Hon. Daniel Elliot, of Brunswick, then in the Senate, he introduced and carried through a bill to reduce the salary of the Land Agent, after an arduous struggle. The report of committee, drawn by him, and signed by Mr. Elliot and himself, was published. In 1865 he made a speech in opposition to report of Committee on Elections ejecting Mr. Jordan, of Berwick, from his seat, which was published in the Kennebec Journal and copied into the Maine Democrat. In 1867 he made a speech on a resolve to amend the State Constitution so as to grant State aid to railroads, which was published in the Kennebec Journal, copied into the Belfast Progressive Age, and subsequently, by request, published in pamphlet form. In 1856 he made a speech, published in the Kennebec Journal, favoring the resumption of Town debts to the extent of $200 per man instead of $100 as proposed by the bill.

In 1870, when not a member, he made a speech before the Committee on Railroads, in presence of most members of the Legislature, in opposition to consolidation of railroads, which by request was written out and published in the Kennebec Journal. This speech attracted as much attention from the public as any ever made by Mr. Crosby, and in the minds of some it had the credit of defeating the bill. In 1861 he pronounced an eulogy at the ceremony of erecting a monument to Lieutenant Lyman S. Richardson, of Garland, killed at the first Bull Run battle, published in the Bangor Whig and Courier. In 1874, at the request of the members of the Penobscot Bar he pronounced an eulogy before the Supreme Court on the character of the late Daniel Barker, published in the Whig and Courier and Dexter Gazette, and a portion of it included in a biographical sketch introductory to a volume of his poems subsequently published. In 1878 he made a short address at the funeral of Benjamin F. Horton, in Dexter, published in the Dexter Gazette and a portion of it copied into a Boston newspaper.

In law he has had a varied practice, in civil, equity and criminal cases, before the jury and before the full court, in the State courts and in the United States courts for Maine. He has defended two capital cases for arson successfully. In 1873, associated with Hon. Josiah H. Drummond, he defended Henry Hudson, a lawyer of Guilford, and Charles Foss, then Sheriff of Piscataquis county, in the United States District Court, on a charge of resisting a United States Deputy Marshal, a sort of "treason." Foss was acquitted. Hudson was convicted, unjustly in the opinion of Mr. Crosby. He has defended successfully two cases of indictments charging an assault, one with a pitchfork, one with a loaded pistol with intent to kill. In January, 1878, Arthur Annette, of Dexter, was arrested and examined before Judge Goodenow, of the Police Court, Bangor, on a charge of robbing the safe of the Eastern Express Company in Dexter of $4,000. Judge Goodenow came to Dexter to hear the case. Mr. Crosby defended him before the Judge, and wrote out his argument, which was published in the Dexter Gazette February 8, 1878. Annette was subsequently indicted for the robbery but was discharged without a trial, the public almost unanimously believing him innocent. Mr. Crosby has been counsel for the Dexter & Newport Railroad Company from its organization in 1867 to the present time. He took great interest in forwarding the enterprise, making a great many speeches to the farmers, endeavoring to make them believe that the stock would pay them annually a dividend of six per cent., which has proved to be correct.

On Memorial Day, May 30, 1878, he delivered an address before the members of H. F. Safford Post, G. A. R., in Dexter, published in the Dexter Gazette May 31.

He has occasionally written other articles or short essays on topics of temporary interest, and published the same in the newspapers over his own signature, of which he has retained no copies—particularly on favoring the policy of President Grant for the annexation of San Domingo, and earnestly advocating it.

V. A. Sprague

Mr. Crosby became a member of the Maine Historical Society in 1868. He has ever been a Unitarian in religion, of temperate habits and very industrious, but not so industrious as to endanger his life, as too many men, especially Yankees, do. In pecuniary affairs with some up and downs, he has upon the whole been moderately prosperous; has enjoyed the comforts of life to a reasonable extent, some but not many of its luxuries, but visited "The Centennial" with his wife, and thence visited his daughter in Minnesota. He desires much to visit Europe. Mr. Crosby is a director in the First National Bank of Dexter. He settled in the country in preference to the city for the reason that he thought the physical activity of a country practice would be more conducive to health than the more lucrative but more stationary habits of a city life. His family is the source of measureless happiness to him, far beyond the dreams of wealth. Upon the whole he has but little inclination or cause to find fault with the world.

VOLNEY A. SPRAGUE.

Elijah W. Sprague was born in Bethel, Oxford county, Maine, December 23, 1784. His father moved from Hingham, Massachusetts (the former home of all the good Spragues), to Bethel about 1782. When quite young Elijah went to live with his uncle William, in the town of Greene, where he lived until twenty years of age, then came to Dexter. He had learned the blacksmith's trade, and as soon as he had located he set up his forge in the open air and commenced doing the blacksmithing for Dexter and Corinna. The joke is told of him that a Corinna man enquired how far it was to Sprague's blacksmith shop, and was told that he was then in the shop, but that he was then three and one-half miles from the anvil. In 1812 he married Phœba Parker. He had five children, all of whom are now living—two in Illinois, one in Kansas, and two in Maine. He never had the advantages of a school, as he never attended school but six weeks. His education was fair, however, he having the reputation of being the best mathematician in town. He held many town offices, and for twelve years held the office of Deputy-Sheriff. While holding this office he detected and broke up a gang of counterfeiters in the town of Exeter; found their plates and printing materials, and obtained sufficient evidence to send the whole gang to the State prison. In 1858 he removed to the State of Illinois, and died at Joliet in 1879, at the advanced age of ninety-five years, being the last of the original settlers of Dexter.

His second son, V. A. Sprague, the subject of this sketch, and whose portrait is herein represented, was born January 28, 1817. He lived at home until fourteen years of age, when he came to the village of Dexter and entered the employ of Eli Winslow as painter. When sixteen years of age he taught his first school, and spent his time, until twenty-one years of age, in painting, attending school, and teaching school. He then entered Colby University (then Waterville College), where he graduated in 1842. On account of ill health he was obliged to travel, and went south as far as Maryland and Virginia, where he remained five years, teaching school when able. In 1847, his health being improved, he returned to Dexter and commenced the study of law with the Hon. Josiah Crosby, and in 1848 was admitted to the Bar, and immediately commenced the practice of law in Corinna, where he continued in practice twenty-three years, when he returned to Dexter, where he now lives, and is now the senior member of the law firm of V. A. & M. Sprague. While in Corinna he held the office of Postmaster thirteen years. In every sense of the word he is a specimen of a self-made man, and the history of his past life furnishes additional evidence that integrity of purpose, coupled with perseverance and assiduous labor, will overcome all the difficulties which may beset the path of the young American, and enable him to fully fit himself for honorable and useful positions in society. In politics he was a member of the Democratic party until 1856, when he became a member of the Republican party, of which party he is now an active member. In 1849 he married Susan M. Sloper, of Waterville, and is the father of two children: Morrill, who married Edith E. Edgerly, and resides in Dexter, engaged in the practice of law with his father, and Wilson, who lives in Portland, Maine, engaged as mechanical draftsman for the Portland Company's locomotive works.

HON. CHARLES SHAW.

Hon. Charles Shaw was born in Corrington, Hampshire county, Massachusetts, in 1811. He was one of a family of thirteen children. When sixteen years of age he made an agreement with his father that if he would give him his time he would pay him $100. He apprenticed himself to a shoemaker in Corrington, where he served nearly four years. At the end of three years he went to Hingham, where he followed his trade, working one year for Caleb Stetson. From there he returned to Corrington, where he went into partnership with his brother in the shoe business, which partnership continued seven years, and in 1837 he purchased one-half interest in his brother Breckly's tannery in Corrington. He remained in partnership with his brother three years, when he sold out and returned to the shoe business, in which he was engaged five years. He afterwards purchased an interest in the old Hubbard tannery, where he remained until 1851, when he sold out his interest and came to Dexter, Penobscot county, and immediately purchased the tannery which he now owns, in company with F. Shaw & Brothers. The partnership existed about nine years, when he purchased his partners' interest, and has remained in the business as sole owner up to the present time. He is one of the most extensive manufacturers of leather in the State of Maine, having had control of six tanneries at one time, with an average capacity of two hundred and twenty-five tons each. He has now in his employ, to carry on his extensive business, seventy-two men. He is a thorough-going, upright business man, and has the respect and confidence of all with whom he comes in contact. In 1850 he was elected a Representative of the town of Corrington, Massachusetts, and in 1867 he was elected Representative by his class to the State Legislature of Maine, and in 1873 and 1874 he represented his class as State Senator, where he served with great credit on several important committees, viz.: Agriculture, Manufactures, and Indian Affairs; was Chairman of Committee on State Prison, and Chairman of the Special Committee appointed to investigate the affairs of the State Prison, also was one of the Committee on Railroads. In politics he was a member of the Democratic party until 1848, when he became a member of the Free-soil party, and afterwards became a member of the Republican party. He is President of the Dexter & Newport Railroad, and First National Bank of Dexter. In 1837 he married Jane P. Whiteing, a native of Hingham, Massachusetts. She was the mother of seven children. She died in Dexter in 1855. He afterwards married Elizabeth G. Roberts, and is the father of eleven children—Flora, who married Shepperd Parkman, died in Burnham; Helen F., Charles B., and Millisse J., died in infancy; Greenville J., who married Jennie Loose, and lives in Hartland; Willis I., who married Ellen Rogers, and lives in New Limerick, Aroostook county; Orlando, died in Dexter; Elizabeth G., lives at home; Charles O., lives in Johnsbury, New York; Millisse, died when one year old; Walter B., lives at home.

DR. GEORGE A. HAINES.

This well known dentist of Dexter was born in June, 1825, in Dexter; his father, Walter Haines, married Elizabeth Folsom. He is a descendant of Governor Haines, of Connecticut, who governed that colony when it was under British rule. His father was a native of New Hampshire, and his mother was born in Maine, though then a part of Massachusetts. Walter Haines was a house carpenter and joiner, and was only able to give his son a common school education, and then set him to learn the blacksmith and carriage business in a shop in Bangor. Here young Haines worked diligently for eight years, when his health failed. Having a natural taste for mechanics, and thinking that a better field was then presented in dental surgery, he entered the office of Dr. Proctor, of Dexter, and studied with him. He afterward finished his preparatory studies with Dr. Osgood, of Bangor, and entered the College of Dental Surgery in Philadelphia, where he was graduated in 1868. During the time he was in college he came to Dexter and worked for one year and then went back and finished his studies. Since finishing his course he has been established in the practice of his profession here in Dexter, in which he has been successful.

The doctor married Martha N. Severance, daughter of Thomas Severance, a tanner. They have now living five children, having lost two in infancy. The doctor is what may be called a self-made man. He has by his own efforts not only succeeded in getting his professional education after he had worked for years at another trade and lost his health for a time, but seems to have made a success in his business. He has been able to send three of his sons to college, one being a successful physician and surgeon in Ellsworth, Maine, and the other two are dentists; one in Salmon Falls and the other a popular dentist in Dexter.

Dr. Haines has always been liberal in assisting all public enterprises in town, and ready to do his part in building up educational and religious institutions.

He is not a politician; though he has position and decided opinions, he finds no time to devote to politics. He attends the Methodist Episcopal church, and gives liberally to its support, though at present not a member.

The doctor is a man easily approached by strangers, affable and pleasant in his manners, and does not appear to feel that he is better than his neighbors.

REUBEN FLANDERS.

Stephen Flanders was probably the first and only one of the name that emigrated to America during its early history. He, with his wife Jane, came to Salisbury, Massachusetts, between the years 1640 and 1646, and were among the first settlers in that town. He was admitted as Townsman in February, 1650. This was different from being admitted as a freeman, as the latter was conferred by the General Quarterly Court only. He died June 27, 1684. His wife died November 19, 1683. One of their descendants, Reuben Flanders, the subject of this sketch, was born in the town of Cornville, Somerset county, Maine, 1811, where he received a common education. He was brought up on a farm and remained in Cornville until nineteen years of age, when he came to Dexter, Penobscot county, and settled in the village, where he engaged in the business of cabinet-making, and was the pioneer of that branch of business in the village. In 1856 he invented a machine for manufacturing orange and lemon boxes, but never got it patented, and he is now in possession of the machine that cut the first box ever manufactured in the world. He followed his trade in Dexter about thirty years, when he sold out, and in 1867 he purchased the mill property of Charles Jumper, about four miles north of the village of Dexter, and engaged extensively in the manufacture of long and short lumber. He has never sought or allowed himself to run for office of any kind whatever, but always attended strictly to business. In politics he was originally an Old Line Whig, but at the organization of the Republican party he became a Republican. He is a Universalist in faith. He is a thorough-going business man, having been thrown on his own resources at the age of nineteen years, with hardly a dollar, but by industry and economy has accumulated a comfortable fortune. In 1840 he married Abigail B. Allen, a native of Cambridge, Maine. She died in the village of Dexter. Mr. Flanders is the father of five children, three boys and two girls—William R., who died in Dexter at the age of twenty-four years; Susan A., who died in Dexter at the age of sixteen years; Esther W., who died at the present residence at the age of twenty-four years; Elbridge A., who lives at home; and Freeland N., who lives in Minnesota, where he is engaged in the lumber business.

Thomas Pluisted

HON. FRANCIS W. HILL

was born in Exeter, Penobscot county, in 1819, where he received a liberal education. He engaged in farming until twenty-five years of age, when he purchased the store and stock of goods at Exeter Corner, of John D. Prescott, and entered into the mercantile business, in which business he was engaged twelve years, when he sold out the stock of goods to Thomas Mansfield, and engaged in the real estate business, in which business he is now engaged. He owns more real estate than any man in the county, and is considered the best authority on real estate transfers in the State of Maine. He has held the office of Selectman, Treasurer, Clerk, and Overseer of the Poor from time to time for the past thirty years. In 1855 he was appointed High Sheriff of Penobscot county by Governor Crosby, which office he held two years, and the duties of which he discharged to the satisfaction of all. In 1879 he was elected Representative by his class, and in 1880 he was elected State Senator, which office he now holds. In 1870 he was elected President of the Somerset Railroad, and acted as such for three years. He is also Director of the Somerset and the Northern Aroostook Railways. In 1876 he was chosen a delegate to the St. Louis Convention, and was chosen one of the vice-presidents of the convention. The same year he was chosen as one of the district electors. In politics he was originally an old-line Whig, but in 1856 he became a member of the Democratic party, to which party he belonged until 1879, when he became a member of the Greenback party. While a member of the Democratic party he was a member of the State Committee for about eight years. He is now a member of the State Committee of the Greenback party, and holds the office of Chairman of the Board of the Finance Committee. Although not a member of any church, he contributes liberally to the support of all denominations; he also takes a deep interest in the public schools, and firmly believes that religion and education are the main pillars of our free institutions. In 1845 he married Sarah A. True, a native of Garland, and is the father of four children—Mary E., who died in Exeter at the age of fourteen; Mabel T., who married Hon. Harris M. Plaisted and resides at Bangor; Frank W. lives at home; Gertrude W. lives at home. He has held the office of Director of the Maine Central Railroad for over eight years, and owns a large amount of stock in the same, and is always ready to assist any railroad enterprise in the State, believing that it is the only true means of developing its resources. He is both generous and kind-hearted, and is always ready to contribute to the relief of the poor, and is known in the community in which he lives as the poor man's friend. He is a kind husband and an indulgent father, generous to a fault, and highly respected by all with whom he comes in contact.

HON. WILLIAM PLAISTED.

Hon. William Plaisted, of Lincoln, Penobscot county, Maine, was born October 24, 1815, in Jefferson, New Hampshire. He is a son of Deacon William and Nancy Plaisted. (For sketch of early family history see the biography of his brother, Governor Plaisted, which appears in this work). His father was a farmer and William spent his early boyhood, as so many of the prominent men of our country have done, in assisting at the farm work. He attended the district school and obtained such an education as was at that time afforded in the country public schools. Being the eldest of the family he early started out for himself, and when eighteen years of age we find him in Gardiner, Maine, sawing wood. This he followed but a short time, however, while looking for a better job. Being possessed of great energy and a determination to do well whatever he did, he soon obtained a situation in a tannery. Here, by close attention to the minutest details of the business, he soon had the confidence and esteem of his employers, and in a short time was advanced to the position of foreman of the establishment. Here he remained seven years, the last four years having entire charge of the business. In 1840 he bought one-fourth interest in Cook & Nutting's tannery and began business for himself. He continued in business here for four years, when he went to Mercer and bought a tannery with his brother-in-law, Mr. Church. Though the tannery was in Mercer Mr. Plaisted lived in Augusta, and attended to the outside business, buying the hides for tanning and selling the leather. Here he lived for three years, and then went to Stetson and built a large tannery, with a capacity of about four hundred tons of bark yearly. He lived in Stetson and continued in the manufacture of leather until 1869, when he removed to Lincoln and built the large tannery here. In 1868 he bought the old tannery at Princeton and built it over, enlarging its size to about double its former capacity.

In 1869 his son Thomas was taken into the firm and the firm name has since been William Plaisted & Son. Their two tanneries have a capacity of 8,500 cords of bark per year. They make what is known as Buffalo Sole Leather, using almost exclusively Calcutta buffalo hides. They have $150,000 invested in the business, and manufacture from $150,000 to $200,000 worth of leather per year. Mr. Plaisted married Martha Forbes, of Windsor, Vermont, daughter of Absalom Forbes. They have had eight children—Lizzie, wife of Mr. Thomas Hersey, of Bangor; William P., now in Princeton, Maine; Thomas M., of Lincoln; Nancy, now Mrs. F. C. Plaisted, of Lincoln, and Harry, residing in Minnesota. The deceased were Mary E., Emma F., Jesse, and Charles.

Mr. Plaisted in politics has been a Republican until the formation of the Greenback party. Believing in the principles of that party he has of late voted with it. In 1868 he was elected to the State Senate, and filled the position in a manner satisfactory to his constituents. Since early boyhood he has been a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, and is a leader in all enterprises of public charity and the relief of the poor. He is a man very highly spoken of by his townsmen and respected by all who know him. He has by legitimate business, carried on as it has been in an honorable manner, acquired success in business life.

Thomas Plaisted, who is associated with his father in business, was born May 18, 1848, in Augusta, Maine. He completed his education at Kent's Hill Seminary. He married Miss Emma Henrys, of Lincoln. They have two children—Ella and Marjory. In 1879 and 1880 he was elected a member of the Legislature on the Greenback ticket.

HORATIO S. AYER.

William R. Ayer, the subject of this sketch, was born in Newfield, York county, Maine, in 1825, where he received a liberal education; he also attended school at the Charleston Academy. He came to Lincoln about 1846, and entered into the mercantile business, in which business he was engaged until his death. He was frequently elected Selectman of Lincoln, and represented his class in the State Legislature one term. In politics he was a Democrat and always took an active part in political matters. He was postmaster of Lincoln for many years, and took a deep interest in educational matters; was one of the Trustees and Treasurer of Mattanawcook Academy, located at Lincoln; was one of the leading men of the county and was foremost in every enterprise that would be of any public benefit. He was twice married. His first wife was Rebecca B. Burnham, a native of Limerick, York county, Maine. She died in Lincoln in 1871. He afterwards married Emily E. Morrison, a native of Bangor. He died in Lincoln, June 1, 1881, mourned by a large circle of friends. He was the father of three children by his first wife: Ella E., who married James H. McAvity, and resides in St. Johns, New Brunswick; Horatio S., who married Mary R. Ayer, and lives in Lincoln, where he is engaged in the mercantile business; Mattie, died in infancy.

HON. ASA SMITH.

Probably no man was more widely known and highly respected in all northern Penobscot Valley than the late Hon. Asa Smith, of Mattawamkeag. His parents emigrated from Ipswich, Massachusetts, about 1795, and settled in what is now a part of Auburn, Maine. His father's name was Petatiah, and his grandfather's John Smith. There is a Bible in the family of his brother, John Smith, of Auburn, Maine, which contains a record of five generations of John Smiths; as far back as 1654. The dates of birth are as follows: The first, October 29, 1654; his wife's name was Elizabeth. The second John Smith, born December 28, 1678; wife, Hannah Martin. The third John Smith, born November 9, 1706, died October 20, 1776; wife, Abigail Dans, born August 11, 1712, died November 1, 1791. The fourth John Smith, born May 23, 1732, died October 21, 1805. The fifth John Smith, born in 1760. His son Petatiah was father of Asa Smith, and, as stated above, settled in Danville, now Auburn. He was a farmer, and Asa spent his boyhood on the farm. He was born August 12, 1798, and received such a limited education as the common schools of that period afforded. In December, 1821, he first came into the Penobscot Valley, and stopped at Passadumkeag about a year and a half, during which time he worked in a store. It was here that he became acquainted with Miss Louisa Haynes, who became his wife in 1826, February 19. On account of his father's death in 1823 he returned to the old home and settled up his father's estate, and remained there until 1827, at which time he made a final remove to the Penobscot River and settled at Passadumkeag. From that time till 1830 he was engaged in lumbering with Alvin Haynes, his wife's brother. In 1830 he removed to Lincoln for a short time, and from there to Haynesville, Aroostook county. At that time there were no roads above Lincoln, and the journey had to be performed up the Penobscot and Mattawamkeag Rivers in batteaux. These obstacles, however, did not deter the early settlers of Northern Maine, and the young couple successfully accomplished the undertaking. Their nearest neighbor for a time was twelve miles distant, but the Military Road being built soon after, settlers began to flock in and built up the new country. Mr. Smith lived here five years, at the end of which time (June, 1835,) he purchased the hotel property, a log house on the site of the present Mattawamkeag House, of Mr. Kelsey. Mr. Smith took possession of this property June 4. Soon after, Mr. Sturgis, who had kept the property for Mr. Kelsey, moved out of town, leaving but two other families in town—George Wait, on the north side of the river, and James Thompson. This property embraced the whole town site. James Thompson at that time carried the Bangor and Houlton mail. He soon left town, as also did Mr. Wait, leaving Mr. Smith the only settler, as we understand the records furnished us. Mr. Smith's success up to this time had not been such as to enable him to pay for this property, yet by dint of perseverance, cheered by his noble, loving wife, after four years of toil and economy he was able to call the valuable property he was occupying his own. The after years of his life were comparatively easy, yet there was none the less activity displayed. He now engaged quite extensively in farming, and kept a store in connection with his hotel business. Here he spent the remainder of his life, with the exception of a few years spent in Lincoln that he might give his children an opportunity to attend school. In his business relations Mr. Smith was strictly honest, and accumulated a competency by legitimate business methods, never engaging in speculations of any kind. It was a favorite saying of his that "economy, honesty, and energy are the essential requisites of success." His strict honesty, energy, and business ability caused him to be often and constantly called to positions of trust and responsibility. He was Town Treasurer for nineteen successive years (ever since the town was organized), and postmaster at Mattawamkeag and Mattawamkeag Forks for forty years. He was three times elected a member of the Maine Board of Agriculture, and through him the charter of the North Penobscot Agricultural Society was obtained. He was the first President of this society, and always took great interest in its welfare. For many years he was a Director in the Merchants' National Bank of Bangor.

In 1843 he was elected to the Legislature, and to the Senate for the years 1846 and 1847. He was again elected to the House for the years 1854 and 1855. In 1859 he became a member of the Horeb Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons at Lincoln, and in 1873, of the Pine Lodge of the same order in Mattawamkeag. He was a public-spirited and generous man. He gave the right of way through his land to the European & North American Railroad Company, and presented the land where their machine shops are built. In politics Mr. Smith was a Democrat, and was elected and appointed to all offices he held, by that party. During his later life he took great interest in religious matters. We copy the following from an obituary notice in Zion's Herald, which appeared at the time of his death:

In the wilds of Northern Maine there was very little to lead a person to an open profession of religion, and it was only twenty years ago that he resolved that he would take God as his guide and counselor. Possessing a sensitive and retiring disposition, his growth in grace was not so manifest as it was deep and heartfelt; yet there was abundant evidence of his acceptance with God. Some five years ago, during the labors of Rev. J. A. Moreau he, with his only daughter, was led to join the Methodist Episcopal church, and as Superintendent of the Sabbath-school, Steward and Trustee he was an honor to the church, and faithful to the cause of God.

During the last years of his life he did much for the church. His home was always open for ministers, and he gave liberally for their support. Only two years before his death he gave a lot of land, and subscribed liberally toward the erection of the church which was built thereon. During his last sickness his faith was strong; he loved to speak of the goodness of God, and was willing to trust all with Him, and often said, "If I go or remain, it will be for the best." It would not be proper to close our brief sketch of this good man without mentioning his estimable wife who has stood by his side through all the hardships of their pioneer life, and who still survives him. Her father was one of the early settlers of Passadumkeag, and the family was widely known and highly respected. She is a most estimable woman, and by her many acts of kindness and charity, her readiness to assist those who are in need of help, she has endeared herself to a large circle of friends. The family of Mr. and Mrs. Smith consisted of six children, viz: Hannah E., widow of the late H. S. Wing, of Mattawamkeag; Elbridge G. H., of Mattawamkeag; George W.; Charles A.; Louisa, deceased, and Asa H. Mr. Smith died December 16, 1880. His cordial greeting, hearty grasp of the hand, his words of counsel and encouragement will long be remembered. A true citizen, a faithful friend, a kind and affectionate husband and father, his good works will long cause his name to be held in grateful and honored remembrance. His portrait and home are shown in this work.

E. W. SHAW.

E. W. Shaw was born in Lecora, New Hampshire, in 1822. At the age of four years he came to the State of Maine with his parents and settled in Palmyra, Somerset county, where he received a common school education. He also attended the Hartland Academy a short time. In 1845 he married Mary E. Palmer, a native of Palmyra; she died in 1847. In 1850 he went to California, where he engaged in lumbering and mining, in which business he was engaged four years, and met with good success, when he returned to Palmyra, where he married Maria W. Elkins, and in 1855 came to Penobscot county, and settled in Newport, where he has followed farming, lumbering, and trading at different times. He served as deputy Sheriff of Penobscot county for twenty years; was also appointed a member of the Valuation Committee of the State by Governor Davis in 1880. In politics he has always been a Republican, and has always taken a deep interest in political matters.

When he started in life he was not worth a dollar, but by industry has accumulated a nice fortune, and is considered one of the best financiers in Penobscot county. He is the father of five children—Mary C., died in Palmyra, at the age of sixteen years; Walter K., lives in Bangor, engaged in the boot and shoe business; Frances A., married Don A. H. Powers, and resides in Newport.

Samuel Elkins was born in Brintwood, New Hampshire, in 1768. He came to the State of Maine at an early day, and settled in Palmyra, where he married Martha Davis, a native of Newfield. He was a farmer, in which business he was engaged all his life; also engaged in the lumbering business a short time. His wife died in Palmyra in 1872; he died in Palmyra in 1875. He was the father of four children—Joseph M., who married Elizabeth Allen and came to his death by being drowned in California; Emeline, who married Randall McCrillis, and lives in Palmyra; James R., married Esta Tuttle, and lives in Palmyra; Maria W., who married E. W. Shaw, and lives in Newport; Bessie A. Lincoln and Mary C., second, live at home.

JESSE R. WADLEIGH.

The subject of this sketch, Jesse R. Wadleigh, was born in Candia, New Hampshire. He never had the privileges of a school education, but as he advanced in years he became one of the most expert mathematicians in his neighborhood. He was one of the first settlers of Oldtown; came here at an early day with his brother Ira and built the Wadleigh mills. They also built the first hotel (the Wadleigh House) at Oldtown. They ran the hotel and mills in partnership for many years. As a citizen, Jesse Wadleigh was ever active in all benevolent and charitable enterprises, giving liberally according to his means. In politics he was a Democrat. He married Susan M. Giant, of Winterport, and died in Oldtown in 1871, mourned by a large circle of friends. His wife died in Oldtown in 1874. They had a family of six children—Andrew, who married Mariah Black and resides in California; Caroline M., who married Jacob Bacon and lives in California; Rufus D., who died in Oldtown; Rufus D. 2d, who married Mariah Davis and resides in Oldtown, where he is engaged in the lumber business; and Sarah, who died when seven years of age.

MOSES P. WADLEIGH.

Moses P. Wadleigh, the subject of this sketch, was born in Oldtown in 1826, where he received a common school education. He also attended the Charleston Academy a short time. He has always been engaged in the lumber business, and is one among the heaviest dealers on the Penobscot. He keeps in his employ constantly from seventy-five to one hundred men. He probably has been in the lumber business longer, and has handled more lumber during his lifetime, than any man on the Penobscot River. He is a self-made man, and has accumulated a comfortable fortune. He is also the possessor of one of the neatest residences in the village of Oldtown, a view of which can be seen on the opposite page. In politics he is independent, always supporting the party or candidate that suits him best. He was twice married, his first wife being Climenia Moore, who died at Oldtown in 1852. He afterward married Emma T. Nesbit, a native of Biddeford, Maine. He is the father of six children, two by his first wife and four by his present wife: Carrie died when three years of age; Jesse died in infancy; Ralph B. died when seven years of age; Moses, Leith and Alfred live at home.

HON. JOSEPH L. SMITH.

Among the most prominent citizens of Oldtown and of the county is the well-known lumberman and political leader, Major Joseph Locke Smith. He is a native of the Pine Tree State, born at the ancestral home in Palmyra, Somerset county, November 29, 1818, the fifth son of Asa and Mary J. (Cowan) Smith, who had a family of six sons and three daughters. His early years were spent upon the farm of his father and in attendance upon the district school. When he was but seven years of age, in 1825, his father removed to Bangor, where he was engaged for a year as a carpenter and house-builder. He then took his family to Oldtown, where he settled permanently as a maker of batteaux, which were then in great demand, especially for the transportation of supplies to the lumber-camps on the East and West Branches of the Penobscot. He soon became a leading man in the community, and was entrusted with important local offices, holding among others that of Town Treasurer for a number of successive years.

Young Joseph attended the village school for a short time every year until he was fifteen, when he became ambitious of somewhat higher education, and was sent for a term to the academy then flourishing at Charleston, in this county. He attended this school in the winter of 1833-34, and then went to the famous academy of that day at China, in Kennebec county. A single term here, in his seventeenth year, finished his formal education in the public schools, and he soon began the battle of life for himself. His opportunities had not been neglected, however, and the knowledge acquired under his teachers has been faithfully used and improved by much reading and observation in his later career.

Mr. Smith, soon after leaving the China Academy, engaged at light wages in the heavy work of lumbering on the Penobscot. In the spring he received somewhat better pay for assistance in booming and rafting on the river, and in a short time, by the severe labors of winter and summer, he amassed the sum of $400, which was to him then a small fortune. He invested his means, in partnership with Isaac Staples, another young man of Oldtown, in the grocery business in that place, which he pursued until he was twenty-one years of age, when he sold his interest to his partner and formed a company with Messrs. H. R. and W. N. Soper and Charles Fisk, for lumbering operations on the West Branch of the Penobscot. They were moderately successful in these, clearing during the first season the sum of $1,200. This was the beginning of forty-three years of continuous business in the great staple of the Penobscot Valley and other parts of Maine and New Brunswick where he has operated. After some years' transactions on the Penobscot he formed a company with his brother, William H. Smith, of Oldtown, and also Gorham L. Byington and Daniel Bradley, of Bangor, for the purchase of a mill-site on the Canifacacious Bay, St. John River, a short distance from the city of St. John. A fine steam saw-mill, with a capacity for turning out several millions of feet per year, besides square timber, was constructed at this point, and kept supplied chiefly from the Maine forests on the Upper St. John, Aroostook, and Fish Rivers. Major Smith was in personal charge of the operations on these streams, and managed them to the entire satisfaction of his partners, who confided implicitly in his judgment upon all matters within his field of the business. After ten years in New Brunswick, the mill and associated interests were sold by the company to the Roberts Brothers, of St. John.

Two years afterwards, in 1865, he and the same bother, with Captain S. H. L. Whittier of Lincoln, and H. R. Beverage of New Brunswick, entered into a partnership for running a line of steamers known as the People's Line, on the St. John River. It soon became popular and prosperous, requiring in time three boats to meet the demands of travel upon it. In 1875 the line was sold to the owner of the narrow-gauge railroad which had been constructed along the river above Fredericton. During a part of the same period the two Smiths, having bought the steamers engaged in the Penobscot trade from Oldtown to Winn, were also running that line, but sold it in 1870 to the rival interes then in operation, the European & North American Railroad, which also purchased their share in the stage route from Bangor to Mattawamkeag. In 1860 they, with William B. Pearson of Bangor, had purchased of Rufus Dwinel the site of his mills at West Great Works, which had been burned, and rebuilt and ran them until 1866, he sold the property. Of late years Major Smith has been mainly engaged in heavy logging operations in the West Branch of the Penobscot and elsewhere.

In the midst of his busy private employments Major Smith has found time for more public duties. An early member of the Republican party, he became active in its councils; in 1860 was elected First Selectman of Oldtown, and in the fall of the same year a Representative in the State Legislature, where he took his seat for a single term in 1861. He was returned to the Legislature, but as Senator, in 1862, and also in 1872 and 1873. In 1878, having been converted to the principles of the Greenback party, he was made the candidate of that organization for the high office of Governor, and was a participant in the memorable struggle of the next winter over the returns of the election. His name was again prominent in the politics of the State during the Senatorial canvass of the winter of 1880-81. He was honored with the caucus nomination of the Greenback and Democratic members of the Legislature, and received 64 votes in the Assembly for the office of United States Senator, against the 83 cast for the Hon. Eugene Hale.

Major Smith derives his military title from his appointment, during the first year of the war, to the staff of Major General James H. Butler, of Bangor, commanding the First Division of State Militia. In his capacity as aid-de-camp he attended at the elections of officers of the companies formed at Oldtown, Calais, Machias, and Pembroke, and otherwise performed efficient and valued services during the period of the Rebellion.

In 1840, November 12, when he had almost reached his twenty-second birthday, Major Smith was united in marriage to Miss Amelia C., daughter of Thomas and Hannah (Keene) Lebalister, of Windsor, Maine, who remains his faithful helpmate to this day. They have had three children, all daughters, named respectively Caroline Amelia, Harriet Bakeman, and Elizabeth Frances—all of whom have married and passed from under the paternal roof, but still reside near their parents in Oldtown.

DR. ALBION PARKER FOLSOM.

This gentleman, one of the most noted medical practitioners in Eastern Maine, is a native of this county and State, born in Newburg June 4, 1838, fifth child and third son of Major Mark and Sarah (Morrell) Folsom, who occupied a farm in that town, where the elder Folsom still resides. He was not only a farmer, but lumberman; and was in his prime a prominent citizen of the town, a Major in the old State militia, and an active Republican politician, to whom important local offices were often entrusted. The Doctor's grandfather, also named Mark, settled as a pioneer in Dixmont, early in the century. On the father's side the family is English; the race stock of the mother was originally Dutch. They were married about 1830, in Newburg, of which Mrs. Folsom was a native.

Albion Folsom was brought up on the farm, attending the district schools of winters, until the age of fifteen. He then took a position in the drug store of his uncle, Dr. William R. Morrell, at Dexter, and served him as clerk four years, meanwhile attending the High School in that place for the recitation of his Latin lessons. He then studied law for a year with Nathaniel H. Hubbard, of Winterport; but was diverted from his designs upon the legal profession by the formation of a partnership with his uncle aforesaid, in the purchase of the drug store of Dr. R. F. Kensil, at Oldtown. Young Folsom accordingly removed to that place and conducted the business for six months, when he bought out the interest of his uncle, formed a new partnership with his brother, Franklin W. Folsom, then an Oldtown school-teacher, and started a drug store in another part of the village. At Winterport he had begun the study of medicine with Dr. Morrill, his uncle, who had removed from Dexter to that place, and continued his medical readings with Dr. James Bradbury, of Oldtown, and then with his nephew, Dr. Samuel Bradbury, of the same place. In 1863 he took the spring course of lectures in the Medical Department of Bowdoin College, and in the fall of the same year matriculated at the Berkshire Medical College, in Pittsfield, Massachusetts, where he was graduated with the degree of M. D., the same season. The next year an addition was made to the firm in the drug business at Oldtown, which had been kept up during his absence, by the admission of his brother, Major M. M. Folsom. The business was now enlarged by the outfit of a wholesale cart with drugs and medicines, for traveling operations in Eastern Maine, of which Mr. F. W. Folsom took special charge. In 1877 the doctor withdrew from the firm, by reason of the demands of his large practice, which called for all his time and attention, and to which he has since devoted himself with great assiduity and success. He has become widely renowned for the treatment of certain diseases, as diphtheria, and is sometimes called a hundred miles away from home to deal with cases of this dreadful scourge. During the four years in which he has made a specialty of this practice he has treated an average of nearly two hundred cases per year, and is reputed to have saved at least ninety-five per cent.—a remarkable record, truly, and one well worthy of permanent notice. He has also a very large and widespread general business in medicine and surgery; and some of his operations in the latter department are locally quite famous.

Dr. Folsom, aside from his professional talents, has also a decided mechanical genius—which, it may be noted, has served him an excellent purpose in dealing with fractures in his surgical operations. Sundry inventions and devices have occurred to him from time to time, of which, however, he has thus far patented but one—an "improved holdback," or attachment to single harness, to which a patent was granted May 3, 1881. This invention consists of a pair of spring metal cups, fitting over the ends of the thills of the vehicle and provided with eyes through which pass straps, secured around the straps supporting the thill holders, or to the side of the saddle on each side of the horse. It is adapted for use on single vehicles of all descriptions without reference to the size of the horse.

The doctor's circular says of its advantages:

In offering this novel style of Holdback to your consideration, I wish to invite attention to a few of the advantages possessed by it over the common breeching:

1st. It holds the carriage firmly, keeping the tugs straight and preventing sagging, holding the thill-holders in their proper position on the shafts, and checking the sawing movement on the thills, which in the old style quickly defaces the leather with which the thills are commonly covered.

2d. Its Safety.—In case of accident, such for instance as the breakage of the tugs or whiffletree, the cups are instantly drawn off by the forward motion of the horse, freeing him from all attachment to the carriage. If one of the Holdbacks becomes detached from any cause, the remaining one will effectually keep the vehicle from the horse's heels until the damage can be remedied. It allows the animal free use of his legs and diminishes the danger of stumbling, while in case of a fall the horse can be detached from the carriage with much greater ease. When used, as it may be, in connection with the ordinary breeching, it serves as an additional safeguard, particularly desirable in the case of heavily laden wagons.

3d. Its Economy.—It saves time in harnessing and unharnessing, as it is readily slipped on to the thills, and is removed by the forward action of the horse. It saves money, as its first cost is less than one-half that of the common breeching, a mere trifle keeps it in repair, and, as before stated, it saves the wear of the thills and thill-holders.

4th. Not the least of its advantages is the comfort it affords to the horse. In dispensing with the breeching it permits the free use of his legs—a great advantage, particularly when descending steep hills, as all danger of interfering from this cause is avoided—and enables him to hold back the vehicle by means of the large bones and muscles of the shoulders. There is no chafing, sweating or wearing off of hair around the breeching or crouper, nor is there the fretting resulting from the swinging of the carriage upon hilly roads. It follows that the animal is enabled to do more work with less exertion, particularly in hot weather and on rough roads. As to this we may add that dispensing with the harness, back of the saddle, gives an appearance of peculiar elegance to a light harness. The absence of the jerking motion of the carriage inseparable from the old form of breeching adds greatly to the comfort of the driver or occupant of the vehicle.

He has also an application for patent pending, for an improved tooth-forceps, which is believed to make an important change and improvement in the methods of extraction of teeth.

Dr. Folsom was married to his present wife in Bradley, Penobscot county, July 23, 1874. She was Miss Annie G. Burrill, second daughter of Ralph B. and Melinda C. (Dodge) Burrill, of that town. Mrs. Folsom was born in 1848. Dr. and Mrs. Folsom have three children—Harold Morrell, born April 23, 1875; Ralph Parker, born September 3, 1876; and Sara Agnes, born August 26, 1880. All are natives of Oldtown, where the Doctor occupies an elegant residence and grounds at the corner of Brunswick and Brown streets, a little above his office on the latter avenue.

MAJOR MELVILLE M. FOLSOM.

Melville Mark Folsom, the well-known druggist and politician, of Oldtown, is the second son of Mark and Sarah Folsom, of Newburg, of whom some notice is comprised in the previous sketch. He was born at the old home, April 27, 1836. His early education was received in the public schools of his neighborhood, and as he grew old enough he aided in the labors of the farm until the age of seventeen, when he entered Hampden Academy, and studied several terms there and at the Maine State Seminary at Lewiston, teaching every winter in country schools in order to raise means to defray his expenses. About the year 1858 he left the schools as a pupil, but continued to teach in Penobscot and Waldo counties until the war of the Rebellion broke out, when he promptly enlisted in the company of Captain Sawyer, at Dixmont, and was made first lieutenant in the company. This was organized under the State call for ten thousand troops, and was assigned to the Sixth Maine Regiment; but, before it could take the field, orders were received which changed the plans, and obliged its members to vote whether to retain their organization and await future calls, or disband. This company, as has been seen in our chapter on military history, voted to hold itself together, though its members in time became dispersed, and joined other companies in regiments taking the field. In the early fall of the same year (1861) Lieutenant Folsom enlisted in Company K, of the Eleventh Maine Regiment, which company was raised for Colonel H. M. Plaisted's command in Newburg and vicinity. Upon the election of officers of the company he was chosen first lieutenant of this also. The regiment rendezvoused at Augusta, moved to Washington late in the season, and was quartered during the winter at Meridian Hill. The subsequent history of this gallant command has been detailed in our Military Record. Mr. Folsom was with it continuously until September, 1864, when he was sent back to Maine to take recruits to the front, and, as the time of his regiment had then expired, he did not return to the field. During his long and perilous service he was in no less than twenty-two pitched battles, besides countless skirmishes and minor engagements, but escaped through all without a wound, or any disease worse than chill-fever, which he contracted in the swamps of the Chickahominy, and from which he has never since been entirely freed. He was often, as first lieutenant, detailed to the command of companies, and was commissioned, May 14, 1863, as captain, and assigned to duty with Company A, of the Eleventh, with which he remained till the close of the service. Most of the time since the war he has served in the State militia. In 1871 he organized the Hersey Light Infantry, a crack company at Oldtown, and commanded it until 1876, when he was elected Major of the First Regiment, First Brigade, First Division of the militia of the State.

When the Gubernatorial troubles came on in the winter of 1878-79, Major Folsom was appointed Acting Adjutant-General by Governor Garcelon, on the resignation of General S. D. Leavitt, and after the organization of the Legislature he was elected by that body Adjutant-General, and served until the troubles were over, when he was succeeded by the present incumbent of that post. When elected Adjutant-General, Major Folsom resigned his position in the State militia, with which he has not since been connected. He is, however, by appointment of Governor Plaisted, a member of the Executive's military staff, with the grade of Lieutenant-Colonel.

Major Folsom was a Republican in his politics until the campaign of 1876, when he voted for Mr. Tilden for President, but has since been affiliated with the Greenback party. As a Republican he was elected a Representative in the State Legislature of 1872, in which he was a member of the Military Committee, and also of the Committee on Leave of Absence and another committee. He was re-elected to the Legislature of 1873, when he was promoted to the chairmanship of the Military Committee, and also served on other committees. Since the latter term of service he has devoted himself to his private business, taking time, however, upon the organization of the Greenback party in the State in 1878, to serve as a member of the State Committee of that party.

Upon returning from his military service, Major Folsom settled at Oldtown in the drug business, with his brothers, Franklin W., now Representative from Oldtown in the Legislature, and Dr. A. P. Folsom, the subject of the preceding sketch. In 1868 he and his partners built the fine block of seven stores of which their establishment occupies the corner. The year before he and the Doctor unitedly put up the fine and spacious residence in which they live, at the corner of Brunswick and Brown streets.

Major Folsom was brought up in the Free Baptist faith, but is not a member of that church. He is a Master Mason, and has been Marshal of the Star in the East Lodge, at Oldtown, since he came to the place. Beside this he has not cared to involve himself in society obligations.

Major Folsom was married during his military service, May 24, 1863, to Miss Hannah Jane, daughter of Rooke T. and Sarah G. (Gove) Edgerby, of Dixmont. Their offspring number two—Edith Louisa, born October 3, 1865; and Arthur Melville, born June 24, 1868.

EBEN WEBSTER.

The first member of the Webster family to settle in Bangor was Andrew Webster, born in Salisbury, Massachusetts, who first pitched his tent near the present intersection of Main and Water streets in 1771. He moved to Orono about 1795, and built a log cabin near the Stillwater River, opposite the present residence of Elijah Webster, and afterward erected a frame dwelling house on the ground where now lives his granddaughter, Mrs. Martha Treat. He died November 1, 1807; his wife survived him, and died in 1823. During the Revolutionary war he was taken prisoner by the British and carried to Bagaduce. His family consisted of six sons and three daughters.

Colonel Eben Webster, a son of Andrew Webster, was born in Bangor, October 3, 1780, previous to the removal of the family to Orono. When a young man he married Lucy Dudley, daughter of Paul Dudley, Esq., of Milford, September 5, 1805; she died May 5, 1859, having raised a family of six daughters and two sons. Colonel Webster was a man of great enterprise and public spirit, and for more than half a century was one of the most active business men in the county. Webster Brook and Lake were named from him. He spotted and cut the military road from Mattawamkeag to Haynesville, through a vast forest for thirty miles. Judge T. H. Allen was accustomed to say that he was by nature the most perfect gentleman he had ever known. In an obituary notice of him published in one of the Bangor papers it was said: "He will long be remembered by the community in which he lived for his enterprise and perseverance as a business man, but longer and better for the rare and generous qualities developed in his social and family relations, and which formed so prominent a part of his character and stamped him one of nature's noblemen."

Eben Webster, son of Colonel Eben Webster, was born in Oldtown, May 21, 1812. In 1823 his parents removed to Orono, where he now lives. His first work from home was in the employ of Daniel White, in driving a horse team at eleven dollars per month. Soon he was hired to take charge of a crew in the woods, and later was allowed an interest in the business, continuing as a partner fourteen years with Daniel and Samuel White. Of his partners, Mr. Webster says, "Two more honest and upright men never lived in this town." Mr. Webster has been engaged in the lumber business about forty-five years. Eben Webster was married in 1839 to Miss Martha Ann Trafton, daughter of General Mark Trafton, of Bangor; she died at Aiken, South Carolina, January 6, 1850. For a second wife he married in 1852 Miss P. S. Crowell, daughter of Mrs. Lucenia Crowell, of Orono.

Mr. Webster served in the State Legislature in 1875-76, and has been a Selectman in his town four years.

PRESIDENT M. C. FERNALD.

Merritt Caldwell Fernald, A. M., Ph. D., President of the State College at Orono, and for many years a prominent educator in Maine, is a native of the State and county, born in South Levant, May 26, 1838. He was the fourth son of a family which consisted of four boys and one daughter, the oldest of whom died in infancy. His parents were Robert and Roxana (Buswell) Fernald, who had removed from London, New Hampshire, to Penobscot county, some years before. The father's is an old and very extensive family in New Hampshire, as well as Maine. The mother was a native of Wayne, in this State, but undoubtedly shared the blood of the Buswells (or Buzzells) of earliest Bangor. She is still living. The father died in 1843 upon his farm in Levant, where he had also a mill property. Young Merritt rendered some aid in the operations of the mill, but most of his physical labors were upon the home farm. He attended the schools of the town, and the perhaps more efficient school of the fireside, until the age of ten, when he was sent to the Academy at East Corinth. Very early he had manifested a decided taste for mathematics, "ciphering" in long division and to reduction during his first winter in school, when he was but five years old. At the academy he rapidly developed this bent of his mind. In the primary schools he had mastered two or three elementary algebras, and in his second term at Corinth, in the fall of 1848, worked through the higher algebra. From time to time during the next six years he was a pupil here, but at sixteen went to the Seminary at Bucksport, where he began in Greek, having already advanced considerably in the rudiments of Latin. His preparation for college was completed at Bucksport, and with a small party of his fellow-students under Professor Rich, of the Theological Seminary at Bangor, but now of the Bates Theological Seminary; and then under Professor Jona E. Adams, of the Bangor institution. In 1867 he matriculated at Bowdoin College, and went through his undergraduate course uninterruptedly, except by his engagement, every fall, as teacher of a High School which he had established at his native place. This did not, however, interfere with the regular progress of his studies, or his graduation as A. B. with his class in 1861, he taking, in his thirty-first year, a "junior part" and at commencement "English oration" as honors. He had already taught a country school near Bucksport, when but seventeen years old, and has been a teacher more or less in every year since—now more than twenty-six years. His successive engagements have been as follow: In his High School at Levant, during the autumns of 1856-62, inclusive, and during the spring of the latter year, following his graduation. At other seasons of some of these years he accepted engagements in several of the country districts of Levant, and once in Carmel. He taught the village school at Searsport in the winter of 1862-63. He then entered upon academic work as an instructor, always, however, taking the position of Principal. His first engagement was in Gould's Academy, at Bethel, where he remained from March to November, 1863. He spent the winter of that year as a student in mineralogy and analytical chemistry in the laboratory of Harvard College, under the celebrated Professor Josiah P. Cooke, author of "The New Chemistry" and other famous writings. He served as assistant to Professor Cooke, and brought away a cordial testimonial from him to his efficiency and ability as a teacher of chemistry and mineralogy. After a visit in the field to his brother George, then a captain in the First Maine Regiment of Heavy Artillery, and now a member of the State Senate, Professor Fernald took another engagement in the Bethel Academy, where he taught during the spring term of 1864. In the fall of that year, and during the winter, he was again at Cambridge, Massachusetts, immersed in scientific studies, and assisting Professor Cooke, as in the previous winter, in the management of the laboratory. In the following March he accepted an appointment to the charge of the academy at Houlton, but after the expiration of the school year 1865-6 effected an exchange in order to be nearer his mother. By virtue of this he became Principal of the Academy at Foxcroft, in Piscataquis county, and remained there two academic years, or until May, 1868, inclusive. Upon the organization of a Faculty for the State College at Orono the same year, he received appointment to it as Professor of Mathematics and Physics, and was the only officer of the institution upon the ground when the first class was admitted in September, except the Superintendent of Farming. He had spent much of the intervening time after his appointment in July, in visiting the agricultural colleges in Massachusetts, Michigan, and other States, from which he obtained many valuable ideas and methods for the foundations at Orono. In the winter of 1872-73 he added to his equipment for scientific teaching the benefits of another residence at Cambridge, but this time as a student in astronomy at the Harvard College Observatory, under the eminent Professor Winlock. Until March, 1879, he sustained the duties of his professorship. At the opening of the college he had been solicited by the Trustees, although then but thirty years old, to assume also the duties of its President for the time pending the election of an official head. This was hindered by the occurrence of differences between the citizens of Orono on the one side, and the State Legislature and authorities of the College on the other, in regard to the title-deeds of the College property, which delayed appropriations and prevented the full organization of the school. Professor Fernald was thus virtually compelled to remain in the acting Presidency for three years, when, the differences having been amicably arranged, he insisted upon relief from its duties. The Trustees pressed upon him an election to the executive chair, but he preferred the choice of another, who was presently secured in the person of the Rev. Charles F. Allen, also a graduate of Bowdoin, who had been recently in charge of the Pine Street Methodist Episcopal church, in Bangor. President Allen retired in the early part of 1879, when Professor Fernald consented to an appointment to the vacant place. Since March 19th of that year, he has been President of the State College, adding to his executive duties instruction in his old department of Physics, and also in Mental and Moral Philosophy, teaching Trigonometry likewise, mainly for its applications in Astronomy.

During his years of service in the college, President Fernald has published, in the Reports of the Maine Board of Agriculture, somewhat numerous and voluminous papers upon topics related to its work, as upon the Distribution of Rains, Plant Growth, Protection from Lightning, Agriculture Compared with other Industries, Education and Labor, Taxation, and The Margin of Profit. Through other mediums he has published sundry brief papers, also meteorological and mathematical tables, records of barometrical, geodetic, and astronomical work, etc. etc. With all his multifarious duties he has found time to do the people some service in public office. In 1861-62 he was Supervisor of Schools in his native town, where he was also Justice of the Peace from 1862 to 1869; and has been a member of the State Board of Agriculture, ex-officio, or under appointment of the Governor, from 1869 to the present date. His has been a busy and, for one of his years, remarkably useful and fruitful life. He is still in his manly prime, in excellent health of mind and body, and has the promise of yet many years of distinguished service.

President Fernald, graduating in 1861 as a Bachelor of Arts, received in course the degree of Master of Arts in 1864; and at the Bowdoin Commencement in 1880 he had the further distinction from his alma mater of the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. He has been a member of the Congregational church since 1868 when he united with the society of that faith in Orono. He has not cared to connect himself with any of the secret orders, except reform organizations. He is a Republican in his political beliefs.

August 26, 1865, soon after his engagement as instructor at Bethel, he fulfilled a more interesting and formal engagement at the same place with Miss Mary Lovejoy Haywood, daughter of Winslow and Sally (Converse) Haywood. On the mother's side she is a Lovejoy, of the family to which the famous Illinois abolitionists, Elijah P. and Owen Lovejoy belonged, as also the Rev. George B. Cheever, and George Bancroft, the historian. The children of President and Mrs. Fernald are Hattie Converse, born September 11, 1866; Robert Haywood, born December 17, 1871; Merritt Lyndon, whose natal day is October 5, 1873; Reginald Lovejoy, August 7, 1877, named from his ancestor, Dr. Reginald Fernald, who settled in Portsmouth, New Hampshire, about 1630; and George Bancroft, born November 10, 1880.

JOHN R. HAMMOND.

Joseph Hammond, the father of John R., was a native of New Gloucester, Maine. In early life he was a farmer, and afterwards a shoemaker. He was the father of sixteen children, as follows: Sarah, died in Paris; Polly, died in Smyrna; Joseph, now lives in Lincoln; Caroline and Peleg, live in Paris; William T., lives in Buckfield; Jane; Sarah (second), lives in Minnesota; Mercy, resides in Wisconsin; John R.; George W., lives in Paris; Susan, Henry, and Lydia, died in Paris. Beside those named above, there were two that died in infancy.

John R. Hammond was born in Paris, Oxford county, Maine, in 1822, where he lived until he became seventeen years of age, when, in 1839, he came to Penobscot county. Two years later he purchased a farm in Crystal, Aroostook county, and in 1853 bought the farm on which he now lives, in Patten. Here he erected the fine farm buildings represented on another page in this work. He is an extensive farmer, and deals largely in sheep and cattle, of which he probably handles more than any other dealer in the north part of the county.

In politics he was originally a Democrat, but at the organization of the Republican party he found it to be better adapted to his views, and has since voted for its representatives. He has held the office of Selectman in Crystal, and also in Patten from time to time.

In 1841 Mr. Hammond was married to Jeanette A. Cushman, a native of Oxford county, Maine. To them have been born eight children: Susan, died at home at the age of eighteen years; Dora A., married Lonson M. Grant, and lives in Patten; Adna O., died at home when six years of age; Mary E., died at home; Florence M., married George T. Merrill, and lives in Patten; Ida I., lives at home; Nettie died in infancy.

HON. JOHN GARDNER.

John Gardner was born in the town of Buckfield, Oxford county, Maine, on the 14th day of December, 1812, and was the youngest of eleven children of Jonathan and Sarah Gardner. At the commencement of the Revolutionary war the father, then only eighteen years of age, enlisted in the Continental army; served through the war and was paid off in Continental currency, of which it took from $50 to $75 to pay for his breakfast on his return home.

The parents of Mr. Gardner were both born and reared in the town of Hingham, Massachusetts. The mother also bore the surname of Gardner before her marriage, though not related to her husband so far as known, the surname of Gardner being a very common one in Hingham at that time. They were married soon after the close of the Revolutionary war, and not long after removed to the then Province of Maine, settling in the township that was afterwards incorporated by the name of Buckfield, so called because many of its original settlers bore the name of Buck. They continued to reside in this town till the death of the father in 1836. John, being the youngest of the children, the parents naturally desired and expected him to take the homestead and provide for their care and support while they lived; which he would have done but for the fact that about this time his father became the recipient of a pension from the Government in consideration of his Revolutionary services. The poverty of the country and the heavy burden of debt under which it labored in the early years of its history, had hitherto prevented it from pensioning its Revolutionary veterans except in those cases where they were unable comfortably to support their families; but now having become able to perform this act of justice, they not only pensioned the surviving soldiers and their widows but generously paid them large sums in arrears.

In the spring following his nineteenth birthday Mr. Gardner left the parental homestead and went out into the world to act for himself, his parents being in the care of an older sister and her husband. During the first and second seasons after leaving, he found employment in boating on the Oxford and Cumberland canal and the waters tributary to it. Wages were then low and employment difficult to obtain; but his rule then and ever was to work, for reasonable wages if possible, but to work at any rate, and following this rule he always found himself in diligent and active service somewhere.

In the fall of 1837, having accumulated a small sum, he commenced business on his own account in company with a young man about his own age, at a little village called "North Paris," in the town of Paris, Maine. Paris was then, as now, the shire town of the county, the Court-house being situated on "Paris Hill" (so called), six miles from North Paris, and always visited by large numbers of people during court week.

At this beginning of Mr. Gardner's career as a business man he kept what is called "a country store," requiring but a small capital to do quite an active business. In about eight months after this modest beginning, his partner was invited by a man of considerable business capacity and capital, to open a grocery and provision store in the city of Portland, which invitation was accepted, leaving Mr. Gardner to plod along alone as best he might, with not much expectation of success. He, however, continued here for four years, finding himself at the end of that time with a considerable increase of means, and a well established credit both with his neighbors and in Portland and Boston.

Leaving Paris in the fall of 1841 he removed to Patten, in the county of Penobscot, when he commenced in the same line of business as at Paris, and has ever since continued to the present time, having also been more or less engaged in farming, and in the business of operating a grist-mill, a saw-mill, and a starch factory, still continuing, in connection with partners, to carry on the latter enterprise, as well as his mercantile business. He has by his shrewdness, activity, and business enterprise, accumulated a handsome and well-earned competence.

Mr. Gardner has always made his private business his specialty, and has never been in any sense an office-seeker. Yet he has always had pronounced and positive views upon public and political questions, and his fellow-citizens, having great confidence in his intelligence, capacity, and honesty, have often, without any solicitation from him, called him to important positions of public responsibility and trust. He has twice occupied the place of Postmaster of Patten, on his last appointment resigning the office as he found it interfered too much with his private business. During the earlier years of his residence in Patten he was for successive years a Selectman of the town, Town Clerk, and Town Treasurer, and for about eight years acted as a Deputy Sheriff. He has also been one of the Trustees of Patten Academy from the incorporation of that institution, in 1846, to the present time.

In 1846 he was a member of the Maine House of Representatives, and while serving in that capacity was placed on the committee of that body which drafted and reported the first prohibitory temperance law enacted in the State of Maine. He was also a member of the State Senate for the years 1868 and 1869, and in that capacity was chiefly instrumental in the framing and passing of the act of 1868 providing for the making and repair of highways in unincorporated places; an act which has done more to secure good roads in our newly settled territories than all previous legislation together, and which is still substantially in force on the statute book.

Mr. Gardner has always been found in uncompromising hostility to all forms of vice and immorality, and his influence has ever been exerted to assist in the suppression of intemperance and the maintenance of good order and correct moral ideas among his fellow-citizens, while his strict business honesty, public-spirit, and enterprise, have been a most important factor in promoting the prosperity and thrift of the beautiful town where he has so long resided. Mr. Gardner married Mary A. Colburn, daughter of Samuel and Harriet Colburn, of Sumner, Maine. They have four children—Ira B., of Patten; Ida, wife of Arthur Robinson, of Sherman Mills; Eva E., now Mrs. C. H. Sunby, of Patten, and Alma E., now Mrs. A. D. Webster, of Patten.

EDWARD JORDON

Edward Jordon is one of the leading farmers of Stetson. Although but thirty years of age, he is the possessor of one of the neatest farms in the county and is one of its most prosperous young men. He believes that strict attention and close application to business is the only sure road to fortune and success, and governs himself accordingly. He received a liberal education at the common schools of Stetson and is largely engaged in buying and shipping stock to Boston. He attended the Poughkeepsie commercial school for a short time, but preferred farming to mercantile pursuits, so gave up his studies and returned to the home of his childhood. A view of his fine residence on another page speaks volumes for his thrift and industry. In 1874 Mr. Jordon married Miss Bessie A. Rexford, a native of Canada, and is the father of one child, George.

NICHOLAS R. HUSTON.

The finest place in Winn is that owned by Nicholas R. Huston. Mr. Huston is the oldest son of Elijah and Mary Huston, nee Mary Rideout. His grandfather, George Huston, lived at North Yarmouth, Maine. Nicholas Rideout, his grandfather on his mother's side, was from Kittery, Maine. Elijah Huston had nine children, seven of whom lived to manhood and womanhood, viz: Nicholas R.; Elijah, now living in New Gloucester, Maine; Andrew L., now of Cumberland, Maine; Mary J., wife of David M. Loring, of Yarmouth, Maine; Harriet, and Caroline. Mr. Huston was a farmer and mason, working at his trade a portion of the time, but raised his family on a farm. He died in Danville in 1839. Mrs. Huston died in 1850.

Nicholas R. Huston, the eldest of the family, was born February 14, 1813. He spent his minority on the farm, and, being the eldest son in so large a family, much of the care of it, and of the farm, naturally fell to his lot, for his father was away at work at his trade much of the time. On becoming of age and starting out for himself, he found himself possessed of a fair common school education, a good constitution, and a pair of hands with which to help himself. These, however, combined with energy, economy, perseverance, good judgment, and business ability, have enabled him to make a success in business life. His first employment was on a farm in Gray, where he worked five months for twelve dollars a month, which at that time was high wages for farm labor. In 1836 he went to Lincoln and engaged with Charles Merrill to take charge of his mill and lumber business together with his farm, where he received twenty dollars a month. He worked for Mr. Merrill until 1850, when he purchased one-half interest in the business. In 1861, on the death of Mr. Merrill, he bought the other half of the property, the mill, the farm, and hundreds of acres of timber land. By owning the standing timber he was enabled to bring his own lumber to his mill and manufacture it. He employed from ten to fifteen men through the year. He remained in Lincoln until 1873, when he sold his property there and moved to Winn. Since buying the place where he now resides, near the village of Winn, he has erected a fine set of farm buildings, a view of which appears in this work. From his residence a very fine view of the Penobscot River is obtained.

Mr. Huston married Miss Abbie M. Brown, daughter of Samuel G. and Mary W. Brown, nee Mary Coombs. Samuel Brown was a native of New Hampshire, and Mrs. Brown of Islesboro, Maine. Mr. Brown died January 1, 1872, and Mrs. Brown May 9, 1870.

Mr. and Mrs. Huston have no children. Mr. Huston has never engaged in public life, preferring to give his entire attention to his own business. Though now sixty-eight years old he does not appear so old by many years, and is still an active business man. By strict attention to business he has acquired a competency and can spend the remainder of his days in ease, enjoying the fruits of an active business life.

GEORGE H. HAYNES.

George H. Haynes, of Winn, is a son of the late Alvin and Albra Haynes (nee Albra Record). Alvin Haynes was a son of David and a grandson of Aaron Haynes, who was a captain in Arnold's expedition to Quebec.

Alvin Haynes was born in Dresden, Maine, August 5, 1801. His father removed while Alvin was yet a child to Bangor, and soon after to a new farm in the wilds of what is now Edinburg, near the banks of the Penobscot. He was the second settler in that town. Here young Alvin grew up and married Albra Record. He assisted his father, who carried the mail between Bangor and Houlton, there being then but one mail a week through this almost unbroken wilderness. Alvin would carry the mail to Howland in a wagon, where he was met by his father with a boat for Scow's Landing, about two miles above Mattawamkeag Point. At this point there was a camp where they met the crew from Houlton and exchanged mails. That crew carried the mail seven miles through the woods to what was called Jimskitticook Falls, now Kingman, when they went in a boat to the Forks, now Haynesville, thence traveled on horseback through the woods to Houlton. In this way he became thoroughly acquainted with the then imperfect mail service, and when the Military Road was completed he drove the first mail stage out of Bangor on that route. He moved to Bangor about 1835, and became agent for Colonel James Thomas, the owner of the stage line between Houlton and Augusta, as well as other lines. He became a partner of Mr. Thomas, and was afterwards appointed United States Mail Agent in the Secret Service of that Department. While holding this position he traveled not only through the New England States, but through the South and West, and in the British Provinces. During this time he was a member of the City Council and Board of Aldermen of Bangor. About this time he built, in company with Mr. Thomas, a hotel at the forks of the Mattawamkeag, and the place was named after him--Haynesville.

Between the years 1845 and 1850 he held the office of United States Deputy Marshal, under Virgil D. Paris. He afterwards removed from Bangor to Mattawamkeag, and was chosen County Commissioner, which office he filled satisfactorily. Subsequently he was elected to the Legislature, his district then covering a large extent of country. The incorporation of many towns in Northern Penobscot is due to his untiring efforts.

About 1863 he moved to Winn, and settled in a pleasant location overlooking the village. Here he passed the remainder of his days, filling many positions of trust and responsibility in the gift of his townsmen.

During his early life he had considerable experience as a surveyor, being employed in 1820 by the English surveyors in connection with the monument line, and after moving to Winn he was connected with the development of towns in this vicinity, many of them being laid out according to Alvin Haynes's plan and survey.

He died September 17th, 1875. Two brothers still survive, Aaron and Elbridge, also one sister, Mrs. Asa Smith, of Mattawamkeag.

At the breaking out of the war Mr. Haynes took an active part in supporting the Government, and during his later life was a Republican in politics, though he had formerly been a Democrat.

Mr. Haynes lost three wives. His first wife was Miss Albra Record, who died in 1841. His second wife was Miss Lucy Phillips, who died about 1849. His third wife was Miss Julia A. Chesley, who is still living. By his first wife he had five children, viz: David O. (deceased), Charles A., George H., Susan J., and Helen M., both of the last named deceased. By his second wife he had two children, viz: Edward R. and Alvin T. By his third wife he had one daughter, Albra.

George H. Haynes was born September 20, 1835, in Bangor. He received his education in Bangor public and high schools, and the East Corinth Academy. He was two years with the surveying party surveying the line of the European & North American Railroad in 1854 and 1855. In 1856 and 1857 he was employed by the State as Land Surveyor in Northern Penobscot and Aroostook.

In 1858 he came to Winn as steamboat agent for the steamboat company whose steamers plied between here and Oldtown. He remained with this company about seven years, though he engaged in other business.

In 1859 he engaged in trade with William Willey, under the firm name of Willey & Haynes, which was continued about three years, when J. L. Smith bought out Mr. Willey, and the firm became J. L. Smith & Co., and so continued till 1864, when they went into a mercantile business with Shaw, Tillson & Co., tanners, under the firm name of Shaw, Smith & Co. This firm continued about two years, Mr. Haynes being the managing partner in the business.

In 1867 Smith & Haynes sold out to the other partners, and Mr. Haynes opened a general merchandise business for himself, in which he continued till 1870, when he moved to Lewiston, Maine, where he lived three years, engaged in trade, and with Patterson & Edwards in the building business.

From Lewiston he went to Chicago, and went into the grocery and market business with M. Sprague, on State street, under the firm name of M. Sprague & Co., where he continued one year.

He came to Winn in 1874, and engaged in general merchandise, where he has since lived.

He married Miss Josephine F. Morrill, of Lincoln Center. They have two children, viz: Minnie R. and Harry N.

Mr. Haynes has a large stock of goods, and is doing a successful business. He is widely known throughout this region, being a gentleman of pleasing address and affable in his intercourse with all.

GENERAL ISAAC HODSDON.

Probably no man in this county, and but few in the State, had so thorough a knowledge of military affairs in his time as General Isaac Hodsdon. Military tactics, rules, and evolutions greatly interested him, and were among his chief studies even in boyhood. In a memorandum left among his effects, he says:

In the autumn of 1790, in the ninth year of my age, I first attended a battalion muster, two miles from home, under the command of Major Ebenezer Sullivan, brother of John and James Sullivan, Governors of New Hampshire and Massachusetts, and both the exercises and words of command I that day saw and heard so engrossed my whole attention that they have remained indelibly fixed on my memory. To comprehend the application and propriety of the, to me, manifest incongruity of command "To the right and left face," which I did that day, was my first military lesson.

At the age of fifteen he commenced the study of the "Tactics" in earnest, and so great was his interest that he spent a greater part of his spare time on them, and at eighteen could repeat verbatim nearly all contained in Baron Steuben's and Jonathan Rawson's systems. He was enrolled as a soldier in the militia before he was legally a subject, and warned to appear at regimental muster, and so anxious was he to enter the ranks that he would not make known his age. The man to whom he was apprenticed at this time was a Quaker, who, not believing in the use of carnal weapons, would not furnish them to his apprentices, so Hodsdon was obliged to provide himself with equipments as best he could.

His next call to serve in the ranks was to be one of a company of militia to conduct the orator, Hon. Benjamin Green, and a large concourse of citizens to the old meeting-house in Berwick, and there leaned on arms reversed two hours to hear an eulogy on the life and services of George Washington, December 22, 1799, eight days after Washington's death.

At the next regimental muster he was unable to appear on account of being destitute of equipments, but he made profits enough on goods furnished him by a baker and a merchant to sell at the parade that day to pay his fine ($1.67), and buy a full set of arms and equipments. This was the only time he was ever absent when it was legally his duty to be present either in the militia or the army, at military elections or court-martials, during forty-three years service.

In 1803 he was made corporal, and in 1805 elected lieutenant. In 1811 he was commissioned adjutant of his regiment, having acted in that capacity for three years previously. In June, 1813, on his way from Portland to Berwick, he breakfasted at Cleave's tavern, in Saco, which was at that time the recruiting rendezvous of the Thirty-third United States Regiment, and while waiting he asked an officer present if he would favor him with a roster of the regiment, as he wished to see if any of his acquaintance had received appointment. After looking over one which was handed him, he returned it, thanked the officer, and went in to breakfast. Before he had commenced eating, however, the officer, who proved to be Colonel Isaac Lane, came in and said: "One of my captains talks of resigning; if he should do so, I would like to have you take charge of his company." Hodsdon expressed his surprise that such an offer should be made to an entire stranger, but told him he would be pleased with such an appointment, and believed he could satisfy the Colonel as to his qualifications for such an office. Colonel Lane replied: "I am satisfied now, sir." Three days afterward he received his appointment as captain in the Thirty-third Regiment United States Infantry, and was immediately ordered on the recruiting service at Bangor and vicinity.

His success as a recruiting officer was such that he was retained at that duty until the November following, when he was ordered to take command of the garrison at Fort Scammel, where he remained until the next January.

He was then ordered by General Thomas H. Cushing to proceed with his company to Stewartstown, New Hampshire, to prevent any intercourse with the enemy on the Canada side. Here they remained from January 10 to August 8, 1814, when Captain Hodsdon received an order from General Cushing stating that, as he (Hodsdon) had accomplished the object for which he had been sent, which every officer previously sent had failed to do, he was therefore ordered to proceed with his company to the regimental rendezvous at Saco, in the District of Maine.

Soon after their arrival at Saco, Captain Hodsdon was again ordered on the recruiting service until January, 1815, when he was ordered to take command of Fort Preble, where he remained until the ratification of the treaty of peace with England, when he was ordered to proceed with his company to Saco, and there discharged them, which he did March 30, 1815, and in April following he was ordered to Springfield, Massachusetts, with other officers, to wait until the army was disbanded, and was finally discharged June 15, 1815.

Although by the laws of Massachusetts he was now exempt from duty in the militia, yet his interest in it was such that, having been unanimously elected, he accepted the office of Major in the same regiment of which he had previously been Adjutant, and received his commission July 18, 1815. July 1, 1816 he was made Lieutenant-Colonel, and June 17, 1817, was elected Colonel of the same regiment. He was elected Major-General of the Third Division, Maine Militia, by the Legislature of Maine, February 15, 1827, having served as Brigadier-General of the same division a large part of the time since the separation of Maine from Massachusetts in 1820. This office he retained with great credit until February 15, 1841, when he resigned and was appointed Adjutant-General of the State of Maine.

In July, 1837, Governor Dunlap concluded to send a military force into New Brunswick and take Mr. Greely from Frederickton Jail unless the British minister at Washington caused him to be discharged, and General Hodsdon was appointed to take command and ordered to visit the Province and ascertain what would be necessary to carry out the expedition.

General Hodsdon was haying on his farm in Corinth when he received this order, but he promptly attended to it, and on his return from this visit the British minister ordered the discharge of Mr. Greely, which ended the trouble.

In the winter of 1839 it was believed that British subjects were plundering timber on the lands claimed by the State of Maine in Aroostook county, hacked up by a British military force, and Governor Fairfield commanded General Hodsdon to detach one thousand troops from his division and march to Aroostook. The order was dated February 16, 1839, and in four days the whole force was on the march. Arriving at Fort Fairfield General Hodsdon ascertained that no British force existed in that section, and concluded that under the circumstances his duty was "so to regulate and govern the troops while they were in this more than useless expedition as would best secure their health, comfort, and character, and return them to private life with no disgrace upon themselves or the State." After becoming satisfied that the whole move would prove futile the Governor ordered their return, and they were discharged April 25th following.

In 1850 General Hodsdon went to Washington and presented the claims of the State upon the Government of the United States for the expenses of this expedition, and Maine received $27,000, which had hitherto remained uncollected.

In 1861, when Maine was called upon for troops, General Hodsdon, although eighty years of age, was considered the best authority in the State on many military questions, and was employed from April to June of that year in preparing the proper blanks and superintending printing of the various blank forms to be used by troops in actual service. His instructions to his son, General John L. Hodsdon, Adjutant-General of Maine at that time, had much to do in winning the praises bestowed on the Adjutant-General's Reports of Maine during the War of the Rebellion, which were considered at Washington as "models of their kind."

General Hodsdon never considered the reputation of a military officer to depend so much upon his rank as upon his knowledge of his duty and the manner of performing it. He was wont to say: "I much prefer to merit the expression, 'that corporal would make a good General,' than 'that General does not know the duty of a corporal.'"

He was never a politician, although he acted with the Democratic party generally until about 1840, in which political revolution he joined the Whigs, and remained with them till they were broken up, when his sympathies went with the Douglas, or, as they were afterwards called, the "War Democrats."

Isaac Hodsdon was born in Berwick, York county, in the District of Maine, December 18, 1781, and was the ninth in a family of twelve children, seven sons and five daughters, of whom two sons and two daughters died in childhood and one son and daughter died at the age of sixteen and seventeen respectively. The other six all lived to become heads of families. His father, Moses, was born July 26, 1740, and died December 10, 1810. His grandfather, Elder Moses, was born April 7, 1712, and died February 4, 1782.

His mother was Dorcas, daughter of Elder Ebenezer Lord, of Berwick, born September 15, 1746, died January 9, 1838. She was an eminently pious lady, and her long life was full of good works. About the year 1650 four brothers by the name of Hodgdon came from England and settled on "Back River," Dover, New Hampshire, where Isaac's grandfather was born and lived till he married Sarah, daughter of Thomas Thompson, of Berwick, and settled on what has since been known as the Hodsdon homestead, in Berwick. About one hundred and fifty years ago this branch of the original family, preferring the present orthography of the name, adopted it.

The educational advantages in Isaac's boyhood were few and of inferior quality. From five to eight years of age he attended a private school in summer taught by a poor widow, whom the neighbors assisted in this way, but who proved to be a very inefficient teacher, and it took nearly all the winter terms, which were taught by his oldest brother, Moses, to unlearn what he had erroneously learned during the summer.

In a memorandum of his school days, he says:

It was my misfortune to be left-handed, and consequently my brother set me to writing at an earlier age than usual that he might compel me to use the pen in my right hand while he had charge of the school. Not realizing the importance of the change, and believing it no fault of mine that my right hand grew on my left side. I was wilfully obstinate and disobedient, and it seemed the more grievous to me because no other scholar was similarly afflicted.

When he could no longer endure my obstinacy he so severely applied his walnut ferule (the usual remedy for refractory urchins at that time) to my left hand that there was little danger of my writing or wronging much with that hand for several days. As soon as he left the house at noon, I raked open the bed of coals in the large open fire-place, and in presence of the whole school placed his ferule beneath them, where it became ashes long before his return. His next experiment was with a fagot of apple-tree suckers, used singly, but with such effect as to start the eye-pumps of the other scholars; but as soon as the smart of the application abated and he had left the house my writing-book followed the walnut ferule. However, a second application of the same growth of the apple tree proved more effectual, and I agreed to spread the ink with my right hand if allowed to dip the pen with my left, which was agreed to.

From the age of eight to fifteen his help being needed on the farm he attended winter school only. The only text-books used during that time in the schools he attended were the Bible, Psaltery, Dillworth's Spelling Book, Catechism of Westminster Divines, and Arithmetic. In June, 1796, at his earnest request, his father apprenticed him to David Nichols, a blacksmith, who belonged to the Society of Quakers. Nichols agreed to give him the advantage of the winter schools, but when school would commence he would be too busy to spare him, and whenever he made any complaint, the Quaker would say: "Isaac, thee has already learning enough for any business thee may have to do." In after life his lack of education was a great source of regret, and was considered by him "the most unfortunate of all his misfortunes." While serving his apprenticeship his evenings and spare hours were all employed in studying the "Tactics," devoting a small portion only to mathematics, and that mostly to land surveying. After completing his apprenticeship four years, he worked as journeyman for Nichols for a short time, and had made arrangements to go into business in Salem, Massachusetts, with Thomas Nichols, his master's uncle, then an old man who had made him some good offers, but Isaac's brother Moses, who had previously settled at Levant, now Kenduskeag, induced him to go there instead, March 5, 1803. January 24, 1805, he was married to Polly, daughter of Timothy and Amy Wentworth, at her father's house in Berwick, by Rev. Joseph Hillier. His wife was seventh in a family of thirteen children, and was born November 14, 1787. They moved to Levant, where they lived till March, 1809, when, becoming involved by being bondsman for irresponsible parties, he gave up business there and moved to Corinth. Here he worked at his trade and read law, teaching school during the winters, till he entered the army in 1815. On his return he resumed the study of law, and in April, 1816, was appointed Postmaster at Corinth. He was chosen Town Clerk when the town was incorporated in 1812, and held that office till 1818, except while in the army. He was also Selectman, Assessor, etc., for the years 1816, 1817, and 1818. July 3, 1818, he was appointed Justice of the Peace, and July 3, 1820, commissioned to qualify civil officers; also appointed Deputy Marshal to take the census of 1820, and about the same time he received the appointment of Justice of the Court of Sessions for Penobscot county. He was appointed Clerk of the Judicial Courts of the county, March 1821, and also a Justice of the Peace and Quorum. At this time he moved to Bangor, where he resided until 1839. He held the Clerk's office sixteen years, and was Justice of the Peace and Quorum till his death.

In 1823 he was commissioned to adjust and settle claims of Penobscot county. While residing in Bangor he purchased the farm in Corinna now the homestead of J. B. Wheeler, Esq., to which he moved in July, 1839, where he lived until he moved to Exeter in March, 1851.

In 1840 he was chosen one of the electors at large for President and Vice-President of the United States, and in 1850 was again appointed Deputy Marshal to take the census. He resided in Exeter until the death of his wife, April 17, 1859, after which he made his home with his son John L., in Bangor, a part of the time, but the last of his life with his nephew Charles Hodsdon, son of his younger brother Nathan, on the old place where he first settled in Corinth, where he died of paralysis May 24, 1864, aged eighty-two years five months and six days, and lies buried by the side of his wife in the cemetery near by.

Although General Hodsdon and wife were never blessed with children of their own, they brought up quite a family. General John L. Hodsdon of Bangor, was their adopted son, and Sabrina, now wife of Joseph Gilman, Esq., of Dixmont, was an adopted daughter. They also adopted two daughters of Mrs. Perkins, of Wolfborough, New Hampshire, a sister of General Hodsdon. One of these died at the age of eighteen, the other was the first wife of Hon. Gorham L. Boynton, of Bangor. This was also the home of Frank, his brother Nathan's son, until his death at the age of fourteen, and after Nathan's death, in 1848, at various times his was the home of others of the same family.

General Hodsdon was a man of noble physique, and it is said by those who were acquainted with both that he very much resembled General Winfield Scott in military bearing and general appearance.

He was reared a Congregationalist but never united with any church. He was a believer in and a great student of the Bible, and has left many pages of manuscript written on various texts that were particularly impressive to him.

Although his income during the most of his life was ample, yet his generous heart would not allow him to hoard, and consequently he left nothing for his heirs to quarrel over.

He held more offices, civil and military, perhaps, than any other man in our county, and its history would not be complete were this tribute to his memory and services omitted. He was a kind friend, an obliging neighbor, and many destitute ones and especially the children of his brother Nathan can say, "Truly he was a father to the fatherless."

JONATHAN EDDY.

Among the prominent business men of Penobscot county, in the middle of the century, was Jonathan Eddy, born in Eddington, Maine, August 1, 1811. He was the son of Ware and Nancy (Clapp) Eddy, and was the oldest of thirteen children born to his father, who was twice married.

Ware, son of Ibrook Eddy, was born in Mansfield,

Massachusetts, May 3, 1784, and removed with his father to Eddington, where he died November 20, 1852. Ibrook was the son of Jonathan Eddy, of Revolutionary fame. He was with his father in Nova Scotia, and was a refugee from that Province, pending the war of the Revolution. He received a grant of land in Eddington, in which place he settled in about 1785.

Jonathan, father of Ibrook, is known in history, and was a prominent actor in early scenes of the Revolutionary war in Cumberland, Nova Scotia, and in Eastern Maine, and was a person of some note in early times in Bangor and the region adjoining, as will be seen in the annals of this volume, in Colonel Porter's memoirs of him, and in Williamson's History of Maine. He was the son of Eleazer, of Mansfield, who was the son of John, of Taunton, who was the son of Samuel (son of William Eddy, A. M., Vicar of Cranbrook, County Kent, St. Dunstan's church, England, from 1589 to 1616), who came to this country in the ship Handmaid, landing at Plymouth in October, 1630.

The subject of this sketch seems to have inherited the title of Colonel from his Revolutionary ancestor. He was a man of fine physique, compactly built, and of great physical strength. It was natural to call him by his ancestor's title, and when once it had been applied it was treated as genuine by his acquaintances.

His early advantages of education were such as the common country schools of half a century ago afforded—six to eight weeks' instruction in reading, writing, spelling, and arithmetic, in the winter. His acquirements were not great, but sufficient to stimulate the desire to aid the educational projects of the age when in his power. This feeling he had in common with those sterling men who were associated with him in business during the greater part of his business life, Newell Avery, Simon J. Murphy, Edwin and Darius Eddy, of the former of whom it was said, by one who knew him well, "he was an earnest and munificent friend of schools, churches, and other institutions which tend to the enlightenment and moral elevation of the people. I have heard him talk by the hour of the importance of education. Though I regarded him as one of the best educated men I ever knew, he was continually lamenting his early privation of books and schools."

At the age of twenty-three years Colonel Eddy was running rafts down the river from Oldtown to Bangor. Though a toilsome yet it was not an elevating kind of business, and he thought to improve upon it by going into trade. Therefore, in about 1834, he went into co-partnership in the mercantile business with Samuel Knapp, in Eddington. They were not successful; they failed in about two years, and upon Eddy devolved the task of settling with the creditors, which he did by paying the principal from his own pocket.

The next three or four years he was a member of the lumbering firm of Turner, Levensaler & Eddy, and was fairly successful. They cut the first logs ever cut on Grand Lake. When his connection with this firm was dissolved he formed a business connection with his cousin, Edwin Eddy, a connection which continued during his life. In a few years after, there became connected with them, his brother Darius, Newell Avery, Sewall Avery, and Simon J. Murphy, and these gentlemen were continuously his partners, with one exception for a short time, until his decease, under the name of Eddy, Murphy & Co. The Averys and Edwin Eddy formed another connection with him by intermarrying with his sisters. Newell Avery had driven an ox team by the month upon the Penobscot, and Colonel Eddy, discovering in him rare abilities, he and Edwin connected him with their firm in 1840-41. The other members came in subsequently.

The business of the firm became rapidly extended, and it formed various collateral connections, for a longer or shorter time, with John Welch, Joseph Heald, A. L. Stebbins, Charles E. Dole, Mr. Crepin, of Chicago, Amos Bailey, Mark Bailey, and many others.

After 1850 it was concluded by the firm to extend its operations into the State of Michigan. They purchased vast tracts of lands in the Lower Michigan Peninsula, having previously had thorough explorations made, and the streams traced, and in 1853 Mr. Newell Avery settled with his family at Port Huron. He died in 1877, and in Rev. Zachary Eddy's eulogy, pronounced over him, is this reference to the work accomplished by the firm after his settlement:

Speedily the forests ring with the stroke of the axe, and not long afterwards with the roar of water-wheels and the buzz of saws. Great rafts begin to drift down the streams on the spring floods. A hardy population flows into the opening forests; log huts here and there appear, and little cultivated clearings. Villages and cities spring up as by magic. Church spires and the domes of court-houses glitter amidst the evergreen foliage. A vast productive industry is established by which many thousands are directly supported, and the whole State indirectly enriched.

The great enterprise is managed with such consummate prudence that the prosperity is almost uninterrupted. Though the lumber trade is proverbially fluctuating and hazardous, this particular firm go on from strength to strength; not a note of paper ever going to protest, not a suspicion of soundness ever whispered by the envious.

This enterprise, started by the subject of this sketch, of which he was the head, and with which one of his sons is still connected, up to the close of the year 1881, had got into marketable condition, by a rough estimate, sixteen hundred million feet of timber and lumber, besides immense quantities of "short" or small lumber, such as usually comes out of such operations.

Colonel Eddy married Caroline, daughter of Amos and Sally (Ballard) Bailey, of Milford, Maine, on March 5, 1839. Mr. Bailey was the proprietor of a hotel at the locality called Sunkhaze, which was much resorted to, and a noted stopping place of supply-teams before the advent of the railroad.

Mrs. Eddy was born July 9, 1819. Her family, at her husband's decease, consisted of four sons and two daughters, one daughter having died in February, 1862. Two daughters are married and settled in Boston. Two sons are in active business in Michigan. J. Frank, the second, went West a year or two after his father died, and is now extensively engaged in the lumber and other business in Bay City. The other two sons are in Bangor.

While in Bangor Colonel Eddy sat under the preaching of Rev. Amory Battles, whom he liked, and with whom he sympathized in his religious (Universalist) views; and he contributed to the erection of the present church structure of that denomination.

In politics he was earnestly Republican, but he was never an active politician, and neither sought nor cared for office. He was interested for the welfare of his county and State, and for the prosperity of the Penobscot Valley, in which the hard and unremitting labor of his life had been performed.

Soon after his marriage he became a resident of East Great Works (Bradley), where he continued until 1847, when he removed to Bangor, which city he made his home until his decease, which occurred August 24, 1865. He died suddenly on State street as he was walking to his office after tea. He had been singularly free from disease all his life until a few days before, when he took cold from wetting his feet when upon logs on the boom above Oldtown. The illness was apparently slight and he was supposed to be recovering.

Colonel Eddy possessed a broad mind, was able as an organizer, a man of great enterprise, of strict integrity, of close and careful business habits, of great force and perseverance, a good husband, father, friend, neighbor, and citizen.

GENERAL HISTORY.

[To be read in connection with Chapter VII.]

The following is the enactment of the General Court of Massachusetts erecting the County of Penobscot:

An Act for dividing the County of Hancock, and establishing a new County by the name of Penobscot:

[EXTRACT.]

Be it Enacted, etc., That all the territory in the County of Hancock which lies north of the Waldo Patent, on the west side of Penobscot River, and north and west of the following lines on the east side of said river, beginning at said river, at the south line of Orrington, thence running easterly on the southerly lines of Orrington, Brewer, and the Gore east of Brewer [Jarvis's Gore, now Clifton], to the west line of the Bingham Purchase; thence northerly by said Bingham Purchase to the northwest corner thereof; thence easterly on the north line of said Bingham Purchase, to the County of Washington—be and hereby is constituted a new county, by the name of Penobscot; whereof Bangor shall be the shire-town until otherwise ordered by the General Court; and the inhabitants of said County of Penobscot shall have and possess, use and enjoy all the powers, rights, and immunities, which by the Constitution and laws of this Commonwealth, any other inhabitants are entitled to.

Passed February 15, 1816.

The following is the enactment of the Legislature of Maine, making a now important addition to the county:

An Act to annex the Town of Corinna to the County of Penobscot.

Be it Enacted, etc., That the Town of Corinna, in the County of Somerset, be and the same hereby is set off from said County of Somerset, and annexed to, and made part of, the County of Penobscot.

Passed February 10, 1833.

The act establishing the County of Piscataquis, passed March 23, 1838, prescribed that "all that portion of territory lying . . . north of the north lines of the towns of Dexter, Garland, Charleston, Bradford, and south line of Kilmarnock, in the county of Penobscot, and bounded east by the east lines of Milton, Kilmarnock, and townships numbered 4, in the Eighth and Ninth ranges [etc., etc.], be and the same is hereby constituted and made a county by the name of Piscataquis."

The following acts of the Maine Legislature also affected this county:

An Act setting off the northerly part of the County of Penobscot, and annexing the same to the County of Aroostook.

Be it Enacted, etc., All the lands in the County of Penobscot, lying north of townships numbered 8 in the Sixth range, 8 in the Seventh range, and 8 in the Eighth range of townships west from the east line of the State, with all the inhabitants thereof, shall be and hereby are set off from the County of Penobscot, and annexed to the County of Aroostook.

Passed March 21, 1843.

An Act altering the division lines between the counties of Hancock and Washington; and between Penobscot and Washington; Penobscot, Piscataquis, and Aroostook; and between Piscataquis and Somerset.

SEC. 2. The division line between the counties of Penobscot and Washington is hereby established as follows: Beginning in the line of the County of Penobscot, as now established in the northerly line of Bingham's Penobscot Purchase; thence running easterly in the north line of said Purchase to the westerly line of township numbered 6, in the First range north of said Purchase; thence northerly in the line dividing 5 and 6 in the First range, 6 and 7 in the Second range, 7 and 8 in the Third range, and 7 and 8 in the Fourth range, to the southerly line of Aroostook county.

SEC. 3. That part of the dividing line between Penobscot and Piscataquis, north of township numbered 4 in the Ninth range, north of the Waldo Patent, shall be established as follows: Beginning in the east line of the county of Piscataquis, at the northeast corner of said township; thence westerly on the north line of said township, to the east line of township B, in the Tenth range of townships west from the east line of the State; then north on the line between the Ninth and Tenth ranges of townships, until it strikes the west line of Indian township No. 4 (or the west upper Indian township); thence along said west line to the northwest corner of said Indian township; thence easterly on the northerly line of said Indian township, to the southeast corner of township numbered 1, in the Ninth range; thence north on the line dividing the Eighth and Ninth ranges of the townships, to the northeast corner of the township No. 8, Range Eight.

Passed March 12, 1844.

[Civil List.]—The very large number of Senators and Representatives in the State Legislature from Penobscot county, from 1816 to 1882 (there have been nearly eight hundred of the latter), and the cost of obtaining a complete list, have precluded its procurement for this work.

BANGOR DAILY WHIG AND COURIER.

For almost half a century this journal has been sustained by the people of Bangor and its neighborhood. The history of its various fortunes has been before written. It has been, from the beginning (July, 1834,) the leading organ of the Whig and Republican parties. It has been under various publishers and various editors, and has always been an influential paper.

After it fell into the hands of Messrs. Wheeler and Lynde, in May, 1854, it steadily improved. Mr. Wheeler, who had been the editorial manager of the Kennebec Journal, was its chief editor, and he gave it a character for dignity and ability second to that of no paper in the State, until he sold his interest to Mr. Lynde, in the fall of 1868.

Mr. Lynde was a model newspaper publisher. He had acquired a knowledge of the printing business in the office of the Maine Farmer. A man of will, shrewd, and enterprising, he bent all his energies to make the paper a success. Politically it was the organ of the great Republican party in the region of its circulation. He strove to make it an acceptable organ to the party, and he strove to make it a successful business organ. In various ways he caused its circulation to be extended, and thus made it indispensable to business men as an advertising medium. And he always kept in view the important mission of a newspaper—to furnish its readers with the earliest possible intelligence of what was transpiring at home and abroad. He saw to it, also, that its moral tone was unexceptionable, and that it was as fit for the family as for the business man. He did not presume to edit the paper, but he understood when a paper was well edited, and did presume to select his editors, and sometimes to suggest how certain subjects should be treated by the editorial pen, that no loss should accrue from inadvertent mention. He saw men; he listened to their opinions; he reflected; and he made few mistakes in his management. The financial affairs of the establishment he attended to himself; and when he died it was a surprise to many that, as a newspaper publisher, he had here accumulated so good an estate.

The close application that Mr. Lynde gave to his business had an effect upon his health, and in the winter of 1874 he visited the South with a view to its restoration. His destination was Florida, but on reaching Savannah, Georgia, in consequence of a cold that had fastened itself upon him, he was compelled to take his bed, from which he never arose. He died on March 12, 1874, at the age of forty-seven years. Mr. Lynde's qualities were well known to the newspaper press, and the expressions of sorrow on his demise were very general in and out of the State, as well as among his neighbors in the city of his home.

The editors under Mr. Lynde, who succeeded Mr. Wheeler, were, first, Mr. Joseph W. Bartlett, of Bangor. He was a native of Litchfield, Maine. After spending some time in editorial labor upon the Whig he left for a position upon the New York Post.

The next was Mr. Ed. A. Perry, of Bangor, who had been a local editor of the Whig. He afterwards had a place upon the Boston Herald.

The next was Captain Charles A. Boutelle, who became the permanent editor-in-chief under Mr. Lynde, and has ever since occupied that position. A sketch of his life and public career is given in a previous chapter.

In 1870, having had considerable experience in correspondence and in writing for the newspapers, he felt a desire to try his hand at "practical journalism." Under advice from an accomplished ex-editor, he concluded to engage with Mr. Lynde. He at first engaged for three months, and so satisfactory did his services prove that Mr. Lynde engaged him as permanent editor at a very liberal salary, and he was in the position at Mr. Lynde's death.

Having become accustomed to the editorial harness, Captain Boutelle had no desire to put it off. He therefore formed a connection with Benjamin A. Burr, Esq., and they purchased the Whig establishment—Captain Boutelle becoming the proprietor of five-eighths. The copartnership still exists.

Mr. Burr was born in Brewer, Maine, is a practical printer; had served three years as night-workman on the Boston Atlas; had been connected with the publication of various papers, particularly with that of the Bangor Jeffersonian, in connection with Joseph Bartlett, Esq.—for many years Register of Probate—who was its editor. Originally Democratic, the Jeffersonian became first a Free-soil, then a Republican paper, and for twenty-two years was an interesting and useful journal. Mr. Bartlett's editorial labors having been terminated by his death, and Free-soilism having become merged in Republicanism, Mr. Burr in 1870 sold his subscription list to Mr. Lynde, and when the opportunity came that he could return to his old business as publisher of a journal sustaining the principles of the Jeffersonian, and of wider influence, he was happy to avail himself of it.

On the 15th of May, 1870, Messrs. Boutelle & Burr entered upon their new enterprise, Captain Boutelle having full control of the editorial, and Mr. Burr of the business department.

Under the present management the Whig and Courier has been and is one of the most ably conducted and managed papers in the State. Captain Boutelle is perfectly fearless. He wields a ready pen. Confident of the correctness of his position, he is ever ready to defend it. If friends question it, he turns them aside by a few skilful strokes; and when impelled thereto falls upon his enemies with masterly vigor. He makes no compromise with wrong. Among the first to discover what he considered the seditious purposes of the mushroom politicians of 1879, to frustrate the will of the people, he fought against them with admirable zeal and persistency; and had the satisfaction, finally, of feeling that he had been largely instrumental in keeping the State out of the hands of political burglars. A believer in the great principles of Republicanism, he never hesitates to do battle for them when the occasion requires; a believer in progress, he is at all times ready to give it intelligent aid. As a writer he is earnest, and his style is chaste and perspicuous.

In 1880 Captain Boutelle was the candidate for Member of Congress of the Republicans of the Fourth District. He has been a campaign speaker in and out of the State in the past two years.

The local editors under the present management have been Mr. James Swett Rowe, Mr. E. H. Trafton, Mr. E. A. Meigs, who is now editorially connected with the New Haven Palladium; Mr. W. J. Curtis, now a lawyer in New York City; Mr. E. P. Boutelle, brother of the editor-in-chief; and Mr. Paul R. Seavey—the last two being now connected with the paper, and, as all readers of the Whig and Courier know, are rendering efficient service.

The daily circulation of the paper is about two thousand. The subscription price is $8 a year. It is a large folio sheet, with eight columns to the page.

BANGOR WEEKLY COURIER.

This is a large six-page paper of eight columns to the page, and is made up of the matter of the Whig and Courier. Of course it is under the same management. It has a circulation of about three thousand. The subscription price is $2 a year, in advance.

BANGOR DAILY COMMERCIAL.

Marcellus Emery continued to edit and publish this journal in Bangor until his decease, in February, 1879. From being mildly partisan, as at first, it became at length intensely partisan, and was largely instrumental in bringing about the fusion between the Democrats and Greenbackers.

Mr. Emery had established a local department, which helped to increase the circulation of the paper. This department was at first under the management of Mr. F. R. Guernsey, then of Mr. A. W. Decrow, then of Mr. E. M. Blanding, who came to Bangor from Saco.

The Daily Commercial—a folio evening paper—was sustained both by subscription and by the sale of single copies. The subscription price was $7 a year; price of single copies three cents. The circulation at Mr. Emery's decease was eleven hundred or twelve hundred copies.

After the decease of Mr. Emery the establishment was purchased by the enterprising firm of J. P. Bass & Co., consisting of Hon. Joseph P. Bass, a former Mayor, Frank H. Getchell, and Miller D. Mudgett, Esqs. From May 1, 1879, to January 1, 1880, George B. Goodwin, Esq., who had been on the Boston Post, was its editor-in-chief. Under him it was honorably conducted. As he would not, by expression or implication, give countenance to what was then the policy of the Fusion party, he withdrew from the paper.

From January 1, 1880, Hon. Daniel Sanborn had the editorial charge of the paper until November 1st of the same year, when he took up his connection with it. Mr. Sanborn was an old journalist, and wielded a racy pen.

Mr. Sanborn was succeeded in the editorial chair by Mr. Getchell, one of the proprietors, who still continues editor-in-chief. Mr. Getchell is a good writer, a discriminating editor, and gives his best energies to making the paper, though partisan, a desirable newspaper. He is a Democrat, and has his heart in the success of his party and of his paper.

Since the Commercial came under its present management it has been made a bi-daily—that is, there is a noon as well as an evening edition.

Mr. Blanding, after several years very satisfactory labor upon the local columns, "saw money" in another enterprise, and about the 1st of January, 1880, left the Commercial to establish the Maine Mining Journal, of which he and his brother became the editors. The Commercial found a competent successor to Mr. Blanding in A. P. Wiggin, Esq., from Belfast, a gentleman of editorial experience and ability.

The proprietors are gratified with the success of the paper, and with its present editorial management. The circulation, of course, fluctuates, according to the interest of the public matters which it promulgates. In the time of the illness of President Garfield, in some days it ran up to three thousand copies daily. Its publishers claim that eighteen hundred is its fair average circulation, and that it is gradually increasing. Feeling that their advertising patronage was highly flattering in the fall of 1881, they enlarged the paper to accommodate it.

From the Daily Commercial is made up a folio weekly, which has a circulation in the State of about three thousand. Its subscription price is $1 per year, payable in advance.

THE COMMERCIAL AND DEMOCRAT,

THE NORTHERN BORDER.

A journal with a lengthy announcement, of which the following is a part:

We, an association of citizens, to wit: B. F. Tefft, O. F. Knowles, Hannibal Hamlin, S. F. Hersey, John B. Foster, Chapin Humphrey, A. J. Chapman, H. W. Knowles, G. W. Merrill, Noah Woods, D. White, G. A. White, C. Holyoke, Otis Gilmore, W. F. Currier, W. H. Knowles, W. S. McDonald, Isaac M. Bragg, David Brown, Joseph Baker, Charles A. Coombs, and Norris E. Bragg, organized as a stock company, propose to publish a weekly periodical at the city of Bangor, Rev. Dr. B. F. Tefft as editor-in-chief, and Oscar F. Knowles as printer, the editorial department to be aided by a number of the ablest writers in this country, and with several well-known European correspondents."

And with the above name was started in Bangor about the 1st of January, 1873. It was not to be sectarian nor political, nor sectional; it was to work for home interests, "for the development of our resources, for the advancement of this portion of our continent by encouraging, advocating, and befriending every enterprise that has this great end in view."

Great things were, of course, expected of a journal with such an announcement. Its editor-in-chief was known as a voluminous writer and ready speaker, as a Methodist clergyman of cosmopolitan ideas, and confident of progress in whatever he undertook.

The paper was a large five-column quarto, well printed, and contained much interesting matter, though not more than most other weekly journals of its size. Terms of subscription, $2 a year in advance. The pen of the editor-in-chief was prolific of suggestions in behalf of our home interests, etc., and his labors were incessant to make the enterprise successful in a business point of view. He may have been aided by "a number of the ablest writers in the country," and by "several well-known European correspondents," but from some cause the anticipated "advancement of this portion of our continent" was not realized, or "our resources" developed to any remarkable extent. For years the industrious editor labored with brains and hands to carry out his plan, and especially to make the enterprise financially a success. The ingenuity displayed was the occasion of frequent remarks, and if no portion of the continent was greatly benefited because of the existence of the Northern Border, it was not for want of effort, intellectual or financial.

Many were interested for the success of the journal, and seconded the efforts of the editor-in-chief to the extent of their ability, but in its inception the cost of carrying on such an enterprise evidently had not been counted. Many fortunes might have been sunk if it had been continued, therefore it was concluded to bring it to an end, and let the advancement of this part of the continent await the natural order of things.

DIRIGO RURAL.

This is a weekly, five-column octavo agricultural paper. It was established in Bangor in 1874 by D. M. Hall, Esq., who continues to be its editor and proprietor. It is the organ of the Grange, and has a circulation of upwards of two thousand copies all over the State, which is increasing. Being in the interest of the farmers its columns are freighted with matter designed for their benefit.

Besides much interesting miscellaneous reading it contains reports, addresses, communications, hints and directions in regard to various matters connected with husbandry, besides items of news and numerous advertisements.

If the Rural has nothing to do with partisanism in politics, or sectarianism in religion, or with any subject over which people will be likely to come in angry collision, there is no reason why it should not be a very valuable aid to those who are engaged in developing the agricultural resources of the State and endeavoring to build up fortunes by the labor of their head and hands, and not simply by carrying into practice the principle that "a dollar saved is two dollars earned."

But if it shall seriously persist in propagating the theory embraced in the following extract from the leading editorial in the issue of November 19, 1881, it may stir up an opposition which will seriously affect its influence. Laboring men are the men who acquire and ought to acquire and have the benefit of fortunes in this country, not the men who spend a good portion of their time in croaking and envying those who by the industrious application of brains and hands become the possessors of large accumulations. This is the extract:

The simplest understanding can comprehend that all wealth is simply the product of labor, and that to create the hundreds of millionaires now numbered in this country, thousands of laboring men must be deprived of the just proportion that should be the reward of their toil. And yet there are some servile natures that believe rich men are to be desired; mistakenly supposing that they are the ones that set the wheels of industry in motion, while, in fact, they only are the ones who secure the profits. For the purposes of carriage we esteem a few inches of snow evenly distributed over the earth of great advantage; but if the wind takes this well-distributed snow and gathers it into immense heaps leaving the ground bare, except where the huge drifts lie, then are all the plans that rested on the promises of sledding defeated. So, too, are the general business energies and capacities of the people crippled and destroyed in proportion as money and property are gathered into a few hands. If only $25 are unduly taken every year from each household of laboring men and given to the few, the aggregate sum is immense and capable of working great depression. It is not only the loss of the $25 of which he is robbed, but the ability of all his neighbors upon whom his business interests depend are weakened in the same way; and they are, in a measure, incapacitated for giving their patronage to his and other industries.

Distribute the fortunes of the millionaires and how long will it be before they are in the hands of the millionaires again? It is not "wind" that heaps up fortunes, it is work. The subscription price is $1.50 per year.

MAINE MINING JOURNAL.

This is an interesting and useful publication, established in Bangor early in the year 1880, to aid in promoting the development of the mineral resources of Maine and adjacent States and Provinces. It is the only publication in New England devoted exclusively to this object. It is published every Friday, and gives valuable information in regard to newly discovered mines, newly opened mines, old mines, and the progress making in all the mines. Nothing of interest in relation to mining, to ores, to the reduction of ores, to the new discoveries, to the action of companies, and the movements of individuals, connected in any way with the industry, escapes the notice of its enterprising editors, who are E. M. Blanding, Esq., for years an efficient and careful local editor of the Bangor Daily Commercial, and his brother, W. F. Blanding, Esq. The paper is in good style, neatly printed, containing sixteen pages of matter, about two-thirds of which is reading, and the rest advertisements. It has a large and increasing circulation. The subscription price is two dollars a year, in advance.

E. H. Dakin is the business manager. The office is at 28 West Market Square, Bangor, Maine.

THE BANGOR TRIBUNE

was a Greenback paper started in Bangor in 1878, for the campaign of that year. The price for the campaign was ten cents, and the paper obtained a circulation of thirty thousand. It was published in Bangor from three to five months. It was afterward removed to Augusta, and thence to Portland, where it was incorporated with the New Era.

While in Bangor, the editor in charge of the Tribune was Charles S. Conant, Esq.

THE GREENBACKER.

In 1879 this was published in Bangor, as a campaign paper, with the politics of the Tribune, by Mr. M. A. Walton, at twenty-five cents.

THE RECORD

was the name of the campaign Greenback paper published in 1880. It was under the management of Mr. Walton. Price twenty-five cents for the campaign, same as that of the Greenbacker.

THE FREEHOLDER.

This is a weekly paper published in Bangor, and was established early in 1881. Its thirty-fifth number was issued November 11, 1881, and 5,300 copies of that number were sent out.

The first column in the paper has this heading:

The Freeholder. A Greenback Newspaper. Published every Friday at Bangor, Maine, by the Freeholder Publishing Co.

Hon. Joseph L. Smith, of Oldtown, President.

Herbert J. Banton, Business Manager.

T. J. McIntyre, Editor.

The President has been several times in the State Senate, and is understood to be a man of much wealth. He was the Greenback candidate for Governor in 1878 and 1879, in which years there was no election by the people. It was claimed by his friends that he was elected Governor by the Legislature, but the Supreme Court held that the body claiming to have elected him was illegal. By the prominence of his position in the publication of the Freeholder, he evidently has great faith in the future prosperity of his party; and the issue of November 11, above referred to, in its leading editorial has this language:

The National Greenback party has thus far been a party of marvelous growth, without a parallel in the history of parties. The old party organs endeavor to screen this fact out of sight. But, like Banquo's ghost, it will not down.

Let no lover of justice despair. The Greenback party, whose sole purpose it is to restore to the people the government of the fathers, is already acknowledged as a party of glorious achievements. It is the only defender of those principles of equity and justice upon which was reared the fabric of our Republic. Therefore it follows, as a natural sequence, that if the Republic is to endure the National party must of necessity be the party of the future, consecrated as it is to the defense of those principles without which the Republic must away.

For the price, the paper is large and well-printed, and its selections are good. Its advertising patronage appears to be large, and, if it shall continue to hold 5,000 paying subscribers year after year, it may be considered as permanently established. The editor, who is an Irish gentleman, has "faith," and that, St. Paul says, "is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen."

THE MESSENGER.

It would seem that the Greenback party in Bangor is in a flourishing condition, if the number of its journals is an indication. The Messenger is the second which has been established within a year. Now (November, 1881,) it is not three months old, and it claims to have twenty-five hundred subscribers, with additions at the rate of two hundred per week.

The Messenger is a large quarto sheet with six columns on a page. It purports to be rather a literary than a political journal, though it has a pronounced political faith. About one page is devoted to editorial and political articles, about five to literature and news, and about two to advertisements. The terms of the paper are the same as those of the Freeholder, $1 for a year, fifty cents for half a year, and twenty-five cents for three months.

Whether both or either of the papers are to be permanently established, and endeavor to build up a higher or different grade of political morality than has existed, will depend somewhat upon the support extended to them.

The Messenger has recently been enlarged from a five-column to a six-column paper, and is well printed. It is published by the Messenger Company, and edited by E. D. Pratt, Esq.

The latest issue contains the following fundamental doctrine of Greenbackism:

A dollar has no existence except as a denomination of the money of account. It is a thing ideal, not real as a bushel of wheat. When the Government says that a piece of gold, silver, or paper shall be known as a dollar, and a legal tender for one dollar, it simply appoints that article, made and prepared in a regular and prescribed form, to correspond in debt-paying power or purchasing equivalency (which is always controlled by the debt-paying power) to the money of account, which in this country has for its unit the dollar.

It contains also this suggestion:

Not only is the silver dollar a fiat dollar, for a part of its value at east, but the hole which may be made in it has a fiat value it seems.

A standard silver dollar with a hole punched in it is worth only sixty-five cents; there the hole has a value of thirty-five cents. Make five holes and at that rate the holes would be worth more than the original dollar. There is "fiat" with a vengeance.—[November 16, 1881.]

THE PARLOR TABLE.

This is the latest and newest journal that has come from the press in Penobscot county. It is new in manner and new in matter. It is a quarto sheet of three columns to the page, is daintily printed, and is appropriate for the repository whose name it has assumed. It is designed for "the society of the Queen City of the East, long famous for intellectual brilliancy and social charm," and promises to "chronicle [for it], with taste and accuracy, the events in the social world, besides furnishing, in its advertising columns, a trustworthy and interesting guide to our emporiums of commerce."

The contents are from the pens of Bangor writers, and relate to matters of interest to the tenants of the parlor, a portion being advertisements designed to attract their attention. Its imprint announces it to be "a social and literary journal; published monthly, at Bangor, Maine; terms, 50 cents a year; John H. Bacon, publisher."

The editor is understood to be the son of the celebrated author, and compiler of the Poets and Poetry of America, a young man of rare abilities—the author of the "P. Q. Indexor."

The first number was issued in November, 1881, and has enough of interest to justify the publisher in the belief that there will be a good demand for succeeding numbers.

THE DEXTER GAZETTE.

This journal was established in 1862 by Rev. J. F. Witherell, a Universalist clergyman. In August, 1869, the establishment was bought by Messrs. Robbins & Gallison. Mr. Gallison continued in the firm something more than two years; he then sold out his interest to Mr. Robbins, who carried on the establishment alone for several years. In 1878 Mr. Robbins formed a business connection with Mr. M. F. Herring, and they published the paper as copartners until 1880, when Mr. Herring purchased Mr. Robbins's interest and became and continues to be the sole proprietor.

The Gazette is a large sheet of twenty-seven by forty-one inches, and eight columns to the page. With the growth of the town it has greatly enlarged its proportions. It was originally a "seven by nine" sheet. It is a valuable local journal, and the enterprising people of Dexter manifest their appreciation of it by giving it a substantial subscription list of at least 1,000, and a handsome advertising support. The subscription price is $2 a year.

THE PATTEN VOICE.

was a small 6x8-inch two-column local paper, published in Patten by William Sleeper in 1866-67. It was the enterprise of an ambitious lad, who wanted occupation and amusement. It obtained a circulation of three thousand copies at 25 cents a year.

After being published in Patten about a year, it was removed to Sherman, in Aroostook county, where it was published under the name of

THE VOICE.

In 1871 it was sold to L. H. Caldwell, who enlarged it to a six-column folio. In 1873 it was sold to E. D. Pratt, who removed it to Patten in 1874 and changed the name to and enlarged it to a seven-column folio. It was published until September, 1875, when it was suspended, and the subscription list was transferred to the Katahdin Kalendar, a weekly sheet published in Sherman by Dr. D. H. Owens.

The community in which the Voice and Tribune were published is an intelligent and thriving, but somewhat isolated one, in almost the extreme north of the county, and a local paper there is a desideratum and convenience.

THE NEWPORT NEWS.

This was a sprightly weekly folio, published in the extreme westerly part of the county, more than a hundred miles from Patten—as the road runs—in 1876, by Mr. Stevens. It was the news medium of Newport and neighboring towns, non-partisan, wide awake, and quite popular; but there was not patronage by subscriptions and advertisements adequate to its support, and in a year or so it went to its bourne. Its publisher could not live on air simply, even when freighted with sweet promises from human lips. It was succeeded late in the year 1878 by a paper called which was published a few months by Mr. Marchant, and then discontinued. It was a six-column folio. Want of support was the complaint of which it died. It was succeeded, in 1879, by a bright, spicy, Republican newspaper. This was published every Saturday by R. O. Robbins, editor and proprietor, at $1.50 a year. It supplied its readers with the news of the neighboring towns, as its predecessor, the News, had done. It was a four-column quarto, well printed, fairly edited, and as unobjectionable as a partisan journal could well be, but it did not survive its second year. It was hinted by some invidious person that it died of "chronicles," but the truth is it died of that air which was so fatal to the News.

The town of Newport has many intelligent and enterprising citizens. It is surrounded by thriving towns, with intelligent people. It is a good location for a newspaper, and ought to have one, but it cannot unless its people will make up their minds to sustain it after the novelty of its first appearance has worn off, and to overlook an occasional mistake, to which all newspapers are liable in some form or other.

COLLEGE REPORTER, was the title of a journal published monthly at the State College in Orono, under the auspices of the students, from 1874 to 1879. It was devoted to the interests of the college and students. It was succeeded by which is published annually at the college, and is somewhat original. It has numerous illustrations, which, if preserved, will perpetuate the wit and wisdom of the graduating classes, and peradventure of others connected with the college.

The publications of the college, as yet, are only the annual reports and catalogues.

THE WEEKLY HERALD,

This was a small four-page paper established in Corinna in March, 1879, by Fred. J. Whiting, and published at seventy-five cents a year. It was devoted to local interests.

In 1880 Mr. Whiting removed his office into Eagle block on Dexter street, and formed a copartnership with Mr. A. Phinney, and enlarged the paper from a four-column to a six-column folio, and changed its name to increased the subscription price to $1.25 per year, and gave its subscribers more reading matter than the Weekly Herald contained.

Messrs. Whiting & Phinney continued to publish the paper in Corinna until July or August, 1881, when it was removed to Pittsfield, in Somerset county, and the original name, "Weekly Herald," was restored.

So far as the writer has had an opportunity to judge, the living press of Penobscot county is generally ably managed. Individuals will criticise, some this thing, some that; but intelligent readers are quite united in their condemnation of personal bickering, blackguardism, vituperation, or passionate denunciation of opponents in newspapers as not within the scope of their intended patronage, and as not a requisite of dignified editors.

CHAPTER XV.

The Newport & Dexter Branch of the Maine Central Railroad, under the auspices of the latter company, is to be extended northeasterly into Aroostook county. The following notice was given the surveying parties about the 1st of December, 1881, by the Aroostook Pioneer:

The Presque Isle party have reached Masardis, having covered forty miles. They found an easy route from Presque Isle to Ashland with one exception—five miles below the latter town—where there will be some heavy work required. From Masardis they will follow the Aroostook valley to Oxbow, eight miles, thence south in the direction of Patten, a town of considerable importance, lying upon the east line of Penobscot county, thirty-five miles west of Houlton. The Dexter party are working their way toward Patten, which they will reach in two or three weeks. The weather has been very favorable, and no serious obstacles have been encountered.

CHAPTER XVI.

Aaron Littlefield Simpson, son of David and Relief Simpson, was born in Dixmont. His father David was born in New Hampshire, and came when a young man to what was then Frankfort—now Winterport. He was married to Relief Littlefield just before the War of 1812. Enlisting in that war, he served one year under General Hampton, and was in the battles of Shadagee and Stone Mill. After his return from the army he moved into what is now the town of Dixmont. It was then a wilderness, and was owned by proprietors who held the land very high. He paid $5 an acre for his farm. Frankfort, a distance of fifteen miles, was the nearest market, and life was a struggle, the seasons being cold and crops poor. David and Relief Simpson had nine children, one daughter and eight sons. Aaron L. was the fourth child. He spent his boyhood days in aiding to clear and cultivate the farm. He was enabled to get only about three months' schooling at a distant district school in a year; but to make more rapid progress during those few months, besides the few branches then taught he took extra studies, carrying home his books, and by the open fire-light in the evening he tried to get an education. Even dipped tallow candles were too expensive to be used for such an occasion. After leaving the district schools he acquired an academic education, earning the money to pay his expenses by teaching schools during the winter months and farming during the summer vacations. After finishing his academic course he entered the law office of John H. Norris, Esq., of Newport, and read law with him two years, teaching during the winter months. He then came to Bangor and entered the office of Albert W. Paine, where he read law one year. He was then admitted to the Bar in June, 1848, at Bangor. The same year he opened a law office in Bangor, where he has remained in successful practice ever since. He has been married twice, the first time in 1855, by which marriage one daughter was born to him. In 1865 he was married in Taunton, Massachusetts, to Miss Corelli C. Williams, by whom he has had a daughter and a son. All of his children are now living. Having been nurtured upon a farm, he has never lost his interest in farming, and has given much attention to horticulture. He was in the civil posse in the Aroostook war. He served three years as a member of the State Board of Agriculture, and has held many other offices of trust—six years as City Solicitor of Bangor, two years as Chairman of Superintending School Committee, and four years as member of the city government (one year as President of the Council.) He has always manifested a public spirit, taking a great interest in the affairs of the city, especially her public schools. He has always taken a great interest in politics. Before the war he was a Democrat. In 1860 he voted for Stephen A. Douglas for President and acted during the first year of the war with the Douglas Democrats, and was among the first of them to join the Administration party and aided in sustaining the war, taking the stump in its support.

TOWNS AND VILLAGES.

[BREWER]. The following addition should be made to the biographical sketch of Mr. William P. Burr: He was one of the charter members of the Brewer Savings Bank in 1869, and was chosen one of the Trustees, which office he has held, with that of President for the past two years, since its organization to the present time.

[CARMEL]. Dr. J. P. Benjamin, one of the oldest settlers of Carmel, is the son of John Benjamin, of Livermore, Maine. He came here about 1807 or 1808. He married Rebecca, daughter of Samuel Benson, of Plymouth, Massachusetts. They had six children—five girls and one boy, viz: Lucette, now Mrs. Cobb, of Bangor; Rebecca, now Mrs. Levi Cobb, of Bangor; Esther, wife of Colonel Avery, of Exeter, now deceased; Sarah, now Mrs. Willey, of this town; Susan, now living in Bangor, and J. P., the subject of this sketch. Dr. Benjamin was born in 1822, and after receiving the education obtained in the common schools he attended the academy at China, and also the Newport Academy. After leaving these schools he studied medicine with John Benson, of Waterville, for four years. He attended lectures in Brunswick, Maine, at Medical College there; graduated at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, in 1853. He then came back here to his native town and began the practice of medicine, where he has ever since lived. In 1855 he married Mary A. Hopkins, daughter of Elisha Hopkins, who came here from Hampden. He followed the sea before coming here. He opened the second store in this town, the first store then being kept by John Fuller, who was the first trader here. To this union there have been born three children, viz: John F., Elmer H., and Linnie, all of whom are now living. Dr.

Benjamin has not held public office, always preferring to give his entire attention to his profession.

[CORINTH.]—Charles H. Bean is the son of Reuben Bean, who came here from New Hampshire about 1830. His wife's name was Mary Smith, of New Hampshire. They had twelve children—eight boys and four girls, viz: Clara, now Mrs. Cheeney; Diana, now Mrs. Marrows; Diantha, now Mrs. Blake; Mariette, now Mrs. Fairbanks; Augustus, Albert, Sumner, Charles, Reuben, Edward and Edwin (twins), and Hobart. Charles H., the subject of this sketch, was born in 1835. He married Sarah Jane Libby, daughter of Alfred Libby, of Charleston. They have two children, having lost two, viz: Charles, Medora, Unie, Josie. The two first they have buried. Mr. Bean first settled in Corinth, where he has since lived. He is a farmer, and has a fine farm of one hundred and fifteen acres in the south part of Corinth. He is a progressive and successful farmer.

[EDDINGTON].—The year of birth of Colonel Eddy was 1726. He was son of Eleazer and Elizabeth (Cobb) Eddy. In April, 1759, he started for Fort Cumberland in Nova Scotia, with a company of soldiers he had recruited, and not as an emigrant. He was on duty as Captain of the company until it was discharged September 30, 1760, after which he bought lands at Fort Cumberland, some of which were owned by his descendants as late as 1876.

It seems that Mr. Williamson, the historian, is in error in saying that Colonel Eddy "received no aid nor direct encouragement" from the General Court of Massachusetts, in 1776, for his projected expedition against Fort Cumberland. On the contrary, he was granted supplies of ordnance and commissary stores.

For much other valuable matter, see the Memoir of Colonel Eddy, published in 1877 by Colonel Joseph W. Porter, now of Bangor.

[GARLAND.]—Calvin P. Berry, of Garland, is a son of Stephen A. Berry, who came to Penobscot county with his parents in 1824. His grandfather, Stephen Berry, was a native of New Hampshire. He was born in Rochester, New Hampshire, in 1771, and died in Exeter in 1836. His wife was Alice Chamberlain, born in 1780, and died in 1851. Stephen Berry was a Colonel of the New Hampshire militia. After coming to Maine, he was for many years a surveyor. Of his family Ira now lives in Portland; Clementina (Mrs. Harvey) lives in Maxfield, and Stephen A., in Garland. Stephen A. Berry was born in New Durham, New Hampshire, in 1806, and came to this county in 1824, with his parents. He married Mary L. Pratt in 1834. The surviving members of their family are Calvin P., of Garland; Mary C., now Mrs. O. W. Twitchell, of Cambridgeport, Massachusetts; Thomas L., of Garland, and Frank S., of Reno, Nevada. Two sons, Arthur A. and Stephen G., died in the service of their country in the late war. Mrs. Berry died in 1863 at the age of fifty-six. Calvin P. Berry was born at Garland in 1835. Mr. Berry has been engaged in farming, and at the carpenter business. He has served as school committee of his town, and was elected to the Legislature in 1881 on the Republican ticket.

[ORONO.]—Mr. A. G. Ring, of Orono, is a son of George Ring, Jr., and a grandson of George Ring, who was a native of Georgetown, Maine. He was born in 1759, and settled in Orono in 1799. He married Margaret Foster, who was born in 1763 in Bath. Mr. Ring was one of the pioneer lumbermen on the Penobscot. He died in Orono in 1812; Mrs. Ring died in 1813. George Ring, Jr., father of the subject of this sketch, was born in Georgetown, Maine, March 2, 1795, and came to Orono in 1799 with his father, when but four years old. He married Mary Lancaster June 29, 1820. She was born in Bangor May 19, 1795. They had eight children, four sons and four daughters, of whom four are now living in Orono, viz: A. G., E. T., C. B., and Mrs. M. J. Parker. Mr. Ring followed the business of his father, and was widely known as a lumberman. He died October 6, 1878. Mrs. Ring is still living, being now eighty-five years old. A. G. Ring was born in Orono June 29, 1821. He married Miss Ann R. Frost February 11, 1849. She was born in Gorham, Maine, May 16, 1827. This couple have had five children, viz: Mrs. Anna H. Hamilton, of Orono; Miss M. F. Ring, in Minneapolis, Minnesota; Nellie E., Grace P., and Nathan A., at home. At the age of sixteen Mr. Ring commenced in the lumber business, working in the mills in Orono. He has followed the business in some capacity ever since. From 1869 to 1875, he was one of the Selectmen of his town.

BRADLEY.

[The following addition to the History of Bradley, by Mr. A. M. Austin, of Milford, has been received since the preceding sketch was printed.]

Bradley village is situated on the Penobscot River, eleven miles from Bangor. The village is in the extreme northern part of the town, on the river. The town of Bradley is on the Penobscot River, a few miles above Bangor, between Milford on the north and Eddington on the south. It is a little irregular in its form and somewhat larger in area than most New England towns. The surface is not very uneven in its character, though some of it is rocky, and ledges are quite numerous. Its soil is not all of the best quality, but there are a number of good farms. It is pretty well watered; two streams, Great Works and Blackman or Nichols Streams, rise not far from the southeast corner of the town and cross it diagonally, nearly parallel with each other. These streams afford numerous sites for manufacturing purposes; there being no less than eighteen water-powers on them, of which eleven are on Great Works Stream and seven on the Blackman Stream. These, with three powers on the Penobscot, afford opportunities for manufacturing purposes of the highest order; and if they were improved to their fullest capacity they would make Bradley one of the important manufacturing centers of the country. Water-power is the one thing for which Maine is pre-eminent above all other States. It is so abundant, in fact, that only the most important and accessible are of much value. This is especially the case in Bradley. Of the twenty-one powers in the town, but five or six have ever been improved.

The most important and valuable of the water-powers of Bradley is the Great Works power so called, on the Penobscot between Bradley village and West Great Works village in Oldtown. This is one of the best of the very valuable powers on that river, and it is the seat of a very important manufacturing business. It is in the hands of the Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Company, one of the most active and enterprising concerns on the rivers. They have erected and maintain in the best possible condition two blocks of saw-mills and one clapboard- and shingle-mill. In said blocks are three gang-mills, one circular saw-mill, and several muley and single saw-mills for the manufacture of long lumber, with a capacity for twenty-five millions of long lumber, besides shingle-, clapboard-, lath-, and stave-mills sufficient to produce thirty millions in the season of seven months—day runs only. These mills are operated by two Bangor concerns, Messrs. Cutter & Eddy, and Messrs. L. & F. N. Strickland, whose business capacity is shown in the fact that these mills, though less favorably situated, as far as railroad facilities are concerned, have been kept in operation through all the hard times, when nearly all other mills on the river were obliged to suspend operations. This power, valuable as it is, might be greatly improved by extending the dam down the river a quarter of a mile below the mills to a point just below the mouth of Great Works Stream. This would increase the head and fall two feet, making a total head of thirteen feet. It would greatly augment the capacity of mill-ponds for storing logs, and perhaps make this the most valuable and convenient power for lumber manufacturing purposes on the Penobscot.

A flourishing village has grown up about these mills. It has a population of about seven hundred inhabitants, who are mainly dependent on the business furnished by the development of this power.

The only other approach to a village is two miles below, at the Blackman mills. There is a store and saw-mill that once did a flourishing business, but the cutting of the timber in the basin of that stream, and the tendency of the lumber business at this time to seek the railroad, have seriously diminished the importance of these mills.

The principal farming section of the town is on the road running parallel with the Penobscot, in the western part of the town. This is the seat of the earliest settlement of the town, and contains the oldest and most valuable farms. The section of the town away from the Penobscot is mostly forest, it being estimated that four-fifths of the town is in an unimproved state. The original growth has been cut off, but the second growth has become available to some extent, and Great Works Stream is still the seat of lumbering operations.

Who was the first pastor to settle within the limits of what is now the town of Bradley is a debatable question. There has been no record made that is reliable, and the memory of the oldest inhabitant does not reach back far enough to settle it. It rests only on tradition, and traditions are not considered so thoroughly reliable as entirely to satisfy the impartial historian. But it is certain that the first settlement was made in Bradley while the Revolutionary war was being waged. At this time Bradley was a part of the territory belonging to the Penobscot Indians, and it is probable that the very few settlers who took possession of portions of the town, if they had any recognized rights to the soil they occupied, acquired it directly from the chief men of the Penobscot tribe.

Prior to 1776 what is now the township of Bradley was a part of the six-mile strip, extending from the head of the tide on the left bank to the head of the Penobscot River. In the year 1796 it was purchased of the authorities of the Penobscot or Tarratine tribe by commissioners of the State of Massachusetts, and was shortly after surveyed and opened for settlement. It was known from this time as No. 4, until its incorporation.

In 1774 the celebrated chief, Orono, was settled just across the Penobscot from Bradley, and before the peace of 1783 it is probable that the white man's axe had made its mark on the virgin forest of this town, and that a log cabin had been erected which afforded shelter to some hardy pioneer, and was the extreme northern limit of civilization on the left bank of the Penobscot when the army of Lord Cornwallis was cooped up at Yorktown, and the soldiers of France and America were performing the gallant deed that gave to the United States an undisputed place among the nations of the earth.

At the time the white man made his appearance within the limits of what is now the town of Bradley, Orono was at the head of the Penobscot tribe. He was then quite old, and was, as he always had been, quite friendly to the white settlers. The very few settlers who were in this town previous to its purchase by the whites in 1796, were not regarded with any but the most friendly feelings. Before the beginning of the present century, families by the name of Oliver, Spencer, Blackman, and probably others, were occupying No. 4, Old Indian Purchase, as Bradley was then called.

This was before the era of lumbering, and hunting, fishing and farming were the only avocations open to the early settlers.

Game was abundant and taken without difficulty. In the springtime the river abounded in the finest fish, and the pioneer settler of those days soon made an opening on the bleak hill sides, and the tasseled corn and waving rye grew up around the blackened stumps and prostrate trunks of trees—all that axe and fire had left of trees that had battled with the breezes of centuries.

It is one of the lost arts at this time, but our forefathers knew how to carve out a living for themselves and families on the thin soil of Eastern Maine; and they took possession of the wilderness in spite of its cold and inhospitable climate. The first settlers of Bradley were not deterred by the rigors of the Northern wilderness. For luxuries they cared little, and when the log cabins were erected they were satisfied to wait until such time as they had wrested from their sterile surroundings the means to erect better and more commodious habitations. They were not obliged to clear extensive tracts for pasturing purposes. The wilderness afforded a wide range, and marking their cattle they made it a common pasture for all who chose to occupy it. The large meadow on Great Works Stream was taken possession of for a hay field. It was a primitive way of living, but it is these primitive methods that have developed a large portion of our country.

At first Bradley progressed slowly. The settlers were all on the main river, and here they were not at all crowded. The pioneer settler is not apt to be. He requires a large amount of room, and when his neighbors become too handy he is pretty sure to advance still further into the wilderness. But quite early in the century a settlement was begun several miles up Great Works Stream, and a few years afterwards a saw-mill was built here. The mill was burnt sometime afterward, but it was and is now known as the Buck Mills.

At the commencement of the last war (1812) quite a number of families were occupying No. 4, and were living in the way that has been described. The war, probably, in a measure, retarded the development of the place, and for several years after the war the business of the country was in such a condition that but little attention was paid to the undeveloped region of Eastern Maine. But by 1820 a tide of emigration was attracted towards the Penobscot, and Bradley commenced to make an increase. At this time the lumbering resources of the Penobscot began to attract attention and mills had been built at various places along the river.

The manufacturing facilities of the town began to be recognized and mills were built at Bradley. At this time a man by the name of Wilson had put up a double saw-mill on the falls. He also traded in a small way, keeping a limited stock of goods in his dwelling house. Shortly afterwards Frederick Spofford built a saw-mill and a small store, and did business on the most extensive scale that had yet been done in the township. A mill was soon after built in Blackman Stream which, with the mill that was built on Great Works Stream by Coolridge, made ample saw-mill accommodations for the settlers and produced some lumber for export.

Prior to 1825 Bradley was known as No. 4 Plantation, but was probably not legally organized until the year just named. In that year John Wilson, Treasurer of Penobscot county, informed the inhabitants of No. 4 that they must pay a county tax, and that they must organize as a plantation by choosing officers and report to him or his successors the action taken by them.

It appears that Thomas S. Cram was acting as Clerk, and he accordingly warned the inhabitants to meet and perfect their organization. They met according to notice and Frederick Spofford was chosen Moderator, Thomas S. Cram, Town Clerk; Thomas S. Cram, George Vincent, and Frederick Spofford, Assessors; Bradley Blackman, Treasurer. Mr. Blackman was Treasurer of the Plantation and of the town of Bradley for many years, and took quite an important part in the early settlement of the township. At this time No. 4 was classed with Brewer, Orrington, and Eddington, for the purpose of electing a Representative to the Legislature. When the Plantation was organized it contained two school districts, and Moses Knapp and Jordan Grant were chosen School Agents.

From this time the progress of the Plantation was quite rapid, and the improvement of the water-power on the Penobscot on an extensive scale was the commencement of the village of Bradley, or Great Works, as it was for a long time and is now sometimes called.

The organization of the Great Works Milling and Manufacturing Company, and the building of the large block of mills about 1833, was a great event for Bradley, and established a business that has ever since been kept on a flourishing basis.

The building of these mills started several stores into operation. These mills and the business established by them made the Plantation ambitious, and a movement was started to incorporate a new town. Accordingly the Legislature was petitioned for that purpose. This was in 1834, and on the 3d of February, 1835, the Governor signed a bill incorporating the town.

The inhabitants of the town, at a meeting held on the 29th of June, 1835, accepted the act of incorporation, and organized by choosing the proper officers. At this meeting Nelson C. Pratt was chosen Moderator; Joseph Williams, Clerk; Joseph Williams, Reuben Pratt, and John D. Carter, Selectmen; Bradley Blackman, Treasurer.

It is said that the town was named Bradley as a compliment to Bradley Blackman, one of the oldest settlers, who had been one of the prominent citizens of the Plantation. The Blackmans were among the earliest settlers, and there are now and always have been quite a number of families by that name resident in the town.

The condition of business at the time the town was incorporated was very flourishing. It was a period of activity and speculation. Everything was run on the high-pressure principle. The timber land of the Penobscot Valley was in great demand, and purchasers were flocking thither from all parts of the country. Prices, too, were inflated to the utmost, and when the panic of 1837 came the crash that ensued was sharp and sudden. Before the collapse everybody (for every person was speculating in something, either timber land or town lots) was rich. After this, all but the very few fortunate ones who had sold at the right moment were poor. It was quite a blow to Bradley village, then just developing, for the times for several years following were quite hard. But the mills which had just been built were kept running, and in a few years matters began to improve again. At this time the mills were all single saws, which were just adapted to the logs then cut. All the lumber cut on the river was pine of the largest size and of a quality that would astonish the lumbermen of the present day. It was sawed into such lumber as the market called for, made into immense rafts at the foot of the mills, floated by the current of the river to Bangor, where it was shipped to Boston and such other ports as required.

Bradley was invariably fortunate in one thing—the mills at the village have always been in good hands. At this time the owners were practical lumbermen, and engaged in the business themselves. In many of the other towns on the river the mills have been and are now owned by capitalists who rent saws to parties who operate them by cutting or buying logs which they manufacture into lumber. This lumber they run to Bangor to commission merchants, who sell for them at a commission on long lumber of five per cent. Rents and commissions take a large part of the profits and in dull times saws are not always rented. But in Bradley the mills have generally been run. The owners being engaged in the lumber business themselves have kept the mills in good condition and kept them in operation, the only difference to them being that in dull times the ledger showed a smaller percentage of profit.

In 1839 George Vincent, one of the prominent citizens of Bradley, was a candidate for Representative to the State Legislature for the district in which Bradley was included, but he was not elected. The next year Bradley was more fortunate, and Hiram Emery was chosen to the same office. Mr. Emery was connected with the mills at Bradley at that time, and was quite an important citizen of the town. He was chosen to all the important offices in the gift of the inhabitants, and was Town Clerk for a long series of years; the records written down by him are models which future clerks may well imitate.

The period extending from 1840 to 1850 was a prosperous one; the mills were kept running to their full capacity. The Bradley lumbermen were active and enterprising, and the village of Bradley, or Great Works, that was growing up around the large block of mills on the river made quite an increase in this decade. The farming population of the town also made some improvements in the appearance and condition of the land they cultivated; but the abundance of lumber and the facilities for producing it have caused farming to be regarded as a matter of little importance in almost all the towns on the upper Penobscot. But a change is beginning to be felt in this respect, and the scarcity and diminished cut of lumber will soon give to farming the respect and importance to which it is entitled.

Some changes in the machinery of the mills were made at this time. Gang mills had come into vogue as an improvement on the old single saw, and iron wheels were rapidly taking the place of the old wooden flutter wheel. The primitive form of iron wheel would be regarded as quite a curiosity in these days of turbines and improved turbines; but they were received with great favor at the time of their introduction, and indeed they were well adapted to the privileges then generally in use on the Penobscot, where water was so abundant at all seasons of the year, that but little heed was taken to save it. The operators in Bradley at this time were Eddy & Murphy, Newell Avery, and others.

Eddy & Murphy afterwards went to Michigan and engaged in lumbering there. Mr. Murphy is still a resident of that State, and is one of the solid men of that section. At a later date Avery also went to Michigan, where he likewise engaged in the lumber business. He was very fortunate and became quite wealthy. At that time and a little later, when the West was being opened up to settlement, and its natural advantages for lumbering on an extensive scale were being availed of, it was often the case that many of the most successful operators were from the Penobscot country, the experience acquired there insuring them success in the newer and richer country. Others besides those named went from Bradley to Michigan and the Northwest, and have been more successful, probably, in the newer and richer West than they would have been on the Penobscot. By the year 1850 the Bradley mills were in outward appearance nearly the same as they are now, and the internal arrangement did not present a very great difference. They contained more single saws, and less short lumber was produced than at the present time. The large block on the main river, the small mill near the mouth of Great Works Stream, owned by Nehemiah Kittredge, and the mills on Blackman's Stream, were all actively employed. The lumber business was good, and until 1857 there was no time that lumber was not in demand. Everybody was employed who wished to work, at good wages. But the town did not grow so fast as it did the preceding decade; but that is easily accounted for. The lumber business had reached its maximum limit. All the water-powers below the boom were occupied by saw-mills. A quantity of logs sufficient to stock the mills was cut each year. This is the reason why the villages on the Penobscot, which started up so rapidly with the building of a block of saw-mills, have made no greater progress. The lumber business soon reached the point where no increase could be made, and when that point was reached but little progress was made afterwards. So it was with Bradley. Its period of rapid growth had passed, and its growth from this time forward if sure was to be slow.

The manifestations from which Spiritualism took its rise had happened a short time before this, and when the new doctrine began to be accepted as spiritual or religious belief, it found many adherents in Bradley. Hosea B. Emery, an enterprising merchant and one of the leading citizens of Bradley, was one of the firmest believers in the new faith, and his influence had much to do with the strong hold that Spiritualism took in Bradley. His house was a headquarters of the new belief, and mediums and lecturers were always welcome. By him and many others Spiritualism was earnestly believed, and it always has been, and is now accepted by many of the citizens of Bradley.

In 1851 Bradley was classed with the towns of Holden, Clifton, Eddington, Milford, and Greenbush, into a representative district, and the same classification has been maintained ever since. Arrangements were made in the first conventions held by the different parties after the classification, assigning years in which the different towns should be entitled to nominate the candidates for Representatives. As matters were arranged Bradley was entitled to the candidates in 1853 and 1858. Edwin Eddy was chosen by the District in 1853, and also in 1858. In 1853 he was elected by the Democrats, and in 1858 by the Republican party. The town of Bradley, as well as the district of which it is a part, had been pretty uniformly Democratic until the formation of the Republican party, when a change occurred, and this town, as well as the district, has rolled up a strong majority for the Republicans nearly ever since.

At the March meeting in 1857 the electors of the town by vote instructed the Selectmen to authorize one man to sell spirituous liquors and "to shut up all other places so as not to leak a drop."

No tavern has ever been kept here, and Bradley has an excellent record as a temperance town, though at times there have been shops that retailed ardent spirits. But the general sentiment of the town has always been opposed to the selling or drinking of spirituous liquors as a beverage. The vote of the town was, perhaps, obeyed that year, but since then there have been places that leaked to an extent that can hardly be measured by drops, yet these places have not been allowed to have a long run, and of late years the town has been generally free from places of this kind.

Bradley has never been encroached upon by railroads. In its plantation days a project was formed and a charter obtained for a railroad from Bucksport to Milford, following the Penobscot River on the eastern shore. This railroad would have crossed the western part of Bradley, and would at this time be a great help to the lumber business, but it was never built, and as a railroad has been built on the other bank of the river it perhaps never will be. Before the building of the European & North American Railway, an express was run in connection with the Bangor, Oldtown & Milford Railroad, and though rather a roundabout way to Bangor, it was better than no railroad. The building of the European & North American Railway has made a more convenient conveyance, a ferry connecting Bradley with the village of West Great Works, in Oldtown, which is a station on that road. It has been proposed to build a bridge across the Penobscot here. This would afford Bradley all the railway facilities needed, and perhaps it will soon be done.

The census taken in 1860 showed only an increase of six and one-fourth per cent. in the population of the town, but the increase in valuation was much larger, showing that the wealth of the town increased faster than the population.

In 1861 the war for the preservation of the Union commenced, and the Government called for the support of all its citizens. Bradley did not waver in the least in its support, and all the regiments raised in the eastern part of the State contained its representatives. On the various battlefields in which they were engaged they fought faithfully, and the town has reason to be proud of its part in the war. The war lasted longer than many supposed it would, and calls for men came thick and fast. Volunteers did not come forward fast enough to supply the demand, and a draft was ordered; but drafts were never popular in this section, and at a later date volunteers were raised, but at an immense cost. A large debt was incurred as a legacy of the war, but it was cheerfully borne and the taxation made necessary by it was paid in later years without murmuring.

The first year of the war was a hard one as far as the lumber business was concerned, but the subsequent years, of great activity in business. The immense disbursements of the Government, and the large issues of paper money, made this a period of great activity, and had not every household been lamenting the absent ones, it might have been regarded as a time of happiness and prosperity.

In 1861 Edwin Eddy was again elected Representative to the Legislature, being the third time he had been thus honored.

In 1865 the war ended and many families were made happy in Bradley by the return of the loved ones. But not all of those who went forth so gladly and bravely when their country called returned; some had fallen in the contest, and the "sacred soil" of Virginia was their last resting place. But though they returned not, they live still in the hearts of those who knew and loved them, and in the grateful memories of all who love their country. The year 1865 was a good one for business, though many predicted the contrary. But the prosperity occasioned by the immense expenditures of the war was still kept up, and the year following was one of the best as far as business was concerned. There was no drought, and an immense stock of logs was in the river. Orders for lumber were plenty, and lumbermen generally were making money.

About this time a lodge of Good Templars was started in Bradley village, and since that time it has generally been kept in a flourishing condition. This fact speaks volumes for the citizens of Bradley, as it requires deep interest and active effort in temperance work to maintain a lodge of Good Templars in good working condition for so long a time in so small a place. To do this the town must be pervaded by a good, healthy temperance sentiment; and there is no doubt but Bradley is in an excellent position as far as the temperance question is concerned.

In 1867 times were still good and the Bradley Mills, then operated by Cutler, Thatcher & Co., and Babb & Strickland, two Bangor concerns, were kept in active operation. All other branches of business were good also. The village was improving in appearance and increasing, though somewhat slowly, in population. The farmers, too, were prosperous and busy.

At this time a project was started to build a hall at the village, the need of which was severely felt. It was started by the right persons, and was pushed forward to a successful completion. It is a large and convenient hall, and is just where it was needed by the village. It stands on the main street in a convenient and accessible location. When completed it was called Union Hall in honor of the unity of spirit and sentiment that characterized its builders.

In 1868 Bradley again had the honor of sending a Representative to the Legislature. Francis Blackman was chosen to represent the district by a large majority.

The lumber business continued good, and in 1870 Messrs. Sawyer & Sons built a steam mill on Great Works Stream, near its entrance to the main river. It was the first steam mill ever built in Bradley, but it was not a success financially. Bradley is so plentifully supplied with water power that there seems to be no need of steam power.

The census of 1870 showed only a small increase in the number of inhabitants, but twenty-three having been added during the ten years preceding; but the valuation had increased $52,000, showing that the town had been and was in a pretty prosperous condition. Matters remained in much the same condition for the next three years; the currency of the country was still in an inflated condition, and but few foresaw the financial stringency that must be endured before the water would be evaporated from the business of the country.

In 1873 the panic came, and the five succeeding years were years of dullness and depression. It was the dullest period that was ever felt in the country, and labor was duller, perhaps, than anything else. In hard times food is as absolutely necessary as at any time; clothing cannot be conveniently dispensed with; but new houses are not built, and old ones are not repaired much, when every energy is employed to drive the wolf from the door.

But Bradley did not feel the hard times nearly so much as most of the other towns on the river. In the depressed state of the labor market and the intense competition of unemployed labor, wages must and did fall to a very low figure; but the mills at Bradley were in the right hands, owned and operated by the same men. They were kept running when most others were shut down. The hard times seemed to make but little difference with the Bradley mills. Logs were still bought and driven to the mill, and the cut of lumber was nearly as large as in the palmiest period of the lumber trade; and that, too, right in the face of the fact that the mills were not connected with any railroad, and most of the lumber was transported to market in the old-fashioned manner of the primitive lumberman. It speaks in the highest terms of the business ability of the operators of the Bradley mills, that they were able to saw so much when most other concerns were doing little or nothing.

In 1873 Bradley sent another Representative to the Legislature in the person of Job Brawn. He was elected by a handsome majority, and made an excellent member.

In 1875 the Baptist people of Bradley began to think themselves able to support a church organization. They accordingly took the necessary steps to perfect one. June 12 a meeting was held, and J. M. Bragg, E. A. Bragg, John Coulter, Hannah Coulter, Peter Curtis, Lizzie Curtis, Sarah Sawyer, M. Welch, Cynthia McIntosh, Ida Bean, Clara Gilman, Nettie Welch, Lillian Collins, and Warren Davis formally organized themselves into a church. J. M. Bragg was deacon, and Rev. Mr. Preston, of Oldtown, was the first pastor. This was the first church organization in the town, but meetings had always been held, though somewhat irregularly at times. The religious condition of the town was always on a par with the neighboring towns, and the reason that a church had not been organized before was because so many different sects were represented. The new church has regularly kept up its meetings, and though not strong enough to support a pastor by itself, by connecting itself with Oldtown but few Sabbaths have passed without the presence of a minister of the Gospel.

The Centennial year presented no notable features, as far as Bradley was concerned. It was the dullest of dull years, and was greatly lamented by those dependent on the lumber business for support.

The succeeding year was a slight improvement on the preceding, but it presented many features that make its memory disagreeable to the lumberman.

The next year, 1878, was the year that the Greenback wave swept over Maine, and Bradley, for the first time for many years, failed to roll up a majority for the Republicans.

The next year showed a decided improvement in lumber and all other branches of business. The mills were run to their fullest capacity, everybody was employed, and wages were slightly better.

In November of this year James J. Norris was murdered in a most shocking manner. Mr. Norris was one of the most capable and respected citizens of Bradley, and had been the recipient of all the offices in the gift of the town. He had been Representative to the Legislature in 1863, and at the time of his death was Treasurer of the town, which office he held for a number of years. He was resident agent for Messrs. Cutler & Eddy, managing their extensive business in Bradley. In this position he handled large sums of money, and generally had money on hand, which he kept in the safe in the office. Joseph Bolduc, a Frenchman from Canada, who had been employed in the mills but had lately been discharged, conceived the idea that Mr. Norris was the cause of his discharge, and determined to have revenge. Mr. Norris was accustomed to write late in his office in the evening, and Bolduc, knowing his habit, secured an axe and awaited him outside the office. Between 9 and 10 P. M. Mr. Norris finished his labor and started for home. He was met by Bolduc, who struck him with the axe and in a moment laid him dead on the spot. He then burst open the safe and rifled it of its contents. Mr. Norris was found in the morning, and Bolduc took the early train for Quebec. But suspicion was attracted toward him, and by means of the telegraph he was overhauled at Newport and arrested. He was tried, found guilty, and is now in the State prison at Thomaston, serving out a life sentence.

The succeeding year, 1880, was one of great activity.

The demand for lumber was greater than the supply, and all branches of business were in a flourishing condition. The drought was severe, but a large cut of lumber was produced by the Bradley mills, they being in such excellent condition that they are not much affected by a drought.

Frank Livermore was chosen Representative to the Legislature, it being Bradley's turn to select the candidate.

In the winter of 1880-81 the capacity of the mills for the production of lumber was enlarged by the addition of a circular saw-mill to the machinery. The season of 1881 was one of the most favorable for sawing ever known. The river was at a high pitch, and the burning of the mills at West Great Works, on the other side of the river, made the water at Bradley even better than at other places on the stream. An unprecedentedly large cut was the result, which has been sold at remunerative prices.

The Baptist society erected a church on a pleasant location in the village. It is a quite handsome and convenient structure, and is an ornament and honor to the village.

Bradley is now in a prosperous condition. The mill property is in the best of hands, and all other kinds of business flourishing. The town has improved much in appearance, and there is reason to believe that it is growing faster than at any time since 1840; and with its spiritual, moral, and intellectual condition constantly improving as they are, it must be one of the most pleasant towns in the county to live in. It is not a large town, but still has natural advantages that, improved as they ought to be, will make it a populous and important place.

DR. GEORGE A. HAINES.

DEXTER.

[The following valuable contribution to the History of Dexter, by Volney A. Sprague, Esq., of that town, was received too late for insertion in its proper place.]

From the date of the first settlement in Maine, by George Popham, in the year 1607, to the year 1760, the history of Maine presents a rapid succession of Indian wars, wherein savage cunning and hate mingles strangely with Anglo-Saxon pluck. At that time the power of the natives became completely broken, and they continued to exist merely a band of mendicants, subsisting on the bounty of their conquerors. Up to this time the District of Maine was organized in only one county, the county of York.

In 1760 the counties of Cumberland and Lincoln were organized, Lincoln to contain all the State east of Cumberland. Thus Dexter was in Lincoln county till 1790, when the county of Hancock was formed, so that the settlement of Dexter was commenced when included in the territory of Hancock county. The county of Penobscot was organized in 1816 with Bangor for a shire-town, its limits including the county of Piscataquis. We need say nothing more of the county.

The town of Dexter until its settlement was of course an unbroken wilderness, with occasional tracts of excellent timber, consisting of pine, spruce and juniper. It being the highest land between the Penobscot and Kennebec rivers, the tribes of Norridgewock and of Penobscot both claimed it as their hunting-ground, and we can only imagine the conflicts that may have taken place within our town limits, between those tribes in asserting their rights. Indian hunters sometimes used the stream and small lakes connected with it in their passage from the Kennebec to the Penobscot, and occasionally used the Dexter stream, but their usual course was to ascend the Sebasticook to Pittsfield; take the west branch to Moose Pond in Harmony, then by way of Main Stream to the nearest point on the Piscataquis river, thence down that river to the Penobscot. This way was circuitous, but they preferred a route like this, as they traveled mostly in canoes. The fact that Dexter is the highest ground between the two rivers is shown by the waters in the east part of the town running into the Penobscot, and those of the west running into the Kennebec. Indeed, on the farm of N. G. Brackett a rivulet divides, a moiety flowing into each river.

There is a question about the year in which the first settlement was made in Dexter, which we are not at present prepared to discuss. The exterior lines were surveyed in 1792 by Samuel Weston, and like all other towns in this part of the county, contains thirty-six square miles. The actual area is about 25,000 acres. The township, then known as No. 4, Range 5, north of the Waldo patent, soon after passed into the hands of proprietors by a contract from the State of Massachusetts. The original contract for the purchase of the territory of Dexter was made by James Bridge, the date of which I have not yet learned. Under this contract was granted a patent to Amos Bond and others, on the 10th day of March, 1804.

The township was surveyed into lots by Simeon Safford, in 1803.

In the year 1799, the proprietors wishing to encourage immigration to the plantation, not only offered liberal inducements in lands to settlers, but also sent Samuel Elkins, a mill-wright, from Cornville to look up a site and build mills. He selected the outlet of what is now known as Silver Lake, and commenced immediate operations. But little more was done that year than to clear away the underwood, fell and hew timber, and build a camp of hemlock bark. It is also urged that Ebenezer Small came and began work on a clearing in that year, but he certainly came the next year, cleared a small piece of land, and planted a crop. In this year, 1800, also came into town John Tucker, who felled trees on the farm owned by John Shaw; also Samuel Elkins, who cleared a patch on the site of the grist-mill. He also continued his preparations for erecting the proposed mill.

Mr. Small built a house of unbewn logs, filling the interstices with clay and covering with hemlock bark. He also built a hovel, with poles inclined and secured at the top with elm and wickerby bark. In these humble structures he laid up the first crop raised in Dexter. These were the first buildings.

We cannot avoid the conclusion that Mr. Small, who moved from Alton, New Hampshire, to Athens, in 1799, on his way to Dexter, really felled a patch of woods in the same year, on the hillside now owned by Josiah Crosby; that in the year 1800 he raised corn there, felled more trees, built his camp just north of the Stone Mill, and upon the crusted snows of the following spring, 1801, hauled his wife from Harmony, the nearest unobstructed point to his camp, fourteen miles, on a hand sled. This is as the story goes, but in fact Mrs. Small walked a good part of the way on snow shoes.

They lived here about three years when he built a house on the hill, near the residence of Hiram Bassett, and several years later occupied the farm now owned by Charles C. Hatch, where he lived for many years.

We accord to the plucky Small the no mean praise of clearing the first land, raising the first crop, building the first dwelling, and hauling the first white woman into Dexter.

We accord to his energetic wife the praise of being the first white woman that stepped on our native soil, that bore the first child, and took the first slide on a hand-sled.

The ladies of Dexter, her fair representatives, continue to honor her example by coasting down the hills of our village, in spite of town ordinance or constable.

The child born was Joannah Small, who married and is now living in Springfield, Maine. Mrs. Small attacked, single handed, a half-grown bear, and succeeded in dispatching him.

In 1801 good progress was made on the mills. Mr. Tucker built a small house, and the succeeding year moved his family in, being the second family in town. Mr. Elkins, on account of failing health, did not return in 1802, but his brother, John Elkins, came and completed a saw- and grist mill in one building, located on the site of the late saw-mill. The town after that was known as Elkinstown.

One of the great disadvantages labored under, was the difficulty of transportation. A road had been cut out from Bangor to Corinth, and a winter road continued to Garland. From Garland to No. 4, six miles, the mill irons had to be transported on horseback. The first mill crank was brought into town balanced on a horse, a man supporting each end, while a third led the horse. Millstones were manufactured from native granite. Soon after the mill was completed, it was sold to Jonathan Snow, who lived in a log cabin near the mill until 1804, when he built the first framed house, near where Mrs. B. F. Horton's house now stands.

In the year 1806, the barn of Samuel Copeland was burned, and Mr. Snow was so strongly suspected of being the incendiary, that, fearing trouble, he sold his property to Wiggins Hill and moved to Massachusetts; afterward he was convicted of a crime there, and sentenced to the penitentiary. While there, he was visited by Hon. Seba French, of Dexter, to whom he confessed that he was guilty of burning Mr. Copeland's barn.

In the spring of 1803, Seba French, of Washington, New Hampshire, moved into town, making his way from Harmony through snow so deep that he was three days in reaching John Tucker's house, and another day in getting to his camp three miles east on the farm of A. L. Barton. During the summer Cornelius Coolidge, Charles and Stephen Fletcher, Simeon, Theophilus, and John Morgan, moved into town from Hallowell. During the years 1803-4-5, Samuel Copeland, Simeon and John Safford, and Hugh Maxwell, moved from Washington, New Hampshire, to Dexter. E. W. Sprague also came from Greene. Mr. Copeland had a large family of boys and girls, who married and settled in Dexter. They have nearly all passed away, only two remaining—Mrs. Emma Beals, of Corinna, and Chauncy Copeland, of Dexter, Michigan.

About the year 1807 immigration had increased with such rapidity that the inhabitants concluded to enjoy some of the luxuries of life, so laid out a road from Garland to Dexter, built a school-house near the house of the late Justin Whitcomb. This house stood there for more than fifteen years, and did duty for the whole town as town-house, church, and school-house, united.

From this time the affairs of Elkinstown continued to prosper. The people were hardy and industrious, ever ready to extend to each other a helping hand, so that the town was as free from cases of actual distress as could be expected. Wiggins Hill, during a residence of two years in Dexter, cleared eight acres of land east of the Abbott mill and built a house near the present residence of the late Jeremiah Abbott.

He then sold the mill to Andrew Morse, who built the house now owned by D. D. Flynt, which is now believed to be the oldest two-story house in town, being seventy-one years old.

The War of 1812 affected the settlers of Dexter very little until the news came that the British fleet was ascending the Penobscot River toward Bangor. Fifteen men immediately volunteered to go to Hampden, where the militia were to rendezvous, but they, meeting the Americans in full retreat, and feeling that prudence required them to join the strongest party, retreated also.

Up to this time what public work had been done was by voluntary contributions. But on the 17th day of June, 1816, just four months and ten days after Penobscot county had been established, the Plantation of Elkinstown was incorporated into the town of Dexter. Previous to this, great interest had been taken in the name of the town by the settlers. Mrs. Small claimed the right to name the town, and she was supported by most of the women. But alas, women could not vote, so she failed. Her choice was Alton, from her native town in New Hampshire. The Federalists voted for the name of Gower, from the Federal Governor in Massachusetts, while the Republicans went for Dexter, from Samuel Dexter, the Republican candidate for Governor. So you see that Republicans were in the majority in those days as now.

The first test vote is recorded as follows, April 7, 1817: Votes given for Governor: For Major-General Henry Dearborn, 26; for his Excellency John Brooks, 17. We must remember that his Excellency was the then Governor.

This record is signed, Elijah W. Sprague, Town Clerk, and as I happen to know that his organ of reverence was decidedly small, it is a matter of surprise that he should spread such high-sounding titles upon the town books.

On the 16th day of April, 1816, a petition signed by Seba French and Samuel Copeland was presented to Isaac Wheeler, of Garland, a Justice of the Peace, to call a meeting of the legal voters of the town to organize under its charter. The warrant was directed as follows:

Penobscot ss. To Captain Samuel Copeland, one of the inhabitants of the Township numbered four, in the fifth range, north of the Waldo patent, and by a late act of the General Court incorporated by the name of Dexter, and being in said county of Penobscot. Greeting.

The first town meeting was held August 23, 1816. Andrew Morse was chosen Moderator; John Bates Town Clerk and Treasurer; Andrew Morse, Cornelius Coolidge, and Seba French, Selectmen; Elijah W. Sprague, Constable.

On the 2d day of September, 1816, the town was called upon to vote on the question of separation from the State of Massachusetts. The vote was as follows: Yeas 27, nays 0.

This year is known as the cold year. The winter was very severe; the spring opened late and backward. As late as the 11th of June a severe snow storm occurred, snow falling several inches deep, and remaining on the ground for more than twenty-four hours. The corn, which was the farmer's main dependence, failed to ripen, and it seemed that in the autumn starvation was at the doors of the poor people. But some of the best farmers had raised good crops of wheat, and this, scattered around, averted the danger. When 1817 opened cold and backward, such men as French, Coolidge, Copeland, and Morse, gave and lent wheat to their poorer neighbors for seed, and a much greater breadth of wheat was sown this year and a less quantity of corn.

Is it not a credit to those brave men that but one man in the whole town attempted to take advantage of the universal distress, and obtain an extra price for the grain he had to sell? Corn in the year 1816-17 was brought from Virginia to Bangor and Augusta, by water, and so found its way into the country, where it brought the then great price of a dollar per bushel, besides the expense of transportation. A farmer would start for Bangor, Augusta or Norridgewock, they being the nearest markets, ride horseback, buy a horse-load of corn, and then walk home by the side of the horse, balancing the grain on its back.

In 1817 Jonathan Farrar bought the mill property of Andrew Morse and the carding-mill of James C. Hill, and being possessed of some means, commenced a system of permanent improvements; dug the canal, built the grist-mill pond, built a new saw-mill and grist-mill, opened a store, and so induced a rapid settlement of the town.

But, strange as it may seem, and as poor as the people then were, the articles mostly sold in his store were liquors, and the special liquor was New England rum. It was said that he would tap a hogshead at each end, sell one end for forty-two cents and the other for fifty cents per gallon, and even in those days there were people so fond of luxuries that he sold out the fifty-cent end first. He enjoyed this joke as well as any one. He was a sharp, shrewd business man, but fair and honorable in all his dealings, and in all business matters was respected and trusted by all classes; and although as a merchant he catered to the universal custom of drinking, he was a strictly temperate man—not temperance man, as the cause of temperance was then unknown. His means enabled him to carry a large stock for those days, and "Farrar's Store" was known and patronized by the inhabitants of all the surrounding towns. He accumulated a large fortune, and in 1835 was reputed to be worth $200,000. In religious belief he was a Universalist, and the flourishing condition of that society was largely due to his munificence.

One little incident came under the writer's personal notice. Soon after the organization of the society, at a meeting of the managing committee, some one (I think Dr. G. M. Burleigh) proposed raising by subscription a sum of money to buy a small library of denominational works for the use of the society. Esquire Farrar (as he was always called) immediately answered the proposition by offering to give one hundred dollars if the other members would give fifty. His proposal was at once accepted.

He was the senior member of the firm of Farrar & Cutler, formed in 1835 for manufacturing woolen goods, which is now known as the Dexter Woolen Mills Corporation. He died in 1839. He came originally from Portsmouth, New Hampshire, but resided in Bloomfield for some time before taking up his residence in Dexter.

In 1817 the town was divided into five school districts, but no other school-house was built until 1822, when one was erected in the village district, No. 6, about on the spot occupied by Josiah Crosby's office. The first physician, Benjamin Clement, located in Dexter in 1816. Doctor Gilman M. Burleigh moved into town in 1818, and up to the time of his death in 1872 he was more or less connected with the public business of the town. He was an active, influential citizen, and until near the close of life was yearly elected to some town office.

Two events happened in 1818. One, a wagon passed through the town, being the first one ever seen in Dexter, causing more astonishment among the little folks than Barnum's circus would now. The other, a mail route was established from Bangor to Harmony through Dexter, and a post-office opened, Jonathan Farrar being appointed postmaster. The mail was carried on horseback till 1828.

The year 1820, Benjamin Greene opened a tavern in the two-story house now standing on the hill east of the village. I believe the house was built the year before. The population of the town now was about five hundred, and its valuation $132,876.

The village consisted of four dwellings and seven other buildings. Some of the dwellings had a room or two finished, but there was not a complete house in town. This year, the last under the jurisdiction of Massachusetts, a town meeting was called at the house of Benjamin Greene, and the constable is directed "to warn the male inhabitants of the age of twenty-one, and who are liable to be taxed, and who have resided in town one year, to meet," etc.

In the record of the next meeting it commenced as follows: "In the name of the Com.," then that is erased, and "State" follows. The clerk had been so much in the habit of writing Commonwealth, that he forgot that Maine had become an independent State.

At the town meeting in 1821 we find the following curious vote: "Article 14, on motion, voted to raise four hundred dollars for the support of schools, and one hundred to defray town charges, and to be paid in grain, delivered at the Town Treasurer's office, between the twentieth and the thirty-first days of January next, at the following prices, namely, wheat at six shillings per bushel, rye at five per bushel, and corn at four per bushel, and the Town Treasurer to be sole judge of the quality of said grain."

In 1820 Jeremiah and Amos Abbott came into town from Andover, Massachusetts, bought the carding-mill and saw-mill, and the upper water privilege. They were the originals of the firm of Amos Abbott & Co., which is still in existence, as one of the oldest firms in the State, being sixty-one years old. Amos Abbott died in 1865, and Jeremiah in 1879, but George, the son of Amos, and Job, the son of Jeremiah, carry on the business, and as each of them have a son, who take actively to the business, they bid fair to make the familiar name of Amos Abbott & Co. perpetual.

The old carding and cloth-dressing-mill has grown, under their fostering care, to a mill one hundred and twenty-five feet long, forty feet wide, and four stories in height, with four sets of machinery, and a pay-roll of $2,000 per month.

HOTELS.

In 1824 John Bates opened a tavern at his house, being the first tavern in the village proper. That house is now standing, just below Newell Bates' saloon. Just look at it, and compare it with the Merchants' Exchange. That house could not hold a fashionable woman and her baggage. Either she or her baggage would have to stop out-doors. This house was kept open to the public until 1830, when the three-story house, near the machine shop of N. Dustin & Co., was erected by Stevens Davis and others, and opened as a hotel on the fourth day of July of that year. This was kept open for about fifteen years, and was succeeded by the Dexter House, built on the site of the Bank Block. This was closed in 1874. In the year 1866 L. D. Hayes built the Merchants' Exchange at a cost of fifteen thousand dollars. This is one of the best appointed hotels in the country, and has always been kept in tip-top style. It has fifty-two rooms, is supplied with pure spring water, and being situated in the busy part of the village, is a desirable stopping place for travelers. The present proprietor is Colonel W. G. Morrill.

The only other public house now is the Dexter House on Spring street. This was formerly known as the Fountain House. After some years it was closed. About five years ago it was purchased by J. H. Brown, who made extensive repairs and additions, and opened it as the Farmers' Hotel. Two years ago he sold it to J. M. Jordan, who is the present proprietor. It has twenty-one rooms, and is well patronized. The hotel accommodations fully supply the wants of the place.

In 1824 a floating bridge was built across the narrows of Pleasant Pond, now called Silver Lake. Previous to this it was usually voted to pay William Smith from fifteen to twenty dollars per year, payable in grain, for tending ferry. This floating bridge was supported by the town till the year 1860, when a permanent stone bridge was built at a cost of almost four thousand dollars. This bridge is about thirty-five rods in length, and is very substantially built.

CHURCHES.

The first church (Universalist) was erected in 1829. The society was large, wealthy, and public-spirited. The house contained fifty-two pews, held at that time by individuals. The first pastor was Rev. William Frost. This church in 1869 was enlarged and completely renovated at a cost of about $12,000. It now contains seventy-six slips, which are owned by the society, and the preaching is sustained by the slip rent. The present pastor is Rev. J. Eugene Clark. The church is situated on Church street. The auditorium is the best in Dexter, with a seating capacity of four hundred and fifty.

The Methodist church was erected in 1834, and contained fifty-two pews. In 1872 this church was remodeled into modern style, at a cost of $4,000. It stands on Main street. The society is large and flourishing. Its present pastor is Rev. George R. Palmer. It has seats for four hundred.

In 1839 the Calvinist Baptists erected a church on Main street at a cost of $5,000. This has recently been repaired and refurnished at a cost of $2,000. The society is large. The pastor is Rev. E. Dewhurst. It can seat three hundred.

The Congregationalists in 1844 erected a small church on Spring street. The society has always been small, but what they lack in numbers they make up in zeal. This church in 1879 was moved back, converted into a vestry, and a new and beautiful edifice erected in its place. It is a beautiful building, and was mostly built by voluntary contributions from abroad. It will seat three hundred. The church has recently secured the services of Rev. T. M. Davics as pastor.

The Episcopal church was erected in 1869. It is of small size but very elaborately and beautifully finished in Gothic style at a cost of about $9,000. This is located on Spring street. The society is small. The resident rector is Rev. Thomas Marsden. The seating capacity is two hundred and twenty-five.

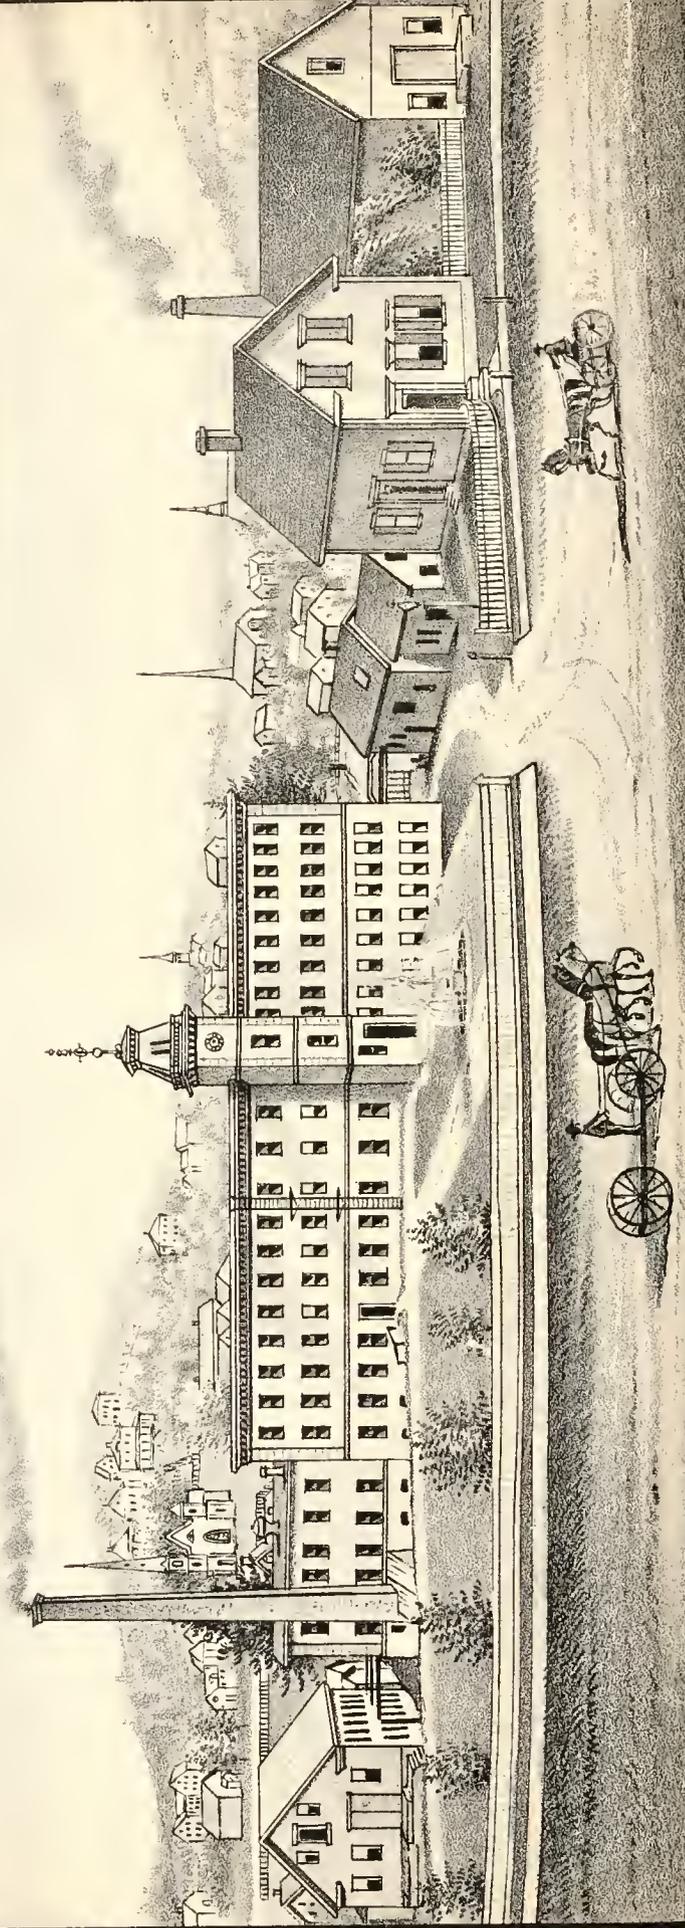

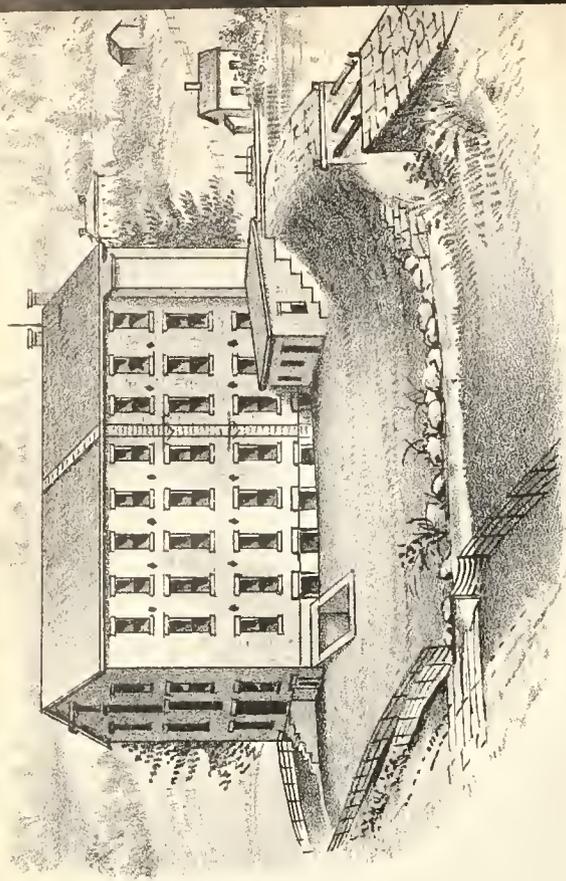

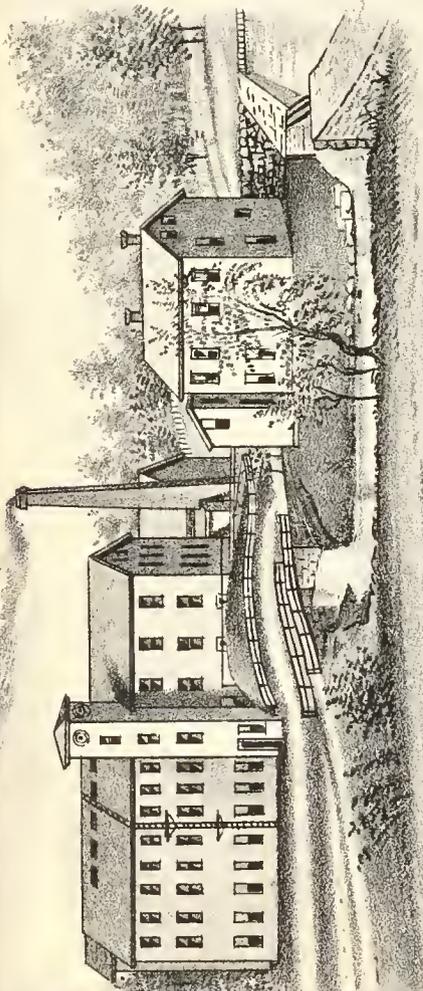

In 1874 the Free-will Baptists, who had before that occupied the Congregational church a part of the time, erected a church on Spring street at a cost of $4,500. It is of small size but neatly and handsomely finished, and will seat three hundred. It has at present no settled pastor.

The Catholics erected a church in 1876 on High street. The cost was probably not far from $3,000. It is plainly finished and will accommodate two hundred and fifty. They have regular monthly services.

Besides these the Second Advents have a hall, where they hold religious services, and the Spiritualists occasionally occupy the town hall, while some unbelievers stay at home. In fact, to the stranger sojourning in town over Sunday Dexter presents as great a variety of religious entertainment as can be found in this county.

CEMETERIES.

On the 16th day of December, 1804, death visited for the first time the settlement of Elkinstown. Phebe

Tucker died of canker rash. She was sixteen years of age. December 24th of the same year, Joseph and Daniel Small died of the same disease. They were buried on the farm of Mr. Tucker. Up to 1819 the town had no burial place. In that year the town by vote purchased a lot eastward of Deacon's Greene's inn. This was used until 1845, although it was totally unfit for such a purpose, the ground being low and wet.

The summer of 1828 was unusually sickly. More than fifty young children were carried off by dysentery. Among the aged was Samuel Copeland, who died at the age of ninety-two. The year was a season of mourning to the whole town. No other general epidemic ever visited the town until 1876, when about seventy fell victims to diphtheria.

In 1845 the town purchased and lotted the cemetery, near the depot, and twenty years after laid out a cemetery on Bryant's hill. Very tasty and expensive monuments have been raised in both, and a tomb built by the town in the new one.

In the year 1828 Lysander Cutler, then a young man, came to Dexter from Royalston, Massachusetts. He was an active business man, possessing indomitable energy, and to him more than any other man is due the present thrift and prosperity of the town. He soon became a partner in the firm of Amos Abbott & Co., and there continued until 1835, when he formed a partnership with Jonathan Farrar, and commenced the erection of the woolen-mill below the grist-mill. This was a wooden structure seventy-five feet long, forty feet wide, and four stories high. It was completed and commenced operating in March, 1836. Besides this were built a wool house, cloth-dressing house, and boarding houses. The whole cost was near $75,000. This mill was burned in December, 1845, but Messrs. Samuel Farrar & Cutler, not discouraged, immediately built upon the same place a stone mill two hundred feet long and two stories high, which they put into operation the following year.

Two years later, 1848, Messrs. Foss, Conant & Co. erected on the lower privilege a brick mill, called the Union mill, and operated it until 1855, when they sold to Farrar & Cutler. Previous to this purchase they had built a third mill, called the White mill, on a dam below the stone mill. All three mills were thus united under one firm. The financial crisis of 1856 was too severe for them, and they were obliged to suspend. After fruitless attempts at a compromise with creditors, they both left the State and settled in Milwaukee.

In 1835 Mr. Cutler organized the Dexter Rifle Company, a military corps quite celebrated in its time; was chosen its first captain, and two years later was elected Colonel of the Ninth Regiment. At the breaking out of the Rebellion he went to the front as Colonel of the Sixth Wisconsin Regiment. During the war he was twice severely wounded, and had no less than seven horses shot under him. He rose to the rank of Brigadier-General. He died in Milwaukee in July, 1866.

The Dexter Mills passed into the hands of Messrs. Johnson, Sewall & Co., of Boston, who leased the property in 1858 to R. W. Robinson, of Dorchester, Massachusetts, for the term of three years, and after that expired continued two years longer under the same lease. In the meantime he had bought one-half of the property. October 1, 1863, Ebenezer Dale, R. W. Robinson, and Albert F. Bradbury, formed a copartnership, bought the mills, and operated under the name of the Dexter Mills until 1880. In the year 1865 two more stories were added to stone mill, making it four stories high and forty feet in length. The death of Dale obliged the firm to suspend operations in 1880, and during the year and while the census was being taken the mills were not running. This made a difference of four or five hundred in our population. During the last year a corporation has been formed under the laws of the State under the name and style of "The Dexter Woolen Mills." The capital stock is $200,000, and it employs about three hundred and fifty hands. The capacity of the mills is twenty sets of machinery. The President is J. G. Wright; R. S. Russell, Treasurer; Albert F. Bradbury, Superintendent; Joseph C. Cutler, Paymaster. The monthly pay roll is $8,000.

In 1847 Calvin Copeland built a mill in the lower village for the manufacture of woolens, which was burned in 1868. It has never been rebuilt, although the privilege is owned by parties abundantly able.

In 1835 a new school-house with a town hall overhead was built, with two school-rooms below. This remained until 1856, when, during a town meeting, when the hall was packed, the floors gave away, above and below, and the people were all precipitated into the cellar. Strange to relate, although a large hot stove went with them, no lives were lost, and but one or two seriously injured. Our present Town Hall was then built, with school-rooms on the first floor, a lockup and furnace rooms in the basement, and offices on the third floor. This cost about $10,000. It is well built, with slated roof, and is an ornament to the village and creditable to the town. Subsequently, in 1877, the hall was rearranged, beautifully frescoed, stage and scenery added at an expense of $1,400. It is now one of the finest halls in the State. With a gallery on three sides, it will accommodate about eight hundred.

When Jonathan Farrar bought the mills in 1817 he also bought a small tannery. This he continued to enlarge until it came to do an extensive business. He afterward sold to Ebenezer Wyman, who in turn sold to Charles Shaw, the present proprietor. He has very much enlarged the buildings and tanning facilities, making this business one of the most important in Dexter. Mr. Shaw moved into Dexter from Cummington, Massachusetts, in 1851, and purchased the tannery for $3,000. He uses now two thousand cords of bark per year, and the stock in process of manufacture is $40,000. The plant is worth $12,000. Mr. Shaw is largely engaged in tanning operations in other places in this State, and in New York. The pay-roll is $650 per month.

When the Dexter mills were first opened in 1836, Nathaniel Dustin came from Lowell, Massachusetts, to superintend the wool sorting. After some years he opened a store and commenced business for himself. In 1859 he bought the foundry and machine shops, and, with his sons, has run them ever since. Two years ago they built new buildings, much enlarged and improved, added new and expensive machinery, and increased the value of the property from about $4,000 to $40,000. The firm is known as N. Dustin & Co., and their business is backed by all the capital that is wanted. Their pay-roll is $1,000.

In 1867 B. F. and Samuel Eldridge bought the workshops of C. W. Curtis & Co. They have made extensive improvements and additions, and now manufacture almost everything in wood, making a specialty of the "World's Fair Prize Churn," of which they sell five hundred per year. Their buildings, machinery, and stock are worth $15,000. Their pay-roll is $400.

The marble works of Messrs. Morse & Bridges turn out some of the finest monuments in the country, and are well patronized. They carry in buildings and stock $4,000. Their pay-roll is $350.

The furniture factory of E. M. Tibbetts turns out yearly large quantities of furniture, caskets, and coffins. The plant and stock is not far from $8,000. His pay-roll is $250 per month.

The grist-mill, the property of Amos Abbott & Co., has grown from an insignificant affair in 1802, to one of the best in the country, with all modern improvements, being the first grist-mill adopting the patent process.

During the present year Moses Brothers purchased the cheese factory (which had ceased operations) and converted it into a factory for canning corn. They put up during the autumn ten thousand dozen cans, and propose in future doing a much larger business. They are now making preparations for desiccating apples by steam. As about every farm in town has an orchard and every man in the village with a rod of ground owns apple trees, there is no reason why the enterprise should not be successful. The firm has disbursed during the season about $10,000.

Another enterprise commenced this year is the manufacture of shovel handles from white ash, by N. B. Turner & Son. They have sent away about ten thousand dozens, and have paid out not far from $7,500. Their pay-roll is $250.

Two establishments for making clothing for Boston parties pay out monthly about $1,600; three-fourths of which goes to the wives and daughters of the farmers of this and neighboring towns.

In 1863 Rev. J. F. Witherell established the Dexter Gazette. It was a small paper, being hardly a foot in length. He sold to Messrs. Gallison & Robbins in 1869, and in 1872 R. O. Robbins bought Gallison's interest in the paper, and in 1878 sold the establishment to M. F. Herring, who is now publisher and proprietor. The paper has grown in size as it has in age, and at present ranks with the best weekly papers in the State. The weekly issue is one thousand, and the advertising patronage large. A great amount of job printing is done here.

In 1868 the Dexter & Newport Railroad was built, fourteen miles in length, at a cost of $300,000, Dexter providing about $225,000. The road pays the running expenses and six per cent. on the stock. It had become a necessity, and was built none too soon. This road is leased to the Maine Central Railroad for thirty years from 1868, at a rental of $18,000 per year, paying the stockholders six per cent. on their investment.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

The first engine, Eagle No. 1, was purchased by the town in 1836. After that the Tiger No. 2. Two force-pumps were afterwards added, one at the grist-mill and the other at the Abbott mill, both with iron pipes running to Main street. A hook and ladder company was organized in 1872. In 1875 two new engines were purchased, which took the place of the old ones. Two hose companies, with separate carriages, perform duty in connection with the hydrants. The old Eagle engine has been utilized by a company of boys, called Company No. 3. Another company formed at Spooner's mills has the old Tiger engine, and is called Company No. 4. The Dexter mills have built a large reservoir and connected it with pipes to all of their mills and boarding-houses, with hydrants at the crossings, having a hundred-foot head. There is also owned in town, and by the town, from six to eight thousand feet of rubber and other hose, making the facilities for extinguishing fires very great, and we challenge any town in New England of its size to show a fire department equal to our own.

BANKS.

The Dexter Savings Bank was incorporated in 1867, and did a successful business to 1878, when, owing to the depression in real estate and bonds, the trustees were compelled to ask for an extension under the laws of the State. Another cause was the sudden death of John W. Barron, the Treasurer. An examination of the bank books also showed considerable confusion in the affairs of the bank. All of its liabilities have since been paid, and the bank is now in good condition and public confidence is fully restored. It has a board of trustees, composed of careful business men, who have the confidence of the depositors. The present amount of deposits is $143,587. It divides five per cent. to its depositors. The President is Albert F. Bradbury; Treasurer, George Hamilton.

The First National Bank of Dexter was organized in 1875, with a capital of $100,000. It has all the business it can do. Charles Shaw is President; Charles W. Curtis, Cashier.

During the year 1875 the Savings Bank erected a substantial and costly brick edifice for its own accommodation and the National Bank. It is three stories, with mansard roof. The first story contains the post-office and the apothecary shop of Bridgman & Son. The second story contains the banking rooms. These are both provided with vaults built of brick and railroad iron, in which are enclosed their safes of the latest style, with chronometer locks added. All the finishings are rich and ornamental. The third story is occupied by the Masons, where they have one of the best finished and furnished halls in the State, with all the requisite ante-rooms. The fourth story is finished into a dining-hall and kitchen. The whole expense of the building and different rooms was over $20,000. It was finished in 1876.

The progress in trade has been as marked as other enterprises. The stores, from one in 1817 and two in 1830, have increased to over thirty-five of different kinds, supplying nearly all the merchandise required for over one hundred and fifty square miles of contiguous territory. There are nine grocery and provision stores; three of dry goods; three, drug and fancy goods; two, ready-made clothing; two, hardware; two, stoves and tinware; two, millinery; two, boots and shoes; two, merchant tailoring; one, furniture; two, jewelry, silver and plated ware; three, saloons; three, meat and provisions; two harness and trimming stores. They carry a stock of not less than $150,000.

SOCIETIES.

Penobscot Lodge of Masons No. 39, was organized February 28, 1822. The charter members were eleven. In January, 1846, they moved into a new hall, which they finished and furnished in good style. This hall was destroyed by fire in 1850, with all the furniture, clothing, and jewels, only the records being saved. After this they leased a hall until 1876, when they dedicated their new hall in Bank Block. The number of members at present is 138. St. John's Royal Arch Chapter numbers 55.

Plymouth Lodge No. 65, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, was organized in December, 1870, with five charter members. It has had a steady and healthy growth, and now numbers 198 members. In 1876 Messrs. Brown and Bridges, the Good Templars, and Odd Fellows, joined in building a large and commodious building. The lower story is used in the manufacture of marble, the second is the Good Templars' hall, and the third the Odd Fellows'.

Martha Washington Lodge, Daughters of Rebekah, No. 18, has a present membership of 61.

Silver Lake Encampment, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, numbers 30 members.

The Good Templars were organized into a lodge many years since, and at the present time it is a large and influential organization. All of these lodges are free from debt.

Dexter Grange No. 155, Patrons of Husbandry, organized in 1877, and built and own the largest hall in town except the Town Hall. They have a large but not handsome building, the lower part of which they lease.

The Sovereigns of Industry also have an organization, and run a grocery and provision store, which is largely patronized.

Besides all of these halls, there are three or four others that are all ready for use when occasion requires.

H. F. Safford Post, Grand Army of the Republic, organized several years since, has a membership of 40.

Dexter Light Infantry, Company C, Second Regiment Maine Volunteers, was organized in 1878, and numbers at present 51 members. Officers: J. D. Maxfield, captain; N. L. McCrillis, first lieutenant; Levi Bridgham, second lieutenant. At the recent State tournament held at Augusta, this company took the first prize for company shooting, from seventeen competing companies. The first prize for team shooting was carried away by them. Corporal G. F. Johnson took the gold badge as the champion shot of the State. Sergeant S. M. Leighton took the first money prize as champion shooter. In fact, after the Dexter boys had gathered their prizes, not much was left for the rest.

SCHOOLS.

Up to 1874 the town was divided into school districts as independent organizations. That year, by a vote of the town, these were discontinued. By this arrangement the smallest school in town can have the same length of term as the largest, and as ample provisions are made by the town for the support of schools, every scholar can have six months' schooling at least per year. The village schools are graded. Four school-houses in the village have two schools in each. They are all thoroughly built, two stories high. Ten other school-houses in town are nearly all new, and all in good repair. The property is worth not less than $15,000. In 1877 the town voted to supply the scholars with books. This has been found to be a benefit to the schools themselves, while to the poor man with an overabundance of that blessing peculiar to the poor, it brings relief to his purse and delight to his children. It costs the town about $350 to supply books to 757 scholars.

The Mercantile Library Association was organized several years since, and in 1880 owned about one thousand volumes. It was then voted to donate the library to the town, provided it was made free to the inhabitants, and $300 added yearly in books. This proposition was accepted by the town, and the library has already increased to more than fifteen hundred volumes. For its size it must be about the best patronized library in the world, as about one-half of the books are in the hands of readers at all times.

Among the other industries of Dexter are the mills of Reuben Flanders, at North Dexter, on the stream called Main Stream—the west branch of the Sebasticook River. This stream runs through the northerly part of Dexter and furnishes several water-powers. At Flanders's mills are manufactured boards, shingles, orange boxes, mirror backs, etc. Mr. Flanders's operations are quite extensive, sometimes sending away boxes by the cargo. His monthly pay-roll is $400. Samuel C. Silver operates another saw-mill on the same stream, in the northeastern part of the town, doing a fair business. Hiram Spooner & Sons also have a saw- and shingle-mill on a water-power at the outlet of Puffer's Pond. At the south line of the town A. C. Libby has a saw- and shingle-mill, also one run of stones for grinding corn. This is the lowest water-power on the Dexter Stream in Dexter. A large quantity of lumber is manufactured there each year.

The old saw-mill that for eighty years wagg'd out its music to the north end, was crowded out, during the present year, by its neighbor, the woolen mill. Since its erection it had been renewed several times, and during the early years of its existence ran night and day. Its site is now occupied by the extension of the woolen mill of Amos Abbott & Co.

The officiating clergy of Dexter have been already mentioned. Tradition is strangely silent in regard to the Christian pioneers of the town. Rev. John Sawyer, Garland, Congregationalist, was probably the first preacher. He preached here as late as 1820, and was then, as the writer distinctly recollects, an old white-headed man. He died in 1856 at the great age of one hundred and one years. Rev. James Hall, Baptist, and Rev. William Frost, Universalist, were among the early preachers of Dexter. Undoubtedly there were others before these, but their names are not given.

We have had occasion to speak of the early physicians. Others have come and gone, among which may be mentioned Doctor Thomas C. Barker, who was the real founder of our present library. At present we have five allopathic, one homeopathic and two clairvoyant physicians. Their field of practice is large, extending into all the surrounding towns.

As the spiritual and physical wants of the people have been well attended to, so also their rights and wrongs have not been allowed to languish for want of legal assistance. The earliest lawyer was Gustavus G. Cushman, who settled in town in the year 1827. He remained here several years, and then removed to Bangor. Samuel McClellan, in 1835, opened an office in Dexter, coming from Bloomfield. He continued in active practice till his death, August 1, 1868. Charles C. Cushman and Abner Knowles practiced here for a time, but both removed to Bangor. At the present time five lawyers constitute the legal force of Dexter, being fully equal to the wants of the inhabitants.

NATURAL FEATURES.

Dexter village is in latitude $45^{\circ} 1' 43''$ north, and in longitude $69^{\circ} 16' 32''$ west of Greenwich. It is the northwestern town of Penobscot county. It is forty-one miles from Bangor, and one hundred and twenty-three miles from Portland. Garland bounds it on the east, Corinna on the south, Sangerville in Piscataquis county on the north, and Ripley in Somerset county on the west.

The face of the country is broken into hills and valleys. There is not a level farm in town. The soil is generally rocky and hard to cultivate, and though there are many excellent farms, yet it will require some time to make it a first-class farming town, free from stones and stumps. There are two small lakes: one called Puffer's Pond that supplies water to a saw-mill, contains about a square mile of area. The other, Silver Lake, about four times as large, furnishes the water power of the village. The peculiarity of this lake is, that much water runs out, apparently but little runs in, it being mostly supplied from sub-surface springs. Another small pond, called the Meadow, in the eastern part of the town, was apparently formed by beavers, as there are to be seen the remains of an extensive colony of these industrious animals.

The Dexter Stream, being the east branch of the Sebasticook, takes its rise in Silver Lake, flows southerly through Corinna to Newport Pond, whence it joins the west branch at Pittsfield, in Somerset county, forming the Sebasticook River.

The water-power in the village is in the fall and not in the body of water. In three-fourths of a mile the fall is 142 feet. On this ten dams are built, which furnish the power to the machinery, and this machinery employs about six hundred persons, and the monthly pay-rolls of these establishments are estimated at more than $15,000.

A dam at the outlet of the lake is capable of raising it seven feet, and this spread over four miles of surface, entirely safe from spring freshets, adds greatly to the value of the water-power on the stream.

Along the northern part of the town extends a range of hills, the Sturdevant Hill being the highest in town.

Dexter village is the present terminus of the Dexter & Newport Railroad. It is finely situated on the hillsides, with easy grades to the stream and lake. The streets are four rods wide, mostly supplied with sidewalks, those on the most busy part of Main street being composed of concrete. The roads are kept in excellent repair, and have the reputation of being the best of any town in the county. Shade trees of maple and elm abound, some having a growth of more than forty years, while from the fruit trees covering the hillsides are gathered large quantities of apples, pears, and cherries. An unusual number of neat and tasteful residences adorn the village, while many of the farmers have excellent and some costly buildings, one barn, built by A. L. Barton, costing $7,000. Strangers passing through the town and village cannot fail to be impressed with the prevalent appearance of prosperity.

The rock formation is slate, excellent for building materials, an impure limestone, which is found to make a good article of cement, and quartase rock. In the latter are found veins of lead and silver, not in paying quantities, but enough to set some to digging who are in haste to get rich.

The soil is generally a vegetable loam, very little clay being found, fertile, well adapted to orchards, and yielding well the usual farm crops. The forest trees are maple, birch, beech, and other deciduous trees, on the upland; and spruce, fir, cedar, etc., on the lowlands.

The growth of Dexter in population and wealth has been steady and constant, except an apparent decline in both in the last decade. An examination of the facts, however, will show that from 1870 to 1880 there was an actual increase in both. In 1870 the valuation was $1,006,966 and the population 2,875. By some unaccountable error the valuation of 1870 was reported to the State committee and adopted by them on nearly a full value basis. The valuation of 1880 is on a two-thirds basis. At the rate of 1870 our valuation would be near $1,400,000. It is patent to every one that the real property of Dexter was very largely increased in the last ten years. Among the valuable buildings are notably the Bank Block, the residence of Dr. Fitzgerald, the fine residences on Maple, Pleasant, Free Grove, and Church streets, Gazette office, Odd Fellows' Hall, and Grange Hall. The capacity of Dexter to do business was increased one-third at least. The census of 1880, taken at a time when the Dexter mills had been closed for nearly a year, and was only preparing to resume, shows a decrease of about three hundred. Then many houses were vacant throughout the village. Now not a house is unoccupied; the hotels and boarding-houses are filled. Our population is now over three thousand, and there is no reason why it should not increase. Through the past season labor has been in very great demand and high wages paid. The influx from Canada is rapidly increasing our population as well as that of other manufacturing towns. As a French Canadian said, who had but lately arrived: "Be gar, I wark all one day long in Canada hard for fafty centimes, now I wark in haying for two dollars a day, and I not work mooch hard either. I mows with the cheval and I peeck with the cheval, and I don't go back to Canada no more, not mooch."

The valuation of 1860 was $465,000, that of 1870 should have been about $725,000, and that of 1880 was $963,000, making a fair and regular increase in the wealth of the town.

Yet for all the public improvements made our taxes are not high. The rate this present year is $17.50 on the $1,000. This is the whole tax. There is no highway tax behind this as in most towns in the county.

TO THE READER:—Many important and interesting matters relating to our town have been omitted, for want of time and space. If any errors have crept into this sketch, the writer would like to be notified, and those having knowledge of incidents of the early days will do a kindly favor by forwarding the same to yours truly.

EXETER.

GEOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

The town of Exeter, in Penobscot county, Maine, is situated in about 45° north latitude, and 69° west longitude from Greenwich. It is about fifty miles northeast from the State capital, at Augusta, and twenty miles northwest from Bangor, the county seat, at the head of tide waters, and of ship navigation on the river Penobscot. The town was calculated to be six miles square, and is bounded on the north by Garland, on the east by Corinth, on the south by Stetson, and on the west by Corinna. Its corners are held and maintained in common with the towns of Dexter on the northwest, Charleston on the northeast, Levant on the southeast, and Newport on the southwest. In area, the town is estimated to contain about 23,040 acres; and is watered by the Kenduskeag Stream and its smaller tributaries, on which, according to Wells's report on the Water Power of Maine (page 274), there were returned by the Selectmen to the Commissioners in 1868 ten water-powers, as follow:

First—On the Kenduskeag Stream, shingle- and grist-mill, fall ten feet, capacity 500,000 shingles per year; grist-mill runs eight months.

Second—On the same, saw-mill, fall twelve feet; capacity 500,000 of lumber a year—could do more.

Third—On the same, saw- and shingle-mill; saw-mill capacity 600,000 per year; shingle machine 300,000; fall eleven feet—could do more.

Fourth—A shingle-mill on the same; fall ten feet; capacity 300,000 per year.

Fifth—On the same, saw and shingle machine and two runs of stones; saw-mill capacity 300,000; shingle-mill about 300,000; fall eleven feet.

Sixth—On the same, shingle-mill; a nine-foot fall.

Seventh—On the same, grist-mill, machine-shop, carriage-shop, and tan-yard; fall eleven feet.

Eighth—On the same, not now in use, formerly a saw- and shingle-mill; fall twelve feet; of one-fourth greater capacity than either of the other privileges.

Ninth—Shingle- and grist-mill upon the "Andrews Brook;" fall nine feet; can cut 200,000 shingles; can grind about four months in the year. [Since the above report was made, a steam-mill has been built on the same brook, where a shingle- and grist-mill are in constant operation, and are doing a good business.]

Tenth—On the "Allen Brook," or "Atkins Brook," capacity the same as No. 9.

SURVEY AND LOCATION.

Exeter, the one hundred and eightieth town within the District of Maine, was located as a township by the survey of its exterior lines in the autumn of 1792. It was then known and designated on the Surveyors' plan as Township No. 3, in the Fourth Range of townships north of the Waldo Patent; this being one of the twenty-one townships surveyed by Ephraim Ballard and Samuel Weston, under the direction of the "Committee for the Sale of Eastern Lands," and of which committee the late Hon. Daniel Cony, of Hallowell (now Augusta), was chairman. The twenty-one townships thus surveyed comprised the territory lying between the Waldo Patent on the south, and Piscataquis River on the north; and extending west, from a line passing north and south through Pushaw Pond, the distance of twenty-four miles, and are all embraced in the following schedule, to wit:

The following townships were surveyed in 1792, by Ephraim Ballard and Samuel Weston, Surveyors, as per plan: Dixmont, Troy (first Kingville), Carmel, Etna, Plymouth and Detroit, Glenburn, Levant, Stetson, Newport, Hudson (Kirtland, 1825), Corinth, Exeter, Corinna, Bradford, Charleston, Garland, Dexter, Orneville (first Milton), Atkinson, Dover, and Sangerville.

*By Hon. Noah Barker.

On completing their survey and location of the above townships, the Surveyors returned a plan of the same, with the following title:

This plan represents, within the red lines, twenty-one townships of land between the rivers Kennebeck and Penobscot, surveyed for the Commonwealth of Massachusetts by the subscribers, A. D. 1792; also part of the river Penobscot; the northern bounds of Waldo Patent; together with four townships surveyed by Jonathan Stone;* as also the bounds of the northerly part of the Plymouth Claim; part of the Sebasticook River; the southeast corner of the "Million Acres," located on the river Kennebeck, and a tract of land betwixt the Plymouth Claim, etc., and the four northerly ranges of townships aforesaid; all which has been taken from actual and approved surveys and here protracted by a scale of two miles to an inch, and inscribed to the Committee for Sale of Eastern Lands by their obedient and humble servants,

EPHRAIM BALLARD,
SAMUEL WESTON, Surveyors.

HALLOWELL, COUNTY OF LINCOLN, October 20, 1792.

FOUNDATION OF LAND TITLES IN EXETER.

This township (No. 3, R. 4, N. W. P.) was donated by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to Marblehead Academy by resolve approved February 8, 1793, reserving 960 acres for public uses, which were divided into three lots, or parcels, one for public schools, one for the ministry, and one for the first settled minister.

It appears by the records of the Corporation that the following persons constituted the Board of Trustees of Marblehead Academy in 1793: Samuel Sewall, Robert Hooper, Samuel Hooper, William Raymond Lee, Elisha Story, Samuel Russell Trevitt, John Humphreys, John Goodwin, Marston Watson, Richard Homan, Joseph Sewall, Samuel Bartoll, John Dixey, Richard Pedrick, Ebenezer Graves, and Burill Devereux.

At a meeting of the Trustees of the Marblehead Academy on Monday, the 21st day of January, 1793, after transacting the usual business of the Association, and passing several votes, etc.—

Voted II, That Samuel Sewall, William R. Lee, and Marston Watson, Esq., be a committee to apply to the Honorable General Court of this Commonwealth in such form as they may think best, for a grant to this Corporation of a tract of land, and any other suitable encouragement to this Academy.

The Committee, it seems, lost no time in forwarding their petition, in behalf of the Trustees, to the Legislature, as the following proceedings will show:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
January 31, 1793. }

On the Petition of the Trustees of the Marblehead Academy:

Resolved, That there be and hereby is granted a township of land of six miles square, to be laid out at the expense of the grantees by the Committee for Sale of Eastern Lands, from any of the unimproved lands belonging to this Commonwealth, lying between the rivers Kennebeck and Penobscot, and said township shall be vested in the said Trustees of the Marblehead Academy and their successors forever, for the use and purpose of supporting the said Academy, to be by them holden in their corporate capacity, with full power and authority to settle, divide, and manage said township, or to sell, convey, and dispose of the same, in such way and manner as shall best promote the interest and welfare of said Academy.

Provided, Nevertheless, that there be and hereby is reserved one lot of three hundred and twenty acres for the use of the ministry, and one lot of three hundred and twenty acres for the support of schools, and one lot of the same quantity to the first settled minister in said town.

And provided, further, That the grantees aforesaid, or their assigns, shall cause twenty families to be settled within said township on or before the first day of June, one thousand eight hundred.

*These "four townships" embrace the present towns of Parkman, Cambridge and Ripley, St. Albans, and Palmyra.

DAVID COBB, Speaker.

February 8, 1793.

On the 25th of March, 1793, at a meeting of the said Trustees it was—Voted, That ten pounds be advanced to pay for a deed of land granted to this Academy by the Honorable General Court of this Commonwealth to be advanced by the several Trustees, and repay them from the first monies belonging to said incorporation.

On the 27th of March, 1793, a deed of the township was made and passed to the Trustees, as the following copy of the deed will show:

To all persons to whom these presents shall come, greeting:

WHEREAS, The Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts did, on the 7th day of February, 1793, grant a township of land to the Trustees of Marblehead Academy, by a resolve in the following words, viz: Resolved, etc. [Here the words of the foregoing resolve are recited], and

WHEREAS, The Legislature aforesaid did, on the 28th day of February last, by their resolve of that date, authorize and empower the Committee for the Sale of Eastern Lands to execute deeds of certain grants of lands in the words following, viz:

"WHEREAS, Several grants of townships and tracts of land have been and may be made by this Court for the encouragement of literature in the various parts of the Commonwealth—

"Resolved, That all the lands which have been or may be granted for the purpose aforesaid be located under the direction of the Committee for the Sale of Eastern Lands, and that said committee be and hereby are authorized and empowered to execute deeds of conveyance and confirmation of the same conformable to the condition of said grants."

Now, therefore, know ye that we, the undersigned, being the Committee for the Sale of Eastern Lands in the said resolves mentioned, and pursuant to the grant and authority thereby made, and in consideration of the sum of ten pounds lawful money, being the whole expense of surveying the township hereinafter described, have located to the said Trustees of the Marblehead Academy, and do hereby convey and confirm to them and their successors a township of land of six miles square, situate in the county of Hancock, and between the rivers Kennebeck and Penobscot, in the Fourth Range, northward of the Waldo Patent, so-called, and being number three of that range, according to the actual survey and return of twenty-one townships, and the plan thereof made by Ephraim Ballard and Samuel Weston, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-two, and by said plan is bounded southerly by number three in the third range, easterly by number two in the fourth range, northwardly by number three in the fifth range, and westerly by number four in the fourth range of those twenty-one townships, with all and singular the privileges and appurtenances of the said township hereby located and confirmed, subject always, nevertheless, to the conditions mentioned in said resolve for said grant, as hereinbefore recited, and according to the true intent thereof.

To have and to hold the said township hereby located and granted with the appurtenances, and subject, as aforesaid, to the said Trustees of the Marblehead Academy and their successors and assigns forever, for the use and purpose of supporting the said academy, to be by them holden in their corporate capacity, with full power and authority to settle, divide, and manage said township, or to sell, convey and dispose of the same in such way and manner as shall best promote the interest of the said academy, excepting and reserving as in the said resolve mentioned.

In witness whereof, the said committee have hereunto set their hands and seals this twenty-seventh day of March, in the year one thousand seven hundred and ninety-three.

SAMUEL PHILLIPS,
NATHANIEL WELLS,
JOHN READ,
DANIEL CONY.

Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of us.

SAMUEL WARD,
SAM. COOPER.

SUFFOLK, BOSTON, March 27, 1793.

Personally appeared Samuel Phillips, Nathaniel Wells, John Read, and Daniel Cony, Esqrs., and acknowledged the foregoing instrument to be their act and deed. Before me, SAMUEL COOPER, Justice of the Peace.

At a meeting of the trustees aforesaid on the 3d day of June, 1793, present Samuel Sewall, Esq., William R. Lee, Marston Watson, Joseph Sewall, Samuel Hooper, Robert Hooper, John Dixey, Dr. Elisha Story, Richard Pedrick, Ebenezer Graves, and William Harris, the following proposals were made by Samuel Sewall, Esq., viz:

To purchase the township of land in the county of Hancock granted by the General Court to the Trustees of the Marblehead Academy, and to give therefor the sum of fifteen hundred pounds, payable with interest, the principal and interest to be secured by the said Sewall's note or bond, with a collateral mortgage of the under-mentioned lands and tenements, the principal to be paid on demand after seven years, the interest to be at six per cent. per annum, payable quarter yearly.

At the same meeting of the Trustees it was "voted that the proposals of Samuel Sewall for the purchase of the township be accepted; and, being fulfilled on his part, this corporation shall and will bargain, grant, assign, and convey to the said Sewall, his heirs and assigns, or to any person whom he or they shall appoint, all the said township of land with the privileges and appurtenances thereof, subject to the conditions, reservations, restrictions, and limitations of every kind which are mentioned and set forth in the said grant," etc. "And Colonel William R. Lee, Colonel M. Watson, and Dr. Elisha Story are hereby appointed a committee to receive of the said Sewall the securities mentioned in his said proposals, which being made and had to the satisfaction of the said committee, they are hereby fully authorized, in the name and behalf of this corporation, to make, seal, and execute a good and sufficient deed to convey in fee simple to the said Sewall, his heirs, or assigns, or to any person whom he or they shall appoint, the said township of land," etc., and the deed was duly executed and delivered, in accordance with said vote, on the 2d day of July, 1793.

It appears from the records of the Registry of Deeds at Ellsworth, for the county of Hancock, that Samuel Sewall conveyed Township No. 3, Range 4, to William Wetmore and John Peck, October 12, 1793.

William Wetmore and John Peck conveyed one-fourth of same to John Gardner February 14, 1794.

William Wetmore and John Peck conveyed one-fourth of same township to Henry Newman February 14, 1795.

William Wetmore conveyed one-fourth of same to John Peck the 24th day of —, 1797.

John Peck conveyed "11,520 acres of land in Township No. 3, Range 4," to David Green January 21, 1797.

CHANGES OF OWNERSHIP.

1800. It appears from the proprietors' records that, prior to the year 1800, several changes had been made respecting the ownership of the township, the proprietors at this time being as follow: Benjamin Joy, William Turner, Edward D. Turner, Stephen D. Turner, John Cushing, David Cheever, and Benjamin Hichborne, all of Boston; John Gardner, of Milton, and Sally Wetmore, of Castine.

On the 20th day of February, A. D., 1800, an indenture of agreement was made and concluded by and between the above named proprietors of the one part, and John J. Blasdel, of Collegetown (now Dixmont), physician, of the other part, whereby the said Benjamin Joy and his associates agreed to sell unto the said Blasdel four thousand acres of land in said township in the manner and upon the terms hereinafter specified, to-wit: That the said Joy and his associates will make, execute, and deliver to the said Blasdel a good warrantee deed or deeds of four thousand acres of land in said township (No. 3, Range 4), at $1 an acre, each of said parties to contribute according to the proportionate share which he holds in said township to make up the quantity of four thousand acres, and each party to be bound only for himself upon his compliance with the covenants and promises by him hereafter made, that the said Blasdel shall be allowed to choose his land at large in said township, provided he shall not take more than two lots adjoining each other in the same range, and shall have two or more lots between his choices; that the said Joy and his associates will convey to the said Blasdel 160 acres whenever he shall have surveyed said township and laid out the same into lots of 160 acres, and marked all around, and returned unto the said Joy and his associates a plan thereof, provided the same be within one year from this date, and one hundred acres whenever he shall have built a good grist- and saw-mill in said town, and sixty acres whenever he shall have cut a road through the same, provided the same be commenced within one year from this date, and completed in two years, both mills and roads, and provided the same be performed according to the directions of said Joy and his associates.

And the said John J. Blasdel, in consideration of the covenants aforesaid, agrees with the proprietors, their heirs, executors, administrators and assigns, that he will pay, or cause to be paid to them or their attorneys, the sum of $4,000, one-third part thereof in one year from the date hereof, with interest thereon; one-third part thereof in two years from said date, with interest, and the remainder with interest thereon, in three years from said date. That the said Blasdel will survey the said township in manner aforesaid; that he will cut the road as aforesaid; that he will cause to be settled on said land within two years from this date twenty families, and that the settlement shall commence in the course of the ensuing year. That the said Blasdel will cause to be settled in said township, within said period, ten other families, provided the said Joy and his associates will furnish lands for them and take the settlers as responsible for the payment of the price of their lands, which price is to be fixed by said Joy and his associates, and at not less than $1.25 per acre, provided the said settlers shall have like time of credit with him, the said Blasdel. And it was further agreed between the parties that said Joy and his associates should give to said Blasdel a deed, or deeds, of one-third of the land upon his compliance with one-third of the payment and terms of purchase, and of the remainder immediately on his compliance with the remainder of his stipulated covenants and payments. It was also understood that the said Blasdel should have a right to choose, on the terms before mentioned, the lots for surveying, and for roads, and the grist-mill, but in his choosing he shall not take a mill-seat, unless he engages to build the mills, and in no case more than one mill-seat, and further, that said Blasdel shall produce to the parties satisfactory evidence of his having settled the township No. 3 in the Fourth Range, according to agreement.

This instrument was duly signed and sealed by the several parties aforesaid.

Dr. Blasdel (whose name is latterly spelled "Blaisdell") immediately made a contract with Major Moses Hodsdon, of Berwick, Maine, to survey and lay out the township into lots, according to his agreement, aforesaid, with the proprietors. Hodsdon commenced the survey in the spring of 1800, and completed it the same year. The township was laid out into twelve ranges, with twelve lots in each range, the numbers commencing at the southeast corner of the township; lot No. 1 in the First Range being the southeast corner lot, and No. 1 in the Twelfth Range, the northeast corner lot in the township.

As compensation for lotting the township, Hodsdon was to have a deed of one lot of land; and lot No. 4, in the First Range, was subsequently conveyed to him.

The following lots were selected and conveyed to Blasdel to make up his quantity of four thousand acres, according to his contract with the proprietors, to-wit: No. 6, in the First Range; Nos. 4 and 6, in the Third Range; Nos. 3, 8, and 9, in the Fourth Range; Nos. 4, 5, and 12, in the Fifth Range; Nos. 1, one-half of 10, and 11, in the Sixth Range; Nos. 1, 2, 6, and 7, in the Seventh Range; Nos. 3, 6, and 7, in the Ninth Range; Nos. 3 and 5, in the Tenth Range; Nos. 1, 2, and 5, in the Eleventh Range, and No. 6, in the Twelfth Range. Dr. Blasdel acted, also, as the agent for the proprietors, in procuring settlers upon their lands; hence, the township, previous to its incorporation, was called, and known as "Blasdel Town."

THE PIONEERS.

As the lotting of the township progressed pioneers began to flock in to make selection of lots for their future homesteads. The first "chopping" by way of settlement, was done in the first week of June, 1800, by Lemuel Tozier and John Durgin, at what is called Hill's Corner (or more latterly, Linnell's Corner), Tozier commencing on lot No. 5, and Durgin on lot No. 4, both lots lying in the Fourth Range, and their choppings contiguous.

Having felled five acres of trees on lot No. 4, Range 4, Durgin sold out his possession to Josiah Barker, and settled in what is now the town of Dixmont, where he continued to reside till the time of his death, which occurred but a few years ago.

As appears by the Proprietors' Records, Tozier and Barker contracted for their lots with Blasdel, in behalf of the proprietors, June 10, 1800, both upon the same day, Tozier agreeing to pay eight shillings and Barker nine shillings per acre for the lots.

These two contracts for lots, by the settlers, are the first to be found on record. Other choppings, however, were made about the same time on lots No. 5 and 6, Range 3; on lots No. 3 and 6, Range 4; also on lot No. 6, Range 5. Tozier burnt his own and Barker's "cut-down" the same season, and built a log house on his lot in the autumn of 1800, and moved his family into it the next April, being the first settler in the town.

EARLY SETTLERS.

1801. Lemuel Tozier's family and household effects were removed from his former residence on the Oakman place, in Corinth, with an ox-team, by the late Robert Campbell, who, in 1797-98, had become a settler on the present homestead of his son and grandson, John and Martin Campbell, of Corinth, adjacent to Exeter line. The late Simon Prescott, of Corinth, had also settled, early in the year 1801, on the lot next north of Campbell's, and these two families were Tozier's nearest neighbors during the first year of his residence in his wilderness home.

But in the spring of 1801 Joseph Pease, with his sons and two sons-in-law, Josiah Barker and Reuben Seavey, came in, on foot, from Parsonsfield, to plant and sow the ground where the trees had been felled the year before, and to make further improvements preparatory to removing their families hither the ensuing winter. Mr. Pease had taken up, or purchased, lot No. 6, Range 3,—now known as the James Brown farm,—where he at once commenced operations. Seavey commenced on lot No. 3, Range 4,—since known as the George W. Hill farm,—and Barker upon his lot, No. 4, Range 4,—since known as the Timothy Drew farm. On this lot was planted, by Albana Pease, then a lad in his fourteenth year, the first hill of corn ever raised in town. This resolute boy had been hired for the season by Barker, his brother-in-law, and had traveled all the way from Parsonsfield, via Augusta, Dixmont, and Pangor, and thence through the wilderness to this, his future home; which, to boys of this day, would be deemed almost an impossible undertaking.

In the same spring several others came, and commenced felling trees preparatory to a settlement upon the lots they had selected. It appears by the Proprietors' Records, before alluded to, that the following lots were contracted for, under date of June 1, 1801, to wit: Josiah Lane, 160 acres; Ebenezer Avey, 100 acres; Simeon Tozier, 160 acres; Richard Staples, 160 acres; Joshua Palmer 80 acres; all at nine shillings per acre.

And while these contracts were being made with the proprietors, Dr. Blasdel was still actively engaged in procuring settlers to enter upon his own lands, as well as those of the proprietors; and for this purpose advertised widely in the western towns of the State, and also in New Hampshire, whence most of the early settlers emigrated.

Messrs. Pease, Barker, and Seavey remained here till their crops were harvested and secured, and in the meantime felled more trees, and built their cozy log cabins to shelter their families on their prospective arrival.

On the 19th day of May, 1801, a petition signed by B. Joy, John Gardner, David Greene, William Turner, and John Cushing (being five of the proprietors of the township), was presented to the Hon. Oliver Wendell, Esq., of Boston, one of the Justices of the Peace throughout the Commonwealth, requesting his Honor to issue his warrant "to call a meeting of said proprietors and their associates, to be holden at James Vila's Concert Hall, in Boston, on the 7th day of July, (then next following,) at 10 o'clock A. M., then and there to act on the following articles, viz."

[Here follow seven articles to be acted on.]

The meeting was called, and the trustees met accordingly, on July 7, 1801, there being present John Gardner, Benjamin Joy, William Turner, for himself and as an attorney for Edward D. Turner and Stephen D. Turner (his brothers), David Greene, and John Cushing; and, thirdly, "voted that David Greene, Benjamin Joy, and John Gardner be authorized and empowered to make, in behalf of the proprietors, such deeds and conveyances as they have agreed to make to settlers and others, and also all other deeds and conveyances necessary to be made by said proprietors pursuant to any votes or orders passed in legal meetings."

1802. On the 10th of March, 1802, Joseph Pease, and on the 12th Reuben Seavey, with their families, arrived upon the township; and Josiah Barker followed them within a month or two after; but owing to the health of his family he was obliged to delay their journey till the next summer, when he returned to Limerick, and brought his wife and three children (the youngest an infant about three months old) all the way on horseback—the mother with her babe riding upon one horse, and the father and two other children, one tied on behind him and the other in his arms, riding a second horse. This arduous journey on horseback seems almost a parallel to the departure of the old patriarch from Padanaram, with his "wives and little ones" upon the backs of his camels. But the reader will take under consideration the fact that this journey was performed long, long years before the advent of steamboats and railroads, or even the convenience of common carriage roads through the country.

In Boston, 15th March, 1802, at a meeting of the proprietors of township No. 3, Range 4, Benjamin Joy, Moderator, it was "voted that the proprietors in conformity to their vote of the 1st inst. now come to a division of said township by lot, according to the plan proposed by Benjamin Joy, Esq., and that William Turner, their clerk, be appointed to draw for the absentees. The proportions of the several proprietors having been ascertained and agreed to, according to the statement which hereafter follows, and the tickets having been duly prepared and examined by the proprietors, they were then drawn and the different lots marked against each proprietor's name, the result of which is as follows, and the several proprietors are entitled to the several lots affixed to their names, which division is unanimously agreed to."

The quantity of land then remaining in the township, unsold and to be divided among the proprietors, was 16,300 acres, the proportionate quantity to each proprietor at that time being as follows: Sally Wetmore, 708 acres; Stephen D. Turner, 531; John Cushing, 636; David Greene, 1,185; Ebenezer Oliver, 425; John Gardner, 4,075; William Turner, 2,653; Benjamin Joy, 4,319; Edward D. Turner, 1,768; total, 16,300 acres. The several lots drawn to make up the above quantities were duly entered upon a schedule and recorded in the Proprietors' Records, also upon their plan of the township, the original being now (1881) in the writer's possession.

On the 10th of August, 1802, was born to Polly Pease, wife of Reuben Seavey, a son, named Reuben Seavey, Jr., being the first child born within the limits of the township. He lived to the years of manhood, married, and settled in Stetson, where he raised up a family, and died January 19, 1858, aged fifty-five years five months and nine days.

1803. On the 24th of March, 1803, occurred the first death within the township, being that of Arene Barker, infant daughter of Josiah and Nancy Barker, aged eleven months and twenty-three days, being the child that its mother had brought through on horseback the summer before. In April, 1803, occurred the second death in "Blasdeltown," being that of Mrs. Sarah L. Tozier, the wife of Lemuel Tozier, the "first settler," aged thirty-nine years and five months. Mrs. Tozier died of the measles, being at the time enccinte, and already the mother of twelve children. Her death produced, as well it might, a great shock to the community, as she had been not only the stay and support of her family, but, indeed, as a "mother in Israel" to the infant plantation. Mrs. Tozier's funeral was conducted in "due form" by Simon Prescott, the "neighbor" before alluded to, and living in the adjoining township, now Corinth. The remains of Mrs. Tozier and of the Barker child were buried in the corner of the "Tozier and Barker lots," being now in the public highway at "Linnell's Corner." The remains of the Barker child were subsequently taken up and removed to the old burying ground on Brown's Hill, and there buried by the side of its mother, who died July 22, 1821, aged forty years and five days. But Mrs. Tozier's grave still remains in the highway, and its precise locality is now unknown.

Under our present date (1803) quite an accession was made to the list of immigrants to the new plantation. Among these were Samuel and Joseph Osgood, who commenced in the north or northeasterly part of the town, in what is still known as the "Osgood Settlement," and soon after were followed by their brother, Benjamin Osgood, from New Hampshire, whence they had emigrated. In the same year (1803) came John Chamberlain, Esq., with his three sons, Ebenezer G. Chamberlain, Zenas, and Pickman, and one daughter, who had emigrated from New Salem (now Meredith), New Hampshire, but had lived a few years, we think, in Hampden prior to their coming to Blasdeltown. The Chamberlains settled in the southwest part of the town, and were worthy and respectable citizens. Before the close of the year 1803 occurred the marriage of Samuel Osgood, of Blasdeltown, and Roxanna Knapp, of Orrington (now Brewer), this being the first marriage in the vicinage of Blasdeltown. In the autumn of this year came Nathaniel Barker, then nineteen years of age, from Limerick, and passed the following winter with his brother Josiah, at whose house Ebenezer G. Chamberlain, during the winter evenings, instructed a class in the rudiments of arithmetic, in which married people as well as single took lessons.

1804. On the 14th of February, 1804, occurred the second birth in Blasdeltown, being that of Ira, the eldest son of Josiah and Nancy Barker. He is still living, and is a resident of Corinna, Maine. At this time, or perhaps a little earlier, Lemuel Tozier had married, for his second wife, Betsey Hathorn, widow of Asahel Gates, of Orrington (now Brewer), and had removed her with her two children, Arumah and Jacob Gates, to his own home in Blasdeltown.

In August, 1804, was taught the first school in this plantation, by Miss Anna M. Stevens, of Warwick, Massachusetts, who was then visiting her sister, the wife of Dr. Gale, an early settler in what was then called "New Ohio," on the town line between the present towns of Corinth and Levant, and where the doctor died the same fall. At the close of her school Miss Stevens returned home to Massachusetts, where she was afterward twice married, and reared an enterprising family.

After an absence of half a century from the scenes of her early missionary labors, she was invited to be present at the fiftieth anniversary of her school, which was celebrated March 3, 1855, at the Town House in Exeter, where was held a full convention, composed of the teachers and scholars of the several public schools in town, and of which David Barker was Supervisor, and officiated as chairman of the meeting. At this convention the invited guest, then the "Widow Anna M. Metcalf," a very intelligent lady of about "three score years and six," was present, and partook of the festivities of the occasion, sitting at the same table with five of her old scholars who have since all passed away. Several other distinguished personages were also in attendance, among whom were the Rev. John Sawyer, then in his one hundredth year, and who addressed the Throne of Grace; and the late General Isaac Hodsdon, who was then, as he expressed it, "living on borrowed time, with his furlough nearly expired," gave a very able and appropriate address of welcome to the distinguished guest, with whom, in the long past, he had been acquainted, but had not before seen in the last fifty years. In extending a written invitation to Mrs. Metcalf to honor the convention with her presence, an inquiry was made of her as to her recollections in regard to her "famous school," also a request for her to state if she could give the names of her scholars, the length of her school, and how supported, her means of conveyance to and from the plantation, and particularly to describe the edifice in which the school was taught, etc., to which she responded as follows:

In answer to your inquiries respecting the first school taught in "Blasdeltown"—(doubtful whether the first attempt of a romantic girl of sixteen should be called a school)—I will say that at a meeting in the house of Mr. Levi Bradley, in "New Ohio" the much honored and lamented Rev. Jotham Sewall, who was on a missionary tour through the then almost unbroken wilderness, inquired if there was any young lady present who would like to teach, as he had $5 of missionary money to spend in that way. The result was—after the usual preliminaries—the school in question, commencing in August, 1804. It would be difficult for me to depict to modern comprehension the ingeniously constructed edifice in which the school was commenced;

although I distinctly remember the four posts—crotched a little at the top, stuck into the ground—on which were laid four other poles, or sticks of wood, with boards leaned up against and over the top, with a square hole left for ingress and egress. Boards were laid on the uneven ground for a floor. I presume there was not a nail used about it. It was located close beside Mr. Josiah Barker's barn, which was necessary, perhaps, to protect the frail tenement from being blown over. After a time the school was removed to the sleeping-room in Mr. Tozier's house. The manner of my conveyance to the scene of my labors has entirely escaped my recollection. It could not have been by railroad, stage, nor omnibus. It probably was on horseback, and very likely on the same horse behind Dr. Gale. I recollect all those families you mention, as I boarded with all or most of them. The scholars were Samuel and Clark Pease, Polly Chamberlain, Arumah Gares; Sally, Richard and Elijah Tozier; Judith and Sophia Barker; John and Clarissa Seavey, and perhaps one or two others whose names I have forgotten. I remember eating very excellent bread baked in an iron dish-kettle over a great blazing fire, and potatoes boiled in a birch-bark sap-trough.* My first trial of roads in the wilderness, was on horseback from Bangor to "New Ohio Plantation," and the next day I was unable in consequence to sit up at all without fainting. I well remember, likewise, the beautiful simplicity and unaffected kindness and friendship of the people in those new settlements, and I most heartily deprecate some of the improvements of modern times.

So much for the first "school ma'am" of Exeter, so worthy of the remembrance and esteem of the present and future descendants of the old stock.

It may be proper to add, that the five families in the neighborhood of the school contributed $5 additional to the "missionary money," which prolonged the term to ten weeks.

During the month of August, 1844, a son was born in the family of Samuel and Roxanna Osgood, this son being Calvin Osgood, now of Garland, Maine.

1805. In March, 1805, came Daniel Barker, from Limerick (a native of Exeter, New Hampshire, for which "Blasdeltown" was subsequently named), and purchased the homestead of Leonard Tozier, who then removed to Brewer, where he continued to reside until the death of his second wife, excepting a few years, in which he had again beaten back into the wilds of "Jarvis Gore" (now part of Dedham), where he again achieved the honor—as in Exeter—of being the "first settler."

Mr. Leonard Tozier, the distinguished pioneer, was born in Pownalborough (now Wiscasset), August 17, 1756. His first wife, Sarah Lancaster, was born in Winslow (then "Fort Halifax"), October 29, 1761. They were married by Ezekiel Pattee, Esq., of Fort Halifax, January 19, 1780, and settled soon after in what is now Glenburn, on the Kenduskeag Stream, on the point of land (or "oxbow" on the stream), still known as "Tozier's Point." Mr. Tozier died in Waterville, Maine, at the home of his daughter Sally, who had married Elias Tozier, her cousin, in the winter of 1843. Mr. Tozier left a large number of descendants, some of whom are now living in Corinth, Maine, where his son, John Tozier, who died January 18, 1878, at the advanced age of eighty-nine years, eleven months, and thirteen days, had long been a worthy and prominent citizen, and where his widow still survives him.

1805 to 1810. Between these years rapid progress was made in the settlement and growth of Blasdeltown. During this period came Elias Milliken, with a large family, from Scarborough, and Bartlett Leathers, from Nottingham, New Hampshire, and Thomas Townsend, Samuel Judkins, Joseph Bradbury, William Tibbetts, Charles Crosby, Jr., Elisha Crosby, John Crocker, Benjamin Hilton, Nathan Doan, Bangs Doan, Nathian Prescott, John McLellan, Mark Chase, Benjamin Sinclair, Richard Palmer, Joseph and Henry Tibbetts (twin brothers), Joseph Davis, Moses Dudley, and John Kenniston, and others soon followed and took up lands in the south part of the town, while in the central part had arrived Samuel Eastman, John and William Staples, Samuel Brown, Stephen and Matthew Hedges, Noah Dow, Samuel Sparhawk, Charles Butters, and some others.

In the northern part of the town the Osgoods were soon followed by William Palmer and two of his sons, William, Jr., and John Palmer, Aaron Hatch, Joseph Champeon, Asa and Joseph Cortland, Nathaniel Oak, Ebenezer and Paul Towle, Nathaniel and John Hill. Phineas, Ebenezer, Nathan, and Nathaniel Batchelder, Gardner Farmer, Gideon Lambert, Nahum Pierce, Jesse Cross, and his brother-in-law, — Waite. Jesse Cross, above named, was a Free-will Baptist clergyman, and came from New Hampshire. His wife, who was a sister of Waite, died within a few years after their removal here, and her remains, with those of a child of Joseph and Nancy Osgood, were buried side by side in Gardner Farmer's orchard; but in after years were taken up and removed to the old burying ground, in the "Osgood settlement." Soon after the death of his wife Mr. Cross and his brother, Waite, returned to New Hampshire.

During these years, there being no corporate authority for raising money by a tax in the plantation, the children, of course, had to be instructed at private charge. But the early settlers, though poor, provided such means as they had for the education of their children, already beginning to increase to a respectable number of scholars. There were some few among the inhabitants, both male and female, who had been teachers, among whom were E. G. Chamberlain, and Mrs. Joseph Bradbury. The latter opened a private school in her own house, on the Tibbetts place, within a year or two after the close of the one by Miss Stevens, where most of the children in the neighborhood—her own among the rest—attended. Private schools were also taught about this time in the Osgood settlement, and Hedges neighborhood, being where Hazen Messenger now lives.

INCORPORATION AS A TOWN.

1810. Early in the spring of 1810 a petition was signed and sent to the Legislature, then convened in Boston, for an act of incorporation, the following being a copy:

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS.

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in General Court assembled. June, 1810:

The subscribers, inhabitants of Township Number Three in the fourth range, north of the Waldo Patent, commonly known by the name of Blaisdeltown, beg leave to represent that their numbers have increased to upwards of forty families; that they labour under all the many and great inconveniences, which naturally arise in consequence of their unincorporated situation.

They therefore pray that the said Township, with the inhabitants therein, may be incorporated into a town by the name of Exeter, with all the privileges and immunities which other towns in the Commonwealth enjoy. As in duty bound will ever pray.

AARON HATCH,

On the foregoing petition a Bill, an "Act to incorporate the Town of Exeter," was reported by the Committee, and finally passed on the 16th of February, 1811.

ORGANIZATION AND EARLY PROCEEDINGS—SCHOOLS.

1811. The warrant for calling the first town meeting in Exeter under its charter (or act of incorporation, in February, 1811,) was issued by Moses Hodsdon, Esq., of "Conduskeag Plantation" (as the present town of Kenduskeag was then called), and under this warrant the legal voters of the town assembled at the dwelling-house of Samuel Eastman, on Lot No. 1, Range 6, on Monday, April 1, 1811, and chose Matthew Hedges Moderator; John Chamberlain Town Clerk; John Chamberlain, Samuel Osgood, Joseph Pease, Jr., Selectmen; Gardner Farmer Treasurer; Nathaniel Barker Collector of Taxes.

John Chamberlain, Esq., was retained in the offices of Clerk and Chairman of the Board of Selectmen for three consecutive years. He was a saddler by trade, and the first Justice of the Peace in town, holding that office under an appointment by the Governor of Massachusetts. He was one of the earliest settlers in town, and died here on the 3d of January, 1830.

No sooner had the citizens of Exeter become organized as a town than they began to manifest a renewed interest in the education of their children. At their second town meeting, May 28, 1811, on the tenth article of their warrant, "Voted eighty dollars for schooling this year." On Article 19, "Voted two hundred dollars for building school-houses," which are the first votes touching the subject of education. At this meeting Joseph Osgood, Joseph Pease, Jr., and Samuel Brown were chosen a committee to superintend the building of school-houses. The sum of $80, raised for schooling, was to be paid by the first day of February, 1812, in wheat at 9s., rye at 7s., or corn at 6s. per bushel.

The town met again December 26, 1811, to consider the question whether school-houses should be built by the town or the several school districts. After considerable discussion and deliberation, it was decided "That the town will build school-houses for the several districts as soon as they shall contain twenty children from the ages of four to twenty-one years;" and Charles Butters, Joseph Pease, Jr., and Aaron Hatch were chosen a committee "to mark out the outlines of as many school districts as they shall think proper to make."

The committee forthwith made their report, which was accepted. This report embraced three school districts, viz.: "South Central" (southeast No. 1, Hill's Corner), "Northeast" (No. 2, Osgood Settlement), and "Northwest" Districts (Exeter Corner). This division was found to be impracticable; for, at a meeting of January 17, 1812, the town voted to have but two school districts, viz.: "Southeast and Northeast, and that the dividing line between them be the centre line which passes through the town north and south;" and that the money ($200) which had been raised May 28, 1811, "or its stated value in grain," be apportioned to the building of said houses.

These houses were to be 26 by 20 feet on the ground, 9-foot posts, and hipped roof, and to be set up and fit for summer schools by the 20th day of June next (A. D. 1812).

These two houses were built in the summer of 1812, but not in season for the summer schools. They were used for schools, however, the next winter, 1813.

On the 19th December, 1812, the inhabitants voted "That the town be districted anew, and to contain but four districts, running a line through the town east and west betwixt the Sixth and Seventh ranges, and a line north and south through the town betwixt No. 6 and No. 7, throughout the ranges, each quarter to form one district." It was further voted "That each of the four districts shall have five hundred dollars apiece allowed them by the town for building school-houses." The school-houses in the foregoing districts were built by the town, and all others have since been built by the several districts. The school-house in the Northwest District was built in 1815, and the Southwest (No. 4) in 1820. Other districts have since been set off from the four original districts, and established in the following order, viz.: District No. 5, in 1820; No. 6, in 1823; No. 7, in 1824; No. 8, in 1827; No. 9, in 1829; No. 10, in 1831; No. 11, in 1835; No. 12, in 1839; No. 13, in 1839; No. 14, in 1841; and No. 15, in the same year, 1841.

The first public town school in Exeter was taught in the summer of 1811, in District No. 1, or Southeast District, by Miss Susan Prescott, daughter of Nathan Prescott, then living in the district. That school was kept in the west room of Joseph Pease's log house, being on Lot No. 6, Range 3, now known as the James Brown place.

The second town school in the same district was taught in the summer of 1812, by Miss Elizabeth Budge, in a room in Nathan Prescott's log house (there being, in fact, none other than log houses at that time in the town).

During the same summer, 1812, the first town school was taught in District No. 2, or the Northeast District (then so called), by Miss Mary T. Hill, daughter of Captain Nathaniel Hill, then living in the district. The next winter, 1813, Isaac Jacobs was the first male teacher in District No. 1, and Lewis Bean in District No. 2. The first school in District No. 3, or Northwest District, was taught in the summer of 1813, by Miss Sarah Shaw, daughter of George Shaw, who had removed his family here the same year from New Durham, New Hampshire, and continued to reside here until his death. In the summers of 1814 and 1815 the schools in this district were taught by Betsey Shaw, a sister of Sarah (the first teacher). The first male teacher in District No. 3 was Isaac Jacobs, who taught here in the winter of 1816-17, and again the next winter following. The first school in District No. 4, or Southwest District, was taught by Sally Peabody, of Corinth, in the summer of 1818; and Hannah Peabody, her sister, taught in the same district in 1819. The first male teacher in No. 4 was James Adams, who taught here in the winter of 1823-24.

Exeter High School was incorporated in March, 1838, with an appropriation of six hundred dollars from the State. The first preceptor in this institution was the late Dr. Albert Wheelock, of Belfast, Maine. The high school was located at Exeter Corner, where a large, commodious building was erected by School District No. 3, and is used both for the high school and the public town school.

THE EXETER SOCIAL LIBRARY

was established at East Exeter, in January, 1826, being the first public library in town; and John Huckins, then a merchant in the place, was chosen Librarian. In the establishment of this library, Flavel Butters was an active mover, and chairman of the committee to solicit subscriptions for shares in the library, at two dollars per share; and also to select and purchase the books.

In after years, when the books had been extensively read, they were divided among the shareholders.

PLACES OF TOWN MEETINGS.

The Exeter Town House was erected, for municipal purposes, in the summer of 1843. Prior to this time, town meetings were held at private houses in different parts of the town, and at school-houses, as the selectmen of the town might direct. The private houses at which town meetings were held, at different times, during the first ten years of the town's municipal history, were those of Samuel Eastman on lot No. 1, R. 6; William Hill on No. 6, R. 7; Levi Stevens on No. 3, R. 6; Jonathan Palmer No. 3, R. 8; and Isaac Jacobs on No. 5, R. 7.

The first town meeting held at a school-house, was on the 3d of April, 1815, at the "Southeast School House" (No. 1), where the town again met May 20, 1816.

On the 4th of November, 1816, a town meeting was held, for the first time, at the "Northeast School House" (No. 2).

On the 9th of March, 1818, for the first time, a town meeting was held at the "Northwest School House" (No. 3).

And the annual March meeting, in 1835, was held at the school-house in District No. 4.

CHURCHES.

Prior to the building of the old school-house in District No. 1, no public building of any kind had ever been built in town, but, as the early settlers were a religious, church-going people, and having no other places in which to assemble, the farmers' barns were used in summer, and their log-house kitchens in winter, as places of public religious worship. That was at a time when almost every one, within four or six miles, attended religious meetings on the Sabbath, females not excepted, and walked this distance with great seeming alacrity; when feelings of kindness were entertained, and acts of benevolence exercised by each, towards all others; when each rejoiced at the prosperity of his neighbor, and sympathized with him in adversity and affliction; when none of those hateful, invidious distinctions existed in society which too often destroy the confidence, peace and happiness of neighborhoods and communities; when the criterion of respectability was neither in the contents of one's purse, the cut, or texture of a garment, nor the furniture of his domicile; when not a town was incorporated, nor a school-house, nor a meeting-house erected north and west of Bangor, within the then county of Hancock; at a time when

To build the towering church and spire,
God's people were not able,
And so, to hear their humble prayer,
The Lord would meet them anywhere—
In kitchen, grove, or stable.

Among the primitive preachers who occasionally held meetings among the early settlers, were the Rev. Jotham Sewall, Elder Simmons, the venerable John Sawyer, Isaac Davis, Paul Ruggles, Enoch Hunting, Jonathan Palmer, Joseph Merrill, Joseph Osgood, Aaron Hatch, Peter Burgess, Melville Cox, Joseph Lull, and, more latterly, Jesse Norcross, Jacob Hatch, and Albana Pease.

The first baptism in town, by immersion, was administered in the summer of 1811 by Elder Paul Ruggles, of Carmel, the candidate for the ordinance being Reuben Seavey, who subsequently became an ordained minister of the Gospel, of the Calvinistic Baptist persuasion. Elder Ruggles held his meeting on the occasion of Mr. Seavey's baptism, in the log-house kitchen of Nathaniel Barker, and the rite of baptism administered at what was called the "Bradbury Rips," in the Kenduskeag Stream, half a mile distant from the place of meeting.

A Baptist church was organized in Exeter by the Rev. Paul Ruggles in 1815, but the early records of the church are not now to be found. On the sale of the lands in town which were "reserved for the ministry," the several religious denominations organized their societies (regardless of church membership), in order that each society might draw its share of the interest accruing annually from the "Ministerial Fund." But after dividing this interest among the religious societies for some years, the town at length voted that the Ministerial and School Fund should thereafter be held in trust by the town, and the interest distributed to the several school districts, in proportion to the number of scholars in each, for the support of education.

A Free-will Baptist Church was instituted in town not long after that of the Calvinistic Baptists, and the Rev. Joseph Osgood was ordained as its pastor, as early as 1817. Messrs. Osgood and Aaron Hatch were early and zealous exhorters in their meetings. At a subsequent period the Rev. John Page, Elder Daniel Swett, and Samuel Whitney were employed as preachers for the society. At a meeting of the society held May 26, 1827, it was "voted to divide the ministerial money equally between Elder John Page and Elder Joseph Osgood." In 1828 the money was divided between Elder John Page and Elder Daniel Swett; and in 1829, between Elder Page and Elder Samuel Whitney. No decisive movement is known to have been made to secure preaching here by the Methodists, till 1816, when Ebenezer Higgins moved into town and interested himself in the matter, and succeeded in the formation of an "eight weeks' circuit" from Harmony to Palmyra, comprising the towns of Harmony, Ripley, Dexter, Garland, Exeter, Corinth, Levant, Stetson, Corinna, and St. Albans—all taking the name of the "Exeter Circuit." In 1817 the Rev. Joseph Lull was sent here, as the first minister upon the circuit.

In 1818-19 a church was organized here, known as the "Christian Band," in which the Rev. Albana Pease officiated for many years; afterward becoming a Christian Adventist. He died in Exeter September 30, 1863, aged seventy-six years, one month and fifteen days.

A Congregational Church was organized in Exeter in 1842-3, and Congregational preaching was obtained, alternately with the Baptists; and through the efforts of the Rev. E. G. Carpenter, a church edifice was erected at East Exeter, in 1843, by these two societies, in which the desk was occupied, for a year or two, by Mr. Carpenter, and Elder Jacob Hatch, of Dexter; also occasionally by the Rev. John Sawyer, of Garland.

A Universalist Society was also organized in town about the year 1834-35, and the Rev. William Frost and Rev. William Miller were the officiating clergymen. Their meetings were held in school-houses, which were generally well filled.

The first meeting-house in town was built by the Methodists and Free-will Baptist Society, jointly, at Exeter Corner, in 1829. That house was burned within a few years after. These two societies then dissolved partnership, and each society built a house for its own accommodation. Since that time other religious societies, such as the Christian Adventists in 1841, the Congregationalists and Calvin-Baptists in 1843, and finally the Episcopal Society in 1874, have erected their own church edifices, and each for its own particular form of worship. For these laudable and worthy enterprises, each of the above-named societies is entitled to much credit. But to the ladies of Exeter Mills and vicinity was reserved the crowning honor of erecting, in the centennial year of our national independence, the first Free House within the precincts of the town, where the people of every creed and denomination may unite in the worship of the Great Common Father, and, in the mode and manner his conscience shall dictate; it being designed not only as a place for public religious worship, but for scientific lectures, social gatherings, and for the convenience and benefit of a free, intelligent, and progressive people. This edifice is called the "Exeter Mills Hall," dedicated November 27, 1876.

EARLY MARRIAGES.

Among the early marriages in Exeter were: Samuel

Osgood and Roxanna Knapp, 1803; Lemuel Tozier and Betsey H. Gates, 1804; Joseph Osgood and Nancy Wilkins, 1806; Nathaniel Barker and Sally Pease, 1807; George Tilson and Nancy Barker, 1808; Joseph Pease, Jr., and Polly Barker, Aaron Hatch and Betsey Wilkins, 1809; Albana Pease and Sally Barker, Matthew Milliken and Peggy Matthews, Rufus Simpson and Nancy Blaven, 1811.

OBITUARY.

Of the foregoing names on the tax-list of 1818, only two out of the ninety-five composing the list are now living, viz: Daniel Dole and Leonard Hill. The last one that died, out of the list, was Colonel Francis Hill, whose exit was on the 8th of January, 1881. He died on the old homestead, where, in 1814, he commenced in the wilderness to make for himself a farm and a future home. Here he had lived ever since. He was left an orphan at an early age, and, without a patrimony, was obliged to shift for himself. At the time of his marriage, in January, 1815, like most of the early settlers of Exeter, he and his young wife, who was equal to the emergency, commenced the struggle of life in a log cabin, depending mainly on the labor of their hands, and their labors were crowned with success. Colonel Hill was noted for his habits of industry, economy, and superior business tact. In this way he accumulated a large estate, and before his death was accounted one of the wealthiest men in town. He had often been called, by the suffrages of his fellow-citizens, to fill the most important offices in town, whose business affairs were ever considered safe in his hands. In his death one of the oldest land-marks in town has been removed, and of which but very few now remain.

Of the thirty-three petitioners to the Legislature, in 1810, asking for the incorporation of Exeter, only one is left on the shores of time. That survivor of all his early companions is McKenzie Pease, now (1881) in his ninety-fifth year, and living with his daughter in Bangor. He was a twin brother of the late Rev. Albana Pease.

THE POST-OFFICES.

In Exeter are four post-offices—Exeter, South Exeter (formerly Hill's Corner), Exeter Mills, and East Exeter. The first was established at Exeter Corner, May 1, 1824, and John Shaw was the first postmaster. The second was established February 27, 1834, and Bradbury Robinson was appointed postmaster. The third was established December 6, 1844, and David N. Buffum appointed postmaster. The fourth was established in 1854, and John Cuttler appointed the first postmaster.

APPORTIONMENT OF REPRESENTATIVE DISTRICTS.

1820-21. New Charleston, Blakesburg, Levant, Corinth, Exeter, and Plantation No. 1, Third Range, and No. 1, Fourth Range, one Representative.

1821, March 22. Exeter, Corinth, New Charleston, Garland, and Dexter, one Representative.

1831, March 10. Exeter and Dexter, one Representative.

1841, April 2. Exeter, one Representative.

1842, March 17. Exeter and Garland, one Representative; and these two towns still remain as one Representative District.

SENATORS.

In 1837 and 1838 Ebenezer Higgins, of Exeter, was elected Senator to the State Legislature; and for 1881 and 1882 Francis W. Hill of Exeter, was elected by the county for that office, which he now holds.

REPRESENTATIVES.

1820-23. Daniel Wilkins, New Charleston; 1824-25. Cornelius Coolidge, Dexter; 1826. Winthrop Chapman, Exeter; 1827-31. Reuben Bartlett, Garland; 1832. Reuben S. Prescott, Exeter; 1833. Isaac Smith, Dexter; 1834. Chandler Eastman, Exeter; 1835. Gilman M. Burleigh, Dexter; 1836. Ebenezer Higgins, Exeter; 1837. Isaac Russ, Dexter; 1838. Noah Barker, Exeter; 1839. Charles C. Cushman, Dexter; 1840. Noah Barker, Exeter; 1841. Isaac Hatch, Dexter; 1842. Hammon Eastman, Exeter; 1843. Smith Libby, Exeter; 1844. Lyndon Oak, Garland; 1845. Charles Butters, Exeter; 1846. Lyndon Oak, Garland; 1847. William Palmer, Exeter; 1848. Stephen D. Jennings, Garland; 1849, Isaiah Avery, Exeter; 1850, Loring D. Hayes, Garland; 1851-52, Samuel M. Woodman, Exeter; 1853, Joseph T. Knight, Garland; 1854-55, Thomas K. Holt, Exeter; 1856, Noah Barker, Exeter; 1857, Artemas Merriam, Garland; 1858, Joshua Palmer, Exeter; 1859, Noah W. Johnson, Garland; 1860, Winthrop Chapman, Exeter; 1861, Luther Rideout, Garland; 1862, E. H. Small, Exeter; 1863, Daniel M. Haskell, Garland; 1864, John W. Osgood, Exeter; 1865, Lyndon Oak, Garland; 1866, Augustus E. Chandler, Exeter; 1867, Lyndon Oak, Garland; 1868, Amasa Stetson, Exeter; 1869, Lyndon Oak, Garland; 1870, John Whitney, Exeter; 1871, Andrew M. Haskell, Garland; 1872, David Barker, Exeter; 1873, Lorenzo Oak, Garland; 1874, Benjamin Frost, Exeter; 1875, Edson L. Oak, Garland; 1876, James L. Linnell, Exeter; 1877, George S. Clark, Garland; 1878, George S. Hill, Exeter; 1879, Charles Seward, Garland; 1880, George S. Hill, Exeter; 1881-82, Calvin P. Berry, Garland.

Francis Hill

CORONERS.

The following-named persons have served as Coroners from Exeter:

Josiah Barker, June 24, 1829; Ebenezer Higgins, December 25, 1833; Ebenezer Moulton, March 2, 1837; Charles W. Adams, March 24, 1838; Philbrick B. Tay, May 2, 1839; Isaiah Avery, November 7, 1839 to May 1, 1848.

DEDIMUS JUSTICES.

The following have been appointed since the admission of Maine as a State:

Isaac Jacobs, July 7, 1821; Winthrop Chapman, March 13, 1826; Ebenezer Higgins, March 17, 1836; John L. Hodsdon, January 1, 1839; Chandler Eastman, May 2, 1839; Isaiah Avery, September 25, 1847; Noah Barker, May 11, 1852.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

The following were appointed by the Governor of Massachusetts:

John Chamberlain, March 20, 1816; John Kenniston, March 20, 1816; Isaac Jacobs, July 3, 1818.

The following Justices of the Peace were appointed after the separation from Massachusetts, from the year 1826 to 1855, inclusive, twenty-five years; each for terms of seven years:

1826, Benjamin Evans; 1827, Ezekiel Hayes; 1828, Charles Butters, Winthrop Chapman, Isaac Jacobs, Joseph Tibbetts; 1829, Henry Hill, John B. Hill; 1831, Reuben S. Prescott, Chandler Eastman, Ezekiel Hayes; 1835, Francis Hill; 1836, Joshua Palmer, Samuel Brown, William Fairfield, Henry Hill, John Lovett, Ebenezer Higgins, Winthrop Chapman, James Adams; 1837, Noah Barker, Alexander M. Robinson; 1838, John W. Osgood, George W. Hill, Chandler Eastman, Hazen Eastman, Edward Snow; 1839, Augustus C. Smith, 1841, William Clark; 1842, Joseph C. Chandler, Francis Hill; 1843, Ebenezer Higgins; 1844, George Kenniston, Henry Hill, Noah Barker, Francis W. Hill, David Barker; 1845, Samuel K. White, John L. Hodsdon, Hazen Eastman, George W. Wilcox; 1846, Lorenzo D. Butters, Benjamin B. Brown; 1848, Thomas McCard, Mark Barker, John Buswell; 1849, Francis Hill, Isaiah Avery, Henry P. Haynes; 1850, James M. Daniels, Benjamin B. Brown, Ebenezer Higgins; 1851, Noah Barker, David Barker, Francis W. Hill.

DEPUTY SHERIFFS.

The following is a list of the Deputy Sheriffs down to the year 1851:

Francis Hill, Ebenezer Higgins, Ebenezer Moulton, Philbrick B. Tay, Charles W. Adams, Isaiah Avery, Augustus C. Smith, George W. Hill, Allen C. Tibbetts, Nathaniel Barker.

In 1855 Hon. Francis W. Hill, of Exeter, was Sheriff of Penobscot county.

MERCHANTS.

The first merchant in town was Samuel Currier, who came here from Vermont in June, 1819, and opened a stock of goods in 1821, in a small building then standing where the Abee House, at East Exeter, now stands, the place being then known as Stevens's Mills. He soon after built a new store adjoining the old one, which last was occupied by the district, in the winter of 1822, for a school-house, in which John Shaw was teacher. The merchants who succeeded Currier at this place were, John Huckins, in 1824-25; Reuben S. Prescott, in 1827, who continued here till May, 1833; Joseph Kendrick, Jr., Henry G. Hill, David Barker, Warren R. Abee, John Cutler, Butters & Shaw, Lorenzo D. Butters, and John Q. Adams (the present trader of the place), and each at different times engaged in mercantile business.

In 1822, after closing his school in the Currier store, John Shaw built a store at Exeter Corner (then a forest), and commenced trade therein, this being the second store built in town, and the only one then occupied. Mr. Shaw continued in the mercantile business till May, 1851, having followed the business twenty-nine years. The amount of goods sold by him during that time, as he says in his letter, "was probably from $200,000 to $300,000." The successors of John Shaw, at Exeter Corner, have been Ezekiel Hayes, Shaw's partner, in 1824; Andrew Shaw, as partner, in 1825; John Walker, in August, 1825; John D. Prescott, with J. Shaw, in April, 1835. Joseph and Josiah Paine bought out Walker, and commenced in 1835; they sold to Andrew Pease, in 1836; and about this time Joseph and Henry M. True commenced trade in the building since occupied as a law-office by John L. Hodsdon and David Barker. In 1839 William W. French commenced trade in the Shaw store; and in 1840 Augustus C. French commenced in partnership with J. Shaw. In 1842 Lewis T. Joscelyn commenced and sold out to J. Walker in 1847. Francis W. Hill commenced trade at the corner about the year 1843; and Samuel Heard, Jr., about 1848.

Joshua Gammon, J. T. Morton, Noah H. Smith, and Ezekiel H. Page, were each in trade here before the present merchants, George S. Hill and John Whitney, commenced.

At Exeter Mills the first merchant was Zebediah Holt. He was succeeded by Benjamin Plummer, Philbrick B. Tay, William Hunnewell, David N. Buffum, Thomas J. Hill, George W. Libby, Edward & John Snow, Benjamin B. Brown & Mark Parker, Nathaniel E. & Charles Brown, Thomas Mansfield, John Whitney, Edmund T. Canney, Benjamin R. Laird, and Mr. Fauvette, who is now the only merchant in the place.

At Linnell's Corner the first trader was William Canney, 1st, who in 1825 opened a store of goods in the west room of Timothy Drew's dwelling house. He afterwards commenced trade at South Exeter, then known as "Canney's Corner." His successors at Linnell's Corner were Edmund Peavey, Henry Hill, Bradbury Robinson, Levi Cutler, and James L. Linnell.

At South Exeter the first merchant was William Canney, 1st; since his death the traders have been Reuben Butters, Flavel B. Shaw, Edmund T. Canney, and J. W. Kent, who is now the only trader there.

PHYSICIANS.

The first physician in Exeter was Dr. Benjamin Evans, who settled here in 1817. His successors have been William Fairfield, William R. Morrill, Dr. Waterhouse, J. M. Small, John B. Wilson, S. W. L. Chase, and F. N. Wheeler, Drs. Chase and Wheeler being the present practitioners.

LAWYERS.

The first lawyer in town was John B. Hill, Esq., who settled at Exeter Corner in 1827-28. His successors have been Samuel Cony (afterwards Governor of the State), James Adams, Charles Cushman, Alexander M. Robinson, Josiah Crosby, George W. Wilcox, John L. Hodsdon, and David Barker, who died September 14, 1874. At present (1881) there is no lawyer in town.

EARLIEST MECHANICS IN EXETER.

The first saddler in town was John Chamberlain, who came here in 1803, and died in 1830.

The first shoemaker was Thomas Townsend, who came here in 1809, and died of small-pox in 1821.

The first house-joiner was Samuel Hersey, who finished off the first school-house in town, in 1812. He was followed, in 1815, by Stephen Holt, who was a mechanic of the first order; not only a joiner but a wheelwright, and built the first wagon that was ever constructed in Exeter. His ingenuity seems to have descended, as by inheritance, to his sons, Stephen, Edward B., and Thomas K., the latter of whom is still living, and a superior workman. He built the Corporation Mills at Veazie.

The first hatter in town was Joseph Bradbury, who came here in 1806, and raised his hatter-shop on the Dole farm, August 19, 1814. He removed with his family to Ohio in 1816.

The first blacksmith in town was Zenas Dexter, who came here in 1817. His shop stood nearly on the site where now stands the school-house at East Exeter, then Stephens's Mills.

The first printer was Benjamim F. Tozier, who started a newspaper here in 1843, called The Pioneer, which was a short-lived concern, dying for want of patronage.

The first cabinet-maker in town was David Adams, who built his house at Exeter Corner in 1821, where he worked at his trade for several years and then went to Massachusetts.

The first tanner in town was Hazen Eastman, who came here in 1820. He is still living at Exeter Mills.

The first tin plate-workers were William C. and Leonard P. Smith, who worked at the business at Exeter Mills as early as 1835. Leonard P. is now at Seattle, Washington Territory.

The first goldsmith in Exeter was John A. Mayhew, who worked at his trade at Exeter Corner for some years, and then removed to Bangor, where he died not long since.

The first chair-maker in town was Samuel K. White, who was an excellent workman, and died here of cholera in 1849.

The first tailor was David Dinsmore, who died in Minnesota soon after his arrival there in 1851.

The first painter, glazier, and paper-hanger in town was Daniel Dole, who purchased his farm here in 1816, and moved his family here in 1825. He is now the oldest citizen living in town.

The first regular butcher and meat vender was Consider Glass, who commenced buying the farmers' calves and lambs in about the year 1841-42.

MISCELLANEOUS ITEMS.

The first saw- and grist-mill in town was built at East Exeter, by Levi Stevens, in 1813. Previous to this time the inhabitants were under the necessity of going through the woods on horseback, either to Hodsdon's Mills in Kenduskeag, or to Elkins's Mills in Dexter, to get their corn and grain ground.

The first carding and cloth-dressing in Exeter was done by John Atkins, who built his clothing mill at East Exeter in 1821-22. This mill was burnt in the winter of 1825, when John Cutler and Horace S. Upham bought the privilege and rebuilt the mill, where they carried on the business extensively for several years. Mr. Upham died in Exeter in the fall of 1841, and Mr. Cutler in Bangor February 9, 1862. His son, John L. Cutler, is now one of the prominent business men in Bangor. He was born in Exeter, March 9, 1829, where he still retains an interest in the mills, long known as Cutler's Mills, at East Exeter.

MILITARY HISTORY.

The history of the old Militia Company of Exeter, embracing, at last, within its limits, only the north half of the town, commences at an early period in the annals of the county, and continues down to about the year 1843-44, when, by act of legislation, all the ununiformed militia of the State was exempted from active duty, "except in case of insurrection, war, invasion, or to prevent invasion." We find, indeed, that this was the oldest military company within the limits of the present county of Penobscot, being a perpetuation of the original company organized on the Penobscot River, in 1776. After the breaking out of the Revolution, in 1775, the Provincial Congress of Massachusetts lost no time in securing the Penobscot Indians in the interest of the Colonies. Accordingly Captain John Lane was sent by the Provincial Congress to raise a company from the Penobscots to join in the war.

The result was that in 1776 a company, consisting of twenty white men and ten Indians, was organized, and one Andrew Gilman, who was then living among the Indians and understood their language, was made Commanding Lieutenant, and Joseph Mansall (afterwards captain of the company) orderly sergeant.

"This was the first military organization, and a rude fort, at the angle of the roads just above Mt. Hope, was their headquarters. They acted as rangers until the British occupied 'Bagadnee,' or Castine, in 1779."*

About this time the company was under the command of Captain Smith.† In 1800 that company, then embracing Bangor and a territory called "Kenduskeag," which now composes the towns of Glenburn, Levant, Corinth, Charleston, Exeter, etc., was commanded by Captain Edward Wilkins, who then resided in what is now the town of Charleston. In 1802 the company was divided, a new company being organized in Bangor, and Timothy Crosby was elected captain, Wilkins still commanding the old company.

On the 21st day of October, 1805, Wilkins resigned, and Elisha Mayhew (then living on the old "Leavitt place" in Levant, opposite the "Oakman homestead" in Corinth), was elected captain, Isaac Hodsdon, lieutenant, and Samuel Grant, ensign. In 1806 Elijah Skinner, of Corinth, was chosen ensign, vice Grant, removed.

Mayhew's company embraced the present towns of Levant, Corinth, Exeter, and Stetson.

In December, 1810, Captain Mayhew was elected Colonel of a regiment, and left Hodsdon in command of the company. In March, 1811, Hodsdon was appointed Adjutant, but still held his command of the company.

On Tuesday, April 30, 1811, Josiah Barker, of Exeter, was chosen captain, and on the first Tuesday of May, 1811, there was a "training" at his house, this being the first "militia training" in Exeter.

In August, 1811, a new company was formed in Corinth and Levant, of which Reuben Ball, of Corinth, was elected captain, leaving Barker in command of the old company, composed of Exeter and Stetson, and of which Nathaniel Ingalls, of Stetson, was orderly sergeant and clerk.

In 1816 a new company was organized in Stetson, of which John Lakin was chosen captain, leaving Barker still in command of the old company. After the formation of this new company in Stetson, Wintrop Chapman was elected lieutenant, and Ira Shepardson ensign of the old company, and John Palmer was appointed orderly sergeant and clerk.

Captain Barker held his commission till 1818, as appears by the following extract from the company records:

REGIMENTAL ORDERS.

CORINTH, 10th March, 1818.

The company lately commanded by Captain Josiah Barker will meet at Stevens's Mill, in Exeter, on Friday, the 20th instant, at one of the clock P. M., to elect a captain in lieu of Captain Josiah Barker, who is honorably discharged at his own request, and to fill any vacancy that (may) happen by said choice.

By order of the Colonel,

GEORGE SIMPSON,

Adjutant of Fourth Regiment.

To Ensign Ira Shepardson, Exeter.

A true copy, attest, JOHN PALMER, Clerk.

On the 20th day of March, 1818, Ira Shepardson was elected captain and Joseph Tibbetts ensign. Chapman still held his commission as lieutenant, though superseded by Shepardson, till July 3, 1819, when Joseph Tibbetts was elected lieutenant, and Francis Hill ensign.

On the 20th of May, 1822, Lieutenant Joseph Tibbetts was elected captain, Francis Hill lieutenant, and Joshua Atkins ensign.

In 1824 a new company was formed called the Exeter South Company, embracing the south half of the town, and of which Stephen B. Chamberlain was elected captain, Sewall Chapman lieutenant, and James Brown ensign. The successors of Chamberlain as captains of the new company were Samuel Currier, Henry Hill, Smith Libby, George W. Hill, and Captain Elijah Crane, who was in office at the time the militia system was changed by statute enactment, his associates in office being Lieutenant Allen C. Tibbetts and Ensign Nathaniel Barker.

After the division of the company in 1824, the old company made choice of Francis Hill captain, Hammon Eastman lieutenant, and John Walker ensign. This was the first choice of officers after the division of the old Exeter company.

On the 20th of February, 1826, Captain Francis Hill was elected lieutenant-colonel, vice Lieutenant-Colonel Philip Greely, deceased; and May 20, 1826, the company elected Hammon Eastman captain, John Walker lieutenant, and Andrew Shaw ensign. On the 16th April, 1829, John Walker was chosen captain, Andrew Shaw lieutenant, and Joshua Palmer ensign. May 12, 1832, Andrew Shaw captain, Joshua Palmer lieutenant, and David F. Hill ensign. August 10, 1833, Joshua Palmer captain, and Isaiah Avery lieutenant, David F. Hill still remaining ensign of the company. July 25, 1835, Isaiah Avery captain, David F. Hill lieutenant, and Samuel Heard, Jr., ensign. May 13, 1837, D. F. Hill having been honorably discharged, Samuel Heard, Jr., was elected lieutenant, and Samuel Osgood, Jr., ensign. February 23, 1839, Osgood having been discharged, Joshua D. Gammon was elected ensign. On the same day a draft was made in the company, by order of Colonel Charles W. Piper, for "minute men," "to be in readiness any moment called for," to enter upon service in the "Aroostook War;" whereupon the following names were drawn, to wit: Robert Gray, Samuel Roak, David Dinsmore, Luther C. Bachelder, and Samuel K. Holt, drafted as privates; William P. Palmer for sergeant, and Charles Berry for fifer. [See Piper's order.] On the 26th February, 1839, four more privates were drafted from the company, viz: Nathaniel H. Shaw, Daniel W. Edgerly, John Kimball, and Ansel Shaw. At the same time a draft was also made in the Exeter South Company, and John Townsend, William Grinnell, Hiram Peavey, Jonathan Peavey, (and perhaps some others) were drafted as privates, and William Pullen for sergeant; he and Nathaniel Barker standing the draft together, and the two drawing lots, it fell to Pullen to serve.

A company was now raised called the Exeter Volunteers, being the first that arrived at what is now Fort Fairfield, on the Aroostook River, where they encamped in the snow, and immediately commenced the construction of the fort, which was named in honor of Governor Fairfield, of Maine. The Exeter men in that company were Lorenzo D. Butters, captain; Reuben Butters, Gustavus Colbath, Robert Colbath, Jesse Fairbanks, Mace S. Grinnell, Charles B. Grinnell, and J. Warren Pease, privates; and Nathan D. Walker, of the Exeter Cavalry, and William O. Colbath, as teamsters to transport the soldiers and munitions of war from Bangor to headquarters.

October 17, 1840, Captain Avery having been promoted, Samuel Osgood, Jr., was elected captain of the Exeter North Company, and continued in command as long as the old militia system was in vogue.

From its earliest municipal record down to the present the citizens of Exeter have ever manifested a laudable military spirit, and have ever been loyal to the country and ready to rally in defense of the dear old flag. Indeed, many of the first settlers of the town had been soldiers under Washington, and thus brought the "spirit of the Revolution" and of independence with them. Among the old patriots of 1776, were Daniel Barker, John Chamberlain, Charles Crosby, Sr., John McLellan, Elias Milliken, and John Oaks, Sr., who had all been in active service.

Mr. Oaks and his interesting "war stories," which he would often relate, even in religious meetings, are still remembered by many of the old citizens of the town. He was born in Harvard, Massachusetts, February 22, 1757, and died in Exeter June 25, 1842, in his eighty-sixth year. He enlisted in the "War of 1776," in the summer of 1775, the year before the Declaration of Independence, in which he served his country till its close. He was in the memorable battle of Bennington, besides five other general engagements. He, with two others, was selected by General Washington to go from Long Island to Quebec to learn the movements of the enemy. His father had also been out in the French War, and was engaged with General Wolfe on the plains of Abraham. "Being a skilful mechanic, he was employed to make the coffin in which the brave General Wolfe was buried."*

At the commencement of the War of 1812 the little town of Exeter was only a "yearling," having been incorporated but a single year. But the "spirit of '76" still animated the sons of the sires; and though wanting in pecuniary resources, the infant town, both in its municipal and in its military capacity, was ready to turn out its yearling to Brother Jonathan to lock horns with John Bull, or even to breast the British Lion.

Not less than seven of the early settlers enlisted and served in that war, some of whom were stationed at Machias and Eastport, while others were sent West, and were in the battle of Chatauguay Woods, and afterwards stationed at Stewartstown, on the Canada border, where the late General Isaac Hodsdon was in command.

The names of those who entered the United States service at that time from Exeter were Elisha Crosby, Charles Crosby, Jr., Pickman Chamberlain, Frank Hatch, Samuel Judkins, Samuel Pease, and Clark Pease.

In 1814, when the British fleet ascended the Penobscot River and took temporary possession of Castine, Hampden, and Bangor, Captain Barker, with his company, was called out, and ordered to march, post haste, to Hampden, there to join the regiment, in order to prevent the British fleet from capturing the corvette Adams, commanded by Captain Charles Morris, and then lying at anchor for repairs. But the company, on arriving at the Legro place in Bangor, met Captain Morris and his crew, who had spiked their guns, and then blown up the Adams, and were on their retreat through the woods to Kennebec. Here Captain Barker received countermanding orders from General Blake to proceed no further, but to return to Exeter with his company. On their return they were accompanied by Captain Morris and his ship's crew to Exeter, where they remained several days, to "rest and refresh themselves." Of Captain Morris's crew, one was an intelligent sailor named Robbins, who had once been cast away on the coast of Barbary, where he was a long time in captivity, and on his return published a journal of his adventures, which was eagerly read. Robbins's Journal was then to be found in most of our social libraries. When Robbins left Exeter he presented Ira Barker, then a boy, with his musket, which was long kept as an heirloom in the family.

The following is a copy of the Muster Roll of the Exeter Company, in 1817, soon after the close of the war:

Mr. M. H. Lufkin is Postmaster at Exeter, J. W. Kent at South Exeter, L. D. Butters at East Exeter, and C. A. Fawsette at Exeter Mills.

BIOGRAPHICAL NOTES.

SURGEON J. B. WILSON.—Dr. John B. Wilson, of Exeter, was mustered into the United States service December 21, 1861, as Captain of Company H, Fifteenth Regiment Infantry, from which he was discharged for promotion as Surgeon, Second Engineers, October 20th, 1863, after having served as Provost Marshal and A. A. Inspector General, District of West Florida, for the preceding nine months. The title of Second Engineers Corps d'Afrique was afterwards changed to Ninety-sixth United States Colored Infantry. Shortly after joining this corps for duty, Dr. Wilson was detached and served successively as Surgeon in charge of Post Hospital, Fort Esperanza, Matagorda Island, Texas; Acting Medical Purveyor, United States forces, in Texas, until its evacuation; and Surgeon in charge United States Army General Hospital, Fort Gaines, Dauphine Island, Alabama; which latter position he held until the acceptance of his resignation and honorable discharge on surgeon's certificate of disability, January 10, 1865.

W. L. Quimby, of Exeter, is a son of John Quimby, who moved from New Hampshire in 1813. He is now the oldest living settler in town except one. His wife's name was Ruby Townsend, by whom he has had eight children, four boys and four girls—Joanna, Royal, Betsey, Ward, David, Samuel, Mary, and Laura, all of whom are now living. He is now eighty-eight years old, and Mrs. Quimby is eighty-one. W. L. Quimby is the second son, and lives two miles from South Exeter. He married Lydia Judkins, now deceased, by whom he had three children, two girls and one boy—Hattie M., Jennie E., and Royal. Mr. Quimby owns a good farm of one hundred acres. He has served as one of the Selectmen of the town.

The first members of the Tibbetts family to settle in the town of Exeter were Joseph and Henry, twin brothers, who came from Corinth and settled in the southern part of the town, now known as East Exeter. Joseph had eight children who arrived at maturity—Albert and Eliza (twins), Nancy, David, Abner, Lousana, Joseph, and Lovisa. Henry had eleven children, six boys and five girls—Mary, Allen, Eunice, Julia Ann, Henry, Osborn, Friend, Daniel, Ann Maria, Frances E., and Leander. Elisha C. Tibbetts, now living in East Exeter, is the son of Abner, above named; he settled here in 1829, on the place he now owns. He married Christana Ulmer, and has seven children now living, five boys and two girls—Marcia, Melvan, Charles, Mary, Corydon, Clarence, and Dayton. These are all married and settled in life, except Clarence and Dayton, who are living at home. From the rugged soil covered with trees and stone Mr. Tibbetts has made a fine farm. Three of his sons are settled near him.

John Q. Adams, of East Exeter, is a son of J. C. Adams, of Bowdoinham. His father, James Adams, came from Massachusetts in an early day. J. C. Adams had seven boys and two girls—John Q., Sarah S. (deceased), James M., Samuel F., Joseph C., William W., Elizabeth, George L., and Albert F. John Q. Adams was born March 8, 1849. After receiving a common school education he went West and spent seven years in the lumber and hotel business. After coming back he went into mercantile business in connection with that of apothecary. He continued at this five years, when he came to East Exeter in 1880, where he is now engaged in general merchandise and drug business. He has held the office of Town Clerk and Justice of the Peace. In 1874 he married Etta L. Tibbetts, of Corinna. They have three children—John L., Mattie L., and Frank H.

E. F. Butters is a son of Flavel Butters, who was born in this town, and married Sarah Shaw, by whom he had eight children—Almeda J., William M., Frank W., Hattie J., E. F., Eddie E., Lizzie C., and Arthur L. E. F. Butters is the third son. He was born July 22, 1859. After receiving a common school education he engaged in teaching school winters, and in the mill business at East Exeter during the rest of the year.

S. J. French, of Exeter, is a son of Eben P. French, who came from Durham about 1817 and located in South Exeter, near where S. J. now lives. He married Hannah Cook, by whom he had five girls and two boys, five of whom are now living, viz: S. J.; Emily E., now Mrs. Knowles; Viola; Edwin L., now living on the home place; and Mary Ellen, now Mrs. Coan. S. J. French was born in 1827, and married Clara B. Erskine, by whom he had three children, only one of whom, Frederick C., is now living. Mrs. French died in 1871, and Mr. French married Laura E. Rich, daughter of Deacon Joseph Rich, by whom he has one child, Lester S., now five years old. He has a fine farm of eighty acres, with good buildings, besides his saw-mill, which he bought and rebuilt in 1859. There are two saws—one a circular board saw and the other a snap-dragon saw. He saws boards, pickets, staves, etc. He runs this mill about three months each year.

The father of John Davis was born in the town of Norridgewock, Maine, October 5, 1809. When about fifteen years of age he went to Oldtown, and after twenty years removed to Etna, where he now lives. His wife was Elizabeth Robinson, born at Vassalboro in 1813. To them were born nine children—Benjamin F., Samuel A., Julia, Henry P., George E., Isadore, John, Mary A., and Emma E. John Davis was born April 27, 1851. He married Clara Bradford, daughter of Peleg and Emily (Waugh) Bradford, October 22, 1876, and has one child. He is at present mail contractor from Exeter to Bangor.

William M. White was born in Hartland, Maine, in 1821. His father was a native of Pembroke, New Hampshire, and his mother of Hartland. Both are deceased. William M. was the first born; the other children were Jane, deceased; Mary Jane, deceased; and Lydia. William M. White married Keziah Huff, in 1849, and had a family of eight children: George died aged seven; Charles died aged twelve; Flavilla died in her twenty-sixth year; James married Nellie A. Towle, and has one child; Frank died at the age of ten months; Willard O. married Annie Davis and lives in Exeter; Hattie May, and Melvin reside at home.

Nathaniel Barker was born in the town of Exeter, November 27, 1814, and has passed his life thus far on the farm on which he was born. He served as Sheriff of the county for twenty-five years. His wife was Miss Elvira Grinnell, daughter of Mace and Rachel (Butters) Grinnell, to whom he was married April 22, 1840. She was born May 17, 1820. To them have been born six children; Mary E. resides at home; Charles F. died aged twenty years; Fred married Viola Shaw and has three children—Roy, Helen and Alice; Frank C. married Mary Fernald and has two children—Bernice and John; Celia N. married Francis Furguson, and died in Minneapolis, Minnesota, May 23, 1881, aged thirty; Alice B. resides at home.

Stephen Chase was born in Newburyport, Massachusetts, in 1789. When twenty-one years of age he moved to Concord, New Hampshire, and in 1832 removed to Conway in the same State, where he died in 1851. His wife, Esther Eastman, was born in Concord in 1788, and was married in 1811. They had a family of six children: James, Jacob E., Jonathan E., Chandler E., Samuel W. L., and Abby E. Doctor Samuel W. L. Chase was born in Concord, New Hampshire, January 21, 1821. He was first married to Susan Buswell, who died in 1852. For a second wife he married Rosanna Treat, who died in 1866. A third time he was married, to Martha A. Treat, who died in 1869. Again he married, Augusta A. Pease, who died in 1877. He was married to his present wife, Ella Gordon, daughter of Amos G., and Mary (Silver) Gordon, December 2, 1879. Dr. Chase has two children: Emma L., who married Walter S. Washburn and has one child, Arthur, who resides at home. Dr. Chase resides at Exeter Mills, where he is engaged in the practice of his profession.

Nelson Wheeler was born in Corinth in 1809. In 1844 he removed to Exeter, where he now resides. He has been engaged in merchandising, and has served as Postmaster and Justice of the Peace. His wife was Abigail B. Hill, born in Exeter in 1816, where she died at the age of fifty-two. Their children were: Abby E., Francis N., Roscoe L., and Rossie Lena. Abby married Thomas H. Wentworth, and has two children; Roscoe died aged six years; Rossie Lena married Dr. O. W. Stone, of Camden. Francis N. Wheeler was born in Corinth, March 11, 1844, and for the past ten years has been a physician and surgeon. September 5, 1873, he married Sarah E. Peirce, who was born December 1, 1841. Mrs. Wheeler is a daughter of Samuel and Harriet Mary (De Laittre) Peirce.

LEE.

DESCRIPTIVE.

The town of Lee is not quite thirty-three miles from Bangor, but three and a half miles from the Penobscot River at its nearest point along the northeast line of Lincoln, and a little less from the European & North American Railroad. It is on the stage-route from Lincoln Station, on that road, through the heart of the town to Topsfield in Washington county. It is in among towns and plantations that are still rather sparsely settled, but has itself a quite respectable population, in 1870 numbering almost one thousand. It is a regular six-mile-square township, containing about thirty-six square miles, or 23,040 acres. On the north it is bounded by Winn, on the east by Springfield, on the south by Township No. 3, in the First Range, and on the west by Lincoln. Webster Plantation corners with it at the northeast, Lakeville Plantation at the southeast, and Burlington at the southwest. For the northwest corner the dividing line between Winn and Lincoln runs off to the Penobscot.

The principal water of Lee is the Mattakeunk Pond, a fine sheet west of Lee post-office, lying somewhat in the shape of a isosceles triangle, with its base at the westward one and one-fifth miles long, and its perpendicular from the middle of this shore to the outlet about the same length. It has an area of one and one-half square miles. At the northwest angle a winding tributary of about two miles length flows in from the border of Lincoln. From the interior of that town comes a larger stream, but with a shorter flow in this town, which enters the pond about one-third of the way down its west shore. The waters of Mattakeunk make their way through a pretty broad outlet into and through Lee village, where they form the Mattakeunk Stream, known beyond East Winn post-office as the West Branch, which, after union with the East Branch, becomes again the Mattakeunk Stream, and flows into the Mattawamkeag River near the north line of Winn. The banks of this stream, for a mile, more or less, in width on each side for about four miles of its course in this town, are almost the only parts of Lee that are uninhabited.

In the southeast angle of the town is the Ware Pond, a narrow sheet about a mile long, closely parallel with another of equal width, but somewhat east of it, the two forming the headwaters of the Passadumkeag Stream, no other part of which flows in this town. Two little bays at the united head of these lakes receives a tributary, the easternmost an affluent in two branches, coming in from Springfield, and uniting a little way inside the Lee line; the other rises in a pretty large pond a mile to the northwest, and receives a tiny affluent about half-way to Ware Pond. The former pond has itself a very small affluent in two branches from the north. A petty lake a mile below Lee village sends a tributary thither to the outlet of Mattakeunk Pond, on its way receiving a mile-long tributary from another and very small pond east of its own source.

Two smallish ponds in the north part of Township No. 3 send their upper edges just inside the south boundary of Lee. Between them flows into No. 3 a small stream rising very near the little pond south of the post-office. Another, flowing about a mile in Lee, passes into No. 3 about midway between the head of the Passadumkeag and the nearest lake on the town line. Within a mile northeast of Lee village the Mattakeunk has two petty tributaries from the northwest, and one from the south. A mile and a half further, and quite near each other, two more come in from the east. Half a mile from the north line of the town a larger stream from the westward, with an affluent passing near School No. 8, enters the Mattakeunk. West of the heads of this tributary are the sources of another stream which flows about two miles north into Winn, which it crosses to a junction with the Penobscot.

The stage road from Lincoln post-office through Lee into Springfield is the most thickly settled up of any part of the town, except the road from Lee post-office south-east and south of Mattakeunk Pond, which is very densely settled east and west from School No. 5. This road makes an angle at the town line, about two-thirds of a mile from the southwest corner, and runs northwest and north to a junction with the stage road. Southeast of the pond, a mile from the village, a road branches off southeast and east, past School No. 8, to a north and south road running from near the south line of the town to the stage road a mile east of Lee post-office, and across it about a mile and a quarter further to the Town Farm, one-third of a mile north of School No. 2. Nearly one-half mile west of this school a road runs south of east into Springfield, putting forth a mile away a branch toward Ware Pond, which also presently runs into Springfield. The stage road is again crossed, two miles northwest of Lee village, by a north and south road starting near the northwest corner of the town, meeting, a mile below, the road from East Winn village, near School No. 7, and thence running across the stage road to the neighborhood of Mattakeunk Pond, where it turns southwest, and ends near the town line a mile west of the pond. A north and south road also connects East Winn with Lee post-office. It is connected with the stage road by a two-mile highway on the west, making a right-angle about half-way, and reaching the main road a mile northwest of the village. On the other side of the Mattakeunk Stream a third road crosses the northeast angle of Lee for about one and one-fourth miles. From the stage road at the east town line another wagon-way starts northward, and keeps the town line about two and one-half miles to a junction with the East Winn road. On this line road, a mile above the stage route, a new post-office has been established of late years, and called North Lee.

At Lee village is the old post-office of the town, a Baptist and one other church, a public school-house, the building of the Lee Normal Academy, two cemeteries, a trotting park around the little Beaver Pond, with the Beaver Pond Stream flowing partly across it into the Pond, and a considerable number of mills, stores, and shops. It is a flourishing and very hopeful place.

HISTORICAL SKETCH.*

At the time of this writing, when the sad history of our second martyred President, James A. Garfield, has drawn the attention and sympathy of the civilized world, some slight attention has been called to Williams College, in Massachusetts, where he gave that study and received that disciplined mind fitting him for his heroic life work, so rudely cut short. In aid of that institution the State of Massachusetts granted (February 19, 1805) Township No. 4, Second Range north of Bingham's Purchase and east of the Penobscot River, afterwards Lee, the subject of this historical sketch. The deed was not recorded until February 15, 1820.

This grant was sold to different parties, — a majority to Nathaniel Ingersoll, of New Gloucester, Cumberland county, Maine, for which the college received, as appears by records in Massachusetts, the sum of $4,500.

The grant to the college was with the condition that thirty settlers were to be put on within three years, probably extended, as Ingersoll did not complete by himself, or to those he sold to, the settling duties before 1828, or as appears by the college conveying the township to John Webber on May 11, 1835. Webber lotted out the town in 1820, and seemed to have paid a debt of Ingersoll and other grantees to the college, or a trustee for them.

In 1822 Ingersoll began to perform these settling duties, and to that end he employed a man in Lowell to commence a clearing in Lee. This man, arriving at a point sloping Lee-ward and in good soil, thought he had reached the point intended and felled ten acres — the amount required. He then reported the same to Ingersoll, or agent, who was about to pay him, when, it being uncertain that the clearing was made in Lee, a man by the name of Harrison Strong was sent to investigate, who reported the land situated in Lincoln half-township.

In 1823 a clearing of ten acres was made on what is now the Harrison G. Rich place, in the southwest part of the town; and in 1824 Jeremiah Fifield and wife, of Howland; Thomas Lindsay, of Lowell; and Enoch Stone went to Lee and cleared up and planted the cutting made the year before.

Mrs. Lucy Fifield, wife of Jeremiah Fifield, afterwards

* By B. F. Fernald, Esq., of Winn.

received one hundred acres of land as a reward for being the first woman to penetrate the wilderness of Lee. Their son Abram still resides in Lee, and Jeremiah lives in Winn, while a daughter married Joseph Deer and lives in Winn. March 13, 1825, Jeremiah Fifield, with his family, located on the ridge on a farm now occupied by Solomon and George Crocker. This ridge lies on a cross-road lying between the Winn and Lee and the Lee and Lincoln roads.

In March, 1826, John Tucker, of Dexter, Maine, came to Lee and located west of the Ames lot, now connected with the Nehemiah Kneeland place. In June, Samuel Parker, of Lowell, located on the Kneeland place; and about the same time Isaac Hobbs, of Howland, located on what is now the Ames lot.

In 1827 the first white child born in the town saw light — Mary Lucy, daughter of John Tucker. She is now the wife of John Varney, and resides in Lee.

A year previous to this, Thomas Lindsay, one of the 1824 pioneers, was married to Lucy, daughter of Jeremiah Fifield. This was the first marriage in Lee.

Judith, a daughter of Samuel Parker, was the first child to die in Lee; while the first death of an adult was that of a Mr. Robinson, of Sidney.

Mr. Fifield built a log-house, warm and home-like, as they often are, and here the first school in Lee was taught by his daughter Lucy. Among the first male teachers were John Towle, son of Joseph Towle, of Bangor; Benjamin Arnold, and John Jackson. The Tuckers, Parkers, and Stones still reside in Lee and vicinity.

At this early day there were two outlets to civilization, but when they were made could not be ascertained. The United States Government cut a road through the woods from below Lincoln mill. It ran through Lee and Springfield, direct to Houlton, and was used for the transportation of troops and rafters, and for getting supplies to the troops at Houlton. This road was followed by the county road, now known as the Lee and Lincoln road, and west of Lincoln as the Lee and Springfield road. In the deed it is called the St. Johns road.

Oaks and Cowan had been largely engaged in lumbering in Springfield, and on what is now Webster Plantation, east of Winn, and they had a winter road start from where Joseph Snow had located in Winn, in 1820, about a mile from the Lincoln line, and running back, very soon struck the town line between Winn and Lee. Following this it very soon struck the line between Springfield and Webster Plantation, and so on to the Mattagordus Stream, where Oaks and Cowan were lumbering in 1826-27. Mattagordus Stream emptied into the Mattawamkeag less than a mile above the village of Kingman. This Oaks and Cowan road was used for a while by a mail carrier to Houlton. Starting from Snow's with the mail bag over his shoulder, he trudged along this road till he reached the Mattawamkeag, beyond Prentiss. From here he rowed to Haynesville, where he again took up his journey overland to Houlton. Over this road the immigrants came into Lee with their families in the snow. This route can be traced indistinctly now, though the new forest growth has about effaced the old emigrant road.

In the meantime, from the time Ingersoll had commenced the clearing on the Rich place in 1823 he had been actively engaged in inducing settlers to locate in Lee, and had negotiated a large number of tracts from two hundred and fifty to one thousand acres in extent to different parties, but had not yet performed his settling duties sufficient to obtain a deed, and in fact did not until 1828. In 1825 the college sold to Samuel I. Mallett, of Litchfield, Kennebec county, Maine, fifteen hundred acres for which he paid the same price as Ingersoll, on condition he should settle upon it. Mallett looked over the situation and concluded to put in some mills on the west branch of the Mattakeunk Stream, which crosses the Lee and Springfield road at the village of Lee. This stream has its rise in the pond about a mile square, just back of the village, near where the first clearing in Lee was made. This sale was made June 5, 1827, Mallett giving a mortgage to the college for the payment, which, however, he failed to pay, though he performed his settling duties as agreed. The same year Mallett and James D. Merrill, of Litchfield, who had purchased from Roger Merrill a claim for two hundred and fifty acres, joined their means and built a saw-mill in 1827 and a grist-mill in 1828, on the Mattakeunk Stream, a few rods west of the crossing of the Winn and Lincoln roads at the centre of the village. A saw- and grist-mill still stands on the stream at the village, not on the location of the first one, however.

During the years 1826-27-28, a large number of settlers came into town, especially in 1827, so that by the following year Ingersoll had with Mallett completed his settling duties, and obtained his deed of the township from the State of Massachusetts.

In 1826-27 came thirty settlers, of whom now are left only Godfrey Jackson, who came from Sidney, Kennebec county, and who was eighty-five years of age, June 22, 1881, a near neighbor of Alpheus Hale, who differs from him in age only a few months.

Mallett's settlers were: Samuel Mallett, James D. Merrill, David Maxwell, Caleb Wilbor, Godfrey Jackson, Hiram Staples, and William Randall.

Ingersoll's settlers were: Bradley Blake, John Jackson, Enoch Stone, Thomas Lindsay, Jeremiah Fifield, Samuel Parker, John Tucker, Joel Barnard, Captain Benjamin Arnold, Alpheus Hale, Samuel Moulton, Joseph Hanscom, Joseph Smith, John Carpenter, Jabez Norton, Benjamin Whitten, and Moses Thule.

Among the other early settlers were: Alvah Tibbets, Joseph and Aaron Rollins, Winslow and Jeremiah Staples, John Lunt, John Moss, Alvord Cushman, George Trask, David Henry, Peleg Jones, Albert Getchell, William Doylers, Captain J. W. Hall, John Snyder, John Mallett, David Dyer, John B. Lidden, Benjamin Jackson, Alexander Potter, David Balley, Stephen Lee, Elisha Brown, and John Gott.

In 1829 Benjamin Whitten came from Litchfield, and located about a mile and a half from the village on the road to Lincoln, a near neighbor to Jackson and Hall. He was afterwards a contractor to get out the timber for the Mattawamkeag bridge, near a brook running into the Mattawamkeag, now called Whitten Brook. His widow, now eighty-four years of age, is still living with her son Chester, in Lee, in the enjoyment of a happy old age. Chester, her son, is now Town Clerk and Director of Lee Normal Academy.

One of the most active business men of Lee was Arthur Prentiss, who came from Oxford to Paris, and was a trader in Lee, and blacksmith. He also built the Elm House building, and kept the first hotel in Lee. He was a cousin of the late Henry Prentiss, of Bangor, also the first trader in Lee, with his brother Addison.

Godfrey Jackson, above named, was one of those who were Mallett's settlers. He came from Sidney in 1827, and being a skillful carpenter, framed the Mallett mills. He made a location near the mills, what is now the Tuck place; he afterwards, through sickness in his family, had his attention called to medicine, and took up the study and soon completed a course at a medical college, from which he returned to Lee, and became the first settled physician. As an instance of the old man's former strength and vigor, it may be related that in his lifetime in Lee he caught twenty-two bears and one wolf.

Somewhere during the next decade, two important lawsuits occurred, which greatly interested the settlers in Lee, and lasted for twelve years in the State and United States Courts. Nathaniel Ingersoll, the purchaser of the College grant, conveyed his titles in Lee to Joseph E. Foxcroft, a resident of New Gloucester, who had been a member of the Massachusetts Legislature, and thought to have been a member of the Legislature which gave the Lee grant. When Maine became a State Mr. Foxcroft became a member of the Maine Legislature. He soon brought suit for the Mallett mortgage, which then remained unpaid; and obtained judgment before Judge Shepley for his claim against Mallett and against the settlers on Mallett's land.

Previous to these suits Ingersoll had by many expedients endeavored to obtain from the settlers pay for his land sold them, or for the land on which they had made improvements, but they in many instances declared that they had paid enough. They felt harassed by Ingersoll and his agents, and in more than one instance gave evidence of those sentiments by acts hardly to be misunderstood, and yet not unmingled with the ludicrous.

On one occasion Ingersoll had gone to Lee with a deputy sheriff, Sanders, from Passadumkeag, and had taken a lot of goods which one William Doble was hauling out to Lincoln for him, when crack went a rifle from the woods near by, and the officer's horse fell under him. The driver unhitched his team, and cleared for Lincoln over the hill top near by, with Ingersoll and the officer, leaving the goods and the vehicle in the woods. Soon after one William Randall, living in Lee, who was something of a resident agent, went out to Lincoln to get some word from Ingersoll about his affairs in Lee, as he (Ingersoll) rather feared to come back to Lee, and Randall, as he got along to the horse, was trying with the aid of his knife to get the shoes and nails off the dead horse. While intent on this, a bullet struck the frog of the horse's foot, and Randall incontinently fled, not even taking his knife, which he afterwards sought for in company with a friend. For years after that horse's feet were to be seen on the roadside fence near by as a reminder of the troublous times in Lee that tried men's souls and horses' feet.

On another occasion, while the tenantry were itching to give Mr. Ingersoll a personal castigation, the wife of John Tucker, a big, brawny, muscular woman, of whom there are innumerable anecdotes told, volunteered to perform a "birch withing," for which she was to receive a new gown or other article. So, hearing he was in town, she got her birches and placed them behind the door, and when he called she very cordially invited him in and then gave him an unmerciful withing. Ere the morning sun illumined their household she had her gown, but Ingersoll took her back to the Police Court at Bangor, where she was fined one cent and costs, which were paid by her neighbors in Lee, while she worked in a hotel to pay her way at Bangor and return.

As appears by a suit of Joseph E. Foxcroft vs. David E. Barnes, to recover the westerly half of Lot 12, Fifth Range in Lee, the Trustees of the college conveyed the township, May 11, 1835, to John Webber, and Nathaniel Ingersoll had conveyed all his interest in the township to John Webber on July 19, 1835, and John Webber, on June 19, 1835, conveyed one-half the lands which he had purchased of Nathaniel Ingersoll and of the Trustees of Williams College, to Joseph E. Foxcroft, of New Gloucester.

An abstract furnished by A. W. Paine, Esq., of Bangor, one of the counsel for the Mallett land and tenants, in the several lawsuits which involved nearly all the settlers' claims in town, may afford a clearer idea of the situation and the principles involved:

The township of Lee was originally granted by the Legislature of Massachusetts to Williams College, and by the College sold in individual parcels to various individuals, as occasion offered, but mostly to parties in Cumberland county. The town was incorporated in 1832. Soon after its incorporation, in 1834, a series of lawsuits was commenced, which lasted for about a dozen years. The litigation pertained mainly to the two lots No. 11, in the Fourth and Fifth Ranges, though several other lots were involved. They were the lots on which the mill privileges were located, and then owned and occupied by Samuel T. Mallett and his sons. The village was built mostly on these lots.

The point in dispute was in many respects simple, though calling out a great amount of legal learning, both on the part of counsel and courts. The original grant was made subject to the condition that the grantee should within three years place on the township thirty settlers. Mallett, having become interested in the town and settled there, had bought and paid for 1,500 acres, with the purpose of performing one-fourth the conditions of getting settlers, the acres known being in common. He afterward took a deed of 6,000 acres, made in common, and mortgaged the same back to the College, describing the land as "The same this day conveyed to me and subject to the settlers' lots as land drawn on plan."

A proprietors' meeting was then held to make partition of the lands among the owners, at which meeting fifteen lots were assigned to settlers of the fifteen hundred acres, the Lots 11, in Fourth and Fifth Ranges, being a part, but the lots were not marked as such on the plan referred to in the deed, Mallett having thus seventy-five hundred acres in all, six thousand of which were subject to the mortgage. The mortgage was produced, and the holder then filed a petition for partition in the State Court, which was resisted on the ground that the mortgage did not cover the settlers' lots. The case was severely contested, but the court overruled the objections and granted the petition, and then affirmed the partition, which assigned the lots in question to the petitioner. Other suits were brought, all of which met with a like fate, the court being fixed in the purpose of dooming all the settlers' lots owned at the time of the mortgage, as forming a part of the land included therein.

In 1842 Mallett, having fought the State Court for some eight years without success, by advice of counsel, assigned all his interests to his son David, who moved to New Hampshire and brought his suit of right for the two lots in question in the Circuit Court of the United States, where it was tried before Judge Story with success to his side. From his decision the case went up to the Supreme Court of the United States, which in January, 1846, affirmed the judgment of the Court below and gave Mr. Mallett his land free from all adverse claim; thus overruling the whole series of decisions in the State Court, and establishing his title as good and valid. W. P. Fessenden and A. W. Paine were counsel for Mallett in United States Court, and Judge Preble, Fessenden, and Deblois, for Foxcroft. In the State Court F. Allen and T. P. Chandler appeared for Mallett, and Abbott & Rogers for the College.

On February 2, 1832, Township No. 4, in the Second Range of townships east of the Penobscot River and north of Bingham's Purchase, was incorporated into a town by name of Lee. The act of incorporation is on the records of Lee attested by John A. Hyde, Town Clerk.

Wherein Lee obtained its name thus runneth the legend: Had it been called for its most prominent name of river or stream it would have been doubtless called Mattakeunk, but bears better a short English name. It is said that Stephen Lee, a worthy citizen of the borough, suggested, as some say, his name, while others say the modest gentleman suggested the name of our patriot Revolutionary General Lee, and to insure the success of his patriotic suggestion offered to treat with a barrel of rum, which in those days was not so dear in price as at present, and doubtless was sacrificed, though my informant maketh not certain that part of the story, but rather inclineth to that fact.

The first town meeting was held April 11, 1832, at James Merrill's barn for the election of officers. Abiel Cushman was elected Clerk; Winslow Staples, Joseph W. Hall and Caleb Wilbor, Selectmen, Assessors, and Overseers of the Poor; Samuel Marlton, Treasurer; and Albert S. Getchell, Constable. Other town officers were chosen the 25th of the same month, and the following moneys raised: $1,000 for highways, $150 for schools and $75 to defray town charges.

In 1832 Lee had sixty-one voters.

The town has always made good provision for schools, suitable amounts being voted year by year for their support.

March 14, 1845, the State Legislature passed an act incorporating Lee Normal Academy. The incorporators were Joseph Mallett, Shephard Bean, William Douglass, John Gott, James Merrill, Liberty W. Bacon, Arthur Prentiss, Levi Moulton, and Abiel Cushman. At their first meeting, May 3, 1845, William Douglass was chosen President of the Board of Managers, Shephard Bean Secretary, James Merrill Vice-President, and Joseph Mallett Treasurer. Trustees were added, and committees appointed for the selecting of building site and material; and a resolution adopted looking to the opening of a school the September following. In 1847 a seal was adopted, representing a school-room with students seated and the preceptor at his desk with a book in his hands in the attitude of communicating instruction, with the name Lee Normal Academy on its margin. Previous to the erection of the Academy, the people of Lee got together one July 4th and put up the frame of a high school-house near the Elm House, but did nothing more about it.

The Principals of the academy, in order of service, have been: Joseph M. True, William S. Green, Mr. Blackwell, Daniel Crosby, Elliot Walker, Jabez H. Woodman, S. W. Matthews, Joseph M. True again, A. N. Willey, G. A. Stewart, George W. Hall, J. H. Sawyer, G. A. Stewart again, Marion Douglass, and Leander H. Moulton, who is now serving the institution.

Among the students at the school, who subsequently became more or less prominent, are the following: C. A. Cushman, attorney; J. E. Estes, attorney; L. A. Stanwood, attorney; P. A. Getchell, Judge of Probate, Bangor; Horace Hanson, M. D.; J. L. Budge, M. D.; Isaiah Alden, M. D.; Fred Smith, editor; Madison J. Bowler, editor; Joseph Bowler, Roswell Leavitt, Cyrus A. Hanson, Benjamin Averill, Representatives in State Legislature; Hiram Stephens, County Commissioner; G. S. Bean, Warden State Prison. Chester H. Whittier is Director of the Academy. The number of scholars in the town in 1881 was 355.

The Springfield line road was accepted in 1845.

An agent was voted for to sell liquors.

Three hundred dollars was appropriated to build an upper story to the town hall; it was also voted to admit all religious denominations, without distinction, to the hall.

The churches seemed not to have been in accord as to the use of the hall, so that, in 1846, by a vote, one-fourth of the time the use of the hall was given to the Calvinistic Baptists, the Methodists and Congregationalists, the Universalists, the Free-will Baptists.

In 1849 the sum of $400 was voted for the support of schools.

Again in 1851 the town voted $400 for schools.

The most revolting murders in the annals of crime were committed April 7, 1859. Marshall Potter murdered his mother, his brothers Oliver and Alexander, and a nephew, Albert, a cripple. He then burned the house, but the mutilated bodies of his victims were proof against him, though in the excitement of the moment he was allowed to escape. He was shortly afterwards arrested in St. Stephens, New Brunswick, whither he had fled, and under a life sentence in the State prison is said to have died some five or six years since.

Lee has ever been a strongly Democratic town, yet, during the war, a bounty of $200 was offered for volunteers to fill the quota of the town.

MILITARY HISTORY OF LEE.

Lee, perhaps, cannot be called a leading military town, though many of its citizens have shouldered the musket and gone forth to fight the battles of our country.

Among the early settlers we find Nicholas Coffin, a Revolutionary soldier, besides a large number who served in the War of 1812, but they are all now dead, and a list of their names cannot be readily obtained. The town was largely represented in the Aroostook war by men who volunteered at the first sound of alarm. In the Mexican war three men went from this town—Timothy H. Tucker, Daniel Hobbs, and Henry Welch. Hobbs and Welch died in service. Tucker was wounded, but returned and served again in the last war. Charles P. Tidd, whose father then resided in Lee, was with John Brown at his raid on Harper's Ferry. Tidd escaped, enlisted in a Massachusetts regiment at the outbreak of the Rebellion, and died in service.

When the forces of slavery and secession waged war against our Union, the people of Lee did not heartily support the Government, but in many ways discouraged enlistment. A single incident will show the spirit of many of her people at that time. In 1862, at a meeting of the militia of the town for the election of company officers, a recruiting sergeant, who was enlisting men for a company then forming at Lincoln, announced his business and asked for some volunteers from Lee to join his company. Thereupon a prominent citizen arose, and with all the eloquence he could command portrayed the dangers and privations of a soldier's life, telling his fellow-citizens he hoped they would not be frightened into enlisting, and not to fear a draft, for there was no power this side of Heaven that could draft a man and carry him out of the State. This speech brought down a perfect storm of applause. Another man came to his feet and denounced such disloyal talk and manifestations, and asked those present not to bring dishonor on the memory of their Revolutionary fathers by thus sending words of cheer and comfort to the enemy. He closed, but no cheer or word of approbation greeted him.

No attempt was ever made to raise a company for the war in this town, but a goodly number enlisted, as the military roster will show. Every man who went to the war enlisted as a private soldier, and whatever higher rank he attained was gained in the field. The larger part of them enlisted the first part of the war, but later, when each town was required to furnish its quota, a draft was usually resorted to here. During 1864 and 1865 three drafts were made from this town with the following result: Total number drafted, 84; entered service, 12; furnished substitutes, 2; failed to report, 47. Most of the latter found their way across the lines into New Brunswick; a part of whom formed a settlement there known as "Skedaddler's Ridge."

A list of the soldiers who went from Lee is given in the military history of Penobscot county in another part of this volume.

No better soldiers entered the service than those who went from Lee. Wherever they went they made an honorable record; and their share in the hardships of war—the march, the battle field, the lingering pain and death in Northern hospitals, the agony endured in the starvation prison pens of the South—was all cheerfully and patiently borne, and their patriotism and valor are worthy to be placed side by side with the long line of patriots who have defended our liberties from the days of Washington to the present time.

A few incidents connected with the war may be of interest.

When the first call for troops was made in the spring of 1861, Horace F. Hanson heard the news while at work on the drive. He immediately stuck his handspike into the bank and started for the war. After many hair-breadth escapes he safely returned, and is now one of the most respected physicians in Bangor.

At the battle of the Wilderness, when General Lee was hurling his forces against our lines and pressing them back, Sergeant Joseph W. Burke, of the Sixth Maine Battery, occupied a road running at right angles to our lines through the dense thicket, with two pieces of artillery. On came the rebel horde pressing back our infantry, when an order was sent to Sergeant Burke to fall back and save his guns. Turning around he said: "Boys, let's give them a little more canister before we go." The road was soon cleared, then training their guns one to the right and the other to the left, they secured an enfilading fire on the advancing foe. Then the perfect storm of canister from the two pieces, which were handled with almost lightning rapidity, did terrific work, leaving the dead in windrows at every fire. The advance was checked and the position held. He saved his guns but did not fall back. For his gallantry he was promoted to first lieutenant.

During the fight on the Boynton road, October 27, 1864, Mott's division of Hancock's corps became partially broken up by an impetuous charge of rebel infantry. While General Hancock was re-forming his broken line, Charles J. House, then eighth sergeant in company E, First Maine Heavy Artillery, discovered a move on the part of the rebels to turn our left flank. Without hesitation he rallied twenty men of his company, and with them dashed forward one hundred and fifty yards to the front and left, secured an advantageous position and held it against ten times his own force, cutting off the retreat of two hundred rebel soldiers, and frustrating their attempt to turn our flank. Reinforcements coming up the two hundred were secured prisoners. With his men he then rushed forward and assisted in recapturing two pieces of artillery which had fallen into the hands of the enemy, then coolly marched his men back to their place in line. He was highly complimented by his commanding officer, and immediately promoted to first sergeant and recommended for a first lieutenant's commission, which he soon received.

INDUSTRIAL HISTORY.

The Mattawamkeag affords the only water-power in Lee, with but little fall throughout its whole course, which is in a northwesterly direction. The privilege of the village was early improved, a saw-mill and grist-mill being erected in 1827-28 by Merrill & Mallett. In 1840 the grist-mill machinery was removed to a mill about two and a half miles down stream, to which a road was opened. In 1850 the available machinery of this mill was moved back to the village, where it still remains.

In 1841 Calvin Barber, Dexter Merrill, and Levi B. Merrill built a clapboard mill, and in 1843 a saw-mill, about one and a half miles below the village; and in 1854 sold to Edward Bowler and Joseph Smith. In 1878 a new saw-mill was built by Charles Merrill, which still stands. In 1845 or 1846 William R. Gifford built a carding-mill, which was run by his son.

A small lake called Ware lies in the extreme southeast corner of the town, beginning in Springfield. The Mat-tawkeunk is dammed four times in Lee, and also bridged four times.

OTHER MATTERS.

There are no very prominent elevations in Lee, though the town is well diversified with hills, and quite an elevation back of the village has been named by the academy scholars Mt. Jefferson.

Lee was early made a field of labor for several religious denominations. About 1835 Rev. Samuel Lewis preached occasionally in Lee, and organized a Free-will Baptist church there, starting one in Chester at the same time. In 1838 he was succeeded by Levi Moulton, who was succeeded in turn by John Banks, William Doble, and James Knights. John Welch is the present preacher and has filled the position ten years.

In 1858 a church was built near the Academy by this society, with the aid of the Calvinist Baptists and the Methodists, at a cost of $1,500. The Methodists also organized a church in 1835, but have had no regular preaching for several years.

The first church in Lee was organized by the Rev. Mr. Dexter, of Dexter, Maine, a Calvinist Baptist, about 1831. The Rev. Walter Marshall, who preached there for several years, resided in Lee, and in 1839-40 was the Town Clerk. Rev. Alvin Messer also preached in Lee, where he resided for some time. The present pastor is the Rev. Sylvester Berse, of Chester. This church now has twenty-five members. The first resident minister was old Parson Sawyer, Congregationalist, who lived to be more than a century old. He resided in Township No. 4, in 1828, but was succeeded two or three years afterwards. Between 1850 and 1860 Charles H. Emerson was pastor, and a church, which cost about $6,000, was built. Although this fine edifice is in the centre of the village it is by no means flourishing and at present has no pastor.

In 1835 a Universalist church was formed, and the Rev. Amos Richards, E. W. Coffin, and J. C. Knowlton, preached for the members. Rev. Daniel Stickney came to Lee in 1846 and preached for five or six years. In 1850 he was Town Clerk.

A church was formed under the direction of Mark Chase, who was succeeded by Rev. Mr. Butterfield, and in 1875 by Rev. James T. Carr, their last pastor, who preached there for two years. He moved to East Winn in the fall of 1881. They have a membership of about forty.

The first physicians here were Godfrey Jackson, who yet lives here; then Jesse Howe, from Norway, came in 1835 and remained ten years. He is now dead. In 1838 came Liberty W. Bacon, from Turner, Maine. He held many municipal positions and fifteen years after moved to Illinois. Dr. Bornham came in 1848, and kept the Elm House hotel, and practiced his profession for two years. In 1858 Charles Merrill, of Springfield, resided in Lee and practiced there until his death in 1875. Dr. Lorin Bridge was educated in Lee and removed to one of the Western States. In 1876 Dr. J. Henry Lindsey moved to Lee and is still practicing there.

Addison Prentiss came from Foxcroft in 1837 and went into trade with his brother Arthur and the practice of law. He practiced law here from that time until 1850. A view of Lee on a page of the town records made while he was Clerk, attests to his artistic tendencies; while his efforts for the incorporation and aid of Lee Academy attest his public spirit. He is now living in Worcester, Massachusetts. Elliot Walker was a student in Prentiss' office, and a teacher in Lee Academy. He never practiced here but moved to Newport and is now Judge of Probate for Penobscot county. Joseph H. Perkins practiced law here but now lives in Bangor. From 1850 to 1860 Henry C. Field, who had removed from Lincoln to Lee, practiced law here, and then returned to Lincoln to die. In 1869 Charles A. Cushman, who had been in trade with his father, Abiel Cushman, an early settler, was admitted to the Bar and has practiced here since.

In 1828-29 Roswell Adams was the blacksmith here, but he then removed to Lincoln to work for the mill buildings. Moses Thurlow succeeded him. In 1840 Timothy Clifford and James Simmons, in 1845 Thaddeus Foss, of Vassalboro, and in 1850 Mr. Dean were the blacksmiths here. In 1847 James T. Bridge succeeded Clifford up to 1863, and again, after failing in trade, went to blacksmithing some three or four years ago and still is so engaged. In 1867 Albert Pickering commenced blacksmithing, and is still thus in business.

The Postmasters at Lee village have been about as follows: Samuel T. Mallett, James H. Bowler, Joseph Mallett, Isaac Hacker, Abner H. Gerrish, Albert S. Getchell, Gustavus S. Bean, George H. Haskell, Charles J. House, Charles A. Cushman, George H. Haskell, the present Postmaster; at North Lee, Albert K. Lewis, Willie Estes, David Estes, and Edwin A. Reed, the present incumbent.

In 1833 Isaac Hacker came from Palermo, Maine, and commenced trade on the Springfield side of the Stream, having James H. Bowler, now of Bangor, as clerk afterwards. Bowler was with Hacker till after 1840, when Bowler went to Lincoln in May, having first built the present Burke store and Charles Mallett's house close by, and Hacker took as partner Abner H. Gerrish to about 1845, when Hacker moved to Fort Fairfield, and some two or three years ago was killed on the railroad in New Brunswick, and Gerrish took in Charles Mallett; then Gerrish took in as partner Gustavus S. Bean, son of Shepherd Bean, long a Deputy Sheriff at Bangor and now Warden of the Maine State prison. Gerrish died in 1848, and as soon as his affairs were closed up Bean took in George H. Haskell. The pioneer tradesman here was Arthur Prentiss, whose store was in what is now called the Mill House, where Elder John Welch lives. He got his goods by boating them to the falls and then hauling them to Lee. In 1833 Isaac Hacker came from Palermo, Maine, and commenced trade on the Springfield side of the stream. Bean removed to Bangor, and sold out to Joseph W. Burke in 1867. They failed in 1877. Joseph W. Burke continued trade in the same place, and Haskell commenced trade in the Clifford-Bridge store. He is now there and is also postmaster. In 1858 George Clifford built a store and was succeeded in 1863 by James I. Bridge. In 1840 Abiel Cushman built the present grange store, and in 1850 the firm became A. Cushman & Son. In 1865 Oren Coffin traded in it, and since 1870 the Forest Grange No. 125, have occupied it. In 1850 J. H. Perkins built the George B. Wetherbee store and traded there until 1860. It was occupied by C. J. House & Bros. after the war until Wetherbee started a hardware store there. In 1870 C. J. House and Albert P. Mallett built a store towards Lee from the cross roads, and traded there until 1873 and failed. Since 1875 H. Coffin has been in business there. Edward Bowler built a store at Bowler's Corner some two miles from Lee. He traded there for ten years. For the latter part of the time Joseph Smith was his partner, at one time ran the lower mill on the Mattakeunk. Albert K. Lewis for a couple of years had a store at North Lee, adjoining Springfield, where he was also Postmaster. Some slight trade has been carried on by members of Elisha Bradley's family on the Springfield road, where a tannery has since been built, and burnt down by lightning.

About 1840 George Haskell kept a hotel in what is called the Buffalo House, on the Springfield road. Arthur Prentiss built the Elm House and kept hotel in it until about 1845, and then leased it to Dr. Bornham, who kept it until about 1851 when it was sold to Joseph M. True, the preceptor of the Academy, in whose family it has been ever since. About 1847 the Academy boarding house was kept as a hotel by Hosea Ricker, in 1860, by Joseph Crandalmire, and in 1870 by George Blanchard, since which time it has been vacant.

SETTLEMENT NOTES.

Samuel Rowe, who has lived in Lee about twelve years, is a native of Hebron, Oxford County, Maine. He is a son of Benjamin and Hannah Rowe (nee Hannah Decoster). They had ten children, all of whom grew to maturity except one. Their names were Priscilla (deceased), Louisa (deceased), Sarah, Caroline (deceased), Samuel, Betsey, Chloe (deceased), Emily, Jane, and Hubbard. Benjamin Rowe lived to be eighty-four and died about fifteen years since. Samuel Rowe, the oldest son, was born May 6, 1811, and spent his boyhood on the farm. On becoming of age he bought a farm in Sumner, Oxford county, where he lived four years. In 1837 he moved to Springfield, Maine, and lived eleven years, after which he went to No. 7 Washington county, and lived about twenty years. In 1869 he came here to Lee and settled where he now lives, about two miles from the village. He married Deborah A. Merrill daughter of Jeremiah and Priscilla Merrill. They have had nine children, of whom eight are living, viz: Cyrus A., now in California; Clara E., wife of P. B. Comstock, of Reno, Nevada; Priscilla J., now Mrs. Otis H. Scribner, of Lambert's Lake, in Maine; Charlotte B., wife of Lyman Scribner, of California; Julia A., wife of N. P. Sweet, Lincoln; Lloyd D., deceased; Louisa M., wife of B. D. Averill, of Prentiss; George, now in Clark's Island, St. George, Maine, and Ella O., wife of Frank C. Stevens, of Lee. While in Washington county Mr. Rowe was for many years one of the Selectmen of his town.

Mr. Walter Coffin, of Lee, one of the first settlers in the neighborhood where he now lives, came here from Belfast, Maine. He is a son of Nicholas Coffin, who came here from New Hampshire. Nicholas was a Revolutionary soldier and present at the surrender of Cornwallis, at Yorktown. He married for his first wife Mary Heath. His second wife, mother of Walter Coffin, was Lydia Lemon. By his first wife he had two daughters, Catharine and Susan, and by his second wife two sons, Walter and Nicholas N., of Lincoln. Nicholas Coffin died in 1850. Walter Coffin was born May 22, 1811; his father was a farmer and he was brought up on the farm. One year he lived in Enfield, but settled on his present farm in 1832, before there was a road through the neighborhood. He married Nancy W. Clark, daughter of Ichabod and Mary Clark. They have had sixteen children, of whom twelve are living, viz: Emily, Elizabeth, Mary E. (deceased), Freeman, Nancy, Cyrus, Walter, Washington, Orrin (deceased), Henry, Engene, Vesta, Madora (deceased), Abbie, Fred, and one who died in infancy not named. Mr. Coffin lives about three miles from Lee, on the road that leads through the half township to Lincoln.

Philip Blake, of Lee, was born August 14, 1811. He is a son of Bradbury Blake, a native of Mt. Vernon, Maine. His mother's name was Abigail Norcross. Bradbury Blake had ten children, all of whom lived to manhood and womanhood. Their names were Paul, deceased; Sophia, deceased; Philip; Prudilla; Nancy, deceased; Permelia, deceased; Abigail; Catharine; Joan; and Elvira, deceased. Bradbury Blake died April 30, 1870. Mrs. Blake died about eighteen months previous. Philip Blake, subject of this sketch, has always lived on the farm where he now lives, about ten miles from the village of Lee. He married for his first wife Maranda Chandler, who died in 1847, and married for his second wife Miss Betsey Lancaster, daughter of Elihu and Sarah Lancaster. Mr. Blake has two children by his first wife —Llewellyn, of Lee, and Philip Chandler, of Hersey township. Mr. Blake has four children now living by his second wife—Clara A., wife of Walter Coffin, Jr., of Lee; Dennis and True, now in Washington Territory; Dearborn P., now at home. Mr. Blake has served as one of the Selectmen of his town at different times.

George H. Haskell, postmaster and merchant at Lee, was born April 7, 1833. His parents, George and Betsey Haskell, were natives of New Gloucester, Maine. George Haskell had five children—Elizabeth, widow of the late Abner H. Gerrish; Lucia A., now Mrs. G. S. Bean, of Thomaston, Maine; Mary W., deceased wife of Bohan Field, of Washington Territory; George H., and Albert, deceased. Mr. Haskell died in 1881, his wife having died in 1875. George H. came to this town when seven years of age, with his parents, and has always lived here. Since arriving at manhood he has been engaged in the mercantile business here. He married Miss Sarah Bowler, daughter of Edward Bowler, of Lee. They have six children—Mary A., Nellie B., Alice E., George E., Harold, and James B., all at home. Mr. Haskell has served as Town Clerk of this town, and is now Postmaster, which office he has held for about seventeen years. He keeps a general stock of merchandise at his place on the principal street in the village.

Joseph W. Burke, dealer in general merchandise and lumber in Lee, this county, is a son of Thomas and Sally Burke, of Litchfield, Maine. Thomas Burke was a son of Samuel Burke of Topsham, Maine; Mrs. Burke was a native of Bath, the daughter of Joel Ham. Thomas and Sally Burke had eleven children, six sons and five daughters, all of whom lived to maturity, and seven of whom are now living—Mary, deceased; John, deceased; James, now of Lee; Nancy, wife of A. Fifield, of Lee; Mark L., now in Leadville, Colorado; Lucy, deceased wife of Samuel Flagg, of New Hampshire; Rachel, now Mrs. William Jones, of Dutch Flat, California; Lydia, now Mrs. A. M. Jewell, of San Francisco, California; Joseph W.; Thomas, deceased; and Nelson, also deceased. Thomas Burke, Sr., died in 1873; Mrs. Burke is still living in this village being now eighty-eight years old. Joseph Burke was born January 30, 1831, and at the age of seventeen went to sea. He followed the sea two years, visiting England, Wales, Holland and Belgium. In 1849 he went to California and engaged in mining, at which he remained two years. He returned to Litchfield in 1851 and engaged in farming, which he followed two years, when he came to Lee and engaged in teaming to Bangor, which he followed until 1862 when he went into the army. He remained in the army until the close of the war, connected with the Sixth Maine Battery. He was wounded at Gettysburg, and in hospital six weeks. He enlisted as a private, and was promoted to first lieutenant ere the close of the war. He was with his regiment in every engagement. At the close of the war he again engaged in teaming, which he followed until 1867 when he opened a store in Lee. He is also engaged in supplying and lumbering. Mr. Burke has served as Selectman, and is at present Town Treasurer; and is also one of the Board of County Commissioners.

He married Maria L. Crandallmire, of Lee. They have four children—Clarence C., now with his father in business, Mabel, Edith, and Alice.

Cyrus A. Hanson, of Lee, is a son of John and Paulina Hanson. John Hanson had three children—Horace, now a physician in Bangor; Lizzie, deceased; and Cyrus, the eldest of the family. Cyrus Hanson was born February 22, 1835, in Harrison, Maine. He spent his boyhood on a farm and always has been a farmer; he also worked at the mason's trade part of the time. After becoming of age he went to California, where he remained about five years. He came to Lee in 1861, and enlisted in the army in 1862. On returning he was drafted and went again for a short time, being discharged for disability in 1863. In 1864 he bought the place where he now resides near the village of Lee, and where he has since lived. Mr. Hanson has held various town offices, and is now Chairman of the Board of Selectmen, a member of which board he has been many years. He married Mary Mallett, daughter of William and Sally Mallett, of Lee, who were among the first settlers in town. They have seven children—Lizzie, Alberta, Annie, James W., Willie, Cyrus F., and Rowena May, the baby. In 1878 he was elected to the Legislature, and served in that body during the winters of 1878 and 1879.

America W. Ames is a son of James and Margaret Ames, for a sketch of whose life and family see that of James G. Ames. America W. Ames was born June 20, 1820. He came here with his father in 1835 and felled the first trees on the place where he now resides. The next year the family moved here. He married Ruth G. Jackson, daughter of Godfrey and Cyrene Jackson. They have two sons, viz: Foster E. and Harris. Mr. Ames has held the offices of Selectman and Town Treasurer of his town several years. He lives on a part of the old homestead. He owns seventy-five acres of land.

Godfrey Jackson, of Lee, is a son of John Jackson, a native of Sidney in this State. John Jackson was a son of John Jackson, Sr. He married for his first wife Dorcas Savage, who lived seven years and died childless. Mr. Jackson married for his second wife Ruth Godfrey, by whom he had seven children, viz: Godfrey, Benjamin, Jemima, Sylvia, John, Ruth and Joan. Godfrey Jackson, the oldest son of this family, was born June 22, 1796. On becoming of age he settled in Gardiner, Maine, where he lived about seven years, engaged as house carpenter. From here he went to Merimichi and lived three years, working as masterworkman in building a jail for the Provincial Government. From there he came to Lee, in 1826, and framed the first saw-mill that was built in this town, which was at that time called No. 4, not being incorporated. He studied medicine and practiced here for about twenty years. Mr. Jackson married Cyrene Hall, of West Waterville, Maine, by whom he had seven children, viz: Mary, now Mrs. Lowell, of Springfield, Maine; Elizabeth, wife of Captain Lowe, of Maryland; Joan, wife of James Ames of Lee; Edward B., now of Springfield, Maine; William, deceased in the army; Ruth, wife of A. W. Ames, of Lee, and Augusta, now Mrs. William Bagley. Mrs. Jackson died many years since and Mr. Jackson is now living with his third wife, whose name was Paulina B. Towle, formerly from Farrington, Maine. She had three sons, Daniel, of Lee; B. H. Towle, of Sherman, Maine; and A. B. Towle, of Lee. Mr. Jackson was in the War of 1812, and a physician in the late war. He has been a great hunter in his day, and killed twenty-two bears besides other large game. He is now in his eighty-sixth year.

One of the early settlers in this county was Captain James Budge, who came from Massachusetts and settled in the present town of Brewer, or Eddington. He had four sons: James, a sea captain; Thomas, Daniel, and Francis H. Francis H. Budge, father of James T., married Abigail Smith, of Hermon. He lived in several towns in this county—Garland, Levant, Glenburn (formerly called Dutton), Springfield, and No. 4 (now called Lakeville), where he died in 1874. Mrs. Budge died in 1848. James and Abigail Budge had ten children, eight of whom lived to maturity, viz: James T., John S., now of Springfield, Maine; George B., in Springfield; Daniel, also of Springfield; Gibson S., now of Lakeville, Maine; Charles L., deceased; Arthur P., now in Minneapolis, Minnesota; and Harriet M., of Bangor. James T. Budge, the oldest of this family, was born July 25, 1824, in Levant, Maine. He spent his early days on the farm, and in early manhood learned the blacksmith's trade. After becoming of age he worked at that business about sixteen years in this town. In 1863 he engaged in trade and continued at that business for fifteen years, when he sold out and again went into blacksmithing with his son, which business he is now following. He married Nancy G. Clifford, daughter of George C. and Mary P. Clifford, of Dover, Maine. They have seven children living, having lost one. Their names are: Julia A., now Mrs. George W. Goodwin; James L., now in Sears, Michigan; Sophia E., wife of George D. Stockwell, of East Eddington; Melvin E., now with his father in business; Adella L.; George C., and Harriet S. The name of the one that died was Mary E. Mr. Budge has been Town Treasurer of his town, and Constable.

John E. Ludden is a son of John B. Ludden, originally from Turner, Maine. He was a son of Joseph Ludden. John B. Ludden married Hannah Woodbury.

They had six sons and two daughters, viz: Louisa, now Mrs. Hiram Stevens, of Carroll, Maine; Sydney, deceased; John E.; Sewall, Cornelia, Lewis V. B., and William A., deceased; and Edwin A., now of Lee. John B. Ludden came from Pownal, Maine, in 1834, and settled where John E. now lives. There was a small field cleared but no buildings. It is said that Mrs. Ludden and her daughter Louisa were the first women who came into this town in a carriage of any kind. They came ere the ice melted in the spring, or they could not have ridden. Mr. Ludden died April 12, 1876, and Mrs. Ludden August 2, 1881. John E. Ludden, the second son of this family, was born June 13, 1823, in the town of Canton, and came here with his parents, at the age of eleven. He settled with his father on the old homestead, where he now lives. In 1849 he married Susan Averill, daughter of David and Mary Averill (nee Mary Lee). This couple have had five children, three sons and two daughters—Sewell R., Clarence E., Louis E. (now in Washington Territory), Anna M., and Lucy E. Mr. Ludden's farm is about three miles from Lee village, on the Springfield road, where he owns about three hundred acres of land.

James G. Ames, of Lee, is a son of James and Margaret Ames (nee Randall). They came here from Litchfield, Maine, in 1836, and settled on the farm where James G. Ames now lives. They had five children—Amanda, deceased; America W., of Lee; Eleanor, wife of John R. Hall, of Farmington, New Hampshire; James G.; and Orville, now Mrs. Charles Kneeland, of Forest City, New Brunswick. James Ames died on the old place in 1844, and Mrs. Ames died January 18, 1862. James G. Ames was born October 9, 1827, in Livermore, Maine, and came here with his parents when nine years of age. He married Joanna Jackson, daughter of Godfrey and Cyrene Jackson, of Lee. They have five children—Charles F., now in Snohomish City, Washington Territory; Milton H., now of Lee; Edson C., James W., and Adla E. Mr. Ames has always been a farmer. He now resides on a part of the farm which he helped to clear up. It is about two and a half miles from the village of Lee. He owns one hundred and fifty acres of land. At the present time he is a member of the Board of Selectmen.

MATTAWAMKEAG.

DESCRIPTION.

Mattawamkeag is a fine, large town, in the Penobscot valley, northernmost in the county of all the long line of towns upon the east bank of the river. It is bounded on the north by Molunkus, and about two miles breadth of Macwahoc Plantation, in Aroostook county; on the east by Kingman; on the south by a strip of Webster Plantation and by Winn, and on the east by the Penobscot, beyond which is Woodville Plantation. At the northwest it corners upon Medway, at the southwest upon Chester, which are the only towns cornering upon its corners.

Mattawamkeag is forty-six miles from Bangor, in a straight line up the Penobscot valley. It is separated by only Kingman and Drew Plantation, ten miles breadth, from the northeast corner of the county and from Washington county, and Woodville is the only organized plantation or town between it and Piscataquis county on the west. Its north line is the longest, being six and one-half miles; the east line a little less than five and one-half miles; the south line nearly six miles; the boundary on the Penobscot five and two-thirds miles in length. The narrowest width of the town is from the mouth of the Mattawamkeag River to the east line of the town, a little more than five miles. A short jog occurs in the north line of the town, at the corner of Molunkus and Macwahoc Plantation. The town contains somewhat less area than an even surveyed township.

Mattawamkeag includes no ponds or lakes of size, and not very many streams. Such as there are, however, are important; and the town is in general, sufficiently well watered. The most useful of these streams is the Mattawamkeag River, which, itself taking an old Indian name, gives its own designation to the town. It rises in Aroostook county and enters Penobscot near its northeast corner, in Drew Plantation, flowing thence in a winding course through Kingman, and entering Mattawamkeag a mile and a quarter above the southeast corner. It flows thence in a southwest direction to the border of Winn, below which it dips in two successive short arcs, and then makes a nearly straight push northwest for the Penobscot, into which it debouches at Mattawamkeag village, about the same distance above the southwest corner of the town as that where it entered above the opposite corner. It receives no tributaries from the southward in this town. Half a mile from its entrance into Mattawamkeag it takes the Whiton Brook, a stream which rises four miles to the northwest, near the road into Macwahoc, and receives a tributary of about three miles length from nearly the same direction shortly before reaching the Mattawamkeag. Half a mile further the river receives another but shorter affluent. It has a total course in and just below this town of about seven miles, and is exceedingly valuable in the operations of the lumbermen, being a broad and otherwise favorable water for their purposes.

The Mattaseunk Stream is another important affluent of the Penobscot which comes down from Aroostook county through Molunkus, striking the county line one and three-fourths miles from the north-central corner of Mattawamkeag, flowing in a pretty large arc across the same angle of the town, being nearly two and one-fourth miles from the corner at the crown or southeast part of the arc, and reaching the river near School No. 3, about as far from the northwest corner as the point of entrance of the stream into the town. It is also a very valuable channel, in the working of the north woods. At what may be called the crown of the arc, a mile or more from the mouth of the Mattaseunk, a tributary of three miles' length, rising near the middle of the town, is received from the southeast, which in its turn takes in a small affluent from the north, heading in the edge of Molunkus. These two large streams, with their tributary waters, and two petty affluents to the Penobscot within half a mile above the mouth of the latter, and one more half a mile above the mouth of the Mattawamkeag, exhaust the list of the waters of this town.

Mattawamkeag, notwithstanding it is so far to the northward, almost on the border of the wilderness, has natural advantages which, together with the location of the repair shops of the European & North American Railroad at the station, have given it, contrary to the precedent afforded by nearly every other part of the county, a steady growth almost from the beginning. During the last twenty-one years (it was only incorporated as a town in 1860) it has increased about one hundred every decade, and during the years 1870-80 just one hundred. The population is still almost altogether settled along the river road, which takes in this town, at least between the two large streams, the name of the Mattaseunk road. The old military trail to Houlton, having followed the Penobscot all the way from Bangor, leaves the river at Mattawamkeag station, and strikes off northwestward, crossing the county line a mile and three-fourths from the northeast corner of the town, passing on to Molunkus village, and thence through Aroostook county to Houlton, not again touching the Penobscot. The section of this road from the station to the town line has as yet but infrequent settlements. A mile out of the village a neighborhood road runs off east about the same distance. East-northeast, or southeast of its terminus settlements are very rare. The river road, however, is well settled up, and has upon it not only the station but a cemetery near, with public hearse-house attached, and two school-houses. About two-thirds of a mile south of the Mattawamkeag it passes close to the Boom Islands, a little cluster of three, which are the only islets in this part of the river.

Mattawamkeag village is at the crossing of the stream of that name, on the north bank, and about one-third of a mile from the Penobscot. The railroad, which has followed closely the river road into the town, here diverges at almost a right angle, and runs off east and north of east into Kingman, making no station in the eight and one-fifth miles to that village. It has at Mattawamkeag its machine and repair shops, freight and passenger-houses, and turn-table, making this place the most important on its line, except Bangor. It is also important for stage connections, daily stage-wagons running hence to Patten, with connections there for Fort Kent, Houlton, Island Falls, and other points. The place has a Methodist Episcopal society, a public school-house, two hotels, and the promising beginning of a business quarter.

HISTORICAL NOTES.*

Mattawamkeag was formerly known as Township No. 1, East Indian Purchase, as Woodville was No. 2, West Indian. Although receiving its first settlers nearly as early as adjoining townships, and long a gateway into Aroostook county on account of the Military Road being built through it at an early day, and also because it has a long stretch of navigable water from the Penobscot by the Mattawamkeag, yet it is only very recently that it was incorporated into a town. The advent of the white man here was in 1829, when Colonel Stanley erected a log cabin or shanty for the accommodation of man and beast engaged in hauling supplies for the lumbermen over the frozen roads of the Penobscot ice. It was closed up during the summer season, and he soon left it for Houlton, after selling it to Milliken and John Rollins. It was built on the north side of the Mattawamkeag, the Military Road afterwards built being down the river from it, and was between the "logan" and the river. In 1829 the United States Government commenced building the Military Road from Lincoln, its southern terminus, to Houlton, and completed it as far as Mattawamkeag that year. As the lumbermen would take up in a bateaux, in the fall, sufficient supplies to last until the river froze over, the teams would haul the bulk of it on the ice, and on the rough woods road following the river which was quite good in winter, and in the spring the bateaux would come down both the Penobscot and Mattawamkeag Rivers. The meagre accommodations of Milliken and Rollins did not suffice for the demand made upon them. This is shown by the experience of a party on their way to the forks of the Mattawamkeag, who had to accept the hospitality of Milliken and Rollins for a night. The ladies slept in the only private room, two on the bed and two on an improvised bed on the floor near the huge fire. In the year 1830 Captain George Waite, who had been employed in hauling supplies to the lumbermen, bought out Milliken and Rollins, Milliken going I know not whither, but Rollins went up to the forks of the Mattawamkeag, thirty miles toward Houlton, where until recently his children resided. Waite continued to keep a house of entertainment, and soon purchased some land and erected a frame house a little further north, above the creek.

In 1830 James Penly and George Wallace, of Oldtown, erected a hotel building on the present site of the Mattawamkeag stage house, and which forms the ell part of that hotel. Soon after they sold to Thomas Pratt, of Oldtown, and I think that Ira Wadleigh owned an interest in it. Pratt finished the buildings and shortly sold them to Joseph L. Kelsey, of Williamsburg, Piscataquis county. In 1834 Joseph L. Kelsey surveyed and lotted Mattawamkeag, leaving a mile square along that river for a village. He bought much of the desirable land, including that where the hotel stood, and having enlarged the buildings, let his brother-in-law, Edward G. Sturgis, keep the hotel until 1835, when Kelsey sold the hotel and land to Asa Smith, who moved there from the forks of the Mattawamkeag, since called Haynesville, thirty miles nearer Houlton, where he had been keeping hotel for five years. Asa Smith came from Androscoggin county; his wife was Lovisa Haynes, daughter of David Haynes and a sister of Alvin Haynes, who was then and a long time previous, a mail-carrier from Bangor to Houlton. Mr. Smith became an important adjunct to the community of Mattawamkeag. He was Justice of the Peace, mail-carrier, postmaster, merchant, and hotel-keeper.

In 1835 Kelsey and Sturgis left town, and only two other families alone remained. George Waite then was a farmer, hotel-keeper, and owner of teams. He had a house up the road, where there is an old cellar hole, with a barn still standing on the farm of William Willey, at the foot of the lower terrace of Webb Hill. Webb Hill is a steep rise, named after the contractor of Portland, father of Nathan Webb, who built the Military Road at that point, and who got so deeply into debt, as Nathan affirms, that it took him twenty years to clear himself from it. The other dweller there was James W. Thompson, who carried the Bangor and Houlton mail. He was probably the first to carry mail on the Military Road. He built the house now standing just north of the store of Libby & Stratton, known as the McDonald House. The first school-teacher was a sister of Mr. Thompson. Mr. Thompson left soon after, and David Haynes moved there from Chester in 1837. About that time Dr. Daniel Lumbert moved from Readfield, Kennebec county, and made a clearing on the Military Road, on the edge of the Martin Gould place. Its site is now used as a pasture by D. Frank Martin, a son of Asher Martin, to whom Lumbert sold out. The widow of Asher Martin married Perley Gould, who died in 1880. Their son, Frank Martin, lives here now. Ira Pitman and Alfred Gordon made a clearing and a brief sojourn in this vicinity on a part of the present Martin farm. Pitman was a son-in-law of that typical Western pioneer, Penuel Shumway, who moved from Howland to Chester, thence to Winn, and finally to Minnesota. Gordon married Elsie Kyle, a daughter of Ephraim Kyle, and moved to Winn. After raising a large family there, he died a lunatic. Previous to this, Colonel Eli Hoskins had owned for several years saw-mills on the Cambolasse Stream in Lincoln. These mills were commenced by the Lindseys, and are now owned by the Webbers, of Bangor. About 1838 Colonel Hoskins, who lived in Oldtown, and George Waite, built a large establishment near the mouth of the present Medway Road, in Mattawamkeag. It was used as a hotel, and S. Warren Coombs was the building contractor. Waite and Hoskins kept the hotel until 1846 or 1847. Waite then moved to the lower part of the town, and built the Hamilton Coombs House, near where he had made a clearing. George Sanborn rented the hotel, and continued it as such until 1855, being succeeded by Asa Smith, who purchased the property and kept the hotel until 1870. Then the buildings were moved across the road, and have since been used as dwelling houses.

At a very early day efforts were made to improve the water-power at the town, and John Gordon, at an early day, built a mill at Gordon's Falls. The building of this mill and its burning by the Indians in 1812, are recounted in the history of Winn. The location is on the confines of Winn and Mattawamkeag, and below it in both the towns are the old cellar-holes of the Dudleys and other settlers who lived there long after the mill was burned down. Purchases have been made with a view of increasing the water-power. The Mattawamkeag dips into Winn twice before it flows into the Penobscot within the territory of Mattawamkeag. When the trouble about the north-western boundary of our county caused soldiers to line the frontier, and a fort and barracks to be constructed at Houlton, that place and Mattawamkeag became memorable, and names were given to locations on the Mattawamkeag that have ever since borne them. Supplies had to be boated up the Mattawamkeag, as well as the soldiers, in a scow, which made a landing below Gordon's Falls and Scatterac Falls, and this has ever since been known as Scow Landing. A road was cut through the woods then, extending to the soldiers' field, where they encamped near Molunkus Stream, above the Falls, where they embarked again. Further up on the river is a place where a woman accompanying the troops gave birth to a child near where two springs arise. Hence the name of "Female Springs." When the troops reached the forks they went by the "spotted line" to Houlton, some twenty-five miles further. A dam has long been built at the lower pitch of Gordon Falls. It was rebuilt with a fish-way a year or two since.

David Bunker, who located in Chester in 1827, went in 1832 to Mattawamkeag, to Mattakeunk Lake, in township A, Aroostook county, on the Mattakeunk Stream, which flows into the Penobscot some three miles up the Penobscot from the Mattawamkeag. At the foot of the lake he built a dam and a large lumber mill, or rather commenced a mill, and Arsenius Robinson, a New Hampshire man, completed the mill and sold it to John Foss, then of Lincoln. Within four years after this last purchase, extensive improvements were made here. Timothy Fuller, of Lincoln, and Seth D. Remick built a horse railroad from the Penobscot to the mill, coming out about half-way from the present residence of Hiram Hathorn. A large amount of lumber was manufactured there.

The Fosses run a mill for some time, and Phineas Foss made some clearings on the edge of the river. The Medway road afterward when built found the houses often so far from an average straight road line as to locate many houses in the middle of the fields.

Shortly after a company from Saco built a mill and a dam within half a mile of the mouth of the stream. When completed it fell into the hands of Amos M. Roberts, of Bangor, and was run by John Jackins for several years. A shingle-mill was built there later by Hiram Hathorn. These mills were burnt down in 1870. This property was owned a long time by Woodman & Maling, of Bangor, and run by Hiram Hathorn. In 1879 Harvey Jordon, of Brewer, built a large lumber-mill and bought the shingle-mill erected by Hathorn after the old mill was burnt. In 1838 Samuel Warren Coombs removed from Chester to Mattawamkeag, and built where he now lives.

Soon after the town was lotted out a road was built to accommodate the Mattakeunk neighborhood, and on that road Samuel Briggs, who removed from Winn, made a farm. Franklin Chesley made a farm in 1839 farther up the road. John Jackins built a house at the mill. Within the next decade some half a dozen farms were made and houses built along the Penobscot River, induced by the milling operations in Mattakeunk. The leading men there for a while seemed to be Phineas Foss and John Jackins, the latter a brother of Mrs. Samuel W. Coombs.

Early after Hoskins' connection with Mattawamkeag's business he had cleared up or started the present farm of Edward Shaw, Jr., or within a half mile or so of the bridge, but it was not until after 1850 that the present Medway road was built, starting near the bridge and winding along most of the way by the Penobscot River side.

Mattakeunk Lake, though not in Penobscot county, is a great resort for fishermen, especially in the winters.

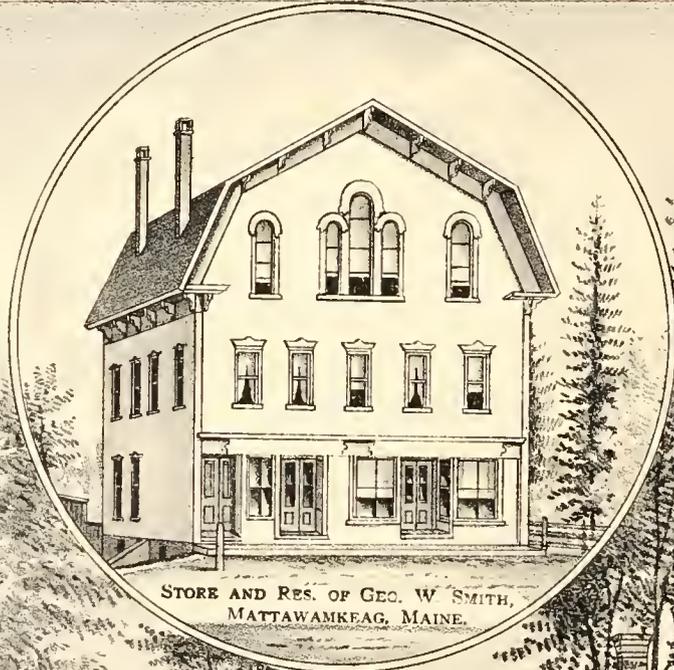

Below Mattawamkeag village, early after the settlement there, about 1830-36, Charles Stetson built a house which stood in the present dooryard of the present fine residence of the late Asa Smith. The old house is now used as an out-house. Gideon Stetson, of Lincoln, is a son of Charles Stetson, and was the first blacksmith in town.

Joseph Blakemore, the father of George W., and a brother of the wife of Elijah Brackett, the pioneer of Upper Winn, built, about 1842, where George now lives. During the years between 1840 and 1850 three or four other farms were made on the Military Road, toward Winn and Mattawamkeag, extending to within three-fourths of a mile of Winn village.

Above Webb Hill but few other settlements were made, the Bradeens locating above Gould's. Indeed, in the whole about five-mile stretch of road to Aroostook county line hardly five farms now exist, though several old clearings grown up to bushes attest to the pioneer unwisdom and subsequent discouragement and desertion. The most of the way to Haynesville the road goes over a boggy ground, whereas if it went eastward a few miles nearer the valleys of the streams, fine farming lands would have attracted immigration.

Some two and one-half miles above Mattawamkeag village are the sunken bridges on the Military Road, where five bridges have sunk into the soft ooze whose depth has never been discovered, though the length of the bridge has been shortened by filling up. About a mile above Mattawamkeag a new road goes into a settlement commenced near 1860; this, with the exception of a short road of two or three miles up the Mattawamkeag River, and the old soldiers' road, being all the roads and settlements in Mattawamkeag off the Military Road and Medway road, excepting the Davis road.

As immigration into the upper country continued Mattawamkeag became the gateway to upper Penobscot and the Aroostook country, and its popular stopping place, Smith's hotel, was full; Hoskins and Waite's well employed—afterwards kept by George Sanborn until bought by Smith; and a house built by Josiah Cripps was afterwards enlarged to a hotel by the Fisks, but a few rods down the river from Smith's, also kept by Alvin Hoskins in 1847, and later by Josiah Snow, Samuel Dudley, Lewis Brown, and by Stratton, and at present by Charles Green and his son-in-law, Greenwood. The Smith family long kept the hotel, the Mattawamkeag stage house, from 1847 to 1852. It was then kept by Holder Sanford, Isaac Bartrain, John R. Adams, Smith & Wing, then by Henry Wing, a son-in-law of Smith; then by George Parks. It has since changed hands many times, and at present is managed by Simon B. Gates, who purchased it in 1811.

The first known postmaster in the town was Asa Smith, who was early appointed, though there may have been some one before, during the "salt-box" period of our mails. Postmasters since Smith have been Holder Sanford, Asa Smith again, George W. Smith, then the present incumbent, David S. Parker, who is also Station Agent on the European & North American Railway.

Of merchants, Beniah Sturgis, a brother of the hotel keeper, E. G. Sturgis, traded in 1833-34, and seems to have been the first in town. Asa Smith, while connected with the hotel, was also in trade. Between 1846-50 Alvin Haynes was in trade. Gilbert, Kirbg & Co. and J. B. Foss for two or three years; Hiram Haines, brother of Henry Haines; G. W. Smith, H. W. Fisk, and many others. In 1872 Asa Smith erected the present large store and dwelling house, where George W. Smith resides and trades. About the same time Henry W. Fisk built the present store of William H. Libby, who took in the present year Orlando A. Stratton, a son of Lewis F. Stratton, who had traded there previous to Libby.

Professionally, Mattawamkeag has been but a fitful residence. Since the early location of Dr. Lumbert, who returned very soon to Readfield, one other physician was here for a short portion of a year. About 1860 Dr. Albert Pearson came to Mattawamkeag from Lincoln. Since Dr. Lumbert left, no physician with a family has lived here. About 1870 Dr. Henry A. Reynolds, of red ribbon fame, removed from Winn to Mattawamkeag, and after remaining a year or two returned to Bangor. In 1881 Dr. Daniel H. Kelly, of Bangor, located here, where he still remains.

The sole lawyer who was at one time a resident of the town, was William A. Evans, a brother of George E. Evans, of Portland. He was in Mattawamkeag some time between the years 1872 and 1875, and removed to Bluehill, where he has since died.

About 1840 Jonathan Sewall, a Calvinist Baptist, preached in Mattawamkeag and vicinity. A small church was established, but is not now in existence.

In 1868, or the following year, a Methodist Episcopal church was organized under the preaching of Rev. George R. Palmer, and in 1879 a church edifice was started, but from some cause it has progressed but little, although the exterior was completed in 1881. The present membership is about twenty. The church edifice is located on Railroad street, on which several of the employes of the European & North America Railway reside.

In the sparsely settled upper Penobscot, for election purposes, a quite large territory was embraced in one voting precinct, and as late as 1853 the voters of Winn, Mattawamkeag, Woodville, and Nicatou, (Chester, being incorporated in 1834,) met for election purposes near the end of Mattawamkeag bridge. In 1853 Five Islands Plantation was incorporated, which reduced the number of voters here. Winn was incorporated in 1857, and Mattawamkeag in 1860, which threw Woodville, and Nicatou into another precinct for voting purposes.

March 26, 1853, the officers elected for Mattawamkeag were Asa Smith, Moderator; Asher Martin, Clerk; Thomas S. Ranney and A. Langley, Assessor; Ranney, Superintending School Committeeman; and Langley, S. W. Dudley, John Bradeen, John Hathorn, and James Rand, School Agents.

May 1, 1854, a petition was presented by Asa Smith, John Q. Adams, and Henry Haines, of East Indian township, to Alvin Haynes, one of the County Commissioners, for the issuance of a warrant authorizing a meeting for the organization of a plantation to be called Mattawamkeag. The officers elected were Asa Smith, Moderator and First Assessor, and Samuel W. Coombs Clerk. In 1855 three school districts were established. In 1856 George W. Smith was chosen Clerk, which office he held during the plantation existence. An additional school district was established in this year. In 1859 the last school district was merged into the first.

In February, 1860, Township No. 1, Indian Purchase, east side of the Penobscot River, was incorporated as the town of Mattawamkeag, a name taken from the river whose mouth is in that town. The best Indian authority gives its signification as "A river with many rocks at its mouth." In March of the same year Asa Smith issued his warrant to Richard Sibley to call a meeting for acceptance of the act of incorporation. At the meeting Asa Smith was chosen Moderator, First Selectman, and Treasurer, one of which offices he held nearly every year until his death in 1880. George W. Smith, his son, was chosen Clerk; Samuel W. Coombs and Columbus Chesley Second and Third Selectmen. Three hundred dollars was raised for the upper story for a town house, provided District No. 1 raised $500 for building for school-house, as a lower story.

In 1862 the Treasurer was authorized to pay $20 bounty to each of six volunteers who enlisted to save the town from draft. The same year $75 was voted to be paid to the families of soldiers absent in the war.

In 1863 $100 was raised as bounty for five volunteers. Also Asa Smith was authorized to hire $1,050, payable in five years, to pay bounties to volunteers to fill Mattawamkeag's quota. In 1865 the town offered to pay any enrolled man who should volunteer or furnish an acceptable substitute, $300 for one year, $350 for two years, and $400 for three years.

In 1864 George W. Blake was chosen Town Clerk, and has been annually re-elected to the office since.

In 1871 $400 was raised for the support of schools; for a year or two before $280 had been raised, and for a long time previous $210 or $175.

In 1873, in accordance with the law for that purpose, a free high school was maintained in Mattawamkeag.

In November, 1869, the first train of the European & North American Railway reached Mattawamkeag. The advent of the railroad increased the population and property of the town materially. The railroad bridge across the stream was burned in May, 1874, and the same year a fine iron structure was erected at a cost of $20,000. The company owns property in the town amounting to $15,000. Their machine shop is under the management of A. O. Bailey.

In 1873 Pine Tree Lodge, Free and Accepted Masons, was instituted, with Wilbur F. Lovejoy, of Winn, as the first Worshipful Master. The present membership is seventy.

In 1874 Sylvan Lodge, Independent Order of Good Templars, was established; the present membership is twenty-five.

October 13, 1877, Floral Grange of Patrons of Husbandry was instituted, of which George W. Blakemore is Master. It has a membership of about forty; it holds an annual fair at the town hall, at which a very creditable show is made.

STATISTICS, ETC.

Mattawamkeag had 280 people within its borders by the census of 1860; in 1870, 356; in 1880, 456.

It had 65 voters in 1860, 63 in 1870, and 122 in 1880. The valuation of estates for these years severally, was $25,000, $76,779, and $77,768.

Mr. D. S. Parker is Postmaster. The other local officers at last report were: Samuel W. Coombs, William H. Libby, Charles A. Smith, Selectmen; G. W. Blakemore, Town Clerk; George W. Smith, Treasurer; D. S. Chadbourne, A. L. Thompson, G. W. Blakemore, Constables; Stark Webster, J. H. Hamilton, Stewart R. Graham, School Committee; George W. Smith, (quorum) Justice.

The town had then one manufactory of long and short lumber, one carriage maker, one picture frame maker, one carpenter and builder, and two smiths. There were two dealers in dry goods and groceries, one livery stable, two hotels, and one resident clergyman.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES.

George W. Smith, of Mattawamkeag, is a son of the late Hon. Asa Smith, whose biography appears elsewhere in this work. He was born in Haynesville, Aroostook county, October 24, 1834, and came to Mattawamkeag when a child with his parents, and has always lived here. He married for his first wife Miss Rosetta K. Brown, of Haynesville, who died in 1871, leaving one son, Fred. For his second wife Mr. Smith married Althea H. Babcock, of Lincoln Centre. They have three children, viz: Gracie M., Sarah, and John. In 1870 Mr. Smith erected the fine store he now occupies, an illustration of which appears in this work. He is a man honored by his townsmen with the best offices in their gift, having held all the leading town offices. He keeps a general merchandise store and is express agent at this time. He is Secretary of the Pine Tree Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons, and an honored member of the fraternity.

Mr. G. D. Stratton, of Mattawamkeag, was born November 22, 1843. His father, Paul Stratton, now eighty-four years of age, is a pioneer settler in Penobscot county. He was in the War of 1812 and is now a pensioner. He married Miss Sarah A. Frazier, of St. Johns, New Brunswick; they were married in St. Johns, and after living there thirteen years came to this county and settled in Chester about 1834. He lived there until 1851, when he moved into Winn, then known as the Five Islands, and built a hotel, being the second house in the place. He followed hotel keeping and farming until 1863; since then he has retired from active business, and now resides in Mattawamkeag. Mrs. Stratton died in 1879, at the age of seventy-nine. They had ten children, viz: Mary, wife of George B. Robertson, of Bangor; William, now in Chester; Eliza, now Mrs. Josiah Snow, of Mattawamkeag; Lewis F., Sheriff of Penobscot county, now in Bangor; Jane, now Mrs. James Snow, of Mattawamkeag; Eunice, wife of the late James P. Crowell, of Orono; George H., in Minnesota; Ellen D., wife of O. T. Hooper, of Boston; Martha, now Mrs. William Jewell, of Gorham, New Hampshire; and Guilford D., now of Mattawamkeag. G. D. Stratton was born in Chester; on becoming of age he engaged in hotel keeping in Winn; he also kept a livery stable there several years. From Winn he moved to Lincoln and farmed three years. He came to Mattawamkeag in 1872 and bought the hotel which he kept until the spring of 1881, when he sold out and moved to his farm just out of town. During his life in Mattawamkeag he farmed in connection with his hotel. He married Miss Eva L. Wing, daughter of Henry S. and Hannah Wing, of Mattawamkeag. They have three children—Alice May, Rosa, and Roy.

Frederick A. Greenwood, now of Mattawamkeag, is a son of Francis and Mary Greenwood, of Lennoxville, Province of Quebec. Francis Greenwood has four children living—E. X., now in Detroit, Michigan; Ellen, wife of D. Moulton, of Minneapolis; Elizabeth, and Frederick A. Mr. and Mrs. Greenwood are both living in Lennoxville. F. A. Greenwood was born June 20, 1852. After obtaining a common school education he studied locomotive engineering, and was engaged in that business until 1877. At that time he took an engine and cut the wood for the European & North American Railway, at which he worked three years, until March, 1881, when he bought the hotel at Lincoln, which he kept till about the 1st of August, when he sold out, and since then has taken a trip in the West. He has not again engaged in any business. He married Laura A. Greene, daughter of Charles Greene, of Mattawamkeag. They have one daughter—Grace M.

The fourth permanent settler in Mattawamkeag was Samuel W. Coombs, who came here from Albion, Kennebec county, in 1835. He had spent about a year in the county before coming here. He was born August 25, 1810, in Islesboro, this county. His father, Jonathan Coombs, was a son of Anthony Coombs, of Brunswick, Maine. Jonathan Coombs married Martha Warren, daughter of Samuel Warren, of Islesboro. He was a seafaring man during his early life, but spent his middle and latter days on a farm in Kennebec county. He had twelve children, four sons and eight daughters, of whom Samuel is the third son, the others being Jonathan, James, and Albert, deceased. Samuel W. Coombs on becoming of age worked at the house carpenter's trade fifteen years, building hotels along the river. Since then he has been engaged in surveying land and scaling lumber. He married Maria Jackins, of Chester, daughter of Christopher Jackins. To this couple have been born eight children, of whom six are living—Corrilla N., wife of Alonzo Babcock, of Augusta, Maine; Martha, deceased, wife of George H. Libbey, of Molunkus; Maria, at home; Hannibal Hamlin, now of Mattawamkeag; George W., deceased; Mary, of Minnesota; Sanford, at home; Dexter, of this town; and Matilda, deceased. Mr. Coombs is now Chairman of the Town Board. He has held many of the town offices.

George W. Blakemore, of Mattawamkeag, was born May 3, 1838. He is a son of Joseph D. and Hebsabeth Blakemore. His grandfather came from Northamptonshire, England. Joseph D. had three children by his first wife. George W. is the only son living of the second family. The names of this family were Joseph H. and Sarah M. Mr. Blakemore died February 14, 1866; Mrs. Blakemore is still living with her son and daughter. George W. was raised on a farm, and went into the army in 1862 in the Sixth Maine Infantry Volunteers, where he remained about six months, when he was discharged for disability on account of a severe attack of rheumatic fever. On his return from the army he came to Mattawamkeag, and since then has been engaged as a clerk for George W. Smith. Mr. Blakemore married Catharine Asher, daughter of William and Mary Asher, of Sherman, Maine. They have three children—Elzaidee M., George E., and Lottie H. Mr. Blakemore has been Town Clerk for seventeen years, and resides in the south part of the village.

Columbus Chesley, of Mattawamkeag, is a son of Samuel Chesley, who was a native of Paris. His grandfather, Nicholas Chesley, was a native of Gloucester, Massachusetts. Samuel Chesley married Martha Perry. They had ten children, of whom Columbus is the fifth. He came to Mattawamkeag in 1854, when he was thirty-two years old, being born October 27, 1822. He has a small place in the village. He married Elizabeth Babcock, daughter of Jesse and Polly Babcock. They have four children—Henry C., Alice M., Albert, and Eunice.

Mr. S. B. Gates, proprietor of the two fine hotels, one at Winn and the other at Mattawamkeag, is a son of Zadock Gates, who was born in Paris, Maine. He married Adeline Monroe. They had seven children—Simon B.; Frances, wife of Samuel Lowell, of Danforth, Maine; Oliver P., deceased; Augustine, died in the army; Silas W., died in the army; George B., now in Nevada; Vesta P., in Chicago; Galen, deceased. Mr. Gates died in 1880; Mrs. Gates died within a week after Mr. Gates. Simon B. Gates was born March 31, 1834, in Lincoln. On becoming of age he engaged in teaching, which he followed four years. He then went into trade in Carroll, where he remained about three years, or until about 1867, when he went to Springfield and engaged in the hotel business, which he has since followed. He opened the large hotel at Winn in 1874. This hotel is the largest north of Bangor in this county. In 1881 he purchased the hotel at Mattawamkeag, which is also large, and under Mr. Gates's management a well kept house. He now runs both hotels, spending a portion of his time at each place, his family living at Winn. Mr. Gates married Theolocia Randall, daughter of Charles and Susan Randall, of Springfield, Maine. They have four children: Stella, Ora, Fayette, and Vaughn.

Mrs. M. E. Willey, of Mattawamkeag, is a daughter of Mrs. Maria McNamara, late of Bangor. Mrs. McNamara was born in Providence, Rhode Island, May 28, 1791. In 1813 she married John McNamara, who was engaged in the War of 1812 in supplying troops at the battle of Lake Champlain. They went to Boston, where Mr. McNamara engaged in business. They lived here until 1834, when the financial crisis caused him to fail in business. Mr. McNamara, feeling his losses very heavily, left Boston, and with many others became interested in Maine timber lands. He went to the Aroostook, then a new and wild country. The family soon followed, and to them the change was very great, as there were only log houses, and no privileges, either social or religious. The children, three daughters, pleased with the novelty, did not realize the change, but the mother, though deeply feeling it, accepted the changed circumstances, and with Christian fortitude looked up for strength, went bravely forward, comforting and sustaining her husband who soon sank under the change, and died in 1842 at the age of sixty-two years. In 1852, with her children, four in number, a son having been born here, she removed to Bangor and passed the remainder of her days in contentment, having the respect of all who knew her. She died June 29, 1863, leaving to her family and friends a bright example of the power of Christian faith and fortitude to sustain the trials and discipline of life. She had nine children, of whom four lived to grow up, viz: Ann Maria, deceased; Mary Eliza, now Mrs. Willey, of Mattawamkeag; Louisa, deceased, wife of William Willey; and John T., deceased. Mr. and Mrs. Willey have no children.

Mr. A. O. Bailey, Master Mechanic in charge of the European & North American Railroad shops at Mattawamkeag, is a son of James W. Bailey, of New Gloucester, Maine. His grandfather was Jacob Bailey, of the same place. James W. Bailey married Hannah Smith, of Lisbon, Maine. They had eight children, viz: Augustus O.; Martha, wife of William Lucas, of Sangerville, Maine; Solomon; H. C., deceased; James E., now in Belleville, Canada West; Jennett, wife of Benjamin E. Swett, of Brunswick, Maine; Sarah H., deceased, wife of Silas B. Foster, of Gray; Mary A., deceased, wife of Charles Latham, Portland. Both James W. Bailey and his wife are now deceased. A. O. Bailey, the oldest son of this family, was born February 11, 1825. When seventeen years of age he went to work in the woolen factory in Gray, where he remained one year when he went to Sacarappa, Maine, where he remained one year in the same business. In 1844 he went to Turner, Maine, where he worked in the factory three years, having charge of the weaving room. From here he went back to Sacarappa and entered the machine shop to learn the machinist's trade. After spending some years here he went to Gorham and worked awhile, when the firm sold out and he went with Mr. Gammon to New Hampshire and remained about six months. About 1850 he went to Portland and worked at the same trade about two years, after which he went into the employ of the Grand Trunk Railroad, at Gorham, New Hampshire. Here he remained as locomotive foreman eleven years, until about 1863. After this he went into mercantile business in Gorham, New Hampshire, and continued about two years, when he went to Glen Cottage, New Hampshire, and lived about nine months engaged in building a summer hotel. The hotel took fire and burned, placing Mr. Bailey back where he started in life. After losing his property here he went to Portland and engaged with the same company for whom he had previously worked, taking charge of their new engines as they were sent out until they were accepted by the purchasers. He remained in their employ about two years, when he came to Mattawamkeag, and has since remained as Master Mechanic for the European & North American Railroad, and has charge of their shops at this place. These are the only shops of the road. Mr. Bailey married Elizabeth A. Cloudman, daughter of John T. S. and Mary A. Cloudman. They have one son, Frederick A., now with his father in the shops. Mr. Bailey has found time in his busy life to serve his town several terms, both here and in New Hampshire, as Selectman.

W. H. Libbey, of Mattawamkeag, is a son of Joseph and Nancy Libbey (nee Nancy Foster), of Macwahoc, Aroostook county. Joseph Libbey has five children, four of whom are living, viz: William H.; Charles O., now of Macwahoc; Oscar H., also in Macwahoc; Jennie K., deceased; Ada G., wife of M. Bowley, of Macwahoc. Mr. and Mrs. Libbey are both now living in Macwahoc. William H., the oldest son of this family was born March 3, 1844. His father being a farmer he spent his boyhood on the farm and after becoming of age he entered the employ of M. Johnson, of South Molunkus, where he remained eight years, when he came to Mattawamkeag and opened a general merchandise store, which he has since carried on. In 1871 he married Miss Maria A. Blackwell, daughter of Oliver and Sabra Blackwell, of Patten. They have one adopted child, Joseph by name, a child of Mr. Libbey's sister, who died and left it when an infant. Mr. Libbey is at present a member of the Board of Selectmen of this town.

Alexander McClain, who came to Mattawamkeag from Readfield in 1846, is a son of Alexander and Esther McClain (nee Esther Robbins). Alexander McClain had two wives. By his first wife he had seven children, of whom Alexander, Jr., is the second son. Mr. McClain was a lumberman and was drowned in the year 1826. Alexander, Jr., was born July 24, 1823, and left home when a mere lad, being bound out to a man by the name of Soule, in the town of Hope. He left him when twelve and went to live with an uncle in Readfield. He lived here until about eighteen when he came to Mattawamkeag, where he has since lived, except ten years he spent in Molunkus, where he built a mill. He has been engaged in lumbering, milling and farming. He was for ten years Deputy Sheriff of this and Aroostook county, and now has a nice place of sixteen acres in the village. He has been in charge of the drives on the Mattawamkeag for many years and sometimes takes the job to get down the logs. He married Mary I. Shedd, daughter of Nathan and Celinda Shedd (nee Celinda Black). They have had eleven children, viz: Benjamin F., deceased; Thomas, in the West; Alexander, Jr., in Danforth, Maine; Ann Maria, deceased; Emma, wife of Humphrey Chadbourn, of Mattawamkeag; Mary I., deceased wife of Alexander Daugherty; Etta May, wife of Alexander Daugherty; Rufus R., now at home; Celinda A., deceased; Nathan S., and George W. Mr. McClain is at present United States Revenue Detective.

Mr. J. H. Jordan, of Mattawamkeag, is a son of Luther Jordan. This branch of the Jordan family can be traced by Luther Jordan back to his grandfather, whose name was John Jordan, of Mariaville, Hancock county, Maine. Luther's father's name was John C. Jordan, who lived in the same town. John C. Jordan married Lucy T. Jordan. They had nine children, of whom Luther is the fourth son. He was born March 23, 1819, in Mariaville. He lived in Mattawamkeag until about eight years since, when he moved to Ellsworth, where he now lives. He married Polly W. Moore, of Mariaville. They have seven children living, viz: Wilmot P., now in Eddington, Maine; J. Harvey; Myra, wife of John F. Frost, of Ellsworth; Luther, now in St. Johns, New Brunswick; Moses L., of Veazie; Addie E., now Mrs. Charles Buzzell, of Veazie, and Eva J., now Mrs. Alonzo Jordan, of Ellsworth.

J. Harvey was born March 10, 1843. He first settled in Veazie, where he lived about one year when he moved to Brewer. He now owns a residence there. He came here to Mattawamkeag about four years since, in 1877, and bought the shingle-mill on Mattaseunk Stream. Since then he has built a saw-mill and now manufactures boards, shingles, and laths. He married Asha Spencer, of Veazie. They have two children, viz: Nathaniel and Albert H. He owns a farm also in connection with his mill.

MILFORD.

SOME NOTES THEREOF.

Our little bark of history now floats for many miles adown the broad Penobscot, till it is moored beside the traditional site of Tarratine sovereignty at Oldtown Island, and looks across the broad acres of old "Sunkhaze Plantation," the modern Milford. This town is only six and one-quarter miles from the northwest corner of Bangor; is immediately on the east bank of the Penobscot; adjoins Hancock county on about two-fifths of its eastern boundary, and is separated only by Greenfield from Township No. 39, in Hancock. It is bounded on the north by Greenbush; on the east by Greenfield and the Hancock county township No. 32; on the south by Bradley; and on the west by the Penobscot, beyond which are Oldtown and a narrow breadth of Argyle. In the river between, however, are Oldtown Island, the lowermost of the Indian reservation, and still almost the exclusive place of residence for the tribe; northwest of it the larger Orson Island; below it the smaller one crossed by the tracks of the European & North American Railroad; and a small islet opposite the south line of Argyle.

The north boundary of Milford is almost one-fifth of a mile short of six miles; the east line is six miles long; the south line six and two-thirds miles; and the west line, following the windings of the Penobscot, is a little more than six and one-half miles in length. The north and south lines diverge a trifle from perfect parallelism, from east and west, so that the greatest breadth of the town, from north to south on a line dropped from the northwest corner, is about a quarter of a mile longer than the east line. The greatest length, from the innermost bend at Milford village, is about seven miles. This line crosses the interesting series of waters known as the Otter Chain Ponds, a singular collection of small lakes, none of which are more than two thirds of a mile in length, and most of them but half a mile by perhaps half the length in greatest breadth in each case. The main part of the Chain is in the southwest quarter of the town, back from Milford village, and beginning one and one-half miles from the river. It consists of a series of seven ponds, lying in a rude triangle, with a sort of open handle to it, the whole two and one-eighth miles in greatest length and one and one-half in largest breadth. Each pond is connected with another, the last, singular to say, joining by an outlet to the first about midway of its length. The little streams connecting the ponds are each but one-third to three-fourths of a mile long. The pond at the south angle of the triangle is the largest, being two-thirds of a mile long by about one-third in widest width. Just below the northwest angle is the last lake of the seven, half a mile below which is another small, narrow one, and a few rods further another, and smaller, beyond which the outlet runs one-third of a mile to the town line near the southwest corner, and then half a mile to the Penobscot through Great Works, where it furnishes valuable power.

A very singular system of branches, also, forms the heads of the Sunkhaze Stream — so involved in its character as to be almost impossible of description, except by the aid of a carefully-elaborated map. Suffice it to say that, all the way from the east middle of the north edge of Bradley, and the extreme northeast corner of that town, along the west edge of Greenfield, and the east border of Milford, to the middle of the south edge of Greenbush, the headwaters of Sunkhaze are found in no less than eighteen brooks and rivulets. From the south, flowing to a junction with Sunkhaze nearly half-way across the town, is the Baker Brook. Next on the east, with its mouth little more than half a mile above that of Baker, is the Little Birch, which heads in three little branches on the east part of the south edge of the town, and flows northwest. In the same general direction, also from three heads, two of them near the southeast corner of the town, is the Big Birch, which, receiving two more little affluents from the east, presently becomes the south branch of the Sunkhaze, and, after a total flow of nearly five miles, joins the north branch a mile and a half above the Little Birch, and with it forms the Sunkhaze. The north branch has its heads beyond the northeast angle of the town, in the borders of Greenfield and Greenbush, and flows southwest about three and a half miles to the point of union. It receives one small tributary from the southeast on the way; also, from the north, less than a mile from the junction, the Spring Brook, which comes down two and a half miles from Greenbush, getting the increase of a small stream on the west, a mile from the North Branch. The Russell Branch, also of Greenbush origin, running two-thirds of a mile west of Spring, and in general parallelism with it, entering the Sunkhaze half a mile below the junction, completes the list of headwaters of the Sunkhaze. After receiving all these, it becomes a stream of quite respectable size and flows in a tolerably broad current for about three miles below the mouth of the Baker Brook, until it reaches the Penobscot. Half a mile above its mouth, on the north side, it takes in a two-mile affluent called the Dudley Meadow Brook. Above this, and half a mile from the northwest corner of the town, a small stream flows into the Penobscot at Costigan Station, formed by two branches rising in Greenbush and Milford, respectively, and joining just east of the railroad.

The population of Milford is almost altogether clustered at Milford village and on the river road a mile below. There is a tolerably dense settlement, however, just below the mouth of the Sunkhaze, and at Costigan Station, the post-office at which is called North Milford. A very few settlements have pushed into the interior in the southwest corner of the town, some of them getting within the enclosure of the Otter Chain Ponds. The only through roads of the town are the river road, passing through Milford village and keeping close to the Penobscot; and one running east, south of east, and northeast in a devious route across the Baker, Little Birch, and Big Birch Brooks into Greenfield. A road also runs from the north part of Milford village to the Otter Chain.

HISTORICAL SKETCHES.*

Although this town has been settled about eighty years, it is largely forest, less than one-tenth of it being cleared land, which is mostly in the first tier of lots in the western part of the town, fronting on Penobscot River.

The underlying and predominating rock is mica schist; the only granite found within the limits of the township is in the shape of granite bowlders scattered here and there over the surface. The surface of the township is mostly low and level in its character, there being no very extensive ridges.

In the western part of the town, commencing at the south line, the land is slightly undulating and sloping gently to the river for the most part. This portion of the town affords excellent and extensive water power, and is the most wealthy and populous part of the town.

On what is known as Oldtown Falls is a large block of saw-mills of ancient date and somewhat antiquated construction.

Around this has grown up the village of Milford, its entire business being lumber, and as a consequence it has had alternate periods of growth and depression as the demand for lumber has been brisk or otherwise.

In this part of the town is another water power of less importance than the first named, on which no improvements have ever been made.

The northwestern part of the town, which has always been known as Sunkhaze, is so low and flat that Penobscot River freshets submerge a large part of it.

It is excellent grass land, and more farming has always been done here than in any other part of the town.

The northeastern part of the town is yet in its natural state, forest and the large meadow on Sunkhaze Stream occupying the whole of it. The forest has been and is now the scene of extensive lumbering operations, and the meadow was the resort of the early settlers for hay, which grows wild in abundance, and even now is utilized, though to a less extent than formerly. The southwestern part of the town is in a wild state; fires have consumed a large part of the original timber and a second growth is coming rapidly forward and even now is of considerable value.

The soil as a whole is not of the highest order even for New England. On the river and streams it is excellent, being easy to work, warm and productive, but as you leave the water courses it becomes cold, clayey and rocky, but there is hardly an acre of waste land in the town, as by clearing and cultivating it could all be made to produce excellent crops of grass.

With the commencement of the present century was the beginning of Milford. In the year 1800, near where the residence of True G. Brown now is, was a log house occupied by a family by the name of Smith. Mr. Smith was what our Western friends would call a squatter, having no right to the land he occupied, and gained a living from the river and the forest. About a year later than this the State of Massachusetts, to which Maine was then attached, sent out a surveying party to run out lots in Township No. 3, Old Indian Purchase (Milford). While surveying the township twelve of the party (whether the whole party or less history does not inform us), charmed with the fishing and hunting facilities of the country, selected lots on which to settle with their families. Early in the fall of 1802 they returned to their homes in Tyngsboro, Massachusetts, fully determined to emigrate to the Eastern wilderness.

The approaching winter, the hardships of pioneer life, the opposition of wives and families, removed the glamour of the wilderness from their minds, and only one of the party had the nerve to carry out his purpose. At this time Bangor was a very small village. There were a few settlers at Orono, and a very few families within the present limits of Oldtown. A double saw-mill had been built in 1798, by Richard Winslow, on the Oldtown side of the river, which, with one frame house, was probably all that occupied the place where now is the village of Oldtown. In the month of December Joseph Butterfield reached the place that was henceforth to be his home. That winter Mr. Butterfield and his family dwelt in the log cabin of which previous mention has been made, with Mr. Smith, and busied himself in cutting timber with which to build himself a house. This timber was sawed at Winslow's mill, and in 1803 Butterfield erected the first frame house in Milford, on the orchard lot which his descendants still own. This house was for a long time one of the landmarks of Milford, standing until a short time ago. The spot that Mr. Butterfield occupied, though white neighbors were few and far between, was not a lonely one. It was in the very heart of the Tarratine country, having been purchased of them in 1796, only six years before.

The Tarratines had once been a powerful and war-like tribe, and were still numerous. The house of Mr. Butterfield was separated by a narrow channel of the Penobscot from the Tarratine metropolis. These Indians had been friendly to the English settlers since 1726, but at this time perhaps were not the most desirable neighbors.

Milford was still a "forest primeval." Although so near the Indian capital, and until so recently the property of the Indians, it was still a virgin forest. Its natural appearance was unchanged. The "towering pines and the hemlocks" still stood unscathed by the woodman's axe; the Penobscot rolled its waters unvexed to the sea. All the natural wealth of the Penobscot Valley was still standing. The whole country was covered with pines, spruces, and hemlocks of the largest size and finest quality. What must have been the original aspect of the country when, after so many years of extensive and reckless cutting, the lumber business is still the most important industry of the Penobscot Valley? The woods abounded in game. Moose, deer, and caribou were easily taken by the skillful hunter, while beaver, otter, and all the lesser fur-bearing animals were the sources of a traffic with the Indians which yielded rich returns to the white man.

The Penobscot fairly swarmed with the finest fish—salmon, shad, and alewives were taken in quantities that seem now almost incredible. Shad Rips and the falls were fishing grounds of the greatest importance, and were resorted to for years by settlers from all parts of the valley.

In such a country as this it will be seen that luxuries would not be easily obtained, but the necessaries of life—shelter, food, and clothing—would be had without difficulty.

Here Mr. Butterfield lived for a short time alone, perhaps—the Smith family soon disappearing from the scene—but other settlers began to come in, and at the commencement of the War of 1812 several families had settled in the town.

A short time after the settlement of that part of the town where Milford village now is, the upper part of the town began to be settled also. Who was the first occupant of that part of the town it is now impossible to determine, but it is certain that in the first decade of the century Sunkhaze, as it was called, had its beginning, and that Samuel Dudley and, perhaps, others, were settled on the south side of Sunkhaze Stream. Samuel Bailey was living on the north side of the same stream, and an Irishman by the name of Larry Costigan was settled near the brook that now bears his name.

The war probably retarded the settlement of the town in a measure, but after the war the settlers began to come in slowly. Times were hard, the cold year (1816) and the scarcity occasioned by it turned the attention of the people of Maine to the milder climate and richer soil of the West, and what was known at the time as the "Ohio fever," was the result. Ohio was at that time a new State, and was supposed to offer better facilities than the bleak and barren East. A vast tide of emigration from Maine was the result. In every town farms were sold, stock disposed of, and every road filled with teams bound for the fair and fertile West. This was before the era of railroads, and a long and tedious journey was before the emigrant ere the enchanted ground was reached. The magnitude of this emigration may be divined when we learn that it reached No. 3, as Milford was then called.

Colonel Ingalls, whose family was one of the seven or eight that then occupied the township, was seized with the Ohio fever and emigrated with all his family except one daughter, who remained, becoming the wife of John Butterfield, the only son of Joseph Butterfield, just before the departure of her parents.

At this time the northern part of the town began to take the lead, and Sunkhaze began to assume local importance. The townships further up the river began to be settled and the lumber business to be developed.

The person who did most to shape the destiny of the embryo town was William Bridge. The exact date of his arrival does not appear. He came from Massachusetts, and for a number of years was engaged in the fish business. He purchased fish of the Indians, which he cured and salted for export. He no doubt foresaw the capabilities of the place, and through his representation Mr. Fiske, a capitalist of Boston, was induced to join with him in the purchase of the township. They are reported to have paid for it twelve and one-half cents per acre to the State of Massachusetts for the entire township except the few lots occupied by actual settlers. The business first engaged in by Mr. Bridge was fishing and trading with the Indians. This traffic was mostly in fish and furs, and shortly after the purchase of the township by Messrs. Fiske and Bridge a small store was built by them on the point where the ferry then was. Here they traded in a quiet way for some years, lumbering a little also, but making no attempts to improve the water power. This was about the time that Maine was admitted to the Union as a State, just before which No. 3 was made a Plantation and was known henceforth as Sunkhaze Plantation until its incorporation as the town of Milford.

At the time of the admission of Maine the country was nearly recovered from the effects of the late war, and the policy of the successful and satisfactory administration of Mr. Monroe gave a great impetus to business and created a demand for lumber, and the few saw-mills that were built at Oldtown, Orono, and further down the river were making some money. As yet none had been built at Milford.

A hotel had been built at Sunkhaze before 1820. It is still standing, and is known as the old Amos Bailey stand. A store, perhaps two, had been built in the upper part of the town by this time, but they were not doing what at this time would be considered a large business. From 1820 to 1825 were quiet years at the lower end of the town. Messrs. Fisk & Bridge were still fishing and trading, but no change of moment was made in this part of the town.

Sunkhaze increased somewhat in population, the building of the highway from the north line of Milford to the north line of Lincoln, which the State was then doing, and the increase in the lumber business, had caused another tavern to be built there, but Sunkhaze was soon to lose its supremacy. A movement was on foot to improve the water-power in the southern part of the town, and in 1826 the first saw-mill was built in Milford. A double saw-mill was built first. It is now standing, but instead of the two single saws, as at the time it was built, it contains the gang of saws known as No. 3.

The following year a second double mill was built on the shore, inside of the first-named, damming the river having caused a washout that was easiest repaired by erecting a mill. This mill is now occupied by a circular saw of the latest pattern, and a clapboard machine, and would probably surprise its original constructor, a celebrated millwright of the early days of Penobscot, by the name of Godfrey.

Fiske & Bridge continued to build mills until 1833, when the whole mill was completed. It stands now in outward appearance nearly the same as at its completion. When completed it consisted of eight double mills, containing seventeen single saws. The old machinery and wheels have nearly all been replaced with machinery of more modern construction. The building of these mills made a great change in the town. Milford village came into existence, and being the centre of business it at once took the lead of Sunkhaze, which it will maintain, probably forever.

At this time, too, the Military Road, as it was called, was being built from Lincoln to Houlton, an appropriation having been obtained from the General Government during the administration of John Quincy Adams. The building of this road and the hauling of supplies over it for the garrison then, and for many years afterwards maintained at Houlton, made business extremely lively, and was a fruitful source of revenue to the taverns along the road. At that time there were three in Sunkhaze alone, all doing a lively business.

These were the palmy days of Milford. Andrew Jackson was President, and it was flush times all over the country.

The business street of Milford in the early days was what is now known as Ferry street, at the foot of which was the ferry to Oldtown. The building of the Milford toll bridge in 1830, some distance below, caused a gradual transfer to what is now known as Main street. This condition of things will probably be a lasting one.

The building of the mills and the prosperous condition of business generally, caused Sunkhaze Plantation to grow ambitious, and in the winter of 1833 a bill was passed by the Legislature, incorporating it into a town by the name of Milford. It was named for Milford, Massachusetts, from which the early settlers of Sunkhaze came.

The act of incorporation was signed by Governor Samuel E. Smith on the 28th February, 1833. It bears the signatures of Francis O. J. Smith, who for the six succeeding years was a member of the State Legislature as President of the Senate, and Nathan Clifford as Speaker of the House, whose fame has since become national as Attorney-General and Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. From some cause which does not now appear, the act of incorporation was not accepted until the spring of 1835. On March 23 of that year Benjamin Johnston, a Justice of the Peace, issued his warrant to Joseph Demerritt, commanding him to notify the legal voters of the town to meet at the school-house in the south part of the town, to organize under the terms of the act, and to choose the necessary town officers.

Accordingly, on the 4th day of April, 1835, the act of incorporation was accepted and the town organized. At the first meeting of the legal voters of the new town Benjamin Johnston was chosen Moderator, Alexander Woodard Town Clerk, Benjamin Johnston, Nathaniel Gerrish, and Ebenezer Toothaker, Selectmen; Saul Dudley, Town Agent; Peleg Hall, Alfred O. Ingersoll, and Alanson Austin, School Committee. At this time the town was divided into two school districts, and Samuel Wright and Charles Brown were chosen School Agents. Previous to 1835 there was a dispute between Milford and Orono (then including Oldtown) about the dividing line, and in 1833 the Selectmen of Orono taxed the eight saws lying outside the sluiceway at Milford, claiming that said sluiceway was the main channel of the river and that the outside saws were within the limits of Orono, and should be taxed accordingly. This claim the inhabitants of Milford considered a most decided aggression. They accordingly appealed to the Supreme Court to decide the matter.

The Court appointed three commissioners to decide where the boundary was between the towns. The commissioners made an elaborate report deciding against the town of Orono, and establishing the lines as they now are.

This was the era of speculation. General Jackson had declared war against the United States Bank; Congress had refused to renew its charter, and the policy of the Government in depositing its funds in certain of the State banks had caused them to be greatly multiplied. The issue of such immense quantities of paper money caused a general rise in values and made this a period of wild and reckless speculation. This was all well enough while it lasted, but inflation then as now had its limit, and in 1837 the bubble burst. The good times of Jackson's administration was followed by the hard times that weighed down President Van Buren's administration. The financial disaster that overspread the country was nowhere more severely felt than in Eastern Maine. It was severely felt in Milford, and for a number of years no houses were built, no further improvements were made on the water-power, and with the exception of changes in the machinery but little has been done since.

Before the financial crash of 1837 Messrs. Fiske & Bridge had been endeavoring to develop the water-power to a greater extent, and it was supposed by many of the inhabitants that but a few years would elapse before the town would become a city, but their hopes were now deferred for a time at least, and that time is still in the future.

Financial depressions do not last always, and the effects of the panic of 1837, though felt for several years, were followed by good times.

The Penobscot country had come to be the great lumbering country of the East, and kept pace with the growth and improvement of the Nation. The stringency of the times diminished the cut of logs for a time, but the demand for lumber was soon active enough to employ all the saws on the river, and Milford had its share of the business. The mills were run night and day, and the large number of men employed made it brisk business for the merchants and hotel-keepers. At this time ('38 to '40) there were four stores and two hotels in Milford village. In Sunkhaze there were two stores and three taverns. Among the traders in Milford village was Samuel F. Hersey, who afterwards removed to Bangor, and died a few years ago a member of Congress and a millionaire. He occupied a store just below where the Willey Tavern (now the American House) stands. He was an enterprising, genial man, and was quite popular. He was Town Clerk in 1839, on the School Board in 1840, and was a candidate for Representative to the Legislature in 1841. In the year 1839 the dispute in regard to the Northeastern Boundary culminated in what is popularly known as the "Aroostook war." The section of country watered by the Aroostook and St. John Rivers being claimed by Great Britain as a part of the territory of New Brunswick, the permitting of timber on the Aroostook by that Province roused the State of Maine; and the Governor ordered four companies of militia to the disputed section to drive off the intruders. These companies were to accompany the Sheriff of Penobscot county as a posse comitatus. One of these companies was from Oldtown, known in those days as the Rac-caribas. In its ranks were quite a number of the citizens of Milford, who endured all the hardships of the expedition and the ridicule that was cast upon it through the masterly retreat of the Sheriff and the flight of its commander. There was no tragedy, but a good deal of farce. The leaders were responsible for this; the privates did their duty and afterwards received land warrants from the General Government.

In the election of 1840 Edward Kent was elected Governor by a decisive majority, and General Harrison was elected President. This was very pleasing to most of the citizens of Milford, which had been before and afterwards continued to be a stalwart Whig town. The canal at this time was occupied by a grist-mill and shingle- and clapboard-mill, but in 1842 Rufus Davenport established a pail-factory thereon that for a time did an immense business. It did too much business in fact. He made pails faster than he could sell them, and, having overstocked the market, he suspended operations. He got rid of his buildings at once, easily disposing of them by moving them off and making them into dwellings, but he carried a stock of pails several years.

There had been but little change in the appearance of the town for several years, but the lumbering business continuing to prosper, a larger cut of logs was made in the winter of 1844-45 than in any previous year; some building began to be done, especially on the upper end of the main street.

About this time Samuel Wright, who had been agent for the Mill Company since the commencement of their operations, resigned his position and was succeeded by Rufus Davenport.

In the latter part of May, 1849, William Bridge died. He had commenced his career in his younger days with high hopes of wealth and prosperity, but he was doomed to disappointment. His latter days were crowded with misfortunes, and death was probably welcomed by him.

The discovery of gold in California in 1848, and the rapid development of that country caused a fever in Milford, as it did in other parts of the country. A great exodus took place, many of the smartest and most enterprising young men emigrating to the golden shores of the Pacific. It was supposed that a great influx of wealth would be the result, and it was said that a bank would have to be established, but the wealth did not come in and the bank has not yet been founded. A large number of those who went out at this time died soon after reaching the land of promise. Some have never returned and most of those who have come back have never seemed to be overburdened with "filthy lucre."

In 1849 the cholera raged with fearful violence in the country. It reached Milford, and though greatly feared there was but one death in the village. In the French settlement of the south end near Bradley it made great havoc, fourteen dying, a very large percentage, for the French inhabitants were few in number.

In 1850 Rufus Davenport resigned his position as agent for the Mill Company and was succeeded by Stephen D. Brown. Under Mr. Davenport's superintendence some changes had been made in the machinery of the mills. Four gangs of saws had been set up and single saws removed to make room for the same. These changes increased the capacity of the mills for the production of lumber. Such changes had taken place in most of the mills on the river, and proved necessary, as the cut of logs on the river was more than three times as great in 1850 as in 1840.

About 1853 a new road was laid out from Milford to Greenfield. It was laid out through the southern part of the town, and was begun in the spring of 1854, some two miles of the road being completed that season. It was a long and costly route. It required several years to complete it, and was quite a burden for so small a town to carry. About the year 1850 the need of suitable accommodations for school purposes began to be felt in the southern part of the town. At the time of the incorporation of the town the old school-house, the remains of which are still to be seen on the ledge near the river, in the upper part of the village, was the intellectual cradle in which the youth of the district were rocked, but it soon gave place to a new and more commodious school-house; this was in the outskirts of the village near the border of the pine forest called Pine Knoll. It only contained one room, and by 1850 the scholars had become too numerous for its limited capacity, and besides improvement was the order of the day, and it was seen that an improvement could be made by organizing and grading the scholar into more than one school. For a few years primary schools were held in such rooms as could be obtained in various parts of the district. But this was only a makeshift, and did not give satisfaction.

In the spring of 1853 a small building was erected on Davenport street, by the combined efforts of dissatisfied parties, and a private school established. This was quite successful for a time, but at length a district meeting was called, and it was voted to build a new school-house, and money was appropriated for that purpose. The building was at once commenced, and in December, 1854, the lower story was occupied for the purpose for which it was intended. Two schools were established in the rooms on the ground floor. They were quite conveniently arranged, and the district had now a school-house, of which it need not be ashamed. The old house near Pine Knoll was taken for a town house, and for a number of years was the Mecca towards which the countenances of the legal voters of the town were turned at least twice in the year, the annual meeting of March and September.

For a number of years efforts had been made in March meetings looking to the purchase of a Town Farm or Almshouse. In 1854 the sum of $500 was appropriated to purchase a lot and erect buildings thereon, and a committee was appointed to make the purchase and expend the money. The committee was also authorized to hire $1,500 at six per cent., if necessary. The lot was purchased and buildings erected. It cost enough to be, and perhaps was, a profitable investment.

In 1854 the Bangor, Oldtown & Milford Railroad built a bridge across the Penobscot, and Milford became the northern terminus of that road. It was a good thing for the hotel-keepers and blacksmiths. Many teams were employed in transporting the freight to the up-river country. In the summer the steamboats on the Penobscot River were employed in the business, but in the winter it was done by horses, and Milford had the benefit of this activity.

Milford at this time was a lively place. The war raging in Europe had an enlivening effect on the business of the United States. A great demand was created for American breadstuffs and provisions, and the merchant marine of the country was the finest in the world. Maine, as the leading ship-building State of the Union, was especially prosperous. The year 1855 was one of the greatest activity, more lumber being rafted on Penobscot boom than in any previous year, and the ship-building business of Maine was that year of surpassing magnitude.

But good times do not always last. Hard times come, no matter who is President, and in 1857 another period of stringency began. It affected the lumber business of the Penobscot seriously. The amount of lumber rafted on Penobscot boom in 1857 was 62,416,000 feet, a great fall off from the previous year, when the amount rafted was 143,271,000 feet. A shrinkage of values followed, and for a time the supply of labor was greater than the demand.

In 1858, on the petition of Stephen Call and others, a new road was laid out from the upper end of Milford village to Sunkhaze Meadow. It was several years in building, and the appropriations for this and the eastern road running to Greenfield, not yet finished, made taxes somewhat heavier than they had been.

In 1859 S. D. Brown resigned as agent for the Milford Mill Company, and was succeeded by Lewis Simpson, who held the position until said company sold out and dissolved in the fall of 1880.

The year 1860 was one of great political excitement. The Democratic party was divided against itself, and the Republican party, after a brilliant and exciting campaign, elected Abraham Lincoln President of the United States. Previous to the formation of the Republican party Milford had been a Whig town, and upon the dissolution of the Whig party it naturally gravitated to the new organization. In the Presidential election of 1860 the Lincoln electors received eighty-one votes, all others thirty, and the political character of the town remained the same for some years.

But the South chose to regard the election of Lincoln as a menace to slavery, and now came the crucial period of the Republic. War's fiery furnace was to test the strength of Republican institutions, and even the smallest hamlet was to be called upon to furnish victims.

When the first call was made for volunteers by President Lincoln, a meeting of the legal voters of the town was called for the 13th day of May, 1861, and a sum of money was raised to provide for the families of volunteers. Several of the citizens of Milford enlisted in the Second Maine, the first regiment to go from Eastern Maine, and fought valiantly at Bull Run and all the subsequent battles in which the regiment was engaged. But the South was terribly in earnest, and the war continued. Call after call was made, and Milford was represented in the various regiments that went forth to the conflict.

In 1862, when the terrible demand for men could not be supplied by volunteers and a draft was ordered, a public meeting was called and money was raised to hasten the filling of the quota of the town. But the war went on, and the call was men, more men. To every demand the town responded nobly, and the men were forwarded and money was voted without stint or hesitation. In 1863 the town was paying $225 for men in addition to State and Government bounty.

As the calls were made, town meetings were called and money voted to raise volunteers; but two drafts were made, and those drafted from the town were placed on the same footing and had the same bounty as volunteers.

The war came on just as the country was recovering from the hard times that followed the crash of 1857. It was supposed that times would be the hardest ever known, and in fact the season of 1861 was a hard one for the lumbermen. The demand for lumber being so light the West Branch drive was not drove in to the boom that season, but was boomed into the lower lakes, where it remained until the following year. Part of the saws in Milford were run that season and business proved much better than had been expected. The vast expenditures of the Government, the withdrawal of so many men from their ordinary avocations to the services of the Government, and the issue of paper money, stimulated business of all kinds, and by the spring of 1862 business of all kinds was in the most flourishing condition. Even the lumber business that it was supposed the war would almost wholly cut off, shared in the general improvement and stood on the same footing as the rest. The flourishing condition of the country made a demand for lumber for home consumption, and a large demand was made for Maine spruce in the West Indies and South America in consequence of the blockade of Southern ports shutting off the supply of hard pine, that had before furnished those markets. The mills on the river were running full time, lumber continually increasing in value, labor was in great demand, and wages all the time tending upward; and while the best and bravest of the country's sons were dying on the battlefield, while the country was running into debt with a rapidity that surprised the whole world, the sacrifices of the country were partially compensated by the flourishing condition of business of all kinds.

The year 1862 was a prosperous one, and 1863 was an improvement on the preceding year. Lumber continued to rise in value, and the wages of labor were constantly rising.

In 1864 lumber reached a higher point than ever before, and probably higher than it has reached since. It was a remarkably dry season. The water in the river was low and the saws cut out lumber slowly. Men were extremely scarce and wages very high. All the mills on the river were running, many of them day and night. All the saws in Milford, one of which was so old and out of repair as to be considered almost worthless, were kept busy. It was a time of general activity and plenty, and but for the awful sacrifices of war it might be regarded as the most prosperous period of the Republic. In the winter of 1865 the last call of President Lincoln was filled, and in March and April they were sent forward. But the end was near. The most of those raised under the last call were stopped at Portland and Boston, and with the capture of Richmond and the surrender of Lee the supremacy of the Government was established. The absent ones were to return to their homes, and fathers, mothers, wives, sisters, and brothers were to be made happy by the return of their loved ones. But not all were to be thus favored. Seventeen of the sons of Milford had laid down their lives on the battlefield, and many of those who returned came back with constitutions weakened by exposure and disease.

The spring of 1865 opened with a good stock of logs in the river, but it was supposed that the price of lumber must go down gradually. And it did go down for a spell; wages, too, fell greatly, and it was thought by some that the supply of men would be so great that labor would command starvation prices, but by July every man that wished to work was employed, and labor and wages were both tending upward. It was a very dry season; the drought was severer than in the preceding year, and there was considerable difficulty in filling the orders for lumber. It continued to rise in value, and in the fall was nearly as high as in the previous year. The favorable condition of business, and the demand for saws caused some improvement to be made in the mills at Milford, all the saws being put in a rentable condition.

The year 1866 was a remarkably good one for sawing lumber. There was no drought. The river was at good sawing pitch all summer. The whole mill was run, much of it day and night. There was a great demand for lumber, and a large stock of logs in the river; everything favored the manufacturer. It was a good year and everybody was making money. At this time considerable business was done in the forest in the southeastern part of town. A good deal of hemlock bark was peeled, and some railroad ties and ship knees were made, and hauled to the railroad station at Milford. The succeeding year, 1867, was also one of great business prosperity. Logs were plenty, lumber sold well, and the drought was not a severe one. The operators in the mills this year were P. D. Hathorn, who occupied the shore end, and F. M. Cunningham, who occupied the stream end.

The year 1868 was another prosperous one. The lumber business was brisk, and, in consequence, all other kinds of business carried on in the town were also prosperous. The operators this year were P. D. Hathorn, Wilder Brothers, and F. M. Leavitt. The building of railroads was being pushed vigorously in all parts of the country, and the European & North American Railway (at the present time the most important in Eastern Maine) was commenced this year. The bridge at Milford was finished this season, and regular trips to Milford were commenced in December of this year. At the same time the road was opened to Olamon. The next summer the European & North American Railway Company purchased the line of steamers running from Oldtown to Winn and operated in connection with their railway, running at first from Olamon, afterwards from Passadumkeag to the head of navigation. This cut off the Bangor, Oldtown & Milford Railroad from the up river country and made a vast difference in the status of that road in Milford. The freight and passenger business of that road dwindled down to a local business and this was shared with the new railway. The building of the new railroad made a gradual change in the manner of transporting to market the lumber manufactured at the mills. The river had always been used as a medium by which to transport lumber to Bangor, where it was shipped to such places as required it. Immense rafts were built at the foot of the mills, the various kinds and sizes being put into it, and when the water was at a good pitch for running these rafts they were deck-loaded with shingles, lath, and clapboards, and such other kinds of short lumber as the market required to be made. The current of the river then conveyed these rafts to Bangor in a very short time in high water, where they were broken up, sorted and surveyed previous to being shipped to buyers.

But the railway changed all this. At first the short lumber was shipped by rail, and afterwards the long lumber as well. In the year 1870 Messrs. Dillingham & Wing, of Oldtown, purchased the Butterfield lot on the river, in the upper part of the village, and erected a steam mill. It contained a circular saw for cutting long lumber, and three shingle machines. It was quite an important factor in the business of the town, being run for a time winter and summer. In the winter of 1871 machinery for making Excelsior was put in this mill, and quite a business was done in this line. In the fall of 1872 it was burned. It was afterwards rebuilt on a small scale to manufacture the stock on hand, but after the poplar in the storehouse was used up it discontinued operations, and the engine and other machinery was sold and removed.

Another steam mill was built in Milford at about the same time, on the Greenfield road, four miles from Milford Station. It was put up by Rand & Ames, and did quite a business in staves and heading for a time, but it was not a paying investment, and the owners meeting with heavy losses it was shut down and never run afterwards.

The lumber business at this time was not so prosperous as it had been, and in 1873 the whole of the mills did not run, and the "panic" of that year and the hard times following made almost an entire suspension of manufacturing. In 1874 and 1875 one gang and one single saw was in operation. Afterwards for several years no long lumber was manufactured, and but little short lumber.

These were the hard times that sat like an incubus on the whole country, and Milford felt these in all their stringency. Its mills idle, and no employment for labor, was particularly hard for a town where farming was of so little moment, and the manufacture of lumber almost the only resource. After several years of almost total inaction the idle wheels began to turn and the manufacturing interest began to recuperate. Heretofore the business of the Milford mills had been largely long lumber, but the hard times produced a change to short lumber. Shingles being especially in demand, machinery for manufacturing them was placed in the mills, and several Milford firms engaged quite largely in their manufacture. Although but a small part of the mill was in operation, quite a number of men were employed. The "Centennial" year, 1876, was one of the dullest years, but after this a gradual improvement took place. In 1877 there were six shingle machines in operation, and it was supposed the business of the town would be about the same as that of the previous year, but the burning of the mills at Oldtown, in June, 1878, made a decided change in the business condition of Milford. The entire mill was leased to the firms that had been sawing at Oldtown, and Milford presented its old-time appearance. The mills being in demand, the owners began to improve them and make such changes as would adapt them to modern machinery. The mills were put in connection with the railroad, and lumber ceased to be conveyed by water to market.

The year 1878 made a great change in the political condition of Maine. For more than twenty years the Republican party had held complete control of the State, and Milford had rolled up large majorities for that party. The Greenback party now developed immense strength, and uniting with the Democratic party succeeded in wresting the State from the Republicans. The vote in Milford this year was tie on the candidates for Governor, the Republican party and the Fusion party each polling seventy one votes.

In 1879 business in all departments continued to improve and there was employment for all the labor of the town at fairly remunerative prices.

The next year, 1880, was one of great prosperity. It witnessed a general revival in all branches of business and especially in lumber. A sharp and sudden advance in the price of lumber put every lumberman in the best possible humor. The saws were run to their full capacity and the only drawback was the long and extreme drought. This was the year of the Presidential election, and in Milford the Republicans made a decided gain from two years before, carrying the town by thirty-five majority.

Another event of some importance to the citizens of the town took place this year, the water-power mills and seventeen thousand acres of land within the limits of the township being sold by the proprietors, the Milford Mill Company, to a new company, known as the Milford Land and Lumber Company, for $85,000. On the land was a large amount of valuable timber which the new party proceeded to cut largely. They also made large improvements in the mills, putting in a new circular saw and otherwise increasing the capacity of the mill. The new firm is composed of Joseph R. Bodwell, Francis Cobb, W. H. Maling, J. W. Bodwell, and others, and it is to be hoped they design other improvements that will add largely to the business of the place. Owing a water-power equal to and superior to that of many of the largest manufacturing cities of the county, they have only to develop it to a limited extent to reap a rich harvest for themselves and to make for Milford an important place among the manufacturing centres of the State. The first year of their ownership has made a great change in the appearance of the town. More men are employed than ever before, and the general condition is one of thrift and prosperity.

Perhaps the liveliness of the present year is the harbinger of better things, and in the near future the natural advantages of Milford for manufacturing purposes may be utilized, and the town commence a new career of growth and business activity.

SKETCHES OF SETTLERS.

George N. Gerrish is the son of Amasa S. and Mahala T. Gerrish, of Milford. Amasa Gerrish was a native of Milford, his father, Nathaniel Gerrish, being one of the early settlers of the town. Amasa and Mahala Gerrish had four children, viz: Carrie E., now Mrs. A. B. Libby, of this town; George N., Tena A., and Maidee. George N., the only son of this family, was born in Milford April 18, 1858; after receiving a common school education, he went into the mercantile business for himself in 1879, in company with Mr. Simpson, under the firm name of G. N. Gerrish & Co., continuing in the business about two years, when he sold out to the Milford Land and Lumber Co., and has since been in their employ. He is at present Treasurer of the town of Milford.

Mr. S. C. Higgins, of North Milford, is a son of Reuben and Susan Higgins, nee Susan Dickey, of Thorndike, Waldo county, Maine. His grandfather, Isaac Higgins, came from Gorham, Maine. Reuben and Susan Higgins had six children, three sons and three daughters, viz: George D., deceased; Marshall T., now of Thorndike, Maine; Stephen C.; Esther, wife of Leonard W. Mann, of Greenbush, Maine; Calista J., now Mrs. J. C. Cilley, of Lincolnville, Maine; Mary A., wife of Thomas McFarland, of Belfast, Maine. Mr. Higgins lived and died in Thorndike; he was a farmer. Mr. Higgins died somewhere about the year 1860. Mrs. Higgins is still living with her daughter Mrs. Cilley. S. C. Higgins was born November 13, 1837, in Thorndike. After completing his education in the common and high school he came to North Milford in 1859, and engaged with Mr. Paul Dudley to work on his farm and about the store. He worked for Mr. Dudley ten years when he bought his store, farm and lumbering business. Since then he has lived in Milford and continued in the business of lumbering, farming and merchandising. During the winter he furnishes about twenty to thirty horses and men for the lumbering business in the woods. He does not manufacture his lumber but sells the logs. During the spring and early summer he employs about twenty-five men on the river running logs down, under the firm name of Higgins & Buzzell. He married Miss Hannah W. Burr, daughter of Warren Burr, of Argyle, Maine. They have two children, Myrtie M. and Paul D. Mr. Higgins has held the positions of Selectman, School Committeeman, etc., in his town. He is a member of the Star in the East Lodge of Free and Accepted Masons of Oldtown, also of St. John's Commandery No. 3, of Bangor.

William Oakes, a native of Temple, came to Olamon in this county in 1823, where he lived until 1835; then moved to Upper Stillwater, where he lived until 1858, when he moved to Wisconsin, and died in 1872. He married Martha S. Glidden. They had eight children, all of whom grew to maturity: William A., now of Milford, Maine; James R.; Wallace C., deceased; Henry H., deceased; Celestia W., now Mrs. Michaels, of Upper Stillwater, Maine; Martha J., wife of Charles J. Ellis, of Michigan; Nancy E., now Mrs. Caleb Williams, of the same place; Wilbert C., now in Peshtigo, Wisconsin. James R. Oakes was born December 27, 1833.

He has always, or until within ten years, been engaged on the river as a lumberman. He is still largely interested in the lumber business. Though not perhaps classed as a manufacturer, he does manufacture part of his lumber. He married Miss Eunice G. Cilley, daughter of Captain Cilley, of Alton, Maine. Mr. Oakes has been Selectman and Treasurer for many years in this town. Mr. William Oakes, father of James R., lost his property, and nearly lost his life in the great fire of Peshtigo, Wisconsin, in 1869.

Joseph Hammond, a native of Paris, Maine, married Lydia L. Cushman. They had eight children, seven of whom grew to maturity, viz: George, now of Lincoln, Maine; Ira F., also living in Lincoln; Andrew, subject of this sketch; Marion W., deceased, wife of Hiram B. Forbes, of Presque Isle, Maine; Sarah E., now Mrs. Isaac McGlaughlin, of Presque Isle, Maine; B. Cushman; Eva, wife of George Snow, of Lincoln, Maine. Andrew Hammond, the third son of this family, was born November 17, 1834. He married Lizzie Sanborn, daughter of Jethro and Betsey Sanborn, of Newport, Maine. They have two children, viz: Clara A. and James Blaine. Mr. Hammond was brought up on a farm, and on becoming of age, followed the business of farming until about twenty-four years of age, when he engaged in the lumber business, which he followed about eighteen years, until 1877, when he went into trade in Milford, Maine, where he has since continued. He keeps a stock of general merchandise. Mr. Hammond has held the office of Selectman in this town, and in other towns where he has lived. He is at present chairman of the board in Milford.

John A. Dudley, of Milford, is a son of John and Nancy Dudley (nee Nancy Cummings). His grandfather, Paul Dudley, was a native of Massachusetts. He came to Penobscot county about 1798, and settled in Milford on what is now known as the Dexter Brown place. He was a Revolutionary soldier in Washington's army. John and Nancy Dudley had five children, viz: Lucy L., deceased wife of Richard Blaisdell; Daniel D., now in Minnesota; Leafy, wife of William Baily of Milford; James C., of Minnesota; John H. Mr. Dudley always followed the lumber business in connection with farming. He died March 18, 1869; Mrs. Dudley died December 20, 1864. John A. Dudley was born January 18, 1828, in Milford, where he now lives. He married Lucy M. Hathorn, daughter of Eli and Hannah Hathorn, of Milford. Mr. Dudley has a good farm of 150 acres on the river road in Milford, with a good set of buildings, and is a well-to-do farmer.

M. G. Stone came from New Hampshire to Maine in about 1808. He first settled in Bangor, but shortly moved from there and lived in Greenfield, Passadumkeag, and Bradley, where he located in 1819. He married Deborah Chesley, of New Durham, and had a family of eight children—Josiah, Abigail, Mary, David, Benjamin, Nancy, M. C. and Alfred M. Mr. Stone died in 1849; his wife died in 1855. M. C. Stone was born in 1813. He married Mary Jane Atkins, daughter of Nathaniel Atkins, who had nine children—Joseph W., Hannah P., Mary J., Henry, Nancy C., Nathaniel A., Charles W., Olive A., and Justin B. Mr. and Mrs. Stone were married in 1843, and have had five children—Charles W., living at home; Olive D., now Mrs. Rogers, of Milford; Abbie F., now Mrs. Stafford, of Bangor, and Mary J., now Mrs. Cunningham, of Milford. Mr. Stone has been engaged as log agent, and though sixty-eight years of age still works at the business.

Among the prominent men of Milford is M. W. Sawyer, who is the son of Edmund Sawyer, of Medford, Maine. He was born in Saco, Maine, and lived for a time at Oldtown. He moved to Medford about 1835, where he still lives. He married Lovinia Snow, of Milo. They had six children, three of whom only arrived at maturity, viz: Lizzie F., now Mrs. I. G. Mayo, of Milo; Carrie H., now Mrs. W. W. Walton, of Milo; and M. W., all of whom are still living. M. W. Sawyer was born in Medford, Maine, March 1, 1839. He came to Milford and settled in 1865, engaging in general merchandising and lumber business. In 1865 he married Miss Lucy A. Willey, daughter of William Willey, of Milford. They have had three children, viz: Edmund M., Frank W., and Lulu B., all of whom are still living at home. Mr. Sawyer has a fine store and dwelling house in Milford, and is one of the most prominent men of the place. He has served his town as Treasurer for several years.

F. H. Butterfield is a son of John Butterfield, who came to this town from Kingsboro, Massachusetts, when a lad of seven years. The father married Betsey C. Ingalls, of Milford, and had fourteen children, ten of whom arrived at maturity—Mary, Charlotte, Emeline, Charles W., Joseph, John, George F., Harry N., William J., and F. H. F. H. Butterfield was born March 18, 1840, and is unmarried. William J., born February 27, 1838, married Lois D. Riggs, of Milford, and has had four children, of whom two are living—Hattie E. and Bessie E. William is now Clerk of this town. The Butterfield Brothers' hotel is the oldest in town. They have kept the hotel together since 1869, though William J. was in the business before this date. They do a large business, boarding the mill men.

Among the prominent men of Milford is Mr. Arthur Lamb, who is the son of William Lamb, of Sheffield. William Lamb married Miss Nancy Pollock, of Edinburgh. They had five children, viz: William, Arthur, James, John, and Thomas, all of whom are now deceased except Arthur, who was born in 1813, and came to this country in 1835. He married Hannah Cookson, daughter of Joseph Cookson, of Greenfield, Maine. They have had ten children, nine of whom are still living: William L. of this town; James, now of Lincoln, Maine; Arthur, now of Greenfield, Maine; Joseph, now of Greenbush, Maine; Lany A., now Mrs. Missue, of Greenbush; Agnes J., now Mrs. J. Priest, of Milford; Polly, now Mrs. E. McDade, of Milford; Sarah, now Mrs. Levi Priest, of Canaan, Maine; and Florence, now of Lowell, Massachusetts. Mr. Lamb first settled in Milford village, where he lived eighteen years. He then moved to Greenbush and lived about thirteen years, then moved to his present farm in North Milford. Mr. Lamb has served as Assessor, Overseer of the Poor, Selectman, etc. He is now one of the Selectmen of this town. He is also the mail carrier from this office to Greenfield.

Captain Samuel Baily came here or to this county from Boston with his father, Samuel Baily, Sr., about 1798 or 1799. He first settled in Bangor, or his father did, where he lived about ten years, and then moved to Milford. Samuel Baily, Sr., married Eleanor Bird. They had three girls and seven boys, viz: Sarah, Samuel, William, Amos, Polly, Thomas, Jane, John, David and Daniel. Samuel Baily, Sr., was a drum major in the Revolutionary war. He was among the very first settlers of this town. Samuel Baily, the father of William Baily, the subject of this sketch, married Catharine Dudley, of this town, daughter of Paul Dudley, Esq. They had eleven children, viz: Paul D., Charles, Nancy D., Lucy, Lucretia, Martha D., William, Catharine, David, Samuel, Paul D., (the first by that name having died). Mrs. Baily died March 23, 1821, and Mr. Baily married for his second wife Leafy (or Olivia) Cummings, by whom he had two children—Samuel and Caroline. Mr. Baily followed various pursuits during his life, being a farmer, trader (Indian), lumberman, etc. He died January 18, 1832. William Baily is the third son of this family. He married Olivia C. Dudley, daughter of John Dudley, of Milford, March 26, 1838, and settled on the old homestead, where he has since lived, and where all his brothers and sisters were born. Mr. and Mrs. Baily have had only one child, Carrie E., who married E. W. Conant. She died December 24, 1874, leaving one son—Eddie A.—now fourteen years old. Mr. Baily has followed the business of trader, lumberman, and drover.

Among the old settlers of Milford is Mr. George F. Dudley, who was born here. His father's name was Paul Dudley, who was the son of Paul Dudley, Sr. Paul Dudley, Jr., came to this town in 1798 when thirteen years old. He married Mary Freeze of Argyle, Maine, daughter of Isaac Freeze. Isaac Freeze was taken prisoner at Castine by the British and compelled to work in their fortifications, ships, etc. Paul Dudley, Sr., settled in the neighborhood now called Sunkhaze, being one of the first settlers; came on the ice. Paul Dudley, Jr., had eight children who grew to maturity, four boys and four girls, viz: Arad, Rebecca F., Charlotte J., Susan P., William F., George F., Eben W., and Margaret A. Paul Dudley, Jr., died in October, 1868. Mrs. Dudley died in 1856. George F. Dudley, the subject of this sketch, was born June 20, 1821, being the fourth child born and living in town. He married in 1849 Miss Rebecca T. Daily, daughter of Nezer Daily, of Canton, Maine. They had two children, viz: George H., now of Milford, and Mary R. Mrs. Dudley died September 27, 1856. Mr. Dudley married for his second wife Mrs. Sarah Dudley, daughter of Orrington Smith, of Bucksport, and the widow of another person of the same name, by whom he has two children, viz: Fred and Charles H. Mrs. Dudley had one child by her first husband, also named Fred. Mr. Dudley has one hundred and sixty acres of land, and also follows lumbering for a business.

PASSADUMKEAG.

[The following interesting and valuable additions to the history of this town, by Mr. M. A. Austin, of Milford, were received after the former sketch had gone through the press.]

This is a well watered town, fronting as it does on so large a river, besides which the Passadumkeag, a stream of no mean proportions, flows diagonally through the town from the eastern to the western line. Cold Stream, the outlet of Cold Stream Pond, waters the northeast part of the township, and joins its waters with the Passadumkeag, near the centre of the town. Much of the soil of the town is low and flat or sandy in its character, but there is some good land. There is some good land fronting on the Penobscot River and some very good farms, and there is a ridge of land running from Passadumkeag Stream to the south line of the town about two miles back of the main river, where there is some excellent land though a portion of it is somewhat rocky.

This ridge is known by the name of Gould's Ridge. It extends into the town of Greenbush, and here are some very good farms and a neighborhood of thrifty, enterprising farmers. Between the ridge and the Penobscot River is a tract of forest land, and the boggy character of the soil will probably cause it to remain in its natural state for a long time to come.

In the eastern part of the town is a large natural meadow, which, being overflowed by the surplus waters of the Passadumkeag in the annual spring freshets, produces plentiful crops of wild grass. It was the great resource of the early settlers of this and adjoining towns, and even now it makes an important part of the hay crop of many of the farmers.

This town was included within the six-mile strip, extending six miles back from the eastern bank of the Penobscot, recognized as belonging to the Tarratines previous to the treaty of 1796. In that year that tribe of Indians ceded to the whites, by treaty with the State of Massachusetts, a strip of land six miles wide, beginning at the head of the tide on the eastern side of the Penobscot and ending at the north line of what is now Passadumkeag. This tract of land was known in the early part of the century as the "Old Indian Purchase." A few years after this it was laid off into townships, and these townships subdivided into lots by order of the State of Massachusetts.

The exact date at which the town was settled it is impossible now to ascertain, but it was shortly before the War of 1812. At the time that war commenced there were six families in town, James Comings and his son Benjamin Comings, Elisha Tourtelotte, Joshua Ayers, Enoch Ayers, and Elisha P. Evans.

These settlers came to No. 1, as the town was then called, at nearly the same time, the Comingses and Ayerses preceding Tourtelotte and Evans by a year or two. Mr. James Comings came from Meredith, Massachusetts. He was a man of thrift and energy, and possessed a large share of the accumulative faculty for which the sons of Massachusetts have always been noted. His wife was a lady by the name of Ingalls, and was a sister to Colonel Ingalls, one of the early settlers of Milford. He settled on a lot of land fronting on the Penobscot River about two miles above the south line of the town. He applied all his energies to the improvement of the land he occupied and soon had a good farm. He set out the first fruit trees in the town and soon had a good orchard for that time and locality. He built a large house and buildings fronting the river, and used to provide food and lodging to such travelers as called for it. Rivers have always been the highways of pioneers and the location of Mr. Comings was just right to accommodate the primitive travel of the Penobscot.

The other settlers occupied lots on the river and began to carve out homes for themselves in the wilderness.

In 1815 Reuben Tourtelotte came into the town and settled on the main river, a short distance below the mouth of the Passadumkeag.

In 1816 Thomas Knowlen moved into the town. He was a hunter, and was very skillful in his avocation.

Joshua Hathaway came here in the year 1820. He settled on the point formed by the confluence of the Passadumkeag with the Penobscot.

This was considered a very pleasant and valuable location, and it is the site of the village of Passadumkeag.

Squire Hathaway, as he was called, was a gentleman of the old school. He had an excellent education, was a pleasant and genial companion, and was possessed of more than average abilities.

The first road in the town followed the river closely. It was cut through the township in 1816. It was rough and rugged in its character, being the primitive style of highway, but it supplied all the needs of that early period.

The first trader in town was Ezra Richardson, who commenced business in a small way. The store he occupied was a log one, but it was suited to the needs of that rude period. Shortly after the formation of the State of Maine in 1820, an appropriation was made by the Legislature to improve the road running near the Penobscot. It was laid out in what are now the towns of Greenbush, Passadumkeag, Enfield, and Lincoln.

This was a great help to the country on the Upper Penobscot, and the building by the General Government of the Military Road, as it was called, from Lincoln to Houlton, to accommodate the garrison maintained at that place, was a great convenience and a great help to the opening up of the country.

In the fall of 1825 Thomas Knowlen, before mentioned, went to the Aroostook country on one of his hunting expeditions. He was accompanied by one companion, and they had excellent luck, securing a large lot of valuable furs. Knowlen never returned, but his body was afterwards found in the stream near which he had encamped. His companion came back and stated that Knowlen was killed by the Indians, but he was not generally believed, and it was commonly supposed that he had a hand in the matter himself.

About 1826 Squire Hathaway sold out on the Point and moved up the Passadumkeag to the mouth of Cold Stream. Mr. Hathaway was the first mail-carrier in this section of the country, and many were the delicate and important commissions with which he was entrusted. The route was between Passadumkeag and Bangor, and he was a faithful and conscientious public servant.

The first tavern was built by James Sanders, Jr., in 1820, and shortly afterwards Tristram F. Jordan built a second one. Sanders's was on the north side of Passadumkeag Stream, and Jordan's on the south side, and both did a good business. All the supplies for the garrison at Houlton were hauled by teams by here, besides the business of all the up-river country. In addition to the hotel business Messrs. Sanders and Jordan went into trade, and Passadumkeag Point, as it was called, became the centre of quite an extent of country.

Before 1830 Parson Lawton began to labor in this place, and it ever afterwards remained his home. He was a Congregationalist, and through his efforts a flourishing church was established.

About 1830 Dr. Murch settled in the place and remained here a long time. He was the first physician, and built up quite a practice.

Gould's Ridge was first settled by 1822. It was named for Zebediah Gould, who settled on the Greenbush end and built a timber house there, near the bank of Olamon Stream.

Shortly after this Joseph Spiller and Nicholas Gilman moved onto the Ridge, felled trees and built houses. There was no road there at this time, and the first settlers followed the path which the Ayerses, the first settlers of Argyle, had made in order to reach Passadumkeag meadow.

Before this time it was the custom of the families settled in the upper part of Argyle, to cut hay on the meadow and stack it at the junction of Cold Stream with the Passadumkeag. Here they built log barns to which they drove their cattle and kept them for the winter. It looks like a shiftless proceeding now, but we know not the difficulties which surrounded the early settlers.

The hotels and stores at the "Point" made that the commercial centre of the township, and about them grew up quite a smart little village. It is a pleasant and salubrious location, but the lack of water-power has retarded its growth, and it is not probable that it will ever become so large a place as its projectors believed.

The town was never a plantation, but in 1834 the inhabitants had become quite numerous and some organized form of government was necessary. They accordingly petitioned the Legislature to be incorporated into a town by the name of Passadumkeag. The Legislature promptly responded, and in January, 1835, passed a bill incorporating the town of Passadumkeag. A meeting was called in March of that year, and the act of incorporation accepted. The first officers were Tristram F. Jordan, Clerk; Tristram F. Jordan, Samuel Dam, Amos Dennis, Selectmen; Aaron Haynes, Treasurer and Collector; William T. Baker, Joshua Norton, Jr., John S. Patten, School Committee; Joshua T. Haynes, Constable. The old name by which the village at the Point had always been known was retained for the whole town. It is an Indian name, and signifies "quick water." It is not exactly applicable to the lower part of the stream of that name, and it is probably derived from the rips on the Penobscot between Passadumkeag and Edinburg.

About this time another tavern was erected by Isaac Haynes in the upper part of the town on the river road. At that time steamboats and railroads had not been introduced, and all the business was done by horse teams, a great number of which were employed in hauling the supplies required by the heavy lumbering operations carried on in the forest country above. Hotels were numerous in those days. In country places they were generally not more than four miles apart, and in every place where any business was done two or more were generally established. Passadumkeag was then the most important place on the river between Milford and Lincoln, and being half-way between those it was supposed that it was the natural centre of a large extent of country. But the want of water-power has been severely felt, and the village has not kept pace with the expectations of its founders.

The first member of the legal fraternity was a man by the name of Randall. He remained here many years, but finally removed to Lincoln. Another lawyer attracted to the young and as was supposed promising village was James B. Cleveland, a son of the celebrated Professor Cleveland, of Bowdoin College. James B. graduated at that institution, studied law, and settled in Passadumkeag. He was a man of fine talent, of genial and kindly disposition, and had many warm friends. He was greatly interested in politics, and was elected Representative to the Legislature in 1850. Shortly after this he went home to Brunswick, and died soon after.

A few years after the incorporation of the town two brothers by the name of Bassett built a tannery on the banks of the Penobscot a short distance above the bridge across the Passadumkeag. It was operated only a few years, not proving remunerative. About 1840 a blacksmith by the name of Daniel Peavey moved into the town and occupied a little shop on the south side of the bridge. He was possessed of wonderful mechanical talent, and patented many valuable inventions, among them the Peavey cant dog, now in general use all over the country, a hay press and stump-puller that came to be commonly used. But his mechanical talent was better than his business talent, and he never gained wealth by his ingenuity. He was the father of a numerous family, among which were four pairs of twins.

The hotels at the Point always did a large business, the stage-line from Oldtown to Mattawamkeag making this a half-way station at which the passengers dined. The establishment of the steamboat line on the upper Penobscot did not hurt their business, as the passengers still had an opportunity to dine here.

James Thompson kept the hotel on the south side of the stream in 1845. He only occupied it a short time. On the outbreak of the Mexican war he raised a company for the New England Regiment, of which he was commissioned captain. He took part in all the battles of his regiment, the famous "Bloody Ninth," particularly distinguishing himself at the battle of Molino-del-Rey. He survived the dangers of the battlefield, but was carried off by a fever shortly after the occupation of the Mexican capital.

The census of 1850 did not show so large a population as in 1840, but this was accounted for by the fact that a third part of the town had been set off to the town of Lowell. The part set off contained a third part of the population and wealth. The town at this time was fairly prosperous, and gained in population faster than the State taken as a whole.

After 1850 it was proposed to navigate the Passadumkeag by steam, and a charter was taken out by Peavey and others, but nothing came of it; the charter was afterwards renewed, but no steamboat was ever built, and it was probably an impracticable project.

The census of 1860 showed a population of 360, an increase of 155 during the decade. By this census the valuation was $26,011. The number of polls 77.

The commencement of the war at this time seemed to retard the progress of the town, and the village seemed duller than in the earlier days, but the falling off in population that occurred during the decade was probably occasioned by the withdrawal of the young men and young women from the farms to the larger cities and manufacturing centres of the country. This, and the large emigration to the West, caused a general falling off in the number of inhabitants of the farming towns in all parts of the State.

The town contributed its share to the armies of the country, and was represented in most of the regiments that were raised in the eastern part of the State. Town meetings were held to encourage volunteering, and money was voted to aid and provide for the families of volunteers, and a large debt was incurred in the efforts to provide volunteers to fill the quotas assigned to the town under the different calls, but the effort was too much for so small and poor a town, and a draft was obliged to be resorted to; but the town furnished its men, and has reason to be proud of its military record.

Many of the brave men sent on to the front perished on the battlefield; others endured the horrors of the prison pen and came home to remember how they struggled with disease and death.

About 1864 a company was organized to raft the logs cut on the Passadumkeag and its tributaries, and a boom was established on that stream, just above the village. Previous to this every operator rafted his logs separately, or drove them in the Penobscot boom at Argyle. The new boom was a great convenience to the lumbermen of that vicinity, besides adding to the business of the town.

The lack of water power had been severely felt and no mill had ever been built. This was a feature peculiar to this town, as saw-mills are the first thing thought of in a country like the Penobscot, where almost the sole business is lumber, but in 1862 Hiram Peavey built a mill and commenced sawing lumber. The power was steam, and had it been favorably located it would have been a good investment, but it was too far from market, and the local business was insufficient to support it. It was shortly afterwards burned, but Mr. Peavey was a man not easily daunted, and he at once rebuilt it. He commenced operations again but failed to make money. It cost too much to get lumber to Bangor. He afterwards disposed of it to Winterport parties, but it never did a paying business until the railroad reached the town.

In the summer of 1869 the European & North American Railway commenced running to this place. For a time this was a terminus of that road, and steamers ran from here to the head of navigation. But this was for a short time only, and when the railroad was completed by the town to points above, the steamboat line was discontinued. But the railway was a benefit to the town and the steam mill was put in connection with it and commenced to do a profitable business. It was in operation a year or two and was again destroyed by fire. It has since been rebuilt by the Messrs. Plummer, who have since continued to operate it. It contains a circular saw-mill for cutting long lumber, a shingle-machine for cutting shingles and heading, and a stave machine. It has lately been doing a profitable business. It has been the means of adding to the wealth and population of the village, and now, when the business outlook is so favorable all over the country, it will probably be more constantly employed and add still more to the population of this pleasant little village. The war left the town largely in debt, but since that time it has been largely diminished and the town is now practically out of debt. During the last ten years the town has increased somewhat in population, several houses have been built and the town presents a decidedly better appearance than it did in 1870. It is now about sixty years since the first commencement was made at the village by Squire Hathaway, and although it has not become so important a place as the early settlers expected, it has become a pleasant and prosperous village that would contrast strongly with the long, low log house of the honest old pioneer who first took up his residence at the confluence of Passadumkeag with the Penobscot.

ADDENDA.

[CHAPTER XVI.—The following additions have been received from Judge Godfrey at the eleventh hour]:

Peregrine G. White is a son of Chandler White, born in Dixmont, Maine. His early education was academic. He was admitted to the Bar of Penobscot county, October, 1868; he has applied himself closely to his profession in Bangor, and is taking a fine position at the Bar. The indications are that he will have good standing as an advocate in the not distant future. On the occasion of the presentation of the Bar resolutions relative to William T. Hilliard, Esq., recently deceased, his address to the Court produced a marked impression by both its manner and matter. After referring to their acquaintance, which dated from his admission to the Bar; to their intimacy for seven or eight years past, which grew out of the fact that they were upon the same flat and their offices were opposite each other, so that they were accustomed to meet, and perhaps visit each other's rooms almost daily; to his kindly, generous, frank, and youthful qualities, which he manifested in such a manner "that one could scarcely realize that he was not a young but an old man," he proceeds:

He was intelligent and appreciative on almost any subject. He was a great reader of books—desultory and miscellaneous, it may be, but wide in range and variety, covering both light and solid literature. Few men, who do not make a study and profession of letters, are possessed of so thorough and intimate an acquaintance with English history and literature. . . . He was also a great admirer of our own historians, Irving, Prescott, Bancroft, Motley, and Parkman. I do not mean by the mention of these authors to indicate even an outline of his reading on these subjects, but merely to show that his taste was rather for historical than other literature, although he had read pretty much everything in fiction, English, French, and American.

By nature he was mild, gentle, and affable. As a neighbor he was generous, considerate, and obliging; as a friend, self-sacrificing, thoughtful, and full of the warmest sympathy. Constitutionally he was sensible, entertaining, and entirely free from arrogance or deceit. . . . He has penetrated the veil and mystery which divide the living from the dead—the life we are living from the life we are to live. The problem he so often expressed a desire to solve, he has at last succeeded in solving.

The above extracts give an idea of Mr. White's manner, as well as his idea of his friend's character, an idea which was explained by Judge Peters and C. T. Appleton, who both bore testimony to the kindly, genial nature of Mr. Hilliard, as well as to his good qualities as a lawyer and a citizen.

Charles P. Brown was born in Newburg, Maine. He read law with Hon. Hannibal Hamlin, then with Hon. Judge Hathaway. Was admitted to the Penobscot Bar January 7, 1840. Has been engaged in many important cases, in which he has shown what may be done by a man with brains. Has given much attention to the procuring of land warrants and pensions, and has been a successful practitioner. Rumor credits him with a large fortune—with being one of the few members of the profession here favored by the god Plutus. Has been somewhat engaged in politics. Has been in the municipal government, and has represented the city several times in the Legislature, and interested himself largely in keeping down taxation.

[CHAPTER XVII.]—We have also from Mr. Duren, the following addition to the bibliographical notice of Mrs. Laura Jane (Curtis) Bullard:

Schoolmates of No. 40; Philadelphia . . . Editor of The Revolution one year, June, 1870, to June, 1871. Previous to that, she edited: The Ladies Visitor and Drawing-Room Companion, a monthly publication, July, 1855, to November, 1860, in which were published articles written by her,—among them: The Overseer's Daughter, a tale of the South, July, 1855; Frederick Murry, the Man who Couldn't Marry a Homely Woman, August; The Love Letter, September; Parson Dole's View, October; Beatrice, November; Cousin Ben., December; Herbert Martyn's Mistake, January, 1856; Air-Castles and Realities, February; Our Music Teacher, March; Mrs. Mortimer's Daughter, June; The White Sun-Bonnet, July; My Fit of the Sulks, and What Followed of It, August; My Great American Novel, September; My Husband's Mother, October; A Simple Story, November; Ada Vincent's First Love, December; Miriam in the Desert, an Arabian tale, translated from the German, January, 1857; Jehiel's Lessons, February; The Teller's Wife, March; The Spirit Warning, April; The Quaker's Plot, or How One Match was Made, May and June; Nathalie Maitland's Experience, July; The Planter's Inventory, from the French of Emila Souvestre, August; The New Boarder, September; June Worcester, October; Georgia's Journal, November; Aunt Ruth's Proverbs Illustrated, December; Mathilde, January, 1858; Before and After Marriage, February; John Salisbury's Household, March; The Step-Mother, April; Lucy Arundel, an Old Maid's Story, July; Fannie's Lovers, August; The Second Wife, a Confession, September; Rainbow, January, 1859; The Violets of Parma, translated from the French, March and April; The Poverty-cure, June; The Cousin's Wager, July; (the following after her marriage) Overseer's Daughter, a tale of the South, January, 1860; The Devoted House, April; Hugh Forester's Revenge, July.

ANNALS OF BANGOR.

[1801.] The valuation of the town of Bangor, according to an old official record in the collection of the Bangor Historical Society, was as follows:

Polls, 45; 19 dwellings at 15s; 4 shops at 10s; 4 tanneries, 30s; 9 barns, 10s; 6 grist-mills, 70s; tillage, 109 acres, at 6s; upland mowing-land, 111 acres, 8s and 6d; meadow, 115 acres; pasture, 33 acres, 2s and 6d; woodland, 2,515 acres, 10s; unimprovable, 186 acres; horses, 3; oxen, 53; cows, 63; swine, 42; plate, 40 oz.; tonnage of vessels, 214.

Nothing is reported of cash or stock in trade, both of which are prominent items in the returns of Hampden for the year.

[1879-81.] The following is the official statement of the amount of lumber surveyed up to October 1, 1881, compared with the amount surveyed in the same period of 1879 and 1880: 1879, 92,541,767; 1880, 87,500, 195; 1881, 111,814,920.

Statement of the amount of lumber surveyed from July 1, to October 1, 1881, compared with the amount surveyed in the same period of 1879 and 1880:

DEXTER.

[The following should appear among the Dexter Settlement Notes.

The first representative of the Bridge family to settle in this county was Levi Bridge, who came here from New Hampshire in 1806. His father was a revolutionary soldier under Washington. Mr. Bridge remained there but a short time, until 1810, when he sold out but returned again in 1826. He married Sarah Bridges, who was born in 1792 and died in 1840. Mr. Bridge was born June 4, 1784, and died in Dexter in 1875. He was a farmer and never engaged in public affairs. Mr. and Mrs. Bridge had seven children: Levi, born in November, 1814, died in 1845; Sarah, born in December, 1816, died in 1844; Mary, born in September, 1820, now lives in Littleton, Massachusetts; Joseph, born in February, 1823, lives in Dexter; Lafayette, born November, 1824; Susan, born in July, 1827, died in 1828; Samuel, born in December, 1830, died in 1833; Abby, born in December, 1836, lives in Lyndesborough, New Hampshire. Lafayette Bridge, subject of this sketch, married Lucretia Austin, born in July, 1830. They have no children. Mr. Bridge and his brother, Joseph, now live on the farm where their father lived in Dexter.

[ANNALS OF BANGOR, CHAPTER XXXVII.—We take especial pleasure, even as the pages of this history are about to close, in adding to the biography of Captain Boutelle, of the Whig and Courier, the following fuller account of his public life, kindly prepared for this work by a friend in Bangor. The story begins with his enlistment in the navy, and appointment as Acting Master, April 8, 1862.]

After a brief period at the school of instruction at the Charleston Navy Yard, he was ordered to report to Rear Admiral S. F. Dupont, commanding the South Atlantic Blockading Squadron, and was by him assigned to duty on board the United States steamer Paul Jones, a side-wheel, double-ender, armed with a heavy battery. On this vessel Mr. Boutelle participated in the blockade of Charleston, South Carolina, in the disastrous Pocatigo Expedition, in several engagements with rebel batteries on Morris Island and an exchange of rifled compliments with the rebel iron-clad Chicora across Charleston Bar. Also in the combined naval and military operations against the ten-gun battery on St. John Bluff, near the mouth of the St. John River, Florida, at the capture of which he commanded a battery of navy howitzers landed and served by United States marines. At the subsequent occupation of Jacksonville he also landed with the howitzer battery to check the offensive demonstrations of the enemy. The Paul Jones was actively engaged in expeditions and blockading all along the South Carolina and Georgia coast and the Atlantic coast of Florida. In the fall of 1863 Mr. Boutelle was ordered to the United States steamer Sassaacus, one of the new double-enders then fitting out at Boston. On this fine vessel he was Navigator and Ordnance Officer, and during her first week of service on the off-shore blockade near Wilmington, North Carolina, two valuable blockade runners were chased ashore, and destroyed by a boarding crew from the Sassaacus under Acting Master Boutelle. In the spring of 1864 his vessel was ordered to Albemarle Sound, North Carolina, where the rebel ram Albemarle, similar to the Merrimac, had created havoc with our little fleet. May 5, 1864, a desperate engagement took place in the sound between the iron-clad Albemarle and two steam consorts and the Union wooden fleet led by the double-enders Mattabessett, Sassaacus, and Wyalusing. In this fight the Sassaacus sought to sink the Albemarle by ramming her at full speed, and very nearly sent her to the bottom. For some twelve or fifteen minutes the two vessels were engaged in a death grapple, when a hundred pound solid rife shot from the iron-clad crashed through the boiler of the Sassaacus, killing and fearfully scalding a number of the latter's crew, and temporarily disabling her, but not until a solid shot from the one hundred-pounder Parrott gun of the Sassaacus had entered the Albemarle's port and inflicted very serious damage. The rebel iron-clad rapidly retreated to Plymouth River and remained there moored under the guns of a land battery until blown up by Lieutenant-Commander Cushing, of the navy, with his torpedo launch some months later. In the early part of the action the rebel steamer Bombshell surrendered to the Sassaacus. In his report of this engagement Lieutenant-Commander F. A. Roe, of the Sassaacus, said:

"I take great pleasure in testifying to the fine conduct of Acting Masters A. W. Muldaur and C. A. Boutelle. These officers were as cool and fearless as if at a general exercise. I respectfully recommend each for promotion to the grade of lieutenant, deserved for good behavior and ability before the enemy in battle."

Under date of May 24 following, Secretary Welles promptly bestowed upon Mr. Boutelle a commission declaring:

"In consideration of your gallant conduct in the action with the rebel ram Albemarle, on the 5th inst., the Department hereby promotes you to the grade of Acting Volunteer Lieutenant in the Navy of the United States."

This was the highest rank then attainable by any volunteer officer of the Navy, and there were but few instances of its being conferred in so complimentary a manner. Lieutenant Boutelle, after serving temporarily as Executive Officer of the United States steamer Eutaw on the James River, and convoying the ill-fated monitor Tecumseh from Norfolk to Pensacola, was ordered in the autumn of 1864 to command of the light-draught gunboat Nyanza, stationed at Berwick's Bay, Louisiana. In the winter of 1864-65 he succeeded in obtaining the transfer of his vessel to participate in the operations against Mobile, Alabama. He volunteered his vessel to pilot the proposed iron-clad assault, and his was the first naval vessel that passed through the obstructions to that city. He was immediately dispatched by Admiral Thatcher to follow the retreating rebel fleet up the Tombigbee River, and captured a boat's crew from Admiral Buchanan's flag-ship Nashville, and a rebel commissary steamer laden with cotton. A few days later he made a trip of nearly five hundred miles up the Alabama River, through the heart of the rebel country, bearing dispatches to our army commanders at Selma and Montgomery, terminating the Sherman-Johnston armistice, and ordering renewal of hostilities. Lieutenant Boutelle, with his vessel, participated at the surrender of the rebel naval fleet at Nannahubba Bluff by Confederate Commodore Eben Farrand, May 10, 1865, and was afterwards ordered to the command of the naval forces in Mississippi Sound, the district extending from New Orleans via Lake Ponchartrain to Mobile Bay, with headquarters station at Pascagoula. This closed his active service, and at his own request Lieutenant Boutelle was honorably discharged from the United States Navy January 14, 1866.

During his naval service he received the highest encomiums of all his superior officers in their official reports now on file in the Navy Department. Captain (now retired Rear Admiral) Steedman writes the Secretary that Mr. Boutelle "performed his duties in a manner to merit my approbation." Commander (now Commodore) A. C. Rhind, the heroic commander of the Keokuk in the famous assault on Sumter, states officially to the Department: "I regarded him (Mr. Boutelle) as one of the best of the volunteer appointments; officer-like in his bearing, intelligent, and exhibiting an interest in his professional improvement, gunnery and small arms, unusual in one not bred to the service."

Lieutenant Commander (now Commodore) Francis A. Roe, in numerous letters, expresses his high opinion of and friendship for Mr. Boutelle. In a letter dated July 7, 1865, to the Bureau of Navigation at the Navy Department, in reply to a request for his recommendation of an officer for special appointment, he writes:

"I respectfully recommend Acting Volunteer Lieutenant Charles A. Boutelle to the favorable notice of the Bureau. Mr. Boutelle served with me during my whole cruise of the Sassacus, as Navigator of the ship. I found him ambitious, talented, full of naval esprit du corps, and fully alive to the importance of our regular naval etiquette. He is brave to a fault; he is intelligent and possesses the adornments of a cultivated gentleman. I know of no others from the volunteers I could recommend."

Rear Admiral Henry K. Thatcher (since deceased), in May, 1865, as commander of the West Gulf Squadron, wrote the Secretary of the Navy: "Acting Volunteer Lieutenant C. A. Boutelle is an excellent officer. Keeps his ship in excellent order, and I consider him worthy of promotion," to the grade of Lieutenant Commander. In March, 1872, the same gallant Admiral, in a letter to George A. Thatcher, Esq., of Bangor, commended his former officer to the acquaintance and friendship of his kinsman, and said:

"My first personal knowledge of Captain Boutelle was at the moment when we were preparing to attack the defences of the city of Mobile, when I made a personal inspection of all the ships that were to be used on that occasion; and the splendid order and fine discipline of Captain Boutelle's vessel is fresh in my remembrance, as well as the gallant and unremitting performance of all his duties as a commander, which followed. The patriotism and devotion to duty which he ever displayed whilst the war continued convinced me that he would prove an ornament to our service should he determine to remain in the navy."

After leaving the navy Captain Boutelle fitted out and commanded a passenger steamer on the route between New York and Wilmington, North Carolina.

On the 16th of May, 1866, he married Miss Lizzie Hodsdon, the youngest daughter of Adjutant-General John L. Hodsdon, at Augusta, Maine, and soon after engaged with the well-known house of Walsh & Carver in the shipping commission business in New York City.

Having from early boyhood a strong inclination towards journalism, he had contributed more or less of correspondence and controversial articles to political journals, and in the spring of 1870 determined to try his capacity for newspaper work. After consulting a distinguished ex-editor whose opinion he highly valued, and who encouraged him by advice to strike out boldly, Captain Boutelle accepted the position of managing editor of the Bangor Whig and Courier, which had been tendered him by John H. Lynde, Esq., the proprietor, and he came to Bangor for three months' trial, subject to termination by either party at any time. Mr. Lynde and the local editor being called away, the new managing editor, who had never before had any experience in a newspaper office, was obliged to get out his first issue of the daily, May 1, 1870, without any assistance, preparing the entire editorial, telegraphic, local, and miscellaneous matter, and reading all the proofs. His labors at this time in mastering the unfamiliar details and carrying on the editorial work were very severe, but he applied himself almost literally night and day, and within a few weeks inaugurated improvements in the classification of matter and general make-up of the paper. Editorially the Whig at once assumed that prompt and positive character that has since distinguished it, while maintaining all its former reputation for elevated moral tone and thorough reliability. The temporary relations were soon succeeded by a permanent engagement at a very liberal salary, and Captain Boutelle continued the management of the paper to the entire satisfaction of Mr. Lynde until the death of that enterprising and energetic publisher, which occurred at Savannah, Georgia, February 16, 1874, while he was on his way to Florida in the hope of restoring the health that had been undermined by years of unremitting labor. From the first week of Captain Boutelle's engagement to the day of Mr. Lynde's death, the relations of the publisher and editor had been of the most cordial and confidential character, without even a momentary shadow upon the warmth of their mutual friendship.

On the 15th of May, 1874, the Whig and Courier establishment, including the daily and weekly papers, was purchased by Captain Boutelle and Mr. Benjamin A. Burr, the former acquiring a controlling interest of five-eighths and assuming entire editorial charge of the paper, while the latter, who had been for a life-time in the printing business and for twenty-two years one of the proprietors of the Bangor Jeffersonian (a weekly paper purchased by Mr. Lynde in 1870 and merged in the Whig and Courier), assumed the duties of publisher and business manager. With the sense of ownership Captain Boutelle became even more vigorous and outspoken upon all public questions, and under his control the Whig has held a leading position among the influential Republican journals of the State.

In 1877 it acquired a national recognition as a logical, earnest, and unyielding opponent of what was known as the Southern Conciliation Policy of President Hayes, by which it claimed that the legally chosen Republican State governments of South Carolina and Louisiana were overthrown; and on the floor of the Maine Republican State Convention of that year Captain Boutelle made an earnest and successful contest against an endorsement of that policy advocated by Ex-Governors Chamberlain, Morrill and others. The Whig has never wavered in maintaining that the primary and paramount duty of the National Government is the full and equal protection of every citizen, regardless of race, color, locality or creed, in the enjoyment of all the rights guaranteed by the Constitution and the laws; and it has good-naturedly welcomed back to the old platform many of its contemporaries who, it says, were temporarily beguiled by the siren song of compromise.

In the famous contest with and triumph over the "counting-out" of the Republican majority of the State Legislature by Governor Carleton and his Council in the winter of 1879-80, Captain Boutelle achieved special distinction as the first to give warning of the designs of the Fusion Executive Department, by persistently arousing public attention thereto notwithstanding the incredulity of the people and almost every other leader of his own party. The result was a remarkable vindication of his sagacity; and the final establishment of the Constitutional Government on the basis of the three great deliverances of the Supreme Court of Maine, was universally conceded to have been largely due to his vigilance, energy, and unyielding determination. The prestige of his public services in this connection added fresh impetus to a popular movement in his behalf in the Fourth Congressional District, which culminated in his unanimous nomination as the Republican candidate for Representative in Congress, on the first ballot, in the District Convention held at Bangor June 24, 1880, comprising an exceptionally large number of the most eminent and influential members of the party. Such a nomination by unanimous vote at a first candidacy was a remarkable if not unprecedented compliment in the history of the Congressional Conventions of the State, as was also the hearty expression of approval from distinguished public men and leading newspapers of his party in all sections of the Union.

Captain Boutelle at once commenced a most vigorous personal canvass of the District, his competitor being Hon. Geo. W. Ladd, Democratic Fusionist of Bangor, who was elected Representative in 1878 by 12,921 votes against 10,095 for Hon. Llewellyn Powers, Republican incumbent. Placing the editorial management of the Whig temporarily in the hands of Howard Owen, Esq., formerly of the Kennebec Journal, Captain Boutelle made over fifty public addresses, traversing the entire district, which comprises more than a third of the area of the State, and meeting everywhere most enthusiastic receptions. The campaign is conceded to have been one of the most dashing and brilliant in Maine politics, and though Captain Boutelle lacked 855 votes of being elected, he received 13,192 against 14,047 for his competitor, thus gaining 3,097 over the Republican vote of 1878, and overcoming nearly two thousand of the previous adverse majority of 2,826. In view of the concentration of opposition effort in this district, which had already been wrested from the Republicans, the result was considered highly creditable to Captain Boutelle's candidacy, and after the outcome was substantially known on election evening, he was given a splendid ovation by his Republican fellow-citizens of Bangor in Norombega Hall.

Devoting but a few days to closing up the business of his Maine canvass Captain Boutelle promptly responded to the summons of the Ohio Republican State Executive Committee to take part in that State in the great October battle. He reached Cleveland September 28, and having been chosen as the member from Maine on the National Republican Club Committee, accompanied a deputation of that body to Mentor on that day, where they had a very cordial conference with General Garfield at his home. On the 29th Captain Boutelle spoke in behalf of Garfield and Arthur in Cincinnati, and continued on the Ohio stump until the decisively triumphant election of October 12. At Eaton and Greenville he spoke with Governor Foster, and at Shelby with ex-Governor Dennison. On the 7th of October, by special invitation of General J. Warren Keifer, now Speaker of the House of Representatives, Captain Boutelle was assigned and spoke with Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll to an immense gathering counted by tens of thousands, on the county fair grounds at Springfield. He closed on the evening before the election by addressing a great mass-meeting of Muskingum county Republicans at Zanesville. After a flying trip home Captain Boutelle took the field again in New York at the urgent invitation of General Arthur, the Republican candidate for Vice President, and devoted a week to speaking at important points in that State. Captain Boutelle's ability, and effectiveness as a speaker were very highly complimented in Ohio and New York, and the flattering recognition given him abroad was very gratifying to his friends in Maine. He kept in harness until the National Republican victory was achieved, and the satisfaction of having contributed to that more than compensated for his own failure to be elected.

On his return home he felt in excellent health, but so soon as the excitement of the campaign had subsided the intense strain of four months' constant labor on the stump, riding frequently nearly all night and speaking twice and even three times a day, began to show its effects in serious nervous prostration, accompanied by an exhausting carbuncle, that left him quite reduced. At this time his mother was seriously sick with erysipelas, and he was attacked by the same malady. His mother died April 4, 1881, while he was so sick that he was unable to see her, although they were adjoining chambers. He passed the crisis safely, and late in April was able to ride out. From that time his recovery was rapid and thorough, a sound constitution proving able to repair even the effects of the immense overwork that had threatened it. In June, by the kindness of President Garfield, at the suggestion of Secretary Blaine, Captain Boutelle was appointed a member of the Board of Visitors to the Military Academy at West Point, and the trip and sojourn up the Hudson, followed by a pleasant visit to Chicago as a guest of the Society of the Sons of Maine, proved very beneficial to his convalescence. A judicious relaxing of the usual amount of editorial labor during the summer and fall of 1881 has enabled him to regain health and strength, and the winter found him stouter than he had ever been before, and ready for yeoman's service again in behalf of the principles that he cherishes.

In addition to his editorial and other duties, Captain Boutelle has been successively chosen a member of the Republican State Committee for Penobscot county for 1875-76-77-78-79-80-81-82, a longer consecutive term than any other member except Mr. Blaine, who retired from the Chairmanship in 1881, and the former is now also a member of the Republican State Executive Committee.

Captain Boutelle finds his chief antidote for the cares and weariness of his arduous journalistic and political labors in the delights of home and the companionship of the family circle. He has three children—Grace Hodsdon, born March 27, 1869; Lily, born December 20, 1875; and Annie Curtis, born July 17, 1877. He is also guardian of his brother, Mortimer H., and an adult brother, Edward P., is his assistant in the editorial staff.

COLONEL FRANCIS HILL.

Colonel Francis Hill was born in Oxford, Worcester county, Massachusetts, on March 4, 1790, and died at Exeter, Maine, in January, 1881. His father, Dr. Aaron Hill, was born in Kempton, Massachusetts, and was the only son of a clergyman. While a young man in college he met Miss Abigail Bell, of Boston, whom he subsequently married, and by whom he had thirteen children, twelve of whom lived to marry.

When Francis was ten years old Dr. Hill moved with his family from Oxford to Bucksport, Maine, and died soon after, leaving his large family in reduced circumstances. The oldest son, Aaron, assumed charge of the family, and Francis went to work in Bucksport village. His mother made his clothes, and his wages, about six or eight dollars per month, went towards the support of the family. But here the poor, bare-footed boy began to lay the foundation of his future fortune. While other boys played at marbles, or spent their time in the stores, he took such evening jobs as he could find to earn a few cents to add to his monthly wages. He said that he could buy a can of tallow for one cent, and if he got only ten cents for chopping wood while it lasted, there were nine cents left to put in his pocket. From these small earnings from his evenings' work he soon had enough money to buy a sheep, which he hired some one to keep for him. From its increase he was soon able to sell enough to buy a heifer—the heifer soon became a cow, and from her offspring he obtained a pair of steers, so that when he became a farmer he had all the necessary stock to begin with. When he was twenty-one years of age the family moved to Castine (Cape Rosier), and Francis went to work for Colonel Samuel Wasson, whose daughter he afterwards married.

In the fall of 1813 he came to Exeter on foot by a spotted line from Bangor, as there was not even a bridle path through the forest—bought a little tract of land and built a log cabin; he then returned to Castine to spend the winter. In the spring of 1814 he returned to Exeter and cleared several acres of land, piling by day and sleeping among the burning piles by night in order to re-ignite the dying embers as often as became necessary and he was rewarded for the summer's toil by a plentiful harvest in the autumn. On January 19, 1815, he married Elizabeth Wasson, of Castine, and brought his wife on horseback to their humble home in the woods; and Mrs. Hill has often been heard to say that the happiest hours of her life were spent in the little log-cabin. Her only homesick day was on Thanksgiving day—the first she had ever spent away from her father's house—and she shed many tears as she stood all day spinning at her busy wheel. Their Thanksgiving dinner was a bowl of bread and milk, for that year their crops had been almost an utter failure, the early frosts having killed nearly everything, and bitten the wheat just as it was going into the milk, rendering it very bitter and quite unfit for food. But "necessity is the mother of invention," and the early settlers found that by mixing mashed potatoes with the pounded wheat (for there were no mills to grind) it would take out the bitter taste to a certain extent and make the bread more palatable. The next year Mrs. Hill visited Castine, making the journey to Bucksport on horseback in one day with a child in her arms—a distance of forty miles.

During the cold seasons which followed many of the settlers became discouraged, sold or abandoned their farms and went to Ohio, while Mr. Hill, as his means increased, availed himself of the opportunity to buy a number of the farms in his neighborhood.

Mr. and Mrs. Hill had seven children, four of which are now living. The two oldest, Abigail and Francis, were born in the log cabin.

Abigail Bell married Nelson P. Wheeler, of Corville, and resided in Exeter. She died in 1868.

Francis Wasson married Sarah Ann True, of Gardiner, and resides in Exeter.

Mary Walker died June 8, 1845, aged twenty years.

Elizabeth N. married Lewis Barker, of Stetson, Bangor.

Cordelia A. married Joseph B. Wheeler, of Corville, where they now reside.

George Samuel died February 26, 1832, aged two years.
 George Samuel second, married Ella E. Raynes, of Exeter, and resides in Exeter.

The first frame house was built about 1820, directly on the site where the homestead now stands. We are sorry to say that nothing now remains of this house, although the grandchildren can remember playing "I Spy" among its ruins and the wild rose bushes which surrounded them not many years ago. In 1829 Mr. Hill bought ninety acres of land of Amos Fletcher, of Norridgewock, for $650, riding to Norridgewock and back on horseback in one day to settle the business. On this farm he built the present large house and spacious barns, which were completed in 1834.

Colonel Hill was Second Lieutenant of the first military company ever organized in town, and finally rose to be Colonel. He was Chairman of the Board of Selectmen for twelve or fifteen years, and was Deputy Sheriff for a number of years; and in his old age he liked to talk of the long fast rides, he had taken on horseback while holding that office, for he always made it a rule to sleep in his own house at night if possible. He was one of the directors of the Merchants' National bank in Bangor, from the time of its organization until his death, at which time the following resolutions were offered and unanimously adopted by the Board:

Resolved, That in the recent death of our associate, Francis Hill, Esq., of Exeter, the Merchants' Bank has lost the counsel and advice of an able man, a man whose large means and life long pared had given him deserved weight and authority upon all financial questions.
 Mr. Hill was director of the Merchants' Bank from the time it first went into operation under a State charter to the present time under its organization as a National Bank, and during this long time of almost half a century we are not aware that any advice or wish of his was ever disregarded by the Board of Directors, or that any advice of his was ever given that did not tend to the success of the institution. We have learned from year to year more and more to appreciate his integrity, his judgment and his character, as we have more and more been in contact with his virtues. He was cautious rather than dangerous in business ventures, and careful always in the performance of all his engagements, but his shadow now only remains where his able presence was wont to inspire respect and confidence. To the community in which he lived he has left the example of a well spent life, and to his family the consolation of love and, more than all, the faith that like a star shall light the way in this night of their bereavement to duty and to Heaven.

Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with the family of the deceased in their sorrow, and ask leave to tender our affectionate condolence and kindest regards.

Colonel Hill died in 1870 at the age of eighty-one, after an industrious life spent in the interests of her family. During the summer before her death in the autumn, she did all the dairy work from seven cows—making butter and cheese—and retained all of her faculties perfectly.
 Her eyesight, which for a number of years had been what impaired, returned to her several years before her death so that she was enabled to read and write out the aid of glasses.

At the death of Colonel Hill Exeter lost one of her most highly esteemed citizens and her oldest settler—he had paid taxes in that town sixty-seven years. In religious opinion Colonel Hill was a Calvinist Baptist, and in politics never changed except as the old Whig party went over to which time he voted with the Democratic party.
 His first vote was at the age of eighteen, in 1808, and for seventy consecutive years never missed a State election, throwing his last vote for Governor Garcelon in 1878. He retained his faculties wonderfully for a man of his age, and his love for labor was as strong at ninety as at nineteen. In 1880 he husked three hundred bushels of corn, and the last work he did was to saw half a cord of wood on the day before he was taken with his last illness.

One of Colonel Hill's strongest peculiarities was his always being prepared for a "rainy day," and at the time of his death there were several cords of wood in his shed which were placed there twenty-five years before, for a "sick winter," and a band of hay in the barn which was cut thirty years before. Another band of the same crop was used during the "grasshopper year." Among his personal effects were found over $100 in Spanish coins, which he took in trading with the British soldiers at Cas-tine. He retained his mental faculties to a remarkable extent, and among his earliest recollections was that of having attended funeral services at Oxford, in 1799, in memory of General Washington, to whom he was second cousin.

Colonel Hill left a large farm of three hundred acres—one of the finest in this section of the State; and where seventy years ago he found a wilderness, he has left one hundred and fifty acres of land in a high state of cultivation, upon which not a vestige of a tree and scarcely a rock remains. Well might he have been proud at this result of his own industry! But in addition to this he has left an estate of over $100,000 in cash assets, accumulated almost entirely as the result of practical industry and good judgment in farming, he never having indulged in speculations of any kind. Should not this be considered another proof that farming in Maine may be made a source of profit?

SAMUEL BUTMAN.*

Colonel Samuel Butman was born in Worcester, Massachusetts, April 30, 1788, and died in Plymouth, Maine, October 9, 1864. In April, 1804, his father, Benjamin Butman, a man of note, moved with his wife and seven children from Worcester to Dixmont, in Penobscot county.

Dixmont and the region about it was almost an unbroken wilderness, and this family was among the earliest settlers. In this town and the adjoining town—Plymouth—Colonel Butman spent his active and useful life.
 He was a man of great energy of character, good judgment, and strict integrity, genial in his manners, of commanding personal appearance, and a true man in the strictest sense of the term. Few men have shared more largely than he in the confidence and esteem of his fellow-citizens. In the War of 1812 he was a captain in active service, and later was Colonel of a regiment of infantry, a member of the convention that framed the Constitution of this State in 1820, a member of both branches of the State Legislature within the next few years. He was a Representative in Congress from his district four years, elected in 1827 and re-elected in 1829. While in Congress he was active and laborious, and did much to aid legislation to the benefit of this State and Nation.

The location and opening of the Military Road from Mattawankeag to Houlton was due largely to his efforts. After he left Congress he was called to fill many offices and positions of trust and responsibility. He was a member of the State Senate and President of that body, a Presidential Elector, and was the first President of the Maine State Agricultural Society, besides holding many other official positions of importance in the State, county, and town, all of which were bestowed upon him unsought, and filled by him with fidelity and marked ability.

During his long life he was largely identified with the development of the agricultural, manufacturing, and all other prominent interests of the county, State, and Nation. Education and religion had his fostering care. He married, in early manhood, Miss Apphia Blaisdell, who survived him about ten years. She was the daughter of Dr. Blaisdell, an early settler of Dixmont. He was a man of skill in his profession, and of much prominence and influence in the early history of Dixmont. He was an original proprietor or owner of the town of Exeter, which was at one time called "Blaisdelltown."

Mrs. Colonel Butman was a woman of great nobility of character, with rare intelligence and culture, and active in missions of benevolence and kindness. She possessed in an eminent degree all the rich and noble qualities which so adorn the brightest Christian life. Her life was literally full of good works, and her memory is fondly cherished by a large circle of relatives and friends. She died at Plymouth, August 30, 1873, aged seventy-six years.

Of the brothers of Colonel Butman, Benjamin located in Worcester, the place of his birth, where he died at an advanced age. He was a prominent business man, and aided largely in the building up of that city. Charles died at Dixmont in early life. Frederick A., and Henry Butman passed the greater part of their lives in Dixmont, to whose enterprise and business energy it was largely indebted for its growth, prosperity, and high reputation as a town. Henry died at Jamaica Plains, Massachusetts, in 1879, aged eighty-six. Frederick A. died at Plymouth in 1861, aged seventy-one, leaving a name for business energy and integrity rarely bequeathed to posterity.

Colonel Butman died, leaving one son, Samuel G. Butman, who resides on the old homestead in Plymouth, and one daughter, Mrs. Ellen A. Thayer, also residing in Plymouth. One other daughter, Lucretia L., died several years before her father. She married Charles P. Brown, Esq., of Bangor.
