PREFACE.

Lawden -37.50

PRIOR to the centennial year the Hon. William S. Garvin, editor of the Western Press, collected material for, and commenced the preparation of, a volume embracing the leading points in the pioneer, family, and official history of Mercer County. Before his plans had been consummated another work, purporting to contain similar information, was hurriedly published, which materially interfered with his future operations, and ultimately thwarted his long-cherished purpose. In fact, the project was finally abandoned, and chapters but partially written were left incomplete, and data in process of being gathered were, at his death in 1883, left in a somewhat chaotic condition.

The chapters which Mr. Garvin had completed, together with his unfinished manuscripts, notes and memoranda, were purchased from his legal heirs in August, 1887, by the undersigned, who employed Prof. J. Fraise Richard to edit and compile the same. What was thus secured, together with a large amount of additional material since collected, will be found in the present volume, which also contains a condensed history of the State from the pen of Prof. Samuel P. Bates, a well known author of Meadville, Penn. The Garvin manuscripts have been carefully edited, and all of the data which he left has been woven into the narrative at the most suitable points, as necessity required.

Many difficulties beset the preparation of a work of this kind. Official records are often incomplete or entirely missing, while the periodical press, that great reservoir of current history, did not exist in early pioneer days to chronicle passing events. And even when it did appear it was meager in local news, and its files were rarely preserved. The real pioneers, too, were not given to preserving records of their lives, their time being entirely devoted to conquering the forest wilderness and providing homes for their families. They have long since passed away, and their descendants are frequently but ill-prepared to recount their trials and experiences. Still it must be apparent to all, that

“The past—the present race must tell
Of deeds done by their friends of old,
Who at their posts of duty fell,
And left their acts and deeds untold.

To rescue from oblivion's page
Events that memory has in store,
We've sought the men of honored age,
And what, we ask, can man do more?”

One of the most important features of this work are its several chapters of personal and family biographies. The data for these were obtained from the original parties or their descendants, to whom the matter was afterward submitted for correction before publication, thus affording them an opportunity of insuring accuracy. Those who furnished the data are, therefore, responsible for its genuineness and authenticity. The future historian will have in this carefully prepared material a good foundation to build upon in commencing his work.

It would be impossible to mention here, everyone who has rendered valuable aid in the preparation of this volume. Appropriate acknowledgments, however, are due and gladly tendered to the heirs of Mr. Garvin for general aid in collecting his papers; to the editors of the several newspapers of the county for the use of their files and kind words of encouragement; to the descendants of the pioneers in every township and borough for information furnished; to the county officials for courtesies shown; to attorneys, physicians and other professional men; to the leading spirits in various societies; to the pastors of churches; to the owners and managers of manufacturing and other business establishments; to those enterprising citizens who gave us their patronage, and without whose assistance we could not have succeeded; and, in general, to everyone who has, in any manner, contributed to the success of the work.

We take pride in the knowledge that we have redeemed our promises, and furnished our patrons a work which every intelligent citizen can justly appreciate. Neither time nor money nor labor has been spared to make the present volume an authentic and reliable source of information, wherein are perpetuated the trials and achievements of the heroic pioneers, and the subsequent growth and development of one of the most prosperous and important counties of Western Pennsylvania.

HISTORY^{OF} PENNSYLVANIA.

BY SAMUEL P. BATES.

"God, that has given it me through many difficulties, will, I believe, bless and make it the seed of a nation. I shall have a tender care to the government that it be well laid at first. - - - - I do, therefore, desire the Lord's wisdom to guide me, and those that may be concerned with me, that we may do the thing that is truly wise and just."

WILLIAM PENN.

HISTORY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY — CORNELIS JACOBSON MEY, 1624-25—WILLIAM VAN HULST, 1625-26—PETER MINUIT, 1626-33—DAVID PETERSEN DE VRIES, 1632-33—WOUTER VAN TWILLER, 1633-38.

IN the early colonization upon the American continent, two motives were principally operative. One was the desire of amassing sudden wealth without great labor, which tempted adventurous spirits to go in search of gold, to trade valueless trinkets to the simple natives for rich furs and skins, and even to seek, amidst the wilds of a tropical forest, for the fountain whose healing waters could restore to man perpetual youth. The other was the cherished purpose of escaping the unjust restrictions of Government, and the hated ban of society against the worship of the Supreme Being according to the honest dictates of conscience, which incited the humble devotees of Christianity to forego the comforts of home, in the midst of the best civilization of the age, and make for themselves a habitation on the shores of a new world, where they might erect altars and do homage to their God in such habiliments as they preferred, and utter praises in such note as seemed to them good. This purpose was also incited by a certain romantic temper, common to the race, especially noticeable in youth, that invites to some uninhabited spot, and Rascelas and Robinson Crusoe-like to begin life anew.

William Penn, the founder of Pennsylvania, had felt the heavy hand of persecution for religious opinion's sake. As a gentleman commoner at Oxford, he had been fined, and finally expelled from that venerable seat of learning for non-conformity to the established worship. At home, he was whipped and turned out of doors by a father who thought to reclaim the son to the more certain path of advancement at a licentious court. He was sent to prison by the Mayor of Cork. For seven months he languished in the tower of London, and, finally, to complete his disgrace, he was cast into Newgate with common felons. Upon the accession of James II, to the throne of England, over fourteen hundred persons of the Quaker faith were immured in prisons for a conscientious adherence to their religious convictions. To escape this harassing persecution, and find peace and quietude from this sore proscription, was the moving cause which led Penn and his followers to emigrate to America.

Of all those who have been founders of States in near or distant ages, none have manifested so sincere and disinterested a spirit, nor have been so fair exemplars of the golden rule, and of the Redeemer's sermon on the mount, as William Penn. In his preface to the frame of government of his colony, he says: "The end of government is first to terrify evil-doers; secondly, to cherish those who do well, which gives government a life beyond corruption, and makes it as durable in the world, as good men shall be. So that government seems to be a part of religion itself, a thing sacred in its institution and end. For, if it does not directly remove the cause, it crushes the effects of evil, and is an emanation of the same Divine power, that is both author and object of pure religion, the difference lying here, that the one is more free and mental, the other more corporal and compulsive in its operations; but that is only to evil-doers, government itself being otherwise as capable of kindness, goodness and charity, as a more private society. They weakly err, who think there is no other use of government than correction, which is the coarsest part of it. Daily experience tells us, that the care and regulation of many other affairs more soft, and daily necessary, make up much the greatest part of government. Governments, like clocks, go from the motion men give them, and as governments are made and moved by men, so by them are they ruined, too. Wherefore, governments rather depend upon men, than men upon governments. Let men be good, and the government cannot be bad. If it be ill, they will cure it. But if men be bad, let the government be never so good, they will endeavor to warp and spoil to their turn. * * * That, therefore, which makes a good constitution, must keep it, men of wisdom and virtue, qualities, that because they descend not with worldly inheritances, must be carefully propagated by a virtuous education of youth, for which, after ages will owe more to the care and prudence of founders and the successive magistracy, than to their parents for their private patrimonies. * * * We have, therefore, with reverence to God, and good conscience to men, to the best of our skill, contrived and composed the Frame and Laws of this government, viz.: To support power in reverence with the people, and to secure the people from the abuse of power, that they may be free by their just obedience, and the magistrates honorable for their just administration. For liberty without obedience is confusion, and obedience without liberty is slavery."

Though born amidst the seductive arts of the great city, Penn's tastes were rural. He hated the manners of the corrupt court, and delighted in the homely labors and innocent employments of the farm. "The country," he said, "is the philosopher's garden and library, in which he reads and contemplates the power, wisdom and goodness of God. It is his food as well as study, and gives him life as well as learning." And to his wife he said upon taking leave of her in their parting interview: "Let my children be husbandmen, and housewives. It is industrious, healthy, honest, and of good report. This leads to consider the works of God, and diverts the mind from being taken up with vain arts and inventions of a luxurious world. Of cities and towns of concourse, beware. The world is apt to stick close to those who have lived and got wealth there. A country life and estate I love best for my children."

Having thus given some account at the outset of the spirit and purposes of the founder, and the motive which drew him to these shores, it will be in place, before proceeding with the details of the acquisition of territory, and the coming of emigrants for the actual settlement under the name of Pennsylvania, to say something of the aborigines who were found in possession of the soil when first visited by Europeans, of the condition of the surface of the country, and of the previous attempts at settlements before the coming of Penn.

The surface of what is now known as Pennsylvania was, at the time of the coming of the white men, one vast forest of hemlock, and pine, and beech, and oak, unbroken, except by an occasional rocky barren upon the precipitous mountain side, or by a few patches of prairie, which had been reclaimed by annual burnings, and was used by the indolent and simple-minded natives for the culture of a little maize and a few vegetables. The soil, by the annual accumulations of leaves and abundant growths of forest vegetation, was luxurious, and the trees stood close, and of gigantic size. The streams swarmed with fish, and the forest abounded with game. Where now are cities and hamlets filled with busy populations intent upon the accumulation of wealth, the mastery of knowledge, the pursuits of pleasure, the deer browsed and sipped at the water's edge, and the pheasant drummed his monotonous note. Where now is the glowing furnace from which day and night tongues of flame are bursting, and the busy water wheel sends the shuttle flashing through the loom, half-naked, dusky warriors fashioned their spears with rude implements of stone, and made themselves hooks out of the bones of animals for alluring the finny tribe. Where now are fertile fields, upon which the thrifty farmer turns his furrow, which his neighbor takes up and runs on until it reaches from one end of the broad State to the other, and where are flocks and herds, rejoicing in rich meadows, gladdened by abundant fountains, or reposing at the heated noontide beneath ample shade, not a blow had been struck against the giants of the forest, the soil rested in virgin purity, the streams glided on in majesty, unvexed by wheel and unchoked by device of man.

Where now the long train rushes on with the speed of the wind over plain and mead, across streams and under mountains, awakening the echoes of the hills the long day through, and at the midnight hour screaming out its shrill whistle in fiery defiance, the wild native, with a fox skin wrapped about his loins and a few feathers stuck in his hair, issuing from his rude hut, trotted on in his forest path, followed by his squaw with her infant peering forth from the rough sling at her back, pointed his canoe, fashioned from the barks of the trees, across the deep river, knowing the progress of time only by the rising and setting sun, troubled by no meridians for its index, starting on his way when his nap was ended, and stopping for rest when a spot was reached that pleased his fancy. Where now a swarthy population toils ceaselessly deep down in the bowels of the earth, shut out from the light of day in cutting out the material that feeds the fires upon the forge, and gives genial warmth to the lovers as they chat merrily in the luxurious drawing room, not a mine had been opened, and the vast beds of the black diamond rested unsunned beneath the superincumbent mountains, where they had been fashioned by the Creator's hand. Rivers of oil seethed through the impatient and uneasy gases and vast pools and lakes of this pungent, parti-colored fluid, hidden away from the coveting eye of man, guarded well their own secrets. Not a derrick protruded its well-balanced form in the air. Not a drill, with its eager eating tooth descended into the flinty rock. No pipe line diverted the oily tide in a silent, ceaseless current to the ocean's brink. The cities of iron tanks, filled to bursting, had no place amidst the forest solitudes. Oil exchanges, with their vexing puts and calls, shorts and longs, bulls and bears, had not yet come to disturb the equanimity of the red man, as he smoked the pipe of peace at the council fire. Had he once seen the smoke and soot of the new Birmingham of the West, or snuffed the odors of an oil refinery, he would willingly have forfeited his goodly heritage by the forest stream or the deep flowing river, and sought for himself new hunting grounds in less favored regions.

It was an unfortunate circumstance that at the coming of Europeans the territory now known as Pennsylvania was occupied by some of the most bloody and revengeful of the savage tribes. They were known as the Lenni Lenapes, and held sway from the Hudson to the Potomac. A tradition was preserved among them, that in a remote age their ancestors had emigrated eastward from beyond the Mississippi, exterminating as they came the more civilized and peaceful peoples, the Mound-Builders of Ohio and adjacent States, and who were held among the tribes by whom they were surrounded as the progenitors, the grandfathers or oldest people. They came to be known by Europeans as the Delawares, after the name of the river and its numerous branches along which they principally dwelt. The Monseys or Wolves, another tribe of the Lenapes, dwelt upon the Susquehanna and its tributaries, and, by their warlike disposition, won the credit of being the fiercest of their nation, and the guardians of the door to their council house from the North.

Occupying the greater part of the territory now known as New York, were the five nations—the Senacas, the Mohawks, the Oneidas, the Cayugas, and the Onondagas, which, from their hearty union, acquired great strength and came to exercise a commanding influence. Obtaining firearms of the Dutch at Albany, they repelled the advances of the French from Canada, and by their superiority in numbers and organization, had overcome the Lenapes, and held them for awhile in vassalage. The Tuscaroras, a tribe which had been expelled from their home in North Carolina, were adopted by the Five Nations in 1712, and from this time forward these tribes were known to the English as the Six Nations, called by the Lenapes, Mingoos, and by the French, Iroquois. There was, therefore, properly a United States before the thirteen colonies achieved their independence. The person and character of these tribes were marked. They were above the ordinary stature, erect, bold, and commanding, of great decorum in council, and when aroused showing native eloquence. In warfare, they exhibited all the bloodthirsty, revengeful, cruel instincts of the savage, and for the attainment of their purposes were treacherous and crafty.

The Indian character, as developed by intercourse with Europeans, exhibits some traits that are peculiar. While coveting what they saw that pleased them, and thievish to the last degree, they were nevertheless generous. This may be accounted for by their habits. "They held that the game of the forest, the fish of the rivers, and the grass of the field were a common heritage, and free to all who would take the trouble to gather them, and ridiculed the idea of fencing in a meadow." Bancroft says: "The hospitality of the Indian has rarely been questioned. The stranger enters his cabin, by day or by night, without asking leave, and is entertained as freely as a thrush or a blackbird, that regales himself on the luxuries of the fruitful grove. He will take his own rest abroad, that he may give up his own skin or mat of sedge to his guest. Nor is the traveler questioned as to the purpose of his visit. He chooses his own time freely to deliver his message." Penn, who, from frequent intercourse came to know them well, in his letter to the society of Free Traders, says of them: "In liberality they excel; nothing is too good for their friend. Give them a fine gun, coat or other thing, it may pass twenty hands before it sticks; light of heart, strong affections, but soon spent. The most merry creatures that live; feast and dance perpetually. They never have much nor want much. Wealth circulateth like the blood. All parts partake; and though none shall want what another hath, yet exact observers of property. Some Kings have sold, others presented me with several parcels of land. The pay or presents I made them, were not hoarded by the particular owners, but the neighboring Kings and clans being present when the goods were brought out, the parties chiefly concerned consulted what and to whom they should give them. To every King, then, by the hands of a person for that work appointed is a proportion sent, so sorted and folded, and with that gravity that is admirable. Then that King subdivideth it in like manner among his dependents, they hardly leaving themselves an equal share with one of their subjects, and be it on such occasions as festivals, or at their common meals, the Kings distribute, and to themselves last. They care for little because they want but little, and the reason is a little contents them. In this they are sufficiently revenged on us. They are also free from our pains. They are not disquieted with bills of lading and exchange, nor perplexed with chancery suits and exchequer reckonings. We sweat and toil to live; their pleasure feeds them; I mean their hunting, fishing and fowling, and this table is spread everywhere. They eat twice a day, morning and evening. Their seats and table are the ground. Since the Europeans came into these parts they are grown great lovers of strong liquors, rum especially, and for it exchange the richest of their skins and furs. If they are heated with liquors, they are restless till they have enough to sleep. That is their cry, 'Some more and I will go to sleep;' but when drunk one of the most wretched spectacles in the world."

On the 28th of August, 1609, a little more than a century from the time of the first discovery of the New World by Columbus, Hendrick Hudson, an English navigator, then in the employ of the Dutch East India Company, having been sent out in search of a northwestern passage to the Indies, discovered the mouth of a great bay, since known as Delaware Bay, which he entered and partially explored. But finding the waters shallow, and being satisfied that this was only an arm of the sea which received the waters of a great river, and not a passage to the western ocean, he retired, and, turning the prow of his little craft northward, on the 2d of September, he discovered the river which bears his name, the Hudson, and gave several days to its examination. Not finding a passage to the West, which was the object of his search, he returned to Holland, bearing the evidences of his adventures, and made a full report of his discoveries in which he says, "Of all lands on which I ever set my foot, this is the best for tillage."

A proposition had been made in the States General of Holland to form a West India Company with purposes similar to those of the East India Company; but the conservative element in the Dutch Congress prevailed, and while the Government was unwilling to undertake the risks of an enterprise for which it would be responsible, it was not unwilling to foster private enterprise, and on the 27th of March, 1614, an edict was passed, granting the privileges of trade, in any of its possessions in the New World, during four voyages, founding its right to the territory drained by the Delaware and Hudson upon the discoveries by Hudson. Five vessels were accordingly fitted by a company composed of enterprising merchants of the cities of Amsterdam and Hoorn, which made speedy and prosperous voyages under command of Cornelis Jacobson Mey, bringing back with them fine furs and rich woods, which so excited cupidity that the States General was induced on the 14th of October, 1614, to authorize exclusive trade, for four voyages, extending through three years, in the newly acquired possessions, the edict designating them as New Netherlands.

One of the party of this first enterprise, Cornelis Hendrickson, was left behind with a vessel called the Unrest, which had been built to supply the place of one accidentally burned, in which he proceeded to explore more fully the bay and river Delaware, of which he made report that was read before the States General on the 19th of August, 1616. This report is curious as disclosing the opinions of the first actual explorer in an official capacity: "He hath discovered for his aforesaid masters and directors certain lands, a bay, and three rivers, situate between thirty-eight and forty degrees, and did their trade with the inhabitants, said trade consisting of sables, furs, robes and other skins. He hath found the said country full of trees, to wit, oaks, hickory and pines, which trees were, in some places, covered with vines. He hath seen in said country bucks and does, turkeys and partridges. He hath found the climate of said country very temperate, judging it to be as temperate as this country, Holland. He also traded for and bought from the inhabitants, the Minquas, three persons, being people belonging to this company, which three persons were employed in the service of the Mohawks and Machicans, giving for them kettles, beads, and merchandise."

This second charter of privileges expired in January, 1618, and during its continuance the knowledge acquired of the country and its resources promised so much of success that the States General was ready to grant broader privileges, and on the 3d of June, 1621, the Dutch West India Company was incorporated, to extend for a period of twenty-four years, with the right of renewal, the capital stock to be open to subscription by all nations, and "privileged to trade and plant colonies in Africa, from the tropic of Cancer to the Cape of Good Hope, and in America from the Straits of Magellan to the remotest north." The past glories of Holland, though occupying but an insignificant patch of Europe, emboldened its Government to pass edicts for the colonizing and carrying on an exclusive trade with a full half of the entire world, an example of the biting off of more than could be well chewed. But the light of this enterprising people was beginning to pale before the rising glories of the stern race in their sea girt isle across the channel. Dissensions were arising among the able statesmen who had heretofore guided its affairs, and before the periods promised in the original charter of this colonizing company had expired, its supremacy of the sea was successfully resisted, and its exclusive rights and privileges in the New World had to be relinquished.

The principal object in establishing this West India Company was to secure a good dividend upon the capital stock, which was subscribed to by the rich old burgomasters. The fine furs and products of the forests, which had been taken back to Holland, had proved profitable. But it was seen that if this trade was to be permanently secured, in face of the active competition of other nations, and these commodities steadily depended upon, permanent settlements must be provided for. Accordingly, in 1623, a colony of about forty families, embracing a party of Walloons, protestant fugitives from Belgium, sailed for the new province, under the leadership of Cornelis Jacobson Mey and Joriz Tienpont. Soon after their arrival, Mey, who had been invested with the power of Director General of all the territory claimed by the Dutch, seeing, no doubt, the evidences of some permanence on the Hudson, determined to take these honest minded and devoted Walloons to the South River, or Delaware, that he might also gain for his country a foothold there. The testimony of one of the women, Catalina Tricho, who was of the party, is curious, and sheds some light upon this point. "That she came to this province either in the year 1623 or 1624, and that four women came along with her in the same ship, in which Gov. Arien Jorissen came also over, which four women were married at sea, and that they and their husbands stayed about three weeks at this place (Manhattan) and then they with eight seamen more, went in a vessel by orders of the Dutch Governor to Delaware River, and there settled." Ascending the Delaware some fifty miles, Mey landed on the eastern shore near where now is the town of Gloucester, and built a fort which he called Nassau. Having duly installed his little colony, he returned to Manhattan; but beyond the building of the fort, which served as a trading post, this attempt to plant a colony was futile; for these religious zealots, tiring of the solitude in which they were left, after a few months abandoned it, and returned to their associates whom they had left upon the Hudson. Though not successful in establishing a permanent colony upon the Delaware, ships plied regularly between the fort and Manhattan, and this became the rallying point for the Indians, who brought thither their commodities for trade. At about this time, 1626, the island of Manhattan estimated to contain 22,000 acres, on which now stands the city of New York with its busy population, surrounded by its forests of masts, was bought for the insignificant sum of sixty guilders, about $24, what would now pay for scarcely a square inch of some of that very soil. As an evidence of the thrift which had begun to mark the progress of the colony, it may be stated that the good ship "The Arms of Amsterdam," which bore the intelligence of this fortunate purchase to the assembly of the XIX in Holland, bore also in the language of O'Calaghan, the historian of New Netherland, the "information that the colony was in a most prosperous state, and that the women and the soil were both fruitful. To prove the latter fact, samples of the recent harvest, consisting of wheat, rye, barley, oats, buckwheat, canary seed, were sent forward, together with 8,130 beaver skins, valued at over 45,000 guilders, or nearly $19,000." It is accorded by another historian that this same ship bore also "853½ otter skins, eighty-one minkskins, thirty-six wild cat skins and thirty-four rat skins, with a quantity of oak and hickory timber." From this it may be seen what the commodities were which formed the subjects of trade. Doubtless of wharf rats Holland had enough at home, but the oak and hickory timber came at a time when there was sore need of it.

Finding that the charter of privileges, enacted in 1621, did not give sufficient encouragement and promise of security to actual settlers, further concessions were made in 1629, whereby "all such persons as shall appear and desire the same from the company, shall be acknowledged as Patroons [a sort of feudal lord] of New Netherland, who shall, within the space of four years next after they have given notice to any of the chambers of the company here, or to the Commander or Council there, undertake to plant a colony there of fifty souls, upward of fifteen years old; one-fourth part within one year, and within three years after sending the first, making together four years, the remainder, to the full number of fifty persons, to be shipped from hence, on pain, in case of willful neglect, of being deprived of the privileges obtained." * * "The Patroons, by virtue of their power, shall be permitted, at such places as they shall settle their colonies, to extend their limits four miles along the shore, or two miles on each side of a river, and so far into the country as the situation of the occupiers will permit."

Stimulated by these flattering promises, Goodyn and Bloemmaert, two wealthy and influential citizens, through their agents—Heyser and Coster—secured by purchase from the Indians a tract of land on the western shore, at the mouth of the Delaware, sixteen miles in length along the bay front, and extending sixteen miles back into the country, giving a square of 256 miles. Goodyn immediately gave notice to the company of their intention to plant a colony on their newly acquired territory as patroons. They were joined by an experienced navigator, De Vries, and on the 12th of December, 1630, a vessel, the Walrus, under command of De Vries, was dispatched with a company of settlers and a stock of cattle and farm implements, which arrived safely in the Delaware. De Vries landed about three leagues within the capes, "near the entrance of a fine navigable stream, called the Hoarkill," where he proceeded to build a house, well surrounded with cedar palisades, which served the purpose of fort, lodging house, and trading post. The little settlement, which consisted of about thirty persons, was christened by the high sounding title of Zwanendal—Valley of Swans. In the spring they prepared their fields and planted them, and De Vries returned to Holland, to make report of his proceedings.

But a sad fate awaited the little colony at Zwanendal. In accordance with the custom of European nations, the commandant, on taking possession of the new purchase, erected a post, and affixed thereto a piece of tin on which was traced the arms of Holland and a legend of occupancy. An Indian chieftain, passing that way, attracted by the shining metal, and not understanding the object of the inscription, and not having the fear of their high mightinesses, the States General of Holland before his eyes, tore it down and proceeded to make for himself a tobacco pipe, considering it valuable both by way of ornament and use. When this act of trespass was discovered, it was regarded by the doughty Dutchman as a direct insult to the great State of Holland, and so great an ado was raised over it that the simple minded natives became frightened, believing that their chief had committed a mortal offense, and in the strength and sincerity of their friendship immediately proceeded to dispatch the offending chieftain, and brought the bloody emblems of their deed to the head of the colony. This act excited the anger of the relatives of the murdered man, and in accordance with Indian law, they awaited the chance to take revenge. O'Calaghan gives the following account of this bloody massacre which ensued: "The colony at Zwanendal consisted at this time of thirty-four persons. Of these, thirty-two were one day at work in the fields, while Commissary Hosset remained in charge of the house, where another of the settlers lay sick abed. A large bull dog was chained out of doors. On pretence of selling some furs, three savages entered the house and murdered Hosset and the sick man. They found it not so easy to dispatch the mastiff. It was not until they had pierced him with at least twenty-five arrows that he was destroyed. The men in the fields were then set on, in an equally treacherous manner, under the guise of friendship, and every man of them slain." Thus was a worthless bit of tin the cause of the cutting off and utter extermination of the infant colony.

De Vries was upon the point of returning to Zwanendal when he received intimation of disaster to the settlers. With a large vessel and a yacht, he set sail on the 24th of May, 1632, to carry succor, provided with the means of prosecuting the whale fishery which he had been led to believe might be made very profitable, and of pushing the production of grain and tobacco. On arriving in the Delaware, he fired a signal gun to give notice of his approach. The report echoed through the forest, but, alas! the ears which would have been gladdened with the sound were heavy, and no answering salute came from the shore. On landing, he found his house destroyed, the palisades burned, and the skulls and bones of his murdered countrymen bestrewing the earth, sad relics of the little settlement, which had promised so fairly, and warning tokens of the barbarism of the natives.

De Vries knew that he was in no position to attempt to punish the guilty parties, and hence determined to pursue an entirely pacific policy. At his invitation, the Indians gathered in with their chief for a conference. Sitting down in a circle beneath the shadows of the somber forest, their Sachem in the centre, De Vries, without alluding to their previous acts of savagery, concluded with them a treaty of peace and friendship, and presented them in token of ratification, "some duffels, bullets, axes and Nuremburg trinkets."

In place of finding his colony with plenty of provisions for the immediate needs of his party, he could get nothing, and began to be in want. He accordingly sailed up the river in quest of food. The natives were ready with their furs for barter, but they had no supplies of food with which they wished to part. Game, however, was plenty, and wild turkeys were brought in weighing over thirty pounds. One morning after a frosty night, while the little craft was up the stream, the party was astonished to find the waters frozen over, and their ship fast in the ice. Judging by the mild climate of their own country, Holland, they did not suppose this possible. For several weeks they were held fast without the power to move their floating home. Being in need of a better variety of food than he found it possible to obtain, De Vries sailed away with a part of his followers to Virginia, where he was hospitably entertained by the Governor, who sent a present of goats as a token of friendship to the Dutch Governor at Manhattan. Upon his return to the Delaware, De Vries found that the party he had left behind to prosecute the whale fishery had only taken a few small ones, and these so poor that the amount of oil obtained was insignificant. He had been induced to embark in the enterprise of a settlement here by the glittering prospect of prosecuting the whale fishery along the shore at a great profit. Judging by this experience that the hope of great gains from this source was groundless, and doubtless haunted by a superstitious dread of making their homes amid the relics of the settlers of the previous year, and of plowing fields enriched by their blood who had been so utterly cut off, and a horror of dwelling amongst a people so revengeful and savage, De Vries gathered all together, and taking his entire party with him sailed away to Manhattan and thence home to Holland, abandoning utterly the settlement.

The Dutch still however sought to maintain a foothold upon the Delaware, and a fierce contention having sprung up between the powerful patroons and the Director General, and they having agreed to settle differences by the company authorizing the purchase of the claims of the patroons, those upon the Delaware were sold for 15,600 guilders. Fort Nassau was accordingly re-occupied and manned with a small military force, and when a party from Connecticut Colony came, under one Holmes to make a settlement upon the Delaware, the Dutch at Nassau were found too strong to be subdued, and Holmes and his party were compelled to surrender, and were sent as prisoners of war to Manhattan.

CHAPTER II.

JOHN CLAUDE RYSINGH, 1654-55.

AT this period, the throne of Sweden was occupied by Gustavus Adolphus, a monarch of the most enlightened views and heroic valor. Seeing the activity of surrounding nations in sending out colonies, he proposed to his people to found a commonwealth in the New World, not for the mere purpose of gain by trade, but to set up a refuge for the oppressed, a place of religious liberty and happy homes that should prove of advantage to "all oppressed Christendom." Accordingly, a company with ample privileges was incorporated by the Swedish Government, to which the King himself pledged $400,000 of the royal treasure, and men of every rank and nationality were invited to join in the enterprise. Gustavus desired not that his colony should depend upon serfs or slaves to do the rough work. "Slaves cost a great deal, labor with reluctance, and soon perish from hard usage. The Swedish nation is laborious and intelligent, and surely we shall gain more by a free people with wives and children."

In the meantime, the fruits of the reformation in Germany were menaced, and the Swedish monarch determined to unsheath his sword and lead his people to the aid of Protestant faith in the land where its standard had been successfully raised. At the battle of Lützen, where for the cause which he had espoused, a signal victory was gained, the illustrious monarch, in the flower of life, received a mortal wound. Previous to the battle, and while engaged in active preparations for the great struggle, he remembered the interests of his contemplated colony in America, and in a most earnest manner commended the enterprise to the people of Germany.

Oxenstiern, the minister of Gustavus, upon whom the weight of government devolved during the minority of the young daughter, Christina, declared that he was but the executor of the will of the fallen King, and exerted himself to further the interests of a colony which he believed would be favorable to "all Christendom, to Europe, to the whole world." Four years however elapsed before the project was brought to a successful issue. Peter Minuit, who had for a time been Governor of New Netherlands, having been displaced, sought employment in the Swedish company, and was given the command of the first colony. Two vessels, the Key of Calmar and the Griffin, early in the year 1638, with a company of Swedes and Fins, made their way across the stormy Atlantic and arrived safely in the Delaware. They purchased of the Indians the lands from the ocean to the falls of Trenton, and at the mouth of Christina Creek erected a fort which they called Christina, after the name of the youthful Queen of Sweden. The soil was fruitful, the climate mild, and the scenery picturesque. Compared with many parts of Finland and Sweden, it was a Paradise, a name which had been given the point at the entrance of the bay. As tidings of the satisfaction of the first emigrants were borne back to the fatherland, the desire to seek a home in the new country spread rapidly, and the ships sailing were unable to take the many families seeking passage.

The Dutch were in actual possession of Fort Nassau when the Swedes first arrived, and though they continued to hold it and to seek the trade of the Indians, yet the artful Minuit was more than a match for them in Indian barter. William Keift, the Governor of New Netherland, entered a vigorous protest against the encroachments of the Swedes upon Dutch territory, in which he said "this has been our property for many years, occupied with forts and sealed by our blood, which also was done when thou wast in the service of New Netherland, and is therefore well known to thee." But Minuit pushed forward the work upon his fort, regardless of protest, trusting to the respect which the flag of Sweden had inspired in the hands of Banner and Torstensen. For more than a year no tidings were had from Sweden, and no supplies from any source were obtained; and while the fruits of their labors were abundant there were many articles of diet, medicines and apparel, the lack of which they began to sorely feel. So pressing had the want become, that application had been made to the authorities at Manhattan for permission to remove thither with all their effects. But on the very day before that on which they were to embark, a ship from Sweden richly laden with provisions, cattle, seeds and merchandise for barter with the natives came joyfully to their relief, and this, the first permanent settlement on soil where now are the States of Delaware and Pennsylvania, was spared. The success and prosperity of the colony during the first few years of its existence was largely due to the skill and policy of Minuit, who preserved the friendship of the natives, avoided an open conflict with the Dutch, and so prosecuted trade that the Dutch Governor reported to his government that trade had fallen off 30,000 beavers. Minuit was at the head of the colony for about three years, and died in the midst of the people whom he had led.

Minuit was succeeded in the government by Peter Hollandaer, who had previously gone in charge of a company of emigrants, and who was now, in 1641, commissioned. The goodly lands upon the Delaware were a constant attraction to the eye of the adventurer; a party from Connecticut, under the leadership of Robert Cogswell, came, and squatted without authority upon the site of the present town of Salem, N. J. Another company had proceeded up the river, and, entering the Schuylkill, had planted themselves upon its banks. The settlement of the Swedes, backed as it was by one of the most powerful nations of Europe, the Governor of New Netherland was not disposed to molest; but when these irresponsible wandering adventurers came sailing past their forts and boldly planted themselves upon the most eligible sites and fertile lands in their territory, the Dutch determined to assume a hostile front, and to drive them away. Accordingly, Gen. Jan Jansen Van Ilpendam—his very name was enough to frighten away the emigrants—was sent with two vessels and a military force, who routed the party upon the Schuylkill, destroying their fort and giving them a taste of the punishment that was likely to be meted out to them, if this experiment of trespass was repeated. The Swedes joined the Dutch in breaking up the settlement at Salem and driving away the New England intruders.

In 1642, Hollandaer was succeeded in the government of the Swedish Colony by John Printz, whose instructions for the management of affairs were drawn with much care by the officers of the company in Stockholm. "He was, first of all, to maintain friendly relations with the Indians, and by the advantage of low prices hold their trade. His next care was to cultivate enough grain for the wants of the colonists, and when this was insured, turn his attention to the culture of tobacco, the raising of cattle and sheep of a good species, the culture of the grape, and the raising of silk worms. The manufacture of salt by evaporation, and the search for metals and minerals were to be prosecuted, and inquiry into the establishment of fisheries, with a view to profit, especially the whale fishery, was to be made." It will be seen from these instructions that the far-sighted Swedish statesmen had formed an exalted conception of the resources of the new country, and had figured to themselves great possibilities from its future development. Visions of rich silk products, of the precious metals and gems from its mines, flocks upon a thousand hills that should rival in the softness of their downy fleeces the best products of the Indian looms, and the luscious clusters of the vine that could make glad the palate of the epicure filled their imaginations.

With two vessels, the Stoork and Renown, Printz set sail, and arrived at Fort Christina on the 15th of February, 1643. He was bred to the profession of arms, and was doubtless selected with an eye to his ability to holding possession of the land against the conflict that was likely to arise. He had been a Lieutenant of cavalry, and was withal a man of prodigious proportions, "who weighed," according to De Vries, "upward of 400 pounds, and drank three drinks at every meal." He entertained exalted notions of his dignity as Governor of the colony, and prepared to establish himself in his new dominions with some degree of magnificence. He brought with him from Sweden the bricks to be used for the construction of his royal dwelling. Upon an inspection of the settlement, he detected the inherent weakness of the location of Fort Christina for commanding the navigation of the river, and selected the island of Tinacum for the site of a new fort, called New Gottenburg, which was speedily erected and made strong with huge hemlock logs. In the midst of the island, he built his royal residence, which was surrounded with trees and shubbery. He erected another fort near the mouth of Salem Creek, called Elsinborg, which he mounted with eight brass twelve-pounders, and garrisoned. Here all ships ascending the river were brought to, and required to await a permit from the Governor before proceeding to their destination. Gen. Van Ilpendam, who had been sent to drive away the intruders from New England, had remained after executing his commission as commandant at Fort Nassau; but having incurred the displeasure of Director Keift, he had been displaced, and was succeeded by Andreas Hudde, a crafty and politic agent of the Dutch Governor, who had no sooner arrived and become settled in his place than a conflict of authority sprang up between himself and the Swedish Governor. Dutch settlers secured a grant of land on the west bank of Delaware, and obtained possession by purchase from the Indians. This procedure kindled the wrath of Printz, who tore down the ensign of the company which had been erected in token of the power of Holland, and declared that he would have pulled down the colors of their High Mightinesses had they been erected on this the Swedish soil. That there might be no mistake about his claim to authority, the testy Governor issued a manifesto to his rival on the opposite bank, in which were these explicit declarations:

"Andreas Hudde! I remind you again, by this written warning, to discontinue the injuries of which you have been guilty against the Royal Majesty of Sweden, my most gracious Queen; against Her Royal Majesty's rights, pretensions, soil and land, without showing the least respect to the Royal Majesty's magnificence, reputation and dignity; and to do so no more, considering how little it would be becoming Her Royal Majesty to bear such gross violence, and what great disasters might originate from it, yea, might be expected. *
* * All this I can freely bring forward in my own defense, to exculpate me from all future calamities, of which we give you a warning, and place it at your account. Dated New Gothenburg, 3d September, stil, veteri 1646."

It will be noted from the repetition of the high sounding epithets applied to the Queen, that Printz had a very exalted idea of his own position as the Vicegerent of the Swedish monarch. Hudde responded, saying in reply: "The place we possess we hold in just deed, perhaps before the name of South River was heard of in Sweden." This paper, upon its presentation, Printz flung to the ground in contempt, and when the messenger, who bore it, demanded an answer, Printz unceremoniously threw him out doors, and seizing a gun would have dispatched the Dutchman had he not been arrested; and whenever any of Hudde's men visited Tinicum they were sure to be abused, and frequently came back "bloody and bruised." Hudde urged rights acquired by prior possession, but Printz answered: "The devil was the oldest possessor in hell, yet he, notwithstanding, would sometimes admit a younger one." A vessel which had come to the Delaware from Manhattan with goods to barter to the Indians, was brought to, and ordered away. In vain did Hudde plead the rights acquired by previous possession, and finally treaty obligations existing between the two nations. Printz was inexorable, and peremptorily ordered the skipper away, and as his ship was not provided with the means of fighting its way up past the frowning battlements of Fort Elsinborg, his only alternative was to return to Manhattan and report the result to his employers.

Peter Stuyvesant, a man of a good share of native talent and force of character, succeeded to the chief authority over New Netherland in May, 1647. The affairs of his colony were not in an encouraging condition. The New England colonies were crowding upon him from the north and east, and the Swedes upon the South River were occupying the territory which the Dutch for many years previous to the coming of Christina's colony had claimed. Amid the thickening complications, Stuyvesant had need of all his power of argument and executive skill. He entered into negotiations with the New England colonies for a peaceful settlement of their difficulties, getting the very best terms he could, without resorting to force; for, said his superiors, the officers of the company in Holland, who had an eye to dividends, "War cannot be for our advantage; the New England people are too powerful for us." A pacific policy was also preserved toward the Swedes. Hudde was retained at the head of Dutch affairs upon the Delaware, and he was required to make full reports of everything that was transpiring there in order that a clear insight might be gained of the policy likely to be pursued. Stuyvesant was entirely too shrewd a politician for the choleric Printz. He recommended to the company to plant a Dutch colony on the site of Zwanendal at the mouth of the river, another on the opposite bank, which, if effectually done, would command its navigation; and a third on the upper waters at Beversreede, which would intercept the intercourse of the native population. By this course of active colonizing, Stuyvesant rightly calculated that the Swedish power would be circumscribed, and finally, upon a favorable occasion, be crushed out.

Stuyvesant, that he might ascertain the nature and extent of the Swedish claims to the country, and examine into the complaints that were pouring in upon him of wrongs and indignities suffered by the Dutch at the hands of the Swedish power, in 1651 determined to visit the Delaware in his official capacity. He evidently went in some state, and Printz, who was doubtless impressed with the condescension of the Governor of all New Netherland in thus coming, was put upon his good behavior. Stuyvesant, by his address, got completely on the blind side of the Swedish chief, maintaining the garb of friendship and brotherly good-will, and insisting that the discussion of rights should be carried on in a peaceful and friendly manner, for we are informed that they mutually promised "not to commit any hostile or vexatious acts against one another, but to maintain together all neighborly friendship and correspondence, as good friends and allies are bound to do." Printz was thus, by this agreement, entirely disarmed and placed at a disadvantage; for the Dutch Governor took advantage of the armistice to acquire lands below Fort Christina, where he proceeded to erect a fort only five miles away, which he named Fort Casimir. This gave the Dutch a foothold upon the south bank, and in nearer proximity to the ocean than Fort Christina. Fort Nassau was dismantled and destroyed, as being no longer of use. In a conference with the Swedish Governor, Stuyvesant demanded to see documental proof of his right to exercise authority upon the Delaware, and the compass of the lands to which the Swedish Government laid claim. Printz prepared a statement in which he set out the "Swedish limits wide enough." But Stuyvesant demanded the documents, under the seal of the company, and characterized this writing as a "subterfuge," maintaining by documentary evidence, on his part, the Dutch West India Company's right to the soil.

Printz was great as a blusterer, and preserver of authority when personal abuse and kicks and cuffs could be resorted to without the fear of retaliation; but no match in statecraft for the wily Stuyvesant. To the plea of pre-occupancy he had nothing to answer more than he had already done to Hudde's messenger respecting the government of Hades, and herein was the cause of the Swedes inherently weak. In numbers, too, the Swedes were feeble compared with the Dutch, who had ten times the population. But in diplomacy he had been entirely overreached. Fort Casimir, by its location, rendered the rival Fort Elsinborg powerless, and under plea that the mosquitoes had become troublesome there, it was abandoned. Discovering, doubtless, that a cloud of complications was thickening over him, which he would be unable with the forces at his command to successfully withstand, he asked to be relieved, and, without awaiting an answer to his application, departed for Sweden, leaving his son-in-law, John Pappegoya, who had previously received marks of the royal favor, and been invested with the dignity of Lieutenant Governor, in supreme authority.

The Swedish company had by this time, no doubt, discovered that forcible opposition to Swedish occupancy of the soil upon Delaware was destined soon to come, and accordingly, as a precautionary measure, in November, 1653, the College of Commerce sent John Amundson Besch, with the commission of Captain in the Navy, to superintend the construction of vessels. Upon his arrival, he acquired lands suitable for the purpose of ship-building, and set about laying his keels. He was to have supreme authority over the naval force, and was to act in conjunction with the Governor in protecting the interests of the colony, but in such a manner that neither should decide anything without consulting the other.

On receiving the application of Printz to be relieved, the company appointed John Claude Rysingh, then Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, as Vice Director of New Sweden. He was instructed to fortify and extend the Swedish possessions, but without interrupting the friendship existing with the English or Dutch. He was to use his power of persuasion in inducing the latter to give up Fort Casimir, which was regarded as an intrusion upon Swedish possessions, but without resorting to hostilities, as it was better to allow the Dutch to occupy it than to have it fall into the hands of the English, "who are the more powerful, and, of course, the most dangerous in that country." Thus early was the prowess of England foreshadowed. Gov. Rysingh arrived in the Delaware, on the last day of May, 1654, and immediately demanded the surrender of Fort Casimir. Adriaen Van Tienhoven, an aide-de-camp on the staff of the Dutch commandant of the fort, was sent on board the vessel to demand of Gov. Rysingh by what right he claimed to dispossess the rightful occupants; but the Governor was not disposed to discuss the matter, and immediately landed a party and took possession without more opposition than wordy protests, the Dutch Governor saying, when called on to make defense, "What can I do? there is no powder." Rysingh, however, in justification of his course, stated to Tienhoven, after he had gained possession of the fort, that he was acting under orders from the crown of Sweden, whose ambassador at the Dutch Court, when remonstrating against the action of Gov. Stuyvesant in erecting and manning Fort Casimir had been assured, by the State's General and the offices of the West India Company, that they had not authorized the erection of this fort on Swedish soil, saying, "if our people are in your Excellency's way, drive them off." "Thereupon the Swedish Governor slapped Van Tienhoven on the breast, and said, 'Go! tell your Governor that.'" As the capture was made on Trinity Sunday, the name was changed from Fort Casimir to Fort Trinity.

Thus were the instructions of the new Governor, not to resort to force, but to secure possession of the fort by negotiation, complied with, but by a forced interpretation. For, although he had not actually come to battle, for the very good reason that the Dutch had no powder, and were not disposed to use their fists against fire arms, which the Swedes brandished freely, yet, in making his demand for the fort, he had put on the stern aspect of war.

Stuyvesant, on learning of the loss of Fort Casimir, sent a messenger to the Delaware to invite Gov. Rysingh to come to Manhattan to hold friendly conference upon the subject of their difficulties. This Rysingh refused to do, and the Dutch Governor, probably desiring instructions from the home Government before proceeding to extremities, made a voyage to the West Indies for the purpose of arranging favorable regulations of trade with the colonies, though without the instructions, or even the knowledge of the States-General. Cromwell, who was now at the head of the English nation, by the policy of his agents, rendered this embassy of Stuyvesant abortive.

As soon as information of the conduct of Rysingh at Zwanendal was known in Holland, the company lost no time in disclaiming the representations which he had made of its willingness to have the fort turned over to the Swedes, and immediately took measures for restoring it and wholly dispossessing the Swedes of lands upon the Delaware. On the 16th of November, 1655, the company ordered Stuyvesant "to exert every nerve to avenge the insult, by not only replacing matters on the Delaware in their former position, but by driving the Swedes from every side of the river," though they subsequently modified this order in such manner as to allow the Swedes, after Fort Casimir had been taken, "to hold the land on which Fort Christina is built," with a garden to cultivate tobacco, because it appears that they had made the purchase with the previous knowledge of the company, thus manifesting a disinclination to involve Holland in a war with Sweden. "Two armed ships were forthwith commissioned; 'the drum was beaten daily for volunteers' in the streets of Amsterdam; authority was sent out to arm and equip, and if necessary to press into the company's service a sufficient number of ships for the expedition." In the meantime, Gov. Rysingh, who had inaugurated his reign by so bold a stroke of policy, determined to ingratiate himself into the favor of the Indians, who had been soured in disposition by the arbitrary conduct of the passionate Printz. He accordingly sent out on all sides an invitation to the native tribes to assemble on a certain day, by their chiefs and principal men, at the seat of government on Tinicum Island, to brighten the chain of friendship and renew their pledges of faith and good neighborhood.

On the morning of the appointed day, ten grand sachems with their attendants came, and with the formality characteristic of these native tribes, the council opened. Many and bitter were the complaints made against the Swedes for wrongs suffered at their hands, "chief among which was that many of their number had died, plainly pointing, though not explicitly saying it, to the giving of spirituous liquors as the cause." The new Governor had no answer to make to these complaints, being convinced, probably, that they were but too true. Without attempting to excuse or extenuate the past, Rysingh brought forward the numerous presents which he had taken with him from Sweden for the purpose. The sight of the piled-up goods produced a profound impression upon the minds of the native chieftains. They sat apart for conference before making any expression of their feelings. Naaman, the fast friend of the white man, and the most consequential of the warriors, according to Campanius, spoke: "Look," said he, "and see what they have brought to us." So saying, he stroked himself three times down the arm, which, among the Indians, was a token of friendship; afterward he thanked the Swedes on behalf of his people for the presents they had received, and said that friendship should be observed more strictly between them than ever before; that the Swedes and the Indians in Gov. Printz's time were as one body and one heart, striking his breast as he spoke, and that thenceforward they should be as one head; in token of which he took hold of his head with both hands, and made a motion as if he were tying a knot, and then he made this comparison: "That, as the calabash was round, without any crack, so they should be a compact body without any fissure; and that if any should attempt to do any harm to the Indians, the Swedes should immediately inform them of it; and, on the other hand, the Indians would give immediate notice to the Christians, even if it were in the middle of the night." On this they were answered that that would be indeed a true and lasting friendship, if every one would agree to it; on which they gave a general shout in token of consent. Immediately on this the great guns were fired, which pleased them extremely, and they said, "Poo, hoo, hoo; mokerick picon," that is to say "Hear and believe; the great guns are fired." Rysingh then produced all the treaties which had ever been concluded between them and the Swedes, which were again solemnly confirmed. "When those who had signed the deeds heard their names, they appeared to rejoice, but, when the names were read of those who were dead, they hung their heads in sorrow."

After the first ebullition of feeling had subsided on the part of the Dutch Company at Amsterdam, the winter passed without anything further being done than issuing the order to Stuyvesant to proceed against the Swedes. In the spring, however, a thirty-six-gun brig was obtained from the burgomasters of Amsterdam, which, with four other crafts of varying sizes, was prepared for duty, and the little fleet set sail for New Netherland. Orders were given for immediate action, though Director General Stuyvesant had not returned from the West Indies. Upon the arrival of the vessels at Manhattan, it was announced that "if any lovers of the prosperity and security of the province of New Netherland were inclined to volunteer, or to serve for reasonable wages, they should come forward," and whoever should lose a limb, or be maimed, was assured of a decent compensation. The merchantmen were ordered to furnish two of their crews, and the river boatmen were to be impressed. At this juncture a grave question arose: "Shall the Jews be enlisted?" It was decided in the negative; but in lieu of service, adult male Jews were taxed sixty-five stivers a head per month, to be levied by execution in case of refusal.

Stuyvesant had now arrived from his commercial trip, and made ready for opening the campaign in earnest. A day of prayer and thanksgiving was held to beseech the favor of Heaven upon the enterprise, and on the 5th of September, 1655, with a fleet of seven vessels and some 600 men, Stuyvesant hoisted sail and steered for the Delaware. Arrived before Fort Trinity (Casimir), the Director sent Capt. Smith and a drummer to summon the fort, and ordered a flank movement by a party of fifty picked men to cut off communication with Fort Christina and the headquarters of Gov. Rysingh. Swen Schute, the commandant of the garrison, asked permission to communicate with Rysingh, which was denied, and he was called on to prevent bloodshed. An interview in the valley midway between the fort and the Dutch batteries was held, when Schute asked to send an open letter to Rysingh. This was denied, and for a third time the fort was summoned. Impatient of delay, and in no temper for parley, the great guns were landed and the Dutch force ordered to advance. Schute again asked for a delay until morning, which was granted, as the day was now well spent and the Dutch would be unable to make the necessary preparations to open before morning. Early on the following day, Schute went on board the Dutch flag-ship, the Balance, and agreed to terms of surrender very honorable to his flag. He was permitted to send to Sweden, by the first opportunity, the cannon, nine in number, belonging to the crown of Sweden, to march out of the fort with twelve men, as his body guard, fully accoutered, and colors flying; the common soldiers to wear their side arms. The commandant and other officers were to retain their private property, the muskets belonging to the crown were to be held until sent for, and finally the fort was to be surrendered, with all the cannon, ammunition, materials and other goods belonging to the West India Company. The Dutch entered the fort at noon with all the formality and glorious circumstance of war, and Dominie Megapolensis, Chaplain of the expedition, preached a sermon of thanksgiving on the following Sunday in honor of the great triumph.

While these signal events were transpiring at Casimir, Gov. Rysing, at his royal residence on Tinicum, was in utter ignorance that he was being despoiled of his power. A detachment of nine men had been sent by the Governor to Casimir to re-enforce the garrison, which came unawares upon the Dutch lines, and after a brief skirmish all but two were captured. Upon learning that the fort was invested, Factor Ellswyck was sent with a flag to inquire of the invaders the purpose of their coming. The answer was returned "To recover and retain our property." Rysing then communicated the hope that they would therewith rest content, and not encroach further upon Swedish territory, having, doubtless, ascertained by this time that the Dutch were too strong for him to make any effectual resistance. Stuyvesant returned an evasive answer, but made ready to march upon Fort Christina. It will be remembered that by the terms of the modified orders given for the reduction of the Swedes, Fort Christina was not to be disturbed. But the Dutch Governor's blood was now up, and he determined to make clean work while the means were in his hands. Discovering that the Dutch were advancing, Rysing spent the whole night in strengthening the defenses and putting the garrison in position to make a stout resistance. Early on the following day the invaders made their appearance on the opposite bank of Christina Creek, where they threw up defenses and planted their cannon. Forces were landed above the fort, and the place was soon invested on all sides, the vessels, in the meantime, having been brought into the mouth of the creek, their cannon planted west of the fort and on Timber Island. Having thus securely shut up the Governor and his garrison, Stuyvesant summoned him to surrender. Rysing could not in honor tamely submit, and at a council of war it was resolved to make a defense and "leave the consequence to be redressed by our gracious superiors." But their supply of powder barely sufficed for one round, and his force consisted of only thirty men. In the meantime, the Dutch soldiery made free with the property of the Swedes without the fort, killing their cattle and invading their homes. "At length the Swedish garrison itself showed symptoms of mutiny. The men were harassed with constant watching, provisions began to fail, many were sick, several had deserted, and Stuyvesant threatened, that, if they held out much longer, to give no quarter." A conference was held which ended by the return of Rysing to the fort more resolute than ever for defense. Finally Stuyvesant sent in his ultimatum and gave twenty-four hours for a final answer, the generous extent of time for consideration evincing the humane disposition of the commander of the invading army, or what is perhaps more probable his own lack of stomach for carnage. Before the expiration of the time allowed, the garrison capitulated, "after a siege of fourteen days, during which, very fortunately, there was a great deal more talking than cannonading, and no blood shed, except those of the goats, poultry and swine, which the Dutch troops laid their hands on. The twenty or thirty Swedes then marched out with their arms; colors flying, matches lighted, drums beating, and fifes playing, and the Dutch took possession of the fort, hauled down the Swedish flag and hoisted their own."

By the terms of capitulation, the Swedes, who wished to remain in the country, were permitted to do so, on taking the oath of allegiance, and rights of property were to be respected under the sway of Dutch law. Gov. Rysingh, and all others who desired to return to Europe, were furnished passage, and by a secret provision, a loan of £300 Flemish was made to Rysingh, to be refunded on his arrival in Sweden, the cannon and other property belonging to the crown remaining in the hands of the Dutch until the loan was paid. Before withdrawing Stuyvesant offered to deliver over Fort Christina and the lands immediately about it to Rysingh, but this offer was declined with dignity, as the matter had now passed for arbitrament to the courts of the two nations.

The terms of the capitulation were honorable and liberal enough, but the Dutch authorities seem to have exercised little care in carrying out its provisions, or else the discipline in the service must have been very lax. For Rysingh had no sooner arrived at Manhattan, than he entered most vigorous protests against the violations of the provisions of the capitulation to Gov. Stuyvesant. He asserted that the property belonging to the Swedish crown had been left without guard or protection from pillage, and that he himself had not been assigned quarters suited to his dignity. He accused the Dutch with having broken open the church, and taken away all the cordage and sails of a new vessel, with having plundered the villages, Tinnakong, Uplandt, Finland, Printzdrorp and other places. "In Christina, the women were violently torn from their houses; whole buildings were destroyed; yea, oxen, cows, hogs and other creatures were butchered day after day; even the horses were not spared, but wantonly shot; the plantations destroyed, and the whole country so desolated that scarce any means were left for the subsistence of the inhabitants." "Your men carried off even my own property," said Rysingh, "with that of my family, and we were left like sheep doomed to the knife, without means of defense against the wild barbarians."

Thus the colony of Swedes and Fins on the South River, which had been planned by and had been the object of solicitude to the great monarch himself, and had received the fostering care of the Swedish Government, came to an end after an existence of a little more than seventeen years—1638-1655. But though it no longer existed as a colony under the government of the crown of Sweden, many of the colonists remained and became the most intelligent and law-abiding citizens, and constituted a vigorous element in the future growth of the State. Some of the best blood of Europe at this period flowed in the veins of the Swedes. "A love for Sweden," says Bancroft, "their dear mother country, the abiding sentiment of loyalty toward its sovereign, continued to distinguish the little band. At Stockholm, they remained for a century the objects of disinterested and generous regard; affection united them in the New World; and a part of their descendants still preserve their altar and their dwellings around the graves of their fathers."

This campaign of Stuyvesant, for the dispossessing of the Swedes of territory upon the Delaware, furnishes Washington Irving subject for some of the most inimitable chapters of broad humor, in his Knickerbocker's New York, to be found in the English language. And yet, in the midst of his side-splitting paragraphs, he indulges in a reflection which is worthy of remembrance. "He who reads attentively will discover the threads of gold which run throughout the web of history, and are invisible to the dull eye of ignorance. * * * By the treacherous surprisal of Fort Casimir, then, did the crafty Swedes enjoy a transient triumph, but drew upon their heads the vengeance of Peter Stuyvesant, who wrested all New Sweden from their hands. By the conquest of New Sweden, Peter Stuyvesant aroused the claims of Lord Baltimore, who appealed to the cabinet of Great Britain, who subdued the whole province of New Netherlands. By this great achievement, the whole extent of North America, from Nova Scotia to the Floridas, was rendered one entire dependency upon the British crown. But mark the consequence: The hitherto scattered colonies being thus consolidated and having no rival colonies to check or keep them in awe, waxed great and powerful, and finally becoming too strong for the mother country, were enabled to shake off its bonds. But the chain of effects stopped not here; the successful revolution in America produced the sanguinary revolution in France, which produced the puissant Bonaparte, who produced the French despotism."

In March, 1656, the ship "Mercury," with 130 emigrants, arrived, the government at Stockholm having had no intimation of the Dutch conquest. An attempt was made to prevent a landing, and the vessel was ordered to report to Stuyvesant at Manhattan, but the order was disregarded and the colonists debarked and acquired lands. The Swedish Government was not disposed to submit to these high-handed proceedings of the Dutch, and the ministers of the two courts maintained a heated discussion of their differences. Finding the Dutch disposed to hold by force their conquests, the government of Sweden allowed the claim to rest until 1664. In that year, vigorous measures were planned to regain its claims upon the Delaware, and a fleet bearing a military force was dispatched for the purpose. But, having been obliged to put back on account of stress of weather, the enterprise was abandoned.

CHAPTER III.

JOHN PAUL JACQUET, 1655-57—JACOB ALRICHS, 1657-59—GOERAN VAN DYCK, 1657-58—WILLIAM BEEKMAN, 1658-63—ALEXANDER D'HINOYOSSA, 1659-64.

THE colonies upon the Delaware being now under exclusive control of the Dutch, John Paul Jaquet was appointed in November, 1655, as Vice Director, Derck Smidt having exercised authority after the departure of Stuyvesant. The expense of fitting out the expedition for the reduction of the Swedes was sorely felt by the West India Company, which had been obliged to borrow money for the purpose of the city of Amsterdam. In payment of this loan, the company sold to the city all the lands upon the south bank of the Delaware, from the ocean to Christina Creek, reaching back to the lands of the Minquas, which was designated Nieuw Amstel. Again was there divided authority upon the Delaware. The government of the new possession was vested in a commission of forty residents of Amsterdam, who appointed Jacob Alrichs as Director, and sent him with a force of forty soldiers and 150 colonists, in three vessels, to assume the government, whereupon Jaquet relinquished authority over this portion of his territory. The company in communicating with Stuyvesant upon the subject of his course in dispossessing the Swedes, after duly considering all the complaints and remonstrances of the Swedish government, approved his conduct, "though they would not have been displeased had such a formal capitulation not taken place," adding as a parenthetical explanation of the word formal "what is written is too long preserved, and may be produced when not desired, whereas words not recorded are, in the lapse of time, forgotten, or may be explained away."

Stuyvesant still remained in supreme control over both the colony of the city and the colony of the company, to the immediate governorship of the latter of which, Goeran Van Dyck was appointed. But though settlements in the management of affairs were frequently made, they would not remain settled. There was conflict of authority between Alrichs and Van Dyck. The companies soon found that a grievous system of smuggling had sprung up. After a searching examination into the irregularities by Stuyvesant, who visited the Delaware for the purpose, he recommended the appointment of one general agent who should have charge of all the revenues of both colonies, and William Beekman was accordingly appointed. The company of the city seems not to have been satisfied with the profits of their investment, and accordingly made new regulations to govern settlement, by which larger returns would accrue. This action created discontent among the settlers, and many who were meditating the purchase of lands and the acquisition of homes, determined to go over into Maryland where Lord Baltimore was offering far more liberal terms of settlement. To add to the discomforts of the settlers, "the miasms which the low alluvial soil and the rank and decomposed vegetation of a new country engenders," produced wasting sicknesses. When the planting was completed, and the new soil, for ages undisturbed, had been thoroughly stirred, the rains set in which descended almost continuously, producing fever and ague and dysentery. Scarcely a family escaped the epidemic. Six in the family of Director Alrichs were attacked, and his wife died. New colonists came without provisions, which only added to the distress. "Scarcity of provisions," says O'Calaghan, "naturally followed the failure of the crops; 900 schepels of grain had been sown in the spring. They produced scarcely 600 at harvest. Rye rose to three guilders the bushel; peas to eight guilders the sack; salt was twelve guilders the bushel at New Amsterdam; cheese and butter were not to be had, and when a man journeys he can get nothing but dry bread, or he must take a pot or kettle along with him to cook his victuals." "The place had now got so bad a name that the whole river could not wash it clean." The exactions of the city company upon its colony, not only did not bring increased revenue, but by dispersing the honest colonists, served to notify Lord Baltimore—who had laid claim to the lands upon Delaware, on account of original discovery by Lord De la War, from whom the river takes its name, and from subsequent charter of the British crown, covering territory from the 38th to the 40th degree of latitude—of the weakness of the colonies, and persuaded him that now was a favorable opportunity to enforce his claims. Accordingly, Col. Utie, with a number of delegates, was dispatched to demand that the Dutch should quit the place, or declare themselves subjects of Lord Baltimore, adding, "that if they hesitated, they should be responsible for whatever innocent blood might be shed."

Excited discussions ensued between the Dutch authorities and the agents of the Maryland government, and it was finally agreed to refer the matter to Gov. Stuyvesant, who immediately sent Commissioners to the Chesapeake to settle differences, and enter into treaty regulations for the mutual return of fugitives, and dispatched sixty soldiers to the Delaware to assist in preserving order, and resisting the English, should an attempt be made to dispossess the Dutch.

Upon the death of Alrichs, which occurred in 1659, Alexander D'Hinoyossa was appointed Governor of the city colony. The new Governor was a man of good business capacity, and sought to administer the affairs of his colony for the best interests of the settlers, and for increasing the revenues of the company. To further the general prosperity, the company negotiated a new loan with which to strengthen and improve its resources. This liberal policy had the desired effect. The Swedes, who had settled above on the river, moved down, and acquired homes on the lands of the city colony. The Fins and discontented Dutch, who had gone to Maryland, returned and brought with them some of the English settlers.

Discouraged by the harassing conflicts of authority which seemed interminable, the West India Company transferred all its interests on the east side of the river to the colony of the city, and upon the visit of D'Hinoyossa to Holland in 1663, he secured for himself the entire and exclusive government of the colonies upon the Delaware, being no longer subject to the authority of Stuyvesant.

Encouraged by liberal terms of settlement, and there being now a prospect of stable government, emigrants were attracted thither. A Mennonite community came in a body. "Clergymen were not allowed to join them, nor any 'intractable people such as those in communion with the Roman See, usurious Jews, English stiff-necked Quakers, Puritans, foolhardy believers in the millennium, and obstinate modern pretenders to revelation.'" They were obliged to take an oath never to seek for an office; Magistrates were to receive no compensation, "not even a stiver." The soil and climate were regarded as excellent, and when sufficiently peopled, the country would be the "finest on the face of the globe."

CHAPTER IV.

AFFAIRS were scarcely arranged upon the Delaware, and the dawning of a better day for the colonists ushered in, before new complications began to threaten the subversion of the whole Dutch power in America. The English had always claimed the entire Atlantic seaboard. Under Cromwell, the Navigation act was aimed at Dutch interests in the New World. Captain John Scott, who had been an officer in the army of Charles I, having obtained some show of authority from the Governor of Connecticut, had visited the towns upon the west end of Long Island, where was a mixed population of Dutch and English, and where he claimed to have purchased large tracts of land, and had persuaded them to unite under his authority in setting up a government of their own. He visited England and "petitioned the King to be invested with the government of Long Island, or that the people thereof be allowed to choose yearly a Governor and Assistants." By his representation, an inquiry was instituted by the King's council, "as to his majesty's title to the premises; the intrusions of the Dutch; their deportment; management of the country; strength, trade and government; and lastly, of the means necessary to induce or force them to acknowledge the King, or if necessary, to expel them together from the country." The visit of Scott, and his prayer to the King for a grant of Long Island, was the occasion of inaugurating a policy, which resulted in the overthrow of Dutch rule in America. But the attention of English statesmen had for some time been turned to the importance of the territory which the Dutch colonies had occupied, and a belief that Dutch trade in the New World was yielding great returns, stimulated inquiry. James,

Duke of York, brother of the King, who afterward himself became King, was probably at this time the power behind the throne that was urging on action looking to the dispossession of the Dutch. The motive which seemed to actuate him was the acquisition of personal wealth and power. He saw, as he thought, a company of merchants in Amsterdam accumulating great wealth out of these colonies, and he meditated the transfer of this wealth to himself. He was seconded in this project by the powerful influence of Sir George Downing, who had been Envoy at The Hague, under Cromwell, and was now under Charles II. "Keen, bold, subtle, active, and observant, but imperious and unscrupulous, disliking and distrusting the Dutch," he had watched every movement of the company's granted privileges by the States General, and had reported everything to his superiors at home. "The whole bent," says O'Calaghan, "of this man's mind was constantly to hold up before the eyes of his countrymen the growing power of Holland and her commercial companies, their immense wealth and ambition, and the danger to England of permitting these to progress onward unchecked."

After giving his testimony before the council, Scott returned to America with a letter from the King recommending his interests to the co-operation and protection of the New England colonies. On arriving in Connecticut, he was commissioned by the Governor of that colony to incorporate Long Island under Connecticut jurisdiction. But the Baptists, Quakers and Mennonites, who formed a considerable part of the population, "dreaded falling into the hands of the Puritans." In a quaint document commencing, "In the behalfe of sum hundreds of English here planted on the west end of Long Island wee address," etc., they besought Scott to come and settle their difficulties. On his arrival he acquainted them with the fact, till then unknown, that King Charles had granted the island to the Duke of York, who would soon assert his rights. Whereupon the towns of Hemstede, Newwarke, Crafford, Hastings, Folestone and Gravesend, entered into a "combination" as they termed it, resolved to elect deputies to draw up laws, choose magistrates, and empowered Scott to act as their President; in short set up the first independent State in America. Scott immediately set out at the head of 150 men, horse and foot, to subdue the island.

On the 22d of March, 1664, Charles II made a grant of the whole of Long Island, and all the adjoining country at the time in possession of the Dutch, to the Duke of York. Borrowing four men-of-war of the king, James sent them in command of Col. Richard Nicholls, an old officer, with whom was associated Sir Robert Carr, Sir George Cartwright, and Samuel Maverick, Esq., and a force of 450 men, to dispossess the Dutch. To insure the success of the expedition, letters were addressed to each of the Governors of the New England colonies, enjoining upon them to unite in giving aid by men and material to Nicholls. The fleet sailed directly for Boston, where it was expected, and whence, through one Lord, the Dutch were notified of its coming. The greatest consternation was aroused upon the receipt of this intelligence, and the most active preparations were making for defense. But in the midst of these preparations, notice was received from the Chambers at Amsterdam, doubtless inspired by the English, that "no apprehension of any public enemy or danger from England need be entertained. That the King was only desirous to reduce the colonies to uniformity in church and state, and with this view was dispatching some Commissioners with two or three frigates to New England to introduce Episcopacy in that quarter." Thrown completely off his guard by this announcement, the Director General, Stuyvesant abandoned all preparations for resistance, and indulged in no anticipations of a hostile visitation. Thus were three full weeks lost in which the colonies might have been put in a very good state of defense.

Nicholls on arriving in American waters, touched at Boston and Connecticut, where some aid was received, and then hastened forward to Manhattan. Stuyvesant had but a day or two before learned of the arrival, and of the hostile intent. Scarcely had he issued orders for bringing out his forces and for fortifying before Nicholls scattered proclamations through the colony promising to protect all who submitted to his Brittanic majesty in the undisturbed possession of their property, and made a formal summons upon Stuyvesant to surrender the country to the King of Great Britain. The Director found that he had an entirely different enemy to treat with from Rysingh, and a few half-armed Swedes and Fins upon the Delaware. Wordy war ensued between the Commissioners and the Director, and the English Governor finding that Stuyvesant not in the temper to yield, landed a body of his soldiers upon the lower end of the island, and ordered Hyde, the commander of the fleet, to lay the frigates broadside before the city. It was a critical moment. Stuyvesant was standing on one of the points of the fort when he saw the frigates approaching. The gunner stood by with burning match, prepared to fire on the fleet, and Stuyvesant seemed on the point of giving the order. But he was restrained, and a further communication was sent to Nicholls, who would listen to nothing short of the full execution of his mission. Still Stuyvesant held out. The inhabitants implored, but rather than surrender "he would be carried a corpse to his grave." The town was, however, in no condition to stand a siege. The powder at the fort would only suffice for one day of active operations. Provisions were scarce. The inhabitants were not disposed to be sacrificed, and the disaffection among them spread to the soldiers. They were overheard muttering, "Now we hope to pepper those devilish traders who have so long salted us; we know where booty is to be found, and where the young women live who wear gold chains."

The Rev. Jannes Myapoleuses seems to have been active in negotiations and opposed to the shedding of blood. A remonstrance drawn by him was finally adopted and signed by the principal men, and presented to the Director General, in which the utter hopelessness of resistance was set forth, and Stuyvesant finally consented to capitulate. Favorable terms were arranged, and Nicholls promised that if it should be finally agreed between the English and Dutch governments that the province should be given over to Dutch rule, he would peacefully yield his authority. Thus without a gun being fired, the English made conquest of the Manhattoes.

Sir Robert Carr, with two frigates and an ample force, was dispatched to the Delaware to reduce the settlements there to English rule. The planters, whether Dutch or Swedes, were to be insured in the peaceable possession of their property, and the magistrates were to be continued in office.

Sailing past the fort, he disseminated among the settlers the news of the surrender of Stuyvesant, and the promises of protection which Nicholls had made use of. But Gov. D'Hinoyossa was not disposed to heed the demand for surrender without a struggle. Whereupon Carr landed his forces and stormed the place. After a fruitless but heroic resistance, in which ten were wounded and three were killed, the Governor was forced to surrender. Thus was the complete subversion of the State's General in America consummated, and the name of New Amsterdam gave place to that of New York, from the name of the English proprietor, James, Duke of York.

The resistance offered by D'Hinoyossa formed a pretext for shameless plunder. Carr, in his report which shows him to have been a lawless fellow, says, "Ye soldiers never stoping untill they stormed ye fort, and sae consequently to plundering; the seamen, noe less given to that sport, were quickly within, and have gotten good store of booty." Carr seized the farm of D'Hinoyossa, his brother, John Carr, that of Sheriff Sweringen, and Ensign Stock that of Peter Alrichs. The produce of the land for that year was seized, together with a cargo of goods that was unsold. "Even the inoffensive Mennonists, though non-combatant from principle, did not escape the sack and plunder to which the whole river was subjected by Carr and his marauders. A boat was dispatched to their settlement, which was stripped of everything, to a very naile."

Nicholls, on hearing of the rapacious conduct of his subordinate, visited the Delaware, removed Carr, and placed Robert Needham in command. Previous to dispatching his fleet to America, in June, 1664, the Duke of York had granted to John, Lord Berkeley, Baron of Stratton, and Sir George Carteret, of Saltrum in Devon, the territory of New Jersey, bounded substantially as the present State, and this, though but little settled by the Dutch, had been included in the terms of surrender secured by Nicholls. In many ways, he showed himself a man of ability and discretion. He drew up with signal success a body of laws, embracing most of the provisions which had been in force in the English colonies, which were designated the Duke's Laws.

In May, 1667, Col. Francis Lovelace was appointed Governor in place of Nicholls, and soon after taking charge of affairs, drew up regulations for the government of the territory upon the Delaware, and dispatched Capt. John Carr to act there as his Deputy Governor. It was provided that whenever complaint duly sworn to was made, the Governor was to summon "the schout, Hans Block, Israel Helm, Peter Rambo, Peter Cock and Peter Alrichs, or any two of them, as counsellors, to advise him, and determine by the major vote what is just, equitable and necessary in the case in question." It was further provided that all men should be punished in an exemplary manner, though with moderation; that the laws should be frequently communicated to the counsellors, and that in cases of difficulty recourse should be had to the Governor and Council at New York.

In 1668, two murders were perpetrated by Indians, which caused considerable disturbance and alarm throughout the settlements. These capital crimes appear to have been committed while the guilty parties were maddened by liquor. So impressed were the sachems and leading warriors of the baneful effects of strong drink, that they appeared before the Council and besought its authority to utterly prohibit the sale of it to any of their tribes. These requests were repeated, and finally, upon the advice of Peter Alrichs, "the Governor (Lovelace) prohibited, on pain of death, the selling of powder, shot and strong liquors to the Indians, and writ to Carr on the occasion to use the utmost vigilance and caution."

The native murderers were not apprehended, as it was difficult to trace them; but the Indians themselves were determined to ferret them out. One was taken and shot to death, who was the chief offender, but the other escaped and was never after heard of. The chiefs summoned their young men, and in presence of the English warned them that such would be the fate of all offenders. Proud justly remarks: "This, at a time when the Indians were numerous and strong and the Europeans few and weak, was a memorable act of justice, and a proof of true friendship to the English, greatly alleviating the fear, for which they had so much reason among savages, in this then wilderness country."

In 1669, a reputed son of the distinguished Swedish General, Conningsmarke, commonly called the Long Fin, with another of his nationality, Henry Coleman, a man of property, and familiar with the language and habits of the Indians, endeavored to incite an insurrection to throw off the English rule and establish the Swedish supremacy. The Long Fin was apprehended, and was condemned to die; but upon reconsideration his sentence was commuted to whipping and to branding with the letter R. He was brought in chains to New York, where he was incarcerated in the Stadt-house for a year, and was then transported to Barbadoes to be sold. Improvements in the modes of administering justice were from time to time introduced. New Castle was made a corporation, to be governed by a Bailiff and six associates. Duties on importations were laid, and Capt. Martin Pringer was appointed to collect and make due returns of them to Gov. Lovelace.

In 1673, the French monarch, Louis XIV, declared war against the Netherlands, and with an army of over 200,000 men moved down upon that devoted country. In conjunction with the land force, the English, with a powerful armament, descended upon the Dutch waters. The aged Du Ruyter and the youthful Van Tromp put boldly to sea to meet the invaders. Three great naval battles were fought upon the Dutch coast on the 7th and 14th of June, and the 6th of August, in which the English forces were finally repulsed and driven from the coast. In the meantime, the inhabitants, abandoning their homes, cut the dikes which held back the sea, and invited inundation. Deeming this a favorable opportunity to regain their possessions wrenched from them in the New World, the Dutch sent a small fleet under Commodores Cornelius Evertse and Jacobus Benkes, to New York, to demand the surrender of all their previous possessions. Gov. Lovelace happened to be absent, and his representative, Capt. John Manning, surrendered with but brief resistance, and the magistrates from Albany, Esopus, East Jersey and Long Island, on being summoned to New York, swore fealty to the returning Dutch power. Anthony Colve, as Governor, was sent to Delaware, where the magistrates hastened to meet him and submit themselves to his authority. Property in the English Government was confiscated; Gov. Lovelace returned to England, and many of the soldiers were carried prisoners to Holland. Before their departure, Commodores Evertse and Benkes, who styled themselves "The honorable and awful council of war, for their high mightinesses, the State's General of the United Netherlands; and his Serene Highness, the Prince of Orange," commissioned Anthony Colve, a Captain of foot, on the 12th of August, 1673, to be Governor General of "New Netherlands, with all its appendences," and on the 19th of September following, Peter Alrichs, who had manifested his subserviency and his pleasure at the return of Dutch ascendancy, was appointed by Colve Deputy Governor upon the Delaware. A body of laws was drawn up for his instruction, and three courts of justice were established, at New Castle, Chester and Lewistown. Capt. Manning on his return to England was charged with treachery for delivering up the fort at New York without resistance, and was sentenced by a court martial "to have his sword broken over his head in public, before the city hall, and himself rendered incapable of wearing a sword and of serving his Majesty for the future in any public trust in the Government."

But the revolution which had been affected so easily was of short duration. On the 9th of February, 1674, peace was concluded between England and Holland, and in the articles of pacification it was provided "that whatsoever countries, islands, towns, ports, castles or forts, have or shall be taken, on both sides, since the time that the late unhappy war broke out, either in Europe, or elsewhere, shall be restored to the former lord and proprietor, in the same condition they shall be in when the peace itself shall be proclaimed, after which time there shall be no spoil nor plunder of the inhabitants, no demolition of fortifications, nor carrying away of guns, powder, or other military stores which belonged to any castle or port at the time when it was taken." This left no room for controversy about possession. But that there might be no legal bar nor loophole for question of absolute right to his possessions, the Duke of York secured from the King on the 29th of June following, a new patent covering the former grant, and two days thereafter sent Sir Edmund Andros, to possess and govern the country. He arrived at New York and took peaceable possession on the 31st of October, and two days thereafter it was resolved in council to reinstate all the officers upon Delaware as they were at the surrender to the Dutch, except Peter Alrichs, who for his forwardness in yielding his power was relieved. Capt. Edmund Cantwell and William Tom were sent to occupy the fort at New Castle, in the capacities of Deputy Governor and Secretary. In May, 1675, Gov. Andros visited the Delaware, and held court at New Castle "in which orders were made relative to the opening of roads, the regulation of church property and the support of preaching, the prohibition of the sale of liquors to the Indians, and the distillation thereof by the inhabitants." On the 23d of September, 1676, Cantwell was superseded by John Collier, as Vice Governor, when Ephraim Hermans became Secretary.

As was previously observed, Gov. Nicholls, in 1664, made a complete digest of all the laws and usages in force in the English-speaking colonies in America, which were known as the Duke's Laws. That these might now be made the basis of judicature throughout the Duke's possessions, they were, on the 25th of September, 1676, formally proclaimed and published by Gov. Lovelace, with a suitable ordinance introducing them. It may here be observed, that, in the administration of Gov. Hartranft, by act of the Legislature of June 12, 1878, the Duke's Laws were published in a handsome volume, together with the Charter and Laws instituted by Penn, and historical notes covering the early history of the State, under the direction of John B. Linn, Secretary of the commonwealth, edited by Staughton George, Benjamin M. Nead, and Thomas McCamant, from an old copy preserved among the town records of Hempstead, Long Island, the seat of the independent State which had been set up there by John Scott before the coming of Nicholls. The number of taxable male inhabitants between the ages of sixteen and sixty years, in 1677, for Uplandt and New Castle, was 443, which by the usual estimate of seven to one would give the population 3,101 for this district. Gov. Collier having exceeded his authority by exercising judicial functions, was deposed by Andros, and Capt. Christopher Billop was appointed to succeed him. But the change resulted in little benefit to the colony; for Billop was charged with many irregularities, "taking possession of the fort and turning it into a stable, and the court room above into a hay and fodder loft; debarring the court from sitting in its usual place in the fort, and making use of soldiers for his own private purposes."

The hand of the English Government bore heavily upon the denomination of Christians called Friends or Quakers, and the earnest-minded, conscientious worshipers, uncompromising in their faith, were eager for homes in a land where they should be absolutely free to worship the Supreme Being. Berkeley and Carteret, who had bought New Jersey, were Friends, and the settlements made in their territory were largely of that faith. In 1675, Lord Berkeley sold his undivided half of the province to John Fenwicke, in trust for Edward Byllinge, also Quakers, and Fenwicke sailed in the Griffith, with a company of Friends who settled at Salem, in West Jersey. Byllinge, having become involved in debt, made an assignment of his interest for the benefit of his creditors, and William Penn was induced to become trustee jointly with Gowen Lawrie and Nicholas Lucas. Penn was a devoted Quaker, and he was of that earnest nature that the interests of his friends and Christian devotees were like his own personal interests. Hence he became zealous in promoting the welfare of the colony. For its orderly government, and that settlers might have assurance of stability in the management of affairs, Penn drew up "Concessions and agreements of the proprietors, freeholders and inhabitants of West New Jersey in America" in forty-four chapters. Foreseeing difficulty from divided authority, Penn secured a division of the province by "a line of partition from the east side of Little Egg Harbor, straight north, through the country to the utmost branch of the Delaware River." Penn's half was called New West Jersey, along the Delaware side, Carteret's New East Jersey along the ocean shore. Penn's purposes and disposition toward the settlers, as the founder of a State, are disclosed by a letter which he wrote at this time to a Friend, Richard Hartshorn, then in America: "We lay a foundation for after ages to understand their liberty, as men and Christians; that they may not be brought into bondage, but by their own consent; for we put the power in the people. * * So every man is capable to choose or to be chosen; no man to be arrested, condemned, or molested, in his estate, or liberty, but by twelve men of the neighborhood; no man to lie in prison for debt, but that his estate satisfy, as far as it will go, and he be set at liberty to work; no man to be called in question, or molested for his conscience." Lest any should be induced to leave home and embark in the enterprise of settlement unadvisedly, Penn wrote and published a letter of caution, "That in whomsoever a desire to be concerned in this intended plantation, such would weigh the thing before the Lord, and not headily, or rashly, conclude on any such remove, and that they do not offer violence to the tender love of their near kindred and relations, but soberly, and conscientiously endeavor to obtain their good wills; that whether they go or stay, it may be of good savor before the Lord and good people."

CHAPTER V.

SIR EDMUND ANDROS, 1674-81—EDMUND CANTWELL, 1674-76—JOHN COLLIER, 1676-77—CHRISTOPHER BILLOP, 1677-81.

WILLIAM PENN, as Trustee, and finally as part owner of New Jersey, became much interested in the subject of colonization in America. Many of his people had gone thither, and he had given much prayerful study and meditation to the amelioration of their condition by securing just laws for their government. His imagination pictured the fortunate condition of a State where the law-giver should alone study the happiness of his subjects, and his subjects should be chiefly intent on rendering implicit obedience to just laws. From his experience in the management of the Jerseys, he had doubtless discovered that if he would carry out his ideas of government successfully, he must have a province where his voice would be potential and his will supreme. He accordingly cast about for the acquirement of such a land in the New World.

Penn had doubtless been stimulated in his desires by the very roseate accounts of the beauty and excellence of the country, its salubrity of climate, its balmy airs, the fertility of its soil, and the abundance of the native fish, flesh and fowl. In 1680, one Malhon Stacy wrote a letter which was largely circulated in England, in which he says: "It is a country that produceth all things for the support and furtherance of man, in a plentiful manner. * * * I have seen orchards laden with fruit to admiration; their very limbs torn to pieces with weight, most delicious to the taste, and lovely to behold. I have seen an apple tree, from a pippin-kernel, yield a barrel of curious cider; and peaches in such plenty that some people took their carts a peach gathering; I could not but smile at the conceit of it; they are very delicious fruit, and hang almost like our onions, that are tied on ropes. I have seen and know, this summer, forty bushels of bold wheat of one bushel sown. From May till Michaelmas, great store of very good wild fruits as strawberries, cranberries and hurtleberries, which are like our billberries in England, only far sweeter; the cranberries, much like cherries for color and bigness, which may be kept till fruit comes again; an excellent sauce is made of them for venison, turkeys, and other great fowl, and they are better to make tarts of than either goosberries or cherries; we have them brought to our houses by the Indians in great plenty. My brother Robert had as many cherries this year as would have loaded several carts. As for venison and fowls, we have great plenty; we have brought home to our countries by the Indians, seven or eight fat bucks in a day. We went into the river to catch herrings after the Indian fashion. * * * We could have filled a three-bushel sack of as good large herrings as ever I saw. And as to beef and pork, here is great plenty of it, and good sheep. The common grass of this country feeds beef very fat. Indeed, the country, take it as a wilderness, is a brave country."

The father of William Penn had arisen to distinction in the British Navy. He was sent in Cromwell's time, with a considerable sea and land force, to the West Indies, where he reduced the Island of Jamaica under English rule. At the restoration, he gave in his adhesion to the royal cause. Under James, Duke of York, Admiral Penn commanded the English fleet which descended upon the Dutch coast, and gained a great victory over the combined naval forces led by Van Opdam. For this great service to his country, Penn was knighted, and became a favorite at court, the King and his brother, the Duke, holding him in cherished remembrance. At his death, there was due him from the crown the sum of £16,000, a portion of which he himself had advanced for the sea service. Filled with the romantic idea of colonization, and enamored with the sacred cause of his people, the son, who had come to be regarded with favor for his great father's sake, petitioned King Charles II to grant him, in liquidation of this debt, "a tract of land in America, lying north of Maryland, bounded east by the Delaware River, on the west limited as Maryland, and northward to extend as far as plantable." There were conflicting interests at this time which were being warily watched at court. The petition was submitted to the Privy Council, and afterward to the Lords of the committee of plantations. The Duke of York already held the counties of New Castle, Kent and Sussex. Lord Baltimore held a grant upon the south, with an indefinite northern limit, and the agents of both these territories viewed with a jealous eye any new grant that should in any way trench upon their rights. These claims were fully debated and heard by the Lords, and, being a matter in which the King manifested special interest, the Lord Chief Justice, North, and the Attorney General, Sir William Jones, were consulted both as to the grant itself, and the form or manner of making it. Finally, after a careful study of the whole subject, it was determined by the highest authority in the Government to grant to Penn a larger tract than he had asked for, and the charter was drawn with unexampled liberality, in unequivocal terms of gift and perpetuity of holding, and with remarkable minuteness of detail, and that Penn should have the advantage of any double meaning conveyed in the instrument, the twenty-third and last section provides: "And, if perchance hereafter any doubt or question should arise concerning the true sense and meaning of any word, clause or sentence contained in this our present charter, we will ordain and command that at all times and in all things such interpretation be made thereof, and allowed in any of our courts whatsoever as shall be adjudged most advantageous and favorable unto the said William Penn, his heirs and assigns."

It was a joyful day for Penn when he finally reached the consummation of his wishes, and saw himself invested with almost dictatorial power over a country as large as England itself, destined to become a populous empire. But his exultation was tempered with the most devout Christian spirit, fearful lest in the exercise of his great power he might be led to do something that should be displeasing to God. To his dear friend, Robert Turner, he writes in a modest way: "My true love in the Lord salutes thee and dear friends that love the Lord's precious truth in those parts. Thine I have, and for my business here know that after many waitings, watchings, solicitings and disputes in council, this day my country was confirmed to me under the great seal of England, with large powers and privileges, by the name of Pennsylvania, a name the King would give it in honor of my father. I chose New Wales, being, as this, a pretty hilly country; but Penn being Welsh for a head, as Penmanmoire in Wales, and Penrith in Cumberland, and Penn in Buckinghamshire, the highest land in England, called this Pennsylvania, which is the high or head woodlands; for I proposed, when the Secretary, a Welshman, refused to have it called New Wales, Sylvania, and they added Penn to it; and though I much opposed it, and went to the King to have it struck out and altered, he said it was past, and would take it upon him; nor could twenty guineas move the Under Secretary to vary the name; for I feared lest it should be looked on as a vanity in me, and not as a respect in the King, as it truly was to my father, whom he often mentions with praise. Thou mayest communicate my grant to Friends, and expect shortly my proposals. It is a clear and just thing, and my God, that has given it me through many difficulties, will, I believe, bless and make it the seed of a nation. I shall have a tender care to the government, that it be well laid at first."

Penn had asked that the western boundary should be the same as that of Maryland; but the King made the width from east to west five full degrees. The charter limits were "all that tract, or part, of land, in America, with the islands therein contained as the same is bounded, on the east by Delaware River, from twelve miles distance northwards of New Castle town, unto the three and fortieth degree of northern latitude. * * * *

The said land to extend westward five degrees in longitude, to be computed from the said eastern bounds; and the said lands to be bounded on the north by the beginning of the three and fortieth degree of northern latitude, and, on the south, by a circle drawn at twelve miles distance from New Castle northward and westward unto the beginning of the fortieth degree of northern latitude; and then by a straight line westward to the limits of longitude above mentioned."

It is evident that the royal secretaries did not well understand the geography of this section, for by reference to a map it will be seen that the beginning of the fortieth degree, that is, the end of the thirty-ninth, cuts the District of Columbia, and hence Baltimore, and the greater part of Maryland and a good slice of Virginia would have been included in the clear terms of the chartered limits of Pennsylvania. But the charters of Maryland and Virginia antedated this of Pennsylvania. Still, the terms of the Penn charter were distinct, the beginning of the fortieth degree, whereas those of Maryland were ambiguous, the northern limit being fixed at the fortieth degree; but whether at the beginning or at the ending of the fortieth was not stated. Penn claimed three full degrees of latitude, and when it was found that a controversy was likely to ensue, the King, by the hand of his royal minister, Conway, issued a further declaration, dated at Whitehall, April 2, 1681, in which the wording of the original chartered limits fixed for Pennsylvania were quoted verbatim, and his royal pleasure declared that these limits should be respected "as they tender his majesty's displeasure." This was supposed to settle the matter. But Lord Baltimore still pressed his claim, and the question of southern boundary remained an open one, causing much disquietude to Penn, requiring watchful care at court for more than half a century, and until after the proprietor's death.

We gather from the terms of the charter itself that the King, in making the grant, was influenced "by the commendable desire of Penn to enlarge our British Empire, and promote such useful commodities as may be of benefit to us and our dominions, as also to reduce savage nations by just and gentle manners, to the love of civil society and Christian religion," and out of "regard to the memory and merits of his late father, in divers services, and particularly to his conduct, courage and discretion, under our dearest brother, James, Duke of York, in the signal battle and victory, fought and obtained, against the Dutch fleet, commanded by the Herr Van Opdam in 1665."

The motive for obtaining it on the part of Penn may be gathered from the following extract of a letter to a friend: "For my country I eyed the Lord in obtaining it; and more was I drawn inward to look to Him, and to owe it to His hand and power than to any other way. I have so obtained and desire to keep it, that I may be unworthy of His love, but do that which may answer His kind providence and people."

The charter of King Charles II was dated April 2, 1681. Lest any trouble might arise in the future from claims founded on the grant previously made to the Duke of York, of "Long Island and adjacent territories occupied by the Dutch," the prudent forethought of Penn induced him to obtain a deed, dated August 31, 1682, of the Duke, for Pennsylvania, substantially in the terms of the royal charter. But Penn was still not satisfied. He was cut off from the ocean except by the uncertain navigation of one narrow stream. He therefore obtained from the Duke a grant of New Castle and a district of twelve miles around it, dated on the 24th of August, 1682, and on the same day a further grant from the Duke of a tract extending to Cape Henlopen, embracing the two counties of Kent and Sussex, the two grants comprising what were known as the territories, or the three lower counties, which were for many years a part of Pennsylvania, but subsequently constituted the State of Delaware.

Being now satisfied with his province, and that his titles were secure, Penn drew up such a description of the country as from his knowledge he was able to give, which, together with the royal charter and proclamation, terms of settlement, and other papers pertaining thereto, he published and spread broadcast through the kingdom, taking special pains doubtless to have the documents reach the Friends. The terms of sale of lands were 40 shillings for 100 acres, and 1 shilling per acre rental. The question has been raised, why exact the annual payment of one shilling per acre. The terms of the grant by the royal charter to Penn were made absolute on the "payment therefor to us, our heirs and successors, two beaver skins, to be delivered at our castle in Windsor, on the 1st day of January in every year," and contingent payment of one-fifth part of all gold and silver which shall from time to time happen to be found clear of all charges." Penn, therefore, held his title only upon the payment of quit-rents. He could consequently give a valid title only by the exacting of quit-rents.

Having now a great province of his own to manage, Penn was obliged to relinquish his share in West New Jersey. He had given largely of his time and energies to its settlement; he had sent 1,400 emigrants, many of them people of high character; had seen farms reclaimed from the forest, the town of Burlington built, meeting houses erected in place of tents for worship, good Government established, and the savage Indians turned to peaceful ways. With satisfaction, therefore, he could now give himself to reclaiming and settling his own province. He had of course in his published account of the country made it appear a desirable place for habitation. But lest any should regret having gone thither when it was too late, he added to his description a caution, "to consider seriously the premises, as well the inconveniency as future ease and plenty; that so none may move rashly or from a fickle, but from a solid mind, having above all things an eye to the providence of God in the disposing of themselves." Nothing more surely points to the goodness of heart of William Penn, the great founder of our State, than this extreme solicitude, lest he might induce any to go to the new country who should afterward regret having gone.

The publication of the royal charter and his description of the country attracted attention, and many purchases of land were made of Penn before leaving England. That these purchasers might have something binding to rely upon, Penn drew up what he termed "conditions or concessions" between himself as proprietor and purchasers in the province. These related to the settling the country, laying out towns, and especially to the treatment of the Indians, who were to have the same rights and privileges, and careful regard as the Europeans. And what is perhaps a remarkable instance of provident forethought, the eighteenth article provides "That, in clearing the ground, care be taken to leave one acre of trees for every five acres cleared, especially to preserve oak and mulberries, for silk and shipping." It could be desired that such a provision might have remained operative in the State for all time.

Encouraged by the manner in which his proposals for settlement were received, Penn now drew up a frame of government, consisting of twenty-four articles and forty laws. These were drawn in a spirit of unexampled fairness and liberality, introduced by an elaborate essay on the just rights of government and governed, and with such conditions and concessions that it should never be in the power of an unjust Governor to take advantage of the people and practice injustice. "For the matter of liberty and privilege, I purpose that which is extraordinary, and leave myself and successors no power of doing mischief, that the will of one man may not hinder that of a whole country. This frame gave impress to the character of the early government. It implanted in the breasts of the people a deep sense of duty, of right, and of obligation in all public affairs, and the relations of man with man, and formed a framework for the future constitution. Penn himself had felt the heavy hand of government for religious opinions and practice' sake. He determined, for the matter of religion, to leave all free to hold such opinions as they might elect, and hence enacted for his State that all who "hold themselves obliged in conscience, to live peaceably and justly in civil society, shall, in no ways, be molested, nor prejudiced, for their religious persuasion, or practice, in matters of faith and worship, nor shall they be compelled, at any time, to frequent, or maintain, any religious worship, place, or ministry whatever." At this period, such governmental liberality in matters of religion was almost unknown, though Roger Williams in the colony of Rhode Island had previously, under similar circumstances, and having just escaped a like persecution, proclaimed it, as had likewise Lord Baltimore in the Catholic colony of Maryland.

The mind of Penn was constantly exercised upon the affairs of his settlement. Indeed, to plant a colony in a new country had been a thought of his boyhood, for he says in one of his letters: "I had an opening of joy as to these parts in the year 1651, at Oxford, twenty years since." Not being in readiness to go to his province during the first year, he dispatched three ship loads of settlers, and with them sent his cousin, William Markham, to take formal possession of the country and act as Deputy Governor. Markham sailed for New York, and upon his arrival there exhibited his commission, bearing date March 6, 1681, and the King's charter and proclamation. In the absence of Gov. Andros, who, on having been called to account for some complaint made against him, had gone to England, Capt. Anthony Brockholls, Acting Governor, received Markham's papers, and gave him a letter addressed to the civil officers on the Delaware, informing them that Markham's authority as Governor had been examined, and an official record made of it at New York, thanking them for their fidelity, and requesting them to submit themselves to the new authority. Armed with this letter, which was dated June 21, 1681, Markham proceeded to the Delaware, where, on exhibiting his papers, he was kindly received, and allegiance was cheerfully transferred to the new government. Indeed so frequently had the power changed hands that it had become quite a matter of habit to transfer obedience from one authority to another, and they had scarcely laid their heads to rest at night but with the consciousness that the morning light might bring new codes and new officers.

Markham was empowered to call a council of nine citizens to assist him in the government, and over whom he was to preside. He brought a letter addressed to Lord Baltimore, touching the boundary between the two grants, and exhibiting the terms of the charter for Pennsylvania. On receipt of this letter, Lord Baltimore came to Upland to confer with Markham. An observation fixing the exact latitude of Upland showed that it was twelve miles south of the forty-first degree, to which Baltimore claimed, and that the beginning of the fortieth degree, which the royal charter explicitly fixed for the southern boundary of Pennsylvania, would include nearly the entire State of Maryland, and cut the limits of the present site of the city of Washington. "If this be allowed," was significantly asked by Baltimore, "where is my province?" He returned to his colony, and from this time forward an active contention was begun before the authorities in England for possession of the disputed territory, which required all the arts and diplomatic skill of Penn.

Markham was accompanied to the province by four Commissioners sent out by Penn—William Crispin, John Bezer, William Haige and Nathaniel Allen. The first named had been designated as Surveyor General, but he having died on the passage, Thomas Holme was appointed to succeed him. These Commissioners, in conjunction with the Governor, had two chief duties assigned them. The first was to meet and preserve friendly relations with the Indians and acquire lands by actual purchase, and the second was to select the site of a great city and make the necessary surveys. That they might have a suitable introduction to the natives from him, Penn addressed to them a declaration of his purposes, conceived in a spirit of brotherly love, and expressed in such simple terms that these children of the forest, unschooled in book learning, would have no difficulty in apprehending his meaning. The referring the source of all power to the Creator was fitted to produce a strong impression upon their naturally superstitious habits of thought. "There is a great God and power, that hath made the world, and all things therein, to whom you and I, and all people owe their being, and well being; and to whom you and I must one day give an account for all that we do in the world. This great God hath written His law in our hearts, by which we are taught and commanded to love, and help, and do good to one another. Now this great God hath been pleased to make me concerned in your part of the world, and the King of the country where I live hath given me a great province therein; but I desire to enjoy it with your love and consent, that we may always live together, as neighbors and friends; else what would the great God do to us, who hath made us, not to devour and destroy one another, but to live soberly and kindly together in the world? Now I would have you well observe that I am very sensible of the unkindness and injustice that have been too much exercised toward you by the people of these parts of the world, who have sought themselves, and to make great advantages by you, rather than to be examples of goodness and patience unto you, which I hear hath been a matter of trouble to you, and caused great grudging and animosities, sometimes to the shedding of blood, which hath made the great God angry. But I am not such a man, as is well known in my own country. I have great love and regard toward you, and desire to gain your love and friendship by a kind, just and peaceable life, and the people I send are of the same mind, and shall in all things behave themselves accordingly; and if in anything any shall offend you or your people, you shall have a full and speedy satisfaction for the same by an equal number of just men on both sides that by no means you may have just occasion of being offended against them. I shall shortly come to you myself, at which time we may more largely and freely confer and discourse of these matters. In the meantime, I have sent my Commissioners to treat with you about land, and form a league of peace. Let me desire you to be kind to them and their people, and receive these presents and tokens which I have sent you as a testimony of my good will to you, and my resolution to live justly, peaceably and friendly with you."

In this plain but sublime statement is embraced the whole theory of William Penn's treatment of the Indians. It was the doctrine which the Savior of mankind came upon earth to promulgate—the estimable worth of every human soul. And when Penn came to propose his laws, one was adopted which forbade private trade with the natives in which they might be overreached; but it was required that the valuable skins and furs they had to sell should be hung up in the market place where all could see them and enter into competition for their purchase. Penn was offered £6,000 for a monopoly of trade. But he well knew the injustice to which this would subject the simple-minded natives, and he refused it saying: "As the Lord gave it me over all and great opposition, I would not abuse His love, nor act unworthy of His providence, and so defile what came to me clean"—a sentiment worthy to be treasured with the best thoughts of the sages of old. And to his Commissioners he gave a letter of instructions, in which he says: "Be impartially just to all; that is both pleasing to the Lord, and wise in itself. Be tender of offending the Indians, and let them know that you come to sit down lovingly among them. Let my letter and conditions be read in their tongue, that they may see we have their good in our eye. Be grave, they love not to be smiled on." Acting upon these wise and just considerations, the Commissioners had no difficulty in making large purchases of the Indians of lands on the right bank of the Delaware and above the mouth of the Schuylkill.

But they found greater difficulty in settling the place for the new city. Penn had given very minute instructions about this, and it was not easy to find a tract which answered all the conditions. For seven weeks they kept up their search. Penn had written, "be sure to make your choice where it is most navigable, high, dry and healthy; that is, where most ships may best ride, of deepest draught of water, if possible to load and unload at the bank or key's side without boating and lightening of it. It would do well if the river coming into that creek be navigable, at least for boats up into the country, and that the situation be high, at least dry and sound and not swampy, which is best known by digging up two or three earths and seeing the bottom." By his instructions, the site of the city was to be between two navigable streams, and embrace 10,000 acres in one block. "Be sure to settle the figure of the town so that the streets hereafter may be uniform down to the water from the country bounds. Let every house be placed, if the person pleases, in the middle of its plat, as to the breadth way of it, that so there may be ground on each side for gardens or orchards or fields, that it may be a green country town, which will never be burnt and always wholesome." The soil was examined, the streams were sounded, deep pits were dug that a location might be found which should gratify the desires of Penn. All the eligible sites were inspected from the ocean far up into the country. Penn himself had anticipated that Chester or Upland would be adopted from all that he could learn of it; but this was rejected, as was also the ground upon Poquessing Creek and that at Pennsbury Manor above Bristol which had been carefully considered, and the present site of Philadelphia was finally adopted as coming nearest to the requirements of the proprietor. It had not 10,000 acres in a solid square, but it was between two navigable streams, and the soil was high and dry, being for the most part a vast bed of gravel, excellent for drainage and likely to prove healthful. The streets were laid out regularly and crossed each other at right angles. As the ground was only gently rolling, the grading was easily accomplished. One broad street, Market, extends from river to river through the midst of it, which is crossed at right angles at its middle point by Broad street of equal width. It is 120 miles from the ocean by the course of the river, and only sixty in a direct line, eighty-seven miles from New York, ninety-five from Baltimore, 136 from Washington, 100 from Harrisburg and 300 from Pittsburgh, and lies in north latitude $39^{\circ} 56' 54''$, and longitude $75^{\circ} 8' 45''$ west from Greenwich. The name Philadelphia (brotherly love), was one that Penn had before selected, as this founding a city was a project which he had long dreamed of and contemplated with never-ceasing interest.

CHAPTER VI.

HAVING now made necessary preparations and settled his affairs in England, Penn embarked on board the ship Welcome, in August, 1682, in company with about a hundred planters, mostly from his native town of Sussex, and set his prow for the New World. Before leaving the Downs, he addressed a farewell letter to his friends whom he left behind, and another to his wife and children, giving them much excellent advice, and sketching the way of life he wished them to lead. With remarkable care and minuteness, he points out the way in which he would have his children bred, and educated, married, and live. A single passage from this remarkable document will indicate its general tenor. "Be sure to observe," in educating his children, "their genius, and do not cross it as to learning; let them not dwell too long on one thing; but let their change be agreeable, and let all their diversions have some little bodily labor in them. When grown big, have most care for them; for then there are more snares both within and without. When marriageable, see that they have worthy persons in their eye; of good life and good fame for piety and understanding. I need no wealth but sufficiency; and be sure their love be dear, fervent and mutual, that it may be happy for them." And to his children he said, "Betake yourselves to some honest, industrious course of life, and that not of sordid covetousness, but for example and to avoid idleness. * * * * * Love not money nor the world; use them only, and they will serve you; but if you love them you serve them, which will debase your spirits as well as offend the Lord. * * * * * Watch against anger, neither speak nor act in it; for, like drunkenness, it makes a man a beast, and throws people into desperate inconveniences." The entire letters are so full of excellent counsel that they might with great profit be committed to memory, and treasured in the heart.

The voyage of nearly six weeks was prosperous; but they had not been long on the ocean before that loathed disease—the virulent small-pox—broke out, of which thirty died, nearly a third of the whole company. This, added to the usual discomforts and terrors of the ocean, to most of whom this was probably their first experience, made the voyage a dismal one. And here was seen the nobility of Penn. "For his good conversation" says one of them, "was very advantageous to all the company. His singular care was manifested in contributing to the necessities of many who were sick with the small-pox then on board."

His arrival upon the coast and passage up the river was hailed with demonstrations of joy by all classes, English, Dutch, Swedes, and especially by his own devoted followers. He landed at New Castle on the 24th of October, 1682, and on the following day summoned the people to the court house, where possession of the country was formally made over to him, and he renewed the commissions of the magistrates, to whom and to the assembled people he announced the design of his coming, explained the nature and end of truly good government, assuring them that their religious and civil rights should be respected, and recommended them to live in sobriety and peace. He then proceeded to Upland, henceforward known as Chester, where, on the 4th of November, he called an assembly of the people, in which an equal number of votes was allowed to the province and the territories. Nicholas Moore, President of the Free Society of Traders, was chosen speaker. As at New Castle, Penn addressed the assembly, giving them assurances of his beneficent intentions, for which they returned their grateful acknowledgments, the Swedes being especially demonstrative, deputing one of their number, Lacy Cock, to say "That they would love, serve and obey him with all they had, and that this was the best day they ever saw." We can well understand with what satisfaction the settlers upon the Delaware hailed the prospect of a stable government established in their own midst, after having been so long at the mercy of the government in New York, with allegiance trembling between the courts of Sweden, Holland and Britain.

The proceedings of this first assembly were conducted with great decorum, and after the usages of the English Parliament. On the 7th of December, 1682, the three lower counties, what is now Delaware, which had previously been under the government of the Duke of York, were formerly annexed to the province, and became an integral part of Pennsylvania. The frame of government, which had been drawn with much deliberation, was submitted to the assembly, and, after some alterations and amendments, was adopted, and became the fundamental law of the State. The assembly was in session only three days, but the work they accomplished, how vast and far-reaching in its influence!

The Dutch, Swedes and other foreigners were then naturalized, and the government was launched in fair running order: That some idea may be had of its character, the subjects treated are here given: 1, Liberty of conscience; 2, Qualification of officers; 3, Swearing by God, Christ or Jesus; 4, Swearing by any other thing or name; 5, Profanity; 6, Cursing; 7, Fornication; 8, Incest; 9, Sodomy; 10, Rape; 11, Bigamy; 12, Drunkenness; 13, Suffering drunkenness; 14, Healths drinking; 15, Selling liquor to Indians; 16, Arson; 17, Burglary; 18, Stolen goods; 19, Forceful entry; 20, Riots; 21, Assaulting parents; 22, Assaulting Magistrates; 23, Assaulting masters; 24, Assault and battery; 25, Duels; 26, Riotous sports, as plays; 27, Gambling and lotteries; 28, Sedition; 29, Contempt; 30, Libel; 31, Common scolds; 32, Charities; 33, Prices of beer and ale; 34, Weights and measures; 35, Names of days and months; 36, Perjury; 37, Court proceedings in English; 38, Civil and criminal trials; 39, Fees, salaries, bribery and extortion; 40, Moderation of fines; 41, Suits avoidable; 42, Foreign arrest; 43, Contracts; 44, Charters, gifts, grants, conveyances, bills, bonds and deeds, when recorded; 45, Wills; 46, Wills of non compos mentis; 47, Registry of Wills; 48, Registry for servants; 49, Factors; 50, Defacers, corruptors and embezzlers of charters, conveyances and records; 51, Lands and goods to pay debts; 52, Bailable offenses; 53, Jails and jailers; 54, Prisons to be workhouses; 55, False imprisonment; 56, Magistrates may elect between fine or imprisonment; 57, Freeman; 58, Elections; 59, No money levied but in pursuance of law; 60, Laws shall be printed and taught in schools; 61, All other things, not provided for herein, are referred to the Governor and freemen from time to time.

Very soon after his arrival in the colony, after the precept had been issued, but before the convening of the Assembly, Penn, that he might not be wanting in respect to the Duke of York, made a visit to New York, where he was kindly received, and also after the adjournment of the Assembly, journeyed to Maryland, where he was entertained by Lord Baltimore with great ceremony. The settlement of the disputed boundaries was made the subject of formal conference. But after two days spent in fruitless discussion, the weather becoming severely cold, and thus precluding the possibility of taking observations or making the necessary surveys, it was agreed to adjourn further consideration of the subject until the milder weather of the spring. We may imagine that the two Governors were taking the measure of each other, and of gaining all possible knowledge of each other's claims and rights, preparatory to that struggle for possession of this disputed fortieth degree of latitude, which was destined to come before the home government.

With all his cares in founding a State and providing a government over a new people, Penn did not forget to preach the "blessed Gospel," and wherever he went he was intent upon his "Master's business." On his return from Maryland, Lord Baltimore accompanied him several miles to the house of William Richardson, and thence to Thomas Hooker's, where was a religious meeting, as was also one held at Choptauk. Penn himself says: "I have been also at New York, Long Island, East Jersey and Maryland, in which I have had good and eminent service for the Lord." And again he says: "As to outward things, we are satisfied—the land good, the air clear and sweet, the springs plentiful, and provisions good and easy to come at, an innumerable quantity of wild fowl and fish; in fine, here is what an Abraham, Isaac and Jacob would be well contented with, and service enough for God; for the fields are here white for the harvest. O, how sweet is the quiet of these parts, freed from the anxious and troublesome solicitations, hurries and perplexities of woeful Europe! * * * Blessed be the Lord, that of twenty-three ships, none miscarried; only two or three had the small-pox; else healthy and swift passages, generally such as have not been known; some but twenty-eight days, and few longer than six weeks. Blessed be God for it; my soul fervently breathes that in His heavenly guiding wisdom, we may be kept, that we may serve Him in our day, and lay down our heads in peace." And then, as if reproached for not having mentioned another subject of thankfulness, he adds in a postscript, "Many women, in divers of the ships, brought to bed; they and their children do well."

Penn made it his first care to take formal possession of his province, and adopt a frame of government. When this was done, his chief concern was to look to the establishment of his proposed new city, the site of which had already been determined on by his Commissioners. Accordingly, early in November, at a season when, in this section, the days are golden, Penn embarked in an open barge with a number of his friends, and was wafted leisurely up the Delaware to the present site of the city of Philadelphia, which the natives called Coaquannock. Along the river was a bold shore, fringed with lofty pines, which grew close down to the water's edge, so much so that when the first ship passing up with settlers for West Jersey had brushed against the branches, the passengers remarked that this would be a good place for a city. It was then in a wild state, the deer browsing along the shore and sipping the stream, and the coney burrowing in the banks. The scattered settlers had gathered in to see and welcome the new Governor, and when he stepped upon the shore, they extended a helping hand in assisting him up the rugged bluff. Three Swedes had already taken up tracts within the limits of the block of land chosen for the city. But they were given lands in exchange, and readily relinquished their claims. The location was pleasing to Penn, and was adopted without further search, though little could be seen of this then forest-encumbered country, where now is the home of countless industries, the busy mart, the river bearing upon its bosom the commerce of many climes, and the abiding place of nearly a million of people. But Penn did not consider that he had as yet any just title to the soil, holding that the Indians were its only rightful possessors, and until it was fairly acquired by purchase from them, his own title was entirely void.

Hence, he sought an early opportunity to meet the chiefs of the tribes and cultivate friendly relations with them. Tradition fixes the first great treaty or conference at about this time, probably in November, and the place under the elm tree, known as the "Treaty Tree," at Kensington. It was at a season when the leaves would still be upon the trees, and the assembly was called beneath the ample shade of the wide-sweeping branches, which was pleasing to the Indians, as it was their custom to hold all their great deliberations and smoke the pipe of peace in the open air. The letter which Penn had sent had prepared the minds of these simple-hearted inhabitants of the forest to regard him with awe and reverence, little less than that inspired by a descended god. His coming had for a long time been awaited, and it is probable that it had been heralded and talked over by the wigwam fire throughout the remotest bounds of the tribes. And when at length the day came, the whole population far around had assembled.

It is known that three tribes at least were represented—the Lenni Lenape, living along the Delaware; the Shawnees, a tribe that had come up from the South, and were seated along the Lower Susquehanna; and the Mingoes, sprung from the Six Nations, and inhabiting along the Conestoga. Penn was probably accompanied by the several officers of his Government and his most trusted friends. There were no implements of warfare, for peace was a cardinal feature of the Quaker creed.

No veritable account of this, the great treaty, is known to have been made; but from the fact that Penn not long after, in an elaborate treatise upon the country, the inhabitants and the natives, has given the account of the manner in which the Indians demean themselves in conference, we may infer that he had this one in mind, and hence we may adopt it as his own description of the scene.

"Their order is thus: The King sits in the middle of a half moon, and hath his council, the old and wise, on each hand; behind them, or at a little distance, sit the younger fry in the same figure. Having consulted and resolved their business, the King ordered one of them to speak to me. He stood up, came to me, and, in the name of the King, saluted me; then took me by the hand and told me he was ordered by the King to speak to me; and now it was not he, but the King that spoke, because what he would say was the King's mind. * * * * During the time that this person spoke, not a man of them was observed to whisper or smile; the old grave, the young reverent, in their deportment. They speak little, but fervently, and with elegance."

In response to the salutation from the Indians, Penn makes a reply in suitable terms: "The Great Spirit, who made me and you, who rules the heavens and the earth, and who knows the innermost thoughts of men, knows that I and my friends have a hearty desire to live in peace and friendship with you, and to serve you to the uttermost of our power. It is not our custom to use hostile weapons against our fellow-creatures, for which reason we have come unarmed. Our object is not to do injury, and thus provoke the Great Spirit, but to do good. We are met on the broad pathway of good faith and good will, so that no advantage is to be taken on either side; but all to be openness, brotherhood and love." Having unrolled his parchment, he explains to them through an interpreter, article by article, the nature of the business, and laying it upon the ground, observes that the ground shall be for the use of both people. "I will not do as the Marylanders did, call you children, or brothers only; for parents are apt to whip their children too severely, and brothers sometimes will differ; neither will I compare the friendship between us to a chain, for the rain may rust it, or a tree may fall and break it; but I will consider you as the same flesh and blood with the Christians, and the same as if one man's body were to be divided into two parts." Having ended his business, the speaker for the King comes forward and makes great promises "of kindness and good neighborhood, and that the Indians and English must live in love as long as the sun gave light." This ended, another Indian makes a speech to his own people, first to explain to them what had been agreed on, and then to exhort them "to love the Christians, and particularly live in peace with me and the people under my government, that many Governors had been in the river, but that no Governor had come himself to live and stay here before, and having now such an one, that had treated them well, they should never do him nor his any wrong." At every sentence they shouted, as much as to say, amen.

The Indians had no system of writing by which they could record their dealings, but their memory of events and agreements was almost miraculous. Heckewelder records that in after years, they were accustomed, by means of strings, or belts of wampum, to preserve the recollection of their pleasant interviews with Penn, after he had departed for England. He says, "They frequently assembled together in the woods, in some shady spot, as nearly as possible similar to those where they used to meet their brother Miquon (Penn), and there lay all his words and speeches, with those of his descendants, on a blanket, or clean piece of bark, and with great satisfaction go successively over the whole. This practice, which I have repeatedly witnessed, continued until the year 1780, when disturbances which took place put an end to it, probably forever."

The memory of this, the "Great Treaty," was long preserved by the natives, and the novel spectacle was reproduced upon canvas by the genius of Benjamin West. In this picture, Penn is represented as a corpulent old man, whereas he was at this time but thirty-eight years of age, and in the very height of manly activity. The Treaty Tree was preserved and guarded from injury with an almost superstitious care. During the Revolution, when Philadelphia was occupied by the British, and their parties were scouring the country for firewood, Gen. Simcoe had a sentinel placed at this tree to protect it from mutilation. It stood until 1810, when it was blown down, and it was ascertained by its annual concentric accretions to be 283 years old, and was, consequently, 155 at the time of making the treaty. The Penn Society erected a substantial monument on the spot where it stood.

Penn drew up his deeds for lands in legal form, and had them duly executed and made of record, that, in the dispute possible to arise in after times, there might be proof definite and positive of the purchase. Of these purchases there are two deeds on record executed in 1683. One is for land near Neshaminy Creek, and thence to Penypack, and the other for lands lying between Schuylkill and Chester Rivers, the first bearing the signature of the great chieftain, Taminend. In one of these purchases it is provided that the tract "shall extend back as far as a man could walk in three days." Tradition runs that Penn himself, with a number of his friends, walked out the half this purchase with the Indians, that no advantage should be taken of them by making a great walk, and to show his consideration for them, and that he was not above the toils and fatigues of such a duty." They began to walk out this land at the mouth of the Neshaminy, and walked up the Delaware; in one day and a half they got to a spruce tree near the mouth of Baker's Creek, when Penn, concluding that this would include as much land as he would want at present, a line was run and marked from the spruce tree to Neshaminy, and the remainder left to be walked when it should be wanted. They proceeded after the Indian manner, walking leisurely, sitting down sometimes to smoke their pipes, eat biscuit and cheese, and drink a bottle of wine. In the day and a half they walked a little less than thirty miles. The balance of the purchase was not walked until September 20, 1733, when the then Governor of Pennsylvania offered a prize of 500 acres of land and £5 for the man who would walk the farthest. A distance of eighty-six miles was covered, in marked contrast with the kind consideration of Penn.

During the first year, the country upon the Delaware, from the falls of Trenton as far as Chester, a distance of nearly sixty miles, was rapidly taken up and peopled. The large proportion of these were Quakers, and devotedly attached to their religion and its proper observances. They were, hence, morally, of the best classes, and though they were not generally of the aristocracy, yet many of them were in comfortable circumstances, had valuable properties, were of respectable families, educated, and had the resources within themselves to live contented and happy. They were provident, industrious, and had come hither with no fickle purpose. Many brought servants with them, and well supplied wardrobes, and all necessary articles which they wisely judged would be got in a new country with difficulty.

Their religious principles were so peaceful and generous, and the government rested so lightly, that the fame of the colony and the desirableness of settlement therein spread rapidly, and the numbers coming hither were unparalleled in the history of colonization, especially when we consider that a broad ocean was to be crossed and a voyage of several weeks was to be endured. In a brief period, ships with passengers came from London, Bristol, Ireland, Wales, Cheshire, Lancashire, Holland, Germany, to the number of about fifty. Among others came a company of German Quakers, from Krisheim, near Worms, in the Palatinate. These people regarded their lot as particularly fortunate, in which they recognized the direct interposition and hand of Providence. For, not long afterward, the Palatinate was laid waste by the French army, and many of their kindred whom they had left behind were despoiled of their possessions and reduced to penury. There came also from Wales a company of the stock of ancient Britons.

So large an influx of population, coming in many cases without due provision for variety of diet, caused a scarcity in many kinds of food, especially of meats. Time was required to bring forward flocks and herds, more than for producing grains. But Providence seemed to have graciously considered their necessities, and have miraculously provided for them, as of old was provision made for the chosen people. For it is recorded that the "wild pigeons came in such great numbers that the sky was sometimes darkened by their flight, and, flying low, they were frequently knocked down as they flew, in great quantities, by those who had no other means to take them, whereby they supplied themselves, and, having salted those which they could not immediately use, they preserved them, both for bread and meat." The Indians were kind, and often furnished them with game, for which they would receive no compensation.

Their first care on landing was to bring their household goods to a place of safety, often to the simple protection of a tree. For some, this was their only shelter, lumber being scarce, and in many places impossible to obtain.

Some made for themselves caves in the earth until better habitations could be secured.

John Key, who was said to have been the first child born of English parents in Philadelphia, and that in recognition of which William Penn gave him a lot of ground, died at Kennet, in Chester County, on July 5, 1768, in the eighty-fifth year of his age. He was born in one of these caves upon the river bank, long afterward known by the name of Penny-pot, near Sassafras street. About six years before his death, he walked from Kennet to the city, about thirty miles, in one day. In the latter part of his life he went under the name of First Born.

The contrasts between the comforts and conveniences of an old settled country and this, where the heavy forests must be cleared away and severe labors must be endured before the sun could be let in sufficiently to produce anything, must have been very marked, and caused repining. But they had generally come with meek and humble hearts, and they willingly endured hardship and privation, and labored on earnestly for the spiritual comfort which they enjoyed. Thomas Makin, in some Latin verses upon the early settlement, says (we quote the metrical translation):

"Its fame to distant countries far has spread,
And some for peace, and some for profit led;
Born in remotest climes, to settle here
They leave their native soil and all that's dear,
And still will flock from far, here to be free,
Such powerful charms has lovely liberty."

But for their many privations and sufferings there were some compensating conditions. The soil was fertile, the air mostly clear and healthy, the streams of water were good and plentiful, wood for fire and building unlimited, and at certain seasons of the year game in the forest was abundant. Richard Townsend, a settler at Germantown, who came over in the ship with Penn, in writing to his friends in England of his first year in America, says: "I, with Joshua Tittery, made a net, and caught great quantities of fish, so that, notwithstanding it was thought near three thousand persons came in the first year, we were so providentially provided for that we could buy a deer for about two shillings, and a large turkey for about one shilling, and Indian corn for about two shillings sixpence a bushel."

In the same letter, the writer mentions that a young deer came out of the forest into the meadow where he was mowing, and looked at him, and when he went toward it would retreat; and, as he resumed his mowing, would come back to gaze upon him, and finally ran forcibly against a tree, which so stunned it that he was able to overmaster it and bear it away to his home, and as this was at a time when he was suffering for the lack of meat, he believed it a direct interposition of Providence.

In the spring of 1683, there was great activity throughout the colony, and especially in the new city, in selecting lands and erecting dwellings, the Surveyor General, Thomas Holme, laying out and marking the streets. In the center of the city was a public square of ten acres, and in each of the four quarters one of eight acres. A large mansion, which had been undertaken before his arrival, was built for Penn, at a point twenty-six miles up the river, called Pennsbury Manor, where he sometimes resided, and where he often met the Indian sachems. At this time, Penn divided the colony into counties, three for the province (Bucks, Philadelphia and Chester) and three for the Territories (New Castle, Kent and Sussex). Having appointed Sheriffs and other proper officers, he issued writs for the election of members of a General Assembly, three from each county for the Council or Upper House, and nine from each county for the Assembly or Lower House.*

This Assembly convened and organized for business on the 10th of January, 1683, at Philadelphia. One of the first subjects considered was the revising some provisions of the frame of government which was effected, reducing the number of members of both Houses, the Council to 18 the Assembly to 36, and otherwise amending in unimportant particulars. In an assembly thus convened, and where few, if any, had had any experience in serving in a deliberative body, we may reasonably suppose that many crude and impracticable propositions would be presented. As an example of these the following may be cited as specimens: That young men should be obliged to marry at, or before, a certain age; that two sorts of clothes only shall be worn, one for winter and the other for summer. The session lasted twenty two days.

The first grand jury in Pennsylvania was summoned for the 2d of February, 1683, to inquire into the cases of some persons accused of issuing counterfeit money. The Governor and Council sat as a court. One Pickering was convicted, and the sentence was significant of the kind and patriarchal nature of the government, "that he should make full satisfaction, in good and current pay, to every person who should, within the space of one month, bring in any of this false, base and counterfeit coin, and that the money brought in should be melted down before it was returned to him, and that he should pay a fine of forty pounds toward the building a court house, stand committed till the same was paid, and afterward find security for his good behavior."

The Assembly and courts having now adjourned, Penn gave his attention to the grading and improving the streets of the new city, and the managing the affairs of his land office, suddenly grown to great importance. For every section of land taken up in the wilderness, the purchaser was entitled to a certain plot in the new city. The River Delaware at this time was nearly a mile broad opposite the city, and navigable for ships of the largest tonnage. The tide rises about six feet at this point, and flows back to the falls of Trenton, a distance of thirty miles. The tide in the Schuylkill flows only about five miles above its confluence with the Delaware. The river bank along the Delaware was intended by Penn as a common or public resort. But in his time the owners of lots above Front street pressed him to allow them to construct warehouses upon it, opposite their properties, which importunity induced him to make the following declaration concerning it: "The bank is a top common, from end to end; the rest next the water belongs to front-lot men no more than back-lot men. The way bounds them; they may build stairs, and the top of the bank a common exchange, or wall, and against the street, common wharfs may be built freely; but into the water, and the shore is no purchaser's." But in future time, this liberal desire of the founder was disregarded, and the bank has been covered with immense warehouses.

* It may be a matter of curiosity to know the names of the members of this first regularly elected Legislature in Pennsylvania, and they are accordingly appended as given in official records:

Seeing now his plans of government and settlement fairly in operation, as autumn approached, Penn wrote a letter to the Free Society of Traders in London, which had been formed to promote settlement in his colony, in which he touched upon a great variety of topics regarding his enterprise, extending to quite a complete treatise. The great interest attaching to the subjects discussed, and the ability with which it was drawn, makes it desirable to insert the document entire; but its great length makes its use incompatible with the plan of this work. A few extracts and a general plan of the letter is all that can be given. He first notices the injurious reports put in circulation in England during his absence: "Some persons have had so little wit and so much malice as to report my death, and, to mend the matter, dead a Jésuit, too. One might have reasonably hoped that this distance, like death, would have been a protection against spite and envy. * * * However, to the great sorrow and shame of the inventors, I am still alive and no Jésuit, and, I thank God, very well." Of the air and waters he says: "The air is sweet and clear, the heavens serene, like the south parts of France, rarely overcast. The waters are generally good, for the rivers and brooks have mostly gravel and stony bottoms, and in number hardly credible. We also have mineral waters that operate in the same manner with Barnet and North Hall, not two miles from Philadelphia." He then treats at length of the four seasons, of trees, fruits, grapes, peaches, grains, garden produce; of animals, beasts, birds, fish, whale fishery, horses and cattle, medicinal plants, flowers of the woods; of the Indians and their persons. Of their language he says: "It is lofty, yet narrow; but, like the Hebrew, in signification, full, imperfect in their tenses, wanting in their moods, participles, adverbs, conjunctions, interjections. I have made it my business to understand it, and I must say that I know not a language spoken in Europe that hath words of more sweetness or greatness in accent and emphasis than theirs." Of their customs and their children: "The children will go very young, at nine months, commonly; if boys, they go a fishing, till ripe for the woods, which is about fifteen; then they hunt, and, after having given some proofs of their manhood by a good return of skins, they may marry, else it is a shame to think of a wife. The girls stay with their mother and help to hoe the ground, plant corn and carry burdens. When the young women are fit for marriage, they wear something upon their heads as an advertisement; but so, as their faces hardly to be seen, but when they please. The age they marry at, if women, is about thirteen and fourteen; if men, seventeen and eighteen; they are rarely elder." In a romantic vein he speaks of their houses, diet, hospitality, revengefulness and concealment of resentment, great liberality, free manner of life and customs, late love of strong liquor, behavior in sickness and death, their religion, their feastings, their government, their mode of doing business, their manner of administering justice, of agreement for settling difficulties entered into with the pen, their susceptibility to improvement, of the origin of the Indian race their resemblance to the Jews. Of the Dutch and Swedes whom he found settled here when he came, he says: "The Dutch applied themselves to traffick, the Swedes and Finns to husbandry. The Dutch mostly inhabit those parts that lie upon the bay, and the Swedes the freshes of the Delaware. They are a plain, strong, industrious people; yet have made no great progress in culture or propagation of fruit trees. They are a people proper, and strong of body, so they have fine children, and almost every house full; rare to find one of them without three or four boys and as many girls—some, six, seven and eight sons, and I must do them that right, I see few young men more sober and laborious." After speaking at length of the organization of the colony and its manner of government, he concludes with his own opinion of the country: "I say little of the town itself; but this I will say, for the good providence of God, that of all the many places I have seen in the world, I remember not one better seated, so that it seems to me to have been appointed for a town, whether we regard the rivers or the conveniency of the coves, docks, springs, the loftiness and soundness of the land and the air, held by the people of these parts to be very good. It is advanced within less than a year to about fourscore houses and cottages, where merchants and handicrafts are following their vocations as fast as they can, while the countrymen are close at their farms. * * * I bless God I am fully satisfied with the country and entertainment I got in it; for I find that particular content, which hath always attended me, where God in His providence hath made it my place and service to reside."

As we have seen, the visit of Penn to Lord Baltimore soon after his arrival in America, for the purpose of settling the boundaries of the two provinces, after a two days' conference, proved fruitless, and an adjournment was had for the winter, when the efforts for settlement were to be resumed. Early in the spring, an attempt was made on the part of Penn, but was prevented till May, when a meeting was held at New Castle. Penn proposed to confer by the aid of counselors and in writing. But to this Baltimore objected, and, complaining of the sultriness of the weather, the conference was broken up. In the meantime, it had come to the knowledge of Penn that Lord Baltimore had issued a proclamation offering settlers more land, and at cheaper rates than Penn had done, in portions of the lower counties which Penn had secured from the Duke of York, but which Baltimore now claimed. Besides, it was ascertained that an agent of his had taken an observation, and determined the latitude without the knowledge of Penn, and had secretly made an ex parte statement of the case before the Lords of the Committee of Plantations in England, and was pressing for arbitrament. This state of the case created much uneasiness in the mind of Penn, especially as the proclamation of Lord Baltimore was likely to bring the two governments into conflict on territory mutually claimed. But Lord Baltimore was not disposed to be content with diplomacy. He determined to pursue an aggressive policy. He accordingly commissioned his agent, Col. George Talbot, under date of September 17, 1683, to go to Schuylkill, at Delaware, and demand of William Penn "all that part of the land on the west side of the said river that lyeth to the southward of the fortieth degree." This bold demand would have embraced the entire colony, both the lower counties, and the three counties in the province, as the fortieth degree reaches a considerable distance above Philadelphia. Penn was absent at the time in New York, and Talbot made his demand upon Nicholas Moore, the deputy of Penn. Upon his return, the proprietor made a dignified but earnest rejoinder. While he felt that the demand could not be justly sustained, yet the fact that a controversy for the settlement of the boundary was likely to arise, gave him disquietude, and though he was gratified with the success of his plans for acquiring lands of the Indians and establishing friendly relations with them, the laying-out of his new city and settling it, the adoption of a stable government and putting it in successful operation, and, more than all, the drawing thither the large number of settlers, chiefly of his own religious faith, and seeing them contented and happy in the new State, he plainly foresaw that his skill and tact would be taxed to the utmost to defend and hold his claim before the English court. If the demand of Lord Baltimore were to prevail, all that he had done would be lost, as his entire colony would be swallowed up by Maryland.

The anxiety of Penn to hold from the beginning of the 40° of latitude was not to increase thereby his territory by so much, for two degrees which he securely had, so far as amount of land was concerned, would have entirely satisfied him; but he wanted this degree chiefly that he might have the free navigation of Delaware Bay and River, and thus open communication with the ocean. He desired also to hold the lower counties, which were now well settled, as well as his own counties rapidly being peopled, and his new city of Philadelphia, which he regarded as the apple of his eye. So anxious was he to hold the land on the right bank of the Delaware to the open ocean, that at his second meeting, he asked Lord Baltimore to set a price per square mile on this disputed ground, and though he had purchased it once of the crown and held the King's charter for it, and the Duke of York's deed, yet rather than have any further wrangle over it, he was willing to pay for it again. But this Lord Baltimore refused to do.

Bent upon bringing matters to a crisis, and to force possession of his claim, early in the year 1684 a party from Maryland made forcible entry upon the plantations in the lower counties and drove off the owners. The Governor and Council at Philadelphia sent thither a copy of the answer of Penn to Baltimore's demand for the land south of the Delaware, with orders to William Welch, Sheriff at New Castle, to use his influence to reinstate the lawful owners, and issued a declaration succinctly stating the claim of Penn, for the purpose of preventing such unlawful incursions in future.

The season opened favorably for the continued prosperity of the young colony. Agriculture was being prosecuted as never before. Goodly flocks and herds gladdened the eyes of the settlers. An intelligent, moral and industrious yeomanry was springing into existence. Emigrants were pouring into the Delaware from many lands. The Government was becoming settled in its operations and popular with the people. The proprietor had leisure to attend to the interests of his religious society, not only in his own dominions, but in the Jerseys and in New York.

CHAPTER VII.

THOMAS LLOYD, 1684-86—FIVE COMMISSIONERS, 1686-88—JOHN BLACKWELL, 1688-90—THOMAS LLOYD, 1690-91—WILLIAM MARKHAM, 1691-93—BENJAMIN FLETCHER, 1693-95—WILLIAM MARKHAM, 1693-99.

BUT the indications, constantly thickening, that a struggle was likely soon to be precipitated before the crown for possession of the disputed territory, decided Penn early in the summer to quit the colony and return to England to defend his imperiled interests. There is no doubt that he took this step with unfeigned regret, as he was contented and happy in his new country, and was most usefully employed. There were, however, other inducements which were leading him back to England. The hand of persecution was at this time laid heavily upon the Quakers. Over 1,400 of these pious and inoffensive people were now, and some of them had been for years, languishing in the prisons of England, for no other offense than their manner of worship. By his friendship with James, and his acquaintance with the King, he might do something to soften the lot of these unfortunate victims of bigotry.

He accordingly empowered the Provincial Council, of which Thomas Lloyd was President, to act in his stead, commissioned Nicholas Moore, William Welch, William Wood, Robert Turner and John Eckley, Provincial Judges for two years; appointed Thomas Lloyd, James Claypole and Robert Turner to sign land patents and warrants, and William Clark as Justice of the Peace for all the counties; and on the 6th of June, 1684, sailed for Europe. His feelings on leaving his colony are exhibited by a farewell address which he issued from on board the vessel to his people, of which the following are brief extracts: "My love and my life is to you, and with you, and no water can quench it, nor distance wear it out, nor bring it to an end. I have been with you, cared over you and served over you with unfeigned love, and you are beloved of me, and near to me, beyond utterance. I bless you in the name and power of the Lord, and may God bless you with His righteousness, peace and plenty all the land over. * * * Oh! now are you come to a quiet land; provoke not the Lord to trouble it. And now liberty and authority are with you, and in your hands. Let the government be upon His shoulders, in all your spirits, that you may rule for Him, under whom the princes of this world will, one day, esteem their honor to govern and serve in their places * * * And thou, Philadelphia, the virgin settlement of this province, named before thou wert born, what love, what care, what service and what travail has there been, to bring thee forth, and preserve thee from such as would abuse and defile thee! * * * So, dear friends, my love again salutes you all, wishing that grace, mercy and peace, with all temporal blessings, may abound richly among you—so says. so prays, your friend and lover in the truth.

WILLIAM PENN."

On the 6th of December of this same year, 1684, Charles II died, and was succeeded by his brother James, Duke of York, under the title of James II. James was a professed Catholic, and the people were greatly excited all over the kingdom lest the reign of Bloody Mary should be repeated, and that the Catholic should become the established religion. He had less ability than his brother, the deceased King, but great discipline and industry. Penn enjoyed the friendship and intimacy of the new King, and he determined to use his advantage for the relief of his suffering countrymen, not only of his sect, the Quakers, but of all, and especially for the furtherance of universal liberty. But there is no doubt that he at this time meditated a speedy return to his province, for he writes: "Keep up the peoples' hearts and loves; I hope to be with them next fall, if the Lord prevent not. I long to be with you. No temptations prevail to fix me here. The Lord send us a good meeting." By authority of Penn, dated 18th of January, 1685, William Markham, Penn's cousin, was commissioned Secretary of the province, and the proprietor's Secretary.

That he might be fixed near to court for the furtherance of his private as well as public business, he secured lodgings for himself and family, in 1685, at Kensington, near London, and cultivated a daily intimacy with the King, who, no doubt, found in the strong native sense of his Quaker friend, a valued adviser upon many questions of difficulty. His first and chief care was the settlement of his disagreement with Lord Baltimore touching the boundaries of their provinces. This was settled in November, 1685, by a compromise, by which the land lying between the Delaware and Chesapeake Bays was divided into two equal parts—that upon the Delaware was adjudged to Penn, and that upon the Chesapeake to Lord Baltimore. This settled the matter in theory; but when the attempt was made to run the lines according to the language of the Royal Act, it was found that the royal secretaries did not understand the geography of the country, and that the line which their language described was an impossible one. Consequently the boundary remained undetermined till 1732. The account of its location will be given in its proper place.

Having secured this important decision to his satisfaction, Penn applied himself with renewed zeal, not only to secure the release of his people, who were languishing in prisons, but to procure for all Englishmen, everywhere, enlarged liberty and freedom of conscience. His relations with the King favored his designs. The King had said to Penn before he ascended the throne that he was opposed to persecution for religion. On the first day of his reign, he made an address, in which he proclaimed himself opposed to all arbitrary principles in government, and promised protection to the Church of England. Early in the year 1686, in consequence of the King's proclamation for a general pardon, over thirteen hundred Quakers were set at liberty, and in April, 1687, the King issued a declaration for entire liberty of conscience, and suspending the penal laws in matters ecclesiastical. This was a great step in advance, and one that must ever throw a luster over the brief reign of this unfortunate monarch. Penn, though holding no official position, doubtless did as much toward securing the issue of this liberal measure as any Englishman.

Upon the issue of these edicts, the Quakers, at their next annual meeting, presented an address of acknowledgment to the King, which opened in these words: "We cannot but bless and praise the name of Almighty God, who hath the hearts of princes in His hands, that He hath inclined the King to hear the cries of his suffering subjects for conscience' sake, and we rejoice that he hath given us so eminent an occasion to present him our thanks." This address was presented by Penn in a few well-chosen words, and the King replied in the following, though brief, yet most expressive, language: "Gentlemen—I thank you heartily for your address. Some of you know (I am sure you do Mr. Penn), that it was always my principle, that conscience ought not to be forced, and that all men ought to have the liberty of their consciences. And what I have promised in my declaration, I will continue to perform so long as I live. And I hope, before I die, to settle it so that after ages shall have no reason to alter it."

It would have been supposed that such noble sentiments as these from a sovereign would have been hailed with delight by the English people. But they were not. The aristocracy of Britain at this time did not want liberty of conscience. They wanted conformity to the established church, and bitter persecution against all others, as in the reign of Charles, which filled the prisons with Quakers. The warm congratulations to James, and fervent prayers for his welfare, were regarded by them with an evil eye. Bitter reproaches were heaped upon Penn, who was looked upon as the power behind the throne that was moving the King to the enforcing of these principles. He was accused of having been educated at St. Omer's, a Catholic college, a place which he never saw in his life, of having taken orders as a priest in the Catholic Church, of having obtained dispensation to marry, and of being not only a Catholic, but a Jesuit in disguise, all of which were pure fabrications. But in the excited state of the public mind they were believed, and caused him to be regarded with bitter hatred. The King, too, fell rapidly into disfavor, and so completely had the minds of his people become alienated from him, that upon the coming of the Prince of Orange and his wife Mary, in 1688, James was obliged to flee to France for safety, and they were received as the rulers of Britain.

But while the interests of the colony were thus prospering at court, they were not so cloudless in the new country. There was needed the strong hand of Penn to check abuses and guide the course of legislation in proper channels. He had labored to place the government entirely in the hands of the people—an idea, in the abstract, most attractive, and one which, were the entire population wise and just, would result fortunately; yet, in practice, he found to his sorrow the results most vexatious. The proprietor had not long been gone before troubles arose between the two Houses of the Legislature relative to promulgating the laws as not being in accordance with the requirements of the charter. Nicholas Moore, the Chief Justice, was impeached for irregularities in imposing fines and in other ways abusing his high trust. But though formally arraigned and directed to desist from exercising his functions, he successfully resisted the proceedings, and a final judgment was never obtained. Patrick Robinson, Clerk of the court, for refusing to produce the records in the trial of Moore, was voted a public enemy. These troubles in the government were the occasion of much grief to Penn, who wrote, naming a number of the most influential men in the colony, and beseeching them to unite in an endeavor to check further irregularities, declaring that they disgraced the province, "that their conduct had struck back hundreds, and was £10,000 out of his way, and £100,000 out of the country."

In the latter part of the year 1686, seeing that the whole Council was too unwieldy a body to exercise executive power, Penn determined to contract the number, and accordingly appointed Thomas Lloyd, Nicholas Moore, James Claypole, Robert Turner and John Eckley, any three of whom should constitute a quorum, to be Commissioners of State to act for the proprietor. In place of Moore and Claypole, Arthur Cook and John Simcock were appointed. They were to compel the attendance of the Council; see that the two Houses admit of no parley; to abrogate all laws except the fundamentals; to dismiss the Assembly and call a new one, and finally he solemnly admonishes them, "Be most just, as in the sight of the all-seeing, all-searching God." In a letter to these Commissioners, he says: "Three things occur to me eminently: First, that you be watchful that none abuse the King, etc.; secondly, that you get the custom act revived as being the equalest and least offensive way to support the government; thirdly, that you retrieve the dignity of courts and sessions."

In a letter to James Harrison, his confidential agent at Pennsbury Manor, he unbosoms himself more freely respecting his employment in London than in any of his State papers or more public communications, and from it can be seen how important were his labors with the head of the English nation. "I am engaged in the public business of the nation and Friends, and those in authority would have me see the establishment of the liberty, that I was a small instrument to begin in the land. The Lord has given me great entrance and interest with the King, though not so much as is said; and I confess I should rejoice to see poor old England fixed, the penal laws repealed, that are now suspended, and if it goes well with England, it cannot go ill with Pennsylvania, as unkindly used as I am; and no poor slave in Turkey desires more earnestly, I believe, for deliverance, than I do to be with you." In the summer of 1687, Penn was in company with the King in a progress through the counties of Berkshire, Gloucestershire, Worcestershire, Shropshire, Cheshire, Staffordshire, Warwickshire, Oxfordshire and Hampshire, during which he held several religious meetings with his people, in some of which the King appears to have been present, particularly in Chester.

Since the departure of Penn, Thomas Lloyd had acted as President of the Council, and later of the Commissioners of State. He had been in effect Governor, and held responsible for the success of the government, while possessing only one voice in the disposing of affairs. Tiring of this anomalous position, Lloyd applied to be relieved. It was difficult to find a person of sufficient ability to fill the place; but Penn decided to relieve him, though showing his entire confidence by notifying him that he intended soon to appoint him absolute Governor. In his place, he indicated Samuel Carpenter, or if he was unwilling to serve, then Thomas Ellis, but not to be President, his will being that each should preside a month in turn, or that the oldest member should be chosen.

Penn foresaw that the executive power, to be efficient, must be lodged in the hands of one man of ability, such as to command the respect of his people. Those whom he most trusted in the colony had been so mixed up in the wrangles of the executive and legislative departments of the government that he deemed it advisable to appoint a person who had not before been in the colony and not a Quaker. He accordingly commissioned John Blackwell, July 27, 1688, to be Lieutenant Governor, who was at this time in New England, and who had the esteem and confidence of Penn. With the commission, the proprietor sent full instructions, chiefly by way of caution, the last one being: "Rule the meek meekly; and those that will not be ruled, rule with authority." Though Lloyd had been relieved of power, he still remained in the Council, probably because neither of the persons designated were willing to serve. Having seen the evils of a many-headed executive, he had recommended the appointment of one person to exercise executive authority. It was in conformity with this advice that Blackwell was appointed. He met the Assembly in March, 1689; but either his conceptions of business were arbitrary and imperious, or the Assembly had become accustomed to great latitude and lax discipline; for the business had not proceeded far before the several branches of the government were at variance. Lloyd refused to give up the great seal, alleging that it had been given him for life. The Governor, arbitrarily and without warrant of law, imprisoned officers of high rank, denied the validity of all laws passed by the Assembly previous to his administration, and set on foot a project for organizing and equipping the militia, under the plea of threatened hostility of France. The Assembly attempted to arrest his proceedings, but he shrewdly evaded their intents by organizing a party among the members, who persistently absented themselves. His reign was short, for in January, 1690, he left the colony and sailed away for England, whereupon the government again devolved upon the Council, Thomas Lloyd, President. Penn had a high estimation of the talents and integrity of Blackwell, and adds, "He is in England and Ireland of great repute for ability, integrity and virtue."

Three forms of administering the executive department of the government had now been tried, by a Council consisting of eighteen members, a commission of five members, and a Lieutenant Governor. Desirous of leaving the government as far as possible in the hands of the people who were the sources of all power, Penn left it to the Council to decide which form should be adopted. The majority decided for a Deputy Governor. This was opposed by the members from the provinces, who preferred a Council, and who, finding themselves outvoted, decided to withdraw, and determined for themselves to govern the lower counties until Penn should come. This obstinacy and falling out between the councilors from the lower counties and those from the province was the beginning of a controversy which eventuated in a separation, and finally in the formation of Delaware as a separate commonwealth. A deputation from the Council was sent to New Castle to induce the seceding members to return, but without success. They had never regarded with favor the removal of the sittings of the Council from New Castle, the first seat of government, to Philadelphia, and they were now determined to set up a government for themselves.

In 1689, the Friends Public School in Philadelphia was first incorporated, confirmed by a patent from Penn in 1701, and another in 1708, and finally, with greatly enlarged powers, from Penn personally, November 29, 1711. The preamble to the charter recites that as "the prosperity and welfare of any people depend, in great measure, upon the good education of youth, and their early introduction in the principles of true religion and virtue, and qualifying them to serve their country and themselves, by breeding them in reading, writing, and learning of languages and useful arts and sciences suitable to their sex, age and degree, which cannot be effected in any manner so well as by erecting public schools," etc. George Keith was employed as the first master of this school. He was a native of Aberdeen, Scotland, a man of learning, and had emigrated to East Jersey some years previous, where he was Surveyor General, and had surveyed and marked the line between East and West New Jersey. He only remained at the head of the school one year, when he was succeeded by his usher, Thomas Makin. This was a school of considerable merit and pretension, where the higher mathematics and the ancient languages were taught, and was the first of this high grade. A school of a primary grade had been established as early as 1683, in Philadelphia, when Enoch Flower taught on the following terms: "To learn to read English, four shillings by the quarter; to write, six shillings by ditto; to read, write and cast accounts, eight shillings by the quarter; boarding a scholar, that is to say, diet, lodging, washing and schooling, £10 for one whole year," from which it will be seen that although learning might be highly prized, its cost in hard cash was not exorbitant.

Penn's favor at court during the reign of James II caused him to be suspected of disloyalty to the government when William and Mary had come to the throne. Accordingly on the 10th of December, 1688, while walking in White Hall, he was summoned before the Lords of the Council, and though nothing was found against him, was compelled to give security for his appearance at the next term, to answer any charge that might be made. At the second sitting of the Council nothing having been found against him, he was cleared in open court. In 1690, he was again brought before the Lords on the charge of having been in correspondence with the late King. He appealed to King William, who, after a hearing of two hours, was disposed to release him, but the Lords decided to hold him until the Trinity term, when he was again discharged. A third time he was arraigned, and this time with eighteen others, charged with adhering to the kingdom's enemies, but was cleared by order of the King's Bench. Being now at liberty, and these vexatious suits apparently at an end, he set about leading a large party of settlers to his cherished Pennsylvania. Proposals were published, and the Government, regarding the enterprise of so much importance, had ordered an armed convoy, when he was again met by another accusation, and now, backed by the false oath of one William Fuller, whom the Parliament subsequently declared a "cheat and an imposter." Seeing that he must prepare again for his defense, he abandoned his voyage to America, after having made expensive preparations, and convinced that his enemies were determined to prevent his attention to public or private affairs, whether in England or America, he withdrew himself during the ensuing two or three years from the public eye.

But though not participating in business, which was calling loudly for his attention, his mind was busy, and several important treatises upon religious and civil matters were produced that had great influence upon the turn of public affairs, which would never have been written but for this forced retirement. In his address to the yearly meeting of Friends in London, he says:

"My enemies are yours. My privacy is not because men have sworn truly, but falsely against me."

His personal grievances in England were the least which he suffered. For lack of guiding influence, bitter dissensions had sprung up in his colony, which threatened the loss of all. Desiring to secure peace, he had commissioned Thomas Lloyd Deputy Governor of the province, and William Markham Deputy Governor of the lower counties. Penn's grief on account of this division is disclosed in a letter to a friend in the province: "I left it to them, to choose either the government of the Council, five Commissioners or a deputy. What could be tenderer? Now I perceive Thomas Lloyd is chosen by the three upper, but not the three lower counties, and sits down with this broken choice. This has grieved and wounded me and mine, I fear to the hazard of all! * * * for else the Governor of New York is like to have all, if he has it not already."

But the troubles of Penn in America were not confined to civil affairs. His religious society was torn with dissension. George Keith, a man of considerable power in argumentation, but of overweening self-conceit, attacked the Friends for the laxity of their discipline, and drew off some followers. So venomous did he become that on the 20th of April, 1692, a testimony of denial was drawn up against him at a meeting of ministers, wherein he and his conduct were publicly disowned. This was confirmed at the next yearly meeting. He drew off large numbers and set up an independent society, who termed themselves Christian Quakers. Keith appealed from this action of the American Church to the yearly meeting in London, but was so intemperate in speech that the action of the American Church was confirmed. Whereupon he became the bitter enemy of the Quakers, and, uniting with the Church of England, was ordained a Vicar by the Bishop of London. He afterward returned to America where he wrote against his former associates, but was finally fixed in a benefice in Sussex, England. On his death bed, he said, "I wish I had died when I was a Quaker, for then I am sure it would have been well with my soul."

But Keith had not been satisfied with attacking the principles and practices of his church. He mercilessly lampooned the Lieutenant Governor, saying that "He was not fit to be a Governor, and his name would stink," and of the Council, that "He hoped to God he should shortly see their power taken from them." On another occasion, he said of Thomas Lloyd, who was reputed a mild-tempered man, and had befriended Keith, that he was "an impudent man and a pitiful Governor," and asked him "why he did not send him to jail," saying that "his back (Keith's) had long itched for a whipping, and that he would print and expose them all over America, if not over Europe." So abusive had he finally become that the Council was obliged to take notice of his conduct and to warn him to desist.

Penn, as has been shown, was silenced and thrown into retirement in England. It can be readily seen what an excellent opportunity these troubles in America, the separation in the government, and the schism in the church, gave his enemies to attack him. They represented that he had neglected his colony by remaining in England and meddling with matters in which he had no business; that the colony in consequence had fallen into great disorder, and that he should be deprived of his proprietary rights. These complaints had so much weight with William and Mary, that, on the 21st of October, 1692, they commissioned Benjamin Fletcher, Governor of New York, to take the province and territories under his government. There was another motive operating at this time, more potent than those mentioned above, to induce the King and Queen to put the government of Pennsylvania under the Governor of New York. The French and Indians from the north were threatening the English. Already the expense for defense had become burdensome to New York. It was believed that to ask aid for the common defense from Penn, with his peace principles, would be fruitless, but that through the influence of Gov. Fletcher, as executive, an appropriation might be secured.

Upon receiving his commission, Gov. Fletcher sent a note, dated April 19, 1693, to Deputy Gov. Lloyd, informing him of the grant of the royal commission and of his intention to visit the colony and assume authority on the 29th inst. He accordingly came with great pomp and splendor, attended by a numerous retinue, and soon after his arrival, submission to him having been accorded without question, summoned the Assembly. Some differences having arisen between the Governor and the Assembly about the manner of calling and electing the Representatives, certain members united in an address to the Governor, claiming that the constitution and laws were still in full force and must be administered until altered or repealed; that Pennsylvania had just as good a right to be governed according to the usages of Pennsylvania as New York had to be governed according to the usages of that province. The Legislature being finally organized, Gov. Fletcher presented a letter from the Queen, setting forth that the expense for the preservation and defense of Albany against the French was intolerable to the inhabitants there, and that as this was a frontier to other colonies, it was thought but just that they should help bear the burden. The Legislature, in firm but respectful terms, maintained that the constitution and laws enacted under them were in full force, and when he, having flatly denied this, attempted to intimidate them by the threat of annexing Pennsylvania to New York, they mildly but firmly requested that if the Governor had objections to the bill which they had passed and would communicate them, they would try to remove them. The business was now amicably adjusted, and he in compliance with their wish dissolved the Assembly, and after appointing William Markham Lieutenant Governor, departed to his government in New York, doubtless well satisfied that a Quaker, though usually mild mannered, is not easily frightened or coerced.

Gov. Fletcher met the Assembly again in March, 1694, and during this session, having apparently failed in his previous endeavors to induce the Assembly to vote money for the common defense, sent a communication setting forth the dangers to be apprehended from the French and Indians, and concluding in these words: "That he considered their principles; that they could not carry arms nor levy money to make war, though for their own defense, yet he hoped that they would not refuse to feed the hungry and clothe the naked; that was to supply the Indian nations with such necessaries as may influence their continued friendship to their provinces." But notwithstanding the adroit sugar-coating of the pill, it was not acceptable and no money was voted. This and a brief session in September closed the Governorship of Pennsylvania by Fletcher. It would appear from a letter written by Penn, after hearing of the neglect of the Legislature to vote money for the purpose indicated, that he took an entirely different view of the subject from that which was anticipated; for he blamed the colony for refusing to send money to New York for what he calls the common defense.

Through the kind offices of Lords Rochester, Ranelagh, Sidney and Somers, the Duke of Buckingham and Sir John Trenchard, the king was asked to hear the case of William Penn, against whom no charge was proven, and who would two years before have gone to his colony had he not supposed that he would have been thought to go in defiance of the government. King William answered that William Penn was his old acquaintance as well as theirs, that he might follow his business as freely as ever, and that he had nothing to say to him. Penn was accordingly reinstated in his government by letters patent dated on the 20th of August, 1694, whereupon he commissioned William Markham Lieutenant Governor.

When Markham called the Assembly, he disregarded the provisions of the charter, assuming that the removal of Penn had annulled the grant. The Assembly made no objection to this action, as there were provisions in the old charter that they desired to have changed. Accordingly, when the appropriation bill was considered, a new constitution was attached to it and passed. This was approved by Markham and became the organic law, the third constitution adopted under the charter of King Charles. By the provisions of this instrument, the Council was composed of twelve members, and the Assembly of twenty-four. During the war between France and England, the ocean swarmed with the privateers of the former. When peace was declared, many of these crafts, which had richly profited by privateering, were disposed to continue their irregular practices, which was now piracy. Judging that the peace principles of the Quakers would shield them from forcible seizure, they were accustomed to run into the Delaware for safe harbor. Complaints coming of the depredations of these parties, a proclamation was issued calling on magistrates and citizens to unite in breaking up practices so damaging to the good name of the colony. It was charged in England that evil-disposed persons in the province were privy to these practices, if not parties to it, and that the failure of the Government to break it up was a proof of its inefficiency, and of a radical defect of the principles on which it was based. Penn was much exercised by these charges, and in his letters to the Lieutenant Governor and to his friends in the Assembly, urged ceaseless vigilance to effect reform.

CHAPTER VIII.

WILLIAM PENN, 1699-1701—ANDREW HAMILTON, 1701-3—EDWARD SHIPPEN 1703-4—JOHN EVANS, 1704-9—CHARLES GOOKIN, 1709-17.

BEING free from harassing persecutions, and in favor at court, Penn determined to remove with his family to Pennsylvania, and now with the expectation of living and dying here. Accordingly, in July, 1699, he set sail, and, on account of adverse winds, was three months tossed about upon the ocean. Just before his arrival in his colony, the yellow fever raged there with great virulence, having been brought thither from the West Indies, but had been checked by the biting frosts of autumn, and had now disappeared. An observant traveler, who witnessed the effects of this scourge, writes thus of it in his journal: "Great was the majesty and hand of the Lord. Great was the fear that fell upon all flesh. I saw no lofty nor airy countenance, nor heard any vain jesting to move men to laughter, nor witty repartee to raise mirth, nor extravagant feasting to excite the lusts and desires of the flesh above measure; but every face gathered paleness, and many hearts were humbled, and countenances fallen and sunk, as such that waited every moment to be summoned to the bar and numbered to the grave."

Great joy was everywhere manifested throughout the province at the arrival of the proprietor and his family, fondly believing that he had now come to stay. He met the Assembly soon after landing, but, it being an inclement season, he only detained them long enough to pass two measures aimed against piracy and illicit trade, exaggerated reports of which, having been spread broadcast through the kingdom, had caused him great uneasiness and vexation. At the first monthly meeting of Friends in 1700, he laid before them his concern, which was for the welfare of Indians and Negroes, and steps were taken to instruct them and provide stated meetings for them where they could hear the Word. It is more than probable that he had fears from the first that his enemies in England would interfere in his affairs to such a degree as to require his early return, though he had declared to his friends there that he never expected to meet them again. His greatest solicitude, consequently, was to give a charter to his colony, and also one to his city, the very best that human ingenuity could devise. An experience of now nearly twenty years would be likely to develop the weaknesses and impracticable provisions of the first constitutions, so that a frame now drawn with all the light of the past, and by the aid and suggestion of the men who had been employed in administering it, would be likely to be enduring, and though he might be called hence, or be removed by death, their work would live on from generation to generation and age to age, and exert a benign and preserving influence while the State should exist.

In February, 1701, Penn met the most renowned and powerful of the Indian chieftains, reaching out to the Potomac, the Susquehanna and to the Onondagoes of the Five Nations, some forty in number, at Philadelphia, where he renewed with them pledges of peace and entered into a formal treaty of active friendship, binding them to disclose any hostile intent, confirm sale of lands, be governed by colonial law, all of which was confirmed on the part of the Indians "by five parcels of skins;" and on the part of Penn by "several English goods and merchandises."

Several sessions of the Legislature were held in which great harmony prevailed, and much attention was giving to revising and recomposing the constitution. But in the midst of their labors for the improvement of the organic law, intelligence was brought to Penn that a bill had been introduced in the House of Lords for reducing all the proprietary governments in America to regal ones, under pretence of advancing the prerogative of the crown, and the national advantage. Such of the owners of land in Pennsylvania as happened to be in England, remonstrated against action upon the bill until Penn could return and be heard, and wrote to him urging his immediate coming hither. Though much to his disappointment and sorrow, he determined to go immediately thither. He promptly called a session of the Assembly, and in his message to the two Houses said, "I cannot think of such a voyage without great reluctance of mind, having promised myself the quietness of a wilderness. For my heart is among you, and no disappointment shall ever be able to alter my love to the country, and resolution to return, and settle my family and posterity in it. * * Think therefore (since all men are mortal), of some suitable expedient and provision for your safety as well in your privileges as property. Review again your laws, propose new ones, and you will find me ready to comply with whatsoever may render us happy, by a nearer union of our interests." The Assembly returned a suitable response, and then proceeded to draw up twenty-one articles. The first related to the appointment of a Lieutenant Governor. Penn proposed that the Assembly should choose one. But this they declined, preferring that he should appoint one. Little trouble was experienced in settling everything broached, except the union of the province and lower counties. Penn used his best endeavors to reconcile them to the union, but without avail. The new constitution was adopted on the 28th of October, 1701. The instrument provided for the union, but in a supplementary article, evidently granted with great reluctance, it was provided that the province and the territories might be separated at any time within three years. As his last act before leaving, he presented the city of Philadelphia, now grown to be a considerable place, and always an object of his affectionate regard, with a charter of privileges. As his Deputy, he appointed Andrew Hamilton, one of the proprietors of East New Jersey, and sometime Governor of both East and West Jersey, and for Secretary of the province and Clerk of the Council, he selected James Logan, a man of singular urbanity and strength of mind, and withal a scholar.

Penn set sail for Europe on the 1st of November, 1701. Soon after his arrival, on the 18th of January, 1702, King William died, and Anne of Denmark succeeded him. He now found himself in favor at court, and that he might be convenient to the royal residence, he again took lodgings at Kensington. The bill which had been pending before Parliament, that had given him so much uneasiness, was at the succeeding session dropped entirely, and was never again called up. During his leisure hours, he now busied himself in writing "several useful and excellent treatises on divers subjects."

Gov. Hamilton's administration continued only till December, 1702, when he died. He was earnest in his endeavors to induce the territories to unite with the province, they having as yet not accepted the new charter, alleging that they had three years in which to make their decision, but without success. He also organized a military force, of which George Lowther was commander, for the safety of the colony.

The executive authority now devolved upon the Council, of which Edward Shippen was President. Conflict of authority, and contention over the due interpretation of some provisions of the new charter, prevented the accomplishment of much, by way of legislation, in the Assembly which convened in 1703; though in this body it was finally determined that the lower counties should thereafter act separately in a legislative capacity. This separation proved final, the two bodies never again meeting in common.

Though the bill to govern the American Colonies by regal authority failed, yet the clamor of those opposed to the proprietary Governors was so strong that an act was finally passed requiring the selection of deputies to have the royal assent. Hence, in choosing a successor to Hamilton, he was obliged to consider the Queen's wishes. John Evans, a man of parts, of Welsh extraction, only twenty-six years old, a member of the Queen's household, and not a Quaker, nor even of exemplary morals, was appointed, who arrived in the colony in December, 1703. He was accompanied by William Penn, Jr., who was elected a member of the Council, the number having been increased by authority of the Governor, probably with a view to his election.

The first care of Evans was to unite the province and lower counties, though the final separation had been agreed to. He presented the matter so well that the lower counties, from which the difficulty had always come, were willing to return to a firm union. But now the provincial Assembly, having become impatient of the obstacles thrown in the way of legislation by the delegates from these counties, was unwilling to receive them. They henceforward remained separate in a legislative capacity, though still a part of Pennsylvania, under the claim of Penn, and ruled by the same Governor, and thus they continued until the 20th of September, 1776, when a constitution was adopted, and they were proclaimed a separate State under the name of Delaware.

During two years of the government of Evans, there was ceaseless discord between the Council, headed by the Governor and Secretary Logan on the one side, and the Assembly led by David Lloyd, its Speaker, on the other, and little legislation was effected.

Realizing the defenseless condition of the colony, Evans determined to organize the militia, and accordingly issued his proclamation. "In obedience to her Majesty's royal command, and to the end that the inhabitants of this government may be in a posture of defense and readiness to withstand and repel all acts of hostility, I do hereby strictly command and require all persons residing in this government, whose persuasions will, on any account, permit them to take up arms in their own defense, that forthwith they do provide themselves with a good firelock and ammunition, in order to enlist themselves in the militia, which I am now settling in this government." The Governor evidently issued this proclamation in good faith, and with a pure purpose. The French and Indians had assumed a threatening aspect upon the north, and while the other colonies had assisted New York liberally, Pennsylvania had done little or nothing for the common defense. But his call fell stillborn. The "fire-locks" were not brought out, and none enlisted.

Disappointed at this lack of spirit, and embittered by the factious temper of the Assembly, Evans, who seems not to have had faith in the religious principles of the Quakers, and to have entirely mistook the nature of their Christian zeal, formed a wild scheme to test their steadfastness under the pressure of threatened danger. In conjunction with his gay associates in revel, he agreed to have a false alarm spread of the approach of a hostile force in the river, whereupon he was to raise the alarm in the city. Accordingly, on the day of the fair in Philadelphia, 16th of March, 1706, a messenger came, post haste from New Castle, bringing the startling intelligence that an armed fleet of the enemy was already in the river, and making their way rapidly toward the city. Whereupon Evans acted his part to a nicety. He sent emissaries through the town proclaiming the dread tale, while he mounted his horse, and in an excited manner, and with a drawn sword, rode through the streets, calling upon all good men and true to rush to arms for the defense of their homes, their wives and children, and all they held dear. The ruse was so well played that it had an immense effect. "The suddenness of the surprise," says Proud, "with the noise of precipitation consequent thereon, threw many of the people into very great fright and consternation, insomuch that it is said some threw their plate and most valuable effects down their wells and little houses; that others hid themselves, in the best manner they could, while many retired further up the river, with what they could most readily carry off; so that some of the creeks seemed full of boats and small craft; those of a larger size running as far as Burlington, and some higher up the river; several women are said to have miscarried by the fright and terror into which they were thrown, and much mischief ensued."

The more thoughtful of the people are said to have understood the deceit from the first, and labored to allay the excitement; but the seeming earnestness of the Governor and the zeal of his emissaries so worked upon the more inconsiderate of the population that the consternation and commotion was almost past belief. In an almanac published at Philadelphia for the next year opposite this date was this distich:

"Wise men wonder, good men grieve, Knave invent and fools believe."

Though this ruse was played upon all classes alike, yet it was generally believed to have been aimed chiefly at the Quakers, to try the force of their principles, and see if they would not rush to arms when danger should really appear. But in this the Governor was disappointed. For it is said that only four out of the entire population of this religious creed showed any disposition to falsify their faith. It was the day of their weekly meeting, and regardless of the dismay and consternation which were everywhere manifest about them, they assembled in their accustomed places of worship, and engaged in their devotions as though nothing unusual was transpiring without, manifesting such unshaken faith, as Whittier has exemplified in verse by his Abraham Davenport, on the occasion of the Dark Day:

' Meanwhile in the old State House, dim as ghosts,
Sat the law-givers of Connecticut,
Trembling beneath their legislative robes.
' It is the Lord's great day! Let us adjourn,'
Some said; and then, as with one accord,
All eyes were turned on Abraham Davenport.
He rose, slow, cleaving with his steady voice
The intolerable hush. ' This well may be
The Day of Judgment which the world awaits;
But be it so or not, I only know
My present duty, and my Lord's command
To occupy till He come. So at the post,
Where He hath set me in His Providence,
I choose, for one, to meet Him face to face,
No faithless servant frightened from my task,
But ready when the Lord of the harvest calls;
And therefore, with all reverence, I would say,
Let God do His work, we will see to ours.
Bring in the candles.' And they brought them in."

In conjunction with the Legislature of the lower counties, Evans was instrumental in having a law passed for the imposition of a tax on the tonnage of the river, and the erection of a fort near the town of New Castle for compelling obedience. This was in direct violation of the fundamental compact, and vexatious to commerce. It was at length forcibly resisted, and its imposition abandoned. His administration was anything but efficient or peaceful, a series of contentions, of charges and counter-charges having been kept up between the leaders of the two factions, Lloyd and Logan, which he was powerless to properly direct or control. "He was relieved in 1709. Possessed of a good degree of learning and refinement, and accustomed to the gay society of the British metropolis, he found in the grave and serious habits of the Friends a type of life and character which he failed to comprehend, and with which he could, consequently, have little sympathy. How widely he mistook the Quaker character is seen in the result of his wild and hair-brained experiment to test their faith. His general tenor of life seems to have been of a piece with this. Watson says: 'The Indians of Connestoga complained of him when there as misbehaving to their women, and that, in 1709, Solomon Cresson, going his rounds at night, entered a tavern to suppress a riotous assembly, and found there John Evans, Esq., the Governor, who fell to beating Cresson.'"

The youth and levity of Gov. Evans induced the proprietor to seek for a successor of a more sober and sedate character. He had thought of proposing his son, but finally settled upon Col. Charles Gookin, who was reputed to be a man of wisdom and prudence, though as was afterward learned, to the sorrow of the colony, he was subject to fits of derangement, which toward the close of his term were exhibited in the most extravagant acts. He had scarcely arrived in the colony before charges were preferred against the late Governor, and he was asked to institute criminal proceedings, which he declined. This was the occasion of a renewal of contentions between the Governor and his Council and the Assembly, which continued during the greater part of his administration. In the midst of them, Logan, who was at the head of the Council, having demanded a trial of the charges against him, and failed to secure one, sailed for Europe, where he presented the difficulties experienced in administering the government so strongly, that Penn was seriously inclined to sell his interest in the colony. He had already greatly crippled his estate by expenses he had incurred in making costly presents to the natives, and in settling his colony, for which he had received small return. In the year 1707, he had become involved in a suit in chancery with the executors of his former steward, in the course of which he was confined in the Old Baily during this and a part of the following year, when he was obliged to mortgage his colony in the sum of £6,600 to relieve himself. Foreseeing the great consequence it would be to the crown to buy the rights of the proprietors of the several English colonies in America before they would grow too powerful, negotiations had been entered into early in the reign of William and Mary for their purchase, especially the "fine province of Mr. Penn." Borne down by these troubles, and by debts and litigations at home, Penn seriously entertained the proposition to sell in 1712, and offered it for £20,000. The sum of £12,000 was offered on the part of the crown, which was agreed upon, but before the necessary papers were executed, he was stricken down with apoplexy, by which he was incapacitated for transacting any business, and a stay was put to further proceedings until the Queen should order an act of Parliament for consummating the purchase.

It is a mournful spectacle to behold the great mind and the great heart of Penn reduced now in his declining years, by the troubles of government and by debts incurred in the bettering of his colony, to this enfeebled condition. He was at the moment writing to Logan on public affairs, when his hand was suddenly seized by lethargy in the beginning of a sentence, which he never finished. His mind was touched by the disease, which he never recovered, and after lingering for six years, he died on the 30th of May, 1718, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. With great power of intellect, and a religious devotion scarcely matched in all Christendom, he gave himself to the welfare of mankind, by securing civil and religious liberty through the operations of organic law. Though not a lawyer by profession, he drew frames of government and bodies of laws which have been the admiration of succeeding generations, and are destined to exert a benign influence in all future time, and by his discussions with Lord Baltimore and before the Lords in Council, he showed himself familiar with the abstruse principles of law. Though but a private person and of a despised sect, he was received as the friend and confidential advisee of the ruling sovereigns of England, and some of the principles which give luster to British law were engrafted there through the influence of the powerful intellect and benignant heart of Penn. He sought to know no philosophy but that promulgated by Christ and His disciples, and this he had sounded to its depths, and in it were anchored his ideas of public law and private and social living. The untamed savage of the forest bowed in meek and loving simplicity to his mild and resistless sway, and the members of the Society of Friends all over Europe flocked to his City of Brotherly Love. His prayers for the welfare of his people are the beginning and ending of all his public and private correspondence, and who will say that they have not been answered in the blessings which have attended the commonwealth of his founding? And will not the day of its greatness be when the inhabitants throughout all its borders shall return to the peaceful and loving spirit of Penn? In the midst of a licentious court, and with every prospect of advancement in its sunshine and favor, inheriting a great name and an independent patrimony, he turned aside from this brilliant track to make common lot with a poor sect under the ban of Government; endured stripes and imprisonment and loss of property; banished himself to the wilds of the American continent that he might secure to his people those devotions which seemed to them required by their Maker, and has won for himself a name by the simple deeds of love and humble obedience to Christian mandates which shall never perish. Many have won renown by deeds of blood, but fadeless glory has come to William Penn by charity.

SIR WILLIAM KEITH, 1717-26—PATRICK GORDON, 1736-36—JAMES LOGAN, 1736-38
—GEORGE THOMAS, 1738-47—ANTHONY PALMER, 1747-48—JAMES HAMILTON,

IN 1712, Penn had made a will, by which he devised to his only surviving son, William, by his first marriage, all his estates in England, amounting to sometwenty thousand pounds. By his first wife, Gulielma Maria Springett, he had issue of three sons—William, Springett and William, and four daughters—Gulielma, Margaret, Gulielma and Letitia; and by his second wife, Hannah Callowhill, of four sons—John, Thomas, Richard and Dennis. To his wife Hannah, who survived him, and whom he made the sole executrix of his will, he gave, for the equal benefit of herself and her children, all his personal estate in Pennsylvania and elsewhere, after paying all debts, and allotting ten thousand acres of land in the Province to his daughter Letitia, by his first marriage, and each of the three children of his son William.

Doubts having arisen as to the force of the provisions of this will, it was finally determined to institute a suit in chancery for its determination. Before a decision was reached, in March, 1720, William Penn, Jr., died, and while still pending, his son Springett died also. During the long pendency of this litigation for nine years, Hannah Penn, as executrix of the will, assumed the proprietary powers, issued instructions to her Lieutenant Governors, heard complaints and settled difficulties with the skill and the assurance of a veteran diplomatist. In 1727, a decision was reached that, upon the death of William Penn, Jr., and his son Springett, the proprietary rights in Pennsylvania descended to the three surviving sons—John, Thomas and Richard—issue by the second marriage; and that the proprietors bargain to sell his province to the crown for twelve thousand pounds, made in 1712, and on which one thousand pounds had been paid at the confirmation of the sale, was void. Whereupon the three sons became the joint proprietors.

A year before the death of Penn, the lunacy of Gov. Gookin having become troublesome, he was succeeded in the Government by Sir William Keith, a Scotchman who had served as Surveyor of Customs to the English Government, in which capacity he had visited Pennsylvania previously, and knew something of its condition. He was a man of dignified and commanding bearing, endowed with cunning, of an accommdating policy, full of faithful promises, and usually found upon the stronger side. Hence, upon his arrival in the colony, he did not summon the Assembly immediately, assigning as a reason in his first message that he did not wish to inconvenience the country members by calling them in harvest time. The disposition thus manifested to favor the people, and his advocacy of popular rights on several occasions in opposition to the claims of the proprietor, gave great satisfaction to the popular branch of the Legislature which manifested its appreciation of his conduct by voting him liberal salaries, which had often been withheld from his less accommodating predecessors. By his artful and insinuating policy, he induced the Assembly to pass two acts which had previously met with uncompromising opposition—one to establish a Court of Equity, with himself as Chancellor, the want of which had been seriously felt; and another, for organizing the militia. Though the soil was fruitful and produce was plentiful, yet, for lack of good markets, and on account of the meagerness of the circulating medium, prices were very low, the toil and sweat of the husbandman being little rewarded, and the taxes and payments on land were met with great difficulty. Accordingly, arrangements were made for the appointment of inspectors of provisions, who, from a conscientious discharge of duty, soon caused the Pennsylvania brands of best products to be much sought for, and to command ready sale at highest prices in the West Indies, whither most of the surplus produce was exported. A provision was also made for the issue of a limited amount of paper money, on the establishment of ample securities, which tended to raise the value of the products of the soil and of manufactures, and encourage industry.

By the repeated notices of the Governors in their messages to the Legislature previous to this time, it is evident that Indian hostilities had for sometime been threatened. The Potomac was the dividing line between the Northern and Southern Indians. But the young men on either side, when out in pursuit of game, often crossed the line of the river into the territory of the other, when fierce altercations ensued. This trouble had become so violent in 1719 as to threaten a great Indian war, in which the powerful confederation, known as the Five Nations, would take a hand. To avert this danger, which it was foreseen would inevitably involve the defenseless families upon the frontier, and perhaps the entire colony, Gov. Keith determined to use his best exertions. He accordingly made a toilsome journey in the spring of 1721 to confer with the Governor of Virginia and endeavor to employ by concert of action such means as would allay further cause of contention. His policy was well devised, and enlisted the favor of the Governor. Soon after his return, he summoned a council of Indian Chieftains to meet him at Conestoga, a point about seventy miles west of Philadelphia. He went in considerable pomp, attended by some seventy or eighty horsemen, gaily caparisoned, and many of them armed, arriving about noon, on the 4th of July, not then a day of more note than other days. He went immediately to Capt. Civility's cabin, where were assembled four deputies of the Five Nations and representatives of other tribes. The Governor said that he had come a long distance from home to see and speak to representatives of the Five Nations, who had never met the Governor of Pennsylvania. They said in reply that they had heard much of the Governor, and would have come sooner to pay him their respects, but that the wild conduct of some of their young men had made them ashamed to show their faces. In the formal meeting in the morning, Ghesaont, chief of the Senecas, spoke for all the Five Nations. He said that they now felt that they were speaking to the same effect that they would were William Penn before them, that they had not forgotten Penn, nor the treaties made with him, and the good advice he gave them; that though they could not write as do the English, yet they could keep all these transactions fresh in their memories. After laying down a belt of wampum upon the table as if by way of emphasis, he began again, declaring that "all their disorders arose from the use of rum and strong spirits, which took away their sense and memory, that they had no such liquors," and desired that no more be sent among them. Here he produced a bundle of dressed skins, by which he would say, "you see how much in earnest we are upon this matter of furnishing fiery liquors to us." Then he proceeds, declaring that the Five Nations remember all their ancient treaties, and they now desire that the chain of friendship may be made so strong that none of the links may ever be broken. This may have been a hint that they wanted high-piled and valuable presents; for the Quakers had made a reputation of brightening and strengthening the chain of friendship by valuable presents which had reached so far away as the Five Nations. He then produces a bundle of raw skins, and observes "that a chain may contract rust with laying and become weaker; wherefore, he desires it may now be so well cleaned as to remain brighter and stronger than ever it was before." Here he presents another parcel of skins, and continues, "that as in the firmament, all clouds and darkness are removed from the face of the sun, so they desire that all misunderstandings may be fully done away, so that when they, who are now here, shall be dead and gone, their whole people, with their children and posterity, may enjoy the clear sunshine with us forever." Presenting another bundle of skins, he says, "that, looking upon the Governor as if William Penn were present, they desire, that, in case any disorders should hereafter happen between their young people and ours, we would not be too hasty in resenting any such accident, until their Council and ours can have some opportunity to treat amicably upon it, and so to adjust all matters, as that the friendship between us may still be inviolably preserved." Here he produces a small parcel of dressed skins, and concludes by saying "that we may now be together as one people, treating one another's children kindly and affectionately, that they are fully empowered to speak for the Five Nations, and they look upon the Governor as the representative of the Great King of England, and therefore they expect that everything now stipulated will be made absolutely firm and good on both sides." And now he presents a different style of present and pulls out a bundle of bear skins, and proceeds to put in an item of complaint, that "they get too little for their skins and furs, so that they cannot live by hunting; they desire us, therefore, to take compassion on them, and contrive some way to help them in that particular. Then producing a few furs, he speaks only for himself, "to acquaint the Governor, that the Five Nations having heard that the Governor of Virginia wanted to speak with them, he himself, with some of his company intended to proceed to Virginia, but do not know the way how to get safe thither."

To this formal and adroitly conceived speech of the Seneca chief, Gov. Keith, after having brought in the present of stroud match coats, gunpowder, lead, biscuit, pipes and tobacco, adjourned the council till the following day, when, being assembled at Conestoga, he answered at length the items of the chieftain's speech. His most earnest appeal, however, was made in favor of peace. "I have persuaded all my [Indian] brethren, in these parts, to consider what is for their good, and not to go out any more to war; but your young men [Five Nations] as they come this way, endeavor to force them; and, because they incline to the counsels of peace, and the good advice of their true friends, your people use them ill, and often prevail with them to go out to their own destruction. Thus it was that their town of Conestoga lost their good king not long ago. Their young children are left without parents; their wives without husbands ; the old men, contrary to the course of nature, mourn the death of their young ; the people decay and grow weak ; we lose our dear friends and are afflicted. Surely you cannot propose to get either riches, or possessions, by going thus out to war ; for when you kill a deer, you have the flesh to eat, and the skin to sell : but when you return from war, you bring nothing home, but the scalp of a dead man, who perhaps was husband to a kind wife, and father to tender children, who never wronged you, though, by losing him, you have robbed them of their help and protection, and at the same time got nothing by it. If I were not your friend, I would not take the trouble to say all these things to you." When the Governor had concluded his address, he called the Senaca chieftain (Ghesaont) to him, and presented a gold coronation medal of King George I, which he requested should be taken to the monarch of the Five Nations, "Kannygooah," to be laid up and kept as a token to our children's children, that an entire and lasting friendship is now established forever between the English in this country and the great Five Nations." Upon the return of the Governor, he was met at the upper ferry of the Schuylkill, by the Mayor and Aldermen of the city, with about two hundred horse, and conducted through the streets after the manner of a conqueror of old returning from the scenes of his triumphs.

Gov. Keith gave diligent study to the subject of finance, regulating the currency in such a way that the planter should have it in his power to discharge promptly his indebtedness to the merchant, that their mutual interests might thus be subserved. He even proposed to establish a considerable settlement on his own account in the colony, in order to carry on manufactures, and thus consume the grain, of which there was at this time abundance, and no profitable market abroad.

In the spring of 1722, an Indian was barbarously murdered within the limits of the colony, which gave the Governor great concern. After having cautioned red men so strongly about keeping the peace, he felt that the honor of himself and all his people was compromised by this vile act. He immediately commissioned James Logan and John French to go to the scene of the murder above Conestoga, and inquire into the facts of the case, quickly apprehended the supposed murderers, sent a fast Indian runner (Satcheecho), to acquaint the Five Nations with his sorrow for the act, and of his determination to bring the guilty parties to justice, and himself set out with three of his Council (Hill, Norris and Hamilton), for Albany, where he had been invited by the Indians for a conference with the Governors of all the colonies, and where he met the chiefs of the Five Nations, and treated with them upon the subject of the murder, besides making presents to the Indians. It was on this occasion that the grand sachem of this great confederacy made that noble, and generous, and touching response, so different from the spirit of revenge generally attributed to the Indian character. It is a notable example of love that begets love, and of the mild answer that turneth away wrath. He said : "The great king of the Five Nations is sorry for the death of the Indian that was killed, for he was of his own flesh and blood. He believes that the Governor is also sorry ; but, now that it is done, there is no help for it, and he desires that Cartlidge [the murderer] may not be put to death, nor that he should be spared for a time, and afterward executed ; one life is enough to be lost ; there should not two die. The King's heart is good to the Governor and all the English."

Though Gov. Keith, during the early part of his term, pursued a pacific policy, yet the interminable quarrels which had been kept up between the Assembly and Council during previous administrations, at length broke out with more virulence than ever, and he who in the first flush of power had declared "That he should pass no laws, nor transact anything of moment relating to the public affairs without the advice and approbation of the Council," took it upon himself finally to act independently of the Council, and even went so far as to dismiss the able and trusted representative of the proprietary interests, James Logan, President of the Council and Secretary of the Province, from the duties of his high office, and even refused the request of Hannah Penn, the real Governor of the province, to re-instate him. This unwarrantable conduct cost him his dismissal from office in July, 1726. Why he should have assumed so headstrong and unwarrantable a course, who had promised at the first so mild and considerate a policy, it is difficult to understand, unless it be the fact that he found that the Council was blocking, by its obstinacy, wholesome legislation, which he considered of vital importance to the prosperity of the colony, and if, as he alleges, he found that the new constitution only gave the Council advisory and not a voice in executive power.

The administration of Gov. Keith was eminently successful, as he did not hesitate to grapple with important questions of judicature, finance, trade, commerce, and the many vexing relations with the native tribes, and right manfully, and judiciously did he effect their solution. It was at a time when the colony was filling up rapidly, and the laws and regulations which had been found ample for the management of a few hundred families struggling for a foothold in the forest, and when the only traffic was a few skins, were entirely inadequate for securing protection and prosperity to a seething and jostling population intent on trade and commerce, and the conflicting interests which required wise legislation and prudent management. No colony on the American coast made such progress in numbers and improvement as did Pennsylvania during the nine years in which William Keith exercised the Gubernatorial office. Though not himself a Quaker, he had secured the passage of an act of Assembly, and its royal affirmation for allowing the members of the Quaker sect to wear their hats in court, and give testimony under affirmation instead of oath, which in the beginning of the reign of Queen Anne had been withheld from them. After the expiration of his term of office, he was immediately elected a member of the Assembly, and was intent on being elected Speaker, "and had his support out-doors in a cavalcade of eighty mounted horsemen and the resounding of many guns fired;" yet David Lloyd was elected with only three dissenting voices. the out-door business having perhaps been overdone.

Upon the recommendation of Springett Penn, who was now the prospective heir to Pennsylvania, Patrick Gordon was appointed and confirmed Lieutenant Governor in place of Keith, and arrived in the colony and assumed authority in July, 1726. He had served in the army, and in his first address to the Assembly, which he met in August, he said that as he had been a soldier, he knew nothing of the crooked ways of professed politicians, and must rely on a straightforward manner of transacting the duties devolving upon him. George I died in June, 1727, and the Assembly at its meeting in October prepared and forwarded a congratulatory address to his successor, George II. By the decision of the Court of Chancery in 1727, Hannah Penn's authority over the colony was at an end, the proprietary interests having descended to John, Richard and Thomas Penn, the only surviving sons of William Penn, Sr. This period, from the death of Penn in 1718 to 1727, one of the most prosperous in the history of the colony, was familiarly known as the "Reign of Hannah and the Boys."

attention. In 1728, worthless bands, who had strayed away from their proper tribes, incited by strong drink, had become implicated in disgraceful broils, in which several were killed and wounded. The guilty parties were apprehended, but it was found difficult to punish Indian offenders without incurring the wrath of their relatives. Treaties were frequently renewed, on which occasions the chiefs expected that the chain of friendship would be polished "with English blankets, broadcloths and metals." The Indians found that this "brightening the chain" was a profitable business, which some have been uncharitable enough to believe was the moving cause of many of the Indian difficulties.

As early as 1732, the French, who were claiming all the territory drained by the Mississippi and its tributaries, on the ground of priority of discovery of its mouth and exploration of its channel, commenced erecting trading posts in Pennsylvania, along the Allegheny and Ohio Rivers, and invited the Indians living on these streams to a council for concluding treaties with them at Montreal, Canada. To neutralize the influence of the French, these Indians were summoned to meet in council at Philadelphia, to renew treaties of friendship, and they were invited to remove farther east. But this they were unwilling to do. A treaty was also concluded with the Six Nations, in which they pledged lasting friendship for the English.

Hannah Penn died in 1733, when the Assembly, supposing that the proprietary power was still in her hands, refused to recognize the power of Gov. Gordon. But the three sons, to whom the proprietary possessions had descended, in 1727, upon the decision of the Chancery case, joined in issuing a new commission to Gordon. In approving this commission the King directed a clause to be inserted, expressly reserving to himself the government of the lower counties. This act of the King was the beginning of those series of encroachments which finally culminated in the independence of the States of America. The Judiciary act of 1727 was annulled, and this was followed by an attempt to pass an act requiring the laws of all the colonies to be submitted to the Crown for approval before they should become valid, and that a copy of all laws previously enacted should be submitted for approval or veto. The agent of the Assembly, Mr. Paris, with the agents of other colonies, made so vigorous a defense, that action was for the time stayed.

In 1732, Thomas Penn, the youngest son, and two years later, John Penn, the eldest, and the only American born, arrived in the Province, and were received with every mark of respect and satisfaction. Soon after the arrival of the latter, news was brought that Lord Baltimore had made application to have the Provinces transferred to his colony. A vigorous protest was made against this by Quakers in England, headed by Richard Penn; but lest this protest might prove ineffectual, John Penn very soon went to England to defend the proprietary rights at court, and never again returned, he having died a bachelor in 1746. In August, 1736, Gov. Gordon died, deeply lamented, as an honest, upright and straightforward executive, a character which he expressed the hope he would be able to maintain when he assumed authority. His term had been one of prosperity, and the colony had grown rapidly in numbers, trade, commerce and manufactures, ship-building especially having assumed extensive proportions.

James Logan was President of the Council and in effect Governor, during the two years which elapsed between the death of Gordon and the arrival of his successor. The Legislature met regularly, but no laws were passed for lack of an executive. It was during this period that serious trouble broke out near the Maryland border, west of the Susquehanna, then Lancaster, now York County. A number of settlers, in order to evade the payment of taxes, had secured titles to their lands from Maryland, and afterward sought to be reinstated in their rights under Pennsylvania authority, and plead protection from the latter. The Sheriff of the adjoining Maryland County, with 300 followers, advanced to drive these settlers from their homes. On hearing of this movement, Samuel Smith, Sheriff of Lancaster County, with a hastily summoned posse, advanced to protect the citizens in their rights. Without a conflict, an agreement was entered into by both parties to retire. Soon afterward, however, a band of fifty Marylanders again entered the State with the design of driving out the settlers and each securing for himself 200 acres of land. They were led by one Cressap. The settlers made resistance, and in an encounter, one of them by the name of Knowles was killed. The Sheriff of Lancaster again advanced with a posse, and in a skirmish which ensued one of the invaders was killed, and the leader Cressap was wounded and taken prisoner. The Governor of Maryland sent a commission to Philadelphia to demand the release of the prisoner. Not succeeding in this, he seized four of the settlers and incarcerated them in the jail at Baltimore. Still determined to effect their purpose, a party of Marylanders, under the leadership of one Higginbotham, advanced into Pennsylvania and began a warfare upon the settlers. Again the Sheriff of Lancaster appeared upon the scene, and drove out the invaders. So stubbornly were these invasions pushed and resented that the season passed without planting or securing the usual crops. Finally a party of sixteen Marylanders, led by Richard Lowden, broke into the Lancaster jail and liberated the Maryland prisoners. Learning of these disturbances, the King in Council issued an order restraining both parties from further acts of violence, and afterward adopted a plan of settlement of the vexed boundary question.

Though not legally Governor, Logan managed the affairs of the colony with great prudence and judgment, as he had done and continued to do for a period of nearly a half century. He was a scholar well versed in the ancient languages and the sciences, and published several learned works in the Latin tongue. His Experimenta Meletemata de plantarum generatione, written in Latin, was published at Leyden in 1739, and afterward, in 1747, republished in London, with an English version on the opposite page by Dr. J. Fothergill. Another work of his in Latin was also published at Leyden, entitled, Canonum pro inveniendis refractionum, tum simplicium tum in lentibus duplicum focus, demonstrationis geometricae. After retiring from public business, he lived at his country seat at Stenton, near Germantown, where he spent his time among his books and in correspondence with the literati of Europe. In his old age he made an English translation of Cicero's De Senectute, which was printed at Philadelphia in 1744 with a preface by Benjamin Franklin, then rising into notice. Logan was a Quaker, of Scotch descent, though born in Ireland, and came to America in the ship with William Penn, in his second visit in 1699, when about twenty-five years old, and died at seventy-seven. He had held the offices of Chief Commissioner of property, Agent for the purchase and sale of lands, Receiver General, Member of Council, President of Council and Chief Justice. He was the Confidential Agent of Penn, having charge of all his vast estates, making sales of lands, executing conveyances, and making collections. Amidst all the great cares of business so pressing as to make him exclaim, "I know not what any of the comforts of life are," he found time to devote to the delights of learning, and collected a large library of standard works, which he bequeathed, at his death, to the people of Pennsylvania, and is known as the Loganian Library.

George Thomas, a planter from the West Indies, was appointed Governor in 1737, but did not arrive in the colony till the following year. His first care was to settle the disorders in the Cumberland Valley, and it was finally agreed that settlers from either colony should owe allegiance to the Governor of that colony wherever settled, until the division line which had been provided for was surveyed and marked. War was declared on the 23d of October, 1739, between Great Britain and Spain. Seeing that his colony was liable to be encroached upon by the enemies of his government, he endeavored to organize the militia, but the majority of the Assembly was of the peace element, and it could not be induced to vote money. Finally he was ordered by the home government to call for volunteers, and eight companies were quickly formed, and sent down for the coast defense. Many of these proved to be servants for whom pay was demanded and finally obtained. In 1740, the great evangelist, Whitefield, visited the colony, and created a deep religious interest among all denominations. In his first intercourse with the Assembly, Gov. Thomas endeavored to coerce it to his views. But a more stubborn set of men never met in a deliberative body than were gathered in this Assembly at this time. Finding that he could not compel action to his mind, he yielded and consulted their views and decisions. The Assembly, not to be outdone in magnanimity, voted him £1,500 arrearages of salary, which had been withheld because he would not approve their legislation, asserting that public acts should take precedence of appropriations for their own pay. In March, 1744, war was declared between Great Britain and France. Volunteers were called for, and 10,000 men were rapidly enlisted and armed at their own expense. Franklin, recognizing the defenseless condition of the colony, issued a pamphlet entitled Plain Truth, in which he cogently urged the necessity of organized preparation for defense. Franklin was elected Colonel of one of the regiments, but resigned in favor of Alderman Lawrence. On the 5th of May, 1747, the Governor communicated intelligence of the death of John Penn, the eldest of the proprietors, to the Assembly, and his own intention to retire from the duties of his office on account of declining health.

Anthony Palmer was President of the Council at the time of the withdrawal of Gordon, and became the Acting Governor. The peace party in the Assembly held that it was the duty of the crown of England to protect the colony, and that for the colony to call out volunteers and become responsible for their payment was burdening the people with an expense which did not belong to them, and which the crown was willing to assume. The French were now deeply intent on securing firm possession of the Mississippi Valley and the entire basin, even to the summits of the Alleghanies in Pennsylvania, and were busy establishing trading posts along the Ohio and Allegheny Rivers. They employed the most artful means to win the simple natives to their interests, giving showy presents and laboring to convince them of their great value. Pennsylvania had won a reputation among the Indians of making presents of substantial worth. Not knowing the difference between steel and iron, the French distributed immense numbers of worthless iron hatchets, which the natives supposed were the equal of the best English steel axes. The Indians, however, soon came to distinguish between the good and the valueless. Understanding the Pennsylvania methods of securing peace and friendship, the natives became very artful in drawing out "well piled up" presents. The government at this time was alive to the dangers which threatened from the insinuating methods of the French. A trusty messenger, Conrad Weiser, was sent among the Indians in the western part of the province to observe the plans of the French, ascertain the temper of the natives, and especially to magnify the power of the English, and the disposition of Pennsylvania to give great presents. This latter policy had the desired effect, and worthless and wandering bands, which had no right to speak for the tribe, came teeming in, desirous of scouring the chain of friendship, intimating that the French were making great offers, in order to induce the government to large liberality, until this "brightening the chain," became an intolerable nuisance. At a single council held at Albany, in 1747, Pennsylvania distributed goods to the value of £1,000, and of such a character as should be most serviceable to the recipients, not worthless gew-gaws, but such as would contribute to their lasting comfort and well being, a protection to the person against the bitter frosts of winter, and sustenance that should minister to the steady wants of the body and alleviation of pain in time of sickness. The treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, which was concluded on the 1st of October, 1748, secured peace between Great Britain and France, and should have put an end to all hostile encounters between their representatives on the American continent. Palmer remained at the head of the government for a little more than two years. He was a retired merchant from the West Indies, a man of wealth, and had come into the colony in 1708. He lived in a style suited to a gentleman, kept a coach and a pleasure barge.

On the 23d of November, 1748, James Hamilton arrived in the colony from England, bearing the commission of Lieutenant Governor. He was born in America, son of Andrew Hamilton, who had for many years been Speaker of the Assembly. The Indians west of the Susquehanna had complained that settlers had come upon their best lands, and were acquiring titles to them, whereas the proprietors had never purchased these lands of them, and had no claim to them. The first care of Hamilton was to settle these disputes, and allay the rising excitement of the natives. Richard Peters, Secretary of the colony, a man of great prudence and ability, was sent in company with the Indian interpreter, Conrad Weiser, to remove the intruders. It was firmly and fearlessly done, the settlers giving up their tracts and the cabins which they had built, and accepting lands on the east side of the river. The hardship was in many cases great, but when they were in actual need, the Secretary gave money and placed them upon lands of his own, having secured a tract of 2,000,000 of acres.

But these troubles were of small consequence compared with those that were threatening from the West. Though the treaty of Aix was supposed to have settled all difficulties between the two courts, the French were determined to occupy the whole territory drained by the Mississippi, which they claimed by priority of discovery by La Salle. The British Ambassador at Paris entered complaints before the French Court that encroachments were being made by the French upon English soil in America, which were politely heard, and promises made of restraining the French in Canada from encroaching upon English territory. Formal orders were sent out from the home government to this effect; but at the same time secret intimations were conveyed to them that their conduct in endeavoring to secure and hold the territory in dispute was not displeasing to the government, and that disobedience of these orders would not incur its displeasure. The French deemed it necessary, in order to establish a legal claim to the country, to take formal possession of it. Accordingly, the Marquis de la Galissoniere, who was at this time Governor General of Canada, dispatched Capt. Bienville de Céleron with a party of 215 French and fifty-five Indians, to publicly proclaim possession, and bury at prominent points plates of lead bearing inscriptions declaring occupation in the name of the French King. Céleron started on the 15th of June, 1749, from La Chine, following the southern shores of Lakes Ontario and Erie, until he reached a point opposite Lake Chautauqua, where the boats were drawn up and were taken bodily over the dividing ridge, a distance of ten miles, with all the impedimenta of the expedition, the pioneers having first opened a road. Following on down the lake and the Conewango Creek, they arrived at Warren near the confluence of the creek with the Allegheny River. Here the first plate was buried. These plates were eleven inches long, seven and a half wide, and one-eighth of an inch thick. The inscription was in French, and in the following terms, as fairly translated into English: "In the year 1749, of the reign of Louis XIV, King of France, We Céleron, commander of a detachment sent by Monsieur the Marquis de la Galissonnière, Governor General of New France, to re-establish tranquillity in some Indian villages of these cantons, have buried this plate of lead at the confluence of the Ohio with the Chautauqua, this 29th day of July, near the River Ohio, otherwise Belle Rivière, as a monument of the renewal of the possession we have taken of the said River Ohio, and of all those which empty into it, and of all the lands on both sides as far as the sources of the said river, as enjoyed or ought to have been enjoyed by the King of France preceding, and as they have there maintained themselves by arms and by treaties, especially those of Ryswick, Utrecht and Aix-la-Chapelle." The burying of this plate was attended with much form and ceremony. All the men and officers of the expedition were drawn up in battle array, when the Commander, Céleron, proclaimed in a loud voice, "Vive le Roi," and declared that possession of the country was now taken in the name of the King. A plate on which was inscribed the arms of France was affixed to the nearest tree.

The same formality was observed in planting each of the other plates, the second at the rock known as the "Indian God," on which are ancient and unknown inscriptions, a few miles below Franklin, a third at the mouth of Wheeling Creek; a fourth at the mouth of the Muskingum; a fifth at the mouth of the Great Kanawha, and the sixth and last at the mouth of the Great Miami. Toilsomely ascending the Miami to its head-waters, the party burned their canoes, and obtained ponies for the march across the portage to the head-waters of the Maumee, down which and by Lakes Erie and Ontario they returned to Fort Frontenac, arriving on the 6th of November. It appears that the Indians through whose territory they passed viewed this planting of plates with great suspicion. By some means they got possession of one of them, generally supposed to have been stolen from the party at the very commencement of their journey from the mouth of the Chautauqua Creek.

Mr. O. H. Marshall, in an excellent monograph upon this expedition, made up from the original manuscript journal of Céleron and the diary of Father Bonnacamps, found in the Department de la Marine, in Paris, gives the following account of this stolen plate:

"The first of the leaden plates was brought to the attention of the public by Gov. George Clinton to the Lords of Trade in London, dated New York, December 19, 1750, in which he states that he would send to their Lordships in two or three weeks a plate of lead full of writing, which some of the upper nations of Indians stole from Jean Coeur, the French interpreter at Niagara, on his way to the River Ohio, which river, and all the lands thereabouts, the French claim, as will appear by said writing. He further states 'that the lead plate gave the Indians so much uneasiness that they immediately dispatched some of the Cayuga chiefs to him with it, saying that their only reliance was on him, and earnestly begged he would communicate the contents to them, which he had done, much to their satisfaction and the interests of the English.'

The Governor concludes by saying that 'the contents of the plate may be of great importance in clearing up the encroachments which the French have made on the British Empire in America.' The plate was delivered to Colonel, afterward Sir William Johnson, on the 4th of December, 1750, at his residence on the Mohawk, by a Cayuga sachem, who accompanied it by the following speech:

"Brother Corlear and War-ragh-i-ya-ghey! I am sent here by the Five Nations with a piece of writing which the Senecas, our brethren, got by some artifice from Jean Coeur, earnestly beseeching you will let us know what it means, and as we put all our confidence in you, we hope you will explain it ingeniously to us.'

"Col. Johnson replied to the sachem, and through him to the Five Nations, returning a belt of wampum, and explaining the inscription on the plate. He told them that 'it was a matter of the greatest consequence, involving the possession of their lands and hunting grounds, and that Jean Coeur and the French ought immediately to be expelled from the Ohio and Niagara.' In reply, the sachem said that 'he had heard with great attention and surprise the substance of the "devilish writing" he had brought, and that Col. Johnson's remarks were fully approved.' He promised that belts from each of the Five Nations should be sent from the Seneca's castle to the Indians at the Ohio, to warn and strengthen them against the French encroachments in that direction." On the 29th of January, 1751, Clinton sent a copy of this inscription to Gov. Hamilton, of Pennsylvania.

The French followed up this formal act of possession by laying out a line of military posts, on substantially the same line as that pursued by the Céleoron expedition; but, instead of crossing over to Lake Chautauqua, they kept on down to Presque Isle (now Erie), where was a good harbor, where a fort was established, and thence up to Le Boeuf (now Waterford), where another post was placed; thence down the Venango River (French Creek) to its mouth at Franklin, establishing Fort Venango there; thence by the Allegheny to Pittsburgh, where Fort Du Quesne was seated, and so on down the Ohio.

To counteract this activity of the French, the Ohio Company was chartered, and a half million of acres was granted by the crown, to be selected mainly on the south side of the Ohio, between the Monongalia and Kanawha Rivers, and the condition made that settlements (100 families within seven years), protected by a fort, should be made. The company consisted of a number of Virginia and Maryland gentlemen, of whom Lawrence Washington was one, and Thomas Hanbury, of London.

In 1752, a treaty was entered into with the Indians, securing the right of occupancy, and twelve families, headed by Capt. Gist, established themselves upon the Monongalia, and subsequently commenced the erection of a fort, where the city of Pittsburgh now is. Apprised of this intrusion into the very heart of the territory which they were claiming, the French built a fort at Le Boeuf, and strengthened the post at Franklin.

These proceedings having been promptly reported to Lieut. Gov. Dinwiddie, of Virginia, where the greater number of the stockholders of the Ohio Company resided, he determined to send an official communication—protesting against the forcible interference with their chartered rights, granted by the crown of Britain, and pointing to the late treaties of peace entered into between the English and French, whereby it was agreed that each should respect the colonial possessions of the other—to the Commandant of the French, who had his headquarters at Fort Le Boeuf, fifteen miles inland from the present site of the city of Erie.

But who should be the messenger to execute this delicate and responsible duty? It was winter, and the distance to be traversed was some 500 miles, through an unbroken wilderness, cut by rugged mountain chains and deep and rapid streams. It was proposed to several, who declined, and was finally accepted by George Washington, a youth barely twenty-one years old. On the last day of November, 1753, he bade adieu to civilization, and pushing on through the forest to the settlements on the Monongalia, where he was joined by Capt. Gist, followed up the Allegheny to Fort Venango (now Franklin); thence up the Venango to its head-waters at Fort Le Boeuf, where he held formal conference with the French Commandant, St. Pierre. The French officer had been ordered to hold this territory on the score of the discovery of the Mississippi by La Salle, and he had no discretion but to execute his orders, and referred Washington to his superior, the Governor General of Canada. Making careful notes of the location and strength of the post and those encountered on the way, the young ambassador returned, being twice fired at on his journey by hostile Indians, and near losing his life by being thrown into the freezing waters of the Allegheny. Upon his arrival, he made a full report of the embassy, which was widely published in this country and in England, and was doubtless the basis upon which action was predicted that eventuated in a long and sanguinary war, which finally resulted in the expulsion of the power of France from this continent.

Satisfied that the French were determined to hold the territory upon the Ohio by force of arms, a body of 150 men, of which Washington was second in command, was sent to the support of the settlers. But the French, having the Allegheny River at flood-tide on which to move, and Washington, without means of transportation, having a rugged and mountainous country to overcome, the former first reached the point of destination. Contracoeur, the French commander, with 1,000 men and field pieces on a fleet of sixty boats and 300 canoes, dropped down the Allegheny and easily seized the fort then being constructed by the Ohio Company at its mouth, and proceeded to erect there an elaborate work which he called Fort Du Quesne, after the Governor General. Informed of this proceeding, Washington pushed forward, and finding that a detachment of the French was in his immediate neighborhood, he made a forced march by night, and coming upon them unawares killed and captured the entire party save one. Ten of the French, including their commander, Jumonville, were killed, and twenty-one made prisoners. Col. Fry, the commander of the Americans, died at Will's Creek, where the command devolved on Washington. Though re-enforcements had been dispatched from the several colonies in response to the urgent appeals of Washington, none reached him but one company of 100 men under Capt. Maskay from South Carolina. Knowing that he was confronting a vastly superior force of the French, well supplied with artillery, he threw up works at a point called the Great Meadows, which he characterizes as a "charming field for an encounter," naming his hastily built fortification Fort Necessity. Stung by the loss of their leader, the French came out in strong force and soon invested the place. Unfortunately one part of Washington's position was easily commanded by the artillery of the French, which they were not slow in taking advantage of. The action opened on the 3d of July, and was continued till late at night. A capitulation was proposed by the French commander, which Washington reluctantly accepted, seeing all hope of re-enforcements reaching him, cut off, and on the 4th of July marched out with honors of war and fell back to Fort Cumberland.

Gov. Hamilton had strongly recommended, before hostilities opened, that the Assembly should provide for defense and establish a line of block-houses along the frontier. But the Assembly, while willing to vote money for buying peace from the Indians, and contributions to the British crown, from which protection was claimed, was unwilling to contribute directly for even defensive warfare. In a single year, £8,000 were voted for Indian gratuities. The proprietors were appealed to to aid in bearing this burden. But while they were willing to contribute liberally for defense, they would give nothing for Indian gratuities. They sent to the colony cannon to the value of £400.

In February, 1753, John Penn, grandson of the founder, son of Richard, arrived in the colony, and as a mark of respect was immediately chosen a member of the Council and made its President. In consequence of the defeat of Washington at Fort Necessity, Gov. Hamilton convened the Assembly in extra session on the 6th of August, at which money was freely voted; but owing to the instructions given by the proprietors to their Deputy Governor not to sign any money bill that did not place the whole of the interest at their disposal, this action of the Assembly was abortive.

The English and French nations made strenuous exertions to strengthen their forces in America for the campaigns sure to be undertaken in 1754. The French, by being under the supreme authority of one governing power, the Governor General of Canada, were able to concentrate and bring all their power of men and resources to bear at the threatened point with more celerity and certainty than the English, who were dependent upon colonies scattered along all the sea board, and upon Legislatures penny-wise in voting money. To remedy these inconveniences, the English Government recommended a congress of all the colonies, together with the Six Nations, for the purpose of concerting plans for efficient defense. This Congress met on the 19th of June, 1754, the first ever convened in America. The Representatives from Pennsylvania were John Penn and Richard Peters for the Council, and Isaac Norris and Benjamin Franklin for the Assembly. The influence of the powerful mind of Franklin was already beginning to be felt, he having been Clerk of the Pennsylvania Assembly since 1736, and since 1750 had been a member. Heartily sympathizing with the movers in the purposes of this Congress, he came to Albany with a scheme of union prepared, which, having been presented and debated, was, on the 10th of July, adopted substantially as it came from his hands. It provided for the appointment of a President General by the Crown, and an Assembly of forty-eight members to be chosen by the several Colonial Assemblies. The plan was rejected by both parties in interest, the King considering the power vested in the representatives of the people too great, and every colony rejecting it because the President General was given "an influence greater than appeared to them proper in a plan of government intended for freemen."

CHAPTER X.

ROBERT H. MORRIS, 1754-56—WILLIAM DENNY, 1756-59—JAMES HAMILTON, 1759-63.

FINDING himself in a false position by the repugnant instructions of the proprietors, Gov. Hamilton had given notice in 1753, that, at the end of twelve months from its reception, he would resign. Accordingly in October, 1754, he was succeeded by Robert Hunter Morris, son of Lewis Morris, Chief Justice of New York and New Jersey, and Governor of New Jersey. The son was bred a lawyer, and was for twenty-six years Councilor, and twenty Chief Justice of New Jersey. The Assembly, at its first session, voted a money bill, for £40,000, but not having the proviso required by the proprietors, it was vetoed. Determined to push military operations, the British Government had called early in the year for 3,000 volunteers from Pennsylvania, with subsistence, camp equipage and transportation, and had sent two regiments of the line, under Gen. Braddock, from Cork, Ireland. Landing at Alexandria, Va., he marched to Frederick, Md., where, finding no supplies of transportation, he halted. The Assembly of Pennsylvania had voted to borrow £5,000, on its own account, for the use of the crown in prosecuting the campaign, and had sent Franklin, who was then Postmaster General for the colonies, to Braddock to aid in prosecuting the expedition. Finding that the army was stopped for lack of transportation, Franklin returned into Pennsylvania, and by his commanding influence soon secured the necessary wagons and beasts of burden.

Braddock had formed extravagant plans for his campaign. He would march forward and reduce Fort Du Quesne, thence proceed against Fort Niagara, which having conquered he would close a season of triumphs by the capture of Fort Frontignace. But this is not the first time in warfare that the result of a campaign has failed to realize the promises of the manifesto. The orders brought by Braddock giving precedence of officers of the line over provincials gave offense, and Washington among others threw up his commission; but enamored of the profession of arms, he accepted a position offered him by Braddock as Aide-de-camp. Accustomed to the discipline of military establishments in old, long-settled countries, Braddock had little conception of making war in a wilderness with only Indian trails to move upon, and against wily savages. Washington had advised to push forward with pack horses, and, by rapidity of movement, forestall ample preparation. But Braddock had but one way of soldiering, and where roads did not exist for wagons he stopped to fell the forest and construct bridges over streams. The French, who were kept advised of every movement, made ample preparations to receive him. In the meantime, Washington fell sick; but intent on being up for the battle, he hastened forward as soon as sufficiently recovered, and only joined the army on the day before the fatal engagement. He had never seen much of the pride and circumstance of war, and when, on the morning of the 9th of July, the army of Braddock marched on across the Monongahela, with gay colors flying and martial music awakening the echoes of the forest, he was accustomed in after years to speak of it as the "most magnificent spectacle" that he had ever beheld. But the gay pageant was destined to be of short duration; for the army had only marched a little distance before it fell into an ambuscade skillfully laid by the French and Indians, and the forest resounded with the unearthly whoop of the Indians, and the continuous roar of musketry. The advance was checked and thrown into confusion by the French from their well-chosen position, and every tree upon the flanks of the long drawn out line concealed a murderous foe, who with unerring aim picked off the officers. A resolute defense was made, and the battle raged with great fury for three hours; but the fire of the English was ineffectual because directed against an invisible foe. Finally, the mounted officers having all fallen, killed or wounded, except Washington, being left without leaders, panic seized the survivors and "they ran," says Washington, "before the French and English like sheep before dogs." Of 1,460, in Braddock's army, 456 were killed, and 421 wounded, a greater mortality, in proportion to the number engaged, than has ever occurred in the annals of modern warfare. Sir Peter Halkett was killed, and Braddock mortally wounded and brought off the field only with the greatest difficulty. When Orme and Morris, the other aids, fell, Washington acted alone with the greatest gallantry. In writing to his brother, he said: "I have been protected beyond all human probability or expectation; for I had four bullets through my coat, and two horses shot under me; yet I escaped unhurt, though death was leveling my companions on every side." In after years, when Washington visited the Great Kanawha country, he was approached by an Indian chieftain who said that in this battle he had fired his rifle many times at Washington and had told his young men to do the same; but when he saw that his bullets had no apparent effect, he had bidden them to desist, believing that the Great Spirit was protecting him.

The panic among the survivors of the English carried them back upon the reserve, commanded by Gen. Dunbar, who seems himself to have been seized with it, and without attempting to renew the campaign and return to the encounter, he joined in the flight which was not stayed until Fort Cumberland was reached. The French were anticipating a renewal of the struggle; but when they found that the English had fled leaving the frontier all unprotected, they left no stone unturned in whetting the minds of the savages for the work of plunder and blood, and in organizing relentless bands to range at will along all the wide frontier. The Indians could not be induced to pursue the retreating English, but fell to plundering the field. Nearly everything was lost, even to the camp chest of Braddock. The wounded General was taken back to the summit of Laurel Hill, where, four days after, he breathed his last. He was buried in the middle of the road, and the army marched over his grave that it might not be discovered or molested by the natives. The easy victory, won chiefly by the savages, served to encourage them in their fell work, in which, when their passions were aroused, no known people on earth were less touched by pity. The unprotected settler in his wilderness home was the easy prey of the torch and the scalping knife, and the burning cabin lit up the somber forests by their continuous blaze, and the shrieks of women and children resounded from the Hudson to the far Potomac. Before the defeat of Braddock, there were 3,000 men capable of bearing arms west of the Susquehanna. In six months after, there were scarcely 100.

Gov. Morris made an earnest appeal to the Assembly for money to ward off the impending enemy and protect the settlers, in response to which the Assembly voted £50,000; but having no exemption of the proprietor's estates, it was rejected by the Governor, in accordance with his original instructions. Expeditions undertaken against Nova Scotia and at Crown Point were more fortunate than that before Du Quesne, and the Assembly voted £15,000 in bills of credit to aid in defraying the expense. The proprietors sent £5,000 as a gratuity, not as any part of expense that could of right be claimed of them.

In this hour of extremity, the Indians for the most part showed themselves a treacherous race, ever ready to take up on the stronger side. Even the Shawanese and Delawares, who had been loudest in their protestations of friendship for the English and readiness to fight for them, no sooner saw the French victorious than they gave ready ear to their advice to strike for the recovery of the lands which they had sold to the English.

In this pressing emergency, while the Governor and Assembly were waging a fruitless war of words over money bills, the pen of Franklin was busy in infusing a wholesome sentiment in the minds of the people. In a pamphlet that he issued, which he put in the familiar form of a dialogue, he answered the objections which had been urged to a legalized militia, and willing to show his devotion by deeds as well as words, he accepted the command upon the frontier. By his exertions, a respectable force was raised, and though in the dead of winter, he commenced the erection of a line of forts and block-houses along the whole range of the Kittatinny Hills, from the Delaware to the Potomac, and had them completed and garrisoned with a body sufficient to withstand any force not provided with artillery. In the spring, he turned over the command to Col. Clapham, and returning to Philadelphia took his seat in the Assembly. The Governor now declared war against the Indians, who had established their headquarters thirty miles above Harris' Ferry, on the Susquehanna, and were busy in their work of robbery and devastation, having secured the greater portion of the crops of the previous season of the settlers whom they had killed or driven out. The peace party strongly objected to the course of the Governor, and voluntarily going among the Indians induced them to bury the hatchet. The Assembly which met in May, 1756, prepared a bill with the old clause for taxing the proprietors, as any other citizens, which the Governor was forbidden to approve by his instructions, "and the two parties were sharpening their wits for another wrangle over it," when Gov. Morris was superseded by William Denny, who arrived in the colony and assumed authority on the 20th of August, 1756. He was joyfully and cordially received, escorted through the streets by the regiments of Franklin and Duché, and royally feasted at the State House.

But the promise of efficient legislation was broken by an exhibition of the new Governor's instructions, which provided that every bill for the emission of money must place the proceeds at the joint disposal of the Governor and Assembly; paper currency could not be issued in excess of £40,000, nor could existing issues be confirmed unless proprietary rents were paid in sterling money; proprietary lands were permitted to be taxed which had been actually leased, provided that the taxes were paid out of the rents, but the tax could not become a lien upon the land. In the first Assembly, the contention became as acrimonious as ever.

Previous to the departure of Gov. Morris, as a retaliatory act he had issued a proclamation against the hostile Indians, providing for the payment of bounties: For every male Indian enemy above twelve years old, who shall be taken prisoner and delivered at any forts, garrisoned by troops in pay of this province, or to any of the county towns to the keepers of the common jails there, the sum of one hundred and fifty Spanish dollars or pieces of eight; for the scalp of every male Indian above the age of twelve years, produced as evidence of their being killed, the sum of one hundred and thirty pieces of eight; for every female Indian taken prisoner and brought in as aforesaid, and for every male Indian under the age of twelve years, taken and brought in, one hundred and thirty pieces of eight; for the scalp of every Indian woman produced as evidence of their being killed, the sum of fifty pieces of eight." Liberal bounties were also offered for the delivering up of settlers who had been carried away captive.

But the operation which had the most wholesome and pacifying effect upon the savages, and caused them to stop in their mad career and consider the chances of war and the punishment they were calling down upon their own heads, though executed under the rule of Gov. Denny, was planned and provided for, and was really a part of the aggressive and vigorous policy of Gov. Morris. In response to the act of Assembly, providing for the calling out and organizing the militia, twenty-five companies were recruited, and had been stationed along the line of posts that had been established for the defense of the frontiers. At Kittanning, on the Allegheny River, the Indians had one of the largest of their towns in the State, and was a recruiting station and rallying point for sending out their murderous bands. The plan proposed and adopted by Gov. Morris, and approved and accepted by Gov. Denny, was to send out a strong detachment from the militia for the reduction of this stronghold. Accordingly, in August, 1756, Col. Armstrong, with a force of three hundred men, made a forced march, and, arriving unperceived in the neighborhood of the town, sent the main body by a wide detour from above, to come in upon the river a few hundred yards below. At 3 o'clock on the morning of the 7th of September, the troops had gained their position undiscovered, and at dawn the attack was made. Shielded from view by the tall corn which covered all the flats, the troops were able to reach in close proximity to the cabins unobserved. Jacobs, the chief, sounded the war-whoop, and made a stout resistance, keeping up a rapid fire from the loop holes in his cabin. Not desiring to push his advantage to the issue of no quarter, Armstrong called on the savages to surrender; but this they refused to do, declaring that they were men and would never be prisoners. Finding that they would not yield, and that they were determined to sell their lives at the dearest rate, he gave orders to fire the huts, and the whole town was soon wrapt in flames. As the heat began to reach the warriors, some sung, while wrung with the death agonies; others broke for the river and were shot down as they fled. Jacobs, in attempting to climb through a window, was killed. All calls for surrender were received with derision, one declaring that he did not care for death, and that he could kill four or five before he died. Gunpowder, small arms and valuable goods which had been distributed to them only the day before by the French, fell into the hands of the victors. The triumph was complete, few if any escaping to tell the sad tale. Col. Armstrong's celerity of movement and well conceived and executed plan of action were publicly acknowledged, and he was voted a medal and plate by the city of Philadelphia.

The finances of the colony, on account of the repeated failures of the money bills, were in a deplorable condition. Military operations could not be carried on and vigorous campaigns prosecuted without ready money. Accordingly, in the first meeting of the Assembly after the arrival of the new Governor, a bill was passed levying £100,000 on all property alike, real and personal, private and proprietary. This Gov. Denny vetoed. Seeing that money must be had, the Assembly finally passed a bill exempting the proprietary estates, but determined to lay their grievances before the Crown. To this end, two Commissioners were appointed, Isaac Norris and Benjamin Franklin, to proceed to England and beg the interference of the royal Government in their behalf. Failing health and business engagements of Norris prevented his acceptance, and Franklin proceeded alone. He had so often defended the Assembly in public and in drawing remonstrances that the whole subject was at his fingers' ends.

Military operations throughout the colonies, during the year 1757, conducted under the command of the Earl of Loudoun were sluggish, and resulted only in disaster and disgrace. The Indians were active in Pennsylvania, and kept the settlers throughout nearly all the colonies in a continual ferment, hostile bands stealing in upon the defenseless inhabitants as they went to their plantings and sowings, and greatly interfering with or preventing altogether the raising of the ordinary crops. In 1758, Loudoun was recalled, and Gen. Abercrombie was given chief command, with Wolfe, Amherst and Forbes as his subordinates. It was determined to direct operations simultaneously upon three points—Fort Du Quesne, Louisburg and the forts upon the great lakes. Gen. Forbes commanded the forces sent against Fort Du Quesne. With a detachment of royal troops, and militia from Pennsylvania and Virginia, under command of Cols. Bouquet and Washington, his column moved in July, 1758. The French were well ordered for receiving the attack, and the battle in front of the fort raged with great fury; but they were finally driven, and the fort, with its munitions, fell into the hands of the victors, and was garrisoned by 400 Pennsylvanians. Returning, Forbes placed his remaining forces in barracks at Lancaster.

Franklin, upon his arrival in England, presented the grievances before the proprietors, and, that he might get his case before the royal advisers and the British public, wrote frequent articles for the press, and issued a pamphlet entitled "Historical Review of the Constitution and Government of Pennsylvania." The dispute was adroitly managed by Franklin before the Privy Council, and was finally decided substantially in the interest of the Assembly. It was provided that the proprietors' estates should be taxed, but that their located uncultivated lands should be assessed as low as the lowest uncultivated lands of the settlers, that bills issued by the Assembly should be receivable in payment of quit rents, and that the Deputy Governor should have a voice in disposing of the revenues. Thus was a vexed question of long standing finally put to rest. So successfully had Franklin managed this controversy that the colonies of Massachusetts, Maryland and Georgia appointed him their agent in England.

In October, 1759, James Hamilton was again appointed Governor, in place of Gov. Denny, who had by stress of circumstances transcended his instructions. The British Government, considering that the colonies had borne more than their proportionate expense in carrying on the war against the French and Indians, voted £200,000 for five years, to be divided among the colonies, the share falling to Pennsylvania being £26,000. On the 25th of October, 1760, George II died, and was succeeded by his grandson, George III. Early in 1762, war was declared between Great Britain and Spain, but was of short continuance, peace having been declared in November following, by which Spain and France relinquished to the English substantially the territory east of the Mississippi. The wise men of the various Indian nations inhabiting this wide territory viewed with concern this sudden expansion of English power, fearing that they would eventually be pushed from their hunting grounds and pleasant haunts by the rapidly multiplying pale faces. The Indians have ever been noted for proceeding against an enemy secretly and treacherously. Believing that by concerted action the English might be cut off and utterly exterminated, a secret league was entered into by the Shawanese and the tribes dwelling along the Ohio River, under the leadership of a powerful chieftain, Pontiac, by which swift destruction was everywhere to be meted out to the white man upon an hour of an appointed day. The plan was thoroughly understood by the red men, and heartily entered into. The day dawned and the blow fell in May, 1763. The forts at Presque Isle, Le Boeuf, Venango, La Ray, St. Joseph's, Miamis, Onaethanon, Sandusky and Michilimackinack, all fell before the unanticipated attacks of the savages who were making protestations of friendship, and the garrisons were put to the slaughter. Fort Pitt (Du Quesne), Niagara and Detroit alone, of all this line of forts, held out. Pontiac in person conducted the siege of Detroit, which he vigorously pushed from May until October, paying his warriors with promises written on bits of birch bark, which he subsequently religiously redeemed. It is an evidence of his great power that he could unite his people in so general and secretly kept a compact, and that in this siege of Detroit he was able to hold his warriors up to the work so long and so vigorously even after all hope of success must have reasonably been abandoned. The attack fell with great severity upon the Pennsylvania settlers, and they continued to be driven in until Shippensburg, in Cumberland County, became the extreme outpost of civilization. The savages stole unawares upon the laborers in the fields, or came stealthily in at the midnight hour and spared neither trembling age nor helpless infancy, firing houses, barns, crops and everything combustible. The suffering of the frontiersmen in this fatal year can scarcely be conceived.

Col. Armstrong with a hastily collected force advanced upon their towns and forts at Muncy and Great Island, which he destroyed; but the Indians escaped and withdrew before him. He sent a detachment under Col. Bouquet to the relief of Fort Pitt, which still held out, though closely invested by the dusky warriors. At Fort Ligonier, Bouquet halted and sent forward thirty men, who stealthily pushed past the Indians under cover of night, and reached the fort, carrying intelligence that succor was at hand. Discovering that a force was advancing upon them, the Indians turned upon the troops of Bouquet, and before he was aware that an enemy was near, he found himself surrounded and all means of escape apparently cut off. By a skillfully laid ambuscade, Bouquet, sending a small detachment to steal away as if in retreat, induced the Indians to follow, and when stretched out in pursuit, the main body in concealment fell upon the unsuspecting savages, and routed them with immense slaughter, when he advanced to the relief of the fort unchecked.

As we have already seen, the boundary line between Maryland and Pennsylvania had long been in dispute, and had occasioned serious disturbances among the settlers in the lifetime of Penn, and repeatedly since. It was not definitely settled till 1760, when a beginning was made of a final adjustment, though so intricate were the conditions that the work was prosecuted for seven years by a large force of surveyors, axmen and pioneers. The charter of Lord Baltimore made the northern boundary of Maryland the 40th degree of latitude; but whether the beginning or end of the 40th was not specified. The charter of Penn, which was subsequent, made his southern boundary the beginning of the 40th parallel. If, as Lord Baltimore claimed, his northern boundary was the end of the 40th, then the city of Philadelphia and all the settled parts of Pennsylvania would have been included in Maryland. If, as Penn claimed by express terms of his charter, his southern line was the beginning of the 40th, then the city of Baltimore, and even a part of the District of Columbia, including nearly the whole of Maryland would have been swallowed up by Pennsylvania. It was evident to the royal Council that neither claim could be rightfully allowed, and hence resort was had to compromise. Penn insisted upon retaining free communication with the open ocean by the Delaware Bay. Accordingly, it was decided that beginning at Cape Henlopen, which by mistake in marking the maps was fifteen miles below the present location, opposite Cape May, a line should be run due west to a point half way between this cape and the shore of Chesapeake Bay; from this point "a line was to be run northerly in such direction that it should be tangent on the west side to a circle with a radius of twelve miles, whose center was the center of the court house at New Castle. From the exact tangent point, a line was to be run due north until it should reach a point fifteen miles south on the parallel of latitude of the most southern point in the boundary of the city of Philadelphia, and this point when accurately found by horizontal measurement, was to be the corner bound between Maryland and Pennsylvania, and subsequently, when Delaware was set off from Pennsylvania, was the boundary of the three States. From this bound a line was to be run due west five degrees of longitude from the Delaware, which was to be the western limit of Pennsylvania, and the line thus ascertained was to mark the division between Maryland and Pennsylvania, and forever settle the vexed question. If the due north line should cut any part of the circle about New Castle, the slice so cut should belong to New Castle. Such a segment was cut. This plan of settlement was entered into on the 10th of May, 1732, between Thomas and Richard, sons of William Penn, on the one part, and Charles, Lord Baltimore, great-grandson of the patentee. But the actual marking of the boundaries was still deferred, and as the settlers were taking out patents for their lands, it was necessary that it should be definitely known in which State the lands lay. Accordingly, in 1739, in obedience to a decree in Council, a temporary line was run upon a new basis, which now often appears in litigations to plague the brain of the attorney.

Commissioners were again appointed in 1751, who made a few of the measurements, but owing to objections raised on the part of Maryland, the work was abandoned. Finally, the proprietors, Thomas and Richard Penn, and Frederic, Lord Baltimore, entered into an agreement for the executing of the survey, and John Lukens and Archibald McLean on the part of the Penns, and Thomas Garnett and Jonathan Hall on the part of Lord Baltimore, were appointed with a suitable corps of assistants to lay off the lines. After these surveyors had been three years at work, the proprietors in England, thinking that there was not enough energy and practical and scientific knowledge manifested by these surveyors, appointed Charles Mason and Jeremiah Dixon, two mathematicians and surveyors, to proceed to America and take charge of the work. They brought with them the most perfect and best constructed instruments known to science, arriving in Philadelphia on the 15th of November, 1763, and, assisted by some of the old surveyors, entered upon their work. By the 4th of June, 1766, they had reached the summit of the Little Allegheny, when the Indians began to be troublesome. They looked with an evil eye on the mathematical and astronomical instruments, and felt a secret dread and fear of the consequences of the frequent and long continued peering into the heavens. The Six Nations were understood to be inimical to the further progress of the survey. But through the influence of Sir William Johnson a treaty was concluded, providing for the prosecution of the work unmolested, and a number of chieftains were sent to accompany the surveying party. Mason and Dixon now had with them thirty surveyors, fifteen axmen, and fifteen Indians of consequence. Again the attitude of the Indians gave cause of fear, and on the 29th of September, twenty-six of the surveyors abandoned the expedition and returned to Philadelphia. Having reached a point 244 miles from the Delaware, and within thirty-six miles of the western limit of the State, in the bottom of a deep, dark valley, they came upon a well-worn Indian path, and here the Indians gave notice that it was the will of the Six Nations that this survey proceed no further. There was no questioning this authority, and no means at command for resisting, and accordingly the party broke up and returned to Philadelphia. And this was the end of the labors of Mason and Dixon upon this boundary. From the fact that this was subsequently the mark of division between the Free and Slave States, Mason and Dixon's line became familiar in American politics. The line was marked by stones which were quarried and engraved in England, on one side having the arms of Penn, and on the opposite those of Lord Baltimore. These stones were firmly set every five miles. At the end of each intermediate mile a smaller stone was placed, having on one side engraved the letter P., and on the opposite side the letter M. The remainder of the line was finished and marked in 1782-84 by other surveyors. A vista was cut through the forest eight yards in width the whole distance, which seemed in looking back through it to come to a point at the distance of two miles. In 1849, the stone at the northeast corner of Maryland having been removed, a resurvey of the line was ordered, and surveyors were appointed by the three States of Pennsylvania, Delaware and Maryland, who called to their aid Col. James D. Graham. Some few errors were discovered in the old survey, but in the main it was found to be accurate.

John Penn, grandson of the founder, and son of Richard, had come to the colony in 1753, and, having acted as President of the Council, was, in 1763, commissioned Governor in place of Hamilton. The conspiracy of Pontiac, though abortive in the results contemplated, left the minds of the Indians in a most dangerous state. The more resolute, who had entered heartily into the views of their leader, still felt that his purposes were patriotic, and hence sought, by every means possible, to ravage and destroy the English settlements. The Moravian Indians at Nain and Wichetunk, though regarded as friendly, were suspected of indirectly aiding in the savage warfare by trading firearms and ammunition. They were accordingly removed to Philadelphia that they might be out of the way of temptation. At the old Indian town of Conestoga there lived some score of natives. Many heartless murders had been committed along the frontier, and the perpetrators had been traced to this Conestoga town; and while the Conestoga band were not known to be implicated in these outrages, their town was regarded as the lurking place of roving savages who were. For protection, the settlers in the neighboring districts of Paxton and Donegal, had organized a band known as the Paxton boys. Earnest requests were made by Rev. John Elder and John Harris to the Government to remove this band at Conestoga; but as nothing was done, and fearful depredations and slaughter continued, a party of these Paxton rangers attacked the town and put the savages to the sword. Some few escaped, among them a known bloodthirsty savage, who were taken into the jail at Lancaster for protection; but the rangers, following them, overpowered the jailer, and breaking into the jail murdered the fugitives. Intense excitement was occasioned by this outbreak, and Gov. Penn issued his proclamation offering rewards for the apprehension of the perpetrators. Some few were taken; but so excellent was their character and standing, and such were the provocations, that no convictions followed. Apprehensions for the safety of the Moravian Indians induced the Government to remove them to Province Island, and, feeling insecure there, they asked to be sent to England. For safety, they were sent to New York, but the Governor of that province refused them permission to land, as did also the Governor of New Jersey, and they were brought back to Philadelphia and put in barracks under strong guard. The Paxton boys, in a considerable body, were at that time at Germantown interceding for their brethren, who were then in durance and threatened with trial. Franklin was sent out to confer with them on the part of the Government. In defending their course, they said: "Whilst more than a thousand families, reduced to extreme distress, during the last and present war, by the attacks of skulking parties of Indians upon the frontier, were destitute, and were suffered by the public to depend on private charity, a hundred and twenty of the perpetrators of the most horrid barbarities were supported by the province, and protected from the fury of the brave relatives of the murdered." Influenced by the persuasions of Franklin, they consented to return to their homes, leaving only Matthew Smith and James Gibson to represent them before the courts.

JOHN PENN, 1763-71—JAMES HAMILTON, 1771—RICHARD PENN, 1771-73—JOHN PENN, 1773-76.

A DIFFERENCE having arisen between the Governor and Assembly on the vexed question of levying money, the Assembly passed a series of resolutions advocating that the "powers of government ought to be separated from the power attending the immense proprietary property, and lodged in the hands of the King." After an interval of fifty days—that time for reflection and discussion might be given—the Assembly again convened, and adopted a petition praying the King to assume the direct government of the province, though this policy was strongly opposed by some of the ablest members, as Isaac Norris and John Dickinson. The Quaker element was generally in favor of the change.

Indian barbarities still continuing along the frontier, Gov. Penn declared war against the Shawanese and Delawares in July, 1765, and sent Col. Bouquet with a body of Pennsylvania troops against them. By the 3d of October, he had come up to the Muskingum, in the heart of the most thickly peopled Indian territory. So rapid had been the movement of Bouquet that the savages had no intelligence of his advance until he was upon them with no preparations for defense. They sued for peace, and a treaty was entered into by which the savages agreed to abstain from further hostilities until a general treaty could be concluded with Sir William Johnson, the general agent for Indian affairs for all the colonies, and to deliver up all English captives who had been carried away during the years of trouble. Two hundred and eight were quickly gathered up and brought in, and many others were to follow, who were now widely scattered. The relatives of many of these captives had proceeded with the train of Bouquet, intent on reclaiming those who had been dear to them. Some were joyfully received, while others who had been borne off in youth had become attached to their captors, and force was necessary to bring them away. "On the return of the army, some of the Indians obtained leave to accompany their former captives to Fort Pitt, and employed themselves in hunting and carrying provisions for them on the road."

The great struggle for the independence of the colonies of the British crown was now close at hand, and the first sounds of the controversy were beginning to be heard. Sir William Keith, that enterprising Governor whose head seemed to have been full of new projects, as early as 1739 had proposed to lay a uniform tax on stamped paper in all the colonies, to realize funds for the common defense. Acting upon this hint, Grenville, the British Minister, notified the colonists in 1763 of his purpose to impose such a tax. Against this they remonstrated. Instead of this, a tax on imports, to be paid in coin, was adopted. This was even more distasteful. The Assembly of Rhode Island, in October, 1765, submitted a paper to all the colonial assemblies, with a view to uniting in a common petition to the King against parliamentary taxation. This was favorably acted on by the Assembly of Pennsylvania, and Franklin was appointed agent to represent their cause before the British Parliament. The Stamp Act had been passed on the 22d of March, 1765. Its passage excited bitter opposition, and a resolution, asserting that the Colonial Assemblies had the exclusive right to levy taxes, was passed by the Virginia Assembly, and concurred in by all the others. The Massachusetts Assembly proposed a meeting of delegates in New York on the second Tuesday of October, 1765, to confer upon the subject. The Pennsylvania Assembly adopted the suggestion, and appointed Messrs. Fox, Morton, Bryan and Dickenson as delegates. This Congress met according to the call and adopted a respectful petition to the King, and a memorial to Parliament, which were signed by all the members and forwarded for presentation by the Colonial Agents in England. The Stamp Act was to go into effect on the 1st of November. On the last day of October, the newspapers were dressed in mourning, and suspended publication. The publishers agreed not to use the stamped paper. The people, as with one mind, determined to dress in homespun, resolved not to use imported goods, and, to stimulate the production of wool the colonists covenanted not to eat lamb for the space of one year. The result of this policy was soon felt by British manufacturers who became clamorous for repeal of the obnoxious measures, and it was accordingly repealed on the 18th of March, 1766.

Determined in some form to draw a revenue from the colonies, an act was passed in 1767, to lay a duty on tea, paper, printers' colors, and glass. The Assembly of Pennsylvania passed a resolution on the 20th of February, 1768, instructing its agent in London to urge its repeal, and at the session in May received and entered upon its minutes a circular letter from the Massachusetts Assembly, setting forth the grounds on which objection to the act should be urged. This circular occasioned hostile feeling among the ministry, and the Secretary for foreign affairs wrote to Gov. Penn to urge the Assembly to take no notice of it; but if they approved its sentiments, to prorogue their sittings. This letter was transmitted to the Assembly, and soon after one from the Virginia Assembly was presented, urging union of all the colonies in opposing the several schemes of taxation. This recommendation was adopted, and committees appointed to draw a petition to the King and to each of the Houses of Parliament. To lead public sentiment, and have it well grounded in the arguments used against taxation, John Dickinson, one of the ablest of the Pennsylvania legislators at this time, published a number of articles purporting to come from a plain farmer, under the title of the Farmer's Letters, which became popular, the idea that they were the work of one in humble life, helping to swell the tide of popularity. They were republished in all the colonies, and exerted a commanding influence. Alarmed at the unanimity of feeling against the proposed schemes, and supposing that it was the amount of the tax that gave offense, Parliament reduced the rate in 1769 to one sixth of the original sum, and in 1770 abolished it altogether, except three pence a pound on tea. But it was the principle, and not the amount that was objected to, and at the next session of the Assembly in Pennsylvania, their agent in London was directed to urge its repeal altogether.

It would seem incredible that the colony of Connecticut should lay claim to any part of the territory of Pennsylvania, but so it was. The New England charters gave limitless extent westward even to the shores of the Pacific Ocean, and south to the northern limits of the tract ceded to Lord Baltimore—the territory between the 40th and 46th degrees of north latitude, and from ocean to ocean. To encroach upon New York with its teeming population was not calculated to tempt the enterprise of the settler; but the rich virgin soil, and agreeable climate of the wide Wyoming Valley, as yet unappropriated, was likely to attract the eye of the explorer. Accordingly, at the general conference with the Indians held at Albany in 1754, the Connecticut delegates made a purchase of a large tract in this valley; a company, known as the Susquehanna Company, was formed in Connecticut to promote the settlement of these lands, and a considerable immigration commenced. The proprietors of Pennsylvania had also made purchase of the Indians of these identical lands, and the royal charters of Charles and James covered this ground. But the Plymouth Charter antedated Penn's. Remonstrances were made to the Governor of Connecticut against encroachments upon the territory of Pennsylvania. The answer returned was understood to disclaim any control over the company by the Connecticut authorities; but it subsequently appeared that the Government was determined to defend the settlers in the possession of their lands. In 1768, the proprietors of Pennsylvania entered into treaty stipulations with the Indians for all this tract covered by the claim of the Susquehanna Company. Pennsylvania settlers, attracted by the beauty of the place, gradually acquired lands under Pennsylvania patents, and the two parties began to infringe on each other's claims. Forts and block-houses were erected for the protection of either party, and a petty warfare was kept up, which resulted in some loss of life. Butler, the leader of the Connecticut party, proposed to settle their differences by personal combat of thirty picked men on each side. In order to assert more direct legal control over the settlers, a new county was formed which was called Northumberland, that embraced all the disputed lands. But the Sheriff, even with the aid of the militia, which he called to his assistance, was unable to execute his processes, and exercise legal control, the New Englanders, proving a resolute set, determined to hold the splendid farms which they had marked out for themselves, and were bringing rapidly under cultivation. To the remonstrances of Gov. Penn, Gov. Trumbull responded that the Susquehanna Company was proceeding in good faith under provisions secured by the charter of the Plymouth Colony, and proposed that the question be submitted to a competent tribunal for arbitrament. An ex parte statement was submitted to Council in London by the Connecticut party, and an opinion was rendered favorable to its claims. In September, 1775, the matter was submitted to the Continental Congress, and a committee of that body, to whom it was referred, reported in favor of the Connecticut claim, apportioning a tract out of the very bowels of Pennsylvania nearly as large as the whole State of Connecticut. This action was promptly rejected by the Assembly of Pennsylvania, and a final decision was not reached until 1802, when Congress decided in favor of the integrity of the chartered rights of Penn.

Richard Penn, son of the founder, died in 1771, whereupon Gov. John Penn returned to England, leaving the President of the Council, James Hamilton, at the head of the Government. John Penn, eldest son of Richard, succeeded to the proprietary interests of his father, which he held in conjunction with his uncle, Thomas, and in October of the same year, Richard, the second son, was commissioned Governor. He held the office but about two years, and in that time won the confidence and esteem of the people, and so much attached was he to the popular cause, that upon his return to England, in 1775, he was intrusted by Congress with the last petition of the colonies ever presented to the King. In August, 1773, John Penn returned with the commission of Governor, superseding his brother Richard. Soon after his arrival, the Governor of Virginia, Lord Dunmore, issued his proclamation, laying claim to a vast territory in the Monongalia Valley, including the site of the present city of Pittsburgh, and upon the withdrawal of the British garrison, one Connolly had taken possession of it in the name of Virginia. Gov. Penn issued a counter-proclamation, calling on all good citizens within the borders of Pennsylvania, to preserve their allegiance to his Government, seized and imprisoned Connolly, and sent Commissioners to Virginia to effect an amicable settlement. These, Dunmore refused to hear, and was preparing to assert his authority by force; but his Council refused to vote him money for this purpose.

To encourage the sale of tea in the colonies, and establish the principle of taxation, the export duty was removed. The colonies took the alarm. At a public meeting called in Philadelphia to consider the subject, on the 18th of October, 1773, resolutions were adopted in which it was declared: "That the disposal of their own property is the inherent right of freemen; that there can be no property in that which another can, of right, take from us without our consent; that the claim of Parliament to tax America, is, in other words, a claim of right to levy contributions on us at pleasure." The East India Company now made preparations for sending large importations of tea into the colonies. The ships destined for Philadelphia and New York, on approaching port, and being advised of the exasperated state of public feeling, returned to England with their cargoes. Those sent to Boston came into the harbor; but at night a party disguised as Mohawk Indians boarded the vessels, and breaking open the packages, emptied 300 chests into the sea. The ministry, on being apprised of this act, closed the port of Boston, and subverted the colonial charter. Early in the year, committees of correspondence had been established in all the colonies, by means of which the temper and feeling in each was well understood by the others, and concert of action was secured. The hard conditions imposed on the town of Boston and the colony of Massachusetts Bay, aroused the sympathy of all; for, they argued, we know not how soon the heavy hand of oppression may be felt by any of us. Philadelphia declared at a public meeting that the people of Pennsylvania would continue firmly to adhere to the cause of American liberty, and urged the calling of a Congress of delegates to consider the general interests.

At a meeting held in Philadelphia on the 18th of June, 1774, at which nearly 8,000 people were convened, it was decided that a Continental Congress ought to be held, and appointed a committee of correspondence to communicate with similar committees in the several counties of Pennsylvania and in the several colonies. On the 15th of July, 1774, delegates from all the counties, summoned by this committee, assembled in Philadelphia, and declared that there existed an absolute necessity for a Colonial Congress. They accordingly recommended that the Assembly appoint delegates to such a Congress to represent Pennsylvania, and Joseph Galloway, Samuel Rhoads, George Ross, Edward Biddle, John Dickinson, Charles Humphries and Thomas Mifflin were appointed.

On the 4th of September, 1774, the first Continental Congress assembled in Philadelphia. Peyton Randolph, of Virginia, was called to preside, and Charles Thomson, of Pennsylvania, was appointed Secretary. It was resolved that no more goods be imported from England, and that unless a pacification was effected previously, no more Colonial produce of the soil be exported thither after September 10, 1775. A declaration of rights was adopted, and addresses to the King, the people of Great Britain, and of British America were agreed to, after which the Congress adjourned to meet again on the 10th of May, 1775.

In January, 1775, another meeting of the county delegates was held in Philadelphia, at which the action of the Colonial Congress was approved, and while a restoration of harmony with the mother country was desired, yet if the arbitrary acts of Parliament were persisted in, they would at every hazard defend the "rights and liberties of America." The delegates appointed to represent the colony in the Second Congress were Mifflin, Humphries, Biddle, Dickinson, Morton, Franklin, Wilson and Willing.

The government of Great Britain had determined with a strong hand to compel obedience to its behests. On the 19th of April, 1775, was fought the battle of Lexington, and the crimson fountain was opened. That blow was felt alike through all the colonies. The cause of one was the cause of all. A public meeting was held in Philadelphia, at which it was resolved to organize military companies in all the counties. The Assembly heartily seconded these views, and engaged to provide for the pay of the militia while in service. The Second Congress, which met in May, provided for organizing a continental army, fixing the quota for Pennsylvania at 4,300 men. The Assembly adopted the recommendation of Congress, provided for arming, disciplining and paying the militia, recommended the organizing minutemen for service in an emergency, made appropriations for the defense of the city, and offered a premium on the production of salt peter. Complications hourly thickened. Ticonderoga was captured on the 10th of May, and the battle of Bunker Hill was fought on the 17th of June. On the 15th of June, George Washington was appointed Commander-in-chief of the Continental Army, supported by four Major Generals and eight Brigadiers.

The royal Governors were now an incumbrance greatly in the way of the popular movement, as were also the Assemblies where they refused to represent the popular will. Accordingly, Congress recommended that the several colonies should adopt such government as should "best conduce to the happiness and safety of their constituents in particular and America in general." This meant that each colony should set up a government for itself independent of the Crown. Accordingly, a public meeting was held in Philadelphia, at which it was resolved that the present Assembly is "not competent to the present exigencies of affairs," and that a new form of government ought to be adopted as recommended by Congress. The city committee of correspondence called on the county committees to secure the election of delegates to a colonial meeting for the purpose of considering this subject. On the 18th of June, the meeting was held in Philadelphia, and was organized by electing Thomas McKean President. It resolved to call a convention to frame a new constitution, provided the legal forms to be observed, and issued an address to the people.

Having thus by frequent argumentation grown familiar with the declaration of the inherent rights of every citizen, and with flatly declaring to the government of Great Britain that it had no right to pursue this policy or that, and the several States having been recommended to absolve themselves from allegiance to the royal governments, and set up independent colonial governments of their own, it was a natural inference, and but a step further, to declare the colonies entirely independent of the British Government, and to organize for themselves a general continental government to hold the place of King and Parliament. The idea of independence had been seriously proposed, and several Colonial Assemblies had passed resolutions strongly recommending it. And yet there were those of age and experience who had supported independent principles in the stages of argumentation, before action was demanded, when they approached the brink of the fatal chasm, and had to decide whether to take the leap, hesitated. There were those in the Assembly of Pennsylvania who were reluctant to advise independence; but the majority voted to recommend its delegates to unite with the other colonies for the common good. The convention which had provided for holding a meeting of delegates to frame a new constitution, voted in favor of independence, and authorized the raising of 6,000 militia.

On the 7th of June, 1776, Richard Henry Lee, of Virginia, introduced in Congress the proposition that, "the United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be, totally dissolved." It was impossible to mistake or misinterpret the meaning of this language. The issue was fairly made up. It was warmly discussed. John Dickinson, one of the Pennsylvania delegates, and one who had been foremost in speaking and writing on the popular side, was not ready to cut off all hope of reconciliation, and depicted the disorganized condition in which the colonies would be left if the power and protection of Britain were thus suddenly removed. The vote upon the resolution was taken on the 2d of July, and resulted in the affirmative vote of all the States except Pennsylvania and Delaware, the delegates from these States being divided. A committee consisting of Adams, Franklin, Jefferson, Livingston and Sherman had been, some time previous, appointed to draw a formal statement of the Declaration, and the reasons "out of a decent respect to the opinions of mankind," which led to so important an act. The work was intrusted to a sub-committee consisting of Adams and Jefferson, and its composition was the work of Mr. Jefferson, though many of the ideas, and even the forms of expression, had been used again and again in the previous resolutions and pronouncements of the Colonial Assemblies and public meetings. It had been reported on the 28th of June, and was sharply considered in all its parts, many verbal alterations having been made in the committee of five; but after the passage of the preliminary resolution, the result was a foregone conclusion, and on the 4th of July it was finally adopted and proclaimed to the world. Of the Pennsylvania delegation, Franklin, Wilson and Morton voted for it, and Willing and Humphrey against, Dickinson being absent. The colonial convention of Pennsylvania, being in session at the time, on receiving intelligence that a majority of its delegates in Congress had voted against the preliminary resolution, named a new delegation, omitting the names of Dickinson, Willing and Humphrey, and adding others which made it thus constituted—Franklin, Wilson, Morton, Morris, Clymer, Smith, Taylor and Ross. An engrossed copy of the Declaration was made, which was signed by all the members on the 2d of August following, on which are found the names from Pennsylvania above recited.

The convention for framing a new constitution for the colony met on the 15th of July, and was organized by electing Franklin President, and on the 28th of September completed its labors, having framed a new organic law and made all necessary provisions for putting it into operation. In the meantime the old proprietary Assembly adjourned on the 14th of June to the 26th of August. But a quorum failed to appear, and an adjournment was had to the 23d of September, when some routine business was attended to, chiefly providing for the payment of salaries and necessary bills, and on the 28th of September, after a stormy existence of nearly a century, this Assembly, the creature of Penn, adjourned never to meet again. With the ending of the Assembly ended the power of Gov. Penn. It is a singular circumstance, much noted by the believers in signs, that on the day of his arrival in America, which was Sunday, the earth in that locality was rocked by an earthquake, which was interpreted as an evil omen to his administration. He married the daughter of William Allen, Chief Justice of the colony, and, though at times falling under suspicion of favoring the royal cause, yet, as was believed, not without reason, he remained a quiet spectator of the great struggle, living at his country seat in Bucks County, where he died in February, 1795.

The titles of the proprietors to landed estates were suspended by the action of the convention, and on the 27th of November, 1779, the Legislature passed an act vesting these estates in the commonwealth, but paying the proprietors a gratuity of £130,000, "in remembrance of the enterprising spirit of the Founder." This act did not touch the private estates of the proprietors, nor the tenths of manors. The British Government, in 1790, in consideration of the fact that it had been unable to vindicate its authority over the colony, and afford protection to the proprietors in the enjoyment of their chartered rights, voted an annuity of £4,000 to the heirs and descendants of Penn. This annuity has been regularly paid to the present time, 1884.

CHAPTER XII.

THOMAS WHARTON, JR., 1777-78—GEORGE BRYAN, 1778—JOSEPH REED, 1778-81—
WILLIAM MOORE, 1781-82—JOHN DICKINSON, 1782-85—BENJAMIN FRANKLIN,

THE convention which framed the constitution appointed a Committee of Safety, consisting of twenty-five members, to whom was intrusted the government of the colony until the proposed constitution should be framed and put in operation. Thomas Rittenhouse was chosen President of this body, who was consequently in effect Governor. The new constitution, which was unanimously adopted on the 28th of September, was to take effect from its passage. It provided for an Assembly to be elected annually; a Supreme Executive Council of twelve members to be elected for a term of three years; Assemblymen to be eligible but four years out of seven, and Councilmen but one term in seven years. Members of Congress were chosen by the Assembly. The constitution could not be changed for seven years. It provided for the election of censors every seven years, who were to decide whether there was a demand for its revision. If so, they were to call a convention for the purpose. On the 6th of August, 1776, Thomas Wharton, Jr., was chosen President of the Council of Safety.

The struggle with the parent country was now fully inaugurated. The British Parliament had declared the colonists rebels, had voted a force of 55,000 men, and in addition had hired 17,000 Hessian soldiers, to subdue them. The Congress on its part had declared the objects for which arms had been taken up, and had issued bills of credit to the amount of $6,000,000. Parliament had resolved upon a vigorous campaign, to strike heavy and rapid blows, and quickly end the war. The first campaign had been conducted in Massachusetts, and by the efficient conduct of Washington, Gen. Howe, the leader of the British, was compelled to capitulate and withdraw to Halifax in March, 1776. On the 28th of June, Sir Henry Clinton, with a strong detachment, in conjunction with Sir Peter Parker of the navy, made a combined land and naval attack upon the defenses of Charleston Harbor, where he was met by Gen. William Moultrie, with the Carolina Militia, and after a severe battle, in which the British fleet was roughly handled, Clinton withdrew and returned to New York, whither the main body of the British Army, under Gen. Howe, had come, and where Admiral Lord Howe, with a large fleet directly from England, joined them. To this formidable power led by the best talent in the British Army, Washington could muster no adequate force to oppose, and he was obliged to withdraw from Long Island, from New York, from Harlem, from White Plains, to cross into New Jersey, and abandon position after position, until he had reached the right bank of the Delaware on Pennsylvania soil. A heavy detachment under Cornwallis followed, and would have crossed the Delaware in pursuit, but advised to a cautious policy by Howe, he waited for ice to form on the waters of the Delaware before passing over. The fall of Philadelphia now seemed imminent. Washington had not sufficient force to face the whole power of the British Army. On the 2d of December, the Supreme Council ordered all places of business in the city to be closed, the schools to be dismissed, and advised preparation for removing the women and children and valuables. On the 12th, the Congress which was in session here adjourned to meet in Baltimore, taking with them all papers and public records, and leaving a committee, of which Robert Morris was Chairman, to act in conjunction with Washington for the safety of the place. Gen. Putnam was dispatched on the same day with a detachment of soldiers to take command in the city.

In this emergency the Council issued a stirring address: "If you wish to live in freedom, and are determined to maintain that best boon of heaven, you have no time to deliberate. A manly resistance will secure every blessing, inactivity and sloth will bring horror and destruction. * * * May heaven, which has bestowed the blessings of liberty upon you, awaken you to a proper sense of your danger and arouse that manly spirit of virtuous resolution which has ever bidden defiance to the efforts of tyranny. May you ever have the glorious prize of liberty in view, and bear with a becoming fortitude the fatigues and severities of a winter campaign. That, and that only, will entitle you to the superlative distinction of being deemed, under God, the deliverers of your country." Such were the arguments which our fathers made use of in conducting the struggle against the British Empire.

Washington, who had, from the opening of the campaign before New York, been obliged for the most part to act upon the defensive, formed the plan to suddenly turn upon his pursuers and offer battle. Accordingly, on the night of the 25th of December, taking a picked body of men, he moved up several miles to Taylorsville, where he crossed the river, though at flood tide and filled with floating ice, and moving down to Trenton, where a detachment of the British Army was posted, made a bold and vigorous attack. Taken by surprise, though now after sunrise, the battle was soon decided in favor of the Americans. Some fifty of the enemy were slain and over a thousand taken prisoners, with quantities of arms, ammunition and stores captured. A triumphal entry was made at Philadelphia, when the prisoners and the spoils of war moved through the streets under guard of the victorious troops, and were marched away to the prison camp at Lancaster. Washington, who was smarting under a forced inactivity, by reason of paucity of numbers and lack of arms and material, and who had been forced constantly to retire before a defiant foe, now took courage. His name was upon every tongue, and foreign Governments were disposed to give the States a fair chance in their struggle for nationality. The lukewarm were encouraged to enlist under the banner of freedom. It had great strategic value. The British had intended to push forward and occupy Philadelphia at once, which, being now virtually the capital of the new nation, had it been captured at this juncture, would have given them the occasion for claiming a triumphal ending of the war. But this advantage, though gained by a detachment small in numbers yet great in courage, caused the commander of a powerful and well appointed army to give up all intention of attempting to capture the Pennsylvania metropolis in this campaign, and retiring into winter cantonments upon the Raritan to await the settled weather of the spring for an entirely new cast of operations. Washington, emboldened by his success, led all his forces into New Jersey; and pushing past Trenton, where Cornwallis, the royal leader, had brought his main body by a forced march, under cover of darkness, attacked the British reserves at Princeton. But now the enemy had become wary and vigilant, and, summoned by the booming of cannon, Cornwallis hastened back to the relief of his hard pressed columns. Washington, finding that the enemy's whole army was within easy call and knowing that he had no hope of success with his weak army, withdrew. Washington now went into winter quarters at Morristown, and by constant vigilance was able to gather marauding parties of the British who ventured far away from their works.

Putnam commenced fortifications at a point below Philadelphia upon the Delaware, and at commanding positions upon the outskirts, and on being summoned to the army was succeeded by Gen. Irvine, and he by Gen. Gates. On the 4th of March, 1777, the two Houses of the Legislature, elected under the new constitution, assembled, and in joint convention chose Thomas Wharton, Jr., President, and George Bryan Vice President. Penn had expressed the idea that power was preserved the better by due formality and ceremony, and, accordingly, this event was celebrated with much pomp, the result being declared in a loud voice from the court house, amid the shouts of the gathered throngs and the booming of the captured cannon brought from the field of Trenton. The title bestowed upon the new chief officer of the State was fitted by its length and high-sounding epithets to inspire the multitude with awe and reverence: "His Excellency, Thomas Wharton, Junior, Esquire, President of the Supreme Executive Council of Pennsylvania, Captain General, and Commander-in-chief in and over the same."

While the enemy was disposed to be cautious after the New Jersey campaign so humiliating to the native pride of the Britain, yet he was determined to bring all available forces into the field for the campaign of 1777, and to strike a decisive blow. Early in April, great activity was observed among the shipping in New York Harbor, and Washington communicated to Congress his opinion that Philadelphia was the object against which the blow would be aimed. This announcement of probable peril induced the Council to issue a proclamation urging enlistments, and Congress ordered the opening of a camp for drilling recruits in Pennsylvania, and Benedict Arnold, who was at this time a trusted General, was ordered to the command of it. So many new vessels and transports of all classes had been discovered to have come into New York Harbor, probably forwarded from England, that Washington sent Gen. Mifflin, on the 10th of June, to Congress, bearing a letter in which he expressed the settled conviction that the enemy meditated an immediate descent upon some part of Pennsylvania. Gen. Mifflin proceeded to examine the defensive works of the city which had been begun on the previous advance of the British, and recommended such changes and new works as seemed best adapted for its protection. The preparations for defense were vigorously prosecuted. The militia were called out and placed in two camps, one at Chester and the other at Downingtown. Fire ships were held in readiness to be used against vessels attempting the ascent of the river.

Lord Howe, being determined not to move until ample preparations were completed, allowed the greater part of the summer to wear away before he advanced. Finally, having embarked a force of 19,500 men on a fleet of 300 transports, he sailed southward. Washington promptly made a corresponding march overland, passing through Philadelphia on the 24th of August. Howe, suspecting that preparations would be made for impeding the passage of the Delaware, sailed past its mouth, and moving up the Chesapeake instead, debarked fifty-four miles from Philadelphia and commenced the march northward. Great activity was now manifested in the city. The water-spouts were melted to furnish bullets, fair hands were busied in rolling cartridges, powerful chevaux-de-frise were planted to impede the navigation of the river, and the last division of the militia of the city, which had been divided into three classes, was called out. Washington, who had crossed the Brandywine, soon confronted the advance of Howe, and brisk skirmishing at once opened. Seeing that he was likely to have the right of his position at Red Clay Creek, where he had intended to give battle, turned by the largely superior force of the enemy, under cover of darkness on the night of the 8th of September, he withdrew across the Brandywine at Chad's Ford, and posting Armstrong with the militia upon the left, at Pyle's Ford, where the banks were rugged and precipitous, and Sullivan, who was second in command, upon the right at Brinton's Ford under cover of forest, he himself took post with three divisions, Sterling's, Stephens', and his own, in front of the main avenue of approach at Chad's. Howe, discovering that Washington was well posted, determined to flank him. Accordingly, on the 11th, sending Knyphausen with a division of Hessians to make vigorous demonstrations upon Washington's front at Chad's, he, with the corps of Cornwallis, in light marching order, moved up the Brandywine, far past the right flank of Washington, crossed the Brandywine at the fords of Trumbull and Jeffrey unopposed, and, moving down came upon Washington's right, held by Sullivan, all unsuspecting and unprepared to receive him. Though Howe was favored by a dense fog which on that morning hung on all the valley, yet it had hardly been commenced before Washington discovered the move and divined its purpose. His resolution was instantly taken. He ordered Sullivan to cross the stream at Brinton's, and resolutely turn the left flank of Knyphausen, when he himself with the main body would move over and crush the British Army in detail. It was a brilliant conception, was feasible, and promised the most complete success. But what chagrin and mortification, to receive, at the moment when he expected to hear the music of Sullivan's guns doubling up the left of the enemy, and giving notice to him to commence the passage, a message from that officer advising him that he had disobeyed his orders to cross, having received intelligence that the enemy were not moving northward, and that he was still in position at the ford. Thus balked, Washington had no alternative but to remain in position, and it was not long before the guns of Howe were heard moving in upon his all unguarded right flank. The best dispositions were made which time would permit. His main body with the force of Sullivan took position along the brow of the hill on which stands the Birmingham meeting house, and the battle opened and was pushed with vigor the whole day. Overborne by numbers, and weakened by losses, Washington was obliged to retire, leaving the enemy in possession of the field. The young French nobleman, Lafayette, was wounded while gallantly serving in this fight. The wounded were carried into the Birmingham meeting house, where the blood stains are visible to this day, enterprising relic hunters for many generations having been busy in loosening small slivers with the points of their knives.

The British now moved cautiously toward Philadelphia. On the 16th of September, at a point some twenty miles west of Philadelphia, Washington again made a stand, and a battle opened with brisk skirmishing, but a heavy rain storm coming on the powder of the patriot soldiers was completely ruined on account of their defective cartridge boxes. On the night of the 20th, Gen. Anthony Wayne, who had been hanging on the rear of the enemy with his detachment, was surprised by Gen. Gray with a heavy column, who fell suddenly upon the Americans in bivouac and put them to the sword, giving no quarter. This disgraceful slaughter which brought a stigma and an indelible stain upon the British arms is known as the Paoli Massacre. Fifty-three of the victims of the black flag were buried in one grave. A neat monument of white marble was erected forty years afterward over their mouldering remains by the Republican Artillerists of Chester County, which vandal hands have not spared in their mania for relics.

Congress remained in Philadelphia while these military operations were going on at its very doors; but on the 18th of September adjourned to meet at Lancaster, though subsequently, on the 30th, removed across the Susquehanna to York, where it remained in session till after the evacuation in the following summer. The Council remained until two days before the fall of the city, when having dispatched the records of the loan office and the more valuable papers to Easton, it adjourned to Lancaster. On the 26th, the British Army entered the city. Deborah Logan in her memoir says: "The army marched in and took possession in the city in the morning. We were up-stairs and saw them pass the State House. They looked well, clean and well clad, and the contrast between them and our own poor, bare-footed, ragged troops was very great and caused a feeling of despair. * * * * * Early in the afternoon, Lord Cornwallis' suite arrived and took possession of my mother's house." But though now holding undisputed possession of the American capital, Howe found his position an uncomfortable one, for his fleet was in the Chesapeake, and the Delaware and all its defenses were in possession of the Americans, and Washington had manned the forts with some of his most resolute troops. Varnum's brigade, led by Cols. Angell and Greene, Rhode Island troops, were at Fort Mercer, at Red Bank, and this the enemy determined to attack. On the 21st of October, with a force of 2,500 men, led by Count Donop, the attack was made. In two columns they moved as to an easy victory. But the steady fire of the defenders when come in easy range, swept them down with deadly effect, and, retiring with a loss of over 400 and their leader mortally wounded, they did not renew the fight. Its reduction was of prime importance, and powerful works were built and equipped to bear upon the devoted fort on all sides, and the heavy guns of the fleet were brought up to aid in overpowering it. For six long days the greatest weight of metal was poured upon it from the land and the naval force, but without effect, the sides of the fort successfully withstanding the plunging of their powerful missiles. As a last resort, the great vessels were run suddenly in close under the walls, and manning the yard-arms with sharp-shooters, so effectually silenced and drove away the gunners that the fort fell easily into the British hands and the river was opened to navigation. The army of Washington, after being recruited and put in light marching order, was led to Germantown where, on the morning of the 3d of October the enemy was met. A heavy fog that morning had obscured friend and foe alike, occasioning confusion in the ranks, and though the opening promised well, and some progress was made, yet the enemy was too strong to be moved, and the American leader was forced to retire to his camp at White Marsh. Though the river had now been opened and the city was thoroughly fortified for resisting attack, yet Howe felt not quite easy in having the American Army quartered in so close striking distance, and accordingly, on the 4th of December, with nearly his entire army, moved out, intending to take Washington at White Marsh, sixteen miles away, by surprise, and by rapidity of action gain an easy victory. But by the heroism and fidelity of Lydia Darrah, who, as she had often done before passed the guards to go to the mill for flour, the news of the coming of Howe was communicated to Washington, who was prepared to receive him. Finding that he could effect nothing, Howe returned to the city, having had the wearisome march at this wintry season without effect.

Washington now crossed the Schuylkill and went into winter quarters at Valley Forge. The cold of that winter was intense; the troops, half clad and indifferently fed, suffered severely, the prints of their naked feet in frost and snow being often tinted with patriot blood. Grown impatient of the small results from the immensely expensive campaigns carried on across the ocean, the Ministry relieved Lord Howe, and appointed Sir Henry Clinton to the chief command.

The Commissioners whom Congress had sent to France early in the fall of 1776—Franklin, Dean and Lee had been busy in making interest for the united colonies at the French Court, and so successful were they, that arms and ammunition and loans of money were procured from time to time. Indeed, so persuasive had they become that it was a saying current at court that, "It was fortunate for the King that Franklin did not take it into his head to ask to have the palace at Versailles stripped of its furniture to send to his dear Americans, for his majesty would have been unable to deny him." Finally, a convention was concluded, by which France agreed to use the royal army and navy as faithful allies of the Americans against the English. Accordingly, a fleet of four powerful frigates, and twelve ships were dispatched under command of the Count D'Estaing to shut up the British fleet in the Delaware. The plan was ingenious, particularly worthy of the long head of Franklin. But by some means, intelligence of the sailing of the French fleet reached the English cabinet, who immediately ordered the evacuation of the Delaware, whereupon the Admiral weighed anchor and sailed away with his entire fleet to New York, and D'Estaing, upon his arrival at the mouth of the Delaware, found that the bird had flown.

Clinton evacuated Philadelphia and moved across New Jersey in the direction of New York. Washington closely followed and came up with the enemy on the plains of Monmouth, on the 28th of June, 1778, where a sanguinary battle was fought which lasted the whole day, resulting in the triumph of the American arms, and Pennsylvania was rid of British troops!

The enemy was no sooner well away from the city than Congress returned from York and resumed its sittings in its former quarters, June 24, 1778, and on the following day, the Colonial Legislature returned from Lancaster. Gen. Arnold, who was disabled by a wound received at Saratoga, from field duty, was given command in the city and marched in with a regiment on the day following the evacuation. On the 23d of May, 1778, President Wharton died suddenly of quinsy, while in attendance upon the Council at Lancaster, when George Bryan, the Vice President, became the Acting President. Bryan was a philanthropist in deed as well as word. Up to this time, African slavery had been tolerated in the colony. In his message of the 9th of November, he said: "This or some better scheme, would tend to abrogate slavery—the approbrium of America—from among us. * * * In divesting the State of slaves, you will equally serve the cause of humanity and policy, and offer to God one of the most proper and best returns of gratitude for His great deliverance of us and our posterity from thralldom; you will also set your character for justice and benevolence in the true point of view to Europe, who are astonished to see a people eager for liberty holding negroes in bondage." He perfected a bill for the extinguishment of claims to slaves which was passed by the Assembly, March 1, 1780, by a vote of thirty-four to eighteen, providing that no child of slave parents born after that date should be a slave, but a servant till the age of twenty-eight years, when all claim for service should end. Thus by a simple enactment resolutely pressed by Bryan, was slavery forever rooted out of Pennsylvania.

In the summer of 1778, a force of savages and sour-faced Tories to the number of some 1,200, under the leadership of one Col. John Butler, a cruel and inhuman wretch, descending from the north, broke into the Wyoming Valley on the 2d of July. The strong men were in the army of Washington, and the only defenders were old men, beardless boys and resolute women. These, to the number of about 400, under Zebulon Butler, a brave soldier who had won distinction in the old French war, and who happened to be present, moved resolutely out to meet the invaders. Overborne by numbers, the inhabitants were beaten and put to the sword, the few who escaped retreating to Forty Fort, whither the helpless, up and down the valley, had sought safety. Here humane terms of surrender were agreed to, and the families returned to their homes, supposing all danger to be past. But the savages had tasted blood, and perhaps confiscated liquor, and were little mindful of capitulations. The night of the 5th was given to indiscriminate massacre. The cries of the helpless rang out upon the night air, and the heavens along all the valley were lighted up with the flames of burning cottages; "and when the moon arose, the terrified inhabitants were fleeing to the Wilkesbarre Mountains, and the dark morasses of the Pocono Mountain beyond." Most of these were emigrants from Connecticut, and they made their way homeward as fast as their feet would carry them, many of them crossing the Hudson at Poughkeepsie, where they told their tales of woe.

In February, 1778, Parliament, grown tired of this long and wasting war, abolished taxes of which the Americans had complained, and a committee, composed of Earl Carlisle, George Johnstone and William Eden, were sent empowered to forgive past offenses, and to conclude peace with the colonies, upon submission to the British crown. Congress would not listen to their proposals, maintaining that the people of America had done nothing that needed forgiveness, and that no conference could be accorded so long as the English Armies remained on American soil. Finding that negotiations could not be entered upon with the government, they sought to worm their way by base bribes. Johnstone proposed to Gen. Reed that if he would lend his aid to bring about terms of pacification, 10,000 guineas and the best office in the country should be his. The answer of the stern General was a type of the feeling which swayed every patriot: "My influence is but small, but were it as great as Gov. Johnstone would insinuate, the King of Great Britain has nothing in his gift that would tempt me."

At the election held for President, the choice fell upon Joseph Reed, with George Bryan Vice President, subsequently Matthew Smith, and finally William Moore. Reed was an erudite lawyer, and had held the positions of Private Secretary to Washington, and subsequently Adjutant General of the army. He was inaugurated on the 1st of December, 1778. Upon the return of the patriots to Philadelphia, after the departure of the British, a bitter feeling existed between them and the Tories who had remained at their homes, and had largely profited by the British occupancy. The soldiers became demonstrative, especially against those lawyers who had defended the Tories in court. Some of those most obnoxious took refuge in the house of James Wilson, a signer of the Declaration. Private soldiers, in passing, fired upon it, and shots were returned whereby one was killed and several wounded. The President on being informed of these proceedings, rode at the head of the city troop, and dispersed the assailants, capturing the leaders. The Academy and College of Philadelphia required by its charter an oath of allegiance to the King of Great Britain. An act was passed November 27, 1779, abrogating the former charter, and vesting its property in a new board. An endowment from confiscated estates was settled upon it of £15,000 annually. The name of the institution was changed to the "University of the State of Pennsylvania."

France was now aiding the American cause with money and large land and naval forces. While some of the patriots remained steadfast and were disposed to sacrifice and endure all for the success of the struggle, many, who should have been in the ranks rallying around Washington, had grown lukewarm. The General was mortified that the French should come across the ocean and make great sacrifices to help us, and should find so much indifference prevailing among the citizens of many of the States, and so few coming forward to fill up the decimated ranks. At the request of Washington, President Reed was invested with extraordinary powers, in 1780, which were used prudently but effectively. During the winter of this year, some of the veteran soldiers of the Pennsylvania line mutinied and commenced the march on Philadelphia with arms in their hands. Some of them had just cause. They had enlisted for "three years or the war," meaning for three years unless the war closed sooner. But the authorities had interpreted it to mean, three years, or as much longer as the war should last. President Reed immediately rode out to meet the mutineers, heard their cause, and pledged if all would return to camp, to have those who had honorably served out the full term of three years discharged, which was agreed to. Before the arrival of the President, two emissaries from the enemy who had heard of the disaffection, came into camp, offering strong inducements for them to continue the revolt. But the mutineers spurned the offer, and delivered them over to the officers, by whom they were tried and executed as spies. The soldiers who had so patriotically arrested and handed over these messengers were offered a reward of fifty guineas; but they refused it on the plea that they were acting under authority of the Board of Sergeants, under whose order the mutiny was being conducted. Accordingly, a hundred guineas were offered to this board for their fidelity. Their answer showed how conscientious even mutineers can be: "It was not for the sake, or through any expectation of reward; but for the love of our country, that we sent the spies immediately to Gen. Wayne; we therefore do not consider ourselves entitled to any other reward but the love of our country, and do jointly agree to accept of no other."

William Moore was elected President to succeed Joseph Reed, from November 14, 1781, but held the office less than one year, the term of three years for which he had been a Councilman having expired, which was the limit of service. James Potter was chosen Vice President. On account of the hostile attitude of the Ohio Indians, it was decided to call out a body of volunteers, numbering some 400 from the counties of Washington and Westmoreland, where the outrages upon the settlers had been most sorely felt, who chose for their commander Col. William Crawford, of Westmoreland. The expedition met a most unfortunate fate. It was defeated and cut to pieces, and the leader taken captive and burned at the stake. Crawford County, which was settled very soon afterward, was named in honor of this unfortunate soldier. In the month of November, intelligence was communicated to the Legislature that Pennsylvania soldiers, confined as prisoners of war on board of the Jersey, an old hulk lying in the New York Harbor, were in a starving condition, receiving at the hands of the enemy the most barbarous and inhuman treatment. Fifty barrels of flour and 300 bushels of potatoes were immediately sent to them.

In the State election of 1782, contested with great violence, John Dickinson was chosen President, and James Ewing Vice President. On the 12th of March, 1783, intelligence was first received of the signing of the preliminary treaty in which independence was acknowledged, and on the 11th of April Congress sent forth the joyful proclamation ordering a cessation of hostilities. The soldiers of Burgoyne, who had been confined in the prison camp at Lancaster, were put upon the march for New York, passing through Philadelphia on the way. Everywhere was joy unspeakable. The obstructions were removed from the Delaware, and the white wings of commerce again came fluttering on every breeze. In June, Pennsylvania soldiers, exasperated by delay in receiving their pay and their discharge, and impatient to return to their homes, to a considerable number marched from their camp at Lancaster, and arriving at Philadelphia sent a committee with arms in their hands to the State House door with a remonstrance asking permission to elect officers to command them for the redress of their grievances, their own having left them, and employing threats in case of refusal. These demands the Council rejected. The President of Congress, hearing of these proceedings, called a special session, which resolved to demand that the militia of the State should be called out to quell the insurgents. The Council refused to resort to this extreme measure, when Congress, watchful of its dignity and of its supposed supreme authority, left Philadelphia and established itself in Princeton, N. J., and though invited to return at its next session, it refused, and met at Annapolis.

In October, 1784, the last treaty was concluded with the Indians at Fort Stanwix. The Commissioners at this conference purchased from the natives all the land to the north of the Ohio River, and the line of Pine Creek, which completed the entire limits of the State with the exception of the triangle at Erie, which was acquired from the United States in 1792. This purchase was confirmed by the Wyandots and Delawares at Fort McIntosh January 21, 1785, and the grant was made secure.

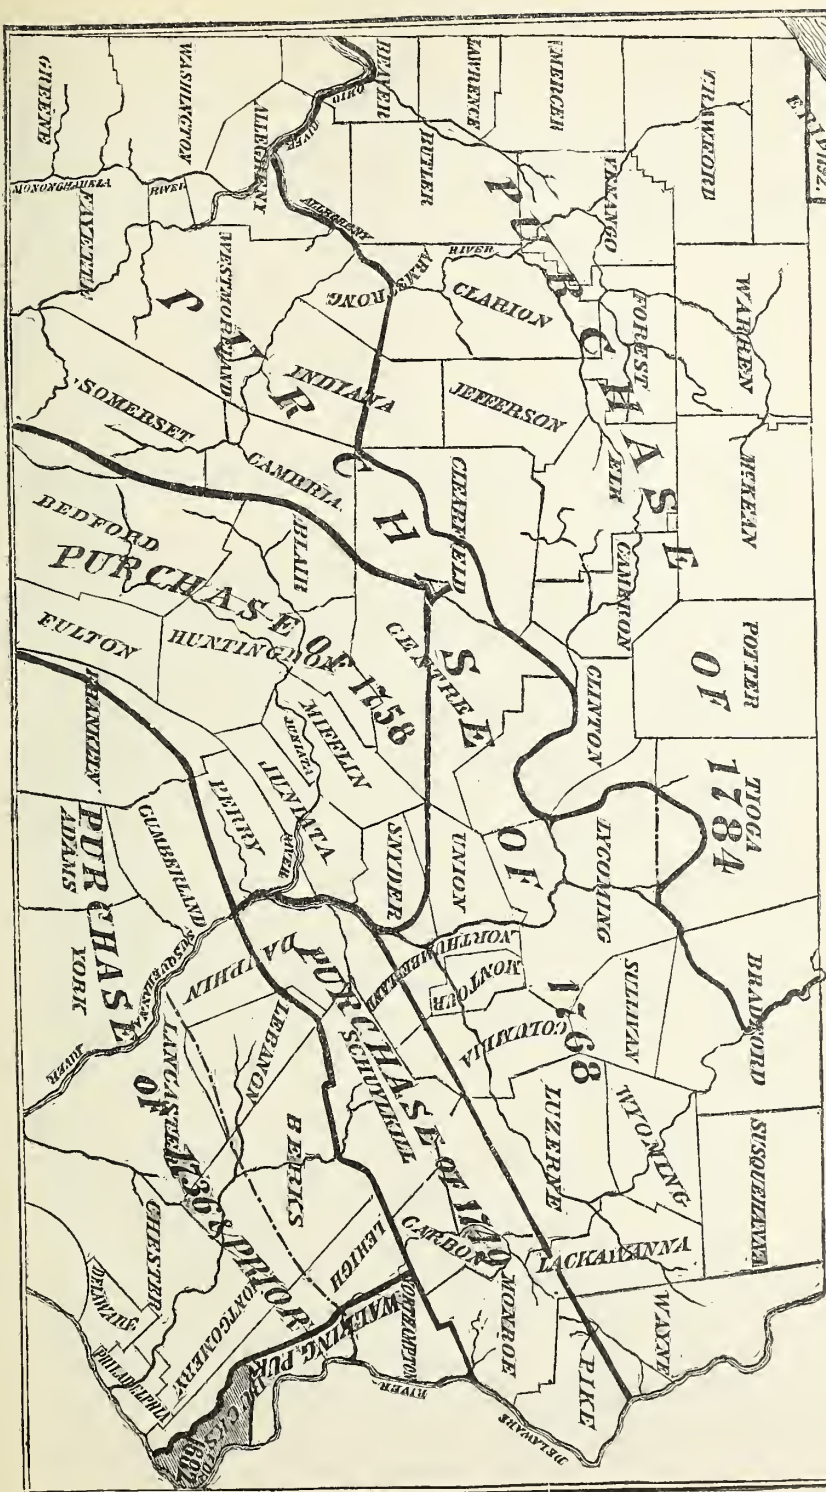

In September, 1785, after a long absence in the service of his country abroad, perfecting treaties, and otherwise establishing just relations with other nations, the venerable Benjamin Franklin, then nearly eighty years old, feeling the infirmities of age coming upon him, asked to be relieved of the duties of Minister at the Court of France, and returned to Philadelphia. Soon after his arrival, he was elected President of the Council. Charles Biddle was elected Vice President. It was at this period that a citizen of Pennsylvania, John Fitch, secured a patent on his invention for propelling boats by steam. In May, 1787, the convention to frame a constitution for the United States met in Philadelphia. The delegation from Pennsylvania was Benjamin Franklin, Robert Morris, Thomas Mifflin, George Clymer, Thomas Fitzsimons, Jared Ingersoll, James Wilson and Gouverneur Morris. Upon the completion of their work, the instrument was submitted to the several States for adoption. A convention was called in Pennsylvania, which met on the 21st of November, and though encountering resolute opposition, it was finally adopted on the 12th of December. On the following day, the convention, the Supreme Council and officers of the State and city government, moved in procession to the old court house, where the adoption of the constitution was formally proclaimed amidst the booming of cannon and the ringing of bells.

On the 5th of November, 1788, Thomas Mifflin was elected President, and George Ross Vice President. The constitution of the State, framed in and adapted to the exigencies of an emergency, was ill suited to the needs of State in its relations to the new nation. Accordingly, a convention assembled for the purpose of preparing a new constitution in November, 1789, which was finally adopted on September 2, 1790. By the provisions of this instrument, the Executive Council was abolished, and the executive duties were vested in the hands of a Governor. Legislation was intrusted to an Assembly and a Senate. The judicial system was continued, the terms of the Judges extending through good behavior.

CHAPTER XIII.

THOMAS MIFFLIN, 1788-99—THOMAS MCKEAN, 1799-1808—SIMON SNYDER, 1803-17—
WILLIAM FINDLAY, 1817-20—JOSEPH HEISTER, 1820-23—JOHN A. SHULZE, 1823-
29—GEORGE WOLFE, 1829-35—JOSEPH RITNER, 1835-39.

THE first election under the new Constitution resulted in the choice of Thomas Mifflin, who was re-elected for three successive terms, giving him the distinction of having been longer in the executive chair than any other person, a period of eleven years. A system of internal improvements was now commenced, by which vast water communications were undertaken, and a mountain of debt was accumulated, a portion of which hangs over the State to this day. In 1793, the Bank of Pennsylvania was chartered, one-third of the capital stock of which was subscribed for by the State. Branches were established at Lancaster, Harrisburg, Reading, Easton and Pittsburgh. The branches were discontinued in 1810; in 1843, the stock held by the State was sold, and in 1857, it ceased to exist. In 1793, the yellow fever visited Philadelphia. It was deadly in its effects and produced a panic unparalleled. Gov. Mifflin, and Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the United States Treasury, were attacked. "Men of affluent fortunes, who gave daily employment and subsistence to hundreds, were abandoned to the care of a negro after their wives, children, friends, clerks and servants had fled away and left them to their fate. In some cases, at the commencement of the disorder, no money could procure proper attendance. Many of the poor perished without a human being to hand them a drink of water, to administer medicines, or to perform any charitable office for them. Nearly 5,000 perished by this wasting pestilence."

The whisky insurrection in some of the western counties of the State, which occurred in 1794, excited, by its lawlessness and wide extent, general interest. An act of Congress, of March 3, 1791, laid a tax on distilled spirits of four pence per gallon. The then counties of Washington, Westmoreland, Allegheny and Fayette, comprising the southwestern quarter of the State, were almost exclusively engaged in the production of grain. Being far removed from any market, the product of their farms brought them scarcely any returns. The consequence was that a large proportion of the surplus grain was turned into distilled spirits, and nearly every other farmer was a distiller. This tax was seen to bear heavily upon them, from which a non-producer of spirits was relieved. A rash determination was formed to resist its collection, and a belief entertained, if all were united in resisting, it would be taken off. Frequent altercations occurred between the persons appointed United States Collectors and these resisting citizens. As an example, on the 5th of September, 1791, a party in disguise set upon Robert Johnson, a Collector for Allegheny and Washington, tarred and feathered him, cut off his hair, took away his horse, and left him in this plight to proceed. Writs for the arrest of the perpetrators were issued, but none dared to venture into the territory to serve them. On May 8, 1792, the law was modified, and the tax reduced. In September, 1792, President Washington issued his proclamation commanding all persons to submit to the law, and to forbear from further opposition. But these measures had no effect, and the insurgents began to organize for forcible resistance. One Maj. Macfarlane, who in command of a party of insurrectionists, was killed in an encounter with United States soldiers at the house of Gen. Neville. The feeling now ran very high, and it was hardly safe for any person to breathe a whisper against the insurgents throughout all this district. "A breath," says Brackenridge, "in favor of the law, was sufficient to ruin any man. A clergyman was not thought orthodox in the pulpit unless against the law. A physician was not capable of administering medicine, unless his principles were right in this respect. A lawyer could get no practice, nor a merchant at a country store get custom if for the law. On the contrary, to talk against the law was the way to office and emolument. To go to the Legislature or to Congress you must make a noise against it. It was the Shibboleth of safety and the ladder of ambition." One Bradford had, of his own notion, issued a circular letter to the Colonels of regiments to assemble with their commands at Braddock's field on the 1st of August, where they appointed officers and moved on to Pittsburgh. After having burned a barn, and made some noisy demonstrations, they were induced by some cool heads to return. These turbulent proceedings coming to the ears of the State and National authorities at Philadelphia, measures were concerted to promptly and effectually check them. Gov. Mifflin appointed Chief Justice McKean, and Gen. William Irvine to proceed to the disaffected district, ascertain the facts, and try to bring the leaders to justice. President Washington issued a proclamation commanding all persons in arms to disperse to their homes on or before the 1st of September, proximo, and called out the militia of four States—Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Maryland and Virginia—to the number of 13,000 men, to enforce his commands. The quota of Pennsylvania was 4,500 infantry, 500 cavalry, 200 artillery, and Gov. Mifflin took command in person. Gov. Richard Howell, of New Jersey, Gov. Thomas S. Lee, of Maryland, and Gen. Daniel Morgan, of Virginia, commanded the forces from their States, and Gov. Henry Lee, of Virginia, was placed in chief command. President Washington, accompanied by Gen. Knox, Secretary of War, Alexander Hamilton, Secretary of the Treasury, and Richard Peters, of the United States District Court, set out on the 1st of October, for the seat of the disturbance. On Friday, the President reached Harrisburg, and on Saturday Carlisle, whither the army had preceded him. In the meantime a committee, consisting of James Ross, Jasper Yeates and William Bradford, was appointed by President Washington to proceed to the disaffected district, and endeavor to persuade misguided citizens to return to their allegiance.

A meeting of 260 delegates from the four counties was held at Parkinson's Ferry on the 14th of August, at which the state of their cause was considered, resolutions adopted, and a committee of sixty, one from each county, was appointed, and a sub-committee of twelve was named to confer with the United States Commissioners, McKean and Irvine. These conferences with the State and National Committees were successful in arranging preliminary conditions of settlement. On the 2d of October, the Committee of Safety of the insurgents met at Parkinson's Ferry, and having now learned that a well-organized army, with Washington at its head, was marching westward for enforcing obedience to the laws, appointed a committee of two, William Findley and David Reddick, to meet the President, and assure him that the disaffected were disposed to return to their duty. They met Washington at Carlisle, and several conferences were held, and assurances given of implicit obedience; but the President said that as the troops had been called out, the orders for the march would not be countermanded. The President proceeded forward on the 11th of October to Chambersburg, reached Williamsport on the 13th and Fort Cumberland on the 14th, where he reviewed the Virginia and Maryland forces, and arrived at Bedford on the 19th. Remaining a few days, and being satisfied that the sentiment of the people had changed, he returned to Philadelphia, arriving on the 28th, leaving Gen. Lee to meet the Commissioners and make such conditions of pacification as should seem just. Another meeting of the Committee of Safety was held at Parkinson's Ferry on the 24th, at which assurances of abandonment of opposition to the laws were received, and the same committee, with the addition of Thomas Morton and Ephriam Douglass, was directed to return to headquarters and give assurance of this disposition. They did not reach Bedford until after the departure of Washington. But at Uniontown they met Gen. Lee, with whom it was agreed that the citizens of these four counties should subscribe to an oath to support the Constitution and obey the laws. Justices of the Peace issued notices that books were opened for subscribing to the oath, and Gen. Lee issued a judicious address urging ready obedience. Seeing that all requirements were being faithfully carried out, an order was issued on the 17th of November for the return of the army and its disbandment. A number of arrests were made and trials and convictions were had, but all were ultimately pardoned.

With the exception of a slight ebullition at the prospect of a war with France in 1797, and a resistance to the operation of the "Homestead Tax" in Lehigh, Berks and Northampton Counties, when the militia was called out, the remainder of the term of Gov. Mifflin passed in comparative quiet. By an act of the Legislature of the 3d of April, 1799, the capital of the State was removed to Lancaster, and soon after the capital of the United States to Washington, the house on Ninth street, which had been built for the residence of the President of the United States, passing to the use of the University of Pennsylvania.

During the administrations of Thomas McKean, who was elected Governor in 1799, and Simon Snyder in 1808, little beyond heated political contests marked the even tenor of the government, until the breaking-out of the troubles which eventuated in the war of 1812. The blockade of the coast of France in 1806, and the retaliatory measures of Napoleon in his Berlin decree, swept American commerce, which had hitherto preserved a neutral attitude and profited by European wars, from the seas. The haughty conduct of Great Britain in boarding American vessels for suspected deserters from the British Navy, under cover of which the grossest outrages were committed, American seamen being dragged from the decks of their vessels and impressed into the English service, induced President Jefferson, in July, 1807, to issue his proclamation ordering all British armed vessels to leave the waters of the United States, and forbidding any to enter, until satisfaction for the past and security for the future should be provided for. Upon the meeting of Congress in December, an embargo was laid, detaining all vessels, American and foreign, then in American waters, and ordering home all vessels abroad. Negotiations were conducted between the two countries, but no definite results were reached, and in the meantime causes of irritation multiplied until 1812, when President

Madison declared war against Great Britain, known as the war of 1812. Pennsylvania promptly seconded the National Government, the message of Gov. Snyder on the occasion ringing like a silver clarion. The national call for 100,000 men required 14,000 from this State, but so great was the enthusiasm, that several times this number tendered their services. The State force was organized in two divisions, to the command of the first of which Maj. Gen. Isaac Morrell was appointed, and to the second Maj. Gen. Adamson Tannehill. Gunboats and privateers were built in the harbor of Erie and on the Delaware, and the defenses upon the latter were put in order and suitable armaments provided. At Tippecanoe, at Detroit, at Queenstown Heights, at the River Raisin, at Fort Stephenson, and at the River Thames, the war was waged with varying success. Upon the water, Commodores Decatur, Hull, Jones, Perry, Lawrence, Porter and McDonough made a bright chapter in American history, as was to be wished, inasmuch as the war had been undertaken to vindicate the honor and integrity of that branch of the service. Napoleon, having met with disaster, and his power having been broken, 14,000 of Wellington's veterans were sent to Canada, and the campaign of the next year was opened with vigor. But at the battles of Oswego, Chippewa, Lundy's Lane, Fort Erie and Plattsburg, the tide was turned against the enemy, and the country saved from invasion. The act which created most alarm to Pennsylvania was one of vandalism scarcely matched in the annals of warfare. In August, 1814, Gen. Ross, with 6,000 men in a flotilla of sixty sails, moved up Chesapeake Bay, fired the capitol, President's house and the various offices of cabinet ministers, and these costly and substantial buildings, the national library and all the records of the Government from its foundation were utterly destroyed. Shortly afterward, Ross appeared before Baltimore with the design of multiplying his barbarisms, but he was met by a force hastily collected under Gen. Samuel Smith, a Pennsylvania veteran of the Revolution, and in the brief engagement which ensued Ross was killed. In the severe battle with the corps of Gen. Stricker, the British lost some 300 men. The fleet in the meantime opened a fierce bombardment of Fort M'Henry, and during the day and ensuing night 1,500 bombshells were thrown, but all to no purpose, the gallant defense of Maj. Armistead proving successful. It was during this awful night that Maj. Key, who was a prisoner on board the fleet, wrote the song of the Star Spangled Banner, which became the national lyric. It was in the administration of Gov. Snyder in February, 1810, that an act was passed making Harrisburg the seat of government, and a commission raised for erecting public buildings, the sessions of the Legislature being held in the court house at Harrisburg from 1812 to 1821.

The administrations of William Findley, elected in 1817, Joseph Heister, in 1820, and John Andrew Schulz in 1823, followed without marked events. Parties became very warm in their discussions and in their management of political campaigns. The charters for the forty banks which had been passed in a fit of frenzy over the veto of Gov. Snyder set a flood of paper money afloat. The public improvements, principally in opening lines of canal, were prosecuted, and vast debts incurred. These lines of conveyances were vitally needed to move the immense products and vast resources of the State.

Previous to the year 1820, little use was made of stone coal. Judge Obediah Gore, a blacksmith, used it upon his forge as early as 1769, and found the heat stronger and more enduring than that produced by charcoal. In 1791, Phillip Ginter, of Carbon County, a hunter by profession, having on one occasion been out all day without discovering any game, was returning at night discouraged and worn out, across the Mauch Chunk Mountain, when, in the gathering shades he stumbled upon something which seemed to have a glistening appearance, that he was induced to pick up and carry home. This specimen was taken to Philadelphia, where an analysis showed it to be a good quality of anthracite coal. But, though coal was known to exist, no one knew how to use it. In 1812, Col. George Shoemaker, of Schuylkill County, took nine wagon loads to Philadelphia. But he was looked upon as an imposter for attempting to sell worthless stone for coal. He finally sold two loads for the cost of transportation, the remaining seven proving a complete loss. In 1812, White & Hazard, manufacturers of wire at the Falls of Schuylkill, induced an application to be made to the Legislature to incorporate a company for the improvement of the Schuylkill, urging as an inducement the importance it would have for transporting coal; whereupon, the Senator from that district, in his place, with an air of knowledge, asserted "that there was no coal there, that there was a kind of black stone which was called coal, but that it would not burn."

White & Hazard procured a cart load of Lehigh coal that cost them $1 a bushel, which was all wasted in a vain attempt to make it ignite. Another cart load was obtained, and a whole night spent in endeavoring to make a fire in the furnace, when the hands shut the furnace door and left the mill in despair. "Fortunately one of them left his jacket in the mill, and returning for it in about half an hour, noticed that the door was red hot, and upon opening it, was surprised at finding the whole furnace at a glowing white heat. The other hands were summoned, and four separate parcels of iron were heated and rolled by the same fire before it required renewing. The furnace was replenished, and as letting it alone had succeeded so well, it was concluded to try it again, and the experiment was repeated with the same result. The Lehigh Navigation Company and the Lehigh Coal Company were incorporated in 1818, which companies became the basis of the Lehigh Coal and Navigation Company, incorporated in 1822. In 1820, coal was sent to Philadelphia by artificial navigation, but 365 tons glutted the market." In 1825, there were brought by the Schuylkill 5,378 tons. In 1826, by the Schuylkill, 16,265 tons, and by the Lehigh 31,280 tons. The stage of water being insufficient, dams and sluices were constructed near Mauch Chunk, in 1819, by which the navigation was improved. The coal boats used were great square arks, 16 to 18 feet wide, and 20 to 25 feet long. At first, two of these were joined together by hinges, to allow them to yield up and down in passing over the dams. Finally, as the boatmen became skilled in the navigation, several were joined, attaining a length of 180 feet. Machinery was used for jointing the planks, and so expert had the men become that five would build an ark and launch it in forty-five minutes. After reaching Philadelphia, these boats were taken to pieces, the plank sold, and the hinges sent back for constructing others. Such were the crude methods adopted in the early days for bringing coal to a market. In 1827, a railroad was commenced, which was completed in three months, nine miles in length. This, with the exception of one at Quincy, Mass., of four miles, built in 1826, was the first constructed in the United States. The descent was 100 feet per mile, and the coal descended by gravity in a half hour, and the cars were drawn back by mules, which rode down with the coal. "The mules cut a most grotesque figure, standing three or four together, in their cars, with their feeding troughs before them, apparently surveying with delight the scenery of the mountain; and though they preserve the most profound gravity, it is utterly impossible for the spectator to maintain his. It is said that the mules, having once experienced the comfort of riding down, regard it as a right, and neither mild nor severe measures will induce them to descend in any other way." Bituminous coal was discovered and its qualities utilized not much earlier than the anthracite. A tract of coal land was taken up in Clearfield County in 1785, by Mr. S. Boyd, and in 1804 he sent an ark down the Susquehanna to Columbia, which caused much surprise to the inhabitants that "an article with which they were wholly unacquainted should be brought to their own doors."

During the administrations of George Wolf, elected in 1829, and Joseph Ritner, elected in 1835, a measure of great beneficence to the State was passed and brought into a good degree of successful operation—nothing less than a broad system of public education. Schools had been early established in Philadelphia, and parochial schools in the more populous portions of the State from the time of early settlement. In 1749, through the influence of Dr. Franklin, a charter was obtained for a "college, academy, and charity school of Pennsylvania," and from this time to the beginning of the present century, the friends of education were earnest in establishing colleges, the Colonial Government, and afterward the Legislature, making liberal grants from the revenues accruing from the sale of lands for their support, the university of Pennsylvania being chartered in 1752, Dickinson College in 1783, Franklin and Marshall College in 1787, and Jefferson College in 1802. Commencing near the beginning of this century, and continuing for over a period of thirty years, vigorous exertions were put forth to establish county academies. Charters were granted for these institutions at the county seats of forty-one counties, and appropriations were made of money, varying from $2,000 to $6,000, and in several instances of quite extensive land grants. In 1809, an act was passed for the education of the "poor, gratis." The Assessors in their annual rounds were to make a record of all such as were indigent, and pay for their education in the most convenient schools. But few were found among the spirited inhabitants of the commonwealth willing to admit that they were so poor as to be objects of charity.

By the act of April 1, 1834, a general system of education by common schools was established. Unfortunately it was complex and unwieldy. At the next session an attempt was made to repeal it, and substitute the old law of 1809 for educating the "poor, gratis," the repeal having been carried in the Senate. But through the appeals of Thaddeus Stevens, a man always in the van in every movement for the elevation of mankind, this was defeated. At the next session, 1836, an entirely new bill, discarding the objectionable features of the old one, was prepared by Dr. George Smith, of Delaware County, and adopted, and from this time forward has been in efficient operation. It may seem strange that so long a time should have elapsed before a general system of education should have been secured. But the diversity of origin and language, the antagonism of religious seats, the very great sparseness of population in many parts, made it impossible at an earlier day to establish schools. In 1854, the system was improved by engrafting upon it the feature of the County Superintendency, and in 1859 by providing for the establishment of twelve Normal Schools, in as many districts into which the State was divided, for the professional training of teachers.

CHAPTER XIV.

IN 1837, a convention assembled in Harrisburg, and subsequently in Philadelphia, for revising the constitution, which revision was adopted by a vote of the people. One of the chief objects of the change was the breaking up of what was known as "omnibus legislation," each bill being required to have but one distinct subject, to be definitely stated in the title. Much of the patronage of the Governor was taken from him, and he was allowed but two terms of three years in any nine years. The Senator's term was fixed at three years. The terms of Supreme Court Judges were limited to fifteen years, Common Pleas Judges to ten, and Associate Judges to five. A step backward was taken in limiting suffrage to white male citizens twenty-one years old, it having previously been extended to citizens irrespective of color. Amendments could be proposed once in five years, and if adopted by two successive Legislatures, and approved by a vote of the people, they became a part of the organic law.

At the opening of the gubernatorial term of David R. Porter, who was chosen in October, 1838, a civil commotion occurred known as the Buckshot War, which at one time threatened a sanguinary result. By the returns, Porter had some 5,000 majority over Ritner, but the latter, who was the incumbent, alleged frauds, and proposed an investigation and revision of the returns. Thomas H. Burrows was Secretary of State, and Chairman of the State Committee of the Anti-Masonic party, and in an elaborate address to the people setting forth the grievance, he closed with the expression "let us treat the election as if we had not been defeated." This expression gave great offense to the opposing party, the Democratic, and public feeling ran high before the meeting of the Legislature. Whether an investigation could be had would depend upon the political complexion of that body. The Senate was clearly Anti-Masonic, and the House would depend upon the Representatives of a certain district in Philadelphia, which embraced the Northern Liberties. The returning board of this district had a majority of Democrats, who proceeded to throw out the entire vote of Northern Liberties, for some alleged irregularities, and gave the certificate to Democrats. Whereupon, the minority of the board assembled, and counted the votes of the Northern Liberties, which gave the election to the Anti-Masonic candidates, and sent certificates accordingly. By right and justice, there is no doubt that the Anti-Masons were fairly elected. But the majority of a returning board alone have authority to make returns, and the Democrats had the certificates which bore prima facie evidence of being correct, and should have been received and transmitted to the House, where alone rested the authority to go behind the returns and investigate their correctness. But upon the meeting of the House the Secretary of the Commonwealth sent in the certificates of the minority of the returning board of the Northern Liberties district, which gave the majority to the Anti-Masons. But the Democrats were not disposed to submit, and the consequence was that two delegations from the disputed district appeared, demanding seats, and upon the organization, two Speakers were elected and took the platform—Thomas S. Cunningham for the Anti-Masons, and William Hopkins for the Democrats. At this stage of the game, an infuriated lobby, collected from Philadelphia and surrounding cities, broke into the two Houses, and, interrupting all business, threatened the lives of members, and compelled them to seek safety in flight, when they took uncontrolled possession of the chambers and indulged in noisy and impassioned harangues. From the capitol, the mob proceeded to the court house, where a "committee of safety" was appointed. For several days the members dared not enter either House, and when one of the parties of the House attempted to assemble, the person who had been appointed to act as Speaker was forcibly ejected. All business was at an end, and the Executive and State Departments were closed. At this juncture, Gov. Ritner ordered out the militia, and at the same time called on the United States authorities for help. The militia, under Gens. Pattison and Alexander, came promptly to the rescue, but the President refused to furnish the National troops, though the United States storekeeper at the Frankford Arsenal turned over a liberal supply of ball and buckshot cartridges. The arrival of the militia only served to fire the spirit of the lobby, and they immediately commenced drilling and organizing, supplying themselves with arms and fixed ammunition. The militia authorities were, however, able to clear the capitol, when the two Houses assembled, and the Senate signified the willingness to recognize that branch of the House presided over by Mr. Hopkins. This ended the difficulty, and Gov. Porter was duly inaugurated.

Francis R. Shunk was chosen Governor in 1845, and during his term of office the war with Mexico occurred. Two volunteer regiments, one under command of Col. Wynkoop, and the other under Col. Roberts, subsequently Col. John W. Geary, were sent to the field, while the services of a much larger number were offered, but could not be received. Toward the close of his first term, having been reduced by sickness, and feeling his end approaching, Gov. Shunk resigned, and was succeeded by the Speaker of the Senate, William F. Johnston, who was duly chosen at the next annual election. During the administrations of William Bigler, elected in 1851, James Pollock in 1854, and William F. Packer in 1857, little beyond the ordinary course of events marked the history of the State. The lines of public works undertaken at the expense of the State were completed. Their cost had been enormous, and a debt was piled up against it of over $40,000,000. These works, vastly expensive, were still to operate and keep in repair, and the revenues therefrom failing to meet expectations, it was determined in the administration of Gov. Pollock to sell them to the highest bidder, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company purchasing them for the sum of $7,500,000.

In the administration of Gov. Packer, petroleum was first discovered in quantities in this country by boring into the bowels of the earth. From the earliest settlement of the country it was known to exist. As early as July 18, 1627, a French missionary, Joseph Delaroche Dailon, of the order of Recollets, described it in a letter published in 1632, in Segard's L'Histoire du Canada, and this description is confirmed by the journal of Charlevoix, 1721. Fathers Dollier and Galinee, missionaries of the order of St. Sulpice, made a map of this section of country, which they sent to Jean Talon, Intendant of Canada, on the 10th of November, 1670, on which was marked at about the point where is now the town of Cuba, N. Y., "Fontaine de Bitume." The Earl of Belmont, Governor of New York, instructed his chief engineer, Wolfgang W. Romer, on September 3, 1700, in his visit to the Six Nations,

"To go and view a well or spring which is eight miles beyond the Seneks' farthest castle, which they have told me blazes up in a flame, when a lighted coale or firebrand is put into it; you will do well to taste the said water, and give me your opinion thereof, and bring with you some of it." Thomas Chabert de Joncaire, who died in September, 1740, is mentioned in the journal of Charlevoix of 1721 as authority for the existence of oil at the place mentioned above, and at points further south, probably on Oil Creek. The following account of an event occurring during the occupancy of this part of the State by the French is given as an example of the religious uses made of oil by the Indians, as these fire dances are understood to have been annually celebrated: "While descending the Allegheny, fifteen leagues below the mouth of the Connewango (Warren) and three above Fort Venango (Oil City), we were invited by the chief of the Senecas to attend a religious ceremony of his tribe. We landed and drew up our canoes on a point where a small stream entered the river. The tribe appeared unusually solemn. We marched up the stream about a half a league, where the company, a large band it appeared, had arrived some days before us. Gigantic hills begirt us on every side. The scene was really sublime. The great chief then recited the conquests and heroisms of their ancestors. The surface of the stream was covered with a thick scum, which burst into a complete conflagration. The oil had been gathered and lighted with a torch. At sight of the flames, the Indians gave forth a triumphant shout, and made the hills and valley re-echo again."

In nearly all geographies and notes of travel published during the early period of settlement, this oil is referred to, and on several maps the word petroleum appears opposite the mouth of Oil Creek. Gen. Washington, in his will, in speaking of his lands on the Great Kanawha, says: "The tract of which the 125 acres is a moiety, was taken up by Gen. Andrew Lewis and myself, for and on account of a bituminous spring which it contains of so inflammable a nature as to burn as freely as spirits, and is as nearly difficult to extinguish." Mr. Jefferson, in his Notes on Virginia, also gives an account of a burning spring on the lower grounds of the Great Kanawha. This oil not only seems to have been known, but to have been systematically gathered in very early times. Upon the flats a mile or so below the city of Titusville are many acres of cradle holes dug out and lined with split logs, evidently constructed for the purpose of gathering it. The fact that the earliest inhabitants could never discover any stumps from which these logs were cut, and the further fact that trees are growing of giant size in the midst of these cradles, are evidences that they must have been operated long ago. It could not have been the work of any of the nomadic Indian tribes found here at the coming of the white man, for they were never known to undertake any enterprise involving so much labor, and what could they do with the oil when obtained.

The French could hardly have done the work, for we have no account of the oil having been obtained in quantities, or of its being transported to France. May this not have been the work of the Mound-Builders, or of colonies from Central America? When the writer first visited these pits, in 1855, he found a spring some distance below Titusville, on Oil Creek, where the water was conducted into a trough, from which, daily, the oil, floating on its surface, was taken off by throwing a woolen blanket upon it, and then wringing it into a tub, the clean wool absorbing the oil and rejecting the water, and in this way a considerable quantity was obtained.

In 1859, Mr. E. L. Drake, at first representing a company in New York, commenced drilling near the spot where this tub was located, and when the company would give him no more money, straining his own resources, and his credit with his friends almost to the breaking point, and when about to give up in despair, finally struck a powerful current of pure oil. From this time forward, the territory down the valley of Oil Creek and up all its tributaries was rapidly acquired and developed for oil land. In some places, the oil was sent up with immense force, at the rate of thousands of barrels each day, and great trouble was experienced in bringing it under control and storing it. In some cases, the force of the gas was so powerful on being accidentally fired, as to defy all approach for many days, and lighted up the forests at night with billows of light.

The oil has been found in paying quantities in McKean, Warren, Forest, Crawford, Venango, Clarion, Butler and Armstrong Counties, chiefly along the upper waters of the Allegheny River and its tributary, the Oil Creek. It was first transported in barrels, and teams were kept busy from the first dawn until far into the night. As soon as practicable, lines of railway were constructed from nearly all the trunk lines. Finally barrels gave place to immense iron tanks riveted upon cars, provided for the escape of the gases, and later great pipe lines were extended from the wells to the seaboard, and to the Great Lakes, through which the fluid is forced by steam to its distant destinations. Its principal uses are for illumination and lubricating, though many of its products are employed in the mechanic arts, notably for dyeing, mixing of paints, and in the practice of medicine. Its production has grown to be enormous, and seems as yet to show no sign of diminution. We give an exhibit of the annual production since its discovery, compiled for this work by William H. Siviter, editor of the Oil City Derrick, which is the acknowledged authority on oil matters:

Production of the Pennsylvania Oil Fields, compiled from the Derrick's Hand-book, December, 1883:

In the fall of 1860, Andrew G. Curtin was elected Governor of Pennsylvania, and Abraham Lincoln President of the United States. An organized rebellion, under the specious name of secession, was thereupon undertaken, embracing parts of fifteen States, commonly designated the Slave States, and a government established under the name of the Confederate States of America, with an Executive and Congress, which commenced the raising of troops for defense.

On the 12th of April, an attack was made upon a small garrison of United States troops shut up in Fort Sumter. This was rightly interpreted as the first act in a great drama. On the 15th, the President summoned 75,000 volunteers to vindicate the national authority, calling for sixteen regiments from Pennsylvania, and urging that two be sent forward immediately, as the capital was without defenders.

The people of the State, having no idea that war could be possible, had no preparation for the event, There chanced at the time to be five companies in a tolerable state of organization. These were the Ringold Light Artillery, Capt. McKnight, of Reading; the Logan Guards, Capt. Selheimer, of Lewistown; the Washington Artillery, Capt. Wren, and the National Light Infantry, Capt. McDonald, of Pottsville; and the Allen Rifles, Capt. Yeager, of Allentown.

On the 18th, in conjunction with a company of fifty regulars, on their way from the West to Fort McHenry, under command of Capt. Pemberton, afterward Lieut. Gen. Pemberton, of the rebel army, these troops moved by rail for Washington. At Baltimore, they were obliged to march two miles through a jeering and insulting crowd. At the center of the city, the regulars filed off toward Fort McHenry, leaving the volunteers to pursue their way alone, when the crowd of maddened people were excited to redoubled insults. In the whole battalion there was not a charge of powder; but a member of the Logan Guards, who chanced to have a box of percussion caps in his pocket, had distributed them to his comrades, who carried their pieces capped and half cocked, creating the impression that they were loaded and ready for service. This ruse undoubtedly saved the battalion from the murderous assault made upon the Massachusetts Sixth on the following day. Before leaving, they were pelted with stones and billets of wood while boarding the cars; but, fortunately, none were seriously injured, and the train finally moved away and reached Washington in safety, the first troops to come to the unguarded and imperiled capital.

Instead of sixteen, twenty-five regiments were organized for the three months' service from Pennsylvania. Judging from the threatening attitude assumed by the rebels across the Potomac that the southern frontier would be constantly menaced, Gov. Curtin sought permission to organize a select corps, to consist of thirteen regiments of infantry, one of cavalry, and one of artillery, and to be known as the Pennsylvania Reserve Corps, which the Legislature, in special session, granted. This corps of 15,000 men was speedily raised, and the intention of the State authorities was to keep this body permanently within the limits of the Commonwealth for defense. But at the time of the First Bull Run disaster in July, 1861, the National Government found itself without troops to even defend the capital, the time of the three months' men being now about to expire, and at its urgent call this fine body was sent forward and never again returned for the execution of the duty for which it was formed, having borne the brunt of the fighting on many a hard-fought field during the three years of its service.

In addition to the volunteer troops furnished in response to the several calls of the President, upon the occasion of the rebel invasion of Maryland in September, 1862, Gov. Curtin called 50,000 men for the emergency, and though the time was very brief, 25,000 came, were organized under command of Gen. John F. Reynolds, and were marched to the border. But the battle of Antietam, fought on the 17th of September, caused the enemy to beat a hasty retreat, and the border was relieved when the emergency troops were disbanded and returned to their homes. On the 19th of October, Gen. J. E. B. Stewart, of the rebel army, with 1,800 horsemen under command of Hampton, Lee and Jones, crossed the Potomac and made directly for Chambersburg, arriving after dark. Not waiting for morning to attack, he sent in a flag of truce demanding the surrender of the town. There were 275 Union soldiers in hospital, whom he paroled. During the night, the troopers were busy picking up horses—swapping horses perhaps it should be called—and the morning saw them early on the move. The rear guard gave notice before leaving to remove all families from the neighborhood of the public buildings, as they intended to fire them. There was a large amount of fixed ammunition in them, which had been captured from Longstreet's train, besides Government stores of shoes, clothing and muskets. At 11 o'clock the station house, round house, railroad machine shops and warehouses were fired and consigned to destruction. The fire department was promptly out; but it was dangerous to approach the burning buildings on account of the ammunition, and all perished.

The year 1862 was one of intense excitement and activity. From about the 1st of May, 1861, to the end of 1862, there were recruited in the State of Pennsylvania, one hundred and eleven regiments, including eleven of cavalry and three of artillery, for three years' service; twenty-five regiments for three months; seventeen for nine months; fifteen of drafted militia; and twenty-five called out for the emergency, an aggregate of one hundred and ninety-three regiments—a grand total of over 200,000 men—a great army in itself.

In June, 1863, Gen. Robert E. Lee, with his entire army of Northern Virginia, invaded Pennsylvania. The Army of the Potomac, under Gen. Joseph Hooker, followed. The latter was superseded on the 28th of June by Gen. George G. Meade. The vanguards of the army met a mile or so out of Gettysburg on the Chambersburg pike on the morning of the 1st of July. Hill's corps of the rebel army was held in check by the sturdy fighting of a small division of cavalry under Gen. Buford until 10 o'clock, when Gen. Reynolds came to his relief with the First Corps. While bringing his forces into action, Reynolds was killed, and the command devolved on Gen. Abner Doubleday, and the fighting became terrible, the Union forces being greatly outnumbered. At 2 o'clock in the afternoon, the Eleventh Corps, Gen. O. O. Howard, came to the support of the First. But now the corps of Ewell had joined hands with Hill, and a full two-thirds of the entire rebel army was on the field, opposed by only the two weak Union corps, in an inferior position. A sturdy fight was however maintained until 5 o'clock, when the Union forces withdrew through the town, and took position upon rising ground covering the Baltimore pike. During the night the entire Union army came up, with the exception of the Sixth Corps, and took position, and at 2 o'clock in the morning Gen. Meade and staff came on the field. During the morning hours, and until 4 o'clock in the afternoon, the two armies were getting into position for the desperate struggle. The Third Corps, Gen. Sickles, occupied the extreme left, his corps abutting on the Little Round Top at the Devil's Den, and reaching, en echelon, through the rugged ground to the Peach Orchard, and thence along the Emmetsburg pike, where it joined the Second Corps, Gen. Hancock, reaching over Cemetery Hill, the Eleventh Corps, Gen. Howard, the First, Gen. Doubleday, and the Twelfth, Gen. Slocum, reaching across Culp's Hill—the whole crescent shape. To this formation the rebel army conformed, Longstreet opposite the Union left, Hill opposite the center, and Ewell opposite the Union right. At 4 P. M. the battle was opened by Longstreet, on the extreme left of Sickles, and the fighting became terrific, the rebels making strenuous efforts to gain Little Round Top. But at the opportune moment a part of the Fifth Corps, Gen. Sykes, was brought upon that key position, and it was saved to the Union side. The slaughter in front of Round Top at the wheat-field and the Peach Orchard was fearful. The Third Corps was driven back from its advanced position, and its commander, Gen. Sickles, was wounded, losing a leg. In a more contracted position, the Union line was made secure, where it rested for the night. Just at dusk, the Louisiana Tigers, some 1,800 men, made a desperate charge on Cemetery Hill, emerging suddenly from a hillock just back of the town. The struggle was desperate, but the Tigers being weakened by the fire of the artillery, and by the infantry crouching behind the stone wall, the onset was checked, and Carroll's brigade, of the Second Corps, coming to the rescue, they were finally beaten back, terribly decimated. At about the same time, a portion of Ewell's corps made an advance on the extreme Union right, at a point where the troops had been withdrawn to send to the support of Sickles, and unopposed, gained the extremity of Culp's Hill, pushing through nearly to the Baltimore pike, in dangerous proximity to the reserve artillery and trains, and even the headquarters of the Union commander. But in their attempt to roll up the Union right they were met by Green's brigade of the Twelfth Corps, and by desperate fighting their further progress was stayed. Thus ended the battle of the second day. The Union left and right had been sorely jammed and pushed back.

At 4 o'clock on the morning of the 3d of July, Gen. Geary, who had been ordered away to the support of Sickles, having returned during the night and taken position on the right of Green, opened the battle for the recovery of his lost breastworks on the right of Culp's Hill. Until 10 o'clock, the battle raged with unabated fury. The heat was intolerable, and the sulphurous vapor hung like a pall over the combatants, shutting out the light of day. The fighting was in the midst of the forest, and the echoes resounded with fearful distinctness. The Twelfth Corps was supported by portions of the Sixth, which had now come up. At length the enemy, weakened and finding themselves overborne on all sides, gave way, and the Union breastworks were re-occupied and the Union right made entirely secure. Comparative quiet now reigned on either side until 2 o'clock in the afternoon, in the meantime both sides bringing up fresh troops and repairing damages. The rebel leader having brought his best available artillery in upon his right center, suddenly opened with 150 pieces a concentric fire upon the devoted Union left center, where stood the troops of Hancock and Doubleday and Sickles. The shock was terrible. Rarely has such a cannonade been known on any field. For nearly two hours it was continued. Thinking that the Union line had been broken and demoralized by this fire, Longstreet brought out a fresh corps of some 18,000 men, under Pickett, and charged full upon the point which had been the mark for the cannonade. As soon as this charging column came into view, the Union artillery opened upon it from right and left and center, and rent it with fearful effect. When come within musket range, the Union troops, who had been crouching behind slight pits and a low stone wall, poured in a most murderous fire. Still the rebels pushed forward with a bold face, and actually crossed the Union lines and had their hands on the Union guns. But the slaughter was too terrible to withstand. The killed and wounded lay scattered over all the plain. Many were gathered in as prisoners. Finally, the remnant staggered back, and the battle of Gettysburg was at an end.

Gathering all in upon his fortified line, the rebel chieftain fell to strengthening it, which he held with a firm hand. At night-fall, he put his trains with the wounded upon the retreat. During the 4th, great activity in building works was manifest, and a heavy skirmish line was kept well out, which resolutely met any advance of Union forces. The entire fighting force of the rebel army remained in position behind their breastworks on Oak Ridge, until nightfall of the 4th, when, under cover of darkness, it was withdrawn, and before morning was well on its way to Williamsport. The losses on the Union side were 2,834 killed, 13,709 wounded, and 6,643 missing, an aggregate of 23,186. Of the losses of the enemy, no adequate returns were made. Meade reports 13,621 prisoners taken, and the losses by killed and wounded must have been greater than on the Union side. On the rebel side, Maj. Gens. Hood, Pender, Trimble and Heth were wounded, Pender mortally. Brig. Gens. Barksdale and Garnett were killed, and Semms mortally wounded. Brig. Gens. Kemper, Armistead, Scales, G. T. Anderson, Hampton, J. M. Jones and Jenkins were wounded; Archer was taken prisoner and Pettigrew was wounded and subsequently killed at Falling Waters. In the Union army Maj. Gen. Reynolds and Brig. Gens. Vincent, Weed, Willard and Zook were killed. Maj. Gens. Sickles, Hancock, Doubleday, Gibbon, Barlow, Warren and Butterfield, and Brig. Gens. Graham, Paul, Stone, Barnes and Brooke were wounded. A National Cemetery was secured on the center of the field, where, as soon as the weather would permit, the dead were gathered and carefully interred. Of the entire number interred, 3,512, Maine had 104; New Hampshire, 49; Vermont, 61; Massachusetts, 159; Rhode Island, 12; Connecticut, 22; New York, 867; New Jersey, 78; Pennsylvania, 534; Delaware, 15; Maryland, 22; West Virginia, 11; Ohio, 131; Indiana, 80; Illinois, 6; Michigan, 171; Wisconsin, 73; Minnesota, 52; United States Regulars, 138; unknown, 979. In the center of the field, a noble monument has been erected, and on the 19th of November, 1864, the ground was formally dedicated, when the eminent orator, Edward Everett, delivered an oration, and President Lincoln delivered the following dedicatory address:

"Fourscore and seven years ago, our fathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle field of that war. We are met to dedicate a portion of it as the final resting place of those who here gave their lives that this nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense we cannot dedicate, we cannot consecrate, we cannot hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work that they have thus far so nobly carried on. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to the cause for which they here gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that the dead shall not have died in vain; that the nation shall, under God, have a new birth of freedom, and that the government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth."

So soon as indications pointed to a possible invasion of the North by the rebel army under Gen. Lee, the State of Pennsylvania was organized in two military departments, that of the Susquehanna, to the command of which Darius N. Couch was assigned, with headquarters at Harrisburg, and that of the Monongahela, under W. T. H. Brooks, with headquarters at Pittsburgh. Urgent calls for the militia were made, and large numbers in regiments, in companies, in squadrons came promptly at the call to the number of over 36,000 men, who were organized for a period of ninety days. Fortifications were thrown up to cover Harrisburg and Pittsburgh, and the troops were moved to threatened points. But before they could be brought into action, the great decisive conflict had been fought, and the enemy driven from northern soil. Four regiments under Gen. Brooks were moved into Ohio to aid in arresting a raid undertaken by John Morgan, who, with 2,000 horse and four guns, had crossed the Ohio River for a diversion in favor of Lee.

In the beginning of July, 1864, Gen. Early invaded Maryland, and made his way to the threshold of Washington. Fearing another invasion of the State, Gov. Curtin called for volunteers to serve for 100 days. Gen. Couch was still at the head of the department of the Susquehanna, and six regiments and six companies were organized, but as fast as organized they were called to the front, the last regiment leaving the State on the 29th of July. On the evening of this day, Gens. McCausland, Bradley Johnson and Harry Gilmore, with 3,000 mounted men and six guns, crossed the Potomac, and made their way to Chambersburg. Another column of 3,000, under Vaughn and Jackson advanced to Hagerstown, and a third to Leitersburg. Averell, with a small force, was at Hagerstown, but finding himself over-matched withdrew through Greencastle to Mount Hope. Lieut. McLean, with fifty men in front of McCausland, gallantly kept his face to the foe, and checked the advance at every favorable point. On being apprised of their coming, the public stores at Chambersburg were moved northward. At six A. M., McCausland opened his batteries upon the town, but, finding it unprotected, took possession. Ringing the court house bell to call the people together, Capt. Fitzhugh read an order to the assembly, signed by Gen. Jubal Early, directing the command to proceed to Chambersburg and demand $100,000 in gold, or $500,000 in greenbacks, and, if not paid, to burn the town. While this parley was in progress, hats, caps, boots, watches, clothing and valuables were unceremoniously appropriated, and purses demanded at the point of the bayonet. As money was not in hand to meet so unexpected a draft, the torch was lighted. In less than a quarter of an hour from the time the first match was applied, the whole business part of the town was in flames. No notice was given for removing the women and children and sick. Burning parties were sent into each quarter of the town, which made thorough work. With the exception of a few houses upon the outskirts, the whole was laid in ruins. Retiring rapidly, the entire rebel command recrossed the Potomac before any adequate force could be gathered to check its progress.

The whole number of soldiers recruited under the various calls for troops from the State of Pennsylvania was 366,000. By authority of the commonwealth, in 1866, the commencement was made of the publication of a history of these volunteer organizations, embracing a brief historical account of the part taken by each regiment and independent body in every battle in which it was engaged, with the name, rank, date of muster, period for which he enlisted, casualties, and fate of every officer and private. This work was completed in 1872, in five imperial octavo volumes of over 1,400 pages each.

In May, 1861, the Society of the Cincinnati of Pennsylvania, an organization of the officers of the Revolutionary war and their descendants, donated $500 toward arming and equipping troops. By order of the Legislature, this sum was devoted to procuring flags for the regiments, and each organization that went forth, was provided with one emblazoned with the arms of the commonwealth. These flags, seamed and battle stained, were returned at the close of the war, and are now preserved in a room devoted to the purpose in the State capitol—precious emblems of the daring and suffering of that great army that went forth to uphold and maintain the integrity of the nation.

When the war was over, the State undertook the charge of providing for all soldiers' orphans in schools located in different parts of its territory, furnishing food, clothing, instruction and care, until they should be grown to manhood and womanhood. The number thus gathered and cared for has been some 7,500 annually, for a period of nineteen years, at an average annual expense of some $600,000.

At the election in 1866, John W. Geary, a veteran General of the late war, was chosen Governor. During his administration, settlements were made with the General Government, extraordinary debts incurred during the war were paid, and a large reduction of the old debt of $40,000,000 inherited from the construction of the canals, was made. A convention for a revision of the constitution was ordered by act of April 11, 1872. This convention assembled in Harrisburg November 13, and adjourned to meet in Philadelphia, where it convened on the 7th of January, 1873, and the instrument framed was adopted on the 18th of December, 1873. By its provisions, the number of Senators was increased from thirty-three to fifty, and Representatives from 100 to 201, subject to further increase in proportion to increase of population; biennial, in place of annual sessions; making the term of Supreme Court Judges twenty-one in place of fifteen years; remanding a large class of legislation to the action of the courts; making the term of Governor four years in place of three, and prohibiting special legislation, were some of the changes provided for.

In January, 1873, John F. Hartranft became Governor, and at the election in 1878, Henry F. Hoyt was chosen Governor, both soldiers of the late war. In the summer of 1877, by concert of action of the employes on the several lines of railway in the State, trains were stopped and travel and traffic were interrupted for several days together. At Pittsburgh, conflicts occurred between the railroad men and the militia, and a vast amount of property was destroyed. The opposition to the local military was too powerful to be controlled, and the National Government was appealed to for aid. A force of regulars was promptly ordered out, and the rioters finally quelled. Unfortunately, Gov. Hartranft was absent from the State at the time of the troubles.

At the election in 1882 Robert E. Pattison was chosen governor. The Legislature, which met at the opening of 1883, having adjourned after a session of 156 days, without passing a Congressional apportionment bill, as was required, was immediately reconvened in extra session by the governor, and remained in session until near the close of the year, from June 1 to December 5, without coming to an agreement upon a bill, and finally adjourned without having passed one. This protracted sitting is in marked contrast to the session of that early Assembly in which an entire constitution and laws of the province were framed and adopted in the space of three days.

James A. Beaver was elected governor of Pennsylvania in November, 1886, and is the present incumbent. He is a native of Perry County, Penn., and a graduate of Jefferson College. He read law, and was admitted to practice in 1859. In April, 1861, he went into the army as a first lieutenant, and served with distinction, being mustered out in December, 1864, with the rank of brigadier-general. The most prominent law enacted during his administration is the Brooks license law, passed in 1887. The proposed amendment to the constitution, prohibiting the manufacture or sale of intoxicants within the State, is now pending, and is a very important measure in temperance legislation.

HISTORY OF MERCER COUNTY.

CHAPTER I.

PHYSICAL FEATURES AND SUBDIVISIONS—BOUNDARIES AND AREA—TOPOGRAPHY—DRAINAGE—TIDE ELEVATIONS—SOIL—VEGETATION—ACT CREATING THE COUNTY—FIRST ELECTION DISTRICTS—ORIGINAL TOWNSHIPS AND THEIR PROGENY—POPULATION OF THE COUNTY BY DECADES.

MERCER COUNTY, as originally defined by act of General Assembly, 12th March, 1800, lies between Crawford on the north, and Beaver on the south, on the line dividing Pennsylvania and Ohio. Its length was thirty-two miles along the State line, and breadth, eastward, where it is bounded by Venango County, twenty-eight miles, the southeast corner jutting on Butler County, the square corners of both being cut off to make a fitting adjustment.

The surface of the county is undulating, but little broken, and peculiarly well watered. It is covered with springs and small streams running into the larger creeks. These creeks consist of the Big Shenango on the west, which rises in Crawford County; Neshannock in the center, with heads all over the northern central portion of the county, and Wolf Creek on the east. These streams all run in a southerly direction, and eventually are swallowed up in the Big Beaver, that empties itself into the Ohio River at Rochester. In addition to these there is the Little Shenango, that runs across a portion of the northern end of the county from east to west, rising six or seven miles east of the central line from south to north, and that empties into the Big Shenango at Greenville; and also Sandy Creek, that takes its rise in Crawford County, and running diagonally through the northeast quarter, empties itself into the Allegheny River about twelve miles below Franklin. Sandy Lake, a sheet of water about a mile and a half long and half a mile wide, situated near the center of the northeast quarter of the county, discharges its surplus water into Sandy Creek. The character of its general surface, its bountiful supply of water, and richness of soil was well calculated to make it the foremost agricultural county in this part of the State; nor has it disappointed the anticipations of its early settlers, for it is now not only a fine agricultural, but a heavy and prosperous mining and iron county, notwithstanding that it lost nearly a fourth of its territory in the erection of Lawrence County.

When Mr. Garvin prepared his manuscript the second geological survey had not been made. From the excellent report of Prof. I. C. White we gather some interesting facts relating to Mercer County, the report being dated 1879. For the sake of convenience these facts are grouped as follows:

1. Topography.—Mercer County, unlike those of its sisters, Beaver and Lawrence, has not had its surface materially modified by the operation of modern agencies. Glacial ice has swept over its territory and leveled its hill peaks and filled up its fertile valleys. The result is undulation, but none of the abrupt peaks which exist in portions of Beaver and southern Lawrence. Then, too, the valleys of its principal streams have been widened and straightened. Even the Shenango, whose actual bed is tortuous, has a comparatively straight valley bed along which it is supposed at one time to have held its way. The valleys, too, are bounded in the main with walls that slope gradually instead of abruptly. The only exceptions are found in the cases where streams have changed their channels, or have worn through the deposits to the underlying solid rock.

2. Drainage.—Though the drainage of the county is somewhat complicated, the rain-water finally all reaches the Big Beaver River, except what falls upon the four northeastern townships, which finds its outlet into the Allegheny. The "divide" which makes this division passes across the county from northwest to southeast. Near the head of Little Shenango, nothing except an instrumental survey will determine the exact location of the divide between the waters that flow southwest into the Shenango and those which flow southeast through Sandy Lake and Sandy Creek into the Allegheny. This condition of things was produced, it is supposed, by a glacial stream which cut through the intervening barrier.

The Shenango is the principal agency in drainage, the entire western half being accommodated by it. Entering Mercer from Crawford County, at Jamestown, it receives two principal tributaries, Little Shenango at Greenville, with Crooked Creek as its leading contributor, and Pymatuning west of Clarksville, with Booth Run as a feeder; and having made some tortuous windings, leaves the county about as far from the State line as where it entered it.

Big Run rises in Greene Township and, taking a southeasterly course through West Salem, empties into the Shenango River near the southeast corner of the latter subdivision.

Neshannock Creek, formed by the union at Mercer of Otter and Mill Creeks with their tributaries, drains the central portion of the county, and finally joins the Shenango River at New Castle, and ultimately through the Big Beaver contributes its stock to the Ohio. Little Neshannock, formed at the Big Bend divide, drops into the main stream a little south of the county line.

Wolf Creek, draining the southeastern portion of the county, flows rapidly into Butler County and joins Slippery Rock Creek, and through the Connoquenessing enters Big Beaver.

Sandy Creek, coming into the county from Crawford, flows southeasterly and, receiving the contents of Sandy Lake, joins the Allegheny River in Venango County.

French Creek, fed by North Deer Creek, drains a small portion of the northeastern part of the county into the Allegheny at Franklin.

3. Tide Elevations.—It will be interesting to know the elevations of various places in the county above the tide or sea level. The following statement shows such altitudes at different railroad stations in the county. On the Erie & Pittsburg the following elevations are given in the survey:

Jamestown, 979 feet; Greenville, 961 feet; Shenango, 941 feet; Transfer, 990 feet; Clarksville, 894 feet; Sharpsville, 948 feet; Sharon, 853 feet; Wheatland, 841 feet; Middlesex, 833 feet.

These are on the grade of the Jamestown & Franklin branch of the Lake Shore:

Naples, 1,165 feet; Stoneboro, 1,171 feet; Coal Branch, 1,199 feet; Clark's, 1,164 feet; Hadley, 1,074 feet; Salem, 998 feet; Amasa, 987 feet.

These are on the line of the Pittsburgh, Shenango & Lake Erie Road:

New Hamburg, 1,158 feet; Fredonia, 1,177 feet; Cool Spring, 1,127 feet; Mercer, 1,108 feet; Pardoe, 1,205 feet; Grove City, 1,250 feet.

The following are on the line of the old New Castle & Franklin Road:

Coulson, 1,277 feet; Summit, 1,388 feet; Garvin, 1,327 feet; Jackson Centre, 1,257 feet; Turner's, 1,137 feet; Mercer, 1,097 feet; Hope Mills, 1,107 feet; Nelson, 1,060 feet; Leesburg, 1,045 feet.

4. Soil.—Mercer County shows unmistakable marks of having been subjected to the presence of northern ice. Glacial marks are to be seen in various parts of the county, notably on the road between Greenville and Mercer, about three miles from the former place. Even on the summit of Keel Ridge, 1,250 feet above tide, the sandstone indicates glacial scratches. A sheet of drift, in some cases more than a hundred feet thick, covers the county. Its composition is various, including a bluish-white clay of great fineness mingled with an occasional rock boulder, and innumerable cobble stones of various sizes. These boulders are often worn by attrition, and include varieties of granite, greenstone, gneiss, limestone, sandstone, shale, coal and most of the varieties of crystalline rocks. The soil is derived mainly from this drift, and is well adapted to the production of the cereals. Under-drainage is a necessity which intelligent and progressive farmers appreciate.

5. Vegetation.—The vegetation of the county is such as characterizes the western part of the State, and includes various forms of herbs, shrubs and trees, both domestic and wild. These vegetable forms are sometimes classified as to their utility for medicinal, esculent and ornamental and useful purposes, as follows:

Medicinal.—Senna, lobelia, ginseng, smartweed, Jamestown weed, snake root, blood root, wahoo, tobacco, marshmallow, pleurisy root, gentian, etc.

Esculent.—Artichoke, potatoes, millet, oats, pea, hop, cherry, plum, apple, mulberry, quince, hickory, maple, persimmon, walnut, chestnut, hazelnut, strawberry, blackberry, raspberry, dewberry, corn, squash, pumpkin, gooseberry, etc.

Ornamental.—Poplar, aspen, linden, maple, horse-chestnut, catalpa, laurel, honey locust, dogwood, holly, evergreen, ivy, honeysuckle, sumach, elm, mountain ash, etc.

Useful for Fabrics.—Hemp, flax, pines, cedar, oak, birch, beech, ash, elm, willow, gum, hickory, sycamore, hemlock, etc.

The act of the Legislature creating the county of Mercer, was passed on the 12th of March, 1800, and reads as follows:

SECTION III. And be it enacted by the authority aforesaid, That all parts of Allegheny County which shall be included within the following boundaries, viz: Beginning at the northeast corner of the county of Beaver, thence northeastwardly along the line of the county of Butler, to the corner of said county of Butler and of the county of Venango, hereinafter described, thence northerly on a line parallel to the western boundry of the State, to the north line of the 5th donation district, thence at a right angle along said line westwardly to the western boundary of the State, thence southerly along said boundary to the northwest corner of the county of Beaver, thence eastwardly along the north boundary of the county of Beaver to the place of beginning, be, and the same is hereby erected into a separate county, to be henceforth called Mercer County, and the place of holding the court of justice in and for the said county shall be fixed by the Legislature at any place at a distance not greater than five miles from the center of said county, which may be most beneficial and convenient for said county. And the Governor shall, and he is hereby empowered to appoint three commissioners, any two of which shall run and ascertain and plainly mark the boundary lines of the said county of Mercer, and shall receive as a full compensation for their services therein, the sum of two dollars for every mile so run and marked, to be paid out of the moneys which shall be raised for the county uses, within the county of Mercer.

Section I, of the same act, erected the county of Beaver; Sec. IV, the county of Crawford; Sec. V, the county of Erie; Sec. VI, the county of Warren; Sec. VII, the county of Venango, and Sec. IX, the county of Armstrong. Excluding Armstrong, these counties were authorized to elect two members to the House of Representatives, and adding the county of Washington, were entitled to one Senator.

The election districts established by this act for Mercer County were two—one at the house of Benjamin Stokely, at which the inhabitants comprehended within the third, fourth and fifth districts of donation lands were to vote, and the other at the house of John Elliott, at which the inhabitants comprehended within the first and second donation districts were to be entitled to vote. The Stokely district comprised the northern half of the county, and the Elliott district the southern half, as well as a large portion of Beaver County, as the northern line of the first district of donation lands was also the line dividing the counties of Beaver and Mercer. The house of Elliott stood on the Beaver side of the line.

The assessments of taxes made in 1800 were for the townships of Neshannock and North Beaver, the dividing lines of which the author (Mr. Garvin) has failed to discover. But as the names of Loutzenhiser, Bean, Christy, Klingensmith, Roberts and Williamson, who are known to have settled in the northwest corner of the county, as well as of Budd, Reno, Hull and Hoagland, in the neighborhood of Sharon, and the Alexanders, Stokely, Simpson, Garvins and Zahnisers, north and northeast of Mercer, the presumption is that the Neshannock Township of 1800 consisted of the territory included within a line starting near Sharon, and running east near to the line now dividing Jackson from Worth Township; thence north to the Crawford County line; thence west to the State line, and thence south to the place of beginning.

Reasoning from the same analogy, as the names of Welch, Sankey, Robinson and the Neals, that settled along the Shenango and Mahoning, and those of the Dennistons and the Gealys, William and John, and the McCrumb, that settled in Springfield and Slippery Rock, as well as the Hezlips and Means, that settled where Wilmington now stands, and the McBrides, James and Robert, the Waldrons, Samuel, James and John, that were near Wolf Creek, indicate that the southern half of the county, with the exception of a part of the east side of Wolf Creek, was included in North Beaver, which perhaps also took in that part of Beaver County included in the election district that voted at the house of John Elliott. In Irwin Township of Venango County the names of the "Ten Milers," the Axtells, Condit, Dodds, Riggs, etc., who settled on Sandy Creek, near where Middletown now stands, in the township of New Vernon; those of Adam Carnahan and William and Jacob Reed, in what was afterward known as French Creek Township, and the Carrols, Carmichaels and Colemans, who were settlers in the neighborhood of the present villages of Millbrook and Hendersonville, induces the conclusion that what are the present townships of Worth, Sandy Lake, Mill Creek, French Creek, and perhaps a part of New Vernon, Deer Creek and Wolf Creek, were then included in Venango Township, the line between the two counties probably not having been ascertained and marked when the tax assessments for 1800 were made.

In 1801 there appears to have been four townships—the name Neshannock, which the previous year was applied to the northwest part of the county, was this year applied to the southwest quarter, and the name of Salem introduced in its place as designating the northwest portion. Sandy Lake designated the northeast quarter, and Cool Spring the southeast—North Beaver being eliminated from the list of Mercer County townships.

In 1802 a further change was made. The name of Wolf Creek was substituted for that of Cool Spring in designating the southeast quarter of the county. Pymatuning was erected out of the southern half of the Salem Township of the previous year—the name of Sandy Lake was dropped, and that of Sandy Creek introduced, which covered the northern half of the northeast quarter of the county, while to the southern half of this quarter was transferred the name of Cool Spring. There were now six townships in the county—the southern half being occupied by Neshannock and Wolf Creek, and the northern half by Pymatuning, Salem, Sandy Creek and Cool Spring.

Thus far, in all practical matters, Mercer County was but an appendage to Crawford, the county commissioners of which appropriated the moneys raised by the taxes they authorized, and before the courts of which all causes from Mercer County were tried. To these county commissioners, or the courts of Crawford County, are to be attributed the naming of the first six townships of Mercer County, and the singular changes of names and locations that have been traced in the preceding page.

The arrangements of 1802 stood until 1805, when Mercer had her own courts and board of county commissioners. These concurring a further division was then authorized, and July 1, 1805, David Watson, Jr., was instructed to make the survey. On the 19th of August following the survey was completed, and we find that West Salem was taken from the west end of Salem, French Creek from the east end of Sandy Creek, Delaware from the east end of Pymatuning, Sandy Lake from the east end of Cool Spring, Shenango and Lackawannock from the northern half of Neshannock, Mahoning from the southwest corner of Neshannock, and Mercer, the county town, and Springfield and Slippery Rock from the west end of Wolf Creek, making fifteen townships and the county seat. With the exception of where the townships of Wolf Creek and Slippery Rock joined the corner of Butler County, the townships of the county were all now of the same size, eight miles in length from north to south, and seven in width.

The first break in this arrangement of townships was made in 1833, when Hickory was taken out of about equal parts of Pymatuning and Shenango. Greene Township was taken out of the northern part of West Salem in 1844. Wilmington from the southern part of Lackawannock in 1846. In 1849 Findley was taken from the northern part of Springfield, East Lackawannock from the eastern part of Lackawannock, Worth from the southern part of Sandy Lake, and Mill Creek from the southern part of French Creek. In 1850 three new townships were erected out of Cool Spring, to wit: Fairview, in the northwest corner, Lake, in the northeast, and Jackson in the southeast, leaving the old name to the southwest corner. In 1851 Wolf Creek was divided so as to make three townships: to the southwest part was given the name of Liberty, to the central part the name of Pine, the northern part retaining the original name of Wolf Creek. In the same year Sandy Creek was so cut up as to make four townships out of it: Deer Creek in the northeast corner, New Vernon in the southeast, Perry in the southwest, and Sandy Creek in the northwest. Hempfield and Sugar Grove were erected in 1856, being chiefly taken from the western half of Salem Township, the first getting, in addition, all that part of West Salem that adjoined it east of the Shenango River, and the latter a little piece from the eastern end of Greene.

For school purposes, several little innovations have since been made in the lines thus established, but the general direction and plan remains as detailed. With regard to Deer Creek there was a contest that lasted several years as to what name it should bear. When first laid out it was called Ross, in compliment to a Democratic family by that name that were among its early settlers. A Whig member being elected to the Legislature the name was changed by act of General Assembly to that of Deer Creek; a Democrat succeeding, the name of Ross, by the same authority, was re-instated, and Deer Creek abolished; a Whig or Know-Nothing following, Ross was again suppressed, and Deer Creek re-established, and as the Democrats failed to elect their candidates to the Legislature for several years afterward, the last name has acquired a permanency that is not likely to be again disturbed.

In 1808, for the alleged reason that so much of the line dividing Mercer and Crawford Counties as lay west of French Creek Township, in Mercer County, ran through and divided the tracts of land that lay along it, this line was moved about half a mile south by authority of the Legislature, thus taking from Mercer and giving to Crawford County a strip of territory twenty-one miles long and half a mile wide off the north ends of Sandy Creek, Salem and West Salem Townships. The Jamestown people, about 1855, recovered their lost portion through the Legislature, and thus the appearance which that borough makes on the map, in having its northern portion, as it were, thrust into Crawford County.

In 1849 the townships of Mahoning, Neshannock and Slippery Rock, together with a strip of territory of about half a mile in width taken from the southern sides of the townships of Springfield, Wilmington and Shenango, were detached from Mercer to contribute to the erection of Lawrence County. In these townships were the villages of Harlansburg, New Wilmington, Pulaski, New Bedford, Hillsville, Edenburg, Eastbrook, and the borough of New Castle, containing altogether quite a third of the population of the county. And thus stands the bounds of Mercer County, with its subdivisions into townships in the one hundred and twelfth year of independence, and the eighty-eighth year of its erection as a separate county by the Legislature of Pennsylvania.

The growth of the county since its formation has been steady and reliable. There has been no fluctuation, as the following table will demonstrate: In 1800 Mercer County contained a population of 3,228; 1810, 8,272; 1820, 11,681; 1830, 19,729; 1840, 32,873; 1850, 33,172; 1860, 36,856; 1870, 49,977; 1880, 56,162; while to-day there is over 60,000 inhabitants within its boundaries. The small increase from 1840 to 1850 may be attributed to the fact that Lawrence County was erected in 1849, taking from the southern part of Mercer a large and populous territory.

CHAPTER II.

LAND TITLES—PENN'S TITLE NOT RECOGNIZED BY THE INDIANS—TREATIES AT FORTS STANWIX AND MCINTOSH—SURVEYORS ENDEAVOR TO LOCATE CLAIMS OF REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS—CONFERENCE OF THE SENECA CHIEFS, CORN-PLANTER, HALF-TOWN AND BIG TREE, WITH PRESIDENT WASHINGTON—WAYNE'S VICTORY OVER THE SAVAGES AT FALLEN TIMBERS—TREATY OF GREENVILLE—DEPRECIATION LANDS—BOUNTY OR DONATION LANDS—TERMS OF SETTLEMENT—JOHN CARMICHAEL'S EFFORT IN WORTH TOWNSHIP—JOHN NICHOLSON AND THE PENNSYLVANIA POPULATION COMPANY—JOHN AND DAVID HOGE—HOLLAND AND NORTH AMERICAN LAND COMPANIES—DR. NATHANIEL BEDFORD—LODGE, PROBST AND WALKER—LITIGATION GROWING OUT OF CONFLICTING CLAIMS—LAND WARRANTS, PATENTS AND DEEDS.

ALTHOUGH within the limits of Pennsylvania, as defined by the charter of Charles II of England in 1681, the Indian title to the lands in this part of the State was not extinguished by purchase until January, 1785, at Fort McIntosh, where the town of Beaver now stands. In the previous October, the commissioners, appointed by the Congress of the United States, met the chief men of the Six Nations of Indians at Fort Stanwix, in New York State, to negotiate a peace and settle upon boundaries, at which time and place the commissioners of Pennsylvania made a purchase of the right and title of the Six Nations to all their lands within the limits of the State. The treaty at Fort McIntosh was held with other tribes, the Delawares and Wyandots being among the number, and claiming property in lands included within the limits of the State; and from them the commissioners made a further purchase, thus extinguishing, as they supposed, all Indian title to the soil of Pennsylvania, a little over a hundred years after the date of the charter to William Penn, and four years after the King of England had specifically recognized Pennsylvania to be a free and sovereign State.

These last purchases constitute very near a third part of the territory of the State, including the whole of the present counties of Lawrence, Mercer, Crawford, Venango, Clarion, Forrest, Warren, McKean, Potter, Tioga, Clinton, Cameron and Elk, and parts of Beaver, Armstrong, Clearfield, Lycoming, Bradford and Erie. A part of Erie County, the triangle, was afterward, in 1792, purchased from the United States and the Six Nations of Indians.

In the spring and summer of 1785, a few months after the extinguishment of the Indian title, surveyors entered on this part of the new purchase, making and numbering different sized tracts of land for donation to the Pennsylvania line of Revolutionary soldiers. The dissatisfaction of the Indians, it is presumed, interrupted this work, for it soon became evident that they were not satisfied with the manner in which Pennsylvania had bargained with them. In 1791 the Seneca chiefs, Cornplanter, Half-Town and Great Tree, in a speech to Gen. Washington, the President of the United States, thus make their complaint with regard to this matter:

Father: Your commissioners, when they drew the line which separated the land then given up to you from that which you agreed should remain to be ours, did most solemnly promise that we should be secured in the peaceable possession of the lands which we inhabited east and north of that line. Does this promise bind you?

Hear now, we beseech you, what has since happened concerning that land. On the day in which we finished the treaty at Fort Stanwix, commissioners from Pennsylvania told our chiefs that they had come there to purchase from us all the lands belonging to us within the lines of their State, and they told us that their line would strike the river Susquehanna below Tioga branch. They then left us to consider of the bargain till the next day; on the next day we let them know that we were unwilling to sell all the lands within their State, and proposed to let them have a part of it, which we pointed out to them on their map. They told us that they must have the whole; that it was already ceded to them by the great King, at the time of making peace with you, and was their own; but they said that they would not take advantage of that, and were willing to pay us for it after the manner of their ancestors. Our chiefs were unable to contend at that time, and therefore they sold the lands up to the line, which was then shown to them as the line of that State.

In his reply to this complaint of one of the Six Nations, Gen. Washington was careful to refrain from any promise of relief for the past, but only for the future. He said:

I am not uninformed that the Six Nations have been led into some difficulties, with respect to the sale of their lands since the peace. But I must inform you that these evils arose before the present government of the United States was established, when the separate States, and individuals under their authority, undertook to treat with the Indian tribes respecting the sale of their lands. But the case is now entirely altered; the general government, only, has the power to treat with the Indian Nations, and any treaty formed and held without its authority will not be binding.

In their answer to this reply of Gen. Washington, Cornplanter and his associates showed themselves to be no mean negotiators. They said:

Father, your speech, written on the great paper, is to us like the first light of the morning to a sick man, whose pulse beats too strongly in his temples, and prevents him from sleep. He sees it and rejoices, but he is not cured.

You say that you have spoken plainly on the great point; that you will protect us in the land secured to us at Fort Stanwix, and that we have the right to sell or to refuse to sell it. This is very good. But our nation complains that you compelled us at that treaty to give up too much of our lands. We confess that our nation is bound by what was there done; and acknowledging your power, we have now appealed to yourselves against that treaty, as made while you were too angry with us, and, therefore, unreasonable and unjust. To this you have given us no answer.

That treaty was not made with a single State—it was with the thirteen States. We never would have given all that land to one State. We know it was before you had the great authority, and, as you have more wisdom than the commissioners who forced us into that treaty, we expect that you also have more regard for justice, and will now, at our request, reconsider that treaty, and return to us a part of that land.

Father: The land which lies between the line running south from Lake Erie to the boundary of Pennsylvania, as mentioned in the treaty at Fort Stanwix, and the eastern boundary of the land which you sold, and the Senecas confirmed, to Pennsylvania, is the land on which Half-Town and all his people live, with other chiefs, who always have been, and still are, dissatisfied with the treaty at Fort Stanwix. They grew out of this land, and their fathers' fathers grew out of it, and they can not be persuaded to part with it. We, therefore, entreat you to restore to us this little piece.

To this Gen. Washington replied:

While you complain of the treaty of Fort Stanwix, in 1784, you seem entirely to forget that you yourselves, the Cornplanter, Half-Town, and Great Tree, with others of your nation, confirmed, by the treaty at Fort Harmar, upon the Muskingum, so late as the 9th of January, 1789, the boundary marked by the treaty at Fort Stanwix, and that, in consideration thereof, you then received goods to a considerable amount.

To this the chiefs of the Six Nations made no reply, but in the negotiations that followed in 1793, with the Indian tribes occupying the lands in the present States of Ohio, Michigan, and Indiana, it was claimed that the only equitable boundary between them and the whites was the Ohio River, of which the Allegheny was then considered a part, as agreed upon by treaty with the English at Fort Stanwix, in 1758, and that the treaties and sale of lands at Fort Stanwix and McIntosh, in 1784 and 1785, were void, for the reason that the Six Nations and Delawares, and Wyandots, were not the sole owners of these lands, which could only be disposed of by a general council of all the Indian nations having rights therein.

This position being finally taken by the Indians of the Northwest, the practical decision of the question of boundary was referred to the fortunes of war. In 1794 Gen. Wayne, by his decisive victory over the Indians at the battle of the Fallen Timbers, entirely convinced them that the line of the Ohio River was no longer a negotiable question, and by the treaty of Greenville, which he made with them in 1795, all their pretensions were given up, and thus, after ten years of uncertainty, with alternate hostility and negotiation, that part of the State lying north and west of the Allegheny and Ohio Rivers, became the undisputed possession of Pennsylvania, and open for the occupation of white settlers.

By act of the Legislature in 1783, even before the Indian title to the lands in this section of the State was claimed to have been either negotiated for or extinguished, a strip of land along the north and west side of the Ohio and Allegheny Rivers, commencing at the place where the western boundary of the State crosses the Ohio River, and thence up said rivers to the "mouth of Mogulbughtiton Creek, thence by a west line to the western boundary of the State, and thence south to the place of beginning," was set apart for the purpose of being surveyed into numbered lots, each containing from 200 to 350 acres, to be sold for "certificates of depreciation," given in settlement to the soldiers of the Pennsylvania line in the Revolutionary army. These certificates were assumed to be the special value of all claims against the State for military service, and for these lands thus set apart were to be received as specie. In addition to this reservation, the same act sets apart all the remainder of the territory in the northwest part of the State, out of which tracts of 200, 250, 300 and 500 acres were to be surveyed, marked and numbered as "Bounty Lands," to the officers, surgeons, chaplains, musicians and privates of the Pennsylvania line in the Revolutionary army. When surveyed these bounty lands were found to cover the greater portion of Mercer County. They are distinguished on the maps by being numbered. A very few of them were settled by the soldiers to whom they were donated, but were sold to others.

In 1792, before the Indian difficulties were entirely settled, the Legislature of the State enacted that all lands north and west of the Ohio and Allegheny Rivers and Conewango Creek, not heretofore reserved for public or charitable uses, should be offered for sale to persons who would cultivate, improve and settle them, at the rate of $20 per 100 acres, with an allowance of 6 per cent for public roads. In this act it was provided that a settlement to be complete, so as to entitle the holder to the privilege of purchasing at the price stipulated, must be the clearing, fencing and cultivation of at least two acres for every hundred in each survey, to build a house for the habitation of man, and to reside, or cause a family to reside thereon, for the space of five consecutive years from the first settlement of the same, unless prevented or driven therefrom by force of arms, by enemies of the United States; in either of which cases their rights under the law were not to be impaired. It was not until four years afterward, in 1796, that settlers began to take advantage of this law, the fear of Indian depredations doubtless deterring them until after Wayne's treaty with them in 1795. Under the law, continuous occupation, with the exceptions above noted, which were inoperative when settlements really began, was necessary to hold the tract of land first settled upon; and according to a rule that obtained general consent among the settlers, the absence of person and dying out of fire in a cabin was deemed an abandonment by the first settler, whose cabin could lawfully be occupied and a new settlement be commenced by any person that thought proper to do so. To hold the premises, when desirable, neighbor friends would travel miles on foot to keep up fires for those who were unavoidably absent on business or in visiting their friends. But this could not be done in all cases. John Carmichael, whose father John, by the way, came to America in the army of Gen. Wolfe, and was at the taking of Quebec from the French in 1759, built his cabin in what is now Worth Township, cleared a few rods of ground, and then left it for the winter, intending to return with his family in the spring. When he arrived, according to intent and accompanied by his father, he found another party in possession, and his traps set outside the door; so there was no other way for a law-abiding citizen than to lose his labor of the previous season and find another place to commence a new settlement. This he did, peaceably and good-naturedly, in the immediate neighborhood, where the numerous descendants of both parties live and flourish, and are friends at this day.

Under the act of 1792 John Nicholson, for himself in the first place, and afterward as the president of the Pennsylvania Population Company, took out warrants from the land office for upward of half a million of acres lying principally in what is now Lawrence, Mercer, Crawford and Erie Counties. In this company, John and David Hoge, of Washington County, Penn., were interested, as well as in other lands covered with warrants taken out by themselves. The Holland Land Company and North America Land Company were two more of these land jobbing associations, whose claims in later years fell into the hands of H. J. Huidekoper, of Meadville, and Hon. Stephen Barlow, of Meadville, and Hon. Henry Baldwin, of Pittsburgh.

In addition to these great companies, either as independent speculators or as agents, figured Dr. Nathaniel Bedford, who held lands in Mahoning and Shenango Townships, and for whom the town of New Bedford, in Lawrence County, was probably named, it being included in his claims, and also the firm of Lodge, Probst & Walker, whose field of operations was principally in the northwest part of the county. These great companies and speculators paid a small fee at the land office for their warrants when issued, and then sought by every means to get settlers on their claims within the two years prescribed by the act, allowing therefor from 100 to 200 acres out of their tract of 400. The State, at the same time, was giving full tracts at the same rates to actual settlers, and the result was that the settler often built his cabin unknowingly on a tract on which one of these warrants was previously laid, and the consequence was years of expensive litigation before the claims of the adverse and contending parties were permanently settled. A land warrant was an order for a survey of a vacant piece of land which, on being returned to the land office, and the stipulated price paid for the land covered by the survey, a patent or deed from the commonwealth was issued; and here, including the surveys made to satisfy the claims of the Revolutionary soldiers, is the bed-rock of all the land titles in Mercer County.

PIONEERS—THEIR NATIONALITY AND CHARACTER—LISTS OF TAXABLES BY TOWNSHIPS—NESHANNOCK FOR 1800, 1801 AND 1802—IRVIN FOR 1800—NORTH BEAVER FOR 1800—SALEM FOR 1801 AND 1802—SANDY LAKE FOR 1801—COOL SPRING FOR 1801 AND 1802—SANDY CREEK FOR 1802—PYMATUNING FOR 1802—WOLF CREEK FOR 1802.

THE early settlers who came into what is now Mercer County, were largely Irish, and mainly members of the Presbyterian Church. They were intelligent, courageous, industrious people, who were desirous of establishing homes for themselves in the new country just opened up to be occupied by the white race. They came, the majority of them, from the counties of Westmoreland, Washington, Fayette and Allegheny, where they had located after wearisome journeys from the East across the Allegheny Mountains. Some, it is true, came direct from Ireland and the eastern counties of the State, but the line of travel brought them by way of the forks of the Ohio. As a rule these pioneers reared large families, and were noted for their longevity. Their modes of living were simple, the habits such as conduce to health and happiness, and, what was favorable, no eager desire to become suddenly wealthy perplexed them. Neighbors lived on terms of genuine friendship and equality, and strove to promote one another's interests. The log rolling, the butter boiling, the corn husking, the cabin raising, the stated meetings, the annual elections, were periods of real enjoyment, which tended to cement the ties of friendship and bind communities more closely together. Common hardships and common wants established a community of feeling and interest. Castes in society did not exist. All occupied the same level, and enjoyed the same rights and privileges. The happiness of those pioneer days would outweigh that enjoyed often in these fashionable times.

It must be remembered that Mercer County was separated, theoretically, from Allegheny County March 12, 1800, but it was not organized until 1803. During the three years intervening it was joined, for judicial purposes, to Crawford County, with the seat of justice at Meadville. It should also be remembered, too, that the names of townships were those which existed under the Crawford County organization. The townships then were large and sparsely populated, and they were subdivided again and again.

The lists of taxables by townships, for the years 1800, 1801 and 1802, were compiled by Mr. Garvin. Most of these pioneers with their families are spoken of in succeeding chapters. Here the names are given alphabetically as a matter of reference, and many of our readers will doubtless recognize in these lists the names of their ancestors and other relatives and friends.

The following pioneers of Mercer County appear as taxables of Irwin Township in 1800: Elias Axtell, Thomas Axtell, Tuttle Axtell, Nathan Axtell, Moses Austin, Robert Beatty, John Brown, Robert Budge, Robert Brisby, Moses Bunnell, John Boylan, Thomas Boylan, Caleb Ball, Thomas Branden, James Bowman, Nathaniel Coleman, Joshua Coleman, Samuel Coleman, N. Cooper, Cary Cooper, William W. Carroll, William Carroll, Jonathan Cochran, Duncan Carmichael, John Carmichael, Timothy Conoway (mulatto), Thomas Crossen, Thomas Crossen, Jr., Daniel Croin, John Chapman, Joseph Caldwell, Francis Cochran, Thomas Carter, William Cousins, Matthias Clark, James Clark, John Clark, Daniel Clark, Abraham Clark, William Creen, Adam Carnahan, David Condit, Ira Condit, John Duncan, William Davison, James Davison, William Donough, Arthur Dickey, William Dowlan, William Doty, Samuel Doty, Isthiel Dodd, James Davitt, Robert Fowler, Thomas Gibson, John Gibson, John Gordon, Samuel Gildersleeve, Samuel Graham, Charles Giebner, Brice Gilmore, Jeremiah Hendry, George Hendry, William Henderson, John Henderson, Robert Henderson, Sr., Charles Henderson, Robert Henderson, Jr., William Houson, Isaac Holloway, Thomas Jordan, Robert Johnston, Hugh Johnston, Alexander Johnston, John Johnston, William Johnston, William Kill, Daniel Kemp, James Kilgore, David Kilgore, Samuel Kilgore, John Long, Robert Latta, Samuel Lindsey, Abraham Ludwick, Abraham Leeb, Curtis Marmaduke (hatter), John Martin, Sr., James Martin, Jr., Robert McGosgen, John McClelland, Robert Morgan (negro), John McClure, Thomas McClure, James McClure, John Mulhall, James McBride, Sr., James McBride, Jr., Robert McBride, James Marshall, William McCormick, Thomas McCormick, David McConahy, Jr., James McNulty, John McElvey, William McClimans, Moses McElwain, Robert McClelland, William Perrine, James Porter, Samuel Polley, Jacob Rowen, Ebenezer Roberts, William Riddle, John Rodgers, Jacob Reed, William Reed, Thomas Robb, Edward Ross, Jacob Ross, Stephen Riggs, James Stephen, John Stephenson, Andrew Smith, George Sutley, John Sheverman, William Vaughn, Andrew Woodruff, James Waddle, Samuel Waldron, Daniel Waldron, John Waldron, Sr., John Waldron, Jr., John Westlake, Henry Westlake, John Wolverton, David Wolverton, John Wentworth.

ALTHOUGH declared a county by act of assembly in 1800, for all practical purposes Mercer constituted a part of Crawford County until 1803, when the first county officers were appointed. In February, 1804, the first and second courts were held at the house of Joseph Hunter, situated on Mill Creek, on the mill property now (1876) owned by the Hon. Wm. Stewart, in February and May of that year. A false impression seems to have gotten out to the effect that the first court was held in Cool Spring Township, at the house of William McMillan, now the property of John McEwen. It doubtless grew out of the fact that boarding accommodations at the time were scarce and imperfect, rendering it necessary for some of the court attendants to go several miles into the country for entertainment. The commissioners at the time were Robert Bole, Andrew Denniston and Thomas Robb. At their first session, November 10, 1803, they received proposals from citizens of Mercer and vicinity to furnish places in which to hold the courts of the county. They finally contracted with Joseph Hunter to use his house for the February and March terms of 1804 absolutely, at the rate of $1 per day, with the privilege of using it also for the two remaining sessions of the year on the same terms. This building, however, was not used beyond the first two terms. In October, 1804, the commissioners removed their office from Hunter's to the house of Jacob Myers in Mercer. The jail building, described further on, was ready for occupancy by the close of that year, and its upper story was finished and used for a court room.

At the first term the commission of Hon. Jesse Moore, as president judge of the circuit composed of the counties of Beaver, Butler, Mercer, Crawford and Erie was read, also the commissions of Alexander Wright and Alexander Brown, as judges for Mercer County. The various commissions of John Findley, as prothonotary, clerk, etc., of the county, was also read; so, also, that of William Byers as sheriff, James Braden as coroner, and John W. Hunter as deputy prosecuting attorney. As there had been as yet no election in the county all of these offices were held by appointment from the executive of the State. The attorneys admitted to practice at the first court were John W. Hunter, Joseph Shannon, Cunningham S. Semple, S. B. Foster, Alex. W. Foster, Ralph Marlin, Edward Work, Patrick Farrelly, William Ayres, Henry Baldwin and Steel Semple. The two Fosters, Farrelly, Ayres, Baldwin and Steel Semple all afterward turned out to be men of mark and ability, and forty and fifty years back from this writing (1876) it was a rich treat to hear the men of that day recite the tricks, stratagems and anecdotes of which they were the perpetrators. At the second term, held in May, the commission of William Anderson as an additional judge of Mercer County was read. This gave three associate judges. The writer of this,* who, as a little boy, occasionally dropped into the court-house along between 1812 and 1820, was indelibly impressed with the grand dignity of the president judge. He was a heavy, solemn-looking man, and retained the dress of the old style gentleman—small clothes, shoe buckles, knee buckles, bald-headed, but hair long behind and done up in a queue, and head and hair and collar of the black coat covered with a white powder sprinkled thereon. He has since seen the supreme court of the United States in session, their black gowns, and the comparative quietness enforced certainly give to it a very dignified aspect, but still there was lacking the grand old powdered head and queue that gave Judge Moore the advantage in imposing dignity.

The first grand jury that assembled in the county consisted of Hugh Hamilton, Joseph McEwen, Thomas Scott, James Waugh, William Welch, James Denniston, John Alexander, William Alexander, Cyrus Beckwith, Daniel Kelly, William Pangburn, John Grace, Duncan Carmichael, Robert Moore, William Nicholson, John E. Larimer, Alex. McCracken, James Montgomery, Jacob Loutzenhiser, Alexander Bean and Joseph Smith, all of whom have long since paid the great debt of nature, but most of whom are yet alive in the generations that have followed and still reside in the county.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS, FIRST COURTS AND STATISTICS.

The land on which Mercer, the county town, was originally located, being very near the center of the county, consisted of 200 acres, presented to the county by John Hoge, of Washington County, who owned large tracts in the vicinity. The trustees to lay out the town and dispose of the lots were John Findley, William Mortimer and William McMillan (commonly designated "Little Billy," to distinguish between a large man of the same name). It was with the funds arising from the sale of these lots that the first court-house, standing in the center of the diamond, was built. On the 18th of May, 1807, John Chambers, John Leech and William McMillan, the county commissioners, contracted with Joseph Smith and John McCurdy for the building thereof for the sum of $7,116. In 1840 there was an addition put to this building, to get better office accommodations, at a cost of about $1,500, and the whole was burned to the ground in February, 1866, after which the present beautiful and substantial structure was erected at a cost of $98,000. It was erected in 1867. Barr & Moser, of Pittsburgh, were the architects, William Maskrey had the superintendence of the stone and brick work, Oliver Alexander of the roof and general carpenter work, and William M. Gibson of the glass and finishing work. The men were employed by day's labor. The first place used for court-house and jail, however, was a log structure on the grounds now occupied by the First National Bank,* the lower story for a jail being built of squared logs, let down flat and dovetailed at the corners, and the court-room above, which was reached by stairs from the outside of the building. Until this structure was ready for prisoners, the commissioners rented a room from James Braden, which they had fitted up as a prison. They made their contract with him at their second session, held Tuesday, December 6th, 1803, to use a portion of his house at the rate of $7 per month, the time to commence with the confinement of the first prisoner.

The second jail was a stone building, erected by Thomas Templeton in 1818-19, directly north of the first one, on the next street. It was used until 1869, when it was purchased by Mr. Lafferty and converted into a temperance hotel. It is now used as a private dwelling.

The present brick jail was erected in 1868 at a cost of $67,000. Barr & Moser were architects, S. Runser & Co., of Sharon, did the iron work, and William M. Gibson, of Mercer, the finishing. The structure was completed and occupied in 1869.

County Farm.—On the 3d of November, 1851, it was resolved by the poor directors that "Enoch Perrine be appointed to visit the poor house at Girard, in Erie County, to make observation and take a draft of said house, and also to get information as to the rules and regulations in the management," also, that "William F. Groves and Samuel Wood be appointed to visit the poor house in Washington County, and any others that they can visit conveniently, for similar purposes." The first poor farm was situated in Cool Spring Township, and was purchased in 1851 of Henry Moore. It being in poor condition and inconveniently located, an act of Assembly authorized the securing of the present one, which was purchased of Thomas Pearson May 15, 1852. A building had already been begun on the Moore place when the change of location was made, and the directors, Enoch Perrine, Samuel Woods and William F. Groves, only secured the renewal of the contract by adding $525 to the original cost, and "dispensing with the floor in the garret." The old farm was sold for $2,800. The present farm includes 206 acres. The house was opened and the first inmates received January 4, 1853. There were fourteen. Of this number two are yet living: Mary Jewett, from Hickory Township, concerning whom the following notes were made: "Fifteen years of age, entirely simple, has many traits of the snake, bites herself and is very vicious." Harriet Hartsuff, from Sandy Lake. "The cords and ligaments of her legs are contracted or stiffened so that she cannot walk. She is intelligent and cheerful. Eighteen years old." The first inmate registered was Minerva Mitchell from Delaware Township. She was forty at the time and nearly blind. She died November 18, 1886, aged seventy-nine years. Samuel Clingan, from Shenango, is said to have been the most comical and distinguished inmate ever admitted. Entry: "Cute, cunning and comical, yet very simple." He died August 5, 1886, aged seventy years.

*This was true in 1876. The site is occupied at present (1888) by the law office of Johnson Pearson, Esq., the bank having recently been removed into the Miller-Gordon block, several doors west of its former site.

The stewards in charge of the institution have been: William Breckenridge, Sandy Lake Township (2 years); Johnson Graham, Millbrook, Worth Township (2 years, 3 months); John Woods, of West Middlesex, Shenango Township (3 years); John Smith, Mercer (3 years); John K. Roberts, West Salem Township (8 years); Amos Taylor, Mercer (3 years); William Clark, Shenango Township (2 years, 9 months); J. C. Cubbison, Fairview Township (4 years); Amos Taylor, Mercer (5 years), and George H. Caldwell, the present steward, from Deer Creek Township, who took charge in January, 1886.

The physicians have been: Dr. George W. Yeager (2 years), Dr. S. S. Mehard (2 years), Dr. John P. Hosack (16 years), Dr. James Magoffin (3 months), Dr. Pawley (3 months), Dr. James Woods (1 year), Dr. Frederick Beil (1 year), Dr. James Mehard (3 years), Dr. Devinney (5 years), and Dr. Robert Hope, who is now serving his seventh year.

The total cost of the new building, one of the best in Western Pennsylvania, including grading and ornamentation, was $110,000. The ground for the site of the structure was broken in August, 1880. The structure was opened in 1883. The contractor was Simon Harrold, of Beaver Falls. The plumbing and heating were done by N. J. Butler, of Erie. The architects were Drum & Stein, of Pittsburgh. The house is under the efficient management of Mr. and Mrs. George H. Caldwell, who are peculiarly adapted to making the inmates feel that they have a real home. The oldest person in the county is still an inmate—Mrs. Melinda Hilliard. She was born near Albany, New York, June 13, 1790, and is consequently in her ninety-ninth year. Another old inmate is John Davis, a Welshman, aged eighty-three. He is one of the oldest puddlers in the United States, and began his trade in 1819.

First Courts.—A reasonably full sketch of the members composing the first court of the county will be found in the chapter on the Bench and Bar in another portion of this work. The first civil case tried at the first court was that of Jacob Hilderbrand vs. Robert McClure for trespass and ejectment. It came from Crawford County Court, being case No. 31, at the January term, 1802. The attorneys were John W. Hunter for the plaintiff and Thomas Collins for the defendant. The case was continued from term to term, but finally dismissed at the November term, 1805, by the attorney for plaintiff. The entire cost, including fees of prothonotary, sheriff and attorney, was $26.25. The attorneys who did most legal business at the February term were Thomas Collins, A. W. Foster, Steele Semple, John W. Hunter and Henry Baldwin. There were at the first Court two criminal cases. The first was the Commonwealth vs. James King, indicted for forcible entry and detainer. A true bill was found. He was held in the sum of $100, and the following witnesses in behalf of the Commonwealth, Carlisle Losse, John Calvin, Peter Lossee, Robert Steele, Henry McLaughlin, Samuel Brown, John Gravatt and John Klingensmith, in the sum of $50 each, to appear at the May term. The trial came off at May term, but the jury brought in a verdict of not guilty. The second case, Commonwealth vs. Henry Gilmore, for assault and battery, was tried at the same time, with a similar verdict. At the May term, still held at the house of Joseph Hunter, the grand jury consisted of John Monteith, Samuel McBride, Francis McFarland, James McWilliams, William Porter, John Small, John Dickey, William Mortimer, John Donaldson, Adam Forker, Thomas Coulson, Jacob Reed, James McEwen, Ebenezer Magoffin and Robert Cochran. After the lapse of eighty-four years it is to be proclaimed that not a single public execution has occurred in Mercer County. A number of exciting murder trials have taken place, but we have purposely refrained from calling attention to them, under the impression that

Vice is a monster of such hideous mien
As to be hated needs but to be seen;
Yet, seen too oft, familiar with its face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace.

Statistics.—The interest of those early days concentrated very much in the public business done in the regular legal courts and the commissioners' sessions. At the December session of the latter body, held December 6, 1803, John Chambers was chosen clerk. Lest he should become suddenly rich, his salary was fixed at ten shillings per day for the time he was actually engaged in such labor. The session in question continued two days. On the 25th of January, 1804, the commissioners made an estimate of the probable expenses of the county for the ensuing year, as follows:

Court expenses, including fees of prothonotary, attorney and sheriff,	$500
Commissioners and clerk.....	400
Assessor.....	96
Collector.....	70
Road viewers.....	50
Jail and office rent.....	100
Extras.....	259
Total.....	$1475

This amount did not include the treasurer's 6 per cent allowance on money handled. On the 20th of February the commissioners appointed Joseph Smith treasurer for the county. On the 5th of March, 1804, the commissioners appointed the following assessors for the several townships: Salem, Thomas Gillis; Pymatuning, Benjamin Bentley; Neshannock, James Walker; Wolf Creek, Michael Brown; Cool Spring, Wm. Pangburn, Sr.; Sandy Creek, Aaron Ross. The rate of taxation ranged from $\frac{53}{100}$ in Salem, the lowest, to $\frac{87}{100}$ in Sandy Creek, the highest.

On the 25th of April, 1804, the collectors for the several townships, together with the sums to be collected, were designated as follows:

TOWNSHIP.	Name.	Amount.
Salem.....	John McClurg.....	$300.10
Pymatuning.....	Jonathan Dunham.....	86.78
Neshannock.....	Charles Gibson.....	380.50
Wolf Creek.....	Valentine Cunningham....	286.10
Cool Spring.....	William Pangburn.....	287.88
Sandy Creek.....	Adam Carnahan.....	133.58
Total.....		$1,474.94

On the 22d of May Ezekiel Sankey was appointed as collector, vice Charles Gibson, who had not been a citizen long enough to entitle him to the position of collector. It will be seen that the amount of tax to be collected was within 6 cents of the estimate as found in a previous paragraph. As showing the difference between the valuation and taxes in 1804, when Mercer County was new and embraced a large portion of what was subsequently (1849) detached to form Lawrence, and those of 1888, the following tabular statement is appended:

DISTRICTS.	Real Estate.	Mills, etc.	Personal Property.	Occupations.	Livery.	Money at Interest.	No. Dogs.	Taxes.

ROSTER OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS.

We present, as far as possible, a complete list of the national, State and county officials who have held positions in the county. These, taken in connection with the township officials given elsewhere, present a complete view of those who have acted as public servants.

Members of Congress who lived in Mercer County when elected are John Banks, 22d and 24th; John J. Pearson, 24th; William S. Garvin, 29th; Michael C. Trout, 33d; William Stewart, 35th and 36th; Samuel Griffith, 42d; James Sheakley, 44th; Samuel H. Miller, 47th and 48th; Norman Hall, 50th.

State Senators.—1800–01, district, Allegheny and all Northwestern Pennsylvania, John Hamilton; 1801–09, district, Mercer, Crawford, Erie, Venango and Warren, William McArthur; 1809–13, same district, Wilson Smith; 1813–17, same district, Joseph Shannon; 1817–21, same district, Henry Hurst; 1821–25, district, Mercer, Crawford and Erie, Jacob Herrington; 1825–29, same district, John Leech; 1829–37, same district, Thomas S. Cunningham; 1837–41, Mercer and Beaver, John J. Pearson; 1841–45, same district, William Stewart; 1845–47, same district, Robert Darragh; 1848–50, Mercer, Beaver and Lawrence, David Sankey; 1851–53, Mercer, Venango and Warren, John Hoge; 1857–59, same district, Glenn W. Schofield; 1860–61, Lawrence, Mercer and Venango, William M. Francis; 1861–63, same district, James H. Robinson; 1864–66, same district, Thomas Hoge; 1867–69, same district, James C. Brown; 1870–72, Mercer, Venango and Warren, Harrison Allen; 1873–75, Lawrence, Mercer and Venango, Samuel McKinley; 1876–78, Lawrence and Mercer, Frederick H. Braggins; 1878–80, same district, George W. Wright; 1880–84, same district, George W. McCracken; 1884–88, same district, Samuel McClure. ONE of the first things to demand the attention of the new settlers was the subject of roads. At first these were crude affairs, the order being the blazed path, the winding way with simply the underbrush cut out, the corduroy road with small timbers and brush thrown into the low places to fill up and permit wagons to pass over with reasonable safety, the dirt roads with ditches on either side and sluices at proper intervals to allow the surplus water to pass from one side to another, and lastly the pike or macadamized road, that permits easy and expeditious travel at all seasons of the year. A large part of the business of the early courts was the hearing of petitions for the locating of roads from one point to another. If the petition was favorably received, viewers were appointed to pass upon the matter and report at a subsequent session.

One of the first roads laid out, as shown by the records, was viewed by John Williamson, John Christy, Robert Bole, William McCullough, David Watson and John Findley. They reported favorably, and their report was confirmed at the August session of court, 1804. It was thirteen miles and forty-five perches in length by thirty-three feet wide, and connected Mercer with Williamson's Mill, near Greenville, whence it joined a highway previously laid out to the lake.

At the May session, 1804, the court appointed John Alexander, Thomas McMillan, Sr., John Rice, James Jeffers, Adam Forker and John Pew, to report as to the advisability of constructing a road from Mercer to John D. Littleford's Mill in Coolspring Township. Their report being favorable, was confirmed by the court at the November session, and the supervisors of roads and highways were ordered "to open, cut, clear, and bridge the same according to law." It was a thirty-three foot road, four and a half miles long.

The road from Mercer to the farm of James Foster in Wolf Creek Township, at the Butler County line, fifty feet in width, was authorized upon the report of John Findley, Samuel Hawthorn, John Garvin, William Nicholson, Robert Cochran and William McMillan, appointed at the February session, 1804.

The road from Mercer to the outlet of Sandy Lake, authorized by the commissioners appointed at the February session, 1804, was confirmed by the November court, same year. The viewers were John Alexander, James Jeffers, Thomas McMillan, John Rice, James McDevitt and James Armstrong.

The road from Mercer to Valentine Cunningham's mill, on Wolf Creek, was authorized by the November session, 1804. The viewers were Thomas McCoy, John Powell, James Braden, David McDowell, John Alexander and Thomas McMillan. It was laid out thirty-three feet wide.

At the May session, 1804, Ebenezer Magoffin, Samuel Hawthorn, David Watson, Jr., William Nicholson, John Dickey and Nicholas Vanemon were appointed to view and lay out a road between New Castle and Mercer. They reported at November term and their report was adopted. The length was found to be fourteen miles and 185 perches, and the width was fixed at fifty feet.

The road between Butler and Mercer was laid out in accordance with an act of the Assembly passed 10th of April, 1807, as was also the road between Beaver and Mercer.

The road from Mercer to Sharon was authorized at the September session, 1806, agreeably to a petition "for a road from where the Youngstown road intersects the State line, near Rev. William Wick's, to the town of Mercer." James McWilliams, William Porter, Alexander McKinley, William McMillan, James Gilkey and George Book were the viewers. It was laid out forty feet wide.

What is known as the "Snodgrass road" was authorized at the December session, 1808. The viewers were Cunningham S. Semple, John Creaton, Joseph Junkin, Ebenezer Magoffin, Robert Newell and Benjamin Stokely.

The road from Mercer to Junkin's mill, now Hope Mills, was authorized at the June session, 1809. The viewers were Benjamin Stokely, Robert Newell, Jonathan Smith, Marcus Higlin, Thomas Hosack and Samuel McCune.

The road from New Castle to the Big Bend of the Shenango was established by the February court of 1811, upon the recommendation of Bevan Pearson, Thomas McMillan, James Gilkey, James Watson, Nathan Patterson and Ezekiel Sankey; width, fifty feet. The road from Mercer to the Big Bend was confirmed at the same session, Bevan Pearson, William McMillan, C. S. Semple, Jonathan Smith, Thomas McMillan and Nathan Patterson having recommended the same. The width was fixed at fifty feet.

The main road leading from Pittsburgh to Erie through Mercer, Shealeysville, Meadville, etc., seems to have been laid out when the territory was yet under the practical control of Crawford County. In 1807 the State appropriated $400 to improve the road between Mercer and Meadville. In 1817 the Mercer & Meadville Turnpike Company was chartered by the Legislature to improve and operate the road between Mercer and Meadville, connecting at Mercer with the road to Pittsburgh. In 1821 the company opened the line for general traffic. It continued to be the principal thoroughfare through Mercer County for many years, and though not macadamized, was subject to the restrictions of toll-gates until quite a late day.

The numerous streams of the county at first had to be forded, which frequently required considerable courage when the current was deep and swift and cold. Eventually temporary wooden bridges spanned the streams, and seemed to answer the necessities of the public until the development of iron industries rendered the construction of iron bridges cheap and more durable. Most of the bridges now constructed are made of this durable material.

BEAVER AND ERIE CANAL.

In the session of 1822-23 the Legislature authorized a survey to ascertain the practicability of connecting Lake Erie with the Ohio River by a canal. In 1824 the United States Government ordered an examination to be made with the same object in view, and the engineers reported in favor of the scheme. After considerable contention the route via the Beaver and Shenango Rivers was adopted. In 1827 the Legislature passed the act for the construction of the canal, and also for the "French Creek Feeder," which previously had been surveyed. Ground was broken on the latter at Meadville, August 24, 1827, and it was completed to Conneaut Lake in December, 1834, but nothing had yet been accomplished toward building the main line, though the subject continued to be agitated by the people along the proposed route.

At a meeting held in the court-house in Mercer on the 28th of December, 1830, of which Hugh Bingham was chairman and William W. Pearson, secretary, a resolution was passed requesting the citizens of Erie, Crawford, Mercer and Beaver Counties to hold a convention at Mercer on the 18th of the ensuing January, to consult relative to petitioning the Legislature to extend the Pennsylvania Canal from Pittsburgh, to Lake Erie. Jacob Herrington, William S. Rankin, James Braden, John Banks and Joel B. Curtis were appointed a committee to superintend the matter. Of its proceedings we have no record.

But on the 21st of May, 1832, a meeting of delegates from Beaver, Butler, Erie, Mercer and Venango Counties, called to take measures upon the indifference of the last General Assembly toward the proposed extension, was held in the Mercer court-house. Hon. John Bredin was chairman, Benjamin Adams, of Beaver, and Col. Thomas Foster, of Erie, were vice-presidents, and Edwin J. Kelso, of Erie, and William S. Rankin, of Mercer, were secretaries. Resolutions were passed condemning the indifference of the previous Legislature, and urging upon the next the speedy completion "of that portion of the line which will connect the city of Pittsburgh with the harbor of Erie, it being necessary to enable the east to share in the advantages of the west, and to complete the original design of connecting the waters of the Delaware with the Western lakes, and to secure to our great Eastern emporium the trade of the Northwestern country."

The project was agitated by others than those mentioned in 1833, '34 and '35. The Reeds, of Erie; the citizens of Meadville; William Fruit, of Clarks-ville; William Budd, T. J. Porter and M. C. Trout, of Sharon, and other spirits along the Shenango Valley were deeply interested in the project. The State ultimately made a preliminary re-survey. This was followed, under the administration of Gov. Ritner, by a limited appropriation, which resulted in pushing the work toward completion. In 1842 the Legislature adopted the watchword of "retrenchment;" the enterprise was throttled by annulling all the contracts and stopping the work. This short-sighted policy resulted in sufficient costs of litigation to have completed the enterprise and made it efficient. Gov. Porter, in his annual message in 1843, said that ninety-seven and three-fourths miles of the main line had been finished, extending from Rochester on the Ohio to the mouth of the French Creek Feeder in Crawford County, and that $4,000,000 had been expended on the improvement between 1827 and 1842.

The work was now turned over, without cost, to the "Erie Canal Company," chartered by the Legislature at the session of 1842-43, on condition that that corporation would finish and operate the canal. James M. Power, of Mercer County, was a member of this company and one of its board of managers. In September, 1843, contracts were let for the unfinished portion of the work, and December 5, 1844, the two first boats, the "Queen of the West," a passenger packet, and the "R. S. Reed," loaded with Mercer County coal, passed through to Erie. Business was brisk, and a new life sprang into the Shenango Valley. It spoiled many old mill-dams along the Big Shenango, but gave a recompense in increased facilities for transportation.

Sharon, Clarksville, Big Bend and Greenville were all given a commercial importance by this new means of travel and transportation. Big Bend was specially important and active, because it was the point from which supplies were hauled to the eastern, central and southeastern parts of the county.

Shenango, which was laid out in June, 1808, promised to become one of the important places of the county. This paper town is now known only as the place that might have been great if the boom at Big Bend had continued.

The canal flourished until the Erie & Pittsburgh Railroad was completed along the same route, when a downward movement began, which finally resulted in its purchase by that company in 1870. The railroad company continued to operate it until 1871, when the fall of the Elk Creek aqueduct in Erie County gave them an excuse for abandoning the enterprise, which no doubt was the intention at the time of purchase. Its bed has since been a source of annoyance to the people of the towns through which it passed, as a breeder of disease, though most of it is now filled up. The whoop of the boy on the tow-path is no longer heard, but instead the shrill whistle of the iron horse.

RAILROADS.

It is sometimes said that great projects are often carried about in the heads of progressive thinkers for a long time before they are realized. Equally true is it that agitation is the keynote of ultimate triumph. In harmony with this principle we find that a meeting was held at New Wilmington, Mercer County, as early as September 2, 1835, at which Joseph Emery was chairman, and Joseph Cowden and A. C. Semple secretaries, to consider railroad matters. In fact, it was resolved "that this meeting believes it proper for the people of Northwestern Pennsylvania to make an effort to connect the harbor at Erie with the Beaver division of the Pennsylvania Canal at New Castle by a railroad."

On the 1st of November, 1849, a spirited railroad meeting was held at Greenville to consider steps to secure the construction of the Pittsburgh & Erie road, which had been chartered in 1845. Dr. H. D. La Cossitt was chairman, and Dr. J. T. Ray and G. A. Bittenbanner were secretaries. A similar meeting was held at Clarksville on the 3d of November, at which Isaac Hazen was president, and James Trimble secretary. Both meetings advocated the enterprise, and regarded it as highly important in developing the permanent interests of the Shenango Valley.

This project was agitated from time to time, but many years elapsed before it was realized. On the 2d of January, 1851, Thomas J. Power, now a resident of Rochester, Beaver County, then chief engineer of the Pittsburgh & Erie Railroad, submitted a report in which he carefully estimated the expense of building such a connecting road a distance of 103½ miles. His estimate for grading and bridging a double track was $644,700; for securing the superstructure at the rate of $10,000 per mile, $1,085,000, making a total of $1,729,700.

In 1856 a new charter was obtained under the name of the Erie & Pittsburgh Railroad. In 1859 the track was completed through Crawford County to Jamestown, which remained the terminus from the north until 1864. Work was also progressing from the direction of New Castle. The first freight train arrived at Sharon from the south October 11, 1863, and the first passenger train the 4th of the following January. The line was finished through Mercer County during 1864, and the company advertised to run regular trains from Erie to New Castle after October 31, 1864. This road enters the county at Jamestown and passes down the Shenango Valley, tapping the towns of Greenville, Shenango, Transfer, Clarksville, Sharpsville, Sharon, Wheatland and West Middlesex in its route.

The Erie Railroad is another important line that passes through Mercer County. In the fall of 1852 a survey was made through this section of the State, and August 19, 1853, ground was broken at Meadville. Soon afterward the contract was let for the construction of that portion of the road lying between the New York and Ohio boundaries, but the work was abandoned in December, 1854. The enterprise continued to be agitated for several years, and in 1857 the Meadville Railroad Company was chartered for the purpose of taking up the project, but financial difficulties balked its promoters. The name of this company was changed by act of Legislature passed March 10, 1859, to the Atlantic & Great Western Railroad Company of Pennsylvania, and active work was soon after resumed. The road was completed from the New York State line, the terminus of the A. & G. W. R. R. of New York, to Meadville in October, 1862, and by January, 1863, the track was finished thorough Mercer County to the Ohio line, where it connected with the A. & G. W. R. R. of Ohio. In August, 1865, the New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio divisions were consolidated as the Atlantic & Great Western Railroad Company. The main line runs southwest from Meadville to Greenville, thence passes down the valley through Shenango to below Transfer, where it turns sharply northwestward to Orangeville. In January, 1880, the road was sold, and became the New York, Pennsylvania & Ohio, familiarly known as the "Nypano." In March, 1883, the line was leased to the New York, Lake Erie & Western Railroad Company, and in 1887 it came under the control of the Erie management. Originally it was a broad gauge, but was changed after the first sale to the general standard of the country.

An important branch of this road runs to Youngstown via Sharon, it being a coal road that was formerly operated by Coleman, Westerman & Co. The first locomotive crossed north of State Street in Sharon on the 20th of May, 1864, and the first passenger train came along the same line from Cleveland on the 1st of April, 1869. Another branch extends from Sharon to West Middlesex, which is largely used for traffic purposes.

The Lake Shore system has two lines in the county, one extending from Jamestown through Hadley, Stoneboro and Sandy Lake to Oil City. It was chartered in 1862 as the Jamestown & Franklin Railroad. It was completed for freight purposes in 1865 as far as Stoneboro, and for passenger traffic the following year. The line was at once leased to the Lake Shore (then called the Cleveland, Painsville & Ashtabula) road. Stoneboro continued to be a terminal point until June, 1867, when the road was extended to Franklin, and in August, 1870, to Oil City. In August, 1872, the road was built as far west as Ashtabula to connect with the main line of the L. S. & M. S. Prior to this last date the E. & P. road was used as a northern outlet from Jamestown.

This road has also a branch from Youngstown to Sharon, with the intention of reaching further up the Shenango Valley. The first construction train crossed north of State Street in Sharon on the 29th of August, 1887. The first passenger train passed in the same direction December 13, 1887.

Another feeder of this line is the Jackson Coal Railroad, which has a terminus at Stoneboro, and extends in a southern direction to the coal fields in Jackson and Worth Townships, a distance of six miles. It was organized in 1883 by S. B. Griffith, A. F. Thompson, Enoch Filer, James Westerman, S. H. Baird and others. It is operated by the Lake Shore in securing coal from the fields mentioned. It is to be extended, it is hoped, from its present quiet terminus to Grove City.

The Sharpsville Railroad was built originally as a coal road to Oakland, a distance of five miles from Sharpsville, without any regular organization. On the 26th of January, 1866, an organization known as the "Sharpsville & Oakland Railroad Company" was effected. The persons represented were Gen. James Pierce, Kimberly & Forker, Ormsby, Fish & Co., Frank Allen & Co., Forker, Meek & Co., Phillips, McMasters & Co., and Ormsby, Koonce & Co. The capital stock was $148,000, but was afterward increased to $184,500. The leading man in the enterprise was Gen. Pierce, who became and continued its president until the time of his death. About 1875 it was reorganized with a capital stock of $350,000, and the right to extend into Butler County, if deemed advisable. It has been a feeder for both the E. & P. R. R., and the N. Y. P. & O., and is now operated in the interest of the B. & O. R. R.

Nearly forty years ago the construction of a railroad from Mercer to New Castle was mooted, and on the 15th of October, 1853, Charles L. Whippoo, of New Castle, submitted a report of a preliminary survey made by him and James A. Leech, of Mercer County. The distance was reported as being eighteen miles, which required an expenditure of $9,000 per mile, amounting to $162,000. The superstructure at $11,000 per mile would cost $198,000. Engineering and contingent expenses were estimated at $26,000. Total, $386,000. Like all other railroad projects, the first efforts were simply preparatory to some successful movement. Finally the New Castle & Franklin road was built in 1872. It was reorganized as the New Castle & Oil City Railroad in May, 1881, and merged with the Oil City & Chicago Railroad in April, 1882; and a second time merged with the Buffalo, New York & Philadelphia Railroad in February, 1883. In 1887 it was again reorganized and became a part of the Western, New York & Pennsylvania Railroad. This is the present operating company.

The heaviest mortgage ever recorded in Mercer County is one that was placed upon the W. N. Y. & P. R. R. in the year 1887. The instrument executed by the railroad company to the Mercantile Trust Company, of New York City, in the sum of $2,000,000, was recorded by Jonathan Dean as one of the closing acts of his office as recorder of the county, the document, covering thirty-five pages of the mortgage book.

The Pittsburgh, Shenango & Lake Erie Railroad had its inception in the charter of the Bear Creek Railroad Company, March 20, 1865. This name was changed by legislative act April 9, 1867, to the Shenango & Allegheny, which title it bore until February 11, 1888, when a reorganization occurred and the present name was adopted. The road was originally intended as a coal feeder to the Atlantic & Great Western, and was finished from Shenango to Pardoe in October, 1869. In July, 1872, it was completed to Harrisville, and in January, 1876, to Hilliard. Several branches were built in 1880, '82 and '83, tapping the coal fields in Mercer and Butler Counties, and in September, 1883, the line was finished to Butler. In March, 1882, the road was extended from Shenango to Greenville, which remained its northern terminus till the latter part of 1887, when operations commenced on the extension to Amasa Crossing, where it intersects the Lake Shore. It was pushed rapidly, and was completed during the summer of 1888. This road, with its connections, has now a line extending from Amasa Crossing to Allegheny City, and the management has in contemplation its extension to the lake in the near future.

The general offices of the company are at Greenville, and its shops, built in 1882, are located at Shenango. Its officers are: M. S. Frost, president; A. H. Steele, vice-president; J. T. Blair, general manager; I. D. Stinson, general passenger agent and treasurer; P. E. McCray, secretary and auditor; E. Richardson, master mechanic; and M. L. Osterhout, master of transportation. With the extension of the road to Amasa a decided improvement was also effected in its surroundings at Greenville. A handsome depot was fitted up on Main Street, and a great deal of filling done along its route through the borough. The citizens of Greenville look upon this road as a home institution, and are proud of the enterprise exhibited by its management.

A number of unrealized railroad schemes might be recorded. One is selected. On the 15th of July, 1847, a meeting was held at the Mercer courthouse at which F. B. Hubbard was chairman and D. B. Hays, secretary, to consider the feasibility of building a railroad from Mercer to Big Bend, then an important point in consequence of its superior shipping facilities by canal. A committee, consisting of B. F. Baskin, William F. Clark, James McKean and William Maxwell, was appointed to voice the sense of the meeting. In their report they declared that "in the opinion of this meeting it is every way desirable to have a railroad constructed from the borough of Mercer to connect with the Erie extension of the Pennsylvania Canal at some point near the bend of the Shenango." The failure to embody the "sense of the meeting" in practical form prevented two points from becoming commercial centers for all time to come.

EARLY INNS AND INNKEEPERS.

When hauling was done on horseback, or by wagons and omnibuses, the inn, as a place of entertainment, was an important factor of growing civilization. The weary traveler had to find a stranger's home, and this, as he alighted from his horse or his clumsy hack, he always found at the wayside inn. Whisky, music, good victuals in great abundance, clean beds, with well-filled straw ticks and feather-beds, and not infrequently the excitement of the rustic dance, awaited his pleasure. A social time was enjoyed. The old-time inn was one of the important educational factors of the times. From the old-time inn, or tavern, has sprung the modern hotel, with register, sample rooms, reading and writing apartments, high-toned clerks and landlords, and numerous commercial guests. To trace the transition carefully would require a volume. Appended is a list of those who have been permitted in Mercer County to keep tavern and to deal out drink as the public demanded, from 1804 to 1834, inclusive. Many of these, it will be seen, were residents of country places. Latterly these houses of entertainment have naturally gravitated to towns and cities, the centers of business activity.

POST-OFFICES AND POSTMASTERS.

Nothing has more fully marked the progress of civilization than the ease, rapidity and certainty with which written and printed communications have been distributed. To note the transition from the monthly appearance of the herald on horseback, whose trumpet announced at the door of the frontier cabin that a message was ready to be delivered, to the daily or even tri-daily visitation of the crowded mail pouch carried on trains with almost lightning speed, would furnish an interesting picture.

In 1806 a weekly mail route was established from Pittsburgh to Erie via Mercer. The carrier rode horseback during the earlier years of its existence. It became a semi-weekly in 1818, a tri-weekly in 1824, and a daily in 1827. On the opening of the Mercer and Meadville turnpike, in 1821, a stage route was established and the mails transported by stage.

Most of the mail in pioneer days was received at the county seat. Envelopes were not used, but sheets of foolscap were employed, properly folded, and closed with small red wafers. The sheet was both letter paper and envelope, the whole secret being involved in the proper folding. The rates of postage were high, and based upon distance. Single letters by land, conveyed not over 40 miles, were charged 8 cents; 40 to 90 miles, 10 cents; 90 to 150 miles, 12½ cents; 150 to 300 miles, 17 cents; 300 to 500 miles, 20 cents; over 500 miles, 25 cents.

The postmaster sometimes gave notice that in future letters could not be removed from the office without the postage being paid. In those days the sender might compel the receiver to pay the sum charged for a message. Not infrequently did the postmaster announce that letters not called for within ninety days would be sent to the dead-letter office. The post-office certainly was not so popular then as now, when it is the place not only for receiving and sending mail, but a meeting ground for those who wish to renew or perpetuate acquaintanceships. Private boxes with keys and glass windows did not then exist. Cheap postage, rapid transit and safety are modern characteristics of the postal system.

We append a list of the post-offices and postmasters in Mercer County from the beginning of its system to the present time, with the year of each postmaster's appointment. It will be noticed that the list does not embrace those which existed in that part of the county which was detached in 1849 to form Lawrence. This list was obtained from the department at Washington through the courtesy of Hon. Norman Hall, member of Congress from this district.

Sharpsville was established as Sharpsville Furnace March 23, 1864, and was changed to Sharpsville February 21, 1871. Its postmasters have been:

William T. McKee, 1864; Jonas J. Pierce, 1866; Samuel Dunham, 1871; Willis W. Kitch, 1885.

Sheakleyville was established as Culbertsons June 16, 1830; changed to Exchangeville January 28, 1850, and to its present name December 22, 1853. Its successive postmasters have been: Joseph Culbertson, 1830; William Furguson, 1840; Adam Weir, 1841; John W. Sheakley, 1843; William McNamara, 1847; William K. Fulton, James Dunn, 1853; William McNamara, 1861; William E. Brown, 1863; Andrew Mills, 1866; Alex. McCoy, 1869; Mary E. McCoy, 1869.

Stoneboro was established April 4, 1868, and has had the following postmasters: Robert P. Cann, 1868; Samuel A. Wilson, 1874; Robert P. Cann, 1876; John P. Hines, 1885.

Transfer was established January 2, 1866, and its postmasters have been: James D. Morris, 1866; Samuel M. McClellan, 1867; George Heile, 1885.

Valley was established February 15, 1853, and discontinued March 21, 1885. John S. King was the only postmaster.

Western Reserve was established May 5, 1836, and discontinued August 28, 1841. Its successive postmasters were: I. R. Sankey, 1836; David Sankey, 1840; Andrew B. Allen, 1840.

West Middlesex was established August 30, 1839, and has had the following postmasters: Robert B. Young, 1839; William G. Henderson, 1845; Jacob Brinker, 1849; John W. Veach, 1849; Louesa Canon, 1856; George W. Veach, 1857; Horatio N. Warren, 1866; Henry H. Newkirk, 1866; Horatio N. Warren, 1866; Henry H. Newkirk, 1867; Horatio N. Warren, 1868; William Jones, 1876; Benjamin J. Haywood, 1877; Albert E. Randall, 1885.

West Salem was established August 11, 1851, and discontinued November 4, 1875. Its postmasters were: James W. Mossman, 1851; John S. Mossman, 1855; Cynthia Judy, 1873; David Fratschen, 1875.

Wheatland was established as Wheatland Furnace July 15, 1864, and changed to Wheatland November 8, 1872. Its successive postmasters have been: John G. Walker, 1864; Jacob A. Breneman, 1871; Charles H. Small, 1871; John E. Hillier, 1872; Anna E. Shaffer, 1886.

Wheeler was established July 26, 1871, and has had the following postmasters: Samuel S. Sample, 1871; Thomas J. Marshall, 1874; Charles H. Sargent, 1876; David W. Sample, 1878; William H. Swogger, 1884; William Jamison, Jr., 1886.

Willow Brook was established May 4, 1855, and discontinued December 9, 1856. William W. Pool was the postmaster.

Worth was established July 5, 1848. Its successive postmasters have been: Israel Garretson, 1848; John V. Hays, 1848; William Gallagher, 1849; Thomas Jones, 1861; Robert Gallagher, 1867; Henry H. Byers, 1869; Robert S. Allen, 1874; Henry H. Byers, 1875; Rebecca Jones, 1886.

THE industries or occupations of mankind are usually classified under the head of agriculture, mining, manufactures and commerce. To these might be added, to represent the present condition of things, the professions, day labor, mercantile occupations, politicians and office-holders. In this article attention will be paid to only two distinct heads—iron and steel enterprises and coal mining. The development of the iron interests of the county is comparatively recent. In the town of Mercer is a frame building which was erected by Mr. Amberson in 1804. The weather-boarding was split out by the process of riving, and the nails were all wrought nails—that is, nails that were made from bar iron by the use of the hammer in the blacksmith's hand. All such iron had to be packed into the county from afar, the native ore not having been discovered or put to practical use at that time. In the Western Press of November 13, 1846, occurs this local editorial note: "A friend informed us last evening that the light of ten furnaces could be seen from the cupola of the court-house." These ten furnaces are thus specified by Mr. Francis Allen, of Hickory Township, a gentleman most thoroughly informed relative to the coal and iron interests of the county:

1. Clay Furnace, two and a half miles southeast of Clarksville, built by Vincent & Himrod.
2. West Middlesex Furnace, West Middlesex, built by Sennett, Clark & Co.
3. Oregon Furnace, two miles west of Mercer, built by Alexander Hutchinson & Co.
4. Big Bend Furnace, Big Bend, built by John King and James McFarland.
5. Esther Furnace, Greenville, built by Himrod, Woodworth & Co.
6. Greenville Furnace, Greenville, built by Power, Waugh & Reed.
7. Hamburg Furnace, Hamburg, built by Mills & Lowry.
8. Sharon Furnace, one mile north of Sharon, built by Shoenberger, Agnew & Co.
9. Sharpsville Furnace, Sharpsville, built by Joseph and John McClure and Vincent & Himrod.
10. Mazeppa Furnace, one mile east of Mercer, built by Garrett, McGaw & Co.

From this enumeration it will be seen that Clay Furnace is the pioneer of the kind in Mercer County. It was built by B. B. Vincent and David Himrod, of Erie, under the firm name of Vincent & Himrod, in the spring of 1845. Francis Allen came from Erie in February of the foregoing year, and acted as their manager in its construction and operation. It was a small furnace, eight foot-bosh and forty-five feet high. It was built for the purpose of working native ore with charcoal, and produced seven gross tons of pig iron per day—a wonder to the people. The name, Clay Furnace, was given to the plant in honor of Kentucky's eloquent statesman, Henry Clay. It has already been stated that Mr. Allen, now of Hickory Township (Hermitage Post-office), was general manager. Carson Davis came from Erie two months later than Mr. Allen, and was employed as founder, which position he held about a year, when he removed to Sharon Furnace, and occupied a similar position there. In the spring of 1848 he returned to Clay Furnace, and occupied his old place for several years, when he bought a farm, distant about a mile from the furnace. On it he is still living.

Clay Furnace was put in blast July 19, 1845, using charcoal and native ore. Vincent & Himrod continued to run the furnace until 1851, when they sold it to the Sharon Iron Company. This company finally sold it to individual stockholders of said company, who were organized under the style of the Iron Mountain Furnace Company about 1854. In 1861 they abandoned it, selling the whole plant to Francis Allen for $5,000, who sold it out by tid-bits, thus saving himself financially. This furnace could not compete successfully with other establishments along the lines of communication. At present scarcely a vestige of the old pioneer remains to tell its interesting history.

The West Middlesex Furnace was built in 1845, and went into blast September 15 of that year, the projectors being Sennett, Clark & Co. After a short time the Buffalo Engine Company was accepted as a partner, being represented by Horatio N. Warren. This firm continued until 1854, when Warren bought the Buffalo Engine Company's interest. The firm of Sennett & Warren (other parties having previously dropped out) continued until 1858, when it failed. G. W. Tift, of Buffalo, bought the plant, which he sold in September, 1859, to Mr. Ely, of Rochester, N. Y. He ran the institution a year, and likewise failed. It then passed into the hands of H. B. Tuttle, of Cleveland, who, after a year, sold it to Martin B. Wilson, by whom it was sold to William Jones, of Greenville, in whose hands it died about 1875. It was torn down, and the material sold to various parties.

It is not known when Oregon Furnace started, although one authority fixes it as early as 1839. This is doubtless a mistake, if authorities can be believed as to the origin of Clay Furnace. It was the property of several firms, but never paid heavy dividends.

Big Bend Furnace was started in 1846, by McFarland & King. On the 1st of April, 1850, they announced that they had erected a foundry in connection with their blast furnace, and were "ready to fill all orders from a needle to an anchor." They exchanged castings for wheat, rye, corn, oats, bacon, etc. They were enterprising men, and did a general shipping business on the canal. McFarland died, and business was continued a few years by King. When mineral coal was introduced, he found the business unprofitable, and abandoned the furnace.

The Esther Furnace at Greenville was built in 1846 by Power, Waugh & Reed. After a time these gentlemen sold to Messrs. Stewart, States & Co., who had also purchased the Greenville furnace. After a number of unsuccessful attempts to produce iron at a profit, the business was abandoned, and to-day no traces of the old building are to be seen.

The Greenville Furnace was built in 1846 by Vincent, Himrod & Woodworth. Joseph Woodworth was the manager. It ran a few years, and failed because its management did not return profitable results. It was then sold to

Gen. Irvine, of Centre County, and three of his brothers. Lot Irvine was the manager, but the General furnished the "sinews of war" for the business. As long as he did this business seemed to be prosperous. Failing to do it, business lagged, and Lot, the manager, becoming greatly discouraged, committed suicide by hanging himself. This circumstance and general business depression soon led to the abandonment of the enterprise.

Hamburg Furnace was built by Mills & Lowry about the same time as the one at Big Bend. It did not prove remunerative, and was soon sold out by the sheriff, and its site is even a matter of conjecture, all vestiges having been removed.

Sharon Furnace, located nearly midway between Sharpsville and Sharon, on the line of the Erie & Pittsburgh Railroad, east of the Shenango River, was built in 1846 by the firm of Shoenberger, Agnew & Co. The firm embraced Dr. Peter Shoenberger, David Agnew, George S. King and W. W. Bell, by whom it was conjointly operated until 1852, when the senior partner, having previously secured the interests of King and Bell, purchased the right of David Agnew, and thus became sole proprietor. He continued business for a year, and then suspended operations for two years. After the death of Dr. Shoenberger the plant became the property of Boyce, Rawle & Co. The stack, 12x60, was rebuilt in 1882, and adapted to the burning of coke and the smelting of Lake Superior hematite. Originally coke and charcoal were consumed in smelting native ores, producing about 1,200 tons of pig metal annually, and employing fifteen men. The present annual capacity is about 25,000 net tons. Until his election to the national House of Representatives, Norman Hall was manager. In July, 1888, J. J. Spearman, of Sharon, and Col. James Collord, of Pittsburgh, leased the plant. The firm of Spearman, Collord & Co. fitted up the property in first-class order, changed the name of the brand from "Sharon" to "Vernon," and began operations September 25, 1888, with the brightest prospects of future success.

The Sharpsville Furnace was built in 1846 by Vincent, Himrod and Joseph and John McClure, under the firm name of Vincent, Himrod & Co. It was then called the "Blanche Furnace." It was built larger than the Clay furnace, being ten feet bosh and forty-eight feet high. Joseph McClure was its manager. The furnace ran for several years, and was then closed until 1853, when it was bought by David and John P. Agnew. They ran it two blasts, when it failed, and passed into the hands of Gen. James Pierce, who took it in payment of a coal debt. He refitted the furnace, supplying modern conveniences and making it one of the best in the Shenango Valley. It resumed operations in 1859, with John J. Spearman as manager. Mercer County block coal and Lake Superior ore were used, and it is claimed that then for the first time in Mercer County a distinctive red short iron was successfully manufactured. In 1862 Jonas J. Pierce became manager of this furnace, and the firm of James Pierce & Sons was subsequently formed. In 1870 the furnace was rebuilt, except the old stone stack, and in 1882 the latter was torn down and its place taken by a new one of modern construction, thirteen foot bosh and sixty-five feet high, which was blown in October 15, 1882. The annual capacity of the Sharpsville furnace is 30,000 tons of pig iron. The present firm is composed of Walter Pierce, Frank Pierce and James B. Pierce, with the last mentioned as manager of the furnace.

Mazeppa Furnace met the fate of all the others that went down under the fruitless effort to manufacture the native ore profitably. It was operated by John J. Spearman from 1853 to 1859, but with all his well-known energy and experience he could not operate it on a paying basis.

Of the ten furnaces mentioned only the Sharon and Sharpsville are still in existence, and they because of the business transformations through which they have passed, and the great improvements made in the cheaper manufacture of pig metal from Lake Superior ores. Most, if not all, of these furnaces were built against elevated ground, for the purpose and convenience of handling the stock from the top yard, as hoists were not then in use. The stacks were massive stone structures from foundation to tunnel head. These have been succeeded by the modern column and casing stack.

The present manufacturing interests of Mercer County, as connected with iron and steel, are confined to the Shenango Valley, and are limited to the towns of Greenville, Sharpsville, Sharon, Wheatland and West Middlesex. In this order we shall speak of them in this chapter, excepting the two last mentioned, which we have placed in the respective histories of those boroughs.

Greenville Rolling Mills.—In 1871 an association consisting of J. M. Mordock, Luther McGilvray, S. P. Thompson and James M. Ewing was formed. The same year they erected on their site of twenty acres lying between the E. & P. and the N. Y. P. & O. Railroads, half a mile south of Greenville, a mill 165x130, and ten tenement houses for their employes. The mill contained ten boiling and two heating furnaces, with three trains of rolls propelled by an engine. It made hoop and bar iron, and an improved car-link and pin. The first year's operation gave employment to fifty-five hands and produced about 2,000 tons. Many changes have taken place in ownership. The plant now has twenty-six single puddling furnaces, four heating furnaces and three trains of rolls, with an annual capacity of 12,000 net tons. The mills are operated by P. L. Kimberly & Co., of Sharon.

SHARPSVILLE.

The history of the Sharpsville furnace has already been given in the preceding part of this chapter.

Claire Furnace.—In 1868-69 Gen. James Pierce, of Sharpsville, and William L. Scott, of Erie, built the Mount Hickory furnaces, Nos. 1 and 2. They were built of brick and stone, in the most approved style, upon cast-iron columns. In 1886 these were taken down, and instead thereof one stack fifteen and one-half foot bosh and seventy-five feet high was erected. Like all others it uses the Lake Superior ore, and produces Bessemer and foundry pig iron. The annual capacity is 40,000 net tons. The organization consists as follows: M. A. Hanna, chairman; A. C. Saunders, treasurer, and A. M. Robbins, secretary and general manager at Cleveland. Josiah Robbins is the superintendent at Sharpsville.

Florence Furnace, under the proprietorship of the Henderson Iron Company, has one stack sixty feet high and twelve foot bosh. It was erected as the Allen furnace, and subsequently called the Henderson furnace, by Henderson, Allen & Co., in 1868. It was put in blast in October of that year, and remodeled in 1882. It produces Bessemer, foundry and mill pig iron, having an annual capacity of 18,000 net tons.

The Douglas Furnaces.—In 1869 Jonas J. Pierce purchased fifty acres of land on the southwest suburb of Sharpsville, on the line of the Erie & Pittsburgh Railroad. In 1870 the firm of Pierce & Kelly was organized, and furnace No. 1 built, with a stack fifty feet high and an eleven-foot bosh, and put in blast in March, 1871. The following year (1872) Gen. Pierce and son, Wallace, obtained an interest in the firm, which then became Pierce, Kelly & Co. Furnace No. 2 was erected the same year, the stack being sixty feet high and fifteen-foot bosh, and blown in February, 1873. In 1879 No. 1 was rebuilt and enlarged to a fifteen-foot bosh and sixty-foot stack, and in 1881 No. 2 was likewise enlarged. The Douglas was the pioneer of the upper furnaces. Bessemer, foundry and forge pig metal are the products. The individual members of the firm are Jonas J. Pierce, George D. Kelly and Wallace Pierce, with Mr. Kelly as general manager.

Mabel Furnaces, owned by Perkins & Co., limited, have two stacks, each sixty-five feet high, and a bosh of fourteen feet. No. 1 was built in 1872 by J. W. Ormsby & Sons. No. 2 was built in 1880. Both were rebuilt in 1883. They use as fuel block coal and coke, and have an annual capacity of about 35,000 net tons of foundry and Bessemer pig iron. The management consists of Simon Perkins, Jr., chairman and manager; L. C. Hanna, secretary and treasurer. M. A. Hanna & Co., of Cleveland, are selling agents.

Spearman Furnaces, owned and operated by the Spearman Iron Company, were built in 1872. There are two stacks, each sixty-three feet high and having fourteen foot bosh. No. 1 was blown in January 15, 1873, and No. 2, September 20, 1875. They were remodeled in 1882 and 1885, respectively. Three Whitwell hot-blast stoves are in use. The fuel consists of coke, and the product is foundry pig iron, made from Lake Superior ore. J. J. Spearman, of Sharon, organized the company, and superintended the erection of the furnaces, and has ever since been the general manager.

In 1869 Gemmill & Hawthorn started a boiler factory in Sharpsville to do all kinds of work belonging to that industry. It has served a valuable purpose in the community.

SHARON.

Sharon has been the great manufacturing center of the county, its interests being more diversified than those of Sharpsville, though not so extensive in particular directions.

The Sharon Iron Company.—One of the first citizens of the Shenango Valley to take a lively interest in the manufacture of iron was Gen. Joel B. Curtis, of Sharon. He had formerly been a leading business man at Mercer, but removed to Sharon before it was a place of any prominence, and became active in its development. He continued to reside there until the time of his death, August 27, 1862. In another part of this volume will be found a sketch of his career. Early in the forties Gen. Curtis, then a heavy coal dealer, conceived the idea of developing the iron interests of the county. This idea, however, did not materialize until 1850, when a stock company, with a capital of $20,000, was formed, and Gen. Curtis was chosen president. It was known as the "Sharon Iron Company," and its first purpose was to establish a foundry on a large scale. Gen. Curtis was authorized, in order to secure reliable information upon the business, to visit the principal cities where such work was being executed. He went to Buffalo, Albany and other important cities in the execution of his mission.

About this time some difficulty arose in the mills at Pittsburgh. Many of the skilled workmen were desirous of uniting their forces, and becoming manufacturers themselves. Gen. Curtis regarded this a favorable opportunity, and cultivated the acquaintanceship of the Pittsburgh operatives. The sequel was the securing of their co-operation in the Sharon enterprise. The iron workers took stock, and the charter was so modified as to include a rolling-mill within its scope. The works were erected before the close of the year 1850, but did not go into operation until 1851. In addition to these works, the company also erected dwellings for their hands, which fact gave a wonderful impetus to the growth of the town. The iron mill ran until 1855, when it closed. In the following year a new company took charge of the plant and fitted it up for the manufacture of steel from raw ore. This experiment was prosecuted without adequate success until the fall of 1857, when the works were again closed until 1861, when the plant was bought by Gen. Curtis, and by him sold to William Coleman, James Westerman, C. B. Wick, Jr., and P. W. Keller, who reopened the works. In 1865 Coleman and Wick disposed of their interests, and C. H. Buhl, C. H. Andrews, W. J. Hitchcock, P. W. Keller and James Westerman became the owners, and the name was changed to the "Westerman Iron Company." The furnace was built by this company in 1865-66, and they operated the works until March, 1874, when Mr. Westerman sold his interest to his partners. From 1865 to 1874 Mr. Westerman had the full management, and carried on the business very successfully. On the first of April, 1882, C. H. Buhl became sole owner of the plant, and no change has since occurred. It is the largest single plant in Mercer County, and furnishes employment to nearly 700 hands. F. H. Buhl is manager, and David Adams secretary and treasurer. Under Mr. Buhl's management many improvements have been made, and every department of the works brought to the highest state of efficiency.

In connection with the iron interests, this company, in 1862, built a railway from their works to a coal field belonging to them, at Brookfield, Ohio, a distance of three miles. This field, embracing some 2,000 acres, yielded an output of some 500 tons daily, involving in prosperous times the employment of 400 men. The company has also operated, besides the Brier Hill block coal at Brookfield, the Home Coal Bank, with a capacity of 300 tons daily. In 1876 the company established what is known as the Sharon Iron Works store, on State Street, where an extensive trade is carried on, not only with the operatives, but with citizens generally.

The Atlantic Iron Works began in 1867, under the management and proprietorship of Alexander, Ashton & Co. When first started they consisted of four boiling furnaces, one heating furnace and eighteen nail machines, with a capacity of eight tons of muck bar iron per day. In 1868 P. L. Kimberly bought an interest and the firm was known as Kimberly, Ashton & Co. Various improvements were made up to February 21, 1871, when Col. James Carnes bought Ashton's interest. The firm name then was Kimberly, Carnes & Co., and so continued for more than ten years, when Carnes sold his interest to Kimberly and retired from the business. The firm name has been continued to the present day as P. L. Kimberly & Co., the individual partners being P. L. Kimberly, T. M. Sweeney, E. Roberts, R. F. Wolfkill and William Roberts.

In 1869 Samuel Kimberly & Co. built near the rolling-mill the Keel Ridge blast furnace, which has the capacity of producing thirty-five tons of pig iron daily. This firm was known under the designation of the Keel Ridge Iron Company. In 1873 the firm of Kimberly, Carnes & Co. bought this furnace and added it to their mill, and it is yet operated in connection therewith. The Atlantic Works have thirty-two puddling furnaces, eight heating furnaces, six trains of rolls and forty nail machines. They use natural gas for fuel, and produce bar, plate, hoop and rod iron, and nails.

The Stewart Iron Works, under the ownership of the Stewart Iron Company, limited, date their origin in 1870, when they were established by the Otis Iron Company. Two years later the firm was changed to the Stewart Iron Company; and again on the 20th of June, 1877, the Stewart Iron Company, limited. The organization embraced David Stewart, of New York, chairman; Fayette Brown, general agent, and Harvey H. Brown, assistant general agent. To these are now added Theodore F. Hicks, secretary, New York, and Gardner P. Lloyd, treasurer, New York. The two Browns are located in Cleveland. Hon. Samuel McClure is the general manager of the works. The plant occupies thirty acres of ground. Four acres are covered by the mill and furnaces, and the remainder by dwellings to accommodate the families of employes. The buildings consist of the rolling-mill, 60x336 feet in dimensions, machine shop, two casting houses, large stock house, office and furnaces. The furnace is double, one stack being sixty-five and the other seventy feet in height, with boshes twelve and two-thirds and thirteen and two-thirds feet respectively. The full capacity of the two furnaces is about 62,000 net tons, but the average annual output is 55,000 net tons per year. Lake Superior ore is consumed, with coke manufactured by the company at their own coke works, at Uniontown, Fayette County, where they have 120 ovens, employing 120 hands.

The Sharon Iron and Brass Foundry was erected in 1872 by J. W. Evans, Joseph King, Dr. J. M. Irvine and others. It continued to run until the spring of 1876, when financial stringency compelled it to suspend. It was known as the "Valley Iron Works," and stood in the south part of town, opposite the office of the Stewart Iron Works. The building is unused, being the property of Ruff & Irvine, of Pittsburgh, Pa.

The Shenango Machine Works, limited, are owned by Daniel Eagan, Frank Buhl, Joseph Riddle and Samuel McClure. The works were formerly conducted by William McGilvray & Co., by whom it was purchased in 1854. At that time it was a woolen factory, but was changed at once to a foundry and machine shop, known as the Sharon foundry. Mr. McGilvray carried on the business successfully until his death, July 5, 1877. In March, 1881, Daniel Eagan and Samuel McClure purchased the property, and in 1883 the present company was organized, with a capital of $40,000. The plant occupies three acres, on which are erected the buildings, seven in number. The foundry is commodious, being a brick structure 50x80, with a wing 30x30. The machine and pattern shop is a large building, originally put up for a woolen-mill. It is three stories high, and is 34x80 feet. The pattern house is a one-story building, 30x50 feet. The officers are Frank Buhl, president, and Daniel Eagan, secretary, treasurer and general manager.

The Sharon Steel Casting Company, Frank Buhl, president; Samuel McClure, vice-president; Daniel Eagan, secretary and general manager; John Forker, treasurer; B. F. Watkins, superintendent; and selling agent, S. P. Davidson, 117 Monroe Street, Chicago, was organized in February, 1887. The commodious works, located on the northern limits of the town, were erected the same year, and the first steel was made on the 26th of August. The equipment consists of one fifteen-ton Siemens-Martin open hearth furnace. The product is steel castings of all kinds, the annual capacity being 10,000 net tons. This is the only steel plant in Mercer County. Though its history is yet limited, it is safe to say it is turning out the finest quality of steel castings, and its product is second to none.

Sharon Boiler Works.—This industry was started in 1868 by S. Runser, William McGilvray, and William McGilvray & Co., with a capital of $5,000. Several years afterward R. G. Morrison bought Runser's interest, and the firm became R. G. Morrison & Co. It so remained until 1878, when the business was incorporated under the laws of the State as the Sharon Boiler Works Company, limited, with a capital stock of $16,000. The organization consists of P. L. Kimberly, president; D. R. Shiras, treasurer, and R. G. Morrison, secretary and general manager.

Sharon Stove Works, R. A. Duncan & Co., proprietors, began to build their structure in the fall of 1883, and commenced active operations in January following. The town donated a tract of land and $10,000. The firm opened with about forty hands. The specialty was cooking and heating stoves. The works continued to run without interruption until November, 1887, never missing a pay-day. They then closed owing to the stringency of money affairs, P. L. Kimberly having closed a court judgment against the firm. Business has since been resumed, and the works are in active operation.

There is a small wire nail factory now operated by Henry Tresise. It was established as a tuyere factory in 1871, and has since been in successful operation. In 1887 Mr. Tresise began the manufacture of wire nails.

In 1874 Messrs. McGilvray, Blount, Fisher & Co., established a furnace for the manufacture of iron from a certain kind of slag. Coke was the fuel used. The experiment proved quite successful, the daily output reaching some ten tons.

The Chain Factory, owned and operated by Victor Doutreville, was established by that gentleman in the spring of 1887. It is located immediately east of the E. & P. R. R. depot, and consists of a one-story frame building, fitted up with modern appliances for the manufacture of chain. Mr. Doutreville has built up a prosperous business, and gives steady employment to quite a number of hands.*

Iron Statistics for 1887.—The production of iron and steel in Mercer County for the year 1887, as we learn by a private letter from James M. Swank, general manager of the American Iron and Steel Association, of Philadelphia, was as follows: Pig iron, 279,236 net tons, or 249,318 gross tons. Rolled iron, including plate and sheet iron and a small quantity of iron rails, 47,519 net tons, or 42,428 gross tons. Nails, 66,625 kegs of 100 pounds each. Of this quantity, 25,882 kegs were made of steel. There are in the county seventeen blast furnaces, six rolling-mills and one open hearth steel casting plant. Of the rolling-mills, two make muck bar and blooms only, which are not included in the rolled iron production just given. From the day that Mr. Amberson made his hand wrought nails at Mercer, in 1804, to the year 1887, great changes and progress in domestic industries have been effected.

A Question of Controversy.—As stated in the early part of this chapter, the first furnaces were fed with charcoal and consumed the native ore of the county. Now either coke or natural gas is the fuel, and Lake Superior ore is the material mainly used in the manufacture of all kinds of iron. The question which has aroused considerable interest and been the cause of no small amount of controversy is: What furnace is entitled to the credit of first successfully using Lake Superior ore, and to what person or persons is the honor to be awarded? The furnaces contesting for the honor are Sharpsville and Clay furnace, and the persons are David and J. P. Agnew and Francis Allen. By the former it is maintained that they worked the ore at the Sharpsville furnace successfully as early as 1853, while the latter maintains that it was not worked successfully until it was done in the Clay furnace after it was remodeled in October, 1856.

The whole controversy depends, it seems, upon what is meant by working ore successfully. After reading the articles published in 1877 in the Sharpsville Advertiser by Messrs. Allen and Agnew, we have concluded that the term success must be defined to solve the difficulty. Certain things were conceded, however.

1. Lake Superior was first used in the Sharpsville furnace, thirty tons in 1853.

*For iron industries of West Middlesex and Wheatland see chapter on those boroughs.

2. It was subsequently used at Clay furnace. The result we shall allow to be expressed by Mr. Allen in his reply to Mr. Agnew:

"As stated in a former article, we wish to accord to Mr. Agnew all honor for having worked thirty tons of Lake Superior ore mixed with native ore, and that, too, before any Lake Superior ore had ever been received at Clay furnace, even if it did take six days. And we now say that if it had taken six months to get this trifling amount through their furnace, we would still be willing to give them all praise for having done it. We spent three years at Clay furnace experimenting with lake ore, and notwithstanding the fact that during the whole of that time we succeeded much better than Mr. Agnew ever did at Sharpsville, we never worked it successfully until the fall of 1856."

Mr. Agnew claims that the fact that some of the iron made from the Lake Superior ore was afterward wrought into bars, nails, etc., at Sharon was evidence of the success claimed for the experiment. Success, then, might not be accepted as success now; but success, so he maintains, is a relative term.

The whole question, then, is one of success. Whether Lake Superior ore was worked successfully at Sharpsville in 1853 or not, it is very certain that it is worked there successfully at the present time.

COAL INTERESTS OF THE COUNTY.

The coal of the county has been, and is now, one of its important products. A beneficent Providence, during the carboniferous age of the world, while dense forests covered the earth, among whose shady jungles crept huge reptiles, and through whose branches sported mighty pterodactyls, and while the atmosphere was heavily charged with carbonic acid gas, had in view the well-being of man, the mighty "lord of creation," and provided, in rich abundance, a fuel that could never be exhausted. He stored, within the bowels of mother earth the means by which his food could be cooked and his hearth-stone made cheerful. He who can study carefully this beautiful provision and not feel deeply grateful, is lacking the primary elements of appreciation.

The coal districts of Mercer County seem to be three in number, viz.: 1. Those of the valley of the Shenango and its tributaries. 2. Those of the Wolf Creek region. 3. Those of the Big Sandy region. While this division may seem to be a little arbitrary, it will answer our purpose for what is to be presented touching this important interest of the county.

The question is frequently asked—Who discovered the first coal in Mercer County? It is now known that citizens came from Trumbull County, Ohio, and obtained, on the farm now owned by Peter Simpkins, in the southwest part of West Salem Township, coal for blacksmithing purposes, as early as the settlements were made in that region, which occurred at the close of the last and opening of the present century. The coal was found cropping out from the rocks along the bluff of a small run. The coal has been regularly worked ever since, and furnishes a fine quality of the black diamonds. At present the mines are operated by the sons of Mr. Simpkins. In 1833-34 Joseph Loutzenhiser, residing northwest of Greenville, put down a shaft on the farm of Samuel Cannon. A shaft was put down about the same time on the Cossitt farm, southwest of Greenville. Early in 1835 croppings of coal were found near Sharon, on the lands afterward owned by Gen. Curtis. What is true of these persons is doubtless true of others—they used coal found near at hand, and made no fuss about it.

Mercer County block coal is peculiar in its formation, being wholly unlike the black diamonds of the Pittsburgh region. It is described as possessing a "laminated structure, splitting into sheets, and is very difficult to break on the opposite of the lamina. The faces of the layers are often covered with a soft, dead, carbonaceous material, like charcoal, and the whole seam throughout is marked by alternate layers of dead and bright looking coal. In the act of combustion it neither smells nor changes form. In the furnace the blocks retain their shape until they fall to ashes." The characteristic qualities possessed made it specially valuable in the manufacture of pig iron. For a long time it was used just as taken from the mines, and its use has only been supplanted by the cheap delivery of coke and natural gas at the furnaces.

The coal in the vicinity of Sharon was discovered in 1835. It is presumed that this means that it was found in paying quantities and subsequently opened up for inspection. It is claimed that Isaac Patterson found traces of coal as early as 1810, not a mile from the borough; but it never availed anything practically. The mines were, soon after discovery, opened on the lands owned by Gen. Curtis; and Charles Meek, who died at Sharon in May, 1876, was, by virtue of previous experience, called upon to take supervision. George Boyce, soon afterward, became associated with Gen. Curtis. Coal was easily obtained, but its use, at first, was only for home consumption. People were so accustomed to use wood as fuel that they were slow to substitute such a substance as coal. Then, too, the means for consuming it had to be invented, the ordinary fire hearths and cooking and heating stoves being ill adapted to the newly introduced fuel. Coal had to create its friends, and all the means for mining, transporting and consuming itself. This required time.

Prior to the completion of the Beaver & Erie Canal, the means of transportation were so imperfect that the coal mined had to go begging for a market. The construction of that medium of communication, however, gave an outlet to trade, and greatly stimulated this important industry. Shipments were made in all directions, at first with small profits, but finally with satisfactory terms to both capital and labor. The completion of the various railroads of the county, and especially those through the Shenango Valley, greatly stimulated its production and distribution.

In 1844 William Fruit, of Clarksville, a pioneer in the coal business, made his first shipment to Erie. In digging his coal he substituted mules for dogs in hauling coal from his mines, making so much of an innovation upon the plan used at the Curtis bank at Sharon. Loading a canal boat, whose capacity was twenty-seven tons, he started for Erie with the first load of coal that had passed along the canal to that place. One of his three hands that accompanied him was Capt. Gregory, now of Mercer. He was disappointed on reaching the place. His new fuel was not in demand. He had to consume tons in experiments to convince people that it would burn, and was superior to wood for cooking and heating purposes. This all involved time and money. Despairing of success, Mr. Fruit was on the eve of dumping his cargo into the lake and returning home in disgust. At that moment Rufus S. Reed, a large shareholder in the canal, took an interest in the cargo and bought it at $2 per ton, giving his note therefor at sixty days. Mr. Fruit had the paper discounted and returned to his home, after an absence of six weeks, rich in experience but poor in purse. The debit side of his loss and gain account was the larger.

The Strawbridge brothers, of Sharon, had, as early as 1840, discovered coal on their land. A year or two later they made developments, built tramways and shutes to the canal, and made shipments. At first their experience was unsatisfactory, but they persevered, and conquered.

In the spring of 1847 Gen. James Pierce located at Clarksville, and formed a partnership with Luke Cutler in purchasing an interest in the Montgomery coal mines. After exhausting those lands, he leased others at Mount Hickory (subsequently his home) and opened up mines. He constructed a "tram-way" to the canal. These mines, worked from 1851 to 1871, when they were exhausted, proved to be very valuable. He opened and worked various banks at different places: The Phillips bank near Mount Hickory, in partnership with John Phillips, in 1855; the Hofius bank in 1860; the Oakland coal mines in 1863, his partner being William L. Scott, of Erie; the Neshannock mines in 1864; other mines near Oakland in 1872, his associates being P. Metcalf and the Frampton Brothers; besides several in Lawrence County. In all these operations his practical judgment and energy made him very successful. We can simply refer to other mines that were opened during this coal period.

Rev. George McCleery began coal operating in 1848, and was engaged in the business up to a recent date.

Douglas' Drift was opened for home use, on the farm of Samuel Douglas, in 1848. It subsequently became a good bank, but is now defunct.

Wilson & Oxy opened a bank on the Koonce farm in 1852. It was soon abandoned.

Mount Carbon Coal Bank.—In 1856 A. L. Crawford, now of New Castle, sank a shaft on the farm of Hon. M. C. Trout, in Hickory Township. It was exhausted in 1867-68. A large supply of coal was taken out, and drawn by horses on a tram-way to Sharon for shipment.

Rankin Bank was opened in 1856, on the farm of Jacob Hann. It was operated by Curtis & Rawle until exhausted in 1868.

Moorfield Bank, sunk in 1857 by T. J. Porter and Henry Forker, was exhausted in 1868. It was on the farm of Henry Love.

Caster Bank, opened by Porter, Forker & Co. in 1858, on the farm of A. Y. Eberhart. They sold it to New Castle parties, who worked it until it was exhausted in 1864.

Ormsby Works No. 1, by Enoch Filer, for J. W. Ormsby and Pierce, on the farm of John Hofius, in 1859, continued until 1871. This was the first shaft in which machinery was used for hoisting the coal.

Keel Ridge No. 1, shaft sunk by Enoch Filer for Kimberly & Forker, on the Titus farm, four miles from Sharpsville, in 1863. The owners were Samuel Kimberly and Henry Forker. Ownership subsequently changed to Kimberly, Forker & Co.; abandoned in December, 1874.

Lowry Mine, located on the farm of J. W. Ormsby, two miles from Clarksville.

Crawford Mines, on the lands of Duncan & Koonce, in Pymatuning Township, were opened by the Crawfords, of Cleveland. The A. & G. W. Railroad (now Erie) built a branch for traffic accommodation.

Emery Bank, on the Emery farm, was opened in 1865 by Veach, Risher & Co., of West Middlesex. Not productive now.

Forker Bank.—Joseph Forker & Co. sank a shaft on the Walker farm in 1865-66. It was very productive for a time. The works burned in 1870, but were rebuilt.

Neshannock Bank.—Shaft was sunk in 1864-65 by Phillips & McMasters, on farm of John Eberhart. In 1870 Gen. Pierce bought McMasters' interest. A destructive fire in 1876 entailed a loss of $8,000 upon the company. Daily capacity, 250 tons. The firm of Phillips & Co. retired from the business in 1887.

Westerman Slope.—Shaft was sunk in 1869, by the Westerman Iron Company, on the farm of McConnell. Daily output, 175 tons.

Pacific Slope was opened in 1874 by Dunham & Roberts, on the Meek farm.

Five Points Shaft was sunk by Pierce & Frampton in 1872, on the farm of Jonathan Eaton, in Hickory Township. A branch railway connected it with the Sharpsville line. It has not been in operation since 1874.

Keel Ridge No. 2.—Shaft sunk on Frazier farm, about half a mile from No. 1, for Kimberly, Forker & Co., in 1871. It was exhausted in 1874.

Keel Ridge No. 3, on the Koonce farm, half a mile north of No. 2, owned by Kimberly & Filer. Sunk about the time the others closed.

Mount Pleasant Shaft, sunk on land of Enoch Filer, by Kimberly & Filer in 1869, with an average daily capacity of 300 tons.

Snyder Bank, on Snyder farm, opened by Kimberly, Filer & Co. in 1873.

Lackawannock Bank, opened on farm of Paul Everhart in 1868–69, by Samuel Kimberly & Co., and abandoned in 1872.

Congressional Bank, sunk on the Love farm by Spearman, Ulp, Kimberly & Filer in 1874. Reached by the Sharpsville Railroad branch to Bethel.

Miller Bank.—Shaft sunk by J. W. Ormsby & Sons in 1870 on the farm of Matthias Miller. The Westerman Coal Company became a partner in 1876, and assisted in the subsequent operations.

Middlesex Mine, opened on the Robert Caldwell farm, one and a half miles west of West Middlesex in 1847, by Sennett & Graham. Passing through various hands it finally became exhausted.

Mount Morris Coal Bank.—Wassen, Veaches & Rishers sunk a shaft on the Morrison farm west of Middlesex in 1860. A tram-way and shutes enabled the company to make extensive shipments after 1861, over 500,000 tons. The construction of the Erie & Pittsburgh Railroad greatly facilitated business.

Crawford & Patterson's Bank is situated on the Jackson farm, one and a half miles west of Middlesex. It was opened in 1862 by Crawford & Geise. After supplying 170,000 tons, the mine was exhausted in 1875.

Bethel Coal Works.—In 1868 Meek, Boyce & Rawle, of Sharon, put down, at a cost of $22,000, a slope on the land of R. S. Allen, of Hickory Township. A narrow gauge railway was built to West Middlesex, a distance of four miles, at a cost of $7,000. An engine and “dumps” furnished the transporting power. In 1869 E. A. Wheeler and other persons from Sharon became the owners of Meek's interest. The same year the works were destroyed by fire, but at once rebuilt. In 1869, too, a shaft (Bethel No. 1) was sunk by the same company in Shenango Township, on the lands of James Stewart's heirs, at a cost of $14,000. A track was laid to this shaft, and increased transporting power secured. Both shafts were worked to their full capacity until 1873–74, when the supply was exhausted. A third shaft was sunk by the company on the farm of S. S. Sample, in Shenango Township, at a cost of $15,000. Railway connection was also made. These works, extensive and thoroughly worked as they were, did not prove exceedingly remunerative, the quality of the coal not being considered the best.

The extensive operations in coal in the vicinity of Sharon during the closing years of the war will be seen by the following statistics taken from the Sharon Herald. In 1864 the output was about 3,500 tons per day.

The daily output of coal by the various companies operating in the Shenango Valley in May, 1865, was:

The other extensive field is that in and around Stoneboro. At this point we are pleased to introduce a carefully prepared report by J. M. Goodwin, of Sharpsville, who located the works and surveyed Stoneboro:

"In the summer of 1864 the Mercer Iron & Coal Company commenced operations preliminary to opening the mines, now known as the Stoneboro Mines, on lands some time previously acquired by that company, situated near, and principally south of, Sandy Lake. The company owned 2,183 acres of land, in fee, and held 'mineral rights' in 1,364 additional acres. Underlying much the greater part of this territory of 3,547 acres there are three veins of coal. The upper vein is Vein No. 3 of the Ohio nomenclature. Vein No. 2 lies from 36 to 70 feet below No. 3, and No. 1 from 50 to 180 feet below No. 2. The average workable thickness of the coal in No. 3 is four feet; Vein No. 2 is found in places to have a thickness of three feet, and No. 1 a thickness of thirty inches. Only the upper vein (No. 3) has been, thus far, worked.

"The mines were opened under the direction and personal supervision of Hon. P. H. Watson. Mr. Watson had been from the early days of the great rebellion until July, 1864, closely engaged as Assistant Secretary of War at Washington. Unremitting attention to the duties of his office had seriously impaired his health, and in 1864 he was forced to leave Washington in order that he might, in out-of-door occupations, regain some of the vigor expended in the service of the government. He came to Sandy Lake for the purpose of examining the coal territory thereabout early in 1864, returning thence to Washington. In August, 1864, accompanied by the writer, he established himself as general manager of the coal company's affairs at Sandy Lake.

"Work on the main entry No. 1 of the mine was commenced in July, 1864. The coal taken out in 'driving entries' during the winter of 1864-65 was sold to teamsters, who hauled it to Oil City, and even to points beyond that place, selling it at prices varying from \$12 to \$15 per net ton. The railroad track connecting the mine with the Jamestown & Franklin Railroad, now part of the Franklin division of the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern Railway, was completed to the shute, at opening No. 1, May 17, 1865, and the first lot (five cars) of coal left the mine May 22, 1865. The coal, excluding nut coal and 'slack,' marketed by the Mercer Iron & Coal Company up to March 25, 1876, aggregated 629,158 tons. This output equals 5,141 tons per acre of area actually mined up to the date named, and is 73 $\frac{1}{4}$ per cent of the entire body of coal originally in the ground in the said area. This is a very praiseworthy showing, indicating, as it does, unusual skill and economy of coal on the part of the mining bosses. The ordinary waste in British mines (worked as the Stoneboro mines are, on the 'pillar and stall' plan) is 40 per cent of the coal in the ground, as reported by a royal commission appointed to investigate mining matters in the United Kingdom, and in this country the waste is, I believe, even greater, as a rule.

"In March, 1875, the company had finished and began using a slope, put in to reach parts of the mine lying north and west from the original openings, and a few years later put down a second slope into coal in the more southerly part of its territory, from which they will eventually mine not less than 5,000,000 tons, except some now unforeseen reason for suspending operations develops itself.

"My connection with the Mercer Iron & Coal Company continued from August, 1864, to March, 1866, during which period I acted as its engineer, under Mr. Watson's management. Having brought the mine to the point of successful operation, Mr. Watson turned over the management to other hands and left Stoneboro—as the village built up near the mines had been named—in the latter part of 1865.

"In February and March of 1876 a survey of the entire mine was made under my supervision. At that time, with the aforesaid output of 629,158 tons of coal, only 122 acres of ground had been actually mined out. The coal mined at Stoneboro is an excellent 'steam-coal,' and is largely used for locomotive fuel and other like services."

The building of the Shenango & Allegheny (now the Pittsburgh, Shenango & Lake Erie) Railroad to Pardoe, in 1869, opened up a new coal region in the vicinity of Pardoe, and subsequently near Grove City (then Pine Grove). The Mercer Mining & Manufacturing Company having laid out the village of Pardoe, opened and began to operate extensive mines, which supply a large quantity of excellent coal. The coal is known as Clarion coal. It is quite hard, and the veins main an average thickness of four to five feet. The coal around Grove City is similar, it is said, to that of Pardoe.

From the report of the Secretary of Internal Affairs, of industrial statistics for the year 1887, we glean the following interesting mining statistics of this county, as reported by Thomas K. Adams, mine inspector for the Third Bituminous District, which embraces Mercer County. In the whole district Mr. Adams reported no fatal accident during the year. Of the nineteen non-fatal, ten were at mines in this county. Four new mines were opened during the year, one of which, Lackawannock No. 2, is in Mercer County. It is the deepest shaft in the district, being sunk to the "Sharon Block" coal, found at a depth of 280 feet. With the report is a drawing showing the strata passed through. At a depth of eighty feet two feet of coal was found, followed by two feet of limestone, then two feet of coal again, which was the only coal until the block was reached at 280 feet. Following is a list of the mines in the county, with amount in tons of coal produced, and number of miners employed:

This report, however, does not embrace the product of the smaller banks in the vicinity of Greenville, Sharon and other portions of the county. Thousands of bushels are mined annually that never enter into such reports, as under the law no bank is included that does not employ ten hands. Private consumers in Greenville are largely supplied from the mines in West Salem and Pymatuning Townships, no mention of which is made in Mr. Adams' report for the reason just stated. This is also the case in Hickory Township and every other coal section in Mercer County. It is estimated that at least 100,000 bushels are annually mined in this county by small operators who do not employ the requisite number of men to bring them within the scope of State reports.

AGRICULTURAL—SOURCES OF WEALTH AND THEIR RELATIONSHIP—DIGNITY OF THE FARMER'S CALLING—FIRST IMPORTATION OF DOMESTIC ANIMALS INTO AMERICA—VEGETABLE PRODUCTS—INTRODUCTION OF WHEAT, RYE, CORN, OATS, BUCKWHEAT, BARLEY AND POTATOES INTO THIS COUNTRY—FARM IMPLEMENTS AND IMPROVEMENTS MADE THEREIN—FERTILIZERS AND DRAINAGE—GILKEY POTATO—AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES—MERCER AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES OF THE PAST AND PRESENT—SHENANGO VALLEY AGRICULTURAL AND MANUFACTURING SOCIETY OF GREENVILLE—WOOL GROWERS' ASSOCIATION—MERCER COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF STONEBORO—JAMESTOWN AGRICULTURAL AND MANUFACTURING ASSOCIATION—KEYSTONE AND BUCKEYE FAIR ASSOCIATION OF SHARON—AGRICULTURAL PAPER—THE GRANGE.

THE sources of wealth are sometimes classified into three groups: 1. Those things which are dug out of the earth in the form of ores and minerals. 2. Those which are grown from the earth in the form of cereals and vegetables of various kinds. 3. Those things which are manufactured, directly or remotely, from either of the foregoing products. These three sources of wealth are intimately connected with one another, and therefore mutually dependent. When this relationship and inter-dependence are recognized properly, they can not be placed in antagonistic attitudes. They constitute the great trinity of industrial pursuits, and have had an existence since the career of the race began in the oriental garden. To the second class of wealth producers belongs the farmer. His occupation is not only one of the most important, but it is given increased dignity because of its age. Not so much as a curse, but as a blessing in disguise, was the primitive man reminded that "in the sweat of his face" he should eat bread. When, in a state of entire innocence, he was placed in the garden, it was not so much to give him a long recreation as to "keep and dress it."

The dignity and importance of his calling have been recognized in all ages. Virgil, the bard of Mantua, has, in his Georgics and Bucolics, devoted the highest powers of his brilliant poetic genius to the proper celebration of its glories. The strain has been caught by poet and orator, painter and sculptor. The humblest tiller of the soil may say, with the fullest appreciation of its import:

A farmer's life is the life for me;
I own I love it dearly,
And every year, full of glee,
I take its labor cheerily

A curious history attaches to some of the animals and vegetables with which the farmer has to deal. Deeming this history a matter of great interest, we insert a brief sketch, commencing with the domestic animals. The first specimens of these were brought to America by Columbus in his second voyage in 1493. As an admiral of seventeen ships, he left Spain with a collection of horses, a bull and several cows. The first horses, forty-two in number, brought into what is now the United States were landed in Florida by Cabeza de Vaca in 1527. Twelve years later, viz., 1539, De Soto also brought to the same region a large number of horses and swine, among the latter of which were thirteen sows, whose progeny soon increased to several hundred. In 1609 three ships from England landed at Jamestown, Va., with many immigrants, and the following animals: Six mares, one horse, 600 swine, 500 domestic fowls, with a few sheep and goats. Other animals had been previously introduced there. In 1610 an edict was issued in Virginia, prohibiting the killing of domestic animals of any kind on penalty of death to the principal, and burning the hand and loss of the ears to the accessory, and twenty-four hours' whipping to the concealer. As a consequence swine became so numerous that the colony was nigh well overrun by them, and the Indians fed upon the wild specimens instead of game.

Wheat was introduced into the North American colonies when the first European settlers arrived. It was first sown on the Elizabeth Islands, in Massachusetts, by Gosnold, at the time he explored its coast in 1602. In 1611 it and other grains were sown in Virginia, and by 1648 many hundred acres were cultivated. This useful cereal was introduced into the Mississippi Valley by the "Western Company" in 1718; but careless cultivation and sudden changes of climate prevented large crops. In 1746, however, 600 barrels of flour had been sent from the Wabash to New Orleans, showing that progress was being made in agriculture. In 1776 the Hessian, or wheat fly, was introduced when Howe's mercenary troops, brought from Germany, disembarked on the west end of Long Island. The insect, supposed to have been carried hither in straw, was for many years the most fatal enemy the farmer had to contend against.

Rye, supposed to be a native of the Caspian Caucasian desert, was cultivated in America soon after its settlement by the English. Traces of it in Nova Scotia are found as early as 1622, and in Virginia in 1648.

Corn is claimed to be indigenous to America. When Columbus discovered Cuba he found it cultivated by the aboriginal inhabitants. The first successful attempt by the English to raise this grain was made on the James River, in Virginia, in 1608. The yield was very great.

Oats, in its most common variety, is said to be indigenous to the island of Juan Fernandez. The plant was introduced into the North American colonies soon after their settlement by the English. It was sown by Gosnold on the Elizabethan Islands, in 1602; cultivated in Newfoundland in 1622, and in Virginia, by Berkley, prior to 1648.

Buckwheat is supposed to be a native of Central Asia, from which it was taken into Europe in the twelfth century. When it was introduced into America is not known. Holm, in his "History of Pennsylvania," published at Stockholm in 1702, mentions it among the productions of the province; so does Kalm, the Swedish naturalist, who visited this country in 1748-49.

Barley, like wheat, was cultivated in Egypt and Syria more than 3,000 years ago. Its introduction into America may be traced to the period of its permanent settlements. Gosnold sowed it and other grains on Martha's Vineyard in 1602, and the colonists in Virginia in 1611.

Potatoes.—The common Irish potato (Solanum tuberosum) has been found, in an indigenous state, in the mountainous districts of South America and Mexico. The first account of it published anywhere was printed at Seville, Spain, in 1553. It subsequently worked its way into Italy and the rest of Europe. It reached the North American colonies probably about 1748.

The Sweet Potato (Batatas Edulis) is a native of the East Indies. It is mentioned as a product of the American colonies as early as 1648.

Farm Implements.—In no department of agricultural activity has greater progress been shown than in the line of its implements for producing and securing its crops. The improvements here are the marks of genuine civilization. The primitive plow was a crude affair. It was heavy, and far from being artistic. Its wooden mold board and heavy beam finally, in the lapse of time, gave way to the steel mold board and iron beam. These changes were produced gradually through the operation of enterprising agents, plowing matches, agricultural papers and fairs. The early harrow with its wooden teeth and heavy timbers would hardly be recognized now as the harbinger of the revolving harrow with strong iron teeth, much less of the patent drill which enables the farmer to dispense with the labor of sowing his grain broadcast as in the olden times. The heavy hoe would scarcely be recognized as the object from which the modern steel implement is fashioned.

In the means of gathering grain, the most decided improvements have been made. First the sickle, or hook, was used. It enabled the skillful farmer to gather his grain whether it stood or had fallen. It was tedious and dangerous, as the fingers of many a hand could testify, if they should relate the experiences while carrying a swath through the field. Then came the cradle, which was a decided improvement, and supposed, for a time, to be all that could be expected in the line of such implements. Like the sickle, it served a worthy purpose, and afforded the jolly farm hands an abundant opportunity to enjoy the 10 o'clock luncheon and genuine rye whisky which always found themselves in the harvest field. But both these implements were destined to give way to the modern reaper with its appliances for self-binding. Human ingenuity enabled the progressive farmer to save his own muscle, and employ instead that of his faithful horses, over whom he was authorized to exercise merciful dominion.

But progress did not stop at this point. The pioneer was content to gather his wheat or buckwheat upon a floor and beat it out with the ordinary flail, or tread it out by the aid of his horses, and then winnow it by allowing the wind to blow out the chaff from the precious grain. When the windmill was introduced, he felt that his labor was greatly lightened, but not till the appearance of the thrashing machine, whose revolving cylinder, kept in motion by bands or rods, connected with a strong horse power, beat out his grain at the rate of several hundred bushels per day, and separated it from the chaff, did he consider himself thoroughly supplied with labor-saving agencies.

Nor was this progress confined to the department of farm implements. The intelligent, progressive farmer soon discovered that not only did he need good machinery to produce and husband his grain, but that he needed to give diligent attention to the condition of his land. He could not expect to take from the soil year after year, without restoring the lost substance. Fertilization thus forced itself upon him. The virgin soil soon began to show marks of weakness, and required to be reinvigorated. This was accomplished sometimes by giving it a rich coating of straw manure; sometimes by change of crops, that is, from wheat to corn or grass or clover, and sometimes by absolute rest from all crops. At a later period the value of phosphates began to attract his serious attention. Another problem, which Horace Greeley pronounced one of the most important in farm economy, viz., drainage, likewise knocked at his door and demanded solution. At first the open drain was considered sufficient, but it soon demonstrated its own inutility. The farmer had neither the time nor the means to be constantly engaged in digging or opening up the ditches with which his land was belted. In regular order the underground drain suggested itself. At first wooden coverings or boxings were deemed adequate, but these, in the lapse of time, were supplanted by the tile drain, which is a permanent outlet for the water which would otherwise remain on the surface, and not only injure the crop, but have a deleterious effect upon the land itself. The progressive farmer has finally settled down in the conviction that he must not only have the labor-saving appliances of modern husbandry, but must give attention particularly to the drainage and fertilization of his land, never neglecting the proper rotation of crops.

Had some record been kept of the various changes through which farming in its various branches has passed, it would be one of the most interesting annals to be had in these days of activity. From the fragments seen we have learned that, in the early part of this century, Mr. James Gilkey, then living near the west branch of Neshannock Creek, performed some interesting experiments in the production of potatoes. From the seed which he planted he developed a potato which, for richness of flavor and general usefulness, has never been surpassed. Bevan Pearson took some of these specimens with him to the Legislature, and showed them to his friends in Philadelphia. They soon became very popular, and their fame spread far and wide. At home they were known from the stream on whose banks they were produced, Neshannocks. In the east they were called the Mercers, and when sent to Ireland during the famine of 1847 they were denominated the Gilkeys, in honor of their producer. These potatoes finally were supplanted by pinkneys, peach-blows, long reds, early roses, snowflakes, and others, ad infinitum. Similar changes have occurred in other departments of the vegetable world.

AGRICULTURAL SOCIETIES.

Agricultural societies and papers have done much toward elevating farming from its former condition to one of intelligent observation and experiment, and demonstrated that its labors may be conducted by the same unerring laws as exist elsewhere. Of these societies Mercer County has had its share. When the first one was organized is not known, the imperfect records having failed to disclose the fact. In the Western Press of January 5, 1828, occurs the following notice: "The Mercer County Agricultural Society will hold its Seventh Exhibition, Cattle Show and Auction, in New Castle, on Friday, the 7th day of November, 1828. All stock must be in the pens, and all articles of domestic manufacture in the room, at 12 o'clock A. M. Joseph Justice, president; Nathaniel McElevey, secretary." The total amount of premiums offered was $88.50. The following are a few of the rewards held out: "For the best crop of wheat on one acre, $3.00. For the best crop of Havanna tobacco on quarter acre, $2.00. For such a stud-horse as may combine points and properties worthy of encouragement, $5.00. For the best piece of flannel, not less than ten yards, $1.00. For the best cheese, not less than ten lbs., $1.00. For the best firkin of butter, made not less than four months previous, $1.00. For the best specimen of horn combs, $3.00." In the same paper of January 8, 1831, Joseph Emery, treasurer of the society, announces that by a resolution of the directors, passed the 15th of the preceding November, he was required to collect all arrears due the organization. This is the last announcement of the society, which may, with propriety, be called the pioneer of such valuable organizations in Mercer County.

Mercer County Agricultural Society.—A call "for the establishment of an agricultural society" was issued June 23, 1843, and signed by Robert McWilliams, Thomas S. Dumars, Amos Wilkins, H. Shuster, James Wilson, J. A. Nelson, T. Rogers, William Patterson, T. S. Cunningham, John Stevenson, James Rose, John Gealy, G. Seeley, J. Glendening, Adam Black, John Newel, Joseph Thompson, W. W. Hoon, Robert Hamilton and O. G. Croy, fixing the 27th of that month as the date for a meeting of the citizens interested in the matter to take initiatory steps. This meeting was held agreeable to the call, but did not result in any organization. It stimulated the public interest for such an enterprise, though, and bore fruit in 1850, when the Mercer County Agricultural Society was organized. The first grounds of this society was on the Hoge farm, north of Mercer, on the east side of the Mercer and Meadville pike. Ten acres of land were leased from the heirs of the Hoge estate, and kept for about two years, although during this time the grounds were never fenced in, nor were buildings erected. At the expiration of this period the society rented ten acres on the opposite side of the same road, above the old building known as the "Lion House," and placed upon them temporary structures for the reception of stock and other exhibits. These quarters were occupied for about nine years, at the end of which time fourteen acres were leased on the present site of the Central Agricultural Society's grounds. At a meeting held in the court-house November 21, 1860, at which time the officers of the society comprised Michael C. Trout, president; T. B. Rogers, recording secretary; James A. Leech, corresponding secretary; Lewis Weaver, treasurer, and J. P. Kerr, auditor, the treasurer was "authorized to borrow funds to pay off the indebtedness of the society, not exceeding $100," and Lewis Egbert, Richard J. Reznor and Robert Patterson were appointed as a committee to ascertain on what terms the fair grounds could be purchased. The society became defunct about the second year of the war (1862), its prolongation to that period being due mainly to the efforts of Seth Hoagland, M. C. Trout, Joel B. Curtis, Robert Patterson, James Denniston, James A. Nelson and others, who were among its enterprising members.

An interval of nine years now elapsed, during which time Mercer was without her annual exhibitions. This was terminated by a meeting held in the court-house on the first Tuesday in February, 1871, out of which grew the Mercer County Central Agricultural Society. This was incorporated December 21 of the same year, with the following named charter members: Robert McKee, J. M. McLain, A. J. McKean, Seth Hoagland, James A. Nelson, J. P. Kerr, Samuel North, W. A. McCormick, M. C. Trout, A. F. Brown and J. D. Kirkpatrick. The first officers elected by the society consisted of Seth Hoagland, president; A. F. Brown, vice-president; S. H. Miller, secretary; A. J. McKean, treasurer, and J. D. Kirkpatrick, M. C. Trout, S. M. Loveland, Robert McKee, James A. Nelson, J. M. McLain and J. P. Pierce, directors. The first annual fair of this new organization was held in September, 1871, on fourteen acres of the present grounds, which had been purchased at a cost of $2,800, and fitted with buildings, fence and track at an additional expense of $5,600. In 1873 a reorganization was effected, the society changing its name to the "Western Pennsylvania Agricultural Society." In the same year twenty-seven additional acres were purchased, at a cost of $5,400, and added to the grounds, the latter being improved at an expenditure of $9,000. This organization continued under this name until September, 1882, when it collapsed, and three months later the property was sold by the sheriff, at the instigation of the First National Bank of Mercer, for $5,000. The officers from 1873 to 1882, inclusive, were: 1873, J. P. Kerr, president; James Denniston, vice-president; A. J. McKean, treasurer, and W. J. McKean, secretary. 1874, the same except vice-president, Andrew Robinson. 1875, the same except A. J. Zahniser, vice-president. 1876, the same except S. S. Donaldson, president, and R. S. Allen, vice-president. 1877, the same. 1878, the same except Andrew Robinson, vice-president, and R. T. Findley, treasurer. 1879, the same except M. W. Alexander, president, and S. F. Thompson, vice-president. 1880, the same except Jesse Hoagland, president; Hon. S. H. Miller, vice-president, and R. S. Madge, treasurer. 1881, the same except Robert McKee, vice-president, and John H. McKean, treasurer. 1882, the same except Robert Dodds, Jr., president.

The present society, known by the name of Mercer Central Agricultural Society, was organized January 30, 1883, being a continuation of the old one. It was chartered December 15, 1883, with a capital stock of $5,000, divided into 100 shares of the par value of $50 each. Its first officers were: Robert McKee, president; R. S. Madge, vice-president; John H. McKean, treasurer; W. J. McKean, secretary, and B. A. Williams, Robert Dodds, Jr., J. K. Minnick, James S. Alexander, S. F. Thompson, David Wilson and T. P. Munnell, directors. These were re-elected in 1884. In 1885 A. P. Jones was president; T. P. Munnell, vice-president; S. F. Thompson, treasurer, and W. J. McKean, secretary. In 1886 the same, except R. S. Madge, vice-president. In 1887-88 the same, except R. S. Madge, president, and William Logan, vice-president. Annual exhibitions are held, and the displays made are generally very creditable to the society and the county.

Shenango Valley Agricultural and Manufacturing Society.—The second organization, in point of time, was the Shenango Valley Agricultural and Manufacturing Society, of Greenville, which was organized in August, 1857, under the management of Marvin Loomis, president; William Waugh, secretary, and Samuel P. Johnston, treasurer. The project of its organization was due mainly to B. F. Baskin, who had for many years advocated the necessity and advantages of such a society. Fourteen acres of land were leased from T. A. Mann and Daniel Saul, fitted out with a third of a mile track, stand, fence and other necessary conveniences, and opened in September of the same year for exhibits. Annual fairs were given thereafter. The society was incorporated August 16, 1869, with a purpose, as expressed in the charter, of effecting the "promotion of the science of agriculture and horticulture; the improvement of the breed of horses, cattle and other stock; the advancement of mechanical and industrial pursuits, and the furtherance of kindred aims." The officers at time of incorporation were: Thomas Leech, Jr., president; Josiah Stewart, vice-president; D. A. Thalimer, secretary; S. M. Loveland, treasurer, and D. B. Packard, T. A. Mann, Jeremiah Brockway, R. J. Bean, William Beatty, J. Long, John Artman, G. W. Phillips, J. K. Hamblin, Samuel Young, James W. Christy, D. Clark, J. R. Donaldson, John A. Carnes, E. M. Campbell, F. M. Gillis, W. H. Emery, S. H. Findley, James Throop and G. W. Moyer, executive committee. An important epoch in the history of this organization was the delivering of a lecture before one of its fairs by Horace Greely, the celebrated editor. The correspondence arranging terms for the address was conducted by the secretary, W. H. Sheakley. In response to a letter from him the following reply was received:

NEW YORK, June 14, 1871.

Dear Sir:—I have yours of the 9th inst. It talks business, and I can meet it squarely. I hold myself engaged to speak for you on Thursday, September 28th, at your Greenville fair. I shall try to be seasonably on hand. Yours,

HORACE GREELY.

To W. H. Sheakley, Esq., Sec. S. V. A. & M. Soc'y.

The manuscript of the above is yet in the possession of Mr. Sheakley. The writing is in the same characteristic scrawl that has become so famous as to furnish food for proverbs. The address, which was duly delivered, was one of those happy efforts which only Greely could make. It was entirely ex tempore, the only references used by the speaker being a few brief notes written on little oblong slips of writing paper, which he held in his hand. It was never published, yet its ideas are not wholly forgotten by those who heard it. The end of this society was foreseen by many, who saw that the rapidity with which kindred organizations were multiplying would eventually result in the death of the weaker ones. After a long and beneficial existence, during which great progress had been made both in the field and in the workshop, on the farm and at the forge, the organization became dormant, and at last wholly defunct.

Wool Growers' Association.—The subject of wool growing early attracted the attention of the farmers of the county. In 1868 Mercer County was the third wool growing county in the State, and its fleeces readily commanded 40 cents per pound. The importance of the industry led to the formation of a county wool growers' association, an account of a meeting of which organization, held in the court-house at Mercer, May 15, 1868, has been found. Among the subjects discussed were foot rot, grub in the head, proper food for animals, and other topics bearing directly upon the interest in question. Of this meeting the members named were: Thomas Alexander, Seth Hoagland, W. H. Alexander, James Denniston, Jonathan Calvin, Robert McKee, A. J. Zahniser, J. P. Kerr, John Albin, James Sellers, A. Robinson and S. H. Miller. The discussion of these subjects was continued at intervals in the Western Press, an agricultural column of which was then conducted by Mr. Seth Hoagland, and an extensive interest was aroused among the farmers.

Mercer County Agricultural Society.—The year 1868 seems to have been one of unusual activity among agriculturists. It beheld the successful convention of a wool growers' association, and of numerous newspaper discussions, and it also ushered into existence the Mercer County Agricultural and Manufacturing Society, of Stoneboro. This organization began at once an active career. It purchased lands from the Mercer Iron and Coal Company and Jeremiah Bonner, and, after quickly fitting them up, held its first annual exhibition the year of its birth. In the following year, August 16, the society was incorporated, with J. P. Kerr, president; Robert J. McClure, vice-president; Samuel Hines, secretary; H. B. Blood, treasurer, and A. B. McCartney, A. P. Jones, Justice Egbert, Elliott Davis, J. P. McKinley, Jonathon Riggs and W. E. McDonald, directors. The officers following were: 1869, J. M. Carnahan, president; secretary and treasurer the same. 1870, R. J. McClure, president; secretary and treasurer the same. 1871, James W. Barker, president; secretary and treasurer the same. In 1872, A. F. Brown, president; J. P. Hines, secretary; treasurer the same. In 1873, J. M. Carnahan, president; secretary the same; R. P. Cann, treasurer. In 1874, the same. In 1875, president and treasurer the same; secretary, S. A. Wilson.

In the year 1876 a reorganization was effected, the name being changed to Mercer County Agricultural Society, and a new charter, dated May 25, 1876, being issued. The capital stock was fixed at $12,000. The new officers were J. M. Carnahan, president; J. P. Hines, secretary; R. P. Cann, treasurer; and J. C. Cornwell, Daniel Perrine, J. Riggs, C. H. Hummason, P. J. Boyd, J. M. Galloway and A. F. Brown, directors. The old grounds were abandoned, and the present spacious quarters, located east of the borough, and consisting of thirty-one acres of well-shaded and neatly adorned land, were secured. Annual exhibitions have since been held in the new grounds, each of which has been entertaining and instructive. The officers since the reorganization have been: 1877, A. P. Jones, president; J. P. Hines, secretary, and R. P. Cann, treasurer. In 1878, George W. Porter, president; L. Bonesteel, secretary, and treasurer the same. In 1879, president and treasurer the same; F. A. Bliss, secretary. In 1880, A. P. Jones, president; V. Porter, secretary; treasurer the same. In 1881, president and treasurer the same; J. P. Hines, secretary. In 1882, J. M. Carnahan, president; secretary and treasurer the same. In 1883, A. S. Throop, president; secretary and treasurer the same. In 1884-85-86, George W. Porter, president; secretary and treasurer the same. In 1887, J. C. Cornwell, president; secretary and treasurer the same.

Jamestown Agricultural and Manufacturing Association.—The organization known by the above name was incorporated May 15, 1871, with a capital stock of $5,000, and with the following officers: V. A. Stewart, president; J. M. McArthur, vice-president; L. A. McCrumb, secretary; J. H. Christy, treasurer; J. C. Anderson, R. P. Johnston, David Gamble, Charles Fowler and Robert McMaster, executive committee; and Harrison Hunter, David Anderson, J. C. Breckenridge, James Jamison and George McKinley, directors. A tract of fine land, comprising twenty-five acres, and located one mile west of Jamestown, was purchased by the association, and fitted up with track, buildings and other necessary equipments. The first exhibition was held in 1871, and annual ones took place for seven years thereafter, at the expiration of which time, owing to a lack of interest manifested in its continuance, the enterprise was abandoned.

Keystone and Buckeye Fair Association.—The latest and not the least pretentious society formed in Mercer County for the furtherance of the cause of agriculture was the Keystone and Buckeye Fair Association, a Sharon product, which was chartered May 17, 1880, with a capital stock of $4,000, to which there were ninety-one subscribers. The purpose of the organization, as announced in the articles of incorporation, was "to provide and maintain in the county of Mercer suitable grounds and personal property for the holding of exhibitions of agricultural and horticultural products, domestic manufactures and domestic animals; to award premiums for the products and animals exhibited; and by all other lawful means to encourage agriculture and horticulture." The first directors chosen under the charter were Joseph Forker, John C. Owsley, M. H. Henderson, P. L. Kimberly, William W. Wallis, Hiram Tate, William K. Nye, Allen Seburn, Godfrey G. Carnes, George C. Veach, Thomas H. Byers, T. B. Satterfield and David Hall. A brief existence sums up its history. Grounds containing a half-mile track, located about two miles from the center of the borough of Sharon, were secured, and a few exhibitions given; but a lack of interest on the part of its patrons rendered the holding of these unprofitable, and the association at length collapsed. The Sharon Driving Park Association has recently been organized, and leased the grounds for a racing park. It held its first meeting October 3 and 4, 1888.

Agricultural Paper.—There has been but one agricultural paper published within the limits of the county, the Mercer County Farmer, issued at Mercer, a sixteen-page monthly, started in June, 1842, by J. W. S. Chappell, manager and editor, who pledged himself to "guard the interests of agriculture and of the farming community generally" for the very modest sum of fifty cents per year for each subscriber. The history of this publication is not intimately known, but it lasted about three years and a half. Notwithstanding its decease, the farmers of the county have been provided with an abundance of good agricultural mental pabulum, both by the local press, which pays considerable attention to their needs, and by the publications devoted exclusively to farming interests, both of which receive a liberal patronage from the intelligent tillers of Mercer County soil.

The Grange.—One of the most important and wide-spread agricultural movements ever witnessed was that known by the name “Grange” or “Patrons of Husbandry.” In common with its sister counties, Mercer took an active part in this enterprise, which soon numbered within its ranks some of her very best farmers. A list of the granges in active operation within the county during 1876, at which time the order passed through its culmination, embraces:

For a number of years annual harvest homes were held, at which a jovial time was had, reminiscences and anecdotes being discussed contemporaneously with the latest improvements and inventions and the freshest innovations in the line of agricultural advancement. These were in nearly every case sources of profit, amusement and good feeling, and added in no small degree to the progress which the farmers' calling has made in the past few decades. Though the grange movement has fallen into a state of "innocuous desuetude," the harvest home meetings still flourish, and have become a source of great benefit, both socially and materially, to the farmers of Mercer County.

CHAPTER VIII.

EDUCATIONAL—NECESSITY OF RUDIMENTARY EDUCATION—PIONEER SCHOOLS AND BUILDINGS—SCHOOL FURNITURE—TEXT BOOKS—BRANCHES TAUGHT—METHODS OF INSTRUCTION—EARLY TEACHERS IN MERCER COUNTY—JAMES HANAVAN'S RECOLLECTIONS—COMMON SCHOOL SYSTEM OF 1834—CONDITION OF THE SCHOOLS IN 1846—OFFICE OF COUNTY SUPERINTENDENT ESTABLISHED, AND JAMES C. BROWN ELECTED AS ITS FIRST INCUMBENT IN MERCER COUNTY—TEACHERS' INSTITUTES—LIST OF COUNTY SUPERINTENDENTS.

THE necessity of a rudimentary education was recognized in the pioneer settlements. The ability to read, write and cipher as far as the single rule of three was regarded as essential to the success and happiness of the backwoodsman's family, who, in even that early day, were not qualified for the duties of life unless they were conversant with the general teachings of the Bible and the Church manuals. In other words, the view of education entertained leaned largely to the practical side of life. A complete view of the agencies employed to secure this elementary training would be a panorama whose checkered and changing scenes would enlist the deepest sympathy and most earnest attention at the present day. Unfortunately, however, the pioneer settlers were so intently concerned with the mere physical and material problems of the home that they gave little attention to any thought of preserving, for the future, a record of their actions and accomplishments in the educational world. From mere fragments preserved by accident, and from a personal knowledge of what has been witnessed in new communities elsewhere, we are enabled to present some sketch of the early schools and scholastic agencies.

One advantage was possessed by the young of that period which greatly outweighed many so-called educational facilities of modern days: the minds of the children were brought directly in contact with nature, its wild forests, its rocks, its waterfalls, its springs bubbling forth from the hillside, its wild game, its great variety of birds, its multiform specimens of herbs, shrubs and trees with their rich fruitage. Then, too, the minds of children were not distracted by the great diversity of studies and texts, nor were they drawn away from their legitimate objects of study by the sudden appearance of a circus or minstrel troupe. What may have been regarded hardships and deprivations were, really, sources of genuine educational strength and value. It is certain, too, that the instruction in those days, as well as the general educational equipment, was not calculated to sugar-coat and make easy the processes of learning. Patent processes, easy methods, labor saving devices, these belong to a later period of educational activity and reform.

It must be borne in mind that the pioneer days were antecedent to the existence of a public school system. Private schools, or rather neighborhood schools, supported by the voluntary efforts of the people of that particular region, supplied the wants of the people. The schools were held as long as the master would consent to give instruction for the sum subscribed by his patrons. In order to get a correct view of those days we must not forget to look at the old-time school-houses.

The School-house built by the people of the neighborhood was, as a rule, a rude, round log structure, about twenty feet square, and but one story high. The better class of them had puncheon floors, and all had clap-board roofs, held down by heavy weight-poles. Illumination was secured by means of greased paper that covered an opening made by cutting out one or more logs. When, at a later day, a larger opening was occupied by a hand-made sash, containing four panes of glass, 8x10, a remarkable stride in school architecture had been accomplished. The seats used were rough benches made from split logs, whose flat surfaces were placed upward, and the convex ones downward, resting upon pins driven into them for supports or legs. Desks were wide slab boards, resting upon pins driven horizontally into the walls of the building, compelling the advanced pupils to face the wall. The chimney was, perhaps, the most interesting part of the structure. It was constructed of sticks and mortar, or in some cases of stone, and frequently occupied one end of the building. It was always large, and afforded an abundance of room for the huge back logs that were rolled into the same to hiss and sputter, as the sap oozed from either end. Then, too, this wide-throated chimney, which received the liberal contributions of wood that willing hands had provided according to the number of children furnished by each family, was a superior means of ventilation, though little attention was then given to that important condition of health. This chimney was likewise the line of attack in case the master refused, during the holidays, to furnish a treat to his pupils. If the teacher was fortunate enough to reach the school-house earlier than any of his pupils, he could hold the fort, unless the ingenuity and daring of some of the largest boys prompted them to smoke him out by placing some covering upon the top of the chimney.

The black-board of the primitive school-house—well, that did not exist. The slate, or more likely the home-made copy book, received all the work of either teacher or pupil. As for globes and charts, they were unheard of.

Text-books were scarce and imperfect. The principal purpose of the primitive teacher was to give instruction in reading, as an aid in religious training in the Bible, the catechism and the hymn-book, and as an auxiliary to any other branches to be taught in school. At first the instruction was very imperfect. Learning the alphabet from A to Z, or "zed," or "izzard," by going down the column of letters, reversing the operation, and then skipping about, was supposed to be the first step in educational work. In many cases these letters were pasted on small shingles or paddles, and the object used in giving a knowledge of the arbitrary characters. Meaningless combinations of these letters, ba, be, bi, bo, bu, and ab, eb, ib, ob, ub, etc., etc., were perpetrated upon innocent pupils as a part of their work in saying lessons. Strange to say, there are so-called teachers, even in this ninth decade of this nineteenth century, who still pursue the same plan of work.

The old time spelling-books were those of Thomas Dilworth, an English school-master, living early in the last century; Webster's the latter part of the last century and early part of the present, and still extensively used in the South; "United States Spelling-book," published at Pittsburgh in 1809, and the "Western Spelling-book," by Rev. Joseph Stockton, principal of an academy at Pittsburgh, 1810-20. Their places were taken at a later period by vigorous competitors.

Writing was the next important occupation. No patent copy-books supplied the school-room. The work for beginners consisted of certain straight marks, pot-hooks and loops, the copies being written by the teacher with a quill pen upon paper. Advanced pupils had their copies set by the master, who paid no attention to the analysis of letters into right and left curves, ovals, etc., but expected an imitation of the work set by him. One of his leading occupations in the school-room was that of making and repairing pens formed of goose quills. Superior writing was done in those days.

Reading at first was not taught in classes, but the pupil read from whatever he had in his possession, Testament, Bible, catechism or spelling-book. Later the Columbian Orator, American Preceptor, English Reader, Porter's Rhetorical Reader and works of that character were used, until they were supplanted by various graded text-books introduced with the building up of the common school system. The lessons contained in those early readers were life-long possessions of great value.

Arithmetic consisted, at first, mainly in doing sums. Classes were not called, but individual work upon problems assigned by the master employed the time of the pupils. When one needed help he repaired to the master's seat to receive it; or in some cases hoisted a flag of distress at his own seat. One of the early books used was Dilworth's "Schoolmaster's Assistant," first published in England, and then republished in this country before the Revolution. Afterward the texts of John Gough and Zachariah Jess, Daboll's "Schoolmaster's Assistant," Stockton's "Western Calculator," and Walsh's Arithmetic supplied the needs of the young.

Geography was not an original branch of school study. Pinkerton's Geography, Workman's "Elements of Geography," Nichol's "Compend of Geography," and Grew's "Description of the Use of Globes," were pioneers in this line, and though not properly appreciated at first, performed excellent service as educators for the present advanced work.

English Grammar was not considered a common school subject at first. It was regarded as belonging to a higher education. The texts of Webster, Lindley Murray, Harrison, Comley and Kirkham, were the pioneers of this somewhat dry and lifeless subject. Murray and Kirkham long continued to be the standards, and in many respects have never been excelled by modern text-books. Roswell C. Smith's work was a later seeker for public favor.

Methods of Instruction were not then the subject of any concern. To know the "reason why" was almost a matter of impudence. "Children were taught," says Wickersham, "as if the only faculty they possessed needing culture was memory; as if the only intellectual appetite God had given them was for facts and forms. Spelling and writing were the branches of learning best taught, and both of these are almost wholly mechanical."

The writer of this chapter has at hand now a juvenile reader published in 1823, for the use of schools in the United States, which fully corroborates the statement as to the absence of anything like method in the presentation of subject matter in those early days. In the preface the author suggests: "Proper attention does not appear to have been paid to the formation of elementary books, intended to introduce children into a course of reading. The matter which they contain is generally such as is ill adapted to infant capacities, and the arrangement is often injudicious. Selections have been made, the language of which is either too lofty, or too refined, to be intelligible to children at an age when their stock of ideas must, of necessity, be yet small. * * * In the work now presented to the public, an attempt has been made to remedy these defects. The matter, it is believed, will be found, on inspection, to be such as infant minds can easily comprehend; and it is so arranged as to make a gradual transition from the easy to the more difficult."

Let us see. The book contains 160 pages, measuring about three inches by five. The first lesson begins thus: "Come here, Charles; come, tell me your letters; do you know how many there are?" "Yes, sir, twenty-six."

"Where is the pointer? Here is the pointer. Now read your lesson."

"Charles, can you spell the letters?" "Yes, sir." "Let me hear you, Charles." The child begins thus: "Ai, bee, see, dee, ee, ef, jee, aitch, etc." "Charles, do you know how many vowels there are?" "Yes, sir; a, e, i, o, u, and sometimes w and y. W and y are consonants when they begin a word or syllable; but in every other situation they are vowels; and b, c, d, f, g, h, j, k, l, m, n, p, q, r, s, t, v, x, z, are consonants."

Now it must be apparent to any one that no child could answer such questions in the first lesson of the first day of school; and it must be apparent, too, that no sensible teacher now would think of asking them. But this was called matter "such as infant minds can easily comprehend." An examination of the contents of this juvenile reader shows that selections were made from Blair, Stearne, Knox, Addison, Emmet, Tappan, Cunningham, Cowper, Watts, Johnson, More, Thompson and other master writers of the world. The last extract in this juvenile reader is a quotation from Thompson's Seasons, commencing:

First joyless rains obscure
Drive thro' the mingling skies with vapors foul.
Dash on the mountain's brow, and shake the woods,
That grumbling wave below. Th' unsightly plain
Lies a brown deluge, as the low bent clouds
Pour flood on flood, yet unexhausted still Combine and deep'ning into night shut up
The day's fair face.

It is safe to say some progress has been made in the methods of teaching primary pupils, since the publication of the above mentioned text book; and that equal progress has been made, too, in the preparation of the books themselves.

No more valuable contribution to our pioneer history could be made, if it were possible, than to record the names and deeds of those heroic men and women who began to mould the rising generation in the new settlement. Without ornate appliances, or the stimulus of abundant earthly remuneration, they labored zealously for the bettering of the condition of the on-coming citizens. They have long since departed from earthly toils and conflicts, and their labors do follow them. Their work is written not upon tablets of stone, but upon the characters of children, even to the third and fourth generations.

As early as 1817 Samuel Webster taught school in Delaware Township. His service continued for a period of two years and nine months in the first log school-house erected in the township. He was a Yankee, being a native of the East. He never flogged his pupils. Robert Fruit taught about the same time, or, possibly, a little later, in a building on land subsequently owned by R. Reznor.

One of the early teachers of Cool Spring was Joseph Alexander. He was born in Washington County, about the year 1798. At a later period, in educational work, came Alexander Riddle, Miss Betsey Jennings, Willis Alexander and a man named Clark.

Thomas Coulson came to what is now Fairview, in Fairview Township, in 1798. In 1817 he erected, on his own land, a school-house for the accommodation of his own children. He was himself the first teacher.

The first teacher in Hempfield Township is said to have been Alexander Dumars, an Irishman, and grandfather of A. D. Gillespie, of Greenville. In 1807 he taught in a log house, located on land cleared by Thomas Dumars.

Philo Dodd wielded the birch in Jackson Township as early as 1805.

James Lowry taught in Lake Township before 1812, in a school-house built of hewed logs, 25x30. It was on land then owned by William Service, but subsequently by Richard Lyons.

Alexander Riddle and Messrs. Starrett and Williams taught in Liberty Township about the close of the War of 1812-15.

In Sandy Creek James Brush and Mrs. David Patterson were both teachers at an early date—the former in 1801 and the latter in 1808. David Nelson taught about 1826, in a log building about fourteen feet square, erected on the farm subsequently owned by W. Applegate. He received $12 per month in produce. N. B. Laird afterward taught in the same school.

Margaret Streight and George Carringer were teachers in Perry Township as early as 1826.

Allen Dunn taught in the first school-house built in Sandy Lake Township. It stood on the land of Patrick McCloskey. The house was built about the year 1800, but Dunn's teaching occurred about ten years later. In the same house also taught Samuel Lowry. About 1823 or 1824 William Little taught in a house built on Enos Sanford's farm. He was succeeded by Dorcas Alderman, a native Buckeye girl, young and handsome.

Alexander Duncan taught in Shenango Township at an early date. The school-house was situated near the State line, on the Sharon & New Bedford road. His efforts were made about the opening of the War of 1812. He was followed by John Nesbitt.

John Hannah and a Mr. McLean were pedagogues in Springfield as early as 1830.

William Kennedy taught in Sugar Grove Township, in a house built of round pine logs, near Riley's Corners, in 1815. He was physically very feeble, and died before his second term closed.

John Speir opened a school in West Salem Township, about three-quarters of a mile west of Greenville, in 1802-03.

Edward Johnston taught a school in a cabin on his farm in West Salem prior to the War of 1812. He conducted it several terms.

Henry Garth taught, in Wilmington Township, 1805-06, in an unfinished dwelling belonging to Samuel Weir.

Of the teachers in Wolf Creek as early as 1826, Betsey Gates taught in a house on land afterward owned by William Jamison; Catherine Mayne, Harriet Wooden and sister taught on the Ethan Coleman farm.

In 1807 Solomon Sutton, of Worth Township, taught in a log school-house on the Daniel Wolverton farm. The first school in the county is said to have been taught in the Amity Presbyterian Church, which stood on the line between Mercer and Venango Counties. Samuel Westlake was also one of Worth's early teachers. The school-house stood on the Westlake farm.

J. G. White taught the first school opened in Millbrook village, about 1858. Miss Sarah White was the first teacher in Bethel borough. The house was a small frame, on the north side of the street, erected in 1871.

James Rogers, licentiate of the Seceder Church, taught the first grammar school in Greenville, in 1824. Two years later came Samuel Webster, from New Hampshire, who taught in Greenville several years. Among other early Greenville teachers were Rev. John Gamble, W. M. Stephenson, John A. Bingham (afterward United States Minister to Japan) and Samuel Griffith, attorney at Mercer.

Thomas Rigdon taught in a school erected about the year 1800, three-fourths of a mile west of the present site of Sharon. David Hays taught in a log school-house built on the Henry Hoagland farm, in Hickory Township, in the year 1800. George McCleery, father of Joseph McCleery, now a resident of Sharon, was an early teacher, and had classes in that dry subject, English grammar, in 1823. Among some of the other early teachers of Hickory Township were James Schofield, who came from the vicinity of Warren, Ohio. He was a good instructor. Joseph Budd, son of William Budd, Esq., was an early teacher, and "good for those days." "Old Master Wilson" taught one of the earliest schools on the site of Wheatland. His structure was situated on the farm of William Haywood, and was built in 1816.

John Dunlap was one of the teachers that had charge of the school built on the Byerly place, near Sharpsville, in 1821.

Allen Dunn was the first teacher in Sandy Lake. His school-house was an old log building which stood on the hill, and was built in 1828.

One of the pioneer teachers of a later period of Mercer County history is still living in Sharon. Reference is made to James Hanavan, Esq., a native of Ireland, where he also received his education. He taught his first school in Delaware (now Jefferson) Township, at the Catholic Church, three miles north of Mercer, in 1843. It was a select school. The following winter he taught a public school in the same district in the house known as the "Round Top School." The text-books then used were: United States Spelling Book, English Reader, New Testament, Western Calculator, and Kirkham's English Grammar. Some of the people objected strongly to the teaching of so meaningless a study as English grammar, with its declensions and conjugations and parsings and analysis. They compared its parsing processes to the chattering of a flock of blackbirds on a tree. Mr. Hanavan taught summer and winter from 1843 to 1854, and during winters from 1854 to 1864, when he retired from the field of pedagogical activity. His efforts were distributed over Delaware, Cool Spring and Fairview Townships. Some of his pupils in those country schools have become conspicuous in public life, embracing such persons as Hon. S. H. Miller, of Mercer; W. W. Service, insurance agent, and Miss A. R. Service, milliner, of Sharon; A. H. McElrath, attorney, and Newton Donaldson, of Mercer, and many others that cannot be mentioned.

The compensation of those days ranged from $10 to $15 per month, with permission to "board round." The regular public schools continued about three months, and were supplemented by six months' subscription term. The law permitted patrons to pay the teacher in produce, including corn, buckwheat flour, oats and potatoes. Mr. Hanavan was desirous of securing a suit of new clothes. Branton H. Henderson, now of Sharon, was a partner with Lewis Weaver, of Mercer, in the dry goods business. With this firm Mr. Hanavan arranged to take produce for the material, and with James Forker, still a tailor in Mercer, to take the same kind of pay for the making of the suit. Still another difficulty presented itself. The produce had to be collected. This was done at the store of Mr. Miller, of Cool Spring, whence it was conveyed to Mercer to liquidate the claims against the teacher. The suit was made of English broadcloth, costing $4 per yard, and the tailor's bill was $5.

The public school system of 1834, fostered by such men as Thaddeus Stevens and Abner Lacock, was a great step in the direction of popular education. At first it met with opposition, because it was regarded as an innovation; but opposition gradually subsided until a general acquiescence, passive in some cases, was yielded to it. Progress was made, even, though slowly, but, unfortunately, our records are not as complete as they could be desired to indicate what was done.

In 1846 the following imperfect report of the condition of schools in the county was made:

Whole number of schools.....	214
Average number of months taught.....	5 months, 5 days.
Number of male teachers.....	170
Number of female teachers.....	145
Average monthly salary—male.....	$13.00
Average monthly salary—female.....	6.09

Public meetings were held from time to time in various parts of the county to stimulate greater zeal in, and love for, the education of the people. One of these meetings was held at the court-house in Mercer October 23, 1850, Dr. John Baskin, chairman. Prof. Robert Milligan, of Washington College, delivered an address on the necessity of educating the masses and building up and sustaining the public school system.

The most important measure in promoting the permanent and healthful growth of public school interest in the county was the establishment of the office of county superintendent of public schools. This important step was taken in 1854. It led to the supervision of work which had previously been illy done or not done at all. The first election for the position of county superintendent occurred on the first Monday of June, 1854, the period at which the law creating the office took effect. The school directors from all parts of the county, to whom belonged the duty of making choice of a competent man, assembled at Mercer. A number of candidates were in the field ready to be first in the discharge of the onerous duties imposed. Among them were William G. Rose, of Pine Township, subsequently mayor of the city of Cleveland; F. P. Carrington, of Sheakleyville; William Dickson, of Clarks-ville; James C. Brown, of Greenville, and others. Rose and Dickson withdrew before balloting began, being dissatisfied with the salary then offered, $400 per year. Mr. Brown was chosen, and served nearly two years, when he resigned, and was succeeded by G. L. Eberhart, now an attorney and resident of Beaver County. Mr. Brown entered heartily upon his work, and succeeded in getting the system before the people.

A teachers' institute was held at Mercer the ensuing November. Home talent mainly was employed to engage in the work of instruction. Judge Arcus McDermitt, the principal of Mercer Academy, and M. D. Leggett, of Cleveland, Ohio, assisted in the work. The institute of that early day was imperfect, but accomplished good results. Teachers were yet in the azoic age of professional work. The "what" or subject-matter of teaching was the main object sought. The instruction at teachers' associations was all intended to answer that purpose. Knotty questions, difficult or curious problems, the parsing of complex sentences—matters of this character demanded the time and consideration of the institute. Nor is there any attempt to find fault with this order of procedure. It was the proper thing to do, in fact the only thing. In the natural order of events the "how" or subject of methods became the theme of heated and exaggerated lectures. Patent processes of doing things, or of solving the intricate problems of school management and school instruction, were heralded with a great flourish of trumpets. One would suppose that teaching was to be regulated like the eight-day clock, if the instructor could only be wound up by the new processes he would run automatically and infallibly until the original impulse was expended. But this condition finally gave way to the "why" of teaching or the philosophy of work. The study of the human constitution, as well as the objects to be taught, began to attract the attention of more reflective minds. This is the highest grade of work. It had to be attained by slow and regular processes.

Much of this progress was secured through the instrumentality of the teachers' institute. Much imperfect work, it must be confessed, was done, but then we must remember that mistakes constitute an important factor in both individual and national development. But the institute did more than this. Its work resulted in securing educational enthusiasm, a professional spirit among the instructors of the land. It unified their efforts, and made them more potent for battling successfully against the fruitful enemy of the race—ignorance. In all these matters, of course, it was ably assisted by the system of county supervision under which it acted.

List of County Superintendents.—As already intimated the first county superintendent was J. C. Brown, of Greenville. For many years he has been a journalist, and is at present engaged in the publication of the Advance-Argus, of Greenville.

Gilbert L. Eberhart filled out the unexpired term of Mr. Brown. He was a candidate for re-election, but was unsuccessful. He is at present a resident of New Brighton, Beaver County, where he is engaged in legal and editorial business.

Calvin W. Gilfillan was the third incumbent. After serving his term of office, he went to Franklin, Venango County, where he still resides. He was a member of Congress at one time.

J. A. McCandless, of West Middlesex, the next in order, was a quiet, modest man. He was both a teacher and attorney. In the latter capacity he formed a partnership with Henry H. Foster, whose sketch will be found in the Bench and Bar chapter. McCandless died about eighteen years ago.

Jacob Miller, the fifth superintendent, was a resident of Greenville, where he had been an instructor in the academy. He was also editor of the Argus for a time, as will be seen by reference to the Press chapter. After his term of office expired, he engaged in the book and stationery business, but finally sold out to Beatty & Findley. He finally removed to Philadelphia, where he became the agent of the publishing house of Harper & Bro., of New York. He too is dead.

N. W. Porter was appointed to fill out the last year of Mr. Miller's second term. He was a native of Pymatuning Township.

He was succeeded by Ira E. Harsh, of Fairview. Harsh was a pleasant man, but was not permitted to complete his term, having occupied his office less than a year when that fell destroyer—consumption—carried him to an early grave.

N. W. Porter was the successor of Harsh, and filled out his term. At the expiration of the period, he was elected, in May, 1872, to the position, and held it until its close. He is now engaged in farming in Colorado.

J. M. Dight, of Sandy Lake, was chosen superintendent on the 4th of May, 1875, to succeed Porter. His competitors for the position were Messrs. N. W. Porter, A. J. Palm, Mr. Mays and Hugh R. Stewart. He held the position one term only. He is now a United Presbyterian minister, and resides in Evans City, Butler Co., Penn., where he has two charges. His brother is at present one of the commissioners of Mercer County.

The next occupant of the superintendent's chair was A. J. Palm, then of West Middlesex, now editor and manager of the Western Press. He held the position through two terms, from 1878 to 1884.

The next superintendent was S. H. McCleery, the present incumbent. He was a resident of Sheakleyville at the time of his first election, being principal of the schools. He was chosen May 6, 1884, over Homer G. Rose, of Grove City; Miss G. Forest, Mercer; F. W. Belton, Greenville, and W. T. Couzens, Leech's Corners. He was re-elected May 3, 1887, his competitors being George H. Lamb, of New Lebanon; George H. Bell, Wheatland; Edwin Twitmyer, Sharpsville, now principal of schools at Braddock; J. B. Scott, Transfer; Thomas S. Vickerman, Findley Township, and U. S. Bortz, of Perry Township.

The following is a summary of the superintendents: J. C. Brown, 1854-56; G. L. Eberhart, 1856-57; Calvin W. Gilfillan, 1857-60; J. A. McCandless, 1860-63; Jacob Miller, 1863-68; N. W. Porter, 1868-69; Ira E. Harsh, 1869-70; N. W. Porter, 1870-75; J. M. Dight, 1875-78; A. J. Palm, 1878-84; S. H. McCleery, 1884 up to the present.

CHAPTER IX.

POLITICAL—CIVIL GOVERNMENT A DIVINE APPOINTMENT—DUTIES IMPOSED BY AMERICAN CITIZENSHIP—NATIONAL ADMINISTRATIONS AND FORMATION OF POLITICAL PARTIES—WASHINGTON THE UNANIMOUS CHOICE OF THE PEOPLE—ELECTORAL VOTE CAST FOR EACH PRESIDENT SINCE THE FOUNDATION OF THE GOVERNMENT—THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY AND ITS OPPONENTS—ANTI-MASONIC PERIOD—NULLIFICATION EXCITEMENT—TARIFF DISCUSSION WHICH IT PRODUCED—PROMINENT NATIONAL CAMPAIGNS—KNOW-NOTHINGISM—BIRTH OF THE REPUBLICAN PARTY—ITS FIRST CAMPAIGN IN MERCER COUNTY—SUBSEQUENT LOCAL STANDING OF POLITICAL PARTIES.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT is an institution of divine appointment, intended to promote man's highest happiness as an integral factor of society. Its necessity is acknowledged by all whose notions are not chaotic in character. It is intended to promote the prosperity of the individual by holding him amenable to the rights of the community. True citizenship implies not only the right but the duty of obedience to constituted authority. "Render unto Cæsar the things that belong to Cæsar, and unto God the things that belong to Him," is but another way of stating the proposition that man is a creature amenable to two governments, one human, the other divine, and that their claims are equally imperative.

Every man owes to his government honest, intelligent and patriotic service. The demands of his country, of his State, of his community, upon him for support and advancement are reasonable. He cannot shirk the responsibility, if he would, of casting his ballot and his influence upon the side of right and justice as he understands them. His duty should be performed conscientiously. Citizenship in a government like ours, where every man is a knighted free-man, implies something. Votes that can be bought are not the possession of men who have proper conceptions of their duties to the commonwealth.

Our National Constitution was framed in 1787, and the first presidential term under it was begun in 1789. At that time there were two political parties, the Federalists and the Anti-Federalists. The Federalists were composed of those who admired the English order of things, and embraced capitalists, land-owners, merchants, theorists and earnest thinkers. They doubted, somewhat, the capacity of the masses for self-government, and favored a strong central power. Washington, Adams and Hamilton were principal leaders.

The Anti-Federalists were opposed to the Federalists in their construction of the theory of government. They strongly defended the rights of the States against a centralized government. They never accepted the designation of Anti-Federalists, and protested against its use. The name died with the close of Washington's first administration, and it was then known as the Democratic party. At the first election Washington had no opposition, the entire electoral vote being cast for him. The Senate said to him: "In you all parties confide." He was the idol alike of both parties. His first term continued from 1789 to 1793.

His second term, from 1793 to 1797, was characterized by the existence of two parties, the Federalists and Republicans or Democrats. Washington was unanimously chosen. The Republicans, called "Democratic Republicans," were under the leadership of Thomas Jefferson. He was a brilliant, conservative man, and willing to give the Constitution a fair test. "I own," said he, "that I am not a friend to a very energetic government; it is always oppressive." The "Democratic Republicans" were also called by the Federalists the "French party," because of their sympathy with the Republicans of the French Revolution. They in turn called their opponents "Tories" and "Monarchists," claiming they were unfriendly to a Republican form of government, and in sympathy with British ideas.

In the election of 1796 John Adams, Federalist, was chosen to the presidency over Thomas Jefferson, Anti-Federalist or Democrat. The vote in the electoral college stood 71 in favor of the former to 68 in favor of the latter. Adam's administration continued from 1797 to 1801, with Jefferson as vice-president. The successive administrations have been as follows:

1801-05—Democratic, Thomas Jefferson, 73 votes; Federalist, John Adams, 65 votes.

1805-09—Democratic, Thomas Jefferson, 162 votes; Federalist, Charles C. Pinckney, 14 votes.

1809-13—Democratic, James Madison, 122 votes; Democratic, George Clinton, 6 votes; Federalist, Charles C. Pinckney, 47 votes.

1813-17—Democratic, James Madison, 128 votes; Federalist, DeWitt Clinton, 89 votes.

1821-25—Democratic, James Monroe, 231 votes; Federalist, John Quincy Adams, 1 vote.

1825-29—Federalist (east), John Quincy Adams, 84 votes; Democratic (west), Andrew Jackson, 99 votes; Democratic (south), William H. Crawford, 41 votes; Federalist (west), Henry Clay, 37 votes.

The election went to the house, and resulted in favor of John Quincy Adams, though Jackson had received more electoral votes than Adams.

1829-33—Democratic, Andrew Jackson, 178 votes; Federalist or Republican, John Quincy Adams, 83 votes.

1833-37—Democratic, Andrew Jackson, 230 votes; Whig, Henry Clay, 49 votes; Anti-Masonic, William Wirt, 7 votes.

1837-41—Democratic, Martin Van Buren, 170 votes; Democratic, Hugh L. White, 26 votes; Democratic, William P. Mangum, 11 votes; Whig William H. Harrison, 73 votes; Whig, Daniel Webster, 14 votes.

1841-45—Whig, Wm. H. Harrison,* 234 votes; Democratic, Martin Van Buren, 60 votes; Abolition or Liberty, James G. Birney, none.

1845-49—Democratic, James K. Polk, 170 votes; Whig, Henry Clay, 105 votes. Liberty or Abolition, James G. Birney, none.

1849-53—Whig, Zachary Taylor,† 163 votes; Democratic, Lewis Cass, 127 votes; Free-soil, Martin Van Buren, none; Liberty or Abolition, Gerritt Smith, none.

1853-57—Democratic, Franklin Pierce, 254 votes; Whig, Winfield Scott, 42 votes; Free Soil, John P. Hale, none.

1857-61—Democratic, James Buchanan, 174 votes; Republican, John C. Fremont, 114 votes; American or Know-nothing, Millard Fillmore, 8 votes.

1861-65—Republican, Abraham Lincoln, 180 votes; Democratic, John C. Breckenridge, 72 votes; Democratic, Stephen A. Douglas, 12 votes; Union, John Bell, 39 votes.

1865-69—Republican, Abraham Lincoln,‡ 212 votes; Democratic, George B. McClellan, 21 votes.

1869-73—Republican, Ulysses S. Grant, 214 votes; Democratic, Horatio Seymour, 80 votes.

1873-77—Republican, Ulysses S. Grant, 286 votes; Liberal Republican and Democratic, Horace Greeley, 63 votes; Democratic, Charles O'Connor, none; Prohibition, James Black, none.

1877-81—Republican, R. B. Hayes, 185 votes; Democratic, Samuel J. Tilden, 184 votes; Greenback, Peter Cooper, none; Prohibition, Green Clay Smith, none.

1881-85—Republican, James A. Garfield,§ 214 votes; Democratic, Winfield S. Hancock, 155 votes; Greenback, James B. Weaver, none.

1885-89—Democratic, Grover Cleveland, 219 votes; Republican, James G. Blaine, 182 votes; Greenback, Benjamin F. Butler, none; Prohibition, John P. St. John, none.

The dates used in the foregoing list are those when the various administrations began and closed. All presidential elections occur in leap years, the November preceding the date of inauguration. This list will be valuable as a matter of reference, as it will assist in fixing events in the history of the county.

It will be seen that the name Democratic, as designating a political organization, began with the first election of Thomas Jefferson, in 1800, and has been perpetuated without change through eighty-eight years of defeat and victory. The name has been talismanic, addressing itself to the judgment of the masses of people, especially to those from the oppressed districts of foreign countries. The opposition party assumed various forms and names—first the Federalist, next the Whig and Anti-Masonic, then the Free-soil, next the Know-nothing, and finally the Republican—its principal opponent to-day.

In 1830, and later, the anti-Masonic feeling aroused over the supposed murder of Morgan in New York, was very strong in this county. The Western Press was the defender of Masonry, while the Luminary and the Greenville Gazette were its persistent opponents. A writer in the Western Press, under date of March 26, 1831, thus deploras the bitterness of the anti-Masonic crusade:

“Persecution, that demon of destruction, has raised its hydra head among us in the shape of proscriptive anti-Masonry. Brought into existence by disappointed office-hunters and their adherents, it is a base, unprincipled and anti-Christian scheme, built on a foundation of combustible matter, which will eventually take fire by some of its crowded squibs and explode, burying itself in its own ruins. If the Masons have violated the laws of our country, let them be tried by a jury, and if guilty, punished according to law, as other persons are. But let us not undertake to condemn those that are not connected in that awful tragedy. To persecute all Masons, and others who do not join with the antis in their ungenerous acts, making use of the most abusive language toward the unoffending citizens who have neither part nor lot in the matter, because they do not think and see as they (the antis) do, is indeed base. We now enjoy the rights of freemen—let us try to preserve those rights pure and uncontaminated in despite of cunning and designing men. Let us never adopt the course the antis have taken: calling their fathers, brothers and husbands rogues and murderers, and charging them with the most heinous crimes the human heart could be guilty of committing.”

This, however, simply fanned the flame. On the 31st of March a monster meeting of the opponents of Masonry assembled in the court-house yard at Mercer. Rev. Samuel Tait was chosen chairman, and William F. Junkin and Malcom McComb, secretaries. The purpose of the meeting was to imbue the religious population of the county with the anti-Masonic sentiment, and resolutions declaring the institution of Masonry as of no benefit were accordingly passed.

On the 19th of the ensuing April an unusually large meeting of the citizens of Mercer County was held at the court-house. Bevan Pearson was chosen president, and William Scott and J. B. Curtis, secretaries. Resolutions were passed “disapproving of the excitement which prevails at this time against Masonry, believing that the object of the anti-Masonic party is to divide the Democratic party in the State and Union.”

Scarcely had the rancor of the anti-Masonic excitement begun to subside, when the people of the country were startled by the news of the nullification policy of South Carolina, under the leadership of John C. Calhoun. The national executive at the time, Andrew Jackson, was a man of iron will, and not disposed to tolerate any weak sentimentality on the subject of secession. His course was sanctioned, and that of the nullifiers condemned, by the people of Mercer County. A meeting was held at the Mercer court-house, on the 28th of January, 1833, for the purpose of denouncing the position assumed by the nullifiers. James Braden, Esq., was elected chairman, and William S. Rankin was chosen secretary. A committee on resolutions, consisting of Joseph Smith, Bevan Pearson, John Hoge, James Moorhead and S. C. Tait, reported the following, among others, which were unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That we are attached to the Union, and are bound by every tie of faith, of honor, of interest and of duty, to maintain its integrity.

Resolved, That we totally disapprove the position taken and the doctrines advanced by the nullifiers of South Carolina, and consider them utterly subversive of the principles on which our happy Union is founded, and a lamentable instance of how far prejudice may lead great and good men into error.

Resolved, That we are ready and willing to lend our aid in sustaining the chief magistrate in maintaining the supremacy of the laws.

On January 18, 1833, a meeting of citizens of West Greenville was held at Col. Bean's hotel. Col. T. W. Bean was chosen president; Maj. James Williamson and Capt. F. H. Shannon, vice-presidents, and Jacob Loutzenhiser and James R. Wick, secretaries. Resolutions condemning the nullifiers in strong terms were adopted, one of them reading as follows:

Resolved, That practical nullification, so far from being a peaceable measure, at once invites the prompt interposition of every patriotic lover of his country, to save the Republic—"peaceably, if they can—forcibly, if they must."

The question of tariff, brought prominently forward by the nullifiers, continued to be an exciting topic of discussion between Democrats and Whigs. The Western Press contains a letter dated September 13, 1843, written by Henry Clay to F. S. Bronson, an editor at LaGrange, Ga. In it the Whig position is thus stated: "The sum and substance of what I conceive to be the true policy of the United States, in respect to a tariff, may be briefly stated. In conformity with the principles of the compromise act, I think that whatever revenue is necessary to an honest and economical administration of the general government ought to be derived from duties imposed on foreign imports. And I believe that, in establishing a tariff of those duties, such a discrimination ought to be made as will incidentally afford a reasonable protection to our natural interests."

Mr. W. S. Garvin states, after giving the foregoing, the position of the two parties as follows: "They (the Whigs) desire a protective tariff with incidental revenue, while the Democrats want a revenue tariff with incidental protection."

It would be interesting, did our space permit, to give a detailed account of the exciting national campaigns, and especially those of 1840, the "log cabin" or "hard cider" campaign; 1860, 1876, 1880 and 1884. The songs sung, the badges worn, the issues presented, and the local processions and contests exhibited, would be interesting and suggestive.

We must, however, refer to one movement that for a time played havoc with both the Whig and Democratic parties, and was the entering wedge toward the destruction of the former. Reference is had to the American, or Know-nothing, party, that took its rise in 1853, and existed until 1857. Its meetings were held in secret lodges, its movements covert, and its results almost unaccountable. The familiar, "Have you seen Sam?" was to be seen on every street corner, and in the show-cases of mercantile establishments. While the principles of this organization were claimed to be distinctively American, the acts of its partisans were diametrically opposed to the liberty guaranteed, under the Constitution, to every citizen of the republic. Its most prominent feature was its bitter antipathy to citizens of foreign birth, and deep-seated animosity toward the adherents of the Catholic Church, whether born on native or foreign soil. Many outrages and not a few murders were committed by the Know-nothings in different parts of the Union. In the elections of 1854-55-56, they developed great strength, and elected many of their local candidates; but the society then began to dissolve, and soon became extinct. Its birth was uncalled for; its short career was a blot upon the body politic, and its death unmourned by every true American.

The year 1855 was remarkable as the period of the birth of one of the great political parties of to-day—the Republican. It was made up of the disintegrated Whig party, some Democrats who were offended by the repeal of the Missouri Compromise of 1820, Free-soilers, Abolitionists and Know-nothings. The national organization occurred at Pittsburgh. The recasting of the party in Mercer County occurred in consequence of a "People's Convention," which assembled at Mercer on the 27th of August, 1855. Of that meeting Hon. Samuel Kerr was chairman, James Gault and Fleming Smith, vice-presidents, and John D. Hill and G. L. Eberhart, secretaries. A ticket for the approaching county election was put in operation, and a vigorous campaign entered upon. A committee to draft resolutions, consisting of William F. Clark, J. H. Robinson, J. M. D. Nesbitt, William Miller, William Waugh, Clayton Herrington, Perry McCoy and Thomas Leech, Jr., was appointed. Their report, which was adopted unanimously, dates the birth of the Republican party in Mercer County.

Since 1855 the contests for political supremacy in the county have been waged between the two leading parties, Republicanism and Democracy, with enough of activity on the part of Greenbackers, Labor Unionists, Prohibitionists and other minor organizations to increase the interest in the contest. Ascendancy has latterly been given to the Republican organization, though occasionally a member of the Democracy has been given the decided preference. This is particularly true as applied to the president judgeship. The Democratic party has furnished incumbents for that position for a third of a century. Both parties are efficiently organized, and prosecute vigorous campaigns.

THE power which leavens and moulds modern society is the press. In this respect it has supplanted oral instruction, which formerly was the power behind the throne. Oral instruction in the pulpit, in the halls of legislation and on the stump is, it must be confessed, very potent; but the educational power of the press, with its daily, weekly, monthly and quarterly visitations to the hovels of the poor equally with the mansions of the wealthy, is omnipotent. The newspaper is, as the term itself implies, a paper containing information from the four cardinal points—north, east, west and south. The laboring man sits down at his humble fireside, after the day's toil is over, and reads intelligence from all parts of the world. He is one member of the great jury to whom facts are submitted, and feels himself called upon to form a judgment. If the jury fail to agree in a verdict it is owing largely to the fact that the case has not been presented clearly and in its details for intelligent action. By the aid of telegraph and telephone, utilized by special and associate press reporters everywhere, cities, states and nations are bound together as near neighbors, and the actions of their citizens, from the humblest to the highest, are daily recorded and spread before the world. Wisely used, the press becomes the conservator of general intelligence and public morals. Its responsibility in the premises is commensurate, however, with its boundless power.

In the dissemination of news, as in other departments of human activity, necessity is the mother of invention. At first written news letters were circulated from hand to hand and place to place as a means of spreading the intelligence of events occurring at the seat of government. Such manuscripts, in the days of Henry VI, were issued as often as important news created the necessity for so doing. The use of movable types, and later, various forms of presses, with more or less of skill and efficiency, was regarded as a stride in the promulgation of intelligence.

At first the desire to have others know what had occurred prompted corresponding efforts to have the intelligence spread abroad. This desire finally became contagious, and the recipients were as anxious to have their cravings for information gratified as others were to gratify them. The spirit which animated the "Athenians and the strangers, which were there to spend their time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing," was founded in the necessities of human nature—the instinctive desire to communicate to others any new item of intelligence.

In the history of English journalism is contained this succinct account of the growth of the newspaper: "First we have the written news letter, furnished to the wealthy aristocracy; then, as the craving for information spread, the ballad of news sung or recited; then the news pamphlet, more prosaically arranged; then the periodical sheet of news; and lastly, the newspaper."

The English newspaper was born in London in 1622. At first its liberty was greatly abridged, nothing being allowed publication until it had passed the necessary official inspection. In the great struggle for independence, the press had to pass through many trying prosecutions and annoyances unknown to the people of this afternoon of the nineteenth century. The blood of martyrs is the seed not only of the church, but of the press as well. Governmental interference with the subject-matter of the newspaper was regarded an inherent right of self-constituted dignitaries; hence we need not affect surprise to find the House of Commons resolving, in 1729, that "it is an indignity and a breach of privilege of the House of Commons for any person to presume to give, in written or printed newspapers, any account or minutes of the debates or other proceedings of this House or any committee thereof." In 1764 the editor of the Evening Post, of London, was fined £100 by the House of Lords for mentioning the name of Lord Hereford in a disrespectful manner.

The severe treatment bestowed upon the publisher of the Public Adver- tiser, the paper in which the celebrated "Letters of Junius" began to appear in 1767, indicates the difficulties through which journalism had to struggle to reach its present disenthralled and exalted position. The caustic manner in which Junius flayed public functionaries for their gross dereliction in official duty would, had his identity been known, have subjected him to assassination, and resulted in the confiscation of the press which dared to give his effusions publicity. The extreme precaution necessary to shield the writer has left his identity a question of impenetrable doubt to the present time.

Even so late as the close of the eighteenth century the English press was greatly hampered. Sydney says: It is always considered as a piece of impertinence, in England, if a man of less than two or three thousand a year has any opinions at all upon important subjects; and in addition, he was sure at that time to be assailed with all the billingsgate of the French Revolution." The good work continued, however, until England was given the boon of a free press.

France has had a bitter experience in liberating the press. During the reign of Louis Napoleon there were 6,000 prosecutions of publishers, but persistence and heroic courage on their part ultimately prevailed, and France to-day can hear from her peasants sentiments which, formerly, the throne did not dare to utter. Not by German battalions only was Napoleon overthrown; he was shot through and through by the paper bullets of a justly hostile and terribly outraged public press.

The first newspaper published in America was entitled "Public Occurrences Both Foreign and Domestic." It was issued in Boston, Thursday, September 25, 1690, by Benjamin Harris, a copy of which is still preserved in the Colonial State Paper Office, in London. It is printed on the first three sides of a folded sheet, two columns to a page, and each page about seven inches by eleven in size. One of the objects of this pioneer journal, as expressed in the preliminary announcement, was a worthy one, and is commended to the attention of modern journalists. It is: "That something may be done toward the curing, or at least the charming, of that spirit of lying which prevails among us; wherefore nothing shall be entered but what we have reason to believe is true, repairing to the best fountains for our information. And when there appears any material mistake in anything that is collected, it shall be corrected in the next."

This paper was too pure to live. The legislative bosses, four days subsequent to the first issue, spoke of it as a pamphlet issued contrary to law and containing "reflections of a very high nature," and absolutely forbade anything in print without license first obtained from those appointed by the Government to grant the same."

The first religious newspaper in America is supposed to have been the Herald of Gospel Liberty, started by Elias Smith, at Portsmouth, N. H., September 1, 1808. It began with 274 subscribers, which number in seven years was increased to 1,500.

The emancipation of the press in America has progressed until journalism is recognized, not only as an important, but an honored and professional calling. Its work is systematized, and its usefulness constantly enlarging.

In 1886 there were, in the United States and Territories, the following publications: Dailies, 1,260; tri-weeklies, 46; semi-weeklies, 152; weeklies, 10,979; bi-weeklies, 50; semi-monthlies, 186; monthlies, 1,401; bi-monthlies; 33; quarterlies, 93; miscellaneous, 7; total, 14,207.

MERCER NEWSPAPERS.

The history of the press in Mercer County begins with the Western Press, one of the oldest newspapers in Western Pennsylvania. The Western Press began its existence in Mercer on Wednesday, February 21, 1811. Its proprietor and editor was Jacob Herrington. He brought with him, from Meadville, the materials which had been used for two years previous in publishing a small paper in opposition to the Crawford Messenger, edited by Thomas Atkinson. Owing to the condition of the road, which lay through a comparative wilderness, the trip required four days. The ox team of that period did not move with the ease and rapidity of the iron horse of the present.

With Mr. Herrington came William C. Keen, as his printer, and two apprentices, Robert Burchfield and John Evans. Keen remained in Mercer until the close of the War of 1812, and then removed to Vevay, Ind., where he published a paper. He subsequently became a major-general of militia among the Hoosiers, and also held the important position of postmaster.

Having served their apprenticeship with Herrington, Burchfield and Evans started out to see the world; in other words, went on a tramp as journeymen printers, but returned after a brief absence. The first was stricken with consumption, and died shortly afterward. Evans resumed work in the Press office, and remained until about 1822, when he went to Franklin and established the Venango Herald, the first newspaper in Venango County. He became a prominent man in public life, and died the 30th of November, 1871, in the seventy-fourth year of his age. From him Mr. W. S. Garvin received his instruction as a printer, and acquired the "art preservative." About the year 1815 another apprentice served in the Press office, David Crawford, founder of the first paper published in New Castle.

To return to the origin of the Press, it began as a four-column folio, size 10x16 inches. In the sixth issue of volume 1, dated March 29, 1811, the earliest paper seen by the writer, occurs the remark—"printed by David Flemming for the proprietors." Whether the plural form, proprietors, was used because of the excessive modesty of publishers in those days, or because the ownership was vested, not in a corporation, but in several individuals, is not known. It is probable that John Hoge had, at even that early date, some pecuniary interest in it; for on the 15th of October, 1827, he became sole proprietor and editor. Mr. Herrington, on that date, issued a card in which he said: "Having retired from the editorial desk, I now want to have all outstanding accounts settled, of whatever kind they may be. Grain will be taken in payment at liberal prices, but must be delivered in November and December ensuing."

At the time of which we are speaking (October, 1827) the paper was called the Western Press and Mercer County Gazette. The Press had just absorbed its first competitor in the county, the Mercer County Gazette. It was a small journal published by James Nelson. "The type," says Wm. F. Clark, Sr., in a letter to the writer, dated December 12, 1887, "was inked with puff-ball, and the impression made, one page at a time, with a screw press manufactured by Adam Ramage, of Philadelphia." This press is now the property of Mr. E. L. Garvin, and is stored away on the third floor of the A. J. McKean building in Mercer. The cumbersome annex, Mercer County Gazette, was dropped prior to 1830, when Mr. Garvin became the nominal owner and active manager of the paper. For nearly a year and a half Mr. Hoge was still interested in the journal. A standing announcement at the head of the first page was: "Published by William S. Garvin;" and at the head of the editorial page: "Edited by Hoge and Garvin." It is understood, however, that Mr.

Hoge's real estate and legal interests required about all his time and efforts, so that Mr. Garvin was the real power behind the throne. At the age of twelve Mr. Garvin began to learn his trade at the Press office, entering as an apprentice in 1819 and remaining until 1825, when he left for New York and other fields. He was absent until 1830, when he returned to take charge of the paper. His sketch in detail will be found in another part of this history.

About the time Mr. Garvin left the Press office, in 1825, John Bigler, subsequently governor of California, at the same time his younger brother was governor of Pennsylvania, became an apprentice, remaining for a brief period, but completing his trade with John McFarland, of Pittsburgh, at that time a Democratic editor of considerable ability.

On the 14th of May, 1831, Mr. Hoge published a card as follows: "Having disposed of all interest in the Press, it is necessary that those indebted to me should settle and arrange their accounts. During the three years the establishment was owned and conducted by me, no one indebted to it was either dunned or sued—now it is hoped that all accounts contracted during that period will be promptly closed." A publisher like Mr. Hoge, who neither dunned nor sued his patrons, would be welcomed by some modern subscribers, who imagine that printers subsist and grow fat on fame and an occasional piece of musty wedding cake. Mr. Hoge was wealthy, and could afford to be lenient.

The position thus vacated by Mr. Hoge was held by Mr. Garvin, with brief interruptions, until the time of his death. "During two years (1836-38) it was in the hands of J. M. Keuster." J. W. S. Chappell, now residing near Sandy Lake, in his seventy-eighth year, came to Mercer on the 15th of June, 1837. Being a young lawyer he was admitted to the Mercer bar on the motion of Hon. William Stewart. Scarcity of money compelled him to do something, meanwhile, to replenish his depleted exchequer. For about a year he worked as editor of the Western Press, then under the management of J. M. Keuster. At the expiration of this time Chappell bought the paper on three years' time, and continued the publication a part of 1838-39. He subsequently sold the plant to a Mr. Bagley, who controlled it for a time, Mr. Scott acting as editor. This arrangement continued but a short time, when the management again fell into the hands of W. S. Garvin, its former owner and editor. While Mr. Garvin was a member of Congress the office work was done by Wm. Donnelly, the editor-in-chief sending editorial matter regularly from Washington. In 1855 William McKnight became editor, and continued to hold the position until about the breaking out of the great rebellion, when his associate and lessee of the paper, Thomas McKean, son of William McKean, took it in charge, and Mr. McKnight became editor of the Democratic Register.

When Thomas McKean became sole manager of the Press he at once began advocating a more vigorous prosecution of the war. He issued it in half sheets, twice a week, Tuesdays and Fridays, to give the latest war news. This he continued to do until the 10th of September, 1861, when he entered the army as an officer of the Tenth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and left the paper in the editorial hands of James A. Stranahan, "a young man in whose abilities and political position he had the fullest confidence."

Mr. Stranahan continued to edit the paper from September 10 to November 1, 1861, when the lease expired. The history of the paper is thus filled in by Mr. W. S. Garvin in an editorial published in the Press of January 6, 1871: "At the beginning of the war the Press establishment was in the hands of Mr. Thomas McKean, who chose to put it into the support of the war. The Register, a rival Democratic paper, took what we believed to be the true ground, in entire opposition to the war. When McKean's lease expired, and the property came back to our hands, we decided to stay out of business rather than enter into rivalry with a paper that was supporting our views, and thus was left to Mr. McKnight a clear field for the Register. For some cause it did not prosper, and eventually went down, leaving the Democracy of the county wholly without a paper. The party that owned the Register printing establishment, near a year afterward, induced Mr. C. W. Whistler to take it and commence the publication of a Democratic paper. With our consent and approbation he called it the Western Press, and thus was resumed the publication of a journal, the first started in the county, the name of which was familiar to all of the 'manor born.' Not meeting with the support he felt himself entitled to receive, at the end of a year and four months he abandoned its publication and surrendered the property to its owners. It was then (January, 1867) that its use was offered to and accepted by us, and that our pledge was given to the Democracy of Mercer County that so long as life lasted they would never again be without a party organ."

In January, 1867, Mr. Garvin again took charge of the paper. It was then a small, six-column sheet. At the opening of 1868 it was enlarged to seven columns. At the beginning of 1871 it was still further enlarged to an eight-column sheet, and a new press from the manufactory of Potter & Co. added to the outfit. During this period the name of the firm was W. S. & E. L. Garvin, the junior partner being the son of the senior. They continued to manage the paper until January 1, 1882, when Mrs. L. L. Garvin, wife of the junior member, became proprietor, and T. W. McClain editor and business manager. On October 6, 1882, the plant was bought by A. J. Palm, R. J. Zahniser and W. B. Bard, and published under the name of the Democrat Printing Company. It was thought wise to change the name from Western Press to the Mercer County Democrat, but loud and numerous protests from old-time patrons and friends prevented the desecration of the familiar title. For a time after this last purchase the editorial duties were performed by W. H. Griffith and T. W. McClain, Mr. A. J. Palm being then county superintendent of public schools. Subsequently, the interests of Zahniser and Bard were bought by Messrs. Palm and McClain, the present proprietors.

One peculiarity of the early days of the Western Press, and in fact of all newspapers of those times, was almost the entire absence of local matter. Long editorials upon political questions, full proceedings of legislative and congressional bodies, excerpts from city journals, giving the latest intelligence from foreign countries, and the annual messages of the governor and President, were deemed the kind of food most palatable to the average backwoods reader.

The Western Press has during all the changes through which it has passed been the exponent and defender of Democratic principles. When the anti-Masonic excitement was at its height the Press, under the vigorous management of Mr. Garvin, espoused the cause of the persecuted Masons against the Luminary, the organ of the opposition. Thomas Jefferson and Jeffersonian Democracy were the ideals which the distinguished and able editor constantly held before his readers. Under Mr. Palm's editorial management the paper has lost none of its former vigor.

The Mercer Luminary was established in 1830 by William and James Moorhead. It was an anti-Masonic paper, and was first published in a two-story log building which stood on the southwest corner of the diamond, on the site of the present Anderson grocery. In 1833 it was purchased by William F. Clark, who removed the outfit to an office on East Market Street, the structure standing on the lot now occupied by Dr. A. I. Hoon. Mr. Clark continued it as an anti-Masonic sheet until that party dissolved, when it and most of the other anti-Masonic papers went into the ranks of the Whig party. It continued as the exponent of Whig principles until the Presidential campaign of 1844, when, refusing to support Henry Clay, it hoisted the banner of Hon. James G. Birney, the Liberty candidate for the Presidency. In 1848 it supported the Free-soil Democratic candidate, Martin Van Buren. The last issue of the Luminary occurred July 3, 1850.

It was changed to the Free Presbyterian, the publishing being done by William F. Clark, but the editorial work by Rev. Joseph Gordon. After two years the Presbyterian was transferred to a society who removed it to Cincinnati, Mr. Gordon becoming a corresponding editor from Cleveland, to which place he had meanwhile removed.

In 1852 Mr. Clark began the publication of the American Freeman, and uniting with it the Promulgator, of New Castle, continued it until 1859, when he sold it to E. S. Durban, who changed the name to that of the Courant and removed the plant to New Castle.

In 1857 began a paper known as the Mercer Dispatch. One wing of the old Whig party, now Republican, was pro-slavery in sentiment. Its organ was the Whig. William M. Stephenson, Esq., the leader of the anti-slavery wing of the party, determined to have an organ. He furnished the money for purchasing the outfit of a defunct Democratic paper, and S. T. McClelland, John A. White, William F. Clark, Jr., and S. B. Stephenson became the proprietors. All were practical printers, and young men of energy; hence the name selected. William F. Clark, Sr., was selected as the nominal editor-in-chief. Mr. White, a brilliant thinker and writer, also enlivened its columns with his productions.

In the course of a year or so McClelland sold his interest and went to Pittsburgh. In November, 1862, William F. Clark, Sr., having received an appointment as revenue collector at Meadville, he and his son sold out their interest in the Dispatch to S. H. Miller, who, with the assistance of Mr. White, continued the publication of the paper. White died shortly afterward, leaving Mr. Miller the sole manager of the journal. This position he maintained until March, 1864, when a consolidation occurred of two papers occupying the same field, the Dispatch and the Whig. At this point we halt to bring up the history of the latter paper.

The Mercer Whig began June 15, 1844. The Luminary refused to support Henry Clay as the Whig candidate for the Presidency, and in consequence a company of prominent Whigs from all parts of the county determined to establish an organ of their own, to be known as the Mercer Whig. The outfit was bought in Pittsburgh, and shipped by the river and canal to Big Bend, whence it was drawn by an ox-team to Mercer. At the same time a delegation went to Pittsburgh to secure for its editor John B. Butler, then publishing a campaign paper favorable to the election of Gen. Markle as governor, called the Mississinewa War Club. Mr. Butler conducted the paper until December, 1845, when he sold his interest to William Waugh, of Greenville. Mr. Waugh ran it about two years, when it became the property of William Gregory and D. B. Hays, publisher and editor, respectively.

On the 15th of December, 1849, Mr. Hays, after a service of two years, retired, leaving the editorial chair to be filled by A. H. Snyder, a young attorney of Mercer. (Mr. Hays died 25th of January, 1851, aged thirty-six years.

it began to "sleep the sleep that knows no waking." Hill was a native of Ireland, but learned printing and book binding in England. He came to Mercer County at quite an early date, and set type in the Western Press office. He subsequently worked at his trade in Warren, Penn., and Ellicottville, N. Y. He died in Greenville in 1841. His daughter, Mrs. Simeon Betts, is living northeast of that borough.

In 1848 J. W. Mason started a paper which he called the Weekly Express. It was subsequently enlarged to a seven-column sheet, and known simply as the Express, and continued independent in politics until 1852.

It was then purchased by Rev. William Orvis, a Congregational minister, who changed its name to Independent Press, and flung to the breeze the then unpopular anti-slavery banner. In a short time it was purchased by William Laird. In April, 1853, J. C. Brown, connected for two previous years with the Jeffersonian Star, at Brookville, Penn., bought the press from Laird, and for a time ran it under the same name. In 1854, Jacob L. Weir became interested as publisher, and the firm was Brown & Weir. This arrangement continued but a short time, when J. C. Brown, having meantime been elected county superintendent, acted only as editor, William S. Finch and J. L. Weir taking charge of the business management.

Before Mr. Brown's term of office had expired the office was purchased by John S. Fairman, late editor of the Coal City Item, of New Castle, Penn. He changed the name to West Greenville Times, and began a new series, issuing his first number November 22, 1856. It was then a six-column folio, flew the motto "Independent—not Neutral," and its subscription price was $1 per year, in advance. On the 1st of December, 1856, A. M. Campbell, a druggist of the borough, joined Mr. Fairman in the paper, and the firm became Fairman & Campbell. In April, 1857, H. A. Bowman bought Fairman's interest, and Bowman & Campbell conducted the Times until the following October, when failing health caused Mr. Bowman to retire from the business. He went south, and died in March, 1858. Mr. Campbell continued to publish the paper until October, 1859, when he sold it to Allen Turner, who purchased it for his sister, Mrs. Orpha Hammond. She edited the paper nearly a year, and was then succeeded by W. F. Chalfant. Soon after the war broke out James C. Brown traded to Mr. Turner a piece of land in Crawford County, and again became the proprietor of the paper. He retained the title and management until 1862.

The plant was then purchased by W. F. Chalfant, who changed the name of the paper to the Rural Argus. After a short time, however, he sold it to F. H. Braggins, and went into the army to fight the battles of his country. In 1867 W. H. H. Dumars became a partner with Braggins, and continued in such relation about a year, when he sold back to Braggins, and returned to Erie. In 1869 Braggins sold his interest to Jacob Miller, and went to Mercer to become one of the managers of the Mercer Dispatch. Mr. Miller owned the paper but a short time, when he disposed of it to W. F. Chalfant, who a second time became its proprietor and editor. This relation continued until October, 1871, when he sold it to Harry Watson.

Mr. Watson changed the name to the Shenango Valley Argus, and in the fall of 1875 sold the paper to George Morgan, who ran it until November, 1877, when the paper again became the property of J. C. Brown, by whom it was finally consolidated with the Advance. Since the beginning of the war it has been a strong Republican paper, and has always supported the measures and candidates of that party.

The Advance was started January 7, 1871, by W. H. H. Dumars, Amos

A. Yeakel and W. F. Harpst, as an eight-column folio at $2 per year. On the 15th of the following April Yeakel and Harpst sold their interest to J. C. Brown, and the paper was then published under the firm name of Dumars & Co. On the 23d of September, same year, Dumars sold his interest to Mr. Brown, who then became sole proprietor, and so continued until the 18th of November, when E. W. Lightner bought the complete equipment, good will and all. He ran the paper until the 25th of January, 1873, when Mr. Brown repurchased the paper, and continued to own and run it until November, 1877, when, having also purchased the Argus, the two papers were consolidated under the name of the Greenville Advance-Argus.

The Advance-Argus was conducted by Mr. Brown until December, 1878, when Leech & Beachler became publishers, and J. C. Brown, editor. This arrangement continued until December, 1880, when Mr. Brown sold a fourth interest to C. F. Beachler, and the firm name became Brown & Beachler, the former remaining editor-in-chief. On the 14th of December, 1885, Mr. Brown bought back Mr. Beachler's one-fourth interest, and at once sold a half interest to L. Hippee. The publishers since that date have remained Brown & Hippee, the former being editor, the latter business manager. Such is, in brief, the history of one of the live Republican papers of the county.

The Union Democrat is one of the defunct newspapers of Greenville. It was established by William P. Hanna in May, 1861, immediately after he was relieved from the postmastership of Greenville, by President Lincoln, and was the first Democratic paper published in that borough. The Democrat was a six-column folio, and its subscription price was $1.50 per annum. Mr. Hanna published the paper until the fall of 1864, when he sold the office to F. H. Braggins, of the Argus, who used the material in the publication of his paper. Mr. Hanna came to Greenville in 1833, and was a resident of the town until his death October 6, 1888.

The Greenville Progress was started as a five-column daily June 1, 1877, by William Orr, Jr., proprietor and editor. It was the first and only daily ever issued in Greenville. On the 21st of July, of the same year, the Weekly Progress began, being made up from the daily. It was issued by Amos A. Yeakel and William Orr, Jr. In the salutatory occurred the sentence: "We are here, a true Jeffersonian Democratic paper, advocating local self-government and honesty in office." A careful examination of the dates shows that this journal had its inception during the stormy days of the great labor strike of 1877, and for a time suffered from the stagnation that ensued. The weekly was conducted for three months by Yeakel & Orr, when (November 3, 1877) Mr. Orr retired and the management consisted of A. D. Gillespie, editor, and A. A. Yeakel, publisher. In their announcement they assert that the existence of two Republican papers in Greenville was regarded a sufficient reason for establishing a Democratic organ. On the 3d of January, 1880, Mr. Gillespie announced the assumption of the entire proprietorship, Mr. Yeakel having retired. W. F. Harpst was at once employed by Mr. Gillespie as foreman of the office. On the 2d of May, 1881, the paper was bought from Mr. Gillespie by W. F. Harpst and Frank C. Huling, by whom it has since been owned, managed and edited. In December, 1877, the paper was enlarged from a five-column quarto to a nine-column folio, the size which it still retains. The Progress is recognized as one of the best newspapers in the county.

The Shenango Valley News was founded on the 11th of April, 1882, by D. B. Robbins, from whom it was purchased in the summer of the same year by W. H. H. Dumars, its present editor and proprietor. It is a six-column quarto, and always brimful of news. In the gubernatorial election of 1882 it espoused the cause of the Independent wing of the Republican party, and did its utmost to secure the election of Hon. John Stewart instead of Gen. James A. Beaver. Since that time it has returned to the fold of orthodox Republicanism, and at the present time is one of the staunchest local advocates of the Republican party. The editor of the News has had considerable experience in newspaper work, and wields a trenchant pen. He is a bold, vigorous writer, and though intensely Republican, exhibits far more independence of expression than is usually found in party organs. The News is a good paper, and has a fair patronage.

The Independent, of Greenville, was established by Austin H. Robbins, and its first number issued May 23, 1885. It is a four-column quarto, issued weekly, at 50 cents a year, and independent, as its name implies. Mr. Robbins is a native of Delaware Township, and learned his trade in the Argus office, during the ownership of W. F. Chalfant and Harry Watson. He assisted his brother in establishing the Shenango Valley News, in 1882, and three years afterward started the Independent, which he has since edited and published. While the paper has quite a large local circulation, Mr. Robbins depends largely upon office work, making a specialty of job printing and advertising.

SHARON PAPERS.

The first paper started in Sharon, the metropolis of Mercer County, was the Sharon Herald, whose first issue occurred Thursday, April 11, 1864. It emanated from an office under the banking house of Porter & Perkins, the proprietors and projectors being R. C. Frey and his brother J. C. Frey. It was printed on a No. 4 Washington hand press, and commanded the modest subscription price of $1.50 per year, always in advance. It began as a seven-column sheet, and from the beginning advocated the principles of the Republican party. On the 20th of April, 1865, Dr. John Winter, a Baptist minister of the town, bought the interest of R. C. Frey, and the business was conducted under the name of J. H. Frey & Co. until the 22d of March, 1866, when Frey bought Winter's interest and became sole proprietor. This condition of things existed until November 1, 1866, when Calvin W. Ray purchased a half interest in the paper. On the 15th of the following December the paper was enlarged to an eight-column sheet, and the subscription raised to $2 per annum. On the 1st of January, 1869, John L. Morrison bought Mr. Frey's interest. Soon thereafter important improvements were made in the equipment. On the 4th of August, 1871, it was again enlarged to a nine-column sheet, and a new Cottrell and Babcock power press purchased. On the 1st of July, 1874, the subscription price was reduced to $1 per year, strictly in advance. On the 1st of January, 1876, Mr. Ray purchased Mr. Morrison's interest (the latter having been elected recorder), and became sole proprietor of the paper. This position he occupied until March, 1879, when he sold the plant to Mr. Morrison, the present proprietor and editor. The Herald has been one of the potent factors in maintaining the supremacy of the Republican party in the borough and the county. It has outlived the doubts connected with its trial existence at the time it was launched upon the stormy sea of journalistic and national existence in 1864. Mr. Morrison has devoted his entire attention to making the Herald what it is to-day—one of the leading newspapers of the Shenango Valley.

The Sharon Times, a Democratic organ, was started in 1868 by John A. Lant and George D. Herbert, the firm name being Lant & Herbert. The first issue appeared on the 17th of June of the said year. On the 6th of July, 1869, Lant withdrew from the firm, leaving Herbert sole proprietor and editor. The paper started as a seven-column folio, 25x37, and was printed on a Washington hand press. In April, 1875, a Potter cylinder press was secured, and in August of the following year a steam boiler and engine were added. The first number was issued from the second story of T. J. Porter's bank building, on State Street, opposite the Shenango House. Some time in 1878 Mr. Herbert became financially embarrassed, and the property passed into the ownership of P. E. Kimberly, but Herbert continued as its managing editor until 1879, when he went to Philadelphia. Reuben Williamson was then business manager, and T. W. McClain, editor. This arrangement continued until shortly after the Presidential election of 1880, when the outfit was sold to J. R. McNabb, of the Sharon Eagle. Thus ended the career of the only Democratic paper ever started in Sharon. It was a neat sheet and ably edited, but lacked the patronage to keep it successfully sailing o'er the stormy sea of journalism.

In 1879 the Gospel Temperance Advocate was started by James R. Burchfield, now of Greenville. After a year's struggling against the waves of adversity, it went down to rise no more.

The Sharon Eagle began its journalistic career on May 3, 1875, as the Mercer County Eagle, J. R. McNabb being the editor and proprietor. It started as a large nine-column weekly paper, "independent in all things and neutral in nothing." On the 6th of October, 1875, McNabb commenced the publication of a daily which he called the Evening Eagle, a venture which was looked upon at first with a great many misgivings by the people of Sharon. Mr. McNabb conducted both papers until the day of his death, which occurred in 1883. The management of the paper then fell upon the shoulders of his son, Scott R. McNabb, who conducted it until April 1, 1885, when the material of the establishment was purchased by James L. Ray and Walter Whitehead, both practical printers. Scott R. McNabb died in Pittsburgh, May 8, 1888, aged twenty-five years. With an increase of patronage these gentlemen decided to convert the paper into a Republican organ, which was done. In October, 1887, Mr. C. W. Ray, formerly connected with the Herald, and the postmaster of Sharon from March, 1879, to March, 1887, was admitted into the partnership, and the style of the firm changed to the "Eagle Printing Company." Under this name is now published the only daily sheet in Mercer County, and by it, also, the weekly began over thirteen years ago. The place of publication is the fine basement of the First National Bank building.

SHARPSVILLE PAPERS.

The Sharpsville Advertiser was established in 1870 by Walter Pierce, Esq., of Sharpsville, the first issue appearing October 21. Its size was 18x24 inches, and it was printed at the office of the Sharon Times. It had no subscription price, but circulated gratuitously among the business men of Sharpsville, who liberally patronized its advertising pages. On the 8th of February, 1871, it was enlarged to an eight-column, four-page sheet, 25x40 inches, and the price fixed at $1 per year. The printing was then done at the office of the Advance, of Greenville. In 1871 Mr. Pierce purchased the material of the Signal, established at Mercer about six months previously by William McKnight, but suspended in June of that year, and organized the "Sharpsville Printing Company." P. J. Bartleson, then connected with the Greenville Argus, was employed as editor. The first paper published in Sharpsville appeared August 23, 1871, the subscription price being put at $2 per year. On the 1st of January, 1872, another enlargement occurred, this time to a nine-column sheet, 28x44 inches. The paper has had a prosperous existence, and is still under the editorial and business management of Mr. Bartleson, the long-tried secretary of the school board.

The Sharpsville Times is the title of a four-page, four-column weekly of Sharpsville, which began in the summer of 1887. It was started by M. W. Thompson and S. W. Hazen, at 75 cents per year. It is devoted largely to local and personal news.

OTHER PAPERS.

In November, 1873, the Jamestown Sun was started in Jamestown, a four-page, eight-column paper, by D. L. Calkins and wife, publishers and editors. It was independent. Price, $1.50 per year. It continued to battle against its evil star until March, 1879, when, owing to the burning of Mr. Calkins' house and the death of his son, foreman of the office, its rays ceased to shine. In the fall of 1879 F. S. and F. A. Alden came from Cleveland to Jamestown and began the publication of the Jamestown Era, a seven-column folio, Republican in character, independent in pretension, but neutral in fact. They continued it under their own management for about four years, when they leased it to DeWitt & Nichols, who changed its name to the Jamestown Democrat, and continued to preside over its destinies one year. At the expiration of that time F. A. Alden took it and published it one year as the Jamestown Sentinel. He sold his interest to F. W. McCoy and J. B. Robinson, both from Sheakleyville, in October, 1885. They ran it as an independent for six months, when McCoy retired, and the firm changed to that of Robinson Brothers, its present proprietors and managers. They have added new type and new presses, and are in a prosperous condition. The Sentinel is independent in politics, and gives all parties fair treatment in its columns.

The Telephone, now published at Grove City, began its existence at Karns City, Butler Co., Penn., when that place was at its zenith as an oil town. It was started by J. Borland in the interest of the Greenback Labor party, but failing to receive proper support he changed it, in 1881, to an independent journal, and added a column to each page. Karns City suffering the decline consequent to the wane of the oil excitement, Mr. Borland sought a new field for his paper. Grove City, then called Pine Grove, offered better inducements, and he consequently came thither and issued the first copy of the Pine Grove Telephone on July 22, 1882. M. W. Moore, who learned the printing trade in the office of the Kittanning Sentinel, came with Mr. Borland as the foreman of the new paper. The Telephone having received a hearty reception in its new field, began to prosper. On the 15th of November, 1882, the name was changed from Pine Grove to Grove City Telephone, to correspond with the changed name of the village. With few changes, it continued under the management of Mr. Borland until August 1, 1884, when A. C. Ray, now local editor of the Dispatch and Republican at Mercer, purchased a half interest. Two weeks later he purchased the other half, and at once transferred it to A. A. Little, of Millbrook, who still retains his interest. At that time the Telephone was issued from what is now the office of the Union Heat and Light Company, but December, 1884, was removed to the upper rooms of W. A. Young & Son's harness store, corner of Broad and Pine Streets. On December 1, 1885, Mr. Little purchased Ray's interest in the Telephone, and immediately transferred it to Mrs. Maggie C. Moore, who is represented in the business by her husband, M. W. Moore. He brought into the office an outfit of job material, which he had used at Sandy Lake prior to joining in the Grove City enterprise. When the new partnership was formed, W. H. McElwain, student at law in Mercer, was chosen to do editorial work, and continued in that relation until July, 1887, when he removed to Findlay, Ohio, his present home. Since that date Mr. Little has occupied the editorial tripod. The Telephone was printed on a hand press until the 6th of April, 1888, when it was supplied with a power press, and now rejoices in increased facilities, growing patronage and enlarged usefulness.

The Sandy Lake News was established August 4, 1874, under the fostering care of Capt. James F. Johnston. It was a six-column folio, patent outside, and for the first six months was printed by the Jamestown Sun. Capt. Johnston was advised by the leading citizens to relinquish his efforts to establish a paper in Sandy Lake, because they believed it would be a failure. He proposed to "fight it out on that line," and accordingly he bought an outfit of type at Andover, Ohio, and moved it to the second floor of the Kirk Building. He subsequently sold out to A. H. Owen, who in a few weeks disposed of the business to L. E. Hogue, from whom it passed into the hands of its present owner, L. I. Crawford, in 1876. Under its present management it is fighting the traffic in alcoholic stimulants, and has built up quite a good circulation among the temperance element of the county.

The Lake Local was established in May, 1879, in Sandy Lake, by W. R. Eckles and J. A. Clary. It was a five-column folio, 17x24, and was printed in the Foster Building. At the end of one year Clary sold his interest to A. E. Long, who, after one year's experience, sold to E. G. Eberman and V. C. Place, and the paper was published for a short time under the firm name of Eckles & Co. Rev. A. T. Wolff, now a Presbyterian minister located at Alton, Ill., bought out Eberman and Place, and with Eckles continued until he sold his interest back to E. G. Eberman, who eventually became the sole proprietor, and remains such. March 1, 1883, the office was transferred to its present quarters at Stoneboro, and was at that time changed to a four-column quarto, its present size. Mr. Eckles has continued from the beginning to edit and manage the paper and the job department connected therewith, the office being fitted up with an excellent supply of job type and good presses. Its circulation is confined principally to the northeastern portion of the county.

CHAPTER XI.

BENCH AND BAR—THE LAW PROFESSION—THE BENCH—SKETCHES OF PRESIDENT JUDGES—ASSOCIATE JUDGES—THE BAR—BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES OF DECEASED ATTORNEYS WHO PRACTICED AT THE MERCER BAR—PRESENT BAR OF MERCER COUNTY.

LAW is said to be a rule of action. Its purpose, as applied to human conduct, is to command and direct that which is right, and to restrain that which is evil. Its foundation is justice. It cannot result in harm to anyone, provided its behests are wisely and impartially enforced. Its temple is holy, and no unholy feet may enter its innermost recesses. He who studies its pages with a view of learning its sublime teachings, should early learn to remove the sandals from his feet, realizing that the ground upon which he is about to tread is sacred. Advocates who have such a conception of her sphere are invited to enter; demagogues are expected to maintain a respectable distance. The law affords an ample field for the exercise of the highest mental, moral and social endowments. Education, a knowledge of human nature, a love of justice, philanthropic impulses, patriotism—all these and other qualifications should be possessed by him who would attain a fair position in the courts of justice. The mere tricks, that win for the hour, can never secure permanent fame. Honesty, integrity, true manhood, careful study of the fundamental principles of law, an acquaintanceship with the various realms of human knowledge, and a consecrated devotion to the profession, have all conspired to give true lasting fame to those who have achieved success, either as attorneys or jurists.

The courts of Mercer County, like others in Western Pennsylvania, have been dominated by judges and attorneys, some of whom were residents of the county and acquainted with its struggles and successes, while others have come only on missions of business. An examination of the lists of attorneys will reveal the fact that many of the advocates at the bar were from adjoining counties, and some even from other States. In treating this subject we give, first, the list of the members of the bench, and then those who practiced at the bar. So far as they could be obtained, sketches of the more prominent are presented. Living representatives are placed in the regular biographical department of this work.

THE BENCH.

The first judge who sat on the bench in Mercer County was Hon. Jesse Moore. He was a native of Montgomery County, Penn., and a stanch Democrat. While practicing law at Sunbury he was appointed president judge of the Sixth Judicial District, his commission dating April 5, 1803. He removed at once to Meadville to assume the duties of his position, which he held, without interruption, until the day of his death, December 21, 1824, in the fifty-ninth year of his age. He was well educated, a diligent student and a good lawyer, discreet, upright, and impartial in his judicial opinions and decisions. He sustained, with becoming grace, the honor and dignity of his profession, and is said to have made an imposing appearance. A competent eye-witness (William S. Garvin) testifies that he was a heavy, solemn-looking man, and retained the dress of the old-style gentleman—small clothes, shoe buckles, knee buckles; bald head, with the long hair behind done up in a queue; head and hair and collar of the black coat covered with powder sprinkled thereon.

The second judge was Henry Shippen, also an adherent of the Democratic party. He was born in Lancaster, Penn., on December 28, 1788. He graduated from Dickinson College, at Carlisle, in 1808. His law reading was prosecuted with Judge Hopkins, of Lancaster, and in due time he was admitted to the bar. During the War of 1812 he was captain of a company from Lancaster which numbered as one of its privates James Buchanan, subsequently President of the United States. Returning from the war, he started and built up a large practice in his native town. He finally removed to Huntingdon, Penn., from which place he was appointed president judge of the judicial district embracing Crawford, Erie, Venango and Mercer Counties. His appointment was dated January 24, 1825. He continued in his judicial functions until the time of his death, which occurred March 2, 1839. He is reputed to have been a man of good sense and sound judgment; and, though quick tempered, was uniformly courteous and dignified to the profession. His charges and decisions were characterized by dignity and uprightness.

A change having occurred in the composition of the district, Hon. John Bredin became president judge on the 10th of May, 1831. He was a resident of Butler, Penn., and was admitted to practice at Mercer November 18, 1817. He was an able and upright judge, who labored earnestly to discharge the duties of his high station. While doing equal justice to all, he was kind, courteous and gentlemanly in all his relations with the bench, the bar and the people of the district. All the counties in his district recommended him to the Democratic State Convention for nomination for the Supreme Bench. He held the position of president judge of the Seventeenth Judicial District for twenty years. He died May 21, 1851.

The next on the bench was Hon. Daniel Agnew, then and still a resident of Beaver, Penn. He was born in Trenton, N. J., January 5, 1809. His education was received mainly in Western Pennsylvania, and embraced a thorough classical training. He began the study of law under Henry Baldwin and W. W. Fetterman, and was admitted to the bar in the spring of 1829, and shortly afterward opened an office in Pittsburgh. In the fall of the same year he removed to Beaver, where he soon built up a large and lucrative practice. He was a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1837-38. In June, 1851, he was appointed by Gov. Johnston to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Judge Bredin, and in the ensuing October was elected for a term of ten years, and re-elected in 1861. In October, 1863, he was elected a judge of the Supreme Court. In 1873 his term as chief justice began, and expired in 1879. During the War of the Rebellion Judge Agnew charged a jury in Lawrence County that sympathy in the North with the rebellion was treason, and should be indicted. His patriotic firmness was a great support to the State and national government. He is regarded one of the ablest jurists Western Pennsylvania has produced.

Another change in the district having occurred, John S. McCalmont was appointed president judge June 15, 1853, and elected the 15th of the ensuing October. He is the son of John McCalmont, of Franklin. He spent several years in attendance at Allegheny College, Meadville, leaving it in 1838 because of an appointment as cadet to the military academy at West Point, where he graduated a few years subsequently. He spent some time afterward in the regular army. Returning to his home, he read law and was admitted to the bar. When the rebellion began he entered the service as colonel of the Pennsylvania volunteers, and did efficient service, being a brave and conscientious officer. He is a Democrat, and was elected judge at a time when his party was strongly in the majority in the district. When the Cleveland administration began, he received an appointment in Washington, which position he still occupies.

Judge McCalmont was succeeded on the bench by James L. Campbell, who was elected October 11, 1861. He is a native of Centre County, but removed to Clarion County shortly after its formation. He studied law in Centre, but his practicing occurred mainly in Clarion, his adopted county. He is a strong Republican. His election was brought about as follows: Hon. William Stewart, of Mercer, was the regular nominee of the Republican party. Some dissatisfaction existing, Mr. Campbell was designated by the Independent Republicans as the people's candidate. He was also endorsed by the Democratic Convention, which gave him sufficient strength to elect him. His administration was efficient, meeting the most sanguine expectations of his friends and earnest supporters. It is proper to state that Judge Campbell had nothing to do with securing his nomination, it being an entire surprise to him.

The next occupant of the bench was Hon. John Trunkey. He was born October 26, 1828, in Vernon Township, Trumbull Co., Ohio, while his mother was visiting a friend of the family. His parents, Francis and Rachael (Fell) Trunkey, removed to the farm in West Salem Township, Mercer Co., Penn., on the Ohio line, where his aged mother still lives, immediately after their marriage. Here he grew up, and received a good common school education. He afterward engaged in teaching, and in 1849 entered the law office of Hon. Samuel Griffith, of Mercer. On September 17, 1851, he was admitted to practice, and the firm of Griffith & Trunkey, formed shortly after the admission to the bar of the junior member, was well known in Western Pennsylvania, and transacted a large share of the legal business in Mercer and the adjoining counties. In 1853 John Trunkey and Agnes Garvin, daughter of the late Hon. William S. Garvin, were married. Three children were born to them, of whom only one is living, William G. Trunkey, the eldest, now a member of the Warren bar.

On the 9th of October, 1866, Mr. Trunkey was elected as the Democratic candidate for president judge in the district then composed of Venango and Mercer Counties. His great personal popularity, and his conceded integrity and ability, enabled him to overcome a large adverse political majority on that occasion. Shortly after his election he chose Franklin as his residence, and that town was his home up to his death. In 1876 he was chosen to preside over the courts of Venango County, which had been erected into a separate judicial district. The following year he was elected, on the Democratic ticket, a justice of the Supreme Court, his term of office commencing in January, 1878. He died in London, England, on June 24, 1888. The following tribute to his memory fully illustrates his high character:

IN MEMORIAM.

At a court of common pleas, held at Mercer, in and for the county of Mercer, Penn., on the second day of July, 1888, the Hon. S. S. Mehard, president judge, presiding; was presented and read the following memorial on the death of Hon. John Trunkey, associate justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, adopted at a meeting of the members of the bar of said county on said second day of July, and which, on motion of Hon. Samuel Griffith, was ordered to be entered upon the record of said court:

GENTLEMEN OF THE BAR: Your committee respectfully report the following minute: Hon. John Trunkey, justice of the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, died in London June 24, 1888. With deep sorrow we enter a minute of this sad event on the records of our court.

Judge Trunkey was born and reared in Mercer County. In 1849 he began the study of law in Mercer, under the tuition of Hon. Samuel Griffith, and was admitted to the bar in 1851. Having formed a partnership with his preceptor he entered upon a large practice. To this he gave zealous attention until called to the bench. In 1866 he was elected president judge of the Twenty-eighth Judicial District, then consisting of Mercer and Venango Counties, but in consequence of the new constitution his district was, in 1874, made to consist of Venango alone, where he at that time resided. He was re-elected to the same position in Venango County, but before he had served a year of his second term he was chosen justice of the supreme court of the State, upon the duties of which he entered in January, 1878. Judge Trunkey was a man of remarkable qualities. He had a clear, strong mind, a calm, noble spirit. His heart was always with the right, but not unduly bitter against wrong. As a lawyer he was high-minded, diligent and able, distinguished at once for his faithfulness to his clients and his fairness to his opponents. As a judge he was not only painstaking, accurate and learned, but clear, broad, upright and just. No influence was so subtle as to deceive his judgment; no interest so great as to turn him from his duty. By his death the State has lost a servant of commanding ability and untiring faithfulness. Mercer County has lost a son who will ever be to her a distinguished honor, and we of this bar have lost a member who was long our companion and always our friend.

To this minute we add assurances of warm sympathy for Judge Trunkey's family in this affliction, and do resolve, as a mark of our sorrow and respect, to attend the funeral in a body.

The secretary is instructed to furnish a copy of this minute to the family of Judge Trunkey, and to the press for publication.

W. MAXWELL,
JOHNSON PEARSON,
S. GRIFFITH,
THOMAS TANNER,

Col. William Maxwell, of Greenville, succeeded Judge Trunkey as president judge of Mercer County. He was appointed in May, 1874, to fill the vacancy caused by the erection of Mercer into a separate judicial district. Judge Maxwell brought to the bench a ripe legal experience, gained through more than forty years' practice. He came to Mercer in February, 1832, and is yet one of the active practitioners of the Mercer bar, being to-day its oldest member, and one of the oldest lawyers in Western Pennsylvania. Judge Maxwell served on the bench until January, 1875, and during his brief term of service was recognized as an able, indefatigable, impartial and dignified judge. Thoroughly versed in the groundwork of legal science, his rulings exhibited careful study and a logical mind.

Judge Maxwell's successor was Arcus McDermitt. He was born in Findley Township, and was a son of Joseph McDermitt, a native of Ireland. His early education was secured at the district school, but he subsequently attended Mercer Academy, where he acquired the rudiments of the Latin and Greek languages. Of this he was somewhat proud, for in his teaching in the South he was required to be able to inform the people that he had studied the classics. He read law in Butler, Penn., under the skillful direction of Charles Sullivan, a prominent attorney of that place, and was admitted to the bar there. He subsequently removed to Mercer, where he was admitted to practice September 1, 1851. He served as treasurer of Mercer County one term. He was the first judge elected under the new constitution, which constituted Mercer County a separate judicial district. He was chosen at the general election of November 6, 1874, and held his position until the date of his death, which occurred in December, 1883, about a year prior to the expiration of his term of office. He was a man of marked ability, and had aspirations to be placed, like his predecessor, upon the supreme bench of the State. The bar of the county passed complimentary resolutions as to his worth and ability.

Judge McDermitt was succeeded on the bench by Samuel S. Mehard, the present incumbent. He was a student under Judge Trunkey, with whom he began, and under whose instructions he was admitted to the bar at Mercer September 18, 1872. Though a comparatively young man, he was appointed by Gov. Pattison as the successor of Judge McDermitt on the 10th of December, 1883, and at the regular election, November 4, 1884, was chosen to preside over the judicial proceedings of the county for a period of ten years. Though his party was in the minority in the county, he was chosen by a combination of Democrats, Prohibitionists and Republicans over Hon. Samuel H. Miller, the regular Republican candidate. Judge Mehard's decisions on the license problem in the county have given him a notoriety beyond the limits of the territory over which he presides. He is recognized as a fair, impartial jurist, and thoroughly in earnest in fulfilling the duties of his high office.

Other judges than those mentioned in the preceding list officiated at times, but only for brief intervals. Among these may be mentioned Isaac G. Gordon, now chief justice of the State, since July 14, 1887. He was a supply at Mercer during the war. After the burning of the court-house, in the spring of 1863, Judge Gordon held sessions in the Union school building. His services, however, did not continue very long.

Glenni W. Schofield, of Warren, Penn., subsequently a distinguished member of Congress, and a prominent official in the treasury department at Washington, also performed supply service at Mercer, in consequence of the division of the district. This occurred prior to 1874, under the old constitution.

It will be seen that the Mercer bench has contributed its share of distinguished men to the State and nation, three of its judges subsequently occupying positions upon the supreme bench of the State, and two of these the chief place.

Associate Judges.—Prior to the adoption of the constitution of 1874 Mercer County had its band of assistants on the bench, taken largely from the ranks of ordinary unofficial life, and known as associate judges. These were well known and reputable men from all parts of the county, the names of whom indicate that they were selected from the substantial families. The following is the list: Alexander Brown, Alexander Wright, William Amberson, James R. Wick, John Mitcheltree, John Findley, Thomas Wilson, John Newell, Thomas S. Cunningham, William Leech, William Waugh, Samuel Kerr, William McKean, Thomas J. Brown, David T. Porter, Joseph Kerr, Robert Patterson, David W. Findley, John Lightner, Milton A. Leech and Richard Carr. Their respective dates of service will be found in Chapter IV, under the head of "Public Officials."

THE BAR.

One of the eminent attorneys admitted to the first court in Mercer, February 16, 1804, was Samuel B. Foster, a younger brother of Alexander W. Foster, under whom he read law. He was a native of West Chester, Penn., where he was born in 1774. He graduated from Princeton College, New Jersey. By a competent member of the Meadville bar he is said to have been a man "possessed of a fine classical education, high legal attainments, and great reasoning power, clear and forcible in argument, and often very eloquent before a jury." He came from West Chester to Meadville as the agent of the Holland Land Company, and subsequently removed to Mercer, where he practiced until the day of his death, March 4, 1831, in his fifty-eighth year. He married Miss Elizabeth Donnell, of Meadville, who became the mother of the following children: William A., married to Maria Hurst, of Meadville, became a merchant at Catlettsburg, Ky.; Imilda, daughter, died at the age of seven; Henry D., a prominent attorney at Greensburg, and member of Congress from the Westmoreland District; Margaret H., married in 1835 to James P. Rogers, of Gallia County, Ohio, who died in 1883. She was born December 10, 1809, and is still living in Mercer, with her son-in-law, Hon. S. H. Miller; Hannah B., married to William M. Stephenson, a prominent attorney of Mercer; Samuel B. died young; Jane Eliza, deceased at the age of twenty-three; Caroline, married to Hon. Samuel Griffith, of Mercer, both of whom are still living, and James A., who died at Salt Lake, at the age of twenty-seven, while serving as quartermaster in the army of the United States. Samuel B. Foster was the first regular attorney that located in Mercer County.

John W. Hunter is the first attorney in the list of those who were admitted at the first court of Mercer, February 16, 1804. He was a resident of Meadville, and a brother-in-law of Samuel B. Foster, the latter having married a sister of Mrs. Hunter. He finally removed to Pittsburgh, where he lived and practiced, but ultimately received an appointment at Washington, where his death occurred. He practiced very little at the Mercer courts.

Joseph Shannon was another of the attorneys admitted at the first court. He lived about three or four miles south of Mercer, on the New Castle road. His wife was Susan Warner, a sister of Mrs. Bevan Pearson. He never had much of a practice, but was treasurer of Mercer County in early days. He died April 16, 1839, aged sixty-nine years. His remains lie in the old graveyard back of the First Presbyterian Church of Mercer.

Alexander W. Foster, an elder brother of Samuel B. Foster, was admitted to practice at the Meadville courts on the 6th of October, 1800. He was a prominent and able lawyer. He was considered a very successful attorney in matters pertaining to real estate. In 1804 he and Roger Alden were principals in the only duel that ever occurred in Crawford County. The hostile meeting took place on the banks of French Creek, about a mile and a half from Meadville. Alden was wounded. Subsequently he removed to Pittsburgh, where he occupied a prominent position at the bar, and where he died in March, 1843. The bar of the city passed resolutions in which they referred to his "long career at the bar as distinguished by profound and varied learning, and endeared by the many virtues of his private life." He had four children, viz.: Alexander W. Jr., an attorney; J. Herron, the projector of the Pittsburgh Dispatch; Francis, subsequently the wife of John Pearson; Garrett, of Mercer, and Hannah, the wife of Gen. Crosman, who became prominent in the regular army.

Cunningham S. Semple was another of the first attorneys. He was a fleshy man, who took the world easy, giving very little attention to legal matters. He was the first postmaster of Mercer, holding the position from 1st of July, 1805, to 1st of July, 1810. He lived on the east side of the diamond, and owned all the land from A. J. McKean's corner north to the alley. He had two children, Henry Harrison, who removed to Tennessee, and a daughter, who became the wife of Samuel Calvin Tait, Esq., the son of Rev. Samuel Tait. Mr. Semple died in Mercer.

Col. Ralph Marlin came from Central Pennsylvania in the spring of 1801 and settled at Meadville. He had been admitted to practice prior to his coming west. He went out as a major in the regular army in War of 1812, and was at Erie during the building of Perry's fleet in 1813. He served in the Legislature from 1815 to 1818, but finally became somewhat dissipated, and about the year 1826 returned to one of the eastern counties. His practice at Mercer was not extensive.

Edward Work was a practitioner at Meadville, and the second postmaster of the village. He ultimately removed to Jamestown, N. Y., where he lived until his death.

Patrick Farrelly was an Irish Catholic who came from Ireland to the United States in 1798, studied law at Lancaster, and coming to Meadville in 1802, was there admitted July 11, 1803, and at Mercer February 16, 1804. He represented his district in the State Legislature and in Congress. He died in Pittsburgh, February 12, 1826, while on his way to Congress, aged fifty-six years. Mr. Farrelly was one of the most prominent, brilliant and successful attorneys of the pioneer bar, and built up a very large practice.

George Selden read law with Hon. Horace Binney, of Philadelphia, and was admitted to the bar in 1817. Two years later he removed to Meadville. He was skilled in legal practice, but allowed his mind to become diverted by a multiplicity of business interests to the injury of his professional practice. He spent about five years in Pittsburgh, but returned to Meadville in 1835, and died shortly afterward. He practiced somewhat in the Mercer courts.

John B. Wallace was a Meadville attorney who did considerable business in Mercer. He was a native of New Jersey. He was a large, well-formed man of majestic mould, a vigorous thinker and an eloquent speaker. He lived in Meadville from 1821 to 1835, during which time he paid his visits to Mercer.

Alexander Addison, a learned and highly accomplished Scotchman, was admitted to practice in the Mercer courts on the 18th of March, 1807. He was a resident of Washington, Penn. Prepared for the ministry, in which he labored for a time at Washington, Penn., he was thoroughly trained in the principles of justice and equity. Having studied law, he was admitted to the bar in 1787. Learned, patriotic, philanthropic, judicial, he labored constantly for the highest good of society, as will be seen by reading his letters, essays, public lectures, addresses and charges to juries. There was in his composition none of the elements of demagoguery. Fearless and impartial, he did his duty as he understood it. His bold and conscientious course in supporting the General Government during the whisky insurrection of 1794 secured for him many personal enemies, who were bent on his ruin. Of course no judicial body would or could convict him. Failing in the courts, his persecutors sought the aid of a partisan Legislature. The House ordered his impeachment, and the Senate convicted him, the sentence being his removal as president judge of the Fifth Judicial District, and perpetual disqualification for holding a judicial office in the State. Says Judge J. W. F. White: "No person can read the report of the trial without feeling that it was a legal farce; that gross injustice was done Judge Addison from the beginning to the end, and that the whole proceeding was a disgrace to the State. The trial took place at Lancaster, where the Legislature sat. The House and Senate refused to give him copies of certain papers, or give assistance in procuring witnesses from Pittsburgh for his defense. The speeches of counsel against him, and the rulings of the Senate on questions raised in the progress of the trial, were characterized by intense partisan feeling. It was not a judicial trial, but a partisan scheme to turn out a political opponent. It resulted in deposing one of the purest, best and ablest judges that ever sat on the bench in Pennsylvania." This trial, which occurred in 1802, crushed the spirits of this good man. He continued, however, to practice in various courts until the time of his death, which occurred in Pittsburgh on the 27th of November, 1807.

Thomas Collins was an attorney at the time, of Pittsburgh, and was admitted at Mercer, May 17, 1804. He subsequently removed to Butler County, where he died. His wife, Sarah Collins, was a daughter of a gentleman in the East, who owned large landed possessions in Butler County. Two of his daughters married Judges McClure and McCandless, respectively. Collins was a good scholar and a man of marked ability.

Steel Semple was a noted attorney and a man of eminent ability—a fine classical scholar. He lived at Pittsburgh, but was admitted to the Mercer bar February 16, 1804. He was addicted to the use of intoxicating drinks, which impaired, somewhat, his great usefulness and power.

John Armstrong was a member of the Pittsburgh bar, admitted at Mercer May 17, 1804, and, like others of his day, rode the circuit of Western Pennsylvania.

James Allison, admitted at Mercer May 17, 1804, was a resident of Beaver for more than half a century, and identified with all the early struggles and improvements of the town and county. He was highly educated, and known throughout his long career as a man of the highest integrity. He was a man of ability, and was from the organization of the county until his retirement from practice one of the acknowledged leaders of the bar. Chief Justice Gibson said he was "the best case lawyer in Pennsylvania." He served in Congress from 1823 to 1825, and was re-elected, but declined to serve, preferring the happiness of domestic life to the strifes of politics. He was the father of the late John Allison, of Greenville, who served both in the State Legislature and in Congress, and who became widely known by the signature he attached to United States bank bills as register of the treasury.

Robert Moore, admitted to the Mercer bar May 17, 1804, was another distinguished member of this group, and a resident of Beaver from 1803 to the time of his death, which occurred January 14, 1831, aged fifty-four years. He was a member of the State Legislature in 1829, and was an exemplary citizen, filling several important trusts with honor to himself and credit to the public. At the time of his death the Beaver Argus contained the following flattering encomium upon him: "As a public servant, he was vigilant, able and successful. As an attorney, he was learned, faithful and honest. As a citizen, he was upright, sociable and esteemed. As a neighbor, he was obliging, attentive and much beloved."

He was an active member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He was the father-in-law of Hon. Daniel Agnew, late chief justice of Pennsylvania, and still an honored resident of Beaver.

Henry Baldwin was, next to Gibson, probably the most powerful and distinguished member of the Mercer court of February, 1804. He was a native of New Haven, Conn., and graduated from Yale College in 1797. He studied law in Philadelphia with Alexander J. Dallas, and was admitted to the bar in that city. Early in the year 1800 he moved from the city of Brotherly Love to Meadville, where he assisted in organizing the first court of the county. About 1804 he removed to Pittsburgh. In 1816 he was elected to Congress, where he served without interruption until 1828. During his Congressional career he was prominent as the champion of domestic manufactures, and participated freely and effectively in the public discussions upon those subjects. He was deeply interested in the iron business, but owing to the financial depression resulting from the War of 1812 failed, as many others did. During the campaign of 1828 he took a deep interest in the election of Jackson to the Presidency. He was an applicant for the position of Secretary of the Treasury, but failing in that he was appointed a member of the supreme bench of the United States.

In 1842 he returned to Meadville, where he continued to reside until the time of his death, which occurred April 21, 1844, while attending court in Philadelphia. While on the bench he published a volume of reports, containing his own decisions in the circuit of Pennsylvania and New Jersey. He was a jovial, generous and high-toned gentleman, an eminent lawyer, a strong, vigorous speaker and an incorruptible judge. He was justly regarded one of the intellectual and legal giants of his day.

William Ayres was a man of great ability and prominence at the bar, and was admitted at Mercer May 17, 1804. He was a resident of Butler, to which place he came from the southeastern part of the State. He was a large, fine-looking man, a bachelor, and noted for his wit. He took an active part in the ejectment suits which were brought in his county, and became quite wealthy. He was elected a member of the Constitutional Convention of 1837, and shared in its deliberations both in Harrisburg and Philadelphia. An incident is related concerning Ayres and Baldwin that illustrates the freedom with which the old-time attorneys perpetrated practical jokes upon each other. Baldwin and some other attorney had informed an innkeeper not to allow Gen. Ayres to have any more whisky, inasmuch as he was unable to control himself. It happened on one occasion that Ayres asked these two gentlemen to drink. The barkeeper set up two glasses, which were taken by Baldwin and his friend, and gave Ayres none, as he had been instructed to do. Ayres saw the trick and accepted the situation gracefully, secretly determining to be even at an early opportunity. In the town was a woman of not most reputable character. Ayres gave her $10 as a gift to go into the court-room that day with a counterfeit bill, and while Baldwin was making a speech to the jury to pass up the aisle, and, handing out the spurious bill, say to him: "The money you gave me is a counterfeit." She did according to contract. Baldwin saw at once that he was caught by his wily attorney friend, and reaching into his pocket drew out a genuine bill and handed it to her.

Judge Maxwell, of Greenville, relates the following incident with much satisfaction: "When I first appeared at the Mercer bar, in March, 1832, I boarded at the Hackney (now Whistler) House, which was then the stopping place for all the attorneys who attended the bar. I was introduced to all the legal gentlemen. Gen. Ayres seemed to take special interest in my case. Said he: 'I had the pleasure of an acquaintance with your father in the East, and esteemed him highly. Now it is important that you start out aright in your practice in this new county. If you will permit it, I shall be most happy to aid you in any way I can.' He then examined my papers, and advised me how to present the cases. He also attached his name in the form of a temporary partnership—Ayres & Maxwell. My cases, some four in number, were won, and I ever afterward had his warmest friendship—a favor I greatly appreciated. The influence of an able and venerable attorney like him was no ordinary affair."

John Bannister Gibson was probably the ablest of the entire number admitted at Mercer in 1804. He was born on the 8th of November, 1780, in Shermans Valley, Cumberland Co., Penn. At the age of eighteen he graduated from Dickinson College, at Carlisle, studied law with Thomas Duncan, and was admitted to the bar of Cumberland County in March, 1803. He first opened a practice at Carlisle, and then removed to Beaver, where he spent several years. His practice at Beaver was not regarded a successful one. He was a man of large dimensions, a regular giant in both physique and intellect. Standing considerably above six feet in height, he was muscular, well-proportioned, full of intellect and benevolence, and indicative of strong character. He was called, by way of derision, "Horse-head Gibson," on account of the height of his head. In his early practice he would, in rising to read a paper, shake and quiver, and his voice would tremble. He was exceedingly fond of the violin, and would spend hours in producing music upon it. It is said that afterward, when he had become chief justice, some of his best decisions were studied out while he was engaged in solacing himself by the strains of this instrument. He was very social at times, and liked his pet associates very much. Among his intimate friends at Beaver was Gen. John Mitchell, formerly of Bridgewater. His practice at Beaver was neither extensive nor lucrative. The people of the county had not yet discovered the mighty genius which subsequently made him the learned judge of the supreme bench. In the Beaver Court records is found the following memorandum:

Elias Milor vs. James Magaw, issue summons wherefore with force and arm he the said James Magaw on the said Elias Minor an assault did make at the county aforesaid, and him did there beat, wound and evilly treat, and other wrongs to him did, to the great damage of the said Elias and against the peace. [Signed] ELIAS MILOR.

To David Johnston, prothonotary.

The bearer says he has not money enough about him to pay for the writ, but if you don't think to trust him I will be accountable for the price of it.

[Signed] JOHN B. GIBSON.

This note of the future chief justice seems to have been satisfactory to the noted prothonotary, and the case was put upon record.

Judge Gibson never looked upon his stay at Beaver with much pride, his practice being made up of petty cases, that annoyed without affording the corresponding remuneration. Hence we need not be surprised at the statement made by him once at a social party, when the question of ages was up for consideration. Like other aged people he was disposed to turn the dial backward a little. Said he: "I am sixty-two." "But," says his friend, "you were twenty-four when you went to Beaver, and you were there five years." "My God," says the old chief, "I hope you are not going to charge me with that."

His success was achieved after he returned to Carlisle. In 1827 he became the successor of Chief Justice Tilghman on the supreme bench, and retained that position until 1851, when, by a change in the Constitution, the judiciary became elective. He was the only member of the bench retained, but only as an associate. Even in a subordinate position "his great learning, venerable character and overshadowing reputation still made him," in the language of Judge Black, "the only chief whom the hearts of the people would know." Versed in the ancient classics, familiar with the whole round of English literature, and thoroughly informed in the science of medicine, he was an oracle in all departments of law, and justly entitled to the following eloquent tribute by Judge Jeremiah Black, which is placed upon the tall marble shaft at Carlisle that marks his final resting place:

In the various knowledge
Which forms the perfect SCHOLAR
He had no superior.
Independent, upright and able,
He had all the highest qualities of a great JUDGE.
In the difficult science of jurisprudence
He mastered every department, Discussed almost every question, and
Touched no subject which he did not adorn.
He won in early manhood,
And retained to the close of a long life,
The AFFECTION of his brethren on the Bench,
The RESPECT of the Bar,
And the CONFIDENCE of the people.

He died in Philadelphia May 3, 1853, in the seventy-third year of his age.

The Hon. John Banks was born in February, 1799, in Juniata County, Penn. His education was received at his father's house, from a private tutor, Rev. Mr. Hutchinson, a Presbyterian minister, who had been a professor in the University of Edinburg, Scotland. Under his tuition he became a proficient scholar in the Latin, Greek and Hebrew languages. He read law with Mr. Anderson, the leading attorney at Lewistown, then the county seat of Juniata, commencing in the year 1816. In 1819 he removed to Mercer, where he opened an office, and at once entered into a large and lucrative practice. He was first elected to Congress in 1830, and for two terms subsequently. The last year of his service he resigned to accept from Gov. Ritner the judgeship of the district embracing Berks, Lehigh and Northampton Counties. He served upon the bench eleven years. He was then nominated by the Whigs as their candidate for governor, but was defeated. He was elected State treasurer, but refused to serve longer than one year. He was offered by President Taylor a foreign mission, either to France or England, but declined the position. After his retirement from political life, he devoted himself to the legal profession in Reading until the time of his death, April 3, 1864. He was married in 1822 to Katherine Keiser, of Lewistown, Penn. His wife and two children, son and daughter, still survive him at their home in Reading.

Among the many bright attorneys who stood conspicuous at the Mercer bar it is highly proper to place John J. Pearson, the late honored ex-judge of the Dauphin and Lebanon County Court at Harrisburg, where he died in the spring of 1888. John J. Pearson, the son of Bevan and Anna (Warner) Pearson, was born in Delaware County on October 25, 1800. His paternal grandfather, John Pearson, was of English descent, the family having hailed from Cheshire at an early period. When John was five years of age he removed with his parents to Mercer County, where he received the best education the schools of the new county afforded. He studied law under the instruction of Hon. John Banks, and was admitted to the bar of Mercer County in August, 1822. He practiced law in Mercer and adjoining counties, and was a leader in all political, business and philanthropic movements. In 1849 he was appointed by Gov. William F. Johnson to the office of president judge of the Twelfth Judicial District, composed of the counties of Dauphin and Lebanon. The position he held for a period of thirty-three years, his term expiring in January, 1882. At the end of every judicial term he was re-elected by a unanimous vote of the people, without opposition. During his residence in Mercer he was twice elected to office, first to the Congress of the United States, for the counties of Beaver and Mercer, 1835-36, afterward to the Senate of Pennsylvania for the same counties in 1837, three years of which term were spent as chairman of the judiciary committee. Mr. Pearson married twice, first to Ellen, only daughter of Gen. Samuel Hays, of Venango County, and next to Mary Harris Briggs, daughter of Joseph and Caroline Briggs, granddaughter of Gen. John Andre Hanna, and great-granddaughter of John Harris, the founder of Harrisburg. He was always an old line Whig, until 1856, when he joined the ranks of the newly formed Republican party, and was identified with it up to his death. His religious heritage was that of the Quakers, but though not a member, he attended Presbyterian services.

Thomas Scott Cunningham, one of Mercer County's prominent men, was born in Washington, Washington Co., Penn., on March 30, 1790. His father, Alexander Cunningham, was a native of Ireland; his mother, Elizabeth (Scott) Cunningham, a citizen of Washington County. He spent his early days in Washington County, and graduated from the Washington College. He studied law in his native town, and was also admitted to the bar at that place. He came to Mercer, and was admitted to the bar of the county on November 17, 1813, when in his twenty-fourth year. On April 7, 1824, he married Miss Matilda Cook, of Washington County, and his subsequent life was spent in Mercer, except when engaged in official life at the State capital. He was a man of fine legal attainments, but he had not the opportunity to develop his powers fully in his chosen calling, for he soon entered political life, and was greatly honored by his constituents. He was, as will be seen by reference to the list of State assemblymen and senators, a member of both branches of the State Legislature, and served with great ability as speaker of the Senate. While in the Legislature he introduced a bill for the complete abolition of the laws of imprisonment for debt. He received for this humane measure much praise from the poor. His support of the bank measure in the Legislature, in opposition to his (Democratic) party, produced a bitter antagonism, from which he never fully recovered. From 1836 forward he was identified with the Whig party. He twice held the position of postmaster of Mercer—from October 1, 1817, to March 22, 1822, and from January 22, 1844, to January 20, 1845. He was associate judge for a period commencing February 15, 1849.

He had the following children, viz.: Alexander, Presbyterian minister (deceased); Grace Sarah, married David Findley (deceased); Elizabeth, married Rev. William Findley, still living as his widow at New Castle; Dorcas, Jane and John (all deceased), and Thomas Scott, a merchant in Waynesboro, Penn.

Gen. Cunningham, as he was familiarly called, was a generous, kind-hearted man, possessing many of the elements of the successful politician and man of the world. He was reared in the Associate Church, but never made a public profession of religion. He died at the home of his daughter, Mrs. Grace S. Findley, in Mercer, on March 28, 1855, aged sixty-four years. His remains are moldering in the old grave-yard attached to the First Presbyterian Church.

Robert C. Rankin was another early member of the Mercer bar. The Mercer Whig of January 29, 1855, thus speaks of him: "It is with feelings of deep sorrow that we chronicle the death of Robert C. Rankin, Esq. He died on the morning of Monday, the 22d inst., after a severe illness of several weeks' continuance, at the age of about forty years. Col. Rankin has been a resident of Mercer since his youth, and his social disposition, his kindness of heart and gentlemanly bearing had endeared him to all of our citizens. He graduated with honor at Washington College, Penn., in the class of 1838, and, while we were there several years afterward, we often heard those who had known him, and had associated with him, speak in the highest terms of his attainments and abilities. After devoting two years to the study of law he was, in December, 1840, admitted to practice in the courts of this county, since which time he has been diligently and successfully engaged in his profession. He was a true friend, a well-read lawyer, and endowed with abilities of no common order. In his death society has lost a useful and energetic citizen, the bar an ornament, and his family a son and brother whom they esteemed and loved and cherished. When he had attained the meridian of life, when by his industry, talents and energy he had gained a competency, and was looking forward with bright hopes to the future, death, the destroyer, comes and strikes deep the fatal shaft, and the strong man lies low."

One of the early and prominent attorneys of the Mercer bar was Samuel Holstein. He was a native of Montgomery County, Penn., but came to Mercer County as an attorney in 1826. In February, 1830, he was commissioned by Gov. Wolf as register and recorder of the county, which position he held during the continuance of the governor's term. Retiring from that office, Mr. Holstein formed a successful partnership with William M. Stephenson. The new firm was retained in many of the most important cases of the county. In 1854 he removed to Neshannock Falls, and engaged in farming and manufacturing. He had a clear and well balanced mind, and acquired a competence. He died in New Castle May 20, 1869, in the sixty-ninth year of his age.

William M. Stephenson, one of the leading members of the Mercer County bar, was born in what is now known as Worth Township, Mercer County, in the year 1808. His father, John Stephenson, was, at the age of ten years, brought to this country by his father, James, about the close of the Revolution. The family remained in Northumberland County, Penn., until this region was opened up to settlers. William's mother was Jane Mortimer, a niece of the William Mortimer who was one of the trustees, with William McMillan and John Findley, to sell the lots of the borough of Mercer to raise the funds with which to build the first jail and court-house. Mr. Stephenson received a good classical education from a well-known and successful educator, Rev. John Gamble, the father of Dr. Gamble, of Jamestown. Mr. Gamble taught academies in Jamestown and Greenville, and enrolled among his pupils some of the brightest men of the county. William first studied medicine, then theology, but finally entered the law office of John J. Pearson. After having served a term as register and recorder, and having been admitted to the bar in 1836, he married Hannah B., daughter of Samuel B. Foster, one of the prominent attorneys at the organization of the county. His natural talents, combined with his studious habits and purity of life, placed him among the leaders of the bar in this and the adjoining counties, where he continued to practice until his death in 1861. In politics he was an outspoken abolitionist, and his house was one of the stations on the "Underground Railroad." He was in 1857 the originator of the Mercer County Dispatch, to represent the anti-slavery element of the new Republican party, he furnishing the money to four young men (one of them his son, S. B. Stephenson), and William F. Clark, Sr., the latter being the political editor. The Union school building of Mercer is a monument to his labors, being built by him in the face of the most determined opposition, and even at the end of a lawsuit. He left two sons, S. B. and John M., both of whom were in the army at the time of his death. The former is still living in Mercer, where he pursues the duties of a civil engineer. The other died in Mercer in the year 1870, leaving two children. The most of Mr. Stephenson's friends and clients have gone to join the ranks of the great silent majority, but some remain to cherish his memory with love and respect.

Hon. William Stewart. At a meeting of the bench and bar, held in the court-house October 20, 1876, of which Hon. L. L. McGuffin, of Lawrence County, was president, and James A. Stranahan, secretary, a committee, consisting of William Maxwell, Samuel Griffith, Johnson Pearson, James A. Stranahan, R. M. De France, S. H. Miller and A. D. Gillespie, was appointed to prepare resolutions bearing upon the death of Hon. William Stewart. On October 23 the committee reported the following, which was unanimously adopted: "Once more have we been called upon to assist in laying away the remains of a distinguished member of our profession, and an honored and respected citizen. On the 17th of October, 1876, after a protracted illness of over three years, Hon. William Stewart peacefully departed from the land of the dying and entered the land of the living. He was born in Mercer, Mercer Co., Penn., on the 16th day of September, 1810. He had an academic education, and having read law with Judge Banks, at that time a practicing attorney of this place, he was admitted to the bar in 1832. He first opened a law office in Brookville, Jefferson Co., Penn., where he remained but a short time, removing thence to Franklin, Venango Co., Penn., where he remained for two years, and thence to Mercer, the place of his birth and education and the home of his relatives and acquaintances, entering the office of Hon. John J. Pearson. During his long, brilliant and active public career he filled the offices of State senator, and represented the district composed of Mercer, Lawrence, Beaver and Butler Counties in the 34th and 35th Congresses of the United States. As an attorney and jurist Mr. Stewart early took rank with his associates, and his native ability, comprehensive mind and active temperament, supplemented by his courteous and dignified bearing toward the Court and his brethren of the bar, soon placed him at the head of his profession. Always zealous of his honor and conscientious in the discharge of his professional duties, his promise once pledged to his opponent was regarded as sacred. The amenities which to-day so strongly mark the professional intercourse of the members of the bar, one with another, and with the Court, are largely due to his example and practice. As a citizen he was public spirited and benevolent, earnestly patriotic, and uncompromisingly devoted to the perpetuity and unity of his country. Socially, he was kind, considerate and attentive to acquaintances, and generous and loving to friends.

"In view, therefore, of the distinguished character, the moral and social virtues, the honored name and the legal attainments which so signally characterized the life and career of William Stewart, be it

"Resolved, That the members of the bar hereby bear testimony to his well-earned reputation for purity of life, honesty of purpose, and ability as a jurist." * * *

J. H. Robinson, attorney, editor and politician, was one of the active and reputable citizens of Mercer, who, cut off in the prime of life, had endeared himself to all classes of his fellow countrymen as a patriotic citizen, an honorable business man and a philanthropic neighbor. He was born May 29, 1826, and died March 7, 1872, in his forty-sixth year. His early education was secured in Mercer, and subsequently at Washington College, from which he graduated with honor in 1849. In 1851 he began the study of law under Hon. William Stewart, and was admitted to the bar August 10, 1853. He served one term as district attorney by election, and one year by appointment. In 1854 he became the editor of the Mercer Whig, which position he held until 1863. Its columns during that period attest the ability and loyalty with which he maintained the principles of his party. He was a cogent writer, as was shown by the editorial and forensic articles which graced the pages of his journal. In 1860 he was elected to the position of State senator, and held the place for four years of the most important part of our national history. He was a genuine supporter of the national and State administrations during those trying times. Hon. William Stewart once said of Mr. Robinson, "that he was not surpassed as a lawyer by any member of the Mercer or any other bar within his knowledge."

We will briefly mention a few more of those who have been connected with the bar, none of whom are now living in Mercer County except Judge William Waugh, of Greenville. He was admitted to practice in 1842, but after a few years gave up the profession.

B. F. Baskin, a native of Selins Grove, Union Co., Penn., was one of the well-known members of the bar. He studied law in Selins Grove, came to Mercer about 1844, was elected district attorney in 1847, and served one term. Some years afterward he removed from Mercer to Greenville, and followed his profession there and at Meadville up to his death, at Greenville, July 8, 1862.

George W. Carskadden was engaged in the law at Greenville from his admission, in 1845, until his death September 18, 1884.

James Galloway was admitted in 1846, and practiced in Mercer until the California gold excitement, when he went to the Pacific slope. He afterward attained considerable prominence in that State.

David B. Hays came from Franklin to Mercer in the forties, and formed a partnership with John J. Pearson. The latter was appointed president judge, and Hays continued in practice alone until his death a few years afterward.

William L. Christy was one of the first lawyers to open an office in Greenville. He did not do very much business, and finally went West and died.

A. H. Snyder, admitted in 1849, was a brother-in-law and partner of William Stewart, and one of the leading members of the bar. He went into the war as captain of Company A, One Hundred and Thirty-ninth Pennsylvania Volunteers, and was killed in the Wilderness May 5, 1864. He then held the rank of major, and was recognized as a gallant officer.

George W. Decamp was also admitted in 1849, practiced some years in Mercer, and then removed to Erie. From there he went to Pittsburgh, and thence to Kansas.

Archibald Cook began to practice in Mercer in 1853, but soon removed to Washington, D. C.

Robert M. DeFrance practiced in Mercer from his admission, in 1853, up to his death.

Robert Taylor commenced legal practice in Mercer in 1853, and continued in the profession until entering the ministry of the Presbyterian Church.

Thomas Zuver was admitted in 1853, but finally removed from Mercer to Venango County.

William G. Rose was admitted in 1855, and after a few years' practice in Mercer went to Cleveland, Ohio. He has become prominent in the social and political interests of that city and State; has served as mayor of Cleveland, and been once the popular Republican candidate for lieutenant-governor.

William Scott practiced a few years in Mercer, commencing in 1855, and Charles A. Wood had an office in Greenville for a time before the Rebellion. Both went west to "grow up with the country."

Died, July 23, 1870, H. H. Foster, in the thirty-eighth year of his age. At a meeting of the bar, of which Hon. William Stewart was chairman, and Arcus McDermitt, secretary, a committee on resolutions, consisting of J. H. Robinson, Arcus McDermitt, R. M. DeFrance, Johnson Pearson and D. L. Hoge, declared that "in his death the bar had lost one of its ablest members, and the community one of its most useful citizens. He was a good lawyer, a faithful friend, and an honest man." He was admitted to practice in 1855. Mr. Garvin says of him: "Universally esteemed for his social qualities and kindness of heart, respected for his genius and great ability as a member of the bar, he had a grasp on the affections of our people that will hold him long in remembrance. It is said, with truth, that lawyers are not born such, but Mr. Foster came so near being so as to endanger the standing of this long admitted axiom. Correct, ready, brilliant in his conceptions, and always cool and collected, his legal brethren have ever felt proud of his abilities, and claimed him as a great ornament to their association."

Died, James B. White, Esq., August 18, 1870, at New Wilmington. He was a member of the Mercer bar, which body passed a series of resolutions declaring in one that in his death "the bar of Mercer has lost an able and honorable member, whose usefulness and fame was limited only by his unfortunate physical weakness, and whose integrity, sincerity and ability were recognized by all with whom he came in contact." He had a genial nature, philosophic mind, refined wit and kindness of heart, which endeared him to his associates.

The present bar of Mercer County has some able representatives. In the ranks of older members are found Judge William Maxwell, of Greenville, the Nestor of the bar. He has been in the county continuously since March, 1832.

A. D. Gillespie, of Greenville, is likewise an old practitioner, and is still in the active field. Full sketches of these veterans will be found in the biographical chapter of Greenville.

At Mercer there are several representatives of the older class—Hon. Samuel Griffith, Hon. Johnson Pearson and Hon. Samuel R. Mason. They have long stood before the public in the capacity of attorneys and citizens and officials. Their names have been connected with the public movements of the county. Their personal sketches are not repeated here, but will be found in the biographical department.

The bar of the county at the present time embraces the following attorneys:

Mercer.—Johnson Pearson, admitted in 1843; Samuel Griffith, June 25, 1846; S. R. Mason, March 23, 1853; Beriah Magoffin, April, 1862; James A. Stranahan, April 20, 1864; J. G. Elliott, May 15, 1865; W. A. McCormick, January, 1866; S. B. Stephenson, November, 1867; J. G. White, February 22, 1870; Samuel H. Miller, 1871; S. S. Mehard, September 18, 1872; S. F.

Thompson, September 18, 1872; A. B. Thompson, February 17, 1873; J. R. W. Baker, February 17, 1873; H. H. Zeigler, February 17, 1873; A. H. McElrath, 1873; John W. Bell, May, 1874; S. B. Griffith, March, 1876; H. B. Bowser, April 17, 1876; Q. A. Gordon, May 22, 1876; Robert A. Stewart, 1876; J. J. Alexander, August 18, 1876; Samuel Redmond, April 8, 1878; W. H. Cochran, April 12, 1880; William Miller, June 15, 1882; W. W. Moore, June 15, 1882; G. W. McBride, August 12, 1882; J. C. Miller, February 14, 1884; J. D. Emery, January 5, 1885; Henry Hall, January 6, 1886, and L. Bingham, June 13, 1887.

Greenville.—William Maxwell, September, 1831; A. D. Gillespie, December 17, 1845; W. H. Sheakley, 1860; Lester Kuder, 1866; A. F. Henlein, June 27, 1874; E. P. Gillespie, August 18, 1874; John W. Vosler, April 25, 1876; E. S. Templeton, 1877; D. P. Packard, January, 1885, and A. J. Gillespie, December 15, 1886.

Sharon.—Joseph N. McClure, January 16, 1866; Thomas Tanner, November, 1868; William C. Haus, May, 1874; John McClure, September, 1874; John H. Elliott, January, 1877; W. W. Shilling, June, 1882, and A. W. Williams, June 10, 1884.

THE majority of the first settlers of Mercer County were Irish Presbyterians, or descendants of that race, and hence had much to do in shaping the religious tendencies and sentiment of the community. The early settlers prized highly their church and school privileges, and hence the effort made to establish both secular and religious instruction. An examination of the facts shows clearly that schools and churches were about simultaneous in their establishment, and rightfully, too. The school-house often became the church edifice, for a time, and vice versa. The following history of the Presbyterian Churches up to 1875 is sketched, in a general way, by Mr. Garvin, whose account is inserted verbatim. Fuller sketches of the congregations will be found in the boroughs and townships.

Presbyterian Churches.—In the very first settlement of Mercer County the Presbyterians took active measures to plant their churches within its limits, probably with a view to a future occupancy of the field, but certainly with a strong desire to carry the Gospel of Christ into every family that was seeking to build up a home in the wilderness. It is presumed that every settlement was visited by their young missionaries before the close of the year 1800, in most of which church organizations were formed, and in several pastors installed. Before roads were cut out, or streams bridged, the missionary, on horseback, was following the blazed paths from settlement to settlement, and from house to house, and where a few could be got together, delivering his message with such sincerity and earnestness as to make deep and lasting impressions on the hearers. These young preachers came mostly from Washington County and from the theological school of Dr. John McMillan, a log-cabin institution that through its graduates has exercised a powerful influence for good in Mercer and adjoining counties. The Revs. Tait, Wick, Lee, Satterfield, Wood, Riggs, Matthews and Condit, who were severally called to the pastorates of different congregations in Mercer County, all studied theology with Dr. McMillan.

It is difficult now to determine which was the first organization in the county. In Eaton's History of the Presbytery of Erie, that of Fairfield is mentioned as having occurred in September, 1799, the first elders being Daniel Axtell, David Condit and Ithiel Dodd, and a faithful search has failed to discover any prior organization. The settlement in this neighborhood, far and near, was familiarly known as the "Ten Milers," and was considered remarkable for its fervid and consistent piety, although outsiders charged it with being straight-laced and a little over plumb. These settlers were all pretty much from Washington County, and came to Mercer County together, reaching their destination on a Saturday evening. The next morning their first prayer-meeting was held in the woods, a sermon read, and the children catechized. This was in 1797 or 1798. In 1799 they were visited by Elisha McCurdy and Joseph Stockton, two of the Presbyterian missionaries that were traversing the Northwest, and by them organized into a church. Rev. William Wylie was their first pastor, staying with them from April, 1802, to December, 1804. Their next ordained pastor was Rev. Cyrus Riggs, who was installed in 1807, and released in 1812. In 1814 Ira Condit was installed pastor, holding the position to his death in 1836. The pastorate of the Rev. David Waggoner followed, commencing in 1838, and ending in 1853; and then that of the Rev. James Shields, who was ordained in 1855 and released in 1864.

Neshannock was organized about 1800, at least the Rev. William Wick was installed pastor in that year, in connection with Hopewell. He was succeeded in 1802 by the Rev. James Satterfield. The first elders were William Jackson, Thomas Scott and Robert Stevenson. From 1813 to 1815 Rev. William Matthews officiated as its pastor. In 1816 Rev. William Wood became its pastor, continuing in the charge until 1837, when he was succeeded by Rev. Absalom McCready, who was pastor when Neshannock was cut off into Lawrence County.

Hopewell was organized about the same time as Neshannock, with the same pastor, who continued with it until his death in 1815. Rev. William Wood succeeded Mr. Wick in 1816, continuing until 1828, when he removed to Ohio, dying at Utica, Licking County, in 1839. The next pastor was Rev. William Nesbit, who was released in 1840. When the county was divided, in 1849, Rev. William Webber was pastor.

Cool Spring was organized in 1800, with Rev. Samuel Tait as pastor. In 1813 this organization seems to have been suspended, the members thereof consenting to worship at Mercer, where Mr. Tait was also pastor. This arrangement continued until 1827, when the Cool Spring people determined on a reorganization, and two years after the Rev. Ira Condit was installed pastor. His death occurred in 1836. He was followed by Rev. David Waggoner, and he again by Rev. James G. Wilson, whose pastorate continued until 1850. The present pastor (1875), John W. McCune, was installed in 1852, and at this writing has been nearly a quarter of a century the pastor of the Cool Spring congregation.

Mr. Tait was the first pastor of Salem, the organization taking place in 1800. When a church was organized in Mercer, in 1804, Salem was relinquished by him until the consolidation of Cool Spring and Mercer, in 1813, when he again became the pastor of Salem, giving it half of his time until the year 1826, when he gave it up. In 1828 Rev. James Alexander became the installed pastor, in connection with Greenville and Big Bend, remaining with it until 1834. In 1836 Rev. James G. Wilson was installed, in connection with Greenville, remaining with it until 1851. From this time until about 1860 it was supplied by Revs. Callen, Johnson, Coulter, Grier and others, when Rev. John W. McCune became its pastor, for one-third his time, in connection with Cool Spring.

Rev. Alexander Cook was the first pastor of Lower Neshannock (now New Castle), being installed in 1803. He was followed by Rev. Robert T. Sample, in 1810, and he by Rev. Wells Bushnell in 1839, during whose pastorate the division of the county occurred.

Plain Grove is claimed to have been organized before 1800. Its first pastor was Rev. William Wood, installed in 1802, its elders being William McNeel and Joseph Campbell. Mr. Wood was succeeded by Rev. John Munson in 1818, and he by Rev. R. B. Walker, in 1839, who was most probably the pastor when this church was cut off into Lawrence County, ten years after.

Centre was organized about the same time as Plain Grove, its first pastor being also Mr. Wood, succeeded by Mr. Munson in 1818, who resigned his charge in 1859, after a pastorate of forty-one years. In 1861 the Rev. W. W. McKinney was installed pastor, followed by Rev. S. A. Hughes in 1866.

The First Presbyterian Church of Mercer was organized in 1804, with Rev. Samuel Tait as its pastor, who remained such until his death in 1841. Rev. Joseph T. Smith then became pastor, relinquishing the post in 1849, to enable him to accept a call in the city of Baltimore. Rev. Robert S. Morton succeeded him in 1851, and remained one year. Rev. Robert T. Sample followed, but was released in 1856. The Rev. John R. Findley was installed pastor in 1857, and continued until 1874, when he relinquished the post to accept a call at Rock Island, on the Mississippi. This congregation has since been supplied by Revs. H. R. Van Pelt, J. F. Stonecipher and J. V. Stockton.

The Second Presbyterian Church at Mercer was a colony from the first church, organized in 1863, with Elias Alexander, Joseph Fleming, and R. M. J. Zahniser as elders. A disagreement with the pastor of the first church, Mr. Findley, in relation to the civil war then raging, rendering their position somewhat uncomfortable, they concluded to colonize and form a new congregation. Their first pastor was Rev. William M. Robinson, installed in 1864. He remained with them until May, 1872, when he relinquished his charge. Rev. B. M. Kerr was installed in September, 1872.

Rocky Spring had Rev. Robert Lee for its first and only Presbyterian pastor, installed in 1801, in connection with Amity. About 1807, when Mr. Lee was released from both these charges, it connected itself with the Associate (seceders) Presbyterian organization.

Amity, the congregation which was made up from both Mercer and Venango Counties, appears to have had no regular pastor from the resignation of Mr. Lee until 1825, when Rev. Ira Condit was installed. He continued until 1829. In 1832 Rev. Robert Glenn was installed pastor, who was released in 1850. The next was Rev. Mead Satterfield, who died while in this charge in 1856. The next was Rev. John F. Boyd, who was succeeded in 1866 by Rev. W. D. Patton.

Upper Sandy, now Georgetown, claims to have been organized in 1799, by Revs. McCurdy and Stockton, with William Byers and Alex. McCracken for elders. The first pastor was Rev. William Wylie, installed in 1802 and released in 1804; after this it was supplied occasionally by Mr. Stockton, pastor at Meadville, and others, for a time, when finally the organization ceased to exist. In 1814 a re-organization was effected, taking the name of Georgetown, Mr. Condit becoming pastor in connection with Fairfield. His death occurred in 1836. Mr. Waggoner was the next pastor, installed in 1838 and released in 1853. Rev. James M. Shields followed, being installed in 1855 and released in 1864. The same year Mr. Waggoner was re-installed for two-thirds of his time, Greenfield, in Crawford County, taking the other third.

Moorfield had but one pastor, Rev. James Satterfield, who was installed in 1802, in connection with Neshannock. In 1834 he no longer found himself able to perform the active duties of the ministry, and as churches had recently sprung up in the villages around (Sharon, Middlesex and Clarksville), the membership of Moorfield gradually became absorbed in them, while the old organization was permitted to die out. The cemetery attached to it is controlled by a corporation. In it were deposited the remains of its only pastor, and many of the pioneers, as well as those of the Hon. M. C. Trout.

Sandy Lake was organized in 1835, with Alexander Brown, Homer Bailey and Eli Butler for elders. Its first pastor was Rev. Robert Glenn, succeeded by Mr. McCune in 1852, and three years afterward by Rev. John G. Condit, and he again, in 1857, by Rev. John Rice.

Greenville was organized in 1825, with Rev. James Alexander for its first pastor, installed in 1828 and released in 1834. The place was next filled by Rev. J. G. Wilson, who retired in 1842. Next, Rev. Henry Webber, who remained with it but two years. The next regular pastor was Rev. J. H. Callen, installed in 1848 and released in 1852. He was followed by Rev. David Grier, installed in 1854 and released in 1859. The next was Rev. A. C. Junkin, installed in 1862 and released in 1867. Then came Rev. J. E. Wright, 1869-74, and B. C. Critchlow, installed in 1875.

Big Bend was organized about the same time as Greenville, with the same pastor, Mr. Alexander. But after his severance from it, in 1834, it seems to have become extinct, its members most likely becoming absorbed in the Mercer and Clarksville churches.

Milledgeville was organized in 1856, being dependent on supplies. In 1866, July 11, Rev. Henry B. Lamb was installed pastor, and released May 9 in the following year.

The United Presbyterian Church, of Greenville, is the successor of the old seceder organization, established by Rev. Daniel McLean in 1802. He was pastor until 1840, and was succeeded by his son, Rev. D. H. A. McLean, D. D., now of Rochester, Penn., who has furnished us a copy of a paper which accompanied the first call for pastoral services received by his father. It bears date December 28th, 1801. At that time there was a preaching station at "Shank's Ford," which subsequently became the Salem Associate Church, and afterwards the United Presbyterian Church of Greenville. The following is the paper, with the signatures attached:

We, the undernamed subscribers, members of the Shenango and Sandy congregations, pray that this Reverend Presbytery would sustain our call and put it into the hand of the candidate, for whom it was brought forward, and adopt every legal measure for hastening his settlement among us, as our case needs the greatest attention. The enemies of Christ's Cross are numerous in the place where God in his providence has cast our lot, and we are deprived of what we conceive a pure dispensation of gospel ordinance dispensed among us in a stated way, all which we conceive very distressing to those who desire to follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth.

The sum we engage to pay annually for the labors of the Rev. Daniel McLean is one hundred and thirty-five pounds, Pennsylvania currency. As witness our hands this 28th day of December, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and one.

David Nelson, elder; Joseph Work, elder; Thomas Ewing, elder; Hugh Fletcher, elder; A. Dumars, Robert Bean, Jonathan Culbert, David Beatty, John Snodgrass, Isaac Mair, William Snodgrass, Benjamin Snodgrass, Quinten Brooks, William Brooks, Francis Mossman, John Brown, Jr., Thomas Gillis, William H. Mossman, John Gillis, George McCord, James Nelson, Matthew McElhaney, David McConaughy, Robert McConaughy, James McElhaney, John Brooks, Hugh Richardson, Alexander Caldwell, Moses Logan, Thomas Mento, John Work, John Cook, John Minter, William Bean, Thomas Bean, Hugh Brown, Robert Story, John Moreland, Isaac Moreland, James Wilson, Thomas Lochrey, Hamilton Armor, Hugh Lackey.

The spelling of some of the names is not in harmony with the present orthography, and we have taken the liberty of changing it. Thomas Ewing was the grandfather of Judge Ewing, of Pittsburgh. Alexander Dumars was the grandfather of A. D. Gillespie, of Greenville. Robert, William and Thomas Bean were the forefathers of the Bean family, still in this county. Hugh Fletcher was the grandfather of O. N. Fletcher, of Greenville. David Beatty was the grandfather of James W. and Henry W. Beatty, of Salem and Otter Creek Townships, respectively. John, William and Benjamin Snodgrass were the ancestors of the Snodgrass families around Jamestown and Greenville. William H. and Francis Mossman were pioneers of West Salem Township, on the Ohio line, and many of their descendants are residents of the county. Thomas and John Gillis were also pioneers of West Salem, where some of the family still live. James Nelson was an early settler of West Salem, and some of his descendants are residents thereof. Matthew McElhaney lived in Crawford County, and was the grandfather of Dr. M. J. McElhaney, of Greenville. James McElhaney was the father of James and Charles S. McElhaney, of West Salem. Hugh Brown was a pioneer near Greenville, and the grandfather of Hon. James C. Brown, of the Advance-Argus, and John Brown, Jr., was his son. John and Isaac Moreland were early settlers of Greene Township, near Jamestown, and the forefathers of the family of that name, still living there. A few of the remaining signers of the call lived in Mercer County, but the majority were residents of Crawford.

Methodist Church.—Methodism made its appearance in the county about the close of the last century. The pioneer was, doubtless, Rev. R. R. Roberts, afterward so well known as Bishop Roberts. He was born in Frederick County, Md., August 2, 1778. In 1785 he removed with his father to Westmoreland County, Penn., where he continued to reside until the spring of 1796, when, at the age of eighteen, in company with his brother Thomas and three other young men of his neighborhood, he started to make his fortune in a yet newer country. The point finally reached was the tract lying north of what is now called Leech's Corners, where he began a settlement by erecting a log cabin. In the spring of 1797 Thomas and Lewis Roberts, in company with Rev. Jacob Gurwell, a local Methodist preacher, made their appearance in the settlement, and continued to share its hardships. The privations of those pioneers make an interesting narrative, but cannot be given here. This is the introduction of Methodism into Mercer County.

Mr. Roberts began to preach in 1801, and subsequently became famous in his church. In the year 1798 the parents of Mr. Roberts moved to the neighborhood in which he had settled. They were soon followed by the Stevensons, the Walkers, the McLeans, the Dumars, etc., all of whom were members of the Methodist Church. The two Irish local preachers, Jacob Gurwell and Thomas McClelland, settled in the same district, and began their work by preaching in log cabins and groves and wherever people could be assembled to hear them. The class formed at that time, of which R. R. Roberts was leader, became the nucleus of Methodism in the Shenango Valley. It included R. R. Roberts, Thomas McClelland and wife, James Stevenson and wife, William Lindsey and wife, Lewis Roberts and wife, John Honnell and wife, John McGranahan and wife, William McGranahan and wife, John Caughey and wife, John Rodgers and wife, William McLean and wife, William Stewart and Nancy Wilson. A year or two later the inflowing tide of inhabitants extended southward and established what was known as the South class, embracing George McFetridge and wife, Thomas Dumars and wife, John Waters and wife, Rev. Jacob Gurwell and wife, Bradson Gibbons and wife, Morris Dunlavy and wife, William Gurwell and wife, and in 1802 John Leech and wife; some twenty-two all told.

Mr. Roberts had, in February, 1799, been married in Ligonier to Miss Elizabeth Oldham, of York County. She, in company with her husband and Lewis Roberts, about two weeks after marriage, rode on horseback through the woods to their new home in the Shenango Valley. She was mounted on a good horse, with cooking utensils and a blanket strapped to her saddle. As they were going through a dense forest, her brother-in-law being ahead with the provisions, she and her husband were compelled to stop over night in the woods. Building a fire, they lay under their blankets, but were not permitted to sleep on account of the howling of the fierce wolves about them. Thus they spent the supperless night.

At this date this whole region was in the Baltimore Conference. At its session held May 1, 1801, it made the following appointments: Pittsburgh District, Thornton Fleming, P. E.; Erie Circuit, James Quinn; Shenango, Joseph Shane. The Pittsburgh District embraced eight circuits, covering a vast territory in the present West Virginia, Erie and Pittsburgh Conferences. The Erie and Shenango Circuits embraced the country west of the Allegheny, between Lake Erie and the Ohio, except the Shenango Circuit, which was the southern one, and embraced the valley by that name. The compensation in those days was not enormous. From 1800 to 1816 it was as follows:

1. The annual salary of the traveling preachers shall be $80 and their traveling expenses.
2. The annual allowance of the wives of the traveling preachers shall be $80.
3. Each child of a traveling preacher shall be allowed $16 annually to the age of seven years, and $24 annually from seven to fourteen years; nevertheless, this rule shall not apply to the children of preachers whose families are provided for by other means in their circuit respectively.

In 1817 Shenango Circuit was divided into Erie and Beaver Circuits. Its name then disappears from the records. Its preachers were as follows: P. B. Davis, 1800; Joseph Shane, 1801; Asa Shinn, 1802; George Askins, 1803; Joseph Hall, 1804; R. R. Roberts, 1805; James Reed, 1806; James Watts, Thomas Church, 1807; James Charles, 1808; Jacob McDowell, Eli Towne, 1809; James Watts, 1810; Abel Robinson, 1811; James Watts, William Knox, 1812; Jacob Gurwell, 1813; John Elliott, 1814; J. Summerville, 1815; R. C. Hatton, 1816. The history of individual congregations will be found in other portions of this volume, to which the reader is referred for information on the local growth of Methodism.

Other Churches.—The Baptists made their first efforts in the county about the beginning of the century. The records show an organization at Sharon in 1804. The Lutherans, Disciples, Reformed, Episcopalians, Congregationalists, Catholics, Evangelicals, United Brethren and other religious organizations will be found reported in their proper places in the sketches of boroughs and townships. They all came later than the Presbyterians and Methodists, but have succeeded in establishing flourishing congregations and erecting comfortable and commodious houses of worship.

Mormonism.—An attempt was once made to establish Mormonism in this county. On the 8th of February, 1832, two Mormon missionaries called at the house of Benjamin Stokely, near Mercer, and declared that they had been sent by God to preach the Gospel to every creature, and offered, if the neighbors would assemble, to announce more fully their mission in the way of an exegetical address. The neighbors were accordingly assembled, and listened to the preaching of the disciples of Joe Smith. Notes of this service were made at the time by Mr. Stokely, and subsequently published in the Western Press. One of these preachers was Orson Pratt, who became, in later days, one of their "Apostles." While the mission was unsuccessful in establishing a congregation, it was effectual in scattering seed which finally grew into fruit. Rev. Sidney Rigdon, at that time a Baptist minister at Sharon, finally became one of their proselytes, and endeavored, after his expulsion from the Mormon Church at Nauvoo, Ill., to form a colony of like faith and character near Greencastle, Franklin Co., Penn. He failed in his purpose.

Bible Society.—When the first Mercer County Bible Society was formed has not been ascertained. Mention of it is made as early as May, 1849, when the board of managers, through its secretary, B. F. Baskin, announced that it had employed Rev. O. Flying as an agent to distribute Bibles and collect funds.

Missionary Society.—It would seem that a county missionary society had an existence at an early day. The announcement is made that Mercer County Missionary Society held its first annual meeting in Mercer on the 11th of June, 1834, with Rev. Samuel Tait as president, Rev. A. W. Black, vice-president, and Rev. J. L. Dinwiddie, secretary. The officers for the next year were Rev. Tait, president; William McElheney, vice-president, and A. W. Black, secretary. Judging from the composition of its officers, it was a Presbyterian institution.

CHAPTER XIII.

MEDICAL—PHYSIOLOGY—PROPER KNOWLEDGE AND OBSERVANCE OF PHYSICAL LAWS NECESSARY TO A SOUND BODY AND MIND—IGNORANCE THE MAIN CAUSE OF MOST HUMAN INFIRMITIES—SENSEOPATHY—PROGRESS IN MEDICAL SCIENCE—THE OLD-FASHIONED DOCTOR—PIONEER PHYSICIANS OF MERCER COUNTY—BRIEF SKETCHES OF THE BEST REMEMBERED PRACTITIONERS OF PIONEER DAYS—EPIDEMICS—MEDICAL SOCIETIES—FIRST MEDICAL SOCIETY OF MERCER—ORGANIZATION OF THE MERCER COUNTY MEDICAL SOCIETY IN 1848—ITS DEMISE AND REORGANIZATION—OFFICERS OF THE SOCIETY SINCE 1882.

WHEN the poet wrote in satirical verse the oft repeated sentiment, Presume not God to scan—
 The proper study of mankind is man, he expressed a truth which the ages have not yet fully comprehended or applied. "I am fearfully and wonderfully made," was an attempt of the sweet singer of Israel to grasp the mysteries connected with his physical organization. Despite the efforts of moralists to give transcendent importance to the demands of the soul, often to the neglect of the best needs of the body, reflecting and intelligent people have insisted upon giving some attention to the "house I live in." While the teachings of the past may have caused Sir William Hamilton to place above the door to his studio the maxim: "On earth there is nothing great but man; in man there is nothing great but mind," yet the demands of a progressive civilization will not be satisfied with any theory which neglects to give due attention to the requirements of the bodily organization.

Mens sana in sano corpore—a strong mind in a strong body—is a classic dictum which ought to prompt sensible people to halt and carefully survey the ground of their terrestrial existence. "I beseech you, by the mercies of God, that you present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service," indicates that divinely inspired men insisted strongly upon the claims of physical Christianity. "Do thyself no harm," was the timely advice of a philanthropic messenger to one who was bent upon the infliction of bodily injury.

All these quotations, and a host of others that might be cited, tend to fix the lesson that man's physical organism instead of being simply a mass of corruption, and the abode of Satanic influences, is as much the workmanship of God as the spirit, and therefore entitled to the same thoughtful attention and culture. Its care, whether supervised intelligently by the person himself or conducted by some one specially set apart for such work, demands proper and judicious direction. Nor can this responsibility be wholly delegated to another. Carlyle confessed that he was past seventy before he discovered that he possessed such an organ as a stomach; but such ignorance, feigned or real, did not exempt him from the penalties which inevitably follow the infraction of physical laws, nor preserve his spirit from the acerbity which such a physical condition necessarily engenders. If the doctor of medicine should return to the standard from which he started originally, and become what the term doctor implies, a teacher of health principles and a preventer of disease, by judicious advice and precautions, rather than a migratory drug store in miniature, feeling pulses and examining tongues, the halcyon days of health and pristine vigor might be restored. But the ignorance and credulity of the people has necessarily perverted and defeated the true mission of the physician by insisting, practically, that no medical service has been rendered unless something tangible to the senses has been given. The patient must taste something, see something, smell something. Wholesome advice, in nine cases out of ten all that is actually required, is not appreciated, and therefore not remunerated. In consequence, the physician practices medicine on a bread and butter basis, and the people are compelled to pay the bill. The public mind needs to be correctly informed upon these matters, and then the merited reform will begin. A physician's intelligent advice, unaccompanied with "big pill" or "little pill," will be appreciated as the lawyer's is, and paid accordingly.

Not unfrequently, too, will the individual be much better off, the testimony of intelligent, conscientious physicians being accepted, if he shall apply common sense principles of health as revealed by the study of his own system, and its wants, and not rely upon the patent remedies which he finds advertised on every hand. Such a state of things was evidently in the mind of the writer of the following stanzas, when he broke away from the restraints of both "regulars" and "irregulars," and launched himself upon the sea of self-preservation, in the ship which he denominated

SENSEOPATHY.

Take the open air,
The more you take the better,
Follow nature's laws
To the very letter.

Let the doctors go
 To the Bay of Biscay;
 Let alone the gin,
 The brandy and the whisky.

Freely exercise,
 Keep your spirits cheerful,
 Let no dread of sickness
 Make you over-fearful.

Eat the simplest food,
 Drink the pure cold water.
 Then you will be well,
 Or at least you ought ter.

The science of medicine has had many difficulties to encounter. In addition to the ignorance of hygienic laws on the part of the people; already referred to, it has had to contend with unreasonable superstitions, reliance upon faith cures, trust in patent nostrums and all sorts of cheap medicines advertised through bills and the public press. Ignorance has been imposed upon. People have often consented to take, from irresponsible parties, medicines of a cheap grade, the taking of which resulted in permanent injury unless counteracted by the timely interference of an accredited physician.

Notwithstanding all these difficulties, the practice of medicine has made great advancement. The blood-letting process of the olden times has been superseded by more rational treatment. The publication of medical journals, the organization of medical associations, the cultivation of the mental and physical sciences, the abandonment of irrational modes of practice, and the general desire on the parts of its members to elevate the standards of the profession, have given an impetus in the right direction. It is not irrational or unkind to say that we are rapidly leaving the period when the condition of things was truthfully represented by H. C. Dodge, in his description of

THE OLD-FASHIONED DOCTOR.

O, don't you remember the old-fashioned doctor,
 Who, when we were children, would enter the room,
 And, looking as wise as an owl or a proctor,
 Would frighten and fill us with thoughts of the tomb?

He'd stalk to our crib-side and order us gruffly
 To stick out our tongue, which we'd do with such dread,
 And give, while he handled our pulses so roughly,
 An ominous shake of his solemn old head.

And then, while he listened to mother's description
 Of things we had eaten and what we had done,
 He grimly would write his old Latin prescription
 For nastiest medicines under the sun.

Those horrible doses. How mother would scold us
 And beg us and buy us to take 'em in vain,
 And O, how we'd struggle when father would hold us
 And squeeze shut our noses regardless of pain.

And, when forced to open our mouths, quickly mother
 Would shove in a spoonful that strangled us till
 We spluttered it out—just in time for another.
 It's vile, deathly taste's in our memory still.

Thank goodness that old fashion dosing is ended,
 With sweet candy pellets and powders in lieu,
 The sick little toddlers who take 'em so splendid
 That even the well ones all cry for 'em too.

Pioneer Physicians of Mercer County.—Unfortunately no available record has been found of the physicians who from time to time have come into the county. Had the present registry laws existed in the primitive days, we could give much more reliable and satisfactory information concerning those who established the medical practice; or had files of the early papers published in the county been preserved, the same result might have been secured.

Of those who practiced at Mercer one of the early ones was Dr. Clark. Concerning him nothing definite has been learned. The only resident who remembered him was Mrs. Rogers.

The two Cossitts, Epaphroditus and James S., were probably next to appear in the place, the former as early as 1809. The following facts were obtained concerning them and the third brother, H. D. La., who located at Greenville, from notes left by Mr. Garvin: Silas Cossitt migrated from Granby, Hartford Co., Conn., in the spring of 1805, and settled in Trumbull County, Ohio. He had served as a captain in the Revolutionary War. When he came West, besides his wife, Sarah, he had seven children, five sons and two daughters. He left two sons at Yale College to complete their education, Epaphroditus and John. On leaving college Epaphroditus settled in Warren, Ohio, in 1805, and commenced the practice of medicine. He at once obtained a reputation as a surgeon. His first operation was the amputation of the thigh of Hon. Webb, a prominent attorney at law. He also established a newspaper. In 1808 he removed to Mercer and resumed the practice of medicine, and was regarded one of the best surgeons in Northwestern Pennsylvania. When the War of 1812 broke out he went to Erie as a captain of Mercer troops. He was transferred to Harrison's army, where he was made surgeon-general, a position he held until the close of the war. He then returned to Mercer, where he practiced for many years, or until his removal to the West. He was one of the organizers of the first Masonic order in Mercer, in 1822.

Dr. James S. Cossitt also lived and practiced in Mercer for a long time, but finally removed to New Castle in April, 1831. He returned to Greenville in old age, where he practiced a few years, and again went back to New Castle.

Dr. James Magoffin, Jr., was one of the early physicians of Mercer. His son, Dr. Magoffin, thinks his father located in Mercer in July, 1821. He was the son of Dr. James Magoffin, Sr., who subsequently came to Mercer and did a little practicing. The senior member died February 7, 1840, aged seventy years, and his remains lie in the old Presbyterian grave-yard. He had formerly been a practicing physician in the town of Newry, Ireland. When he came to Mercer the present iron-clad code of medical ethics did not exist, and he announced himself in the following newspaper card:

James Magoffin, Sr., Physician, Surgeon and Accoucher, informs his friends and the public, that he has removed from the City of Pittsburgh (where he has practiced for a number of years) into the borough of Mercer, Penn. He tenders his services to the inhabitants and vicinity, and hopes, by care and attention to his patients and moderate charges, to merit a share of public patronage. He is well supplied with a regular assortment of the most genuine medicines. He may be consulted at all hours, if not professionally engaged, at his house, formerly occupied by the Rev. Dinwiddie, Market Street.

☞ He has been very successful in the cure of very malignant fevers, etc., etc.

October 12, 1830.

Dr. James Magoffin, Jr., had a very extensive, lucrative and successful practice. As early as 1831 he announced that upward of $10,000 were standing out, and that a settlement must be had prior to the 1st of May of that year. In 1834 he and his father appear as partners in business as physicians and surgeons. He died the 25th of November, 1879, aged eighty-two years.

Later, probably about 1840, a brother of James Magoffin, Jr., Beriah Magoffin, came from Butler and began the practice of medicine in Mercer. He was a good physician. A full sketch of the Magoffins will be found in the biographical chapter of Mercer.

Dr. Christopher Heydrick, one of Mercer's earliest practitioners, was born in Philadelphia County, Chestnut Hill, in 1770. After having fitted himself by a thorough literary education, he studied medicine under the instruction of the celebrated Dr. Benjamin Say, of Philadelphia, and in 1792 graduated with high honors at the University of Pennsylvania. Six years afterward, in 1798, he was elected a member of the Philadelphia Society of Medicine, and during the same year and for some time afterward he was physician of the Philadelphia Hospital. In 1815 he was elected resident member of the Cabinet of Sciences in Philadelphia. Having been engaged in the practice of medicine in Chestnut Hill and Philadelphia from 1792 to 1820, he at the latter date removed to the borough of Mercer. He resided in this place several years, and had a very successful and lucrative practice. But from his youth having a passion for agriculture, he determined to abandon his profession, and to enjoy for the remainder of his life his favorite pursuit; and having this object in view he removed from Mercer to a farm in the valley of the French Creek, Venango County, where he continued to reside until his death February 9, 1856, in his eighty-sixth year. During the last ten or twelve years of his life he was afflicted with blindness. Dr. Heydrick left two surviving children, Charles H. Heydrick, Esq., of French Creek Township, Venango County, and a daughter, who is the wife of Thomas J. Brown, of Mercer.

Thomas Coffey was one of the early physicians of Mercer. He attended lectures in Philadelphia in 1822-23. Dr. G. W. Yeager, of Mercer, has in his possession the notes taken by him of the lectures delivered. He was a post-master at Mercer, a bachelor then, but subsequently removing to St. Louis was there married, and also died in that city.

On the 9th of November, 1833, Dr. M. K. Johnston offered his services to the citizens of Mercer and adjacent country, in physic, surgery and obstetrics. His office was on North Erie Street.

Dr. E. W. Glezen was in Mercer as early as October, 1830. He lived then in the stone house opposite Dr. J. S. Cossitt, on North Pitt Street, owned at present by Mrs. J. H. Robinson.

Dr. John Baskin, a physician of considerable prominence in Mercer, succeeded Dr. Glezen about 1844. He had two sons who became well known, one as an attorney and the other as a physician. The attorney was B. F. Baskin, whose name occurs in various connections in this work as a lawyer in Mercer and Greenville. The physician, George W. Baskin, was the efficient secretary of the second Mercer County Medical Society. He was stricken down when but twenty-eight years of age by the hand of an assassin, the deed having been committed in Mercer April 10, 1853. Dr. John Baskin came to Mercer from Union County, Penn., where he had served as associate judge, being appointed by Gov. Porter in 1841. He continued to practice until severely hurt by his horse running away, from the effects of which he died September 26, 1851, in his sixty-third year.

The two Mehards, S. S. and J. W., father and son, had quite an extensive practice. Both died in 1883, comparatively young men. The records of the medical society show how they supported that means of professional growth.

In addition to these, John W. Rogers (eclectic), J. B. Pauley (eclectic), G. T. Monroe and Dr. Blakeley, both homœopaths, and Dr. Slemmons were in the town, and engaged in practice at a later date.

At Greenville the earlier physicians were Dr. Hardscrabble, who was in the place about 1819; Dr. Lane, some three years later; Dr. Obadiah Hall, 1824; Dr. H. D. La. Cossitt, 1825; Dr. Samuel Wylie, 1826; Dr. Beriah Magoffin, 1827, and Dr. R. E. Breiner, 1835.

H. D. La. Cossitt grew up in Ohio, and received his principal education in Mercer, where he attended the academy under the principalship of Prof. Anderson. He read medicine with his brothers, and attended lectures in the sessions of 1824-25 at the College of Physicians and Surgeons, Fairfield, Herkimer County, N. Y., and subsequently at Geneva, N. Y. Dr. Cossitt was married June 9, 1825, and the following August located in West Greenville, where he commenced the practice of medicine. He continued the active duties of his profession in Greenville and vicinity until his death, at his homestead southwest of that borough, March 1, 1877. He was recognized as one of the leading practitioners of Mercer County. A fuller notice of Dr. Cossitt will be found in the biographical chapter of West Salem Township.

Dr. R. E. Breiner located in Greenville in the spring of 1835, and soon after formed a partnership with Dr. H. D. La. Cossitt, who had then been practicing in that town for ten years. His parents were George and Maria (Spiegel) Breiner, of Lehigh County, Penn. Dr. Breiner was born in Maccungie Township, Lehigh County, Penn., April 13, 1808, and at an early age began the study of medicine under Dr. Peter Martin, of Maccungie, Penn. He attended lectures in 1828-31 at Jefferson Medical College, Philadelphia, and in 1831 commenced practice in Maccungie, whence he came to Greenville, where he devoted the rest of his life to the duties of his profession. Soon after locating in Mercer County Dr. Breiner graduated at Willoughby Medical Institute, of Lake Erie, now Starling Medical College, Columbus, Ohio, which added to his previous knowledge of medical science. He always kept well up with the progress in medicine, and won and retained one of the largest practices in this section of the State. Dr. Breiner was married June 10, 1841, to Miss Sarah Ann, daughter of Robert G. Mossman, one of the most prominent pioneer business men of Greenville. She died June 1, 1861, leaving two daughters, Maggie M. R. E., wife of E. T. Beatty, of Greenville, and Susan J. P., wife of W. H. Findley, of the same borough. Dr. Breiner was one of the pioneer medical practitioners of Mercer County, and the fact that he practiced medicine successfully in one community from 1835 up to 1868 is abundant proof of his ability and worth. Owing to declining health he ceased regular practice about two years prior to his death, which occurred at Minneapolis, Minn., August 25, 1870, whither he had gone the previous May, with the hope of recuperating his shattered constitution. Coming of English and German ancestry, he possessed many of the rugged, sterling characteristics of those races. Positive in opinion, of strong likes and the opposite, he was, nevertheless, of a courteous and affable disposition. He was, however, deeply wedded to his profession, and devoted all of his indefatigable energy to the duties which his calling imposed. He practiced for miles in every direction, and was well liked and respected, both by the profession and the people at large. A writer in one of the local papers paid Dr. Breiner the following tribute at the time of his death: "Few men have endured more hardships, few have discharged the difficult and toilsome duties of the medical profession so unceasingly and so long. Both his co-laborers and his patients will testify to the promptness and fidelity, the energy and watchfulness, with which he performed his professional duties."

Dr. Daniel B. Packard may also be classed among the earlier medical practitioners of Greenville. He graduated at Willoughby Medical Institute in February, 1842, and soon after began practice at Clarksville, Mercer County, whence he removed to Greenville the following August. He entered into partnership with Dr. Cossitt, which lasted about ten years. Dr. Packard continued in active practice until 1854, when he retired from the profession and engaged in mercantile pursuits.

H. C. La. Gossitt

Dr. R. G. Stephenson appears as a physician at Greenville in 1847, his card bearing date April 30 of that year. Some others were probably here, but these are the best remembered and remained longest in practice.

Dr. John Mitcheltree located south of Sharon at quite an early day; it is claimed in 1807. He was a native of Ireland, and married Jane Irvine, a sister of Dr. John M. Irvine, of Sharon. Dr. Mitcheltree was the first resident physician in that part of the county, his practice extending along the Shenango Valley for many miles. He accumulated a large estate, but left no children to inherit it. He died February 6, 1852, his widow surviving him two years.

The first physicians who practiced in Sharon were Drs. Mitcheltree and Elijah Flower, the latter of Brookfield, Ohio. Dr. Robert McCormick was, however, the first resident physician of the town. He came from Cumberland County, Penn., about 1839. These were succeeded by Drs. Martin, Edward Reynolds, Christy, Wolf and W. N. Reno, the last of whom practiced from 1841 to 1850.

One of the prominent physicians of a later date was Dr. J. M. Irvine, who was born at Mount Vernon, Ohio, October, 11, 1814. Being left an orphan at a very early age, he was adopted into the family of Dr. Mitcheltree, who had married his oldest sister. He was thus enabled to secure what educational facilities were afforded by the common schools. After completing this scholastic training he engaged in mercantile business with his elder brother, Armstrong Irvine, and at the same time began the study of medicine. He pursued the latter undertaking so faithfully that in 1837 he had completed a course at the Cincinnati Medical College, and graduated with the degree of M. D., locating shortly afterward at Lexington, Mo. Remaining in this place for a year only, he returned to the East, and located in Sharon, where he resumed the practice of his chosen profession. In the spring of 1842 he married the oldest daughter of Rev. John Winter. Three years later, in the winter of 1845, Dr. Irvine removed to Texas, remaining several months. Becoming dissatisfied he returned to the North, locating for a time at Nauvoo, Ill., where he became such an active leader among the Gentiles in their efforts against the Mormons that he became fearful of their enmity. After a period of two and a half years' successful practice, he again removed to Sharon, in which place he continued the performance of professional duties until 1862, when he retired from active practice. Dr. Irvine was an enterprising, public-spirited man, always giving freely his support and money to worthy purposes. In politics he belonged to the Democratic faith, and in his later years espoused the cause of temperance. In 1866 he was a candidate for State senator, and greatly reduced the majority of his successful Republican opponent. At the outbreak of the Rebellion he raised a company of cavalry and tendered its service to the government. That kind of military forces not being in active demand, the offer was not accepted. Dr. Irvine was a member of the Masonic order, but was never identified with any church. He died April 29, 1878, in the sixty-fourth year of his age. He left three children, all of whom are yet living. Of these Mary is the wife of Prof. S. P. Dame, and resides in Pittsburgh; Armstrong is engaged in cattle raising in the West, and Frank, who was recently married, is also living in the West. Mrs. Irvine is still living in Pittsburgh, at an advanced age.

Dr. Robert Irvine is represented to have lived in the vicinity of Wheatland as early as 1808.

Dr. Dowling was at Jamestown in 1832. He lived in the John Williamson house.

Dr. William Gibson arrived in Jamestown in the fall of 1836. He was born January 22, 1813, in Oswego County, N. Y., the son of Samuel and Mary Gibson, who came to America at the time of the insurrection in 1791. Samuel Gibson died in 1815, leaving two children, William and Mary, the latter the wife of Dr. William Cotton, deceased, of Brownsville, Penn. William spent his youth at Harrisburg, Penn., where he commenced the study of medicine with Dr. Samuel Agnew. He subsequently continued his study with Dr. Alexander Proudfit, of Oswego, N. Y. He graduated at the New York Medical University, and at the time of his death held the oldest diploma in Mercer County. He commenced the practice of medicine in Oswego, with Dr. Proudfit, his preceptor. In the fall of 1836 he started for St. Louis, Mo., but en route was detained at Jamestown, where he subsequently established himself permanently. He married Susan, youngest daughter of Joseph Beatty, of near Meadville, who survives him. Years ago he bequeathed to the United Presbyterian Foreign Mission Board of the United States the perpetual annual income of two large brick blocks in the city of Erie, costing over $75,000, for the gratuitous distribution of the Scriptures in Arabia, Egypt and Palestine. The Doctor and Mrs. Gibson traveled extensively in Europe, Asia and Africa. They were members of the Quaker City excursion, which Mark Twain so graphically describes in his "Innocents Abroad." Dr. Gibson obtained, while at Jerusalem, a fine museum of Assyrian, Babylonian, Roman, Greek and Hebrew coins. They were to be presented by the United States Consul to the National Museum at Washington, but were given to Dr. Gibson instead. This collection has been greatly augmented by valuable contributions from many other sources. All is yet in the possession of Mrs. Gibson. Prior to his death, which occurred July 16, 1887, Dr. Gibson began the erection of a granite monument from material obtained in New Hampshire. It cost upward of $75,000. It is simple, bearing on the south, "William Gibson, M. D."; on the east, "William and Susan Gibson"; north "Susan Gibson."

Samuel Axtell, the original of the line of physicians of that name in Mercer County, was born in Washington County, Penn., on the 28th of November, 1791. He removed with his family to Mercer County, and located in Sheakleyville in 1825. He practiced in the village and the surrounding country until 1852. By reference to the sketch of the two first medical societies, it will be seen that he was an active and honored member of the same. He died in November, 1864, at the round age of seventy-three.

His successor in practice, as well as his associate for many years, was his son, Dr. W. H. Axtell, usually called Dr. Harvey Axtell. He was born under the parental roof in Washington County, November 27, 1816, and came with his parents to the new country, where he enjoyed such educational facilities as the times furnished. He finally studied medicine, and began to practice in 1840. His success was such as the most ardent could desire. He has always been esteemed among the medical gentlemen of the county, and still lives and practices at Sheakleyville, the oldest physician in Mercer County. Like his father, he began and continued under the old system of practice; and like him, he has held to the Presbyterian form and system of theology. He has the consolation in his old age of knowing that his son, John L. Axtell, who graduated in 1885, at one of the most reputable schools, is thoroughly competent to become his successor, and to vindicate the fair name of the Axtells.

Drs. Brainard and John Vath were the first two physicians in Sandy Lake.

Died, near North Liberty, April 13, 1847, Dr. George Kirtpatrick. He had been a practitioner in the county for more than thirty years.

Dr. Grier was at New Hamburg in 1839, and Dr. Harnett about seven years later.

Dr. J. R. Andrews settled at New Vernon about 1845, and died in that place in 1867.

Dr. Cornelius Byles is said to have been the first physician in Fredonia.

As early as 1841 Dr. Jesse McMurray was at Sharpsville.

Epidemics.—Mercer County has been comparatively free from epidemics. Of course, while the country was new, the vast amount of vegetable matter which occupied the lower districts, and the imperfect means of drainage then existing, produced more or less of fever and ague, and various forms of malarial disease. As the country became more fully cleared, and the drainage was improved, these special forms of disease naturally decreased, until at present they are comparatively scarce. Then, again, medical practice became more conversant with the physical features of the country, and the necessary tendencies of the inhabitants, all of which aided in mastering the most perplexing types of disease.

From Dr. W. H. Axtell, of Sheakleyville, we learn that in 1838 an epidemic of dysentery occurred in Sandy Creek and New Vernon Townships. It began in July and continued until October or November. It was extensive, and fatal in its results. Dr. Samuel Axtell was the leading physician.

In 1844, commencing in July and continuing until November, an epidemic of malignant dysentery raged in French Creek and Sandy Creek Townships. It was more extensive, and fatal, too, than that of 1838. The symptoms were the same—the most violent purging. Nearly every family in the infected region had its victims. Drs. Samuel and W. H. Axtell, and Drs. Bennett and J. R. Andrews were the physicians in charge.

The most extensive and fatal epidemic, however, which ever reached Mercer County, was that of 1847. It was the same in kind as those of 1838 and 1844. Its territory embraced French Creek, Old Sandy Creek and a portion of Salem Townships, in Mercer County, and a part of Greenwood Township, in Crawford County. The physicians employed were Drs. Samuel Axtell, W. H. Axtell and G. W. Brush, of Sheakleyville, and Bennett and Andrews, of New Vernon. Dr. Samuel Axtell himself became afflicted with the disease, and his patients had to receive the attention of his son, requiring riding nearly day and night for a long period. The disease, by some called dysentery and by others bloody flux, began in June, but its most disastrous results were produced in August and September. The symptoms are described by William M. Burns, of Milledgeville, one of its victims, thus: "Vomiting and purging; some fever, and bloody stool, with severe griping or pain."

The number of victims is variously put, ranging from eighty to 200. Jacob Zahniser, of Jackson Township, represents the number as 131, but Dr. W. H. Axtell informed the writer that there were over 200 deaths within the bounds of his own practice. William M. Burns has furnished the names of the following victims: Mrs. John Rice and two children, Mrs. Mumford, two children of William M. Burns, child of Joseph Andrews, Daniel Williams, Andrew Williams' wife and several children, W. G. Voorhies' child, Benjamin Bumgartner's son, Israel Gear's son and others. Dr. W. H. Axtell had the greatest labor imposed upon him—too much to be successfully prosecuted.

He is said to have been very successful in the cases committed to his care from the first attack. The cause of these epidemics seems never to have been satisfactorily fixed upon. The season was very dry, and water somewhat scarce. In this condition, possibly, existed the origin.

In the winter of 1842-43 typhoid fever broke out with great virulence in Sandy Creek and Deer Creek Townships. It continued about six months, and proved quite fatal.

In 1850 or 1851 quite an epidemic of typhoid fever prevailed in Sandy Creek and Deer Creek Townships, Mercer County, and Greenwood Township, Crawford County. A. L. Streight, grandfather of George H. Caldwell, the superintendent of the county poor farm, was one of its victims.

In the spring of 1856 the region about New Lebanon was visited by a severe scourge of typhoid fever. Among its victims who died were Jacob and William Reed, brothers; Taylor Farver and R. C. Gordon, Mrs. Price Dilley and her son David, William Uber and others. The leading physicians were Abijah C. Axtell, of New Lebanon, and E. X. Giebner, of Sandy Lake.

From some of the old newspapers glimpses of early medical matters in the county are obtained. In the Western Press of August 27, 1831, occurs this statement: "Bilious fever has been prevalent in this county during the summer and autumn months for several years." In the same paper, under date of August 13, 1831: "Considerable excitement existed in our village in the early part of this week relative to mad dogs, one of which was killed on Tuesday morning. Four dogs that were unquestionably rabid have now been killed in the borough (Mercer) within a few weeks. A meeting was held in the court-house on Tuesday, 9th, to devise means for escaping hydrophobia, and petitioning the council to pass proper ordinances for the safety and welfare of the citizens." On the 14th of January, 1832, the same paper stated that small-pox was very prevalent fifteen miles south of Mercer, and that several deaths therefrom had already occurred.

Medical Societies.—No records having been preserved, we are unable to determine when the first medical society was organized in the county. The first trace we have discovered of any was a brief notice in the Western Press, that the medical society of Mercer met December 23, 1843, at the Temperance Hotel, kept by Mrs. C. Shannon. The president was Dr. Samuel Axtell, and the secretary, T. L. Harper. The next trace is an announcement of a meeting held January 23, 1844, at which the following officers were elected: President, Samuel Axtell; vice-president, James Magoffin; secretary, Robert McCormick; censors, John Baskin, H. D. La. Cossitt and George Kirkpatrick; publishing committee, John Baskin and Robert McCormick.

At this meeting the following pronouncement was made: "Resolved, that this society deprecates the use of patent quack nostrums; and also the employment of patent quack steam and urine doctors, knowing them, as well as we do, to be injurious to the health of the community, and not infrequently dealing out death to the credulous victims of their false pretensions." Still further to place a quietus upon that much-dreaded enemy of human kind, the "quack," Dr. Axtell was appointed to read, at their next session, a paper on the distinguishing marks between the scientific practice of medicine and quackery. Unfortunately, we are not able to present that paper, no copy of it having been preserved for future generations. One of the quack nostrums which was anathematized in the foregoing resolution was Dr. Duncan's Expectorant Remedy. It was extensively advertised, and the unsuspecting were caught by such tempting promises as the following:

Does sickness weigh upon your heart,
 Or pains afflict your breast?
 Try Dr. Duncan's healing art,
 And it will give you rest.
 That worm of death might be defied,
 If Dr. Duncan's art were tried;
 And many lovely damsels saved
 The fate of an untimely grave.

The second Mercer County Medical Society was organized June 14, 1848, in the house of Mrs. Bradley, of Mercer, with Dr. Samuel Axtell, president; Dr. John Baskin, vice-president, and Dr. J. M. Irvine, secretary. At the second meeting, held July 24, same year, a constitution and by-laws, prepared by Drs. G. W. Baskin, J. W. Grier and J. P. Hosack, were adopted. At this meeting there were present Drs. Samuel Axtell, John Baskin, J. M. Irvine, J. P. Hosack, J. W. Grier, D. B. Packard, B. F. Gordon, C. M. Stewart, W. N. Reno, G. W. Baskin, Rosenberry Vath and George Bagnell. Subsequently the following named physicians became members of the society: R. E. Breiner, John T. Ray, H. D. La. Cossitt, J. H. Rankin, J. H. Mason, W. G. Henderson, A. G. Hart, P. H. Hanset, A. Harsha, W. H. Axtell, J. W. Riddle, George Veach, C. I. Dawson and C. Henderson. Its principal object was "to secure the advancement of medical knowledge; the elevation of professional character; the protection of the interests of its members; the extension of the bounds of medical science, and the promotion of all measures adapted to the relief of suffering."

The society as first organized continued its existence until the early part of the war, probably 1862. From that time until January, 1867, its condition was one of suspended animation. At the latter date, in pursuance of a call issued by a number of prominent physicians, a meeting for re-organization was held at the office of James & Barber, in Sharon. An ostensible revivication ensued, and for about five years a mere existence was maintained by Drs. Hosack, Mossman, Leet and Giebner, through social and professional visits. Increased membership and augmented interest on the part of the physicians of the county have since that period rendered the meetings of the society more fruitful and instructive.

The following officers have guarded the interests of the society during the past seven years of its history:

1882: President, J. H. Twitmyer; vice-presidents, T. M. Jackson and L. G. Meyer; secretary, J. H. Reed; examiners, B. E. Mossman, A. T. Clark and H. M. Bishop; censors, J. B. Livingston, Salem Heilman and A. T. Clark.

1883: President, J. W. Mehard; vice-presidents, Salem Heilman and J. B. McElrath; secretary, J. T. Shutt; treasurer, H. M. Bishop; examiners, H. M. Bishop, A. T. Clark and B. E. Mossman; censors, L. G. Meyer, A. T. Clark and Salem Heilman.

1884: President, J. P. Hosack; vice-presidents, G. W. Shilling and J. T. Shutt; secretary, J. T. Shutt; treasurer, H. M. Bishop; examiners, A. T. Clark, B. E. Mossman and H. M. Bishop; censors, Salem Heilman, L. G. Meyer and A. T. Clark; delegates to American Medical Association, R. M. Hope, G. W. Shilling and J. H. Twitmyer; delegates to State Medical Society, A. T. Clark, B. E. Mossman, R. D. Morford, T. H. Mitchell, J. H. Reed and J. T. Shutt.

1885: President, Salem Heilman; vice-presidents, R. M. Hope and F. H. Leet; secretary, R. D. Morford; treasurer, H. M. Bishop; examiners, B. E. Mossman, H. M. Bishop and A. T. Clark; censors, A. T. Clark, Salem Heilman and L. G. Meyer; delegates to American Medical Association, B. E.

Mossman and Salem Heilman; delegates to State Medical Society, G. W. Shilling, E. J. Tidd, D. B. Hanna, L. G. Meyer, R. M. Hope and R. D. Morford.

1886: President, G. W. Shilling; vice-presidents, A. T. Clark and F. M. Temple; secretary, R. D. Morford; treasurer, A. T. Clark; examiners, H. M. Bishop, A. T. Clark and B. E. Mossman; censors, T. H. Mitchell, A. T. Clark and Salem Heilman; delegates to American Medical Association, A. T. Clark, F. M. Temple and H. M. Bishop; delegates to State Medical Society, L. G. Meyer, J. W. Hamilton, D. B. Hanna, R. D. Morford and G. W. Shilling.

1887: President, R. M. Hope; vice-presidents, E. J. Tidd and J. H. Reed; secretary, R. D. Morford; treasurer, A. T. Clark; examiners, J. H. Twitmyer, E. Griswold and J. M. Scoville; censors, E. Griswold, J. H. Mitchell and A. T. Clark.

1888: President, L. G. Meyer; vice-presidents, D. A. Phillips and J. B. McElrath; secretary, J. M. Scoville; treasurer, A. T. Clark; examiners, J. H. Twitmyer, E. Griswold and J. M. Scoville; censors, A. T. Clark, E. Griswold and J. R. Caldwell.

SELFISHNESS is a strong element in human society. Its behests are imperious, and often relentlessly cruel and oppressive; and yet gleams of a higher light sometimes break through into benighted human nature and reveal ennobling traits. Men and women can be found who rise above the selfishness and bigotry that characterize a large part of the race. To such exceptional characters, and they may perhaps be regarded exceptional, the term philanthropists may be applied; persons who love not the specific man alone, but the race; persons who accept the fundamental doctrine that "God has made of one blood all nations of men to dwell on all the face of the earth." With them the surface and accidental distinctions of the world have no existence. Intelligence and character are more important than the fortuitous positions of mere wealth or social caste. The color of the skin, or the shape of the physical outline, or the social position occupied, are not the marks by which either God or enlightened humanity judges rational creatures. He who is limited in his sympathies or benefactions by the narrow boundaries of party or race, presents very meager evidences of liberal culture or enlightened conscience. He can justly lay claim to a very little of that spirit which declares that "God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness is accepted of Him."

Temperance agitation in some form dates with the beginning of society. If we accept the only comprehensive definition of temperance, viz., a moderate use of the good things of life and a total abstinence from those that are harmful, we shall readily see that two dangers must always be encountered: 1. The keeping within the bounds of moderation. 2. The observance of complete non-use of hurtful objects.

Human nature has its weaknesses. The conflict between the flesh and the spirit, between appetite and reason, between the baser and the nobler instincts of our nature, is a constant warfare. The great problem involved is whether man shall be governed by his stomach or his brain. In the natural economy the brain has the uppermost position, and should sit as the ruler; but how often is this order reversed. Very wisely has Solomon said that he who governs his own spirit is greater than the conqueror of a city. This superiority of the spiritual over the animal is the result of religion and education, and finally becomes, so to speak, a matter of enlightened habit. It cannot be regulated entirely by acts of the legislature. Moral regeneration cannot be secured directly by the preambles and resolutions of legislative bodies; and yet these have their importance as educational agencies, as means of developing and fostering an enlightened and sensitive public conscience. All acts of prohibition, to be permanently effective, must be passed by the unanimous voice of the person's individual legislative faculties and enforced by the executive power of his own will, guided by the promptings of a properly educated and responsive conscience. Legislatures and societies and associations aid in this matter, and in so far are they highly important and desirable. Parents should realize that sobriety in their children must be cultivated by developing habits of self-denial and self-control in all domestic matters. Habit, in short, is the basis of character, and habit must be formed by sound religious training and educational agencies.

Individual protests had been made against the general use of liquors in the family, and at the "log-rollings" and "huskings" in the early days, but apparently with little effect. The distillery was regarded as quite as important as the grist-mill or school-house. Every community was well supplied with such institutions, run, often, by the leaders of churches, and patronized by the minister of the gospel.

In 1827 the first public movement in the county in the direction of active temperance work was made. Rev. Samuel Tait, pastor of the Presbyterian Church at Mercer, being the originator and leading spirit of it. He began his efforts by first pledging himself to abstain from the use of ardent spirits, and believing that precept would likewise prove efficacious, preached a strong sermon on temperance, in which he enjoined a rigid adherence to the spirit and letter of Christian abstinence. Not content with this, he appointed a meeting for the purpose of permanently organizing the temperance workers of the county. As might be expected, little interest was at first manifested. Whisky in those early days was almost universally regarded as a household necessity, being in special demand in the harvest field and at huskings, log rollings and raisings. But notwithstanding the freedom with which it was used, a sentiment against its consumption gradually arose, and in due time attained formidable proportions. Organizations were established in every township in the county. During the twelve years of the existence of this movement much good was accomplished directly, and more, indirectly, by the impulse thus given to the work.

The immediate result of Rev. Tait's efforts took shape as the "Mercer Temperance Society." The officers elected February 10, 1829, were as follows: President, Alexander Brown; vice-president, Samuel Holstein; secretary, William Fruit. Following are the rules on temperance adopted by the organization:

We agree to discontinue the use of ardent spirits during our membership, except as medicine.

We agree that it shall not be considered as any mark of friendship for any member of this society to offer ardent spirits to any one on any occasion, except as medicine.

We agree that it would be highly improper for any member of this society to give, solicit, or receive drams in stores.

We agree that we will neither give or receive treats at public elections, military trainings or any other public meetings.

We agree to withhold our suffrages from all drunkards.

We agree to use all friendly means that we can to reclaim those who drink to excess.

We agree to prefer helping those who need manual labor when they have no ardent spirits.

We agree if any of us are known to use ardent spirits, except as medicine, our name shall be stricken from the society by the officers.

We agree that such members of this society as have on hand, or contracted for, ardent spirits, are at liberty to dispose of them according to their best lights, provided they abstain from them themselves.

These rules were signed by the following persons: S. Tait, James Hawthorn, Joseph McClain, James K. Caldwell, Thomas Vaughn, George Smith, W. Young, James S. Cossitt, John Bowman, Sr., Elias Alexander, Lyman W. This society grew to be a power in the county. An account of its various meetings would be interesting to those concerned in the growth of public sentiment. Such a sketch, however, is not possible. We can give but a few intimations along the line of temperance progress. A spirited meeting of the society was held at Center Church, seven miles southeast of Mercer, on the 8th of September, 1832. Malcom McComb was president, and S. Calvin Tait, secretary. Addresses were delivered by Rev. John Munson and William McMillan, Esq. In the resolutions passed, to the effect that the visitation of the country by malignant cholera demanded total abstinence from ardent spirits; and that, notwithstanding some defection from its ranks, the cause of temperance was making progress in the county.

The active work done by the society in the county resulted in counter movements. One of the most noted of these was a meeting held at Georgetown (now Sheakleyville) on the 14th of March, 1834. Ebenezer Miller was chairman and J. Montgomery, secretary. A long series of resolutions, condemning, in the strongest terms, the formation and maintenance of temperance societies, as "calculated to disorganize our civil institutions, to engender strife and envies, to break the peace and harmony of society, to arm brother against brother, and father against son, and throw us into a state of revolution and war," were passed. This array consisted of a preamble of 3,000 words, and twenty-nine distinct resolutions. As specimens we here insert three resolutions:

Resolved, That the principle on which abstinence associations are formed are destructive of all government, that is, that private societies have the right to combine together in order to put down an article of domestic trade and manufacture, in which thousands of citizens are engaged, and from which the government receives a revenue for its support. Admit this principle, and there is an end to all established rules and regulations, for if they have a right to do so in one case, they will have a right to do so in another, until the government becomes a mere name, a shadow without substance.

Resolved, That it is with sorrow and regret that we see and hear of ministers of the gospel, who profess to take the Word of God as the only rule of their faith and practice, engaged in the catch-popularity scheme of peddling about abstinence addresses, teaching their hearers to resist the ordinances of God, to depart from the faith and to give heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils, commanding to abstain, etc., which, however, is unanswerable proof that the Scriptures are of divine inspiration; for the Apostle Paul, who spoke almost eighteen hundred years ago, has told us that such things would take place in the latter days.

Resolved, That the abstinence plans are a mean species of nullification—a sneaking attempt to lessen the public revenue and injure property, forsooth, because the laws of God and the laws of country do not comport to their views and wishes.

The work of the county society, however, was not to be thwarted by such protests. The advocates of temperance were determined to push the war into the enemy's country, as was foreshadowed in a meeting held at the Presbyterian Church, in Neshannock Township, on the 26th of February, 1835, with Alex. Brown, president; William F. Junkin, vice-president; and S. C. Tait, secretary. After listening to addresses by John A. Bingham and J. P. Smith, resolutions were passed, declaring:

That the officers of this society divide the county into districts, appoint an individual to deliver an address in each district, and adopt measures to have the temperance pledge presented to every family in the county.

That the manufacture and sale of ardent spirits, except as medicine and for mechanical purposes, are a violation of the principles of political economy, and impose enormous burdens upon the industry and wealth of the country.

That all who continue the traffic in ardent spirits, except as medicine or for mechanical purposes, stand in an intimate and criminal relation to all the evils of intemperance, and must, on the principle of moral accountability, be made partakers of those evils.

The historical development of this subject presents some interesting phases that should not be overlooked. In the first part of the chapter it is stated that the use and even the manufacture of liquor by church members, and in some cases by preachers, even, was not regarded disreputable. The public conscience, however, became enlightened. We are not surprised, therefore, to find the County Temperance Society, in a meeting held at the court-house January 24, 1851, at which J. L. McQuillen was president, and Theo. McDonald, secretary, report the following: "The members of this society, regarding the making, vending and using of intoxicating liquors as a beverage an immorality, we call upon the churches to treat them as an offense, calling imperatively for the exercise of strict discipline."

The agitation of this temperance problem culminated in a new movement—or rather a new phase of the question—prohibition by State enactment. In the Mercer Whig of June 14, 1855, we find the following address, calling for a temperance convention:

TO THE FRIENDS OF TEMPERANCE IN MERCER COUNTY.

Fellow Citizens:—In view of the present position of the reform, we deem it our duty to call a county convention of the friends of a prohibitory liquor law, to meet at the court-house in Mercer, on Friday, June 22. This salutary law has been enacted by the Legislatures of many States, but it has not yet found a place on the statute books of Pennsylvania. An act, restrictive to a certain extent, was passed at the last session, and it becomes the imperative duty of the friends of temperance to urge the passage of an act looking to the entire suppression of the liquor traffic. On the other hand, those interested in this traffic have declared their intention to prevent further legislative restriction, but to repeal the laws of this nature already in force, and thus open the flood-gates of vice, misery and crime. Let the friends, then, in Mercer County come up en masse to the Convention of the 23d, and declare their position before the political parties have placed candidates before the people for their suffrages, to represent this in the next Legislature.

D. W. FINDLEY,
A. J. GRIER,
D. R. BARKER,
W. W. WOOD,
ALEXANDER THOMPSON,
SAMUEL KERR,
F. B. HUBBARD,
WILLIAM F. CLARK,
DR. A. G. HART.

The result of the foregoing meeting, called for June 22, at which Theodore Newcomb presided, and B. McDowell acted as secretary, may be inferred from the subjoined resolutions, which were drafted by William F. Clark, and unanimously adopted by the assembly. The terseness and vigor of the sentiments then used can scarcely be excelled by those of any modern meeting, however learned or earnest:

Resolved, That the great object of civil government is to prevent and suppress, rather than sanction and encourage, crime and immorality; to protect the weak and defenseless, and to promote the general welfare.

That the statement and admission of the foregoing proposition necessarily carries with it the conclusion that government is vested with the power to enact and enforce all laws necessary to accomplish the end proposed; and moreover, that it is under the highest obligation to exercise the power.

That, as the traffic in intoxicating liquors is the grand promoter of vice, immorality and crime—is destructive of the general welfare—and as the drunkard himself, his abused wife and hungry and half-naked children need the strong arm of the law to protect them against the ravages of the rum-seller—therefore, it is the bounden duty of the law-making power to enact a law that will entirely prohibit the traffic.

That we hail with joy the rapid progress which the principles of prohibitory legislation have made since the first enactment of the Maine law, it having found a place in the statute books of some ten States, within the short period of a few years; and that we contemplate, with unmingled satisfaction, the condition of our country when every State Legislature shall prohibit the importation of intoxicating liquors.

That, as the triumph of this principle thus far has been secured in the face of inveterate opposition from those interested in the liquor traffic, so will be its future progress; and the friends of prohibition must not abate one jot or tittle of their labor until victory shall have crowned their efforts.

That, while we are thankful for the restrictive laws enacted by the last Legislature of this State, yet we believe that any legislation recognizing the legitimacy of this traffic is wrong, and that nothing but a prohibitory law will effect thoroughly the end proposed. Therefore, it is the duty of the friends of temperance to direct their energies to secure this result.

That to this end representatives must be chosen who are firm, unwavering advocates of such a law. None others can be trusted, and none others can or will receive the support of the genuine friends of prohibition.

That, as the sense of this convention, we do not desire to mingle this beneficent cause with the conflict of political parties, and will not, unless circumstances compel us to do so. We, therefore, decline designating any candidates for the Legislature, in the hope that the political parties will place good and true men before us; but should this hope be disappointed, we authorize the County Committee to call another convention, at a suitable time, to adopt such means as may be deemed necessary to secure the consummation of the high and holy objects we have in view.

The prohibitory movement in Pennsylvania in 1854-55 became very popular, and the amendment submitted for popular vote lacked only about 5,000 of being carried.

Several society movements were at work throughout the country, commencing with the popular movement of Father Matthew, the great Irish Catholic temperance orator, the Sons of Temperance, the Sons of Malta, and the Good Templars. Each one did its part in arousing popular interest in the cause of temperance, and had numerous orders in all parts of the country.

In the spring of 1874 there originated in Hillsboro, Ohio, what was popularly called the Woman's Crusade. It organized praying bands of ladies, who made direct appeal to the saloon keeper to cease his nefarious business, and aimed to deter men from drinking. It spread extensively and rapidly throughout Ohio, and invaded the adjoining States, east, north and west. Quite an efficient organization was established at Sharon, and possibly at other points in the county. The crusade at Sharon was a vigorous one, and was instrumental in enlisting in favor of temperance many prominent citizens who had previously occupied an attitude either of indifference or of absolute opposition. The crusade was but a tidal wave, temporary in its operations, but permanent in the results that followed the agitation which it developed.

The crusade movement culminated in a movement more philosophical in its methods and permanent in results—the Woman's Christian Temperance Union.* Its origin in Mercer County was as follows: In March, 1875, Mrs. M. Wolfkill and Mrs. A. P. Hamilton, from Sharon, attended a convention in Philadelphia for the purpose of organizing a State W. C. T. U. Mrs. Hamilton was appointed vice-president of the 26th Congressional District, comprising the counties of Mercer, Crawford and Butler. In June, of the same year, she called a convention at Mercer, which organized a county Union. Its history is thus stated by Miss M. Luella Crawford, of Sandy Lake, county superintendent of the press department: "The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Mercer County was formally organized in the court-house, Mercer, June 10, 1875. The meeting was called to order by Mrs. A. P. Hamilton, of Sharon. The temporary officers were: President, Mrs. Rev. B. M. Kerr; secretaries, Mrs. Rev. R. McWatty and Miss Sarah Pew. Ladies were present from Sharon, West Middlesex, Greenville, New Castle and Franklin. The following officers were elected for the year: President, Mrs. Rev. S. A. Bignell, of Greenville; vice-presidents, Mrs. Rev. B. M. Kerr, Mercer, Mrs. Rev. B. K. Ormond, Sharon, and Mrs. Emily Rayen, West Middlesex; recording secretary, Miss Sarah Pew, Mercer; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Jennie Martin, Greenville; treasurer, Mrs. Ward, Sharon.

The subsequent officers were as follows: Presidents, Mrs. B. M. Kerr, Mrs. M. Wolfkill, Mrs. A. J. Kerr, Miss Narcissa E. White, Mrs. E. C. Eckles, Miss Sarah Pew.

Recording secretaries, Miss Sarah Pew, Mrs. Knight, Mrs. Wolfkill, Mrs. C. Cunningham and Mrs. L. I. Crawford.

Corresponding secretaries, Mrs. Jennie Martin, of Greenville, Miss Sarah Pew, Mrs. Bennett, Mrs. Dr. Martin, of Grove City, Mrs. A. P. Hamilton, Mrs. J. W. Stevenson and Miss Sarah Pew.

Treasurers, Mrs. Ward, Mrs. A. P. Hamilton, Mrs. J. M. Wilson, Miss Sarah Pew, Mrs. M. Wolfkill and Mrs. A. P. Hamilton.

The full corps of officers for 1887-88 is as follows: President, Mrs. E. C. Eckels, Stoneboro; vice-president, Mrs. Dr. Martin, Grove City; corresponding secretary, Miss Sarah Pew, Mercer; recording secretary, Mrs. L. I. Crawford, Sandy Lake; treasurer, Mrs. A. P. Hamilton, Sharon.

Annual conventions have been held as follows: Greenville, 1875 and 1884; Mercer, 1876, 1877 and 1879; Sharon, 1878; Sharpsville, 1880 and 1887; N. Salem, 1881; Clarksville, 1882; Jackson Centre, 1883; Sheakleyville, 1885; Grove City, 1886, and Stoneboro, 1888.

The treasurer's books show the following receipts during the successive years: 1875, $48.50; 1881, $82.61; 1882, $108.88; 1883, $62.59; 1884, $115.84; 1885, $125; 1886, $234.16; 1887, $289.70.

The efficiency of this work in the county is seen in many directions, in the various departments into which it is organized. Its power is specifically felt at the season of renewing licenses in the various boroughs of the county. In addition to the regular Woman's Christian Temperance Union, there are an equal number of young women's christian temperance unions, whose mission is confined to the more youthful classes. The two organizations enroll over 1,500 members in the county.

Another temperance movement originated in 1876, and exerted a marked influence throughout the land. It was known as the "Murphy movement," in honor of its leading spirit, Francis Murphy, a reformed inebriate, who has done a great deal in the temperance cause.

Prohibition, quite a successful temperance movement, which purposes to correct the ills of humanity by prohibiting the manufacture, sale and consumption of intoxicating drinks, has acquired considerable strength. It relies largely upon the moral regeneration, assisted by acts of legislation, and has been organized into a political party. It is the second effort to solve the temperance problem by prohibitory legislation, the first having been made in 1854-55.

Anti-Slavery Agitation.—Mercer County was not agitated as much over the enormities of the African slave system in the South as other portions of the State lying contiguous to that region; and yet the abolition of the evil was advocated, not as a political but as a reform movement, early in its history. A discourse having been delivered in the Presbyterian Church in Mercer, June 15, 1835, by the Rev. Nathaniel West, on the subject of slavery and measures for its extinction, a meeting was called on the dismissal of the assembly, and organized by calling John Young to the chair, and S. C. Tait, secretary. A free interchange of opinion was had as to the proper course to be pursued on this subject, when the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That in the opinion of this meeting it is expedient to form an anti-slavery society in this county.

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of Gen. T. S. Cunningham, William F. Junkin, William McElhauey, William S. Rankin and S. C. Tait, be appointed to draft a constitution for adoption by such a society.

At an adjourned meeting of the anti-slavery advocates, held at the court-house, in Mercer, Saturday, July 4, 1835, William Fruit was called to the chair, and John Keck appointed secretary. The committee appointed to draft a constitution reported one with the following preamble, which was adopted by the society:

WHEREAS, We hold, with the venerable signers of the Declaration of Independence, these truths to be self-evident: That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. We believe that God hath made of one blood all the nations of men; that with Him there is no respect for persons; and that He requires of all that they should do unto others as they would others should do unto them; and that slavery in the United States deprives more than two millions of our fellow men of their inalienable rights, and therefore is a gross violation of the fundamental principles of our government, and incompatible with the laws of God and the requirements of the Gospel, and in direct opposition to the healthful influences of all republican institutions—that it is a system of injustice and oppression calculated in its very nature to sow discord in our national councils, and to impoverish and enfeeble slave-holding States, to bring honest inquiry into contempt, and to make the poor an easy and continued prey to the lawless passions of the avaricious, the rapacious and licentious. That it begets and fosters an aristocratic spirit, befitting the pampered lordlings of despotism rather than American citizens. That wherever it prevails it breathes a moral and political pestilence, alike destructive to the endearments and purity of domestic and social life and to the privileges and principles of republican freemen. That its continuance in this boasted land of liberty, in the view of all enlightened nations, pronounces our Declaration of Independence “the poetry of philanthropy” rather than the dictates of common sense and common justice. Therefore, we hold that duty to God our Creator, and love to our fellowmen, as well as to redeem our nation from the charge of inconsistency and to stay the arm of the Almighty from executing deserved wrath for the awful guilt of its oppression, we are bound to repent instantly, to undo the heavy burdens, to break every yoke, and let the oppressed go free.

The purpose of the society, as enunciated in Articles 3 and 4 shall be to induce the entire abolition of slavery in the United States, by collecting and diffusing information concerning its true character, by endeavoring to convince our countrymen, by arguments addressed to their understanding and consciences, that slave-holding is inconsistent with the religion of our Savior, and a heinous crime in the sight of God, derogatory to our national character, and that the duty, safety and interests of all concerned require its immediate abandonment.

This society shall aim to elevate the character and condition of the people of color, by encouraging their intellectual, moral and religious improvement, but never countenance the oppressed in vindicating their rights by resorting to physical force.

On motion it was Resolved, That the diffusion of anti-slavery sentiments through the Northern States is not only necessary in order to convince our Southern brethren of the enormity of the traffic in human souls, but also that the whole moral energies of the nation be brought to bear on the monster, slavery, which sits like an incubus on our land.

The first officers chosen by the society were: President, John Hoge; vice-presidents, William F. Junkin and William McElhauey; recording secretary, John Keck, and corresponding secretary, Rev. A. W. Black.

The sentiment of abolition continued to grow. In 1843 we find the first traces of a political organization known as the “Liberty Party,” whose object was the “deliverance of the North from the expense, disgrace and crime of slavery.” The central committee of this party in the county consisted of Robert Stewart, William H. Scott, Robert Hanna, John Young, F. B. Hubbard, Joseph McDonald, Joseph Sykes, Joseph L. McQuillan and James Kilgore. The subsequent passage of the Fugitive Slave law and the Dred Scott decision were not calculated to allay this anti-slavery feeling. Men were found in various parts of the county who were efficient agents of the "Underground Railroad," whose stations were always open to the runaway negro. The agitation was kept up until the great Rebellion was precipitated, which extinguished the evil forever.

Assistance Rendered the Irish People.—One of the philanthropic appeals of the last half century which struck the American people feelingly was that in behalf of the famishing people of Ireland in 1847, brought to starvation by English misrule and tyranny. Mercer County, like other portions of the country, was keenly alive to the distress caused by the severe famine in the Emerald Isle, and its citizens, largely of Irish descent, acted nobly in furnishing immediate and necessary relief. In pursuance of previous notice, a meeting was held at the court-house in Mercer on Friday, March 5, 1847, to act in the premises. Rev. J. T. Smith was chosen president, and Hugh Bingham, secretary. William F. Clark, by request, stated the object of the meeting, and offered a preamble and series of resolutions, which expressed the condition of things existing in Ireland and the necessity of taking steps for immediate relief. The resolutions suggested the appointment of a central committee, to address the people of the county and solicit liberal contributions for the end in view. The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and the following gentlemen appointed as the central committee of supervision: William F. Clark, chairman; L. Weaver, secretary; E. W. Carter, William McElhaney, John Bowman, J. P. Garrett, Thompson Graham, Jacob Zahniser, James Sheriff, R. L. Maxwell and J. R. Rogers. William F. Clark, James Sheriff and William McElhaney were appointed to prepare an address to the people of the county, urging a liberal and hearty response to the appeal of perishing humanity. Mercer, and the warehouse at Big Bend kept by Messrs. McFarland & King, were designated as points at which contributions would be received. We regret that we are unable to give the results of this movement specifically, but they were generous and timely. The collections were shipped to the Ohio, and thence by boat to the destitute.

Desecration of the Lord's Day.—The observance of one day in seven as a day of rest and religious worship has met the approbation of the wisest and best statesmen and philosophers of the world. Its importance was also recognized by the early settlers of Mercer County. On the evening of March 26, 1846, the citizens of West Middlesex and vicinity met to express their denunciation of the profanation and desecration of the Lord's holy day. R. B. Young was chosen chairman, and Robert Crawford, secretary. Rev. A. C. Rockwell, J. D. Foreman and Thomas Sweezy were appointed a committee to express the sense of the meeting. They reported a preamble and resolutions, the former expressing the sanctity and divine appointment of the Lord's day, and calling attention to the laxity and, in some cases, the irreverence with which it is observed. In their resolution they said:

Resolved, by us, the citizens of West Middlesex and vicinity, that as public opinion is, under God, the prime source of security to our laws and morals, we solemnly declare and hereby publish to the world that we disapprove of, and wholly discountenance, such a disposition to desecrate God's sacred day, and in testimony of our determination to set our faces against this great, this growing, Heaven-daring evil, and unitedly, and by every proper means, to use our influence for its restraint and entire suppression, we set our names to this our resolution: Abram Robinson, Amos Smith, William Clingan, J. D. Foremen, N. H. Pritt, Charles Eaton, James Canon, John Lover, William Crossman, John McCall, William Steen, Thomas Miles, Jacob Brinker, James Bell, John Welch, John W. Edeburn, Jacob Davis, Henry Davitt, Joseph Edeburn, R. G. Garlick, Jackson Robinson, William Mathers, Isaac Pounds, James Satterfield, Erasmus Canon, William Mitcheltree, S. C. Sample, Thomas Miles, Jr., R. B. Young, Ross Robinson, Wesley Hoge, Thomas Sweezy, S. C. Johnson, Jerome Vernon, David Walan, A. O. Rockwell, R. E. Johnson, William Johnson, John Campbell, Robert Mayers, John McConnell, Samuel Bell, John Hill, John Mitcheltree, Mead Satterfield, William Hill, John McBride, R. Crawford, W. G. Henderson, A. F. Everhart, James B. Ward, J. B. Mathers and James Satterfield, Jr.

Fourth of July Celebrations.—The celebration of our natal birth-day was, in the earlier days of our country, attended with patriotic exercises and beneficial results. There is no doubt that American patriotism, and the grandeur and achievements of the American nation, owe much to the inspirations of those occasions, when martial music familiarized the young with Yankee Doodle, the Star Spangled Banner, Hail Columbia and other national airs; when the reading of the Declaration of Independence portrayed vividly the causes which led to the revolt against the mother country; when the oration for the day supplied the popular information which the school-boy of to-day obtains from his history of the United States, and when the toasts responded to by leading citizens gave prominence to our republican form of government, its flag and its civic institutions. Free dinners in the grove, copious draughts of pure whisky, and all the pageantry of martial parade, called out vast crowds of people. The introduction of the fire-cracker and sky-rocket at a later date added special attractiveness to the occasion for the average boy and girl. The sketch of these successive occasions would, if carefully written, be a valuable contribution to American patriotic literature. Sad will it be when America neglects to observe properly her natal day. Let banners float; let rockets glare; let martial music enliven every occasion; let cannon boom; let children decorate, and enjoy themselves; let fire-crackers be discharged; let orations spread-eagle in style be delivered; let the Declaration of Independence be read, and let the rising generation know the rich heritage they have received from a loyal ancestry.

Lives there a man with soul so dead
Who never to himself hath said,
This is my own, my native land?

CHAPTER XV.

MILITARY—THE REVOLUTION, WAR OF 1812 AND MEXICAN WAR—CONDITION OF WESTERN PENNSYLVANIA DURING THE REVOLUTION—PERIOD OF SETTLEMENT—REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS WHO SETTLED IN MERCER COUNTY—WAR OF 1812—EARLY INCIDENTS OF THE STRUGGLE—MILITARY ORGANIZATION IN THE COUNTY BEFORE THE WAR—ROSTERS OF COMPANIES FROM MERCER COUNTY—CHARACTER OF THE TROOPS—EVENTS OF THAT PERIOD—SOME VETERANS WHOSE NAMES DO NOT APPEAR ON THE ROSTERS—MEXICAN WAR—OPPOSITION OF THE WING LEADERS TO THE WAR—ENTHUSIASM OF THE PEOPLE—A COMPANY RAISED IN MERCER AND ITS SERVICES TENDERED THE PRESIDENT—PUBLIC MEETINGS HELD TO SUSTAIN THE GOVERNMENT.

WHEN the Declaration of American Independence was made, and even as late as the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown in October, 1781, not a single family of white men resided in what is now Mercer County. Throughout its territory, and, in fact, throughout the greater portion of what is now Western Pennsylvania, "the rank thistle nodded in the wind and the wild fox dug his hole unscared." Through the vast forests which covered its lands the dusky Indian chased his panting game, and in its rippling waters the savage hunter looked for the delicious food which the finny tribe furnished in great abundance. Beneath the branches of the giant oak, mighty robed senator of the forest, the Indian youth wooed and won the heart and hand of the maiden whose untrained sylvan voice was a source of life to his developing soul. All was wild and uncultivated.

After the Revolutionary struggle in the East and South had ended, and the independence of the colonies was recognized, the course of empire began to take its way westward. Lands set apart for donation purposes, as described elsewhere, began to be occupied—in many cases by those who had been staunch friends of American institutions, and had fought for them during the war just closed. Such, then, were the representatives of the Revolutionary War in Mercer County. Their martial conflicts were elsewhere, but their trials with the wilds of nature were here; and in many a resting place within the confines of Mercer County may be seen, to-day, some evidence of the gratitude with which their descendants hold their memory in loving remembrance. Side by side with those who fought in subsequent wars they rest, while the twinkling stars above and unseen angels keep the watch of unsleeping vigils over their consecrated ashes. May their hallowed and patriotic memories ever be cherished by their descendants, and all others who have entered into the fruition of their unselfish sacrifices.

We regret that we are unable to give the names of all such heroes. In the biographical sketches of this volume will be found references to many of these ancient worthies, and tributes to their memories. We append the names of some as they have been collected:

Godfrey Carnes, who came to Pymatuning Township as early as 1801, was one of these patriots. Many of his descendants are residents of the county.

Capt. James Duncan, whose diary of the Revolutionary War is now in the possession of A. L. Duncan, of Greenville, was a settler four miles northwest of Clarksville. His ashes rest on the old homestead.

William Simonton, a participant in the battles of Brandywine and Long Island, in the former of which he was badly wounded, settled about two miles southeast of Clarksville. His remains rest in Moorfield Cemetery. His descendants are still found in and around Clarksville.

David Hayes, one of the pioneer pedagogues of the county, was a neighbor of Mr. Simonton, and now rests in the same "city of the dead," Moorfield Cemetery.

Abraham De Forest was a captain in the Revolutionary War, taking part in the campaigns in New Jersey. He died near Sharon in 1847, aged ninety-eight years, nine months and fifteen days. His children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren are still living in and around Sharon.

Benjamin Kaster, whose remains are in the Moorfield Cemetery, came to Hickory Township in 1802.

Capt. William Findley and Joseph Junkin were both residents of Findley Township, the first settling about 1799 and the latter about 1806.

Benjamin Stokely, whose history is given in extenso elsewhere, aided in the suppression of the whisky insurrection in 1794.

John Carmichael, a Scotchman, who, drafted into the British army, served under Wolfe at Quebec in 1759, lived in Worth Township, whither as an old man he accompanied his sons in 1802.

Peter Wilson settled in Jackson Township in 1797, and built one of the first mills of the county the same year. He was of Irish extraction.

William Gill was a resident of Liberty Township, James Williamson was an early settler of Otter Creek and Martin Carringer of Perry Township. All fought for independence.

Daniel Harper located in Lake Township in 1797, and was a pioneer horticulturist.

William Egbert, a settler of Sandy Lake as early as 1800, was a pioneer blacksmith.

Among the Revolutionaries in Wilmington Township were Joshua Cook, James Young, Mr. Dumars and Christopher Irwin.

Samuel Waldron was a pioneer in Worth, John Perry and William Dougherty likewise of Pine.

Cyrus Beckwith, a resident of Cool Spring, was a captain from 1776 to the end of the war.

Archibald Titus is buried in Oakwood Cemetery.

Garrett Cronk and William Nickle are buried in the Pearson grave-yard in Jefferson Township.

Capt. John Elliott located on the Shenango, in Hickory Township, late in the eighteenth century.

Capt. Samuel Quinby settled at Sharon in 1808-09. For a number of years preceding his death he was blind. He died September 9, 1842, and was buried the following day, the anniversary of Perry's great victory on Lake Erie, with military honors.

John Morford, a pioneer of Hickory Township, was a Revolutionary patriot, as was also William McClimans, of West Salem.

WAR OF 1812.

The War of 1812 was unlike that of the Revolution, thirty-five years previous, in several respects, but mainly in the fact that during the latter struggle the invading army came from the north instead of from the east. Canada was the base of operations, and hence our northern border was exposed to constant menace. Says Mr. Garvin, in some manuscript notes:

"In the War of 1812 the people of Mercer County were frequently called upon to give their aid in defense of Erie, where the fleet of Commodore

Perry was being built. On these alarms, which were about as frequent as a ship of the enemy hove in sight, the whole county would be aroused by runners in a day, and in a very few hours most of the able-bodied male population would be on the march to Erie. On one occasion the news came to Mercer on a Sunday, while the Rev. Samuel Tait was preaching in the courthouse. The sermon was suspended, the dismissing benediction given, and immediate preparations for the march commenced. On the next day the military force of the county was well on its way to Erie.

"At another time the news of a threatened invasion came in the midst of the grain harvest. This made no difference; the response was immediate. It was on this occasion that Col. John Findley dropped his sickle in his tracks in the wheat field, hastened to his house, and seizing his gun, with such provisions as his wife had at hand to put in his haversack, hastened on his way to the defense of his country. On his return, some weeks afterward, the sickle was found by him where it had been dropped. This was the spirit of the Mercer County people in the War of 1812."

It would seem that local military organizations had been maintained for a number of years prior to the breaking out of the war. These afforded nuclei of the organizations which rendered efficient service when called into the field. As early as 1807 there were two regiments in this region, the One Hundred and Thirty-fourth and the One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Pennsylvania Militia. The organization of the One Hundred and Thirty-fourth at the time was as follows:

Lieutenant-colonel, James Montgomery.

Majors: First Battalion, John McCoy; Second Battalion, James Braden.

Captains in First Battalion: John McNulty, John Emery, Joseph McCoy, Benj. Woods, William Smith, John Minnis, Richard McElwain, John Stewart, John Caldwell, James Denniston.

Lieutenants First Battalion: James McBride, Michael Huttenbaugh, Oliver Reeves, James McCoy, William Breckenridge, James Weakley, Daniel Carry, John Clark, Samuel Clark, William Gibson, William Zahniser, Joseph Collins.

Ensigns First Battalion: Josiah Winters, Robert Ramsey, James McCoy, John Gilmore, John McCartney, Samuel Clark, Samuel Scott, Archibald Montgomery, David Hart and John Haggerty.

Of the Second Battalion: John Findley was captain; John Junkin, lieutenant, and Peter Rambo, ensign.

The One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Regiment had the following organization at the same time (1807):

Lieutenant-colonel, Henry Hoagland.

Majors: First Battalion, John Christy; Second Battalion, John Porter.

Captains: John Gilliland, Alexander McGaughy, Samuel Robinson, James Watson, Samuel Christy, John McCready, William McMillan, William H. Mossman, John Hannell, James Gault, Bashara Hull.

Lieutenants: John Mossman, William Anderson, Robert Mayberry, John Fisher, John Sims, William Young, George Davis, James King, David Newell, Matthew Dawson, David Hayes, Lewis Carey.

Ensigns: John Ferguson, John McCombs, John Moore, James Patton, Thomas Bean, John McCord, Joseph McClain, James Bailey, Isaac Mickey, David Clark, Azariah Dunham.

The organizations of these two regiments in 1811 (August 3) are as follows:

One Hundred and Thirty-fourth Regiment.—Lieutenant-colonel, Thomas Hosack.

Majors: First Battalion, John Stewart; Second Battalion, John McCoy.

Captains: James Denniston, John Caldwell, Job Egbert, Abraham Clark, Thomas Courtney, Samuel Clark, Samuel Thompson, James McCune, Joseph McClintock, James Montgomery, James McCoy.

First Battalion, R., John Junkin, Epaphroditus Cossitt; L. I., Samuel Clark.

Second Battalion, R., David Robinson.

Lieutenants: John Haggerty, Jesse Kilgore, George Able, Samuel Scott, James Ramsey, George McBride, William Turner, George Sheakley.

First Battalion, R., Walter Oliver; L. I., Frederick Minner.

Second Battalion, R., Hugh Jamison.

Ensigns: Hugh Jamison, William Orr, Thomas Ireland, Abraham Clark, Archibald McCormick, Charles Stevenson, Samuel Thompson, Asa Arnold, Henry Emery, Eliab Axtell, George Wilson, Martin Cochran, David Ross, Ichabod Dilly, Jacob Smith and John Dougherty.

First Battalion, R., Samuel Leek, Samuel B. McCune; L. I., Stephen McKinley.

Second Battalion, R., Isaac Taylor.

One Hundred and Thirty-fifth Regiment.—Lieutenant Colonel, Andrew Christy.

Majors: First Battalion, James Gault; Second Battalion, John Sims.

Captains: Matthew Dawson, John Gilliland, Samuel Christy, Robert Mann, John Rea, George Pearson, Robert McCord, Alexander Thompson, Thomas McMillan, John Fisher.

Lieutenants: Robert Stewart, John Ferguson, Thomas H. Bean, James J. Bean, Isaac Gibson, James Limrick, John Docan, James Clark, Joseph Williamson.

Ensigns: John Canon, Robert McDowell, Thomas W. Bean, Francis Beatty, Francis Scott, Andrew Chestnut, Matthew Black, Henry Hoover, James Woods.

When actual service occurred the organizations seem to have changed somewhat, many of the men belonging to the Militia companies for drill purposes not going to the front. Col. Christy led a battalion of his regiment to Pittsburgh in the summer of 1812. At that point the battalion joined Gen. Crook's brigade, and marched through Ohio to operate with Gen. W. H. Harrison against the British around Fort Meigs. We have succeeded in securing the rosters of his command, consisting of the companies of Capts. Matthew Dawson, John Gilliland, Robert Mann, John Junkin and Robert McCord:

Captain, Matthew Dawson; lieutenant, John Ferguson; ensign, Francis Scott.

Sergeants: Thomas Jewell, John T. Bean, George Pearson, Robert Lockhart.

Corporals: Edward Douglass, John Gibson, Jeremiah Ralston, Joshua Chenoweth.

Privates: Joseph Allen, Samuel Awkwright, William Beatty, Frederick Baum, Alexander Boyle, William Byers, John Canon, Frederick Carpenter, William Carnes, Benjamin Castor, William Clark, Jacob Cooper, Thomas Cherry, Thomas Crawford, Jacob L. Gurwell, James Graham, Jeremiah Hazen, John Henry, John Irvine, Daniel Klingensmith, Andrew Marquis, Samuel Marquis, William Means, Henry Mercer, Isaac Moreland, John Moreland, Christian Moats, John H. Monteith, William McClurg, John McCord, William McCord, Samuel McCrumb, Andrew McFadden, Robert McIntyre, Samuel Patterson, Elijah Patton, Jacob Pool, Andrew Reed, William Sample, Samuel

Sample, Thomas Sampson, William Scott, John Siverlin, Francis Slayman, Robert Sheal, Thomas Speir, John Sommerville, John Thompson, John Vannoston, David Warner, Lott Watson, William Zuvér.

Captain, John Gilliland; lieutenant, John Ferguson; ensign, Charles Richardson.

Sergeants: Robert Johnston, John W. Brown, James Brush, John Stevenson.

Corporals: William Leech, Andrew Beatty, Benjamin Lodge, Cornelius McCurdy; drummer, Thomas Calvin.

Captain, Robert Mann; lieutenant, James J. Bean.

Sergeants: James Donaldson, James Bole, Thomas Morford, John Loutzenhiser.

Corporals: Adam Gault, James Thompson, Thomas H. Bean, Charles McCreight.

Privates: William A. Bean, Thomas W. Bean, Alexander Bean, John W. Bean, Robert Beatty, John Calvin, John Christy, John Donaldson, David Haun, Jacob Hommer, Joseph Hommer, John Hommer, Jacob Kamerer, Samuel Kamerer, Irwin Kerr, William Kirby, Matthew Kirby, Peter Klingensmith, John Klingensmith, Joseph Klingensmith, Daniel Keck, David Leech, Samuel Lininger, Joseph Long, James Linn, James K. Marshall, Christopher Miller, Thomas Morford, Jr., John McLean, Hugh McFetridge, Matthew Ormsby, David Patterson, Robert Ralston, Matthew Ralston, Christopher Streight, Henry Williamson, James Williamson, Thomas Williamson, David White, James Woods. This company was formed in and around Greenville, and went to Erie to resist the threatened invasion from the north.

Captain, John Junkin; lieutenant, Walter Oliver; ensign, Samuel B. McCune.

Sergeants: Andrew Clark, James Rambo, Thomas Rambo, Jacob Forker.

Corporals: John Feltibarger, John Moore, George F. Kurtz, Thomas Brandon.

Fifer, James K. Caldwell; drummer, Samuel Phinesy.

Privates: John Alexander, Henry Black, Joseph Black, David Barnhill, Samuel Bowman, Josias Campbell, Thomas Canon, John Carmichael, Abraham Clark, John Clark, Solomon Cook, Alexander Coyle, John Coyle, Alexander Denniston, Robert Gibson, James Glenn, Thomas Gordon, William Gordon, Joseph Harber, John Hawthorne, Samuel Hawthorne, Frederick Helverin, John Johnston, Henry Jordon, Joseph Junkin, John Lowry, Charles Lucas, Joseph Moore, Samuel Moore, Daniel Maurer, James McCord, James McCloskey, John McCoy, David McCurdy, James McCracken, Allen McDonald, John McDonald (Wolf Creek), John McDonald, Thomas McEwen, Jacob Osburn, John Perrine, Peter Rambo, John Rihel, Chapman Rose, Andrew Rose, Francis Scott, Ezekiel Sankey, William Sheriff, Matthew Simpson, Thomas Simpson, Aaron Taylor, Washington Tait, Joseph Thorn, Abraham Truxel, Charles Williams, William Zahniser.

Captain, Robert McCord; lieutenant, Andrew Chestnut; ensign, James Melvin.

Sergeants: Samuel Howard, Andrew Brown, John Boston, William McCord.

Corporals: George Fell, John Fry, Robert Ellis, Carlisle Lossee.

Drummer, Adam Miller; fifer, John Burns.

Capt. Junkin's company was known as the "Mercer Blues." Concerning it Mr. Garvin says, and the remarks will apply equally to the whole battalion: "A rifle company, the 'Mercer Blues,' under the command of Capt. John Junkin, volunteered its services for six months under Gen. Harrison, and was at Fort Meigs in the winter of 1813. Their time expiring before the siege made by Proctor was commenced, when the Virginia volunteers under Gen. Leftwick left the fort, they were among the Pennsylvania brigade that volunteered to remain until Gen. Harrison was able to relieve them. Some of them even remained to participate in the defense against the siege of Proctor."

The Mercer Blues, as will be seen by an examination of the roster, was made up of exemplary men. In his biography of George Junkin, D. D., the Rev. D. X. Junkin says: "They numbered some eighty rifles; and so large a proportion of them were pious young men that, in every tent except two, family worship was maintained by the mess during the campaign, and in those two the captain often officiated. Nor did their devotion diminish the perfection of their military discipline and efficiency. Their drill was as perfect as that of regulars, and Gen. Harrison often complimented them for their gallantry and soldierly bearing."

While these troops were on their way to the front, they had occasion to encamp near Mansfield, Ohio. While there a serious misfortune occurred on the 29th of November, 1812. A violent storm came up early in the morning, hurling a huge oak tree upon the line of tents occupied by Capt. Dawson's company. Jeremiah Ralston was killed instantly, and William Beatty, John F. Bean, John Gibson, John H. Monteith and William Clark were all wounded. Bean had his right collar bone broken. Beatty and Monteith had their ankles mashed, and Clark had five ribs broken. Gibson subsequently died of pneumonia at Wooster, Ohio. William Clark is still living and in good health at Clarksville, Penn., having passed his ninety-fourth birthday on June 8, 1888. Six other men in an adjoining tent were injured more or less by the top of the tree.

These troops passed from Mansfield via Fort Ball (now Tiffin), and Upper Sandusky to Fort Meigs, where they joined Harrison's army. A letter written from what is Perrysburg, Ohio, by Capt. John Junkin, to his brother, gives some facts and views of interest to the reader. We reproduce it :

HEADQUARTERS, MIAMI RAPIDS, February 12, 1813.

Dear Brother: I received yours of the 26th ult., and intended answering it from Upper Sandusky, but was ordered off suddenly, and had not time; and now you can have but barely an acknowledgment. We arrived here yesterday. Our force I do not precisely know, perhaps five thousand. More will soon join us. Winchester's misfortune at the river Raisin, you will have heard of perhaps more correctly than I could state it. Harrison pursued a body of Indians, two nights since, about twenty-five miles. They headed for Malden, and he returned to camp. Our army is well supplied. Desertion is not now frequent. The cowards, I think, are now all drained from among us, and the men now present in the army will do more than if they that have deserted had remained with us. What the intended movements of the army are, none but General Harrison knows; and it is right it should be so. What the results of the movements may be, God only knows. He who ruleth the armies of man, and giveth the battle to whom He pleaseth, can save by many or few. That we may all be enabled to place our trust in the King of kings is the prayer of your most affectionate brother,

JOHN JUNKIN.

These troops were absent from September, 1812, to May, 1813.

In the summer of 1813 another demand was made for the troops of Mercer County. The approach of the British fleet on the lake demanded the assembling of the troops at Erie, where Commodore Oliver H. Perry was building his fleet. To that point the Militia of Northwestern Pennsylvania repaired. The urgency of this demand is clearly shown by the following order issued by a Mercer County man to another Mercer County officer. The Col. Hosack referred to was the son of Henry Hosack, a pioneer of Findley Township, and an uncle of Dr. J. P. Hosack, at present practicing medicine in Mercer. The colonel met a sad death, having been completely cremated, when he was an old man, in the conflagration of his own house.

Sir: In pursuance of General Orders, you are commanded to march the whole of your company to the town of Meadville, prepared to march forthwith to the town of Erie; there to perform a tour of thirty days, unless sooner discharged. Each officer and soldier will appear equipped for the field of battle. A court of appeals will be held at Joseph Alexander's on Monday, the 18th day of October next. Rations will be prepared at Meadville.

Sunday, July 25, 1813.

Captain JAMES McCoy.

THOMAS HOSACK,
Lieutenant-Colonel 134th Regiment P. V.

Papers are extant showing that Capt. McCoy was discharged from service on the 5th of February, 1814. This will indicate, probably, about the length of time these services were given.

It is a source of regret that the names of all who responded so patriotically to their country's call in the War of 1812 cannot be given. In addition to those already given in the rosters, we mention some that have been picked up in various ways. These, with the names found incidentally in the biographical chapters, will do something to reclaim their memories from oblivion.

Hickory Township.—Archibald Titus, Ebenezer McGowan, Nathan Hazen, Samuel Quinby, Washington Porter, Henry Hoagland, Samuel Hoagland, John Hoagland, John Rankin, Elam Bentley, John B. Henderson, Joseph Stinedorf, Jacob Dillinger.

Jackson Township.—Samuel and Abraham Pew, George and James Wilson.

Lake Township.—William, Valentine and Michael Zahniser, Andrew and John McClure.

Sandy Lake Township.—Daniel Perrine, Charles A. Giebner and his sons, William and Augustus.

Wilmington Township.—Benjamin Junkin, William Young.

Findley Township.—Thomas and John Hosack, Joseph Forker.

Springfield Township.—James Denniston, Alexander Black, Capt. Robert Black, Adam Black.

Salem Township.—John Leech, Sr.

Cool Spring Township.—Joseph Alexander, Zachariah Johnston, Samuel Johnston, John McEwen.

Wolf Creek Township.—William Montgomery and five sons, William, Thomas, John, Alexander and David; Nathaniel and Joshua Coleman.

MEXICAN WAR.

The war with Mexico did not strike the leaders of the Whig party with any degree of patriotic force. They feigned to regard it as a scheme of President Polk and the Democratic party to popularize his administration in the slaveholding States by increasing the boundaries of our territory in the Southwest. The people, however, exhibited unbounded enthusiasm in the support of the government, and a large addition of the richest territory in the Union was the final result of the war. It is not our purpose here to trace the stages of the struggle, but to call attention to the role that Mercer County played.

The records reveal the fact that on the 20th of June, 1846, there was organized at Mercer a company known as the "Mercer County Infantry," whose services were at once tendered to the President. Its officers were:

Captain, James Galloway; first lieutenant, J. H. Williamson; second lieutenant, Dawson Wadsworth. The services of these patriotic men were not accepted, and hence they were not permitted to inscribe their names upon the roll of Mexican veterans who upheld the flag from the Rio Grande to the City of Mexico.

The next account of an effort in the direction of influencing public sentiment was the report of a large and enthusiastic meeting held at the court-house on the 22d of December, 1847. It was called to voice the sentiment of the people upon the subject of prosecuting with vigor the then pending war. William S. Garvin was chairman; John Findley, Joseph Kerr, M. L. Mordock and John Barns, vice-presidents, and B. F. Baskin and M. C. Trout, secretaries. John Hoge, B. F. Baskin, James Dickson, Thomas Wilson, William L. Christy, Benjamin Polly and Thompson Graham were appointed a committee to draft resolutions expressing the sentiment of the meeting. While this committee was drafting its report, James Galloway, Esq., who had previously been deprived of the privilege of leading his company to the field, was called upon to make an address. He spoke eloquently of the right of the United States Government to the territory of Texas, up to the Rio Grande, and maintained, likewise, that the war had been commenced by Mexico. He commended the administration for conducting the war vigorously and economically.

The committee reported a preamble in which the United States was upheld and vindicated for the part she was taking in the pending conflict, and introduced a series of resolutions, the first of which asserted "that it is the duty of all good and true men to stand by their country in this war, and to uphold by their voice and strengthen by their sympathy the hands of the government in its efforts to secure a satisfactory peace." Another resolution demanded of Mexico a sufficient indemnity for the injuries she had inflicted upon citizens of the United States, and for the expense incurred by the latter government in the prosecution of the war. The Congressman of the district, Hon. John W. Farrelly, was instructed to vote "supplies of men and money for the vigorous prosecution of the war to a successful and speedy termination."

This meeting was composed largely of Democrats, the Whig leaders not endorsing the movement. Mr. Garvin, in the Western Press says: "There were a few patriotic Whigs present, who, though they did not figure as officers or on the committee, nevertheless countenanced the meeting and sanctioned its proceedings. It is not known that any troops went to Mexico—certainly no organization as such. Individual soldiers may have gone in some other organizations, if so, the cases have not been made matter of record."

CHAPTER XVI.

WAR OF THE REBELLION—THE SEED OF DISCORD PLANTED WITH THE COLONIAL SETTLEMENTS—GROWTH OF THE "IRREPRESSIBLE CONFLICT," AND ITS FINAL CULMINATION—SOME CAUSES ACCOUNTING FOR THE INTENSITY AND DURATION OF THE REBELLION—EVENTS PRECEDING ITS COMMENCEMENT—PARTISANSHIP IN MERCER AT THE BEGINNING OF THE WAR—SUBLIME PATRIOTISM OF THE PEOPLE IRRESPECTIVE OF PARTY—THEIR DEVOTION TO THE UNION—PROSECUTION OF THE WAR—TROOPS FURNISHED BY MERCER COUNTY—REGIMENTAL SKETCHES AND ROSTERS OF COMPANIES—THIRTY-NINTH—FIFTY-SEVENTH—SEVENTY-SIXTH—SEVENTY-SEVENTH—ONE HUNDREDTH—ONE HUNDRED AND THIRTY-NINTH—ONE HUNDRED AND FORTIETH—ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-SECOND—ONE HUNDRED AND FORTY-FIFTH—ONE HUNDRED AND SIXTY-NINTH—TWO HUNDRED AND ELEVENTH—MISCELLANEOUS TROOPS—CLOSING EVENTS OF THE WAR.

THE intestine war, which raged in this country with unwonted fury from 1861 to 1865, was a gigantic rebellion—not a war between the States as such—not a war between the North and South, except so far as the former stood as the representative and defender of national government, and the latter as the exponent and defender of a slave-holding confederacy. It was not a revolution, because that would imply just grounds for such an unusual and destructive action; and further, because a revolution, according to the authority of the eminent Sir James McIntosh, is a movement crowned with success. It will not do to underestimate the conflict by applying to it the rhetorical euphemism—"the late unpleasantness." Fealty to the facts of history, and to the demands of the unborn future, requires that it should be called by its proper name—the Southern Rebellion.

He who expects to study, intelligently, the history of this colossal military and social conflict, will utterly fail if he begins with the stirring scenes of 1861. They are but the beginning of the last, but most tragic, act in the great drama of American civilization. They are but the culmination, on the field of battle, of a conflict which had been in progress, with varying fortunes and constantly increasing intensity, since the colonial settlements were made upon the Atlantic coast. The basic conflict in the elements of man's nature—the struggle between his spiritual nature, which is guided by intelligence, and held amenable to the promptings of an enlightened and responsive conscience, and the fleshly instincts, which constantly enslave and debase him, is abundantly illustrated in the two types of civilization that originated respectively at Plymouth and Jamestown. The former, always intolerant, and often perverse and in error, was permeated by the teachings of a church, whose conscience was vigorously and persistently held to established standards. Freedom of speech, of the press, and of human action, restrained by personal responsibility to rigorous and often tyrannical laws, was a leading characteristic of the Puritan type. Industry and the dignity of labor, equality of all classes before the law, personal responsibility for individual acts—these things characterized the New England colonies. Jamestown was composed originally, of men, the leaders of whom cared for little else than bodily ease and the accumulation of wealth. Naturally and readily they accepted the institution of African slavery, because it coincided with their notions of ease and superiority, was suitable to the climatic conditions of the country, and afforded a means of developing wealth wholly compatible with their original notions in seeking this country. Property in bone and muscle and brain was easily reconciled with their sense of the eternal fitness of things.

The "irrepressible conflict," which began two and a half centuries ago between these two radically unlike types of civilization, grew with time and opportunity, and frequently threatened the peace and permanency of the imperfect local self-governments established. The only peace existing during that time was the truce enforced by a necessary conflict with enemies external and more powerful than either party alone. Permanent peace could not, in the nature of things, exist. Compromises but deferred the final conflict. All the efforts made to have two irrepressible elements permanently harmonized in our government were, in the nature of things, unsuccessful. Human nature, and all that we know of truth and error, right and wrong, conscience and prejudice, Christianity and infidelity, could not be reconciled to such an anomalous condition of things. The only possible basis for peace and progress was the utter and absolute overthrow of one or the other type of civilization. All effort at harmony by diplomacy had failed. An appeal was finally made by one power to the arbitrament of war. The tongue and pen gave way to the sword. Under the new regime the only possible terms to be offered were: "Unconditional surrender." This demand was made from first to last, and finally the deferred decision was made at Appomattox. Jamestown, that had furnished the regnant ideas of the slave-holding South, and consequently of the Southern Confederacy, surrendered to Plymouth, the progenitor of the free North. The Declaration of Independence, which asserts that all men are created equal and endowed with certain inherent rights, was at last interpreted philanthropically, and steps were at once taken to readjust and reconstruct our civilization.

With the acceptance of the foregoing philosophy of the great conflict that simply terminated in 1865, we have little difficulty in deciding the causes of the late war. The charging of the matter upon John Brown's raid on Harper's Ferry; the publishing of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" or Helper's "Impending Crisis;" the speeches of hot-headed anti-slavery orators; the harangues of Southern leaders; the passage of the Fugitive Slave law; the enactment of "Personal Liberty Bills" by certain States; the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, the division of the Democratic Convention, at Charleston, in 1860, which defeated Douglas for the Presidency, and the subsequent election of Abraham Lincoln, were but the culminating manifestations of the great conflict we have already mentioned. They were but ripples on the great sea of troubled waters of conflict. Recognizing the philosophy of what has been said, we are partially prepared to interpret the history of the late war. In addition, however, to what has already been given, it may be wise to remember a few other facts that account for the intensity and duration of the conflict.

1. Owing to the warm climate and the use of carbonaceous food, the people of the South were excitable and courageous, and hence deadly in earnest from the beginning of the war. The people of the North were lethargic, and required to be pounded and defeated for a time to arouse them. The first two years of the war were favorable to the Southern Confederacy.

2. The young men of the South were trained to horseback riding and the use of fire-arms. Hence their soldiers were good in cavalry and skillful as sharpshooters. Northern men, taken from the fields and workshops, were wanting in these matters.

3. Southern troops were organized upon a better basis. Men were brigaded by States, and thus retained their State pride. New recruits, too, were put into old organizations, and thus made efficient from the first. They acted as veterans because they had competent comrades and leaders. Able-bodied men, too, were not put to driving ambulances or provision wagons, but into the ranks to do actual military service. An army of 30,000 Confederates was equivalent to 40,000 Union soldiers for the reasons just given.

4. At the opening of the war the best generals of the old army were in the South—the Lees, and Johnstons, and Hardees, and Braggs, and Jacksons, and Longstreets, and Beauregards, and Stuarts, etc.

5. It must be remembered, too, that Jefferson Davis, the President of the Southern Confederacy, was a military man, a graduate of West Point, and better qualified to conduct military movements than President Lincoln. This fact was a source of great strength.

6. The fighting was principally upon Southern soil, where its men were fighting at home and for home. They were inspired, too, by the near presence of their chivalrous ladies, who were equal to an army in reserve.

7. Both parties mistook and underestimated the strength and skill of their adversaries. The "breakfast job" proved to be a four years' struggle, involving millions of men and billions of money. Washington's whole army during the Revolution would not have supplied the pickets for either army during the Rebellion. After four years' of conflict the great North and the sunny South became introduced. A costly introduction, it is true, but the progress and destiny of the great Republic are its fruitage.

Mercer County, too, was interested in this conflict. She helped to elect Abraham Lincoln, the "rail splitter" from the western prairie, whose success was taken as the pretext for the secession of the cotton States and the forming of a separate government, with slavery as both the foundation and arch stone. Before Mr. Lincoln was inaugurated public excitement was at tiptoe. The closing days of Buchanan's administration were full of painful anxiety. State after State was passing the ordinance of secession; supplies were being shipped to the Southern States for the use of the conspirators; the national executive was undecided as to the course of action he should pursue; Southern members of his cabinet, tinctured deeply with the heresy of secession, were resigning and leaving their places to be filled in the closing hours of his administration, when most of the preparatory mischief had already been done; statesmen in Washington were holding conferences looking toward some compromise that would prevent actual hostilities; the celebrated Crittenden compromise, conceived in a generous and charitable spirit, had been offered in vain to the erring South; the authorities at Washington, asphyxiated by the dilatory policy of the President, were helpless to check the general stampede toward national disintegration; and the incoming administration had no power to stay, if it could, the tide of ruin and desolation sweeping over the country. Party prejudices had not been given up, and the people were not yet in a frame of mind to appreciate fully the gravity of the danger that threatened them on every hand.

Under these circumstances several meetings of historical significance occurred in Mercer, the relation of whose leading points now demands our attention. On the 22d of January, 1861, Rev. W. T. McAdam, then pastor of the Second United Presbyterian Church of Mercer, but subsequently of the Presbyterian Church of Sharon, delivered a lecture at the Mercer court-house, entitled "Our National Troubles." By two distinct committees, representing prominent business and social men of the town, he was requested to permit its publication. He consented. The document occupies about nine columns of the Mercer County Whig, and is a carefully prepared discussion of the question of slavery as being the innocent cause of the war. It is not our purpose to give an outline of the lecture, but to call attention to a few points as showing its drift. His reason for delivering the lecture is thus expressed: "At a time like this, when the citizens of several States in this magnificent confederacy are in open rebellion, * * * it is the duty of every patriot and philanthropist to stand up in defense of his country."

He planted himself upon the proposition that there had "been nothing in the legislation and administration of the General Government which caused the secession movement in the South." He was disposed to treat sections of the country fairly, but was courageous in his advocacy of the right as he understood it. Said he: "We should scrupulously yield to the South all the rights guaranteed them by the Constitution of our common country, and not one iota more, should it even save us from all the calamities of civil war. It is no time for unholty compromises. Sure that we are right, we should stand as inflexible as justice, and trust the issue to Almighty God."

He then reviewed, in order and at length, the various charges brought by the South against the people of the North, viz.: (1) The passing, in certain States, of "Personal Liberty Bills;" (2) The existence of "under-ground railroads" for aiding the fugitive slaves; (3) The holding of opinions hostile to the institution of slavery, the publication of books like "Uncle Tom's Cabin," Helper's "Impending Crisis," etc., and the making of inflammatory anti-slavery speeches.

After discussing these points, Mr. McAdam concludes by saying: "Whatever may be the immediate result of the existing state of things, one thing is sure—the ultimate issue will be glorious." His idea of solving the problem then up for solution is tersely put thus: "But what must be done with those citizens of the United States who are now in rebellion against the government? There is but one course—the Federal laws must be enforced, cost what it will. There has been too much lenity already exercised, and the government should bring all its resources to enforce obedience to its laws." His remarks throughout were fortified by copious quotations from the leading statesmen of the South; but they were not acceptable to the entire community. There were many who felt that the effort of the preacher was tinged with partisanship, and needed rebuttal. Two plans were pursued. First, a rejoinder, occupying about five columns and a half of the Democratic Register, was made in the form of an open letter written and signed by the editor, William McKnight. It criticised the lecture strongly for two reasons: First, because it was delivered by a preacher of the Gospel, it being held that the man of God should not leave his usual field and dabble in politics; and, second, because it was claimed to contain partisan statements not in harmony with the truth.

The second effort was to hold a public meeting, at which speeches were to be made and a series of resolutions passed that would reflect the sentiment of the opposition. Accordingly posters signed "Many Citizens" were put up in the town calling "a public meeting of those who prefer the Union and the Constitution to a party platform." The Register likewise published the call, announcing, editorially, that "a Union meeting will be held at the courthouse this evening. Turn out." The meeting was held Thursday, January 22, 1861, the organization consisting of Peter Harnett, Esq., chairman, and Maj. H. Graham and Hon. T. J. Brown, vice-presidents. The opening address was made by John Trunkey, Esq., the recently deceased supreme judge. He pursued, it is said, the general line of argument presented in McKnight's open letter, published the same day. After Mr. Trunkey closed, calls were made for D. W. Findley and R. M. De France. At this point a difficulty arose. The organization embraced only members of the Democratic party, and the speakers belonged only to it, though there were many Republicans in the audience. There was no disposition to hear Judge Findley, inasmuch as he was not in sympathy with the spirit of the meeting, whose object, it was alleged by the Republicans, was to pass a series of resolutions condemning the Republican party as being responsible for the then existing condition of the county and indorsing the Crittenden compromise measure. The Republicans were unwilling to sanction this course, and insisted upon their right to be heard. When it was objected that the gathering was one of Democrats, Johnson Pearson mounted a table and began to read the call for a "Union Meeting," which had been posted all over town. Most of the Republicans finally withdrew from the meeting, and the Democrats carried out their previous intentions. The occasion at that time was a critical one, and but for the ascendancy of the wise counsels of cool-headed men of both parties, bloodshed might have ensued. It is a source of much rejoicing that such a favorable termination occurred, for the people at that date, the inauguration of Mr. Lincoln not having yet occurred, were not in a frame of mind to divest themselves of partisan prejudice.

Two months later, however, when rebel guns had fired upon Fort Sumter and compelled its garrison, under the gallant Maj. Anderson, to surrender, mere partisan sentiment was somewhat dissipated, and men of all shades of political belief began to see that armed treason was really in dead earnest. The only alternative then left was to rally to the support of the general government, put down treason and traitors, maintain the supremacy of the national government under the stars and stripes, and discuss technical points after the matter was all over. As the better class of men viewed the matter, it was unwise, while the house is on fire and devouring flames are sweeping through it in all directions, to stop to discuss how the fire originated and who is responsible for the misfortune. The wise policy is to go to work manfully to save the building, and leave the discussion for a less heated and more auspicious time. Patriotic men—men who loved their country more than they did parties and dogmas—came to the rescue of our imperiled institutions. They furnished means and men and all else necessary to suppress rebellion.

From the ranks of the two great political parties, who a few months before, with almost equal numbers, had stood opposed to each other in a hotly contested campaign of words and ballets, sprang the loyal defenders of the Union. They responded to the call of the new President for aid in suppressing rebellion and maintaining the supremacy of the Constitution and the Union. The roster of every company and every regiment bore the names of these men. They can not be too highly honored for their patriotic course. To them is the nation indebted to-day for its perpetuity and the proud position it occupies among the powers of earth.

In passing, mention of another class must not be forgotten to be made. While troops were enlisting and going to the front, first for the three months' service, and later for nine months, a year and three years, there were devoted friends at home. Men who could not go themselves furnished means to those who did go, or provided protection for the families of those who went. The services of such friends of the government have never been properly appreciated and recognized. And then still another class have been overlooked—the loyal ladies who provided the delicacies and mementoes that encouraged soldiers in the field. Sanitary commissions and Christian commissions and ladies' aid societies of various kinds were invaluable auxiliaries in the crushing of the Rebellion. All such as aided in these directions, as well as by sending letters of cheer and encouragement to loved ones in the field, are deserving of the most grateful recognition by the nation. Could their names be made a part of the war record, as they should, a halo of imperishable glory would encircle the wreath.

It is proper to state, in this connection, that while there were many—too many—of the stay-at-home class, yet, as the war progressed, the better class of people, irrespective of party, rallied to the support of the government. The feeling is very happily expressed in a call issued at Mercer September 2, 1861, and signed by O. H. Gould, W. P. Leech, Samuel Griffith, J. H. Robinson and John Trunkey, for a Union convention. The committee says: "Believing that the preservation of our government, and our institutions under it, are superior to party success, or mere partisan considerations, the delegates to the county convention unite in a call for a Union convention of all true and loyal citizens of the county, irrespective of past party associations, who are in favor of the Union and the Constitution, and of sustaining the government in a vigorous prosecution of the war for the suppression of the existing rebellion and the enforcement of the laws, * * * to nominate a Union ticket."

This union sentiment prevailed, and was a wonderful source of encouragement to soldiers in the field, and to the authorities at Washington. Time and space forbid our giving all the phases of the home contest throughout the war. At times sentiment ran high between the supporters of the Union and those who looked upon the war as a mere partisan affair, prosecuted for personal and partisan aggrandizement. In September, 1863, after the fall of Vicksburg, the capture of Morgan and the battle of Gettysburg, the Union convention at Mercer passed the following resolutions unanimously. They were but part of a series adopted:

1st. We here renew our vows of devotion to the government transmitted to us by the patriots of the Revolution, and pledge our last efforts to maintain its authority and integrity unimpaired.

2d. It is the duty of every friend of the Union to merge all sectional and party feelings in a common patriotism, and by a united and earnest effort, sustain the constituted authorities of the government in their efforts to crush the cruel and wicked Rebellion, which aims at the destruction of the liberty and happiness of thirty millions of an unoffending people, and the universal enslavement of men, women and children, without distinction of race or color.

3d. We approve the policy adopted by the President of the United States in prosecuting the war in support of the authority of the government, and the suppression of the Rebellion, and pledge our support to the administration as the only means of securing a return of that peace and security so much to be desired.

The year 1864 was an exciting one, Gen. Grant having been made lieutenant-general, and commander of all the armies of the United States, the war was prosecuted with special vigor. Sherman moved upon Atlanta, Grant upon Richmond, while Sheridan ran, like a weaver's shuttle, through the valley of the Shenandoah. From that time onward the fortunes of the new Confederacy waned rapidly, and the decree was plainly to be read that "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, should not perish from the earth."

It is not possible in this historic sketch to enter fully into details. They must be found in Bates' History of Pennsylvania Volunteers and in special histories of regiments.

Thirty-ninth Regiment, Tenth Reserves.—This regiment had two companies from Mercer County, B and G. The first was recruited mainly in the vicinity of West Middlesex. It was first under the command of Capt. Thomas McConnell, but subsequently under that of Capt. Joseph B. Pattee.

Company G was recruited at Mercer by Capt. A. J. Warner, then principal of the Mercer schools, but latterly a member of Congress from Marietta, Ohio. He was promoted successively to lieutenant-colonel and colonel, and was finally brevetted a brigadier-general in March, 1864. He was wounded at White Oak Swamp and Antietam.

The regiment was mustered into the United States service July 21, 1861. For a brief period it encamped near Washington. It was transferred in June, 1862, to McClellan's army operating against Richmond, and participated, June 26, at Mechanicsville, where Capt. McConnell was seriously wounded. It met the enemy on the 27th at Gaines' Mill, and again on the 30th, capturing some sixty prisoners on the latter date. The regiment was transferred from the Peninsula to join Gen. Pope, and shared in the terrible battles during the closing days of August and opening days of September, 1862. It was present at South Mountain and Antietam, and later the slaughter of Fredericksburg, where it lost heavily. It shared in the memorable campaign through Maryland and into Pennsylvania in 1863, and was present at Gettysburg. It participated in the pursuit of the retreating hosts, and subsequently in the campaign against Richmond in 1864. Its term of service expiring May 30, it was mustered out June 11, 1864.

Company B.—Captains, Thomas McConnell, Joseph B. Pattee; first lieutenant, Charles N. Jackson; second lieutenant, David Farrell.

Fifty-seventh Regiment.—This organization was formed largely from Mercer County, though companies were obtained in Crawford, Venango, Bradford, Tioga, Wyoming and Susquehanna Counties. Its two principal officers, Col. William Maxwell and Lieut.-Col. E. W. Woods, were both from Mercer County. It rendezvoused at Camp Curtin. In December, 1861, it was sent to Washington, and in February following was assigned to the Army of the Potomac. Col. Maxwell resigned March 1, 1862, and was succeeded by Capt.

Charles T. Campbell, of Franklin County, an officer in the Mexican War. He was promoted to the rank of colonel and assigned command of the new regiment. It participated in the Peninsular campaign under McClellan, being a member of Jameson's brigade, Heintzelman's division. It operated against Yorktown for a month following April 4, 1862, sleeping in the mud as it dug trenches. It lost one man killed and five wounded. During this period much sickness prevailed. On the 24th of May it crossed the Chickahominy, and participated at Fair Oaks on the 31st, where it lost eleven killed and forty-nine wounded. Among the former was Maj. Culp. His place was taken by Capt. S. C. Simonton, promoted to major. He is now postmaster at Clarks-ville. Col. Campbell was severely wounded, and was succeeded in command by Lieut.-Col. Woods.

On the 30th of June the regiment was engaged at Charles City Cross Roads, losing seven killed and fifty-six wounded. Among the latter were Maj. Simonton and Lieut. Morse. It was subsequently engaged at Malvern Hill, where it lost two killed and eight wounded. Lieut. C. O. Etz was one of the former. When the regiment reached Harrison's Landing its ranks were reduced from nearly a thousand men a few months before to fifty-six for active duty. Col. Woods left the regiment here on account of sickness, and soon thereafter was mustered out. Capt. Ralph Maxwell, of Company F, was in command of the regiment for a time. Subsequently Maj. William Birney, of the Fourth New Jersey, brother of Gen. D. B. Birney, was assigned to the command. Having recruited in health, the regiment was transferred with other troops to the army under Gen. Pope. It participated in the terribly severe battles of Second Bull Run, August 29 and 30; Chantilly, September 1. At the latter place was killed the gallant Gen. Kearney, whose body fell within the rebel lines. Four companies of the Fifty-seventh, under a flag of truce, escorted the body into the Union lines. For a month the regiment performed picket duty at Conrad's Ferry, on the Potomac.

Col. Campbell rejoined the regiment on the 10th of October, and was with it at the terrible slaughter at Fredericksburg, December 13, where he was again wounded. In this engagement the losses were twenty-one killed, seventy-six wounded and seventy-eight missing. Capt. Ralph Maxwell, now of Greenville, commanded the regiment temporarily after Campbell's being wounded, but Capt. Peter Sides, of Company A, was promoted to be lieutenant-colonel, and relieved Capt. Maxwell. The next severe engagement was that of Chancellorsville, in May, 1863. The regiment lost in killed, two officers and eleven men; in wounded, three officers and forty-five men. Among the killed were Capt. Edson Rice and Lieut. Joseph Brady.

From July 1 to 3, at the famous battle of Gettysburg, the regiment performed a conspicuous part, its losses being: Killed, twelve; wounded, forty-five, and missing, forty-five. Lieuts. Henry Mitchell and John F. Cox were killed; Col. Sides was wounded, and Maj. Neeper and Lieuts. Burns, Crossly and Hines were captured. It performed efficient service in chasing the retreating rebels from Pennsylvania soil back to "Old Virginia."

Many of the men, having re-enlisted during the winter of 1863, received a veteran furlough on January 8, 1864. They returned with numerous recruits for the campaign of 1864. On the 3d of May it was heavily engaged with the enemy at the intersection of the Brock and Plank roads. Its losses were: killed, twenty-two; wounded, 128. Among the latter was Col. Sides. The command devolved upon Capt. A. H. Nelson, of Company K. It was a member of Hancock's command on the 12th of May, when an entire rebel division was captured. The regiment lost seven killed, twenty wounded and three missing. Among the killed was Lieut. J. C. Green. It bore a conspicuous part at North Anna River and Cold Harbor, losing many men. Capt. Edgar Williams and Lieut. John Bowers and Henry M. Adams were killed.

The regiment participated in the siege of Petersburg. Lieut.-Col. William B. Neeper, long exhausted by imprisonment, returned and assumed command of the regiment. Col. Sides having tendered his resignation, it was accepted November 26, 1864. Capt. L. D. Bumpus was appointed to be his successor. The command was consolidated into six companies January 11, 1865. A few days later the same was done with the Eighty-fourth, and its battalion was joined with that of the Fifty-seventh. Lieut.-Col. George Zinn, of the Eighty-fourth, became colonel. Capt. George W. Perkins, of Company K, was promoted to lieutenant-colonel, and Samuel Bryan, of the Eighty-fourth, was made major. At the fighting about Fort Steadman the regiment took more than a hundred prisoners. It was present at the surrender of Lee's army at Appomattox Court-house. It was mustered out of service at Alexandria, Va., June 22, 1865.

Seventy-seventh Regiment.—Only a part of one company (E) went from Mercer County. The regiment was organized at Pittsburgh, and went thence to the western army, arriving at Louisville October 18, 1861. In the following March it proceeded to Nashville, when it moved with Buell's army to the battle-field of Shiloh, where it participated in the second day's engagement, April 7, the only Pennsylvania regiment on the bloody field. It took part in Halleck's farcical siege of Corinth, and subsequently belonged to the Army of the Cumberland, and bore a heroic part with Rosecrans in the bloody battles of Stone River, Liberty Gap and Chickamauga. It took part in the later movements around Chattanooga, shared in the Atlanta campaign, and then aided Schofield and Thomas in the sanguinary struggles of Franklin and Nashville. After the war was virtually over it was sent to Texas. Remaining some months, it returned to Philadelphia, January 16, 1866, and was mustered out soon thereafter.

One Hundredth Regiment.—This regiment, known as the "Round-heads," had one company from Mercer County, Company G, recruited mainly in Worth Township. Simeon A. Brown was the first captain. He was succeeded respectively by Capts. Thomas H. Curt, John P. Blair and Samuel R. Grace. Capt. Brown was killed at the second Bull Run battle, August 29, 1862, and Lieut. Curt was wounded. Capt. Grace, then only a sergeant, was wounded at Chantilly, September 1, and subsequently at Petersburg. Lieut. P. B. Rayen was killed at Bull Run on the same day with Capt. Brown. The regiment went successively to Port Royal, Charleston and then back to Port Royal. It was with Pope in Virginia during the month of August, 1862, and then at South Mountain, Antietam, Fredricksburgh; then with the Ninth corps went to Vicksburg, Miss., then to Jackson, and thence to Knoxville, Tenn., during the siege of that place. Having passed through Grant's campaign, in 1864, it was mustered out July 24, 1865.

One Hundred and Thirty-ninth Regiment.—Of this regiment, Company A was from Mercer County, mainly from Mercer, Leesburg, Hamburg, New Lebanon, and the townships of Delaware, Fairview and Wolf Creek. Capt. A. H. Snyder and Lieut. James P. McKean were from Mercer; Lieuts. A. C. Douglass and William S. Leech were from New Lebanon; Lieuts. John Orr and McLean Thorn were from Leesburg; Lieut. A. T. Black was from Liberty, and Lieut. E. C. Grace from Worth. Capt. Snyder, promoted to major, was killed in the Wilderness May 5, 1864. Lieut. Grace shared the same fate the same day. Lieut. Orr died September 27, 1863. Lieut. Douglass was promoted to be captain, and brevetted a major. He was wounded in the Wilderness May 6, 1864. The regiment performed its first military service on the field of Second Bull Run battle, where they buried 1,799 bodies which the rebels had left upon the ground. The regiment was present at Fredericksburg, but did not participate in the battle. At Chancellorsville it lost 123 men in killed and wounded. It was also engaged at Gettysburg, where Company A lost one killed and several wounded. It shared in the Richmond campaign until July 9, when it accompanied the Sixth corps to Washington, and thence to the Shenandoah under Sheridan. After Early's defeat it returned to the Army of the Potomac around Petersburg, and continued with it until Lee's surrender at Appomattox. It was mustered out shortly thereafter. Company D had Sergts. William Gregory and Stephen H. Barnett, two Mercer County men.

Company A.—Captains: Abraham H. Snyder, Arthur C. Douglass; first lieutenants: John Orr, William S. Leech, Joseph T. Black; second lieutenants: McLean Thorn, Ephraim C. Grace, James P. McKean.

Sergeants: James S. Maguire, Ephraim C. Voorhies, Carlton Rice, Alexander M. Hoge, Thomas Tanner, John E. Beil, Samuel Walters, Robert J. Pardoe.

Corporals: James M. Stamm, Francis A. Filson, James Patterson, David P. Orr, James B. McCurdy, S. B. Patterson, John N. Reznor, John I. Gordon, Reed W. Moore, George W. Burns, Allison N. Clawson, William H. Dight, Franklin E. Cole, Hector McCahan, William J. Gibson, James F. Brandon, R. W. McFarland.

Musicians: Wilson Dean, George W. Riddle.

One Hundred and Fortieth Regiment.—This regiment had but one company from Mercer County, viz., Company B. Its officers were: Cpts. Thomas B. Rodgers and Jason T. Giebner, from Mercer; Capt. A. C. Grove, from New Lebanon; Capt. R. C. Craig, from Pine Grove (Grove City); Lieut. John Satterfield, from Hickory Township; Lieut. George Tanner, from Mercer. Capt. Grove and Lieut. Satterfield were wounded at Cold Harbor. The first fighting by the regiment occurred under Hancock, at Chancellorsville. It next engaged at Gettysburg, where its gallant colonel, R. B. Roberts, was killed; Capt. Rodgers was taken prisoner. He was promoted to major to date July 4, 1863. The regiment took an active part in the great campaign of 1864. Its muster-out occurred May 31, 1865.

Company B.—Captains: Thomas B. Rodgers, Jason T. Giebner, Abram C. Grove, Ranel C. Craig; first lieutenant, John Satterfield; second lieutenant, George Tanner.

Sergeants: John Fox, James C. Nolan, Charles W. Giebner, George Perrine, James L. Griffin, Samuel B. Rodgers, George W. Smail, John W. Johnson.

Corporals: James I. Smith, Alfred Ritner, Benjamin A. Paston, George Rose, Daniel B. Moyer, John Roberts, George D. Moore, Price Dilley, Isaac Davis, Henry Rafferty, Alexander Patton, William Patton, Robert G. Davidson, Robert B. Porter, Thomas G. Eagles, Samuel Holmes.

Musicians: David B. Sinclair, Charles Vath, Thomas J. Cozad.

Privates: D. W. Armstrong, William Blair, William Brannan, Hugh Bradberry, Wilson Bean, George M. Bennett, Nathaniel Breast, Joseph Brackley, William P. Buchanan, Samuel B. Bruner, John L. One Hundred and Forty-second Regiment.—Of this regiment, Company A was from Mercer County, mainly from West Middlesex and vicinity; Capts. Horatio N. Warren and Frank M. Powell and Lieut. Martin A. Gilson were all from West Middlesex. The regiment, under command of Col. Robert P. Cummins, Lieut.-Col. Alfred B. McCalmont and Maj. John Bradley, rendezvoused at Camp Curtin in August, 1862. Its service was confined to work on Fort Stevens, Washington; in guarding Frederick, Md., and taking care of the wounded from South Mountain and Antietam; under Meade to share in the battles of Fredericksburg and Chancellorsville, and subsequently at Gettysburg. At the latter place Col. Cummins was mortally wounded; Lieut. F. M. Powell was also wounded. Capt. Warren was promoted in succession to be major, lieutenant-colonel and colonel. In the last capacity he acted until the day of muster-out, May 29, 1865.

Company A.—Captains: Horatio N. Warren, Frank M. Powell; first lieutenant, Martin A. Gilson.

Sergeants: Cyrus B. Thompson, Thomas J. Wood, Alfred H. Goble, Alexander S. Love, John Harsh, John McConnell, William G. Drum, Morgan B. Shirk.

Corporals: Beriah Orr, John Gundy, Jr., John Hosack, William Healey, Lester Moore, Edwin F. Stiles, Joseph Jones, William Jeremiah.

Musicians: Robert E. Gundy, William J. Reed.

Webster, William Williams, William T. Williams, James W. Webster, James A. Williamson, Job Williams.

One Hundred and Forty-fifth Regiment.—This regiment rendezvoused at Erie, under Col. Hiram L. Brown, Lieut. Col. D. B. McCreary and Maj. John W. Patton. Company G was recruited by its captain, William W. Wood, in and about Greenville. Its captains, following Wood, were Thomas F. McCreary and George F. C. Smart; its lieutenants were Joseph L. Linn, John W. Vincent, Robert C. McClure and Stephen A. Osborne. The regiment left Erie for Chambersburg September 11, 1862, and was present at Antietam, its first sanguinary engagement. After the battle it was detailed to bury the dead, which produced much sickness among the men. It engaged in the battle of Fredricksburg, December 13, where it lost heavily. Capt. Wood and Lieut. Vincent were mortally wounded. It took part subsequently at Chancellorsville and Gettysburg, losing many men and capturing many prisoners. In the great campaign under Grant in 1864 it did its work manfully. In the operations about Petersburg many of its members were captured and sent south—the officers to Macon, and the men to Andersonville. The portion not captured remained with the army of the Potomac until the close of the war. They were mustered out June 5, 1865.

At the annual reunion of the survivors of the One Hundred and Forty-fifth, held at Corry, Penn., September 18, 1888, Capt. J. C. Hilton read a sketch of the regiment, from which we cull the following to illustrate its gallant record:

“I would like to call the attention of any who have read the Century magazine of May, 1888, to the part your regiment figured in the late war. We will take for our basis the killed and mortally wounded. I would not wish to take any honors from any regiment, but will only use in comparison the figures of our old neighbors, the Fifth New Hampshire of the Second corps. This was the best regiment in the whole army (according to Col. Fox’s report). Col. Cross, as he marched directly behind me into the battle of Gettysburg, spoke to me as follows: ‘Don’t forget to-day that you are fighting in your own State, and give them the best you have.’ In fifty minutes afterward he was killed, after having been wounded in eleven different engagements.

“This regiment lost during the war 295—yours lost 205. They lost eighteen officers, and you lost eighteen officers, killed and wounded. Their percentage was 17.9; yours 14.1, you having enrolled 1,456 men. There were 2,200,000 enlistments during the war, and the loss in killed was 5 per cent. The largest number lost by the Fifth New Hampshire in one battle was 69 at Cold Harbor. You lost at Fredricksburg, with only eight companies engaged, 91 men and 9 officers killed. The Fifth New Hampshire lost of disease, accidents, etc., 178; you lost 227. Total killed, wounded, and missing (which include 98 taken prisoners and starved to death), the Fifth New Hampshire lost 1,051; you lost 947.

“Now take from after the battle of Antietam in 1862, when your regiment joined the army of the Potomac, and we find the Fifth New Hampshire lost 230 and you lost 205, the best regiment losing but 25 men more than yours, and from Antietam you participated in all the engagements with the best corps in the army—the Second Corps—the corps that made the longest marches, did the most fighting and lost the most men; and why should it not be when it had Hancock, the superb, to lead it.

“These are statistics obtained from the rolls and histories at Washington, and not idle words. The largest number of officers killed in any one battle from one regiment was ‘in the Seventh New Hampshire at Fort Wagner.’ You come next with nine officers killed at Fredericksburgh (and only eight companies engaged). You are numbered among the forty-five regiments who lost over 200 men killed in the war.”

Company G.—Captains, William W. W. Wood, Thomas F. McCreary, George F. C. Smart; first lieutenant, Joseph L. Linn; second lieutenants, John W. Vincent, Robert C. McClure, Stephen A. Osborne.

Sergeants: George H. Nickerson, James Heckman, Clinton C. Hutcheson, Emanuel Kile, Amos A. Yeakel, William A. Keck, Andrew E. Slater, John C. Dickey, Robert B. Warnock, George W. Poole, James W. Boies.

Corporals: David W. Webster, Elias A. Jones, George L. Palm, Francis Menold, Isaiah McCartney, Thomas E. Clingan, Joseph M. Kitch, William Heckman, J. Q. A. McPherrin, John H. Leech, B. F. Zimmerman, Josiah C. Long, George W. Lee, William M. Davis, George Benson.

One Hundred and Sixty-ninth Regiment.—This regiment was raised for nine months. It was organized at Pittsburgh, October 28, 1862. It went to Washington and thence to Fortress Monroe. For a time it did picket duty at Yorktown and Gloucester Point. Much sickness characterized its career. In the early part of 1863 it was attached to the Eleventh Corps, and did valiant service. It was mustered out July 27, 1863. Companies A and D were from Mercer County, the former being commanded by Capt. John D. Hill, and the latter by Capt. Anthony Struble.

Company A.—Captain, John D. Hill; first lieutenant, William M. Cochran; second lieutenant, James R. Bean.

Corporals: Joshua F. Davis, James W. Cozad, Samuel M. Hawn, James Gill, James H. Hamilton, John J. Porter, Matthew J. Andrews, George W. Armstrong.

Two Hundred and Eleventh Regiment.—Company D, Capt. William A. Colton in command, was from Mercer County. The regiment was recruited for one year, and was organized at Pittsburgh in September, 1864. It went to Bermuda Hundred, and was assigned to the army of the James. It was transferred, November 27, 1864, to the army of the Potomac, and attached to the Third Division of the Ninth Corps, under command of Gen. Hartranft. Under command of Capt. Coulter it shared in the capture of Fort Steadman, March 25, 1865, with small loss. In the assault upon the enemy's lines April 2, 1865, it lost 135 men. It continued in service until after Lee's surrender, being mustered out June 2, 1865. Capt. Coulter was promoted for gallant conduct to the lieutenant colonelcy May 10, 1865.

Company D.—Captains, William A. Coulter, Thomas C. Gibson; lieutenants, Albert Alexander, James F. Johnston.

Corporals: John J. Moore, Daniel A. Snyder, Thomas C. Glenn, Joseph Bentley, Uriah S. Zahniser, William C. Black, Wilson Donaldson, James T. Baker, E. H. Armstrong.

Miscellaneous Troops.—Many volunteers left Mercer County and enlisted elsewhere, and it is impossible to give the names of all these men. A number of men went from Greenville and vicinity to Erie, Penn., and enlisted under Capt. T. M. Austin, in Company K, Eighty-third Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, for three years, from September, 1861. Their names, as furnished by W. H. Beil, cashier of the Greenville National Bank, are as follows: James McMahon, Isaac Keck, John Greenawalt, Henry Heckman, Thomas J. Power, Jr., E. W. Reed, Adam Urmson, Nelson R. Hays, Philip J. Harlow, Herman Miller and W. H. Beil. Most of these gentlemen returned and are still living. Capt. A. J. McKee and Lieuts. A. C. Douglass and Fleming Smith, of the same regiment, were also from this county, and served in the army of the Potomac. Privates Thomas and Hosea Morrison, David Pattison and William Ayres were in the same regiment.

In the fall of 1861 Judge Taylor, of Franklin County, secured from the vicinity of New Vernon the following men, who served in Company I, Fourth Pennsylvania Cavalry, of which Taylor was captain: Captain, F. M. Ervay; lieutenant, John B. Hogue; sergeants, John Findley, H. A. Ross and Daniel Holloway; corporals, William Streight and M. B. Roberts; privates, David McCracken, Alexander James, G. W. Bromley, William McCutcheon, John Vorous.

Thomas B. Beil, of Sharon, served in Company K, Sixty-third Regiment; T. J. Gillespie, of Sharon, was in Company B, Fifty-fifth Pennsylvania Militia; Daniel Hasenplug, of Greenville, served in the Fifty-eighth and One Hundred and Ninety-ninth Regiments, successively; James B. McClimans, of Greenville, was in the Second Pennsylvania Cavalry, and Christian Keller, father of the late Frank Keller, of Greenville, served in Company K, Sixty-first Pennsylvania Volunteers.

Several physicians of Mercer County served in the capacity of surgeon, among whom were Drs. Elisha Griswold, of Sharon, and F. H. Leet, of Greenville. The former was appointed surgeon of the One Hundred and Twelfth Regiment in November, 1861, and served until 1864, and afterward was promoted to other responsible positions in the medical service. Dr. Leet was appointed assistant surgeon of the Fifty-seventh Regiment in January, 1863, and served nine months. Dr. Anson T. Clark, now of Greenville, was appointed from Crawford County in May, 1863, assistant surgeon of the Twenty-third Regiment, and filled that position until the fall of 1864, when the regimental term of enlistment expired. Dr. J. P. Hosack, of Mercer, was a surgeon during the war, as was also Dr. John Barber, of Sharon.

The closing operations of the Union armies brought victories most signal. The last great battle had been fought and won, and every patriot participated in the inspiration of the triumphs of our arms over the hosts of rebellion. But an appalling sorrow suddenly overshadowed the land. The assassin's hand struck down the nation's ruler, and turned its joy into grief. In all the bitter sorrows of the previous four years none proved so startling as this, and every true heart was filled with consternation at the inhuman desperation of the act. The succeeding days in Mercer County were days of gloom and sadness, and the deep impression made by the assassination of Lincoln, so closely associated as it was with the Rebellion, can never be effaced from the hearts of the people.

If the foregoing sketches will serve to perpetuate the glorious part taken by the soldiers of Mercer County in the Rebellion, our object is attained. When the tocsin of war sounded they went forth in all their vigorous manhood to battle for national life, and on many a bloody field carried the dear old flag to victory. Many went down in the crash of battle; scores sickened and died from exposure and hardships on the tented field, or starvation in rebel prisons; others returned scarred and maimed for life, while many came out unscathed again to resume their places in civil affairs. The events of this war have passed into history. The youthful student is bewildered with the recital of its gigantic proportions, and the son listens with wonder to the tale of bloody strife as it falls from the lips of the surviving father who served in the struggle. The mother relates the anguish and long years of anxiety and suffering in those dark days. All are familiar through written records with the causes which produced the great Rebellion, its fierce continuance, its glorious termination, and the fruits left for the enjoyment of coming generations.

IN the gathering of material for a local history much valuable information cannot be classified under the ordinary heads. We shall therefore place such fragmentary matter in this chapter, and believe our readers will find much interest in the many historical items which it embraces. When Mercer County was first settled Indians were quite numerous, especially along the Shenango and its tributaries. They were, in the main, friendly, and lived at peace with the whites. They had a number of villages in the county. One of these, called "Centretown," was located near that village, in Worth Township. It was among the sugar trees where they raised their corn. Another was on the present site of Sandy Lake; it occupied the Knoll property, which formerly belonged to Dr. Vath. Another was at the Big Bend of the Shenango. It was occupied by some families of the Corn-planter tribe of the Senecas. Among their hunters were Flynn, Tioga, Kindoshawa, Harthegig, Peter and Petty.

The venerable James Bentley, still living in Ohio, near Sharon, in his ninety-first year, relates the following concerning the fate of Flynn. Flynn had obtained some whisky near Mercer, and becoming beastly drunk killed his wife. Capt. Petty refused to punish him for the offense. Finally Hugh Carr, a white man, said that if he found Flynn he would punish him. Ultimately, at Keel Ridge, six miles east of Sharon, on the present Samuel Phillips farm, he overtook Flynn tying his moccasin upon his foot. True to his word, Carr drew up his rifle and shot Flynn through the head, killing him instantly. Mr. Bentley, then a boy (it was about 1804), asked Capt. Petty why he did not punish Flynn. The answer was: "Him drunk. Him never do so any more."

The Delawares lived at the junction of the Shenango and the Mahoning. Their chief was called Billy Bowlegs. Shenango was the Indian warrior who owned all the hunting lands from New Castle northward along the stream which bears his name. Pymatuning and Wannock were his subordinates, and gave their names to the two creeks, Pymatuning and Lackawannock. In the latter case, the little lake which is the source of the stream was prefixed, making it Lacka (Latin Lacus) wannock.

Concerning the fate of Harthegig, the reader is referred to the sketch of Samuel Pew, found in another part of this volume. The Pews knew much concerning the Indians. Samuel related the following incident concerning Peter, one of their number. Peter was a favorite red man with the Pews. One day he came to the Pew cabin in Mercer just as Mrs. Pew had taken out of her Dutch oven a large corn pone that she had been baking. Peter proposed a trade. He wanted the pone, and would exchange a bear for it. Mrs. Pew thought he was cheating himself. She would give him the pone, but thought it would not be right to take the bear for it. Rising with all his Indian dignity, he said: "Me know what is right—the bear for the pone." There was no disputing the Indian without insulting him, and hence the bargain was closed. Mr. Pew went with Peter for the bear, which was found but a little distance up the hill, near the intersection of Otter and East Market Streets; there, indeed, was found a large and neatly dressed bruin. In addition to the pone, set down on the table for the use of Peter, was a slice of butter and a tin of milk. After eating and satisfying his hunger, Peter complimented the lady of the house by saying as he rose: "White woman such good cook." The Indians aided the whites in their house-raising. They appreciated very highly, on such occasions, the whisky and the good meals provided for the hands.

On one occasion the Indian known as John, belonging to the Centretown family, came to Mr. Pew to borrow some lead. Pew showed him that he was short, having only enough to make one or two bullets. "No lead, no venison; we must have it," said John. Then instructing Mr. Pew to have a big fire in the afternoon, he left. He came back at the appointed time with ore enough to produce ten pounds of lead, which was equally divided between himself and Pew. He went in the direction of Bald Hill, but it was never ascertained where he obtained the ore. The query still remains: Does Mercer County produce native lead ore?

Prehistoric Remains.—It has always been believed that a mound which formerly stood between the two Shenangos, within the borough of Greenville, was a prehistoric earthwork. The elevation, which measured some seventy-five feet in diameter across the base and twenty feet in height, was graded down some three or four years ago by Mr. Packard. The round condition of the pebbles still remaining in the base, and the general structure of the valley about it, would seem to indicate to the geologist that the foundation of the mound, at least, was produced by the action of the water from the two streams forming an eddy, rather than by the dusky tribes, though the latter may have built an earthwork upon this foundation in ages long ago.

In the southwest part of West Salem Township, on the lands of Messrs. Pollock and Bidlick, are the remains of what is called the "Old Indian Fort." It is situated between two small rivulets flowing from the east, and entering Booth Run at right angles. These rivulets, flowing along parallel ravines or gulches, are more than a hundred feet beneath the top of the intervening ridge, and are about a fourth of a mile apart. The earthen embankments which constitute the supposed fort are parallel, and run at right angles with the gulches. These embankments, which are about twenty-five rods apart, were several feet high, and were thrown up from the outside and inside, respectively, commencing on the east. When the fort was constructed, by whom and for what purpose, are simply fruitful subjects for conjecture. On the eastern embankment is the stump of a tree which was cut down about twenty years ago. The stump measures twenty-seven inches in diameter. The tree had grown since the embankment was thrown up, and would indicate the lapse of several hundred years, thus throwing the construction back of the French and Indian War, beyond the times of even the French exploring expedition of Celoron. Its purpose seems to have been mainly defensive. It would seem that an attack was expected mainly from the west, and that the parallel trenches were double lines of defense, the eastern one being used in case the other was carried by assault. It may have been the work of an Indian tribe to defend itself against the assaults of a powerful enemy.

Slaves in Mercer County.—According to the census of 1830 there were six slaves within the limits of Mercer County, as follows: Males between 10 and 24 years, 2; males between 24 and 36 years, 1. Females under 10 years, 1; females between 10 and 24 years, 2; total, 6.

Natural Occurrences.—Some of the most interesting things in all history are preserved in a very ordinary way. Tombstones, ordinary friendship and news letters, diaries, memorandums, church registers, family records, newspapers, memories of old people, books of travel, family and personal biographies, monuments, legends—all these are instrumental in chronicling the events in the lapse of time. If people would be more careful to keep these records, history would be more reliable, and much litigation would be prevented or made more just, because actual knowledge would be substituted for promiscuous guessing.

The following miscellaneous facts may be of general interest:

1. Heavy Snows. The deepest snow of the past ninety years occurred in the winter of 1799. It began to fall on Friday evening, and continued to fall, without interruption, until the next Monday morning. It was from three to five feet deep. It was impossible for horses and cattle to reach their watering places. Deer and other wild animals died from starvation.

The second heavy snow was that of February 4, 1817, which was three and one-half feet deep. The writer has been informed by J. Pearson, Esq., that his father drove a team from New Castle to Mercer at that time. He was unable to find the road, and hence followed direction instead. After the snow was gone he found, from the trees and other marks, that he had driven some rods from the road, over fences and logs.

The year 1856 was noted for its long continued snow. There were ninety days of uninterrupted sleighing. The winter was exceedingly cold, too.

2. Peculiar Winters. January 19, 1810, was said to have been the coldest day within the memory of the oldest inhabitant. The winter of 1824 was almost destitute of snow. The first sleighing of the season occurred on the 15th of February. January 1, 1864, is generally remembered as the "Cold New Year's Day of '64." The writer was at the headquarters of the Twenty-third Army Corps, at Strawberry Plains, East Tennessee. The corps commander, Maj. Gen. J. D. Cox, afterward governor of Ohio, and Secretary of the Interior under President Grant, says that the Union army in East Tennessee endured suffering equal to that of Washington's army at Valley Forge in 1777-78. The winter of 1875-76 was very warm. On January 1, 1876, the mercury stood at 68° in the sun, and men walked the streets in their shirt sleeves. The winter of 1871 had eighty days of continuous cold weather.

3. Miscellaneous Facts Concerning the Seasons. On May 18, 1833, there had been snow and freezing for three days, the ice being half an inch in thickness.

September 8, 1835, there was a hard frost, which killed the corn. Seed corn sold at $2 per bushel in consequence.

June 2, 1845, a severe frost, which nearly ruined the wheat and corn.

1854 was known as the dry summer. Extensive fires raged in the forests, burning trees out of root. Weevil began to destroy wheat.

The year 1855 was noted as being very wet. Grain was harvested with difficulty, much of it being spoiled in the shock. The ensuing winter was cold, and supplied with deep snow.

June 5, 1859, was the day of the heavy frost which entirely destroyed wheat, rye and corn.

March 17, 1860, bees returned to their hives laden with honey. The next day the ground was covered with snow, and the weather was extremely cold.

4. Heavy Floods. The heavy floods in the Ohio River, which affected its tributaries, occurred in 1810 (the "Punkin Flood"), 1832, 1852, 1865 and 1884. The last one was the highest and most destructive.

5. Locust Years. Without referring to the swarm that came upon Pharaoh to induce him to let the Israelites depart from the land of Goshen, let it be noted that the first remarkable visitation of this insect, of which any record is had, occurred in 1795. They came up from the south in dark swarms, and remained about six weeks. Subsequent visits were made every seventeen years, viz., in 1812, 1829, 1846, 1863 and 1880. Because they happened to come in 1812, 1846 and 1863, during the wars with England, Mexico and the great Rebellion, they are supposed to have war-like proclivities.

Wolf-killing among the Pioneers.—The deadly enemy of the pioneer flocks was the wolf. A premium of $8 was placed upon his head, to be paid out of the common funds. The presentation of the scalp, together with the certificate of the hunter, was sufficient evidence to the commissioners to issue a warrant upon the treasurer for the amount. This warrant enabled the pioneer to pay his taxes and other expenses. An examination of the records of the commissioners' office for 1807 reveals the number of wolves killed, the names of the hunters, and the amount paid for such service. The following is the record:

A Veritable Snake Story.—The following story has come to us through a number of reliable sources. In no instance has it been diminished. We give it as recorded in Mr. Garvin's note-book: "John Johnson's wife went out early in the morning to get her cows. In a little while she found herself surrounded with rattlesnakes, and her retreat cut off. They appeared to be in very great numbers, and the woman sought safety by climbing a dogwood that stood near by. Her cries alarmed her husband, who, when he came, was so astounded with their numbers that he feared trying alone to relieve his wife. 'Polly, I can't relieve you alone, there are so many of them;' and running to his neighbor, Asa Arnold, for his assistance, he came back with new courage. With large hickory poles, or withes, these two cut their way through the snakes until the beleaguered woman was relieved. Both men sickened in their work of destroying the reptiles, and had to desist and rest for a time, and then go at it again. The yellow rattlesnakes were counted and piled, and numbered no less than 200, while there were many black and other snakes left on the ground uncounted. Some of the sets of rattles counted as many as twenty-five." This battle with the rattlesnakes occurred between 1800 and 1803, on the Asa Arnold farm, on the west side of "Yankee Ridge." The snakes seemed to crawl out of the rocks on the west side of the ridge by hundreds.

A Rare Surgical Operation.—Miar Cook, who lived on the Wilmington road, a few years later, was bit by a rattlesnake. His leg was very much swollen, and at length gangrene commenced. Dr. Slemmons, who was then located in Mercer, determined that to save his life the limb must be amputated, and the patient submitted to the operation. The doctor performed the cutting, but McCurdy, a carpenter, was called upon to do the sawing. Whether this was because the doctor was not the possessor of an amputating saw, or preferred to use the skill of a mechanic, is not known. Cook was seen to dance on his wooden leg as late as 1812.

Why Lawrence County Was Erected.—In 1849 was formed, from Beaver and Mercer Counties, what is now known as Lawrence County. The agitation of the question of forming a new county began as early as 1820, and was continued with great persistence through the intervening years, and by all legitimate agencies, until it was finally consummated. The reasons urged by the advocates of the new county were as follows: 1. New Castle was a thriving place and favorably located to accommodate those living in its vicinity, either north or south. 2. The dividing line between Beaver and Mercer ran through the corporation. Legal process served in one county was easily thwarted by stepping into the adjoining county. 3. Many citizens were compelled to travel long distances to transact county business at either Mercer or Beaver. The new county project was supported by such men as L. L. McGuffin, William Dickson, William Moore, John L. Warnock, Joseph T. Boyd, James Dickson, Isaac Dickson, Thomas Falls, Joseph Kissick, John N. Ewer, Dr. Charles T. Whippoo, James Cubbison, and others. The bill for the division was introduced in March, 1849, and signed by Gov. William F. Johnston on the 5th of April following.

Mercer County's Phrenology.—An examination of the outline map of the county, published some years ago, reveals a peculiar phrenological configuration, as developed by the Shenango River. It is that of a human head, looking steadily and intently into Ohio. Commencing at the Big Bend, the river flows first westward, and then, returning upon itself, moves southward and eastward, until it passes, in succession, Clarksville, Sharpsville, Sharon, Wheatland and West Middlesex, going on to contribute its waters with those of the Neshannock and Mahoning to the Big Beaver and the Ohio. If we conceive the outline to be completed, Mercer would be found on the rear of the head, and Hickory Corners, or Hermitage, would be located at the ear. Under this arrangement Mercer would be found at philoprogenitiveness, Big Bend at firmness, Clarksville at veneration, Sharpsville at benevolence, Sharon being found above and between the eyes would be found at memory, Wheatland at the mouth, and West Middlesex at the Adam's apple. As to Greenville, Sheakleyville, New Lebanon, Sandy Lake, Stoneboro and Grove City, they would all appear as ornaments on the hat or high bonnet which surmounted this head. They need not regret their position, for the great question now is, whether the hat belongs to the head, or the head to the hat.

Distinguished Visitors.—Mercer County has had some distinguished visitors. It is thought that Washington, in executing his mission from Gov. Dinwiddie in 1753 to the French forts, passed through the northeastern corner of the county. Gen. Lafayette, in his second trip to the United States, in 1824, passed through Mercer, and occupied a room over night at the Hackney House. The year 1849 was noted for the appearance of two distinguished officials in Mercer County. The one was Zachary Taylor, President of the United States. He remained all night at the Hackney House. He was accompanied by Gov. Johnston, of Pennsylvania. From Mercer they went to Meadville and Erie, stopping for dinner at Sheakleyville, where he made a brief speech in response to an address of welcome by George Sheakley.

While at dinner his attention was drawn to the booming of a cannon, and on inquiring as to whom was paying him the honor, learned that it was not his Whig admirers, but Mrs. William Dunn, wife of the Democratic landlord of the opposition hotel, familiarly known as "Queen Ann." Gen. Taylor at once expressed a wish to call upon her. On reaching Dunn's hotel, called the "Spirit of '76," he asked for the hostess, and taking her hand thanked her for the patriotic courtesies shown the President. "Queen Ann," with true Democratic courage, at once said: "That salute was not given in honor of the President, sir." "Then for whom was it given, madam?" asked the now astonished dignitary. "It was given in honor of the bravest General of the Mexican War," replied "Queen Ann." President Taylor bowed gallantly and laughed heartily at the characteristic Democratic reply, and again warmly thanking her for the honor paid him, and the patriotism exhibited, bid her good-bye and soon after left the village.

The second person was James Buchanan, subsequently President of the United States. He remained over night in Mercer, whither he had come from Meadville, where he had been visiting his sister, Mrs. Dr. C. M. Yates, seriously ill at the time.

Men of Mark.—Mercer County has never furnished any Presidents. She has, however, supplied other positions with men and women of note, who have acted well their parts in their several spheres, and gained distinction. Two of her adopted sons subsequently held gubernatorial honors, John Bigler, in California, and William Bigler, in Pennsylvania, both being elected at the same time, in 1851.

In the ranks of divines it has turned out Rt. Rev. Thomas S. Becker, Catholic Bishop of Savannah, Ga.; George and D. X. Junkin; J. T. Smith, now of Baltimore; William Findley, lately deceased at New Castle, D. H. A. McLean, of Rochester, Penn., and many others of less brilliant attainments.

In the ranks of journalism it produced William S. Garvin, Adam Black Chambers, William F. Clark and John B. Butler, all of State reputation.

In the line of Congressional representatives it has marshalled Hons. John Banks, William Stewart, William S. Garvin, Michael C. Trout, John J. Pearson, Samuel Griffith, James Sheakley, S. H. Miller and Norman Hall.

In the ranks of brilliant attorneys it has had S. B. Foster, T. S. Cunningham, William M. Stephenson, William Stewart, Henry D. Foster, H. H. Foster, John Banks, John J. Pearson, Arcus McDermitt, John Trunkey, and others, all deceased.

For the bench it has furnished John Banks, John J. Pearson, John Trunkey, William Maxwell, Arcus McDermitt and S. S. Mehard, all of wide reputation.

James Bowman achieved a popularity both in America and Europe as a portrait painter.

In other fields of noble activity, her sons and daughters have not been wanting when weighed in the balance.

First Piano in Mercer County.—The first piano that was brought to this county is still in the possession of the family of Dr. James Magoffin, of Mercer, and is highly prized for the hallowed memories with which it is associated. It was brought from Dublin, Ireland, by Mrs. Magoffin, then Miss Grace E. Mitcheltree, who came to this country with the family of her father, Dr. William Mitcheltree, in the year 1825. It is of English manufacture, Astor & Co., London. Although smaller than the pianos of the present day, it is of exquisite workmanship. The frame work is of mahogany and satinwood. It was a great curiosity at that time, and many were the visitors to see and hear it.

Muster Days.—Every citizen above middle age remembers vividly the "muster days" of the olden times, when companies would collect at stated places once or twice a year, to go through the prescribed routine of training. The uniforms were as various as the individuals, and the arms presented the same mixed condition, consisting of muskets, wooden guns, broomsticks, cornstalks, canes, etc., ad infinitum. The occasions were made memorable by the number of fights had, the amount of whisky consumed and the "general good time enjoyed." Old grudges were settled on the field of martial combat, and the various champions of the region round about had a fair opportunity to display their powers.

Rev. D. X. Junkin relates substantially the following: About 1821 there were several uniformed companies in the county, the "Mercer Light Infantry," Capt. Benjamin Junkin; the "Shenango Marksmen," Capt. William Sheriff; the "Wolf Creek Rangers," Capt. David Robinson; the "Salem Rangers," Capt. Samuel Williamson; a company from the vicinity of Harrisville (name unknown), and one from New Castle, Capt. Samuel Byers. These were organized into the One Hundred and Twenty-first Regiment Pennsylvania Militia. Capt. Samuel Williamson was elected colonel, Benjamin Junkin, lieutenant-colonel; M. O. Junkin, major, and Capt. Samuel Byers, adjutant. These companies were arranged so as to distribute the honors of position. The "Mercer Blues," or "Light Infantry," was the oldest company, and always occupied the head of the regiment.

Capt. Job Egbert, of Sandy Lake, was a soldier in the War of 1812, probably a member of the "Blues." He was at Erie, and in after years sported a swallow-tailed coat of blue, trimmed up with buff. The coat grew rusty with years, but on State occasions (reviews) he sported it. He had outgrown it, and it, when buttoned, had split over his hips. On one occasion (a review) Pitt Street, Mercer, near Hackney's Hotel, was crowded with the formidable array of militia companies marching to and fro, with shrieking fifes and rattling drums. Capt. Egbert, who commanded the Seventh Company, was marching down the street at its head, followed on foot by all the chivalry of Sandy Lake, armed with sticks and brooms, with here and there a rifle or shot-gun. The redoubtable captain had for his drummer a Guinea negro, named Adam; but in default of a fifer, Adam had puckered his voluminous lips, and was whistling the "White Cockade," and using his drum sticks with zealous skill—performing the double functions of fifer and drummer. Another company was marching up street, and the head of the columns, as they passed through the narrow avenues formed by the spectators, met and could not pass. "Left face," said Capt. Egbert. "Right face," said the chieftain of the other band. This order brought the head of each line in the same direction. "Right face," said Capt. Job. "Left face," said the other, causing a movement to the other side of both. By this time the military patience, even of Capt. Job, was exhausted, but not his military resources. Knowing that the men of his command were more familiar with the terms used in driving oxen than with military phrases, he cried out, with presence of mind worthy of so trying a crisis, waving his sword in the style of an ox-wattle, "COME, WHOA HERE," and they "whoa." With vociferous laughter they followed their intrepid leader and sallow whistling drummer down into the public square.

MERCER, the seat of government of the county, was laid out in August, 1803, by William McMillan, John Findley and William Mortimer, trustees appointed for that purpose, on a tract of 200 acres, donated by John Hoge, who was the owner of two warrant tracts of 400 acres each. The site for the county-town was selected by five commissioners, viz.: Isaac Weaver, Thomas Morton, John Hamilton, Pressly Carr Lane and James Brady. The deed executed by him to the trustees was dated May, 1804, and stipulated that 200 acres should be used for the purpose of a county seat.

The act of March 12, 1800, creating the county of Mercer, gave to it the name of a distinguished physician and officer of the Revolution. Both the town and county were named in honor of Dr. Hugh Mercer, concerning whom not as much is generally known as should be relative to a distinguished namesake. Hugh Mercer was born in Aberdeen, Scotland, in 1721. After being liberally educated he began the study of medicine. In the memorable battle of Culloden, between the forces of Charles Edward and the Duke of Cumberland, Dr. Mercer served as assistant surgeon. The Scotch army being defeated, and the Pretender compelled to flee, Dr. Mercer left his native country a refugee, and came to America. He located near Greencastle, Franklin Co., Penn., about the year 1750, and was the first practicing physician of the county. His location was a wild one, and not destined to prove a very lucrative field for medical practice by a stranger. The region was sparsely settled by whites, and open to constant incursions from the wily and treacherous red man of the forest. He remained, however, without injury or fear until the Indians, emboldened by Braddock's defeat, in 1755, made frequent and bloody forays into the Kittatinny or Cumberland valley. To protect themselves against these incursions, the settlers formed themselves into military companies, of one of which Dr. Mercer was made captain. His commission was dated March 6, 1756. His company, a part of the troops under command of Col. John Armstrong, did valiant service in the region of Mercersburg, Welsh Run and Fort McDowell, all within the limits of Franklin County. Finally, in the autumn of 1756, he and his company went with Col. Armstrong in the expedition against Kittanning, which Indian village they surprised and destroyed.

On this occasion he marched from Fort Shirley, in Huntingdon County, at which post he discharged the duties of surgeon to the garrison as well as those pertaining to his military station. At Kittanning he was severely wounded in the shoulder by a rifle bullet, and was carried from the field to a place of supposed safety. Being separated from his companions, he was suddenly surrounded by the savages. He saved himself from capture by crawling into a fallen and hollow tree. During the continuance of the fight, the Indians stood upon the tree in which he was concealed, not suspecting his presence. After the rout of the savages Mercer crept from his place of concealment, but found that his friends had also left the field. His situation was full of embarrassment and danger. Faint from the loss of blood, and suffering from a severe wound, he was alone in the wilderness, surrounded by blood-thirsty savages, more than a hundred miles from any settlement, and without the means of procuring subsistence. Under these trying circumstances, his intelligent courage did not forsake him. He determined to reach Fort Cumberland, which then stood on the present site of Cumberland, Md., a station on the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. During his painful and tedious journey thither he lived on roots, berries and the body of a rattlesnake, which, with difficulty, in consequence of his wound, he succeeded in killing. After encountering many hardships and enduring almost inexpressible fatigue, he reached the fort, but not too soon, for his powers of endurance were about exhausted. He slowly recovered, and in the following year, 1757, was made commander of the garrison in the fort at Shippensburg, then considered a frontier post.

On the 4th of December, 1757, he was commissioned a major in the "forces of the Province of Pennsylvania," and "was posted west of the Susquehanna." He accompanied the expedition of Gen. John Forbes, the following year, against Fort Du Quesne. During this trip he first met Washington, then a brigadier-general of Virginia troops, and laid the foundation for the intimate and enduring friendship which existed between these noted men. After the evacuation and burning of Fort Du Quesne by the French and Indians, Mercer, with the increased rank of colonel, was left in command of the post. Under his direction the garrison of 409 men, embracing 200 of Washington's Virginia troops, partially rebuilt the works. At the close of the French and Indian war, and the consequent evacuation of the western forts by the French, Mercer temporarily retired from military life, and at the urgent solicitation of Washington transferred his residence from the wilds of the Cumberland valley to Fredericksburg, Va., where he resumed the practice of medicine.

When the Revolutionary War broke out he was commissioned as colonel in a Virginia regiment. Shortly after he was, on the recommendation of Washington, given the rank and position of brigadier-general. He accompanied his chief during the retreat through New Jersey, and "rendered him valuable aid at the battle of Trenton," when the Hessians were captured, December 26, 1776. At the battle of Princeton, January 3, 1777, he led the vanguard of the American army, and while exhibiting skill in the handling of his forces, his horse was shot under him, and he was compelled to continue the contest on foot. He was speedily surrounded by British soldiers, who ordered him to surrender. Disregarding the summons, he drew his sword and began an unequal contest with overpowering foes. He was finally beaten to the ground with muskets and brutally thrust through with bayonets. Having received seven wounds, five in his body and two in his head, he was left on the field supposed to be dead. He was carried to a neighboring house by a son of Col. John Armstrong, his old friend and neighbor. When Washington heard of the fate of his old friend and compatriot, he sent his nephew, Major Lewis, to watch over his final moments and minister to the wants of the dying hero. A few days having elapsed the spirit of Hugh Mercer took its flight to the eternal world. Thus died a brave and patriotic man, he after whom both the county and the town were named. The sixty thousand people now living within the limits of the county, and enjoying the liberty which he made such heroic sacrifices to secure, should hold his name in grateful and loving remembrance. Would it be too much for them to erect, within the limits of the court-house square, in Mercer, a granite shaft to attest their devotion and gratitude to their patriotic benefactor?

The streets of Mercer running north and south, commencing on the east, were called Otter, Pittsburgh (usually called now Pitt), Erie and Shenango. The alleys in the same direction, East, Cherry, Strawberry, Turkey, Sassafras and West. The streets running east and west, commencing at the north, were Venango, Market, Butler and Powers. The alleys in the same direction, North, Quince, Gooseberry, Currant, Peach, Pear, Plum and South. Market, Butler, Pittsburgh and Erie were laid out ninety feet wide, while Shenango, Otter, Venango and Beaver were only seventy.

The public square, to be used for court-house, was laid out 460 feet long and 330 feet wide. Lots numbered 249 and 250 were reserved for the jail. They were subsequently used as the site of the Mercer Academy.

While the survey was in progress a turkey's nest, with the eggs yet unhatched, was found by Abraham Pew as an alley was being run. Whereupon the surveyor, Mr. Findley, said: "We'll call this Turkey Alley," hence the name now in use. The first stake driven in the survey was held by the late Samuel Pew, then but a mere lad. While this stake was being driven by Mr. Findley, he said to the boy: "Now, Sam, you hold up the stake, and if you live to be an old man, you can tell that you did so, and that I drove it down on this corner." This stake was driven down at the northeast corner of the public square, where the Whistler House stands. The square was first surveyed, and then the streets. The site of the new town was mainly a hazel prairie, with a few low trees scattered through it.

On the 5th of December, 1803, lots were sold at the house of James Braden (formerly occupied by John Pew, near the residence of Mrs. Theodore McDonald), on the following conditions, substantially: 1. The highest bidder to be the buyer. 2. No bid for less sum than 25 cents to be entertained. 3. Bids of persons under twenty-one years of age not to be received. 4. One-third of purchase money to be paid in advance; the other two-thirds to be paid within nine and eighteen months, respectively. 5. Failure to pay subsequent claims to forfeit money already paid. 6. Failure to meet first payment to result in the forfeiture of ten per cent of the sale value. 7. Deed to be given at the time of last payment. The primitive town plat of Mercer was nearly in the form of a square, and embraced the 200 acres donated by Mr. Hoge. In 1873 the borough limits were extended to include about 700 acres, assuming a rectangular form, averaging some 441 rods in length by 252 rods in width. The high hill on which the town was laid out was a desirable place for the weary settlers to locate. From it they could look off in all directions and see the vast scope of country which lay open to improvement by the sturdy pioneers coming in from the old counties. It, too, was infested with wild game in rich abundance, which the skillful aim of the Pews and the other pioneers succeeded in converting into palatable food. Deer and turkeys and bears and squirrels could be shot within a few hundred yards of the present site of the court-house.

The first house built in Mercer stood on the northwest corner of East Market and Otter Streets. It was erected by David Watson, and was a log structure, the timbers being hewed on four sides. Nathan Patterson, subsequently sheriff of the county, owned and occupied it for tavern purposes. No vestige of it remains to tell its interesting story. On its site now stands a small one-story frame structure, the property of Miss Belle Black.

HOTELS OF THE PAST AND PRESENT.

Near the spring now known as the Griffith Spring, north of the residence of Hon. Samuel Griffith, stood as early as 1798 a tavern known as the "Blue Ball." Its significant sign invited to the hospitable entertainment afforded by its proprietor, John Garvin, father of the Hon. William S. Garvin, many a weary traveler between Pittsburgh and Erie, between which places it was a well-kept half-way house. The second tavern erected in town stood back of the present Whistler House, and was known as the "Dobbins House." On the site of the present Magoffin Block, southeast corner of the public square, was erected the first brick house in the town. The structure was put up by Ebenezer Magoffin, the uncle of Drs. James and Beriah Magoffin, and was used, for a long time, as a dwelling, and for store and other public purposes. After the death of Mr. Magoffin it was converted into a hotel, the American House, and used for such purpose by Joseph Wood, Hugh Evans, Noah Shipler and possibly others. In process of time it was again used as a bakery and grocery, and so continued until the present block was erected.

On the site of the present John Magoffin residence, on South Pitt Street, stood in primitive days the Thompson House, Samuel Thompson being proprietor. In it were kept grocery and, probably, some dry goods stores. From its proprietor Samuel B. Foster, Esq., obtained the tallow candle by the aid of which he intended to read the President's message in 1831. It was kept likewise by Joseph Wood, Charles Bush, Hugh Evans, and when finally sold became the property of Dr. James Magoffin. A house was kept, at one time, on the southwest corner of the Diamond, by Peter Shipler, father of the present Peter Shipler, cabinet-maker.

At a very early day Hugh and Thomas Bingham built on the northwest corner of the diamond, on the site of the present Miller & Gordon block, a frame structure which was used for store-room and dwelling purposes. It stood next to the old log jail, the upper story of which was used for a court room. It is said that Judge Moore was holding court at the time the Bingham were roofing their structure. The pounding and other noise disturbed the court, whereupon Judge Moore ordered the tip-staff to go down and have the confusion stopped. The message was delivered, but to no avail. The judge, angered by the supposed slight of his judicial authority, then ordered the officer to arrest the daring workmen. When they saw the officer come to serve the summons, they quietly drew up the ladder by which he was to ascend, and thus a second time defeated the irate judge's purposes. This building was first kept as a hotel by Thomas Rogers, grandfather of the present John W. Nickum, of Mercer, by whom the structure was changed from a business room to a hotel. Subsequently it was conducted by Mr. Patterson, from New York; Charles Whistler, father of Capt. C. W. Whistler, James Stewart, Charles William Stewart, Noah Shipler, Hugh Evans and C. W. Whistler. It was a popular house in its day. It was finally supplanted by the old Opera House block, which the devouring flames swept away a year or two ago.

The Whistler House was erected in 1817, by Aaron Hackney, by whom it was run for many years, and subsequently by his widow; William Turner, of Sandy Lake, being her bartender. It was then and long afterward known as the Hackney House. In it Gen. Lafayette remained over night, when traveling through the United States in 1824. Additions have been made to it at various times, until it has attained its present dimensions, the main part being a three-story brick structure. James Stewart, Martin Reed, Thomas Dunlars, John Brownlee, Levi Jones, Mr. Whann, Daniel Nelson, C. W. Whistler, and doubtless many others whose names can not be recalled, have presided over its destinies, the last mentioned being the present proprietor.

The Northwestern Hotel was built about 1830, as a dwelling house, by Gen. John Forker. Subsequently John Brownlee became proprietor, and, building the west wing, converted it into a hotel. Changes were quite frequent, the structure having been occupied for inn purposes by Alex. McCartney, Elijah Satterfield, John McKinney, subsequently sheriff of the county; Noah Shipler, Charles Evans, Mrs. Mary Bradley, A. J. Wiese and Charles Livingston, the present proprietor.

What is now the St. Cloud Hotel was built as a private dwelling by John Crill, at an early day. It was changed into a hotel, and frequently known as the Yellow House. Every new proprietor gave it a name. It changed hands quite rapidly, being conducted in turn by John S. Thompson, James Miles, John Gumfory, Thomas Conley, Mr. Brown, from Greenville; the Wilson Sisters, Mr. Brown, of Sandy Lake, and numerous others. The proprietorship of the property is at present in dispute between Levi Jones and Hunter Pardoe.

Several other houses in town, the Moon House, erected in 1866 by A. B. Moon, its present proprietor; the Graham House, built by F. Graham, and the Armstrong House, being the private residence of the late Hon. W. S. Garvin, are comparatively recent in their uses for hotel purposes.

Just outside of the borough limits, to the right of the Meadville road, is a time-honored house of entertainment. It was built about 1830 by Robert Simcox, by whom it was called the Forest House, and run for a number of years. In its construction William Bigler, subsequently governor of Pennsylvania, was employed as a carpenter. Its gables had painted upon them by John K. Coxson, subsequently a local Methodist preacher, and an attorney, unique designs, which still attract the passer-by. On the west gable is the representation of a street lined with houses on either side, and marked at the nearer end by the forms of two frolicsome horses rearing upon their feet and congratulated by a huge American eagle. The east gable is characterized by the forms of two huge lions, with shaggy manes, and tails of prodigious length waving in graceful curves high above their gigantic bodies. The Forest House, also known as the Lion House, was famous as a resort for those who desired to partake liberally of intoxicating drinks and trip the light fantastic to enchanting music. Mrs. Simcox is said to have been a model landlady, kind, generous and self-sacrificing. Her husband was a natural trader, and dealt in Yankee clocks, cattle, horses and any other object of ready barter. After he relinquished control, the house changed hands rapidly, and finally fell into "innocuous desuetude," and is remembered now as a place of revelry during the days of militia muster.

EARLY SETTLERS AND BUSINESS INTERESTS.

Among the early settlers within the present limits of Mercer were two brothers, David and John Garvin, and James Braden, a strong member of the Seceder Church. These came as early as 1797; John Pew came from Washington County in 1798, and built his cabin near the present McDonald Spring, south of East Market street; David Watson, the builder of the first house in 1797 or '98. William Amberson came from Westmoreland County and built a cabin on the site of the barber shop, corner of East Market and Pitt Street, in 1802. About the same time or a little later came S. B. Foster, the first resident attorney of Mercer; Cunningham S. Semple, the first postmaster of Mercer, and one of the first attorneys; Washington Porter, Jonathan Smith, William McMillan, James Galey, Jacob Mower and others.

Reference has already been made to the early inn-keepers. Jonathan Smith established a tannery as early as 1803, and James Galey one about a year later. In 1808 Bevan Pearson started the third. The first blacksmith shop was started in 1806 by Jacob Mower and his son Jacob. As early as 1810 there were two stores in the place, one kept by Andrew Patterson, and the other by Jacob and James Herrington. They built the large stone building now occupied by the family of Mrs. J. H. Robinson, on North Pitt Street. About the same year, Robert Stewart, father of Hon. William Stewart, deceased, opened a blacksmith shop.

In the ranks of the teachers of those early days mention should be made of Rev. Samuel Tait, Sallie and Kittie De Wolf, Mrs. Annie B. Garrett, St. John Galbreath, James O'Hara, Mrs. Clark.

Drs. Clark, Epaphroditus and James S. Cossitt, E. W. Glezen (druggist), James Magoffin, Beriah Magoffin and others, were early physicians, and prominent, too, in their day.

The first preaching was done in the court-house, which, for, a time, was the second story of the log jail. In pleasant weather the services were held in "Semple's Orchard," in and around the reservoir of the present water-works. In addition to these religious sanctuaries, the old court-house, the academy building and the oak forest surrounding "Tent Spring," south of the borough, afforded suitable places for the assemblies of those days.

MANUFACTURES.

Mercer has never been a manufacturing point. As early, however, as 1818, Judge Alexander Brown built a dam on McCollough's Run, and erected an oil mill. In the upper story he had carding machinery. Subsequently he removed the carding machine to the borough and ran it for a number of years.

About two years later, viz., 1820, Jacob Smith, Esq., built a dam on the same run, just above the point at which it is crossed by the Meadville road. He constructed, along the brow of the rising ground toward the southeast, a race which afforded power for a frame grist-mill containing two run of stone. Some twenty rods from the grist-mill he built a distillery, whose operation, however, was prevented for a time by the temperance agitation that was then beginning. Jacob Herrington operated it for a time. [See sketch of Western Press]. It and the old mill have both long since passed away, as likewise the mill race.

Isaac P. Rose was born in Mercer, Penn., January 17, 1812. His father, Isaac P. Rose, was proprietor of a small pottery works at Mercer, where he located in the closing years of the last century. About 1824 he removed with his family to New Castle, Penn., and there died.

In 1828 John Wright established, near Mercer, a manufactory of copperas. He had such facilities as were supposed to enable him to supply the demand north of the Ohio. Pittsburgh was his principal market. It proved unremunerative and he abandoned the enterprise.

In 1853 Hirst & Shipler erected in the the southwest part of town a grist-mill. It was afterward owned by Wilson & Burns. It was finally purchased by the Woolen Mill Company, who made requisite changes, and did an extensive business, employing twenty-five hands and sending their products to Chicago, Pittsburgh and other points. The property was burned in 1873.

In 1867 a large planing mill was put in operation by Zahniser & Bro. In 1873 the firm was changed to Zahniser & Bell, and in 1875 to the Mercer Planing Mill Company. The plant was located on the south side of East Market Street, opposite the Graham House. They employed some ten or twelve hands, and did a business of about $35,000 annually. Adversity finally overtook it, and the buildings now stand unoccupied.

In 1869 Alexander Thompson & Son began to operate the Mercer Foundry and Machine Shop. S. R. Thompson subsequently became proprietor, and still later, J. M. Sheriff, the present owner. The institution does a general foundry business.

About 1875 a small stove factory was commenced by M. T. Thompson & Co., near the line of the N. C. & F. R. R. It is still in operation, and doing an active business.

For a time Henry Beckwith leased from Hiram C. White a small tannery property, and ran it. Its days are numbered.

A factory for making bedsteads existed for a time on the east side of Ne-shannock Creek, but it has long ceased to do any work.

Thomas and John Gelvin, in February, 1870, started the Mercer Carriage Works. Two years later William Howell was admitted as a partner, and the business was conducted under the firm name of Howell, Gelvin & Co., for a period of about eighteen months. Finally Gelvin sold his interest to Howell, who, having conducted the business about a year, transferred it to Stranahan & Thompson. The firm employed some twelve or thirteen hands in the manufacture of carriages, buggies, sleighs, etc., and did a business of some $15,000 to $20,000 per year. The business is now conducted by John Gelvin with success.

Messrs. Sykes & Son are engaged in general building and repair business, giving their attention to wagons, plows, harrows, horse rakes, etc. The senior member has been engaged in his work in one place for more than half a century.

In 1869 Houck & Reznor ventured upon a new enterprise, that of a hub and spoke factory. After a time Reznor was succeeded by Weaver, and still later the firm changed to that of Wilson & Stranahan. In 1874 a fire destroyed the establishment, and it has never been rebuilt.

In the line of recent industries is the Mercer Flouring Mill, erected in 1882 by William Huston and W. R. Packard. It is now owned by William Huston, Packard having disposed of his interest to his partner. The mill has a capacity of 125 barrels per day, and, if it is operated continually, would grind about 28,000 bushels during a month. No enterprise of Mercer is of as much value to the city and surrounding country as this. Mr. Houston employs seven men regularly, and he and his son give it their personal attention, and deserve much credit for establishing a business that is of great pecuniary interest to the community. Other reference is made in a personal sketch of Mr. Houston.

The Mercer Wooden Ware Works were erected a short time after the Houston Flouring Mills, by Arthur Seaton. From him it passed into the hands of O. Berean, who sold to D. J. Courtney, the present owner. His cousin, T. A. Courtney, is the superintendent. It does an extensive business in the making of butter packages, firkins, pails, tubs, etc.

The Mercer Creamery was incorporated as a joint stock organization in the winter of 1887-88, and a brick building at once erected near the railroad station. It was opened for business on the 16th of April, 1888. Its products of butter the first six weeks of its existence were as follows: 389; 820; 1,149; 1,593; 2,252, and 3,000 pounds. Its management consists of the following: A. Newell, manager; J. Morrison, assistant manager, and W. Oyster, conductor of the practical work.

INCORPORATION AND BOROUGH OFFICERS.

Mercer was incorporated as a borough by Act of Assembly approved 28th of March, 1814. The first election was held at the court-house on the 2d of the ensuing May. The officers then elected and those elected in subsequent years are shown, so far as records could be found:

1814—Burgess, Joseph Smith; high constable, Samuel Thompson; clerk, John Stewart, James Clark (tie vote, each having fifteen); council, Henry Anderson, Jonathan Smith, Thomas Templeton, Samuel B. Foster and Robert Moore.

1815—Burgess, Cunningham S. Semple; high constable, James Davitt; clerk, Thomas Scott Cunningham; council, Bevan Pearson, Samuel B. Foster, Hugh Bingham, Robert Stewart and Nathan Patterson.

1816—Burgess, Bevan Pearson; high constable, James Davitt; clerk, Thomas S. Cunningham; council, John Wright, Aaron Hackney, John Findley, James Miller, and for the fifth member Robert Stewart, John Hamill and Samuel Scott each had eighteen votes.

1817—Burgess, Bevan Pearson; high constable, Thompson Clark; clerk, Thomas S. Cunningham; council, James Templeton, Aaron Hackney, Henry Anderson, James Miller and Hugh Bingham.

The first recorded ordinance was passed by the council of the borough of Mercer March 7, 1817, as follows: "Be it enacted and ordained by the burgess and inhabitants of the borough of Mercer, in council assembled, That if any persons residing in the borough shall neglect or refuse to perform the duties of any office to which he may be regularly appointed, under any of the ordinances of this borough, he shall forfeit and pay the sum of $20."

1818—Burgess, Jonathan Smith; high constable, Adam Forker; clerk, Thomas S. Cunningham; council, Henry Anderson, Aaron Hackney, Samuel Thompson, Joseph Smith and James Miller.

1821—Burgess, James Clark; high constable, Joseph McDowell; clerk, Thomas S. Cunningham; council, James K. Caldwell, John Banks, Henry Anderson, Robert Stewart and Epaphroditus Cossitt.

1823—Burgess, Joseph Smith; high constable, James Black; clerk, Thomas S. Cunningham; council, Robert Stewart, James K. Caldwell, Adam Fisher, Herbert Ramsey and John Banks.

1825—Burgess, Joseph Smith; high constable, Hugh Hunter; clerk, Thomas S. Cunningham; council, Hugh Bingham, Henry Anderson, Thomas Rodgers, John Banks and Bevan Pearson.

1826—Burgess, Robert Stewart; high constable, Thomas Graham; clerk, Hugh Bingham; council, Henry Anderson, Samuel B. Foster, Bevan Pearson, Joseph Smith and Andrew Patterson.

1827—Burgess, Bevan Pearson; high constable, Hugh R. Hunter; clerk, David T. Porter; council, John Banks, Henry Anderson, James Thompson, Joel B. Curtis, Thomas Rodgers and James T. Black.

1828—Burgess, Joseph Smith; high constable, Samuel Clark; clerk, David T. Porter; council, Bevan Pearson, Michael Yeager, John Forker, Thomas Rodgers and James K. Caldwell.

1829—Burgess, Robert Stewart; high constable, William D. Bell; clerk, David T. Porter; council, Joseph Smith, Andrew Patterson, James K. Caldwell, Nesbit Ramsey and Bevan Pearson.

1830—Burgess, William S. Rankin; high constable, William D. Bell; clerk, David T. Porter; council, Robert Patterson, Abraham Pew, William Marshall, John Bowman and Jacob Zahniser.

1832—Burgess, Bevan Pearson; high constable, William D. Bell; clerk, David T. Porter; council, James T. Black, J. K. Caldwell, Andrew Patterson, James McKean and William S. Rankin.

1833—Burgess, Bevan Pearson; high constable, Thomas Richardson; clerk, David T. Porter; council, William S. Rankin, George Kline, James Thompson, Michael Yeager and James K. Caldwell.

1834—Burgess, Bevan Pearson; high constable, Thomas Richardson; clerk, David T. Porter; council, John Forker, Jacob Mourer, Jacob Zahniser, Joel B. Curtis and Joseph Smith.

1835—Burgess, Bevan Pearson; high constable, Jacob Forker; clerk, David T. Porter.

1836—Burgess, Bevan Pearson; high constable, Jacob Forker; clerk, David T. Porter; council, William S. Garvin, John Brownlee, James Thompson, Henry Hosack and John McGill.

1837—Burgess, Bevan Pearson; high constable, Jacob Forker; clerk, David T. Porter; council, James D. Moore, James Sheriff, William M. Smith, Jacob Zahniser and James Thompson.

1838—Burgess, Jacob Zahniser; high constable, Jacob Forker; clerk, David T. Porter; council, John Forker, David T. Porter, John Moon, William M. Stephenson and James K. Caldwell.

1849—Burgess, Joseph Sheriff; high constable, William B. Woods; clerk, J. R. Hunter; council, William S. Garvin, William M. Smith, Henry Forker, John Moore, Joseph Shipler.

1850—Burgess, J. P. Garrett; clerk, John D. McGill; high constable, John McKean; council, M. C. Trout, Peter Shipler, Samuel Henderson, D. S. Bassett, Joseph R. Hunter.

1851—Burgess, William Stewart; clerk, Samuel P. Pearson; high constable, Hiram Swift; council, Thompson Graham, Robert C. Rankin, Adam Forker.

1853—Burgess, Joseph Kerr; secretary of council, John D. McGill; high constable, Joseph D. Woods; auditor, A. J. McKean; council, L. Weaver, A. S. Burwell, J. C. Stewart, William Maxwell, Robert Waugh, Joseph Sykes.

1854—Burgess, D. W. Findley; secretary of council, D. J. Mourer; high constable, Joseph D. Woods; auditor, William McKnight; council, Thompson Graham, Lyman Beach, A. H. Snyder.

1855—Burgess, Samuel R. Mason; high constable, William B. Woods; council, Hiram McLain, Thomas J. Nickum, John W. Rogers.

1856—Burgess, Robert Croskey; secretary of council, J. D. McGill; high constable, James Morton; council, Joseph Sykes, Samuel Giebner, William McElheny.

1857—Burgess, William Gregory; secretary of council, John Forker; high constable, William Forker; auditor, Thomas Pearson; council, I. G. Hirst, John Forker, William Dight.

1858—Burgess, William Gregory; secretary of council, John Forker; high constable, Asa Cochran; council, John Bowman, William L. Fleming, William Smith.

1859—Burgess, A. S. Burwell; secretary of council, T. J. Nickum; high constable, R. M. Irwin; council, J. L. McLuillen, William M. Gibson, T. J. Nickum.

1860—Burgess, Joseph Shipler; secretary of council, Joseph Forker; high constable, John McKean; council, A. J. Greer, Hiram McLain, William W. Sheriff.

1864—Burgess, Joseph Shipler; secretary of council, W. J. McKean; high constable, William Cummings; council, A. S. Burwell, William W. Sheriff, Thomas Sykes, R. M. J. Zahniser, W. J. McKean.

1865—Burgess, J. H. Robinson; secretary of council, W. J. McKean; high constable, Justus Stowe; council, William R. Montgomery, A. J. McKean, T. J. Irwin, R. M. J. Zahniser, W. J. McKean.

1866—Burgess, John C. Glenn; secretary of council, P. E. Shipler; council, A. S. Burwell, W. J. McKean, P. E. Shipler, William Jack, William Smith.

1867—Burgess, J. R. Williams; secretary of council, O. H. Gould; council, D. W. Findley, O. H. Gould, C. W. Kline, William Alexander, Joseph Sykes.

1868—Burgess, Alexander Newell; secretary of council, O. H. Gould; council, J. D. Crawford, O. H. Gould, Joseph Parks, J. Rankin, Alexander Thompson.

1869—Burgess, William Flemming; secretary of council, Joseph L. Parks; high constable, I. L. C. Miller; council, John R. Hanna, Joseph L. Parks, Alexander Newell, O. H. Gould.

1870—Burgess, William L. Flemming; secretary of council, A. J. McKean; council, Joseph Shipler, R. M. Irvin, Thomas Sykes, A. J. McKean.

1871—Burgess, William J. McKean; secretary of council, A. J. McKean; council, Hiram McLain, Joseph Shipler, A. J. McKean, Carlisle Alexander, Adam Laughlin.

1872—Burgess, William Flemming; secretary of council, R. Bellis; council, A. S. Burwell, V. Zahniser, Philip Leary, J. P. McKinley, R. Bellis.

1873—Burgess, John W. McCullough; secretary of council, Reuben Bellis; council, A. S. Burwell, W. H. Alexander, Oliver Alexander, Thomas McBurney, H. M. Clawson, Reuben Bellis.

1874—Burgess, S. H. Miller; clerk, R. Bellis; council, Thomas Sykes, W. H. Alexander, A. B. Clawson, R. Wright, J. S. McKean, R. Bellis.

1875—Burgess, S. H. Miller; clerk, R. Bellis; council, A. B. Moon, A. J. McKean, A. M. Clawson, W. H. Alexander, George T. Sykes, R. Bellis.

1876—Burgess, S. H. Miller; clerk, R. Bellis; council, A. M. Clawson, Jones Thompson, John Logan, F. F. Graham, R. Bellis.

1877—Burgess, S. F. Thompson; secretary of council, Joseph L. Parks; council, F. F. Graham, A. Mills, H. Frankel, R. A. Stewart, Joseph L. Parks, J. E. McClure.

1878—Burgess, S. F. Thompson; secretary of council, A. Newell; council, William Logan, A. Mills, F. A. Filson, F. F. Graham, A. Newell.

1879—Burgess, C. W. Whistler; secretary of council, J. J. Alexander; high constable, William Hawk; council, W. R. Packard, William Lary, P. E. Shipley, John B. Mowry, John Gelvin, William M. Gibson.

1880—Burgess, John C. Logan; secretary of council, J. J. Alexander; high constable, Frank Redman; council, W. R. Packard, J. B. White, R. K. Patterson, H. F. King, John M. Findley, A. Mills.

1884—Burgess, George T. Sykes; secretary of council, S. F. Smith; high constable, E. S. Edwards; council, A. M. Clawson, F. A. Filson, James S. Martin, George McBride, F. F. Graham and James Patterson.

1885—Burgess, James Woods; secretary of council, H. H. Zeigler; high constable, Elias Shaffer; council, James D. Morrison, C. M. Derickson, James Patterson, G. W. McBride, F. A. Filson and George W. White.

1886—Burgess, H. B. Bowser; secretary of council, H. H. Zeigler; high constable, D. M. Cook; council, John M. Magoffin, A. R. Young, James Patterson, F. A. Filson, J. D. Morrison and C. M. Derickson.

1887—Burgess, William Miller, Jr.; secretary of council, H. H. Zeigler; high constable, H. K. Maitland; council, F. A. Filson, H. B. Bowser, C. M. Derickson, J. D. Morrison, John M. Magoffin and A. R. Young.

1888—Burgess, Robert G. Madge; secretary of council, H. H. Zeigler; high constable, H. K. Maitland; council, George M. Williams, William Lary, J. D. Morrison, John M. Magoffin, H. B. Bowser and A. R. Young.

FIRE DEPARTMENT.

One of the earliest fires in the place was the burning of the "Union Church," which stood north of East Market Street, on the site of the present Benjamin Ride residence. It occurred in 1824, and the consternation it produced led to the organization of a fire company for protecting the town in future against the ravages of the fire king. The first effort toward organizing this company was made June 28, 1824, when the following petition was presented to "the Burgess and Council of the Borough of Mercer." It voices the sentiment at the time, and indicates, too, who were the enterprising residents of Mercer sixty-five years ago: "The memorial of the undersigned inhabitants of said borough respectfully represents that your petitioners are seriously and alarmingly impressed with the destruction of the Union Meeting-house in this borough, on this morning, by lightning. Numerous instances have occurred of houses having taken fire which must inevitably have been burned to the ground, with probably the loss of valuable lives, but for the fortunate time when they were discovered to be on fire, and extraordinary and dangerous exertions of the citizens of said borough. Were it not for the torrent of rain that poured down at the most critical time of the late dreadful and destructive fire, your petitioners believe that all their efforts would not have been sufficient to stay the progress of that devouring element before probably a number of other buildings would have been enveloped in flames. Your petitioners have full confidence in the activity and exertions of each other on such alarming occasions as the above mentioned fire, but it is known to your honorable body that this borough is almost entirely destitute of those means which are considered by all towns to be necessary in extinguishing fire under difficult circumstances. Your petitioners therefore request that said burgess and council will pass an ordinance laying a tax on each taxable inhabitant of said borough, according to the late county assessment, to be appropriated exclusively for the purchasing of a fire engine and what other implements may be thought necessary for the said purpose, for the use of said borough. Aaron Hackney, J. S. Cossitt, J. S. Black, John Forker, Samuel Thompson, William Stephenson, William McMillan, Jonathan Smith, James Caldwell, John Moore, William H. Forker, William Amberson, John McGill, Thomas Templeton, Adam Forker, James K. Caldwell, R. C. Johnson, Jacob Zahniser, Benjamin Hartley, J. Magoffin, Robert Stewart, Annanias Kittlinger, Washington Porter, John Bowman, Jr., William Cochran, Patrick McCloskey, Bevan Pearson, Andrew Patterson, T. S. Cunningham, David Crawford, John Findley, J. B. Curtis, A. Brown, John Simpson, Nathaniel Welsh, Archibald Boyd, Thomas Bole, Saul Scott, J. Davitt, Hugh Bingham, Jacob Herrington, Robert Patterson, Thomas Graham, Michael Yeager, James Thompson, John S. Pearson, Joseph Hunter, John Garvin, R. Hanna, E. Magoffin, John Hoge, Jr., H. R. Hunter, T. Rogers, Joseph Woods, Oliver Stephens, Joseph D. Lowry, N. Ramsey, A. Brown, Jr., Robert Bowman, Abraham Pew, William S. Rankin, L. O. V. Renz, George Wright, Henry Hosack, Hiram Hackney, Thomas Banks, James Clark, David Smith, John Bowman, James Williamson, Samuel B. Foster, Jonathan Allen, T. D. Brown, James McKean, William Amberson, James Gregory, Joseph Smith, Robert Boyd, Thomas Pearson, William Banks, Samuel Bowman, T. J. Anderson, David T. Porter, James Gillis, James Kilgore, William Marshall, Joseph Junkin, J. Carman, John C. Hanna, James Herrington, Thomas J. Porter, H. D. La. Cossitt, John Chambers, John Orr, John McAuly, Jacob Williamson, N. Patterson, James Graham, Henry Anderson, S. S. Shields, A. A. Sample."

The ordinance petitioned for by the foregoing was passed on the 28th of April, 1825. The fire engine purchased is said to have been a superior piece of machinery, the best of the kind ever had in Mercer. It continued to be used with acceptance and efficiency until the old court-house was burned in 1866, when some persons under the influence of liquor crowded the machine into the basement of that building and caused it to be burned up. For about six years the city was without protection. In the spring of 1873 "The Alert Hook and Ladder Co.," composed of the active young men of the town, was organized, with F. H. Braggins as captain. By the aid of a hand engine, which is yet in existence, this organization was enabled to do efficient service against the ravages of fire.

The Citizens' Hose Company was organized in March, 1887, its charter members consisting of George W. Bohn, Charles W. Bollinger, Mont Kile, Harry Logan, W. S. Hirst, D. W. Zahniser, John Moore, S. K. Cochran, A. H. Chew, A. E. Amberson, J. W. McKim, S. F. Bare, Charles T. Pew, C. R. Patterson, Mack Weimer, C. J. Gregory, H. G. Dean, J. H. McKean, W. J. Logan, G. G. Lafferty, C. W. Kline, A. E. Lindsey and John Patton. The first corps of officers was as follows: Foreman, J. H. McKean; first assistant foreman, S. K. Cochran; second assistant foreman, H. C. Dean; secretary, C. H. Forest; treasurer, S. K. Cochran. The present corps embraces: Foreman, J. H. McKean; first assistant foreman, G. W. Bohn; second assistant foreman, H. C. Dean; secretary, L. C. Bingham; treasurer, S. K. Cochran. The membership is forty. The company meets the first Monday of every month in rooms on the second floor of the Logan Block. The constitution and by-laws of the organization were adopted November 10, 1887.

S. H. Miller Hose Company.—The preliminary meeting for the formation of this company was held in the court-house February 3, 1887, at which time the organization was effected by the election of the following officers: H. H. Harrison, foreman and president; Charles E. Whistler, assistant foreman; C. K. Downs, vice-president; J. S. Sykes, secretary; George M. Gibson, treasurer; George P. Zahniser and John Mills, executive committee. In addition to the above, the following named were constituted members: George B. Stewart, John Armstrong, Edward Forker, Edward Fike, W. R. Miller, R. C. Kerr, Marshall Ayres, Coe Livingston, William Ride, Sherman Cousins, William Cozad, George Elliott, Harry McKnight, Charles Byers, Major Ormsby, William Good, S. B. Moon, A. W. Madge, John M. Barnett, John Orr, John Carter, Milton Hindman, George Nickum and Charles K. Dorons. A constitution, making the name of the organization the "S. H. Miller Hose Company," was adopted February 11, 1887. The property of the company consists of a cart and 450 feet of the best linen hose. There are at present twenty-two members. Meetings are held on the last Tuesday of each month, in the company's new quarters in the Miller & Gordon block. The last elected officers consisted of John Orr, president; A. W. Madge, vice-president; Harry McKnight, secretary; Ed. Forker, treasurer; Ralph Kerr, foreman; Coe Livingston, assistant foreman, and Samuel Albin and George M. Gibson, executive committee.

CHURCHES.

The First United Presbyterian Church is the successor of one of the very oldest societies in the county, and was organized in the early part of 1801, being known as the Cool Spring Church. Its first house of worship, located about three miles from the present one, was built of round logs, chinked and daubed with mud, and was 18x20 feet in dimensions. Its windows were of greased paper, and the door opened at one end of the building into the aisle, which led up the center of the church between the pews of split logs, laid parallel to each other at right angles to the sides of the structure, to the pulpit, which, like its primitive fellows, consisted of a huge stump, delicately festooned with a rich growth of green moss. The "meetin' house" of the regular Presbyterian Church, known by the same name, of which Rev. Samuel Tait was pastor, was located about a half mile away, and between the two churches there was a narrow foot-path, the only means of communication. The first regular pastor of the Cool Spring Seceder flock was Rev. Thomas McClintock, who began his labors May 8, 1803. Among its early members were Mr. McClintock (no relative of the pastor) and family, Mr. McDonald and family, Mr. Bradley and family, Mr. Garvin and family and Mr. Braden and wife. Rev. McClintock continued until July 2, 1805, when his pastoral relations were terminated. An amusing incident is related of him, which shows how strong was his desire for the right to prevail. At one of his services two dogs, which had by stealth made their way into the church, became engaged in a fight, the noise of which so disturbed the pastor that he was compelled to cease preaching. As two of his congregation seized the unruly curs and began applying a liberal chastisement, preparatory to ejecting them from the church, he looked calmly on, with an appearance of impartial interest, and at length, in a slow, devout tone, similar to that which characterized his preaching, addressed the two conservators of the congregation's peace, exclaiming: "Give the yellow dog the most, for he began it." It was during his pastorate that the name Cool Spring was exchanged for that of Mercer, and the old log church deserted. Services were first held, after the removal, in the open air at a spring situated near the old tannery, and known as the tent spring. Meetings were held here in the summer of 1805, and upon the approach of winter a tent was erected, which served as part shelter from the cold and snow. In this manner services were maintained until 1807, when the erection of the old court-house furnished better quarters. Private houses were, of course, utilized in the extreme winter, and it is related that the old tavern, which stood upon the present site of the post-office, was also occasionally occupied by the devout congregation. The second pastor, Rev. John Walker, was installed July 11, 1811. The ordination services were held in open air under the shade of two large oak trees that marked the location of the tent spring, and were conducted by a Rev. Duncan. His pastorate lasted but three years, and came to a close August 14, 1814, his farewell sermon being preached on the same ground that beheld his installation. Near the spring was a large pool of water, on the bank of which had been placed a huge log. Two of the brethren seated themselves upon this rustic pew, and while preparing to drink deeply of the fountain of wisdom that was expected to fall from the preacher's eloquent lips, as he bade his flock a final farewell, became somewhat drowsy. The sermon had been protracted to an unusual length, when the good brother sitting on the end of the log nearest the water, at last succumbed to the sedative influences, lost his balance, and in endeavoring to regain it, seized his companion and fell with him into the pool below. The water had a cooling effect, however, and the two quickly clambered out, and during the remainder of the sermon successfully resisted the wiles of Morpheus. Rev. Walker was followed, after an interval during which no regular services were held, by Rev. Isaac Beggs, who was installed September 19, 1827, the exercises on that occasion being held in the Rocky Spring Church. The new pastor was a man of rather irascible temper, and possessed a firm will. Upon one occasion the Presbyterians and Seceders, through mistake, appointed their respective services in the court-house at the same hour. Rev. Tait, the shepherd of the former flock, arrived first, and was about to ascend to the pulpit, when Beggs entered, strode hastily forward, pushed his clerical compeer to one side, and began the exercises himself, indulging for four hours in a disquisition upon the virtues of psalmody, to the delight and edification, doubtless, of his Calvinistic auditors, who were greatly in the majority. During his ministry, however, much progress was made, both spiritually and materially. In 1834 the old brick church, 40x60 feet in dimensions, situated on a lot just behind the present dwelling of Hon. S. Griffith, was erected and occupied. This was the first regular house of worship the Mercer congregation had ever enjoyed, the Cool Spring log house having been occupied but a year or two.

Rev. Beggs' pastorate terminated in 1836. He was succeeded by Rev. D. H. A. McLean, D. D., who was installed in 1841, and released in 1845. His successor, Rev. G. C. Vincent, D. D., began his ministry in December, 1847, having been called the previous August, and continued until December 28, 1852. For four years following a vacancy occurred, which was filled by the advent of Rev. D. W. French, who was installed October 21, 1856, the services being conducted in the present church, which had been erected in the previous summer, at a cost of $10,000. Preparatory to its completion the court-house had been occupied, in which Rev. French had begun his labors in March, 1856. This ministry was the longest the church has yet known. It continued with gradually increasing success until March 16, 1875, when it was terminated by death. Rev. J. M. French, a brother of the preceding, then began a pastorate that ended in 1880. In 1881 Rev. J. S. McKee was installed, and released in 1884. Rev. H. W. Crabbe, the last regular pastor, began his labors in 1885, and closed them in 1887.

Second United Presbyterian Church.—The date of the origin of this congregation is shrouded in mystery. It has been variously estimated from 1802 to 1820. The first evidence of the existence of such a society is found in the minutes of the Associate Reformed Presbytery: "On April 10, 1805, a petition came from Mercertown for the dispensation of Gospel ordinances. May 15, 1805, Mercertown put in the statistical table for synod as a vacancy. Mr. Kerr was appointed to preach in Mercertown the third Sabbath of November, 1805. August 26, 1806, Rev. Mungo Dick was called to the united charge of Mercertown, Neshannock and Sandy Lake." From this it will be seen that an organization certainly existed prior to 1806. The "Mr. Kerr" referred to was Rev. Joseph Kerr. The first ruling elders of whom any record is made were John Findley and Joseph Junkin. The first regularly installed pastor was Rev. James Galloway, a young man of the age of twenty-five, who began his labors in 1810, which were closed May 10, 1818, by death. During the early years of his ministry no house of worship was had, and services alternated between the groves, the private residences of Messrs. Findley, Junkin and others, and the old court-house. In the latter, it is related that Rev. Tait secured the pre-emption of the court-room, and the flock that followed the leadership of Rev. Galloway was thus forced to resort to the grand jury room, and when simultaneous services were held, as was often the case, a competition of voices occurred between the two pastors, from which Rev. Tait came out victor, his opponent having a slight frame and weak lungs. The inconveniences of this sort of worship impelled the congregation to begin the erection of a suitable church building. A lot, now owned by Mr. Benjamin Ride, was purchased, and a structure, built of plain boards, was placed in construction. This was not completed, however, until after Rev. Galloway's death. In 1820 Rev. James L. Dinwiddie was called to the pastorate. The two years preceding his coming had been times of sore distress, though, to the little flock, and his arrival found them burdened with debt and depressed in spirit. To add to their troubles, just as they had begun to feel relieved, and to regain their lost cheerfulness, a disastrous storm occurred, on the 24th of June, 1824, during which their new structure was struck by lightning and wholly destroyed by the resulting conflagration, which threatened the ruin not only of their church, but of their private dwellings as well. But through the untiring efforts of their pastor and a few devout members better times soon came, the lot on which the present church stands was purchased, and the erection of a second church begun. Rev. Dinwiddie's relations with the congregation were terminated in 1834, at which time he left, to accept the charge of a leading congregation in Pittsburgh. For a period of four years provisional services were held, which were presided over by various supply and itinerant ministers. The arrival of Rev. Andrew Bower, the third pastor, in 1838, put an end to these, however, and regular services were resumed under his ministry. He remained only until 1842, after which, for about five years, supplies were again resorted to. During this time the heavy debt which had been hanging over the congregation since the building of the new church was gradually reduced, until, in 1847, the organization felt itself able to secure another regular pastor. Accordingly, Rev. W. T. McAdam was called, for half his time, at an annual compensation of $250, and, upon his arrival, stated services were resumed. This pastorate continued with flattering success until 1853, when, after an interval of a few months, Rev. Robert McWatty succeeded to the charge of the Mercer flock. His pastorate, which has been by far the longest and most prosperous one the church has ever known, continued until 1882. During it almost phenomenal progress was made; the present elegant structure, much the largest in town, was erected and furnished at a cost approximating $20,000; over 1,000 members, including children, were received into active communication and fellowship, and the church placed upon a firm and lasting basis, the security of which had never been known before. In 1883 Rev. J. A. Grier began a ministry of three years, which resulted in much advancement to the church. Since the close of Rev. Grier's services the church has had no regular pastor.

The First Presbyterian Church was organized in 1804, with twenty members. The first elders chosen consisted of Joseph Smith, Judge Alexander Browne and Adam Forker. For two years the congregation was supplied with occasional services by Rev. Samuel Tait, then in charge of the churches of Cool Spring and Salem. In 1806, however, Rev. Tait was called for one-half his time, the remainder being devoted to Cool Spring. For seven years this arrangement continued, but in 1813 the members of the Cool Spring Church consented to worship at Mercer, and the pastor was thus enabled to give one-half his time again to Salem. In 1826 the Presbytery released Mr. Tait from his connection with the Salem Church, and from that time until his death, which occurred 2d June, 1841, he labored exclusively for the upbuilding of the congregation of which we write. His efforts were in a great measure successful. The earnestness and direct inevitable logic which characterized his presentation of the truth won many souls.

Following Mr. Tait in the pastorate came Rev. Joseph T. Smith, a son of one of the first elders. He was ordained and installed 20th April, 1842, and continued to serve with much success for seven years, at the expiration of which time he resigned and removed to Baltimore, where he was chosen pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church. Dr. Smith was moderator of the General Centennial Assembly of the Presbyterian Church that met at Philadelphia, Penn., 1888.

There was then a vacancy for two years. It was terminated by the coming of Rev. Robert S. Morton, who was installed 10th September, 1851. He remained but one year, and was succeeded by Rev. Robert F. Sample, in October, 1853, who remained until May 7, 1856. The fifth pastor, Rev. John Ross Findley, was installed 29th April, 1857. His pastorate was the longest in the history of the church, and was marked by the most exciting incidents. During the stormy period of the Rebellion, and afterward, during reconstruction, party feeling ran so high as to thrust itself even into church relations. The partisans on both sides clamored loudly against their opponents, and much turmoil and bitterness resulted. It was chiefly from this cause that the Second Presbyterian Church of Mercer was formed by a number who withdrew from the parent organization. Notwithstanding the seemingly troublous experiences which the latter underwent, Mr. Findley's pastorate was characterized by much progress and success. It is a curious fact that the most prosperous periods in the history of congregations are those immediately following what appear to be the most discouraging and disheartening trials.

Rev. Reuben H. Van Pelt, the successor of Rev. Findley, who resigned in 1874, and removed to Rock Island, Ill., was called 29th June, 1874, and concluded his labors in 1876. He in turn gave way to Rev. J. Frank Stonecipher, whose pastorate extended from January 29, 1878, until April, 1882. The present pastor, Rev. J. V. Stockton, began his services October, 1882, and was installed on 14th of December, of the same year. He has met with merited appreciation.

A word may now be said of the houses of worship in which the congregation has assembled. The first regular meeting-place was a room over the old jail, which stood on the present site of the law office of Johnson Pearson, Esq. Occasional services were also held in the court-room of the old court-house. A brick house was then erected and occupied, but, being considered unsafe, was abandoned after a short time. The present building was built in 1829. It has been repaired several times, and now presents the appearance of a new structure. A beautiful parsonage has recently been completed by the congregation.

Following is a list of the elders of the church since 1836: Samuel Bowman, 1836-56; Jacob Zahniser, 1840-52; John Young, 18—37; Robert Stewart, 18—37; Elias Alexander, 18—37 and 1849-63; G. Edward Laschell, 1840-49; John Bowman, 1836-62; Joseph Flemming, 1840-63; Samuel Giebner, 1840-87; Andrew M. Barber, 1849-61; Thomas P. Grubb, 1859-85; Samuel R. Mason, 1859-65; John D. Nickum, 1859-72; Adam Boston, 1859-86; John McKim, 1863-67; William L. Flemming, 1863-81. The present officers are—elders, Alexander McCullough, John B. Mowry, W. J. Calvin, Dr. W. B. Isenberg; treasurer, J. J. Alexander; secretary, John W. Bell; trustees, C. M. Derickson, H. H. Zeigler, John T. Crill, James B. Grubb and J. J. Alexander.

Second Presbyterian Church.—This congregation, a colony from the First Presbyterian Church, withdrew from the fold of the parent flock on the 20th day of October, 1863, the cause of the schism being the peculiar views which the pastor of the latter church, Rev. John R. Findley, held concerning the war, which was then waging. The organization of the seceders was effected in the Congregational Church, there being forty-seven members who united themselves into the new congregation. These were: Elias Alexander, Joseph Fleming, Henry W. Ahrend, Nancy Ahrend, Eva Baskin, Jane Bell, Rachael B. Bell, D. W. Findley, Mary J. Findley, Samuel Fleming, Joseph Forker, Laura C. Filson, Sarah F. Filson, D. H. Fleming, Mrs. M. C. Fleming, John J. Graham, Mrs. Mary E. Hirst, Mrs. Huett, Mary W. Hirst, William McMillan, R. M. Irwin, Rachael Irwin, Robert F. Irwin, H. Irwin, Susannah Kieth, Mrs. H. Lees, Charles Lees, Jane Lees, Charlotta Lees, John Lees, R. L. Maxwell, Sophia D. Maxwell, Hannah G. Morrison, Amanda M. Magiffin, Andrew Patterson, M. M. Patterson, Nancy Templeton, Mary Templeton, Mrs. A. D. Waugh, R. M. J. Zahniser and Lizzie M. Zahniser. The first election of elders resulted in the choice of Elias Alexander and Joseph Fleming, who were accordingly installed. The church was without a regular pastor until March 28, 1864, when a call was extended to Rev. W. M. Robinson, who accepted and began his pastorate in the following April, his installation taking place June 14, at which service Rev. A. C. Junkin delivered the accustomed sermon, Rev. J. W. McCune the charge to the pastor and Rev. W. P. Moore the charge to the people. For a year thereafter services were held in the Congregational Church, and also in the old court-house. Efforts were, however, being constantly made toward the erection of a suitable house of worship, a building committee, consisting of Hon. D. W. Findley, William B. Tate, R. M. J. Zahniser, R. M. Irwin and William Miller, having been appointed in February, 1865, and liberal contributions having been made by Mrs. Amanda Magoffin, Hon. William Stewart, Andrew Patterson and others. The fruit of these labors was realized in the completion of the present spacious structure, which was dedicated on the first Sunday in January, 1867, the sermon on that occasion being delivered by Rev. W. P. Moore, the resident ministers of the town participating in the service. The church cost originally $11,000, and since its erection has undergone several expensive repairs. The ministry of Rev. Robinson terminated in May, 1872. His successor, Rev. B. M. Kerr, was installed September 6, 1872, and continued until August, 1877. For a period of five years no regular pastor was employed, the services being conducted by supplies. In September, 1882, Rev. D. R. Kerr began his pastorate, and was installed October 13. He remained in charge until March, 1887, and in October of the same year the present pastor, Rev. W. E. Slemmons, began his labors, his installation taking place December 13. The church is at present in good condition, and has a membership of 285. Connected with it is a Sunday-school enrolling 170 pupils, of which the superintendent is James A. Stranahan. The session of the church has comprised since the beginning Elias Alexander, Joseph Fleming, R. M. J. Zahniser, Joseph Junkin, John Miller, D. M. Wood, I. N. Donaldson, S. G. Pew, S. F. Smith, C. S. Burwell and G. T. Sykes.

Methodist Episcopal Church.—This congregation dates its organization from the year 1820, when, according to Gregg's History of "Methodism within the Bounds of the Erie Conference," "Rev. Alfred Brunson, ordained a deacon in Cincinnati, Ohio, July, 1819, was employed part of the following year by Elder Swayze on the Erie Circuit, when he succeeded in forming a class in Mercer, consisting of William Stephenson and wife, Joseph McDowell and wife, Robert Boyd and wife, Sarah Stokely, Elizabeth Stokely, Polly Stokely and Esther Stokely. Benjamin Hartley, Mrs. John Banks and John Keck were likewise among the early members. Persecution ran high in Mercer at that time, and it was with much difficulty that a place was obtained in which to hold meetings. Churches, court-house and school houses were all refused. The society was organized in a small log house a few rods from the place where the church now stands." The first house of worship was a frame structure—originally about thirty feet square. To it additions were made until its length reached some sixty feet. It was only one story in height, and had a gallery which was used for a class room. It stood on the site of the present parsonage, and cost in the neighborhood of $500. The seats were plain wooden affairs, and were never contaminated with any such substance as paint. Rustic as they were, and a sample is yet to be seen in the present house, they served the purpose of those early days when Methodism boasted of its simplicity. The illumination was secured by means of six lard lamps. This house, erected about 1830, was sold by piecemeal to various persons, by whom it was removed from its sacred place. It had been struck by lightning once and the pulpit end of the structure badly shattered. The lot on which it stood was donated by Mrs. Judge John Banks, now of Reading, Penn. The second edifice, a two-story brick structure, 45x75, the lower story containing four class rooms and a lecture room, the upper being a main audience room, was erected in 1853 at a cost of $7,000, and dedicated in September, 1855, by Rev. Alfred Cookman, of Pittsburgh, assisted by Rev. F. S. DeHass, D. D., who delivered the historical discourse. The erection occurred during the pastorates of the Reverends James R. Lock, Dillon Prosser, D. Smith and Thomas Guy, the first commencing and the last three completing the work. The contractor was John Boyd, of Mercer, the brick work being done by John McKean, Esq., John Henderson and James B. White, the last subsequently becoming an attorney at the bar. The bell was donated by Hon. S. Griffith and wife. The first intention was to repair the old house. This was then modified to erect a frame structure, but wiser counsels prevailed, resulting in the construction of a substantial brick chapel. Three additional lots were bought of Mrs. Banks, giving the church an entire block of land. The first parsonage was a frame structure, and is still standing as a dwelling on East Market street, the property of Mrs. John McKinney. It was sold, and the funds were used in the erection of the brick church. The second parsonage was built during the war by William Maskrey at a cost of about $4,500, and is a very commodious and comfortable home. In 1871 the church edifice was refitted by the removal of the gallery to give room for the pipe organ now in use. The instrument was bought of Hook & Hastings, of Boston, at a cost of $2,000, and is said to have been the first pipe organ introduced into Mercer County. At the same time the old style windows gave place to the present stained glass ones. The following is a list of the pastors from its origin until the present time: Samuel Adams, 1822; H. Knapp, 1823; C. Thorne and Job Wilson, 1824; A. Brunson and E. Stevenson, 1825; H. Kinsley and J. Leech, 1826; J. P. Kent and S. Ayers, 1827; T. Carr and R. Armstrong, 1828; T. Carr and I. Winans, 1829; J. Summerville and L. D. Prosser, 1830; J. Hitchcock and W. Butt, 1831; C. Jones and T. Thompson, 1832; R. Clapp, 1833-34; J. S. Barris, 1835; G. W. Clarke, 1836; J. Robinson, 1837; J. E. Chapin, 1838; H. N. Sterns, 1839; R. Parker, 1840; M. H. Bettes and J. P. Benn, 1841; J. Leslie and E. B. Lane, 1842; I. Merson and J. Marvin, 1843; I. Merson and J. L. Holmes, 1844; W. F. Wilson, 1845-46; E. Jones, 1847-48; W. F. Day, 1849; G. B. Hawkins, 1850; J. R. Locke, 1851-52; Dillon Prosser, 1853; D. Smith, 1854; T. Guy, 1855; R. A. Caruthers, 1856; A. D. Morton, 1857-58; E. S. Gilette, 1859-60; J. Greer, 1861-62; G. W. Chesbro, 1863-64; O. G. McIntire, 1865-66; W. F. Wilson, 1867-68; L. W. Day, 1869-71; E. J. L. Baker, 1872; F. H. Beck, 1873-75; N. H. Holmes, 1876-78; W. P. Bignell, 1879-80; C. M. Morse, 1881-83; O. L. Mead, 1884-86; E. K. Creed, 1887, present incumbent. The congregation has a membership of 318, and a Sunday-school of 175. Both are in a flourishing condition.

Grace Episcopal Church.—Episcopal preaching has occurred in Mercer for a period of probably sixty-five years, the date of its first services being involved in obscurity. In 1827 an organization was established, and Samuel Holstein, a prominent member of the Mercer bar, was chosen as a delegate to the convention which elected Bishop Onderdonk as assistant to the venerable Bishop White, chaplain of the Continental Congress. This organization, it seems, did not pursue an aggressive policy. Services were held only at intervals until 1839, when Rev. Dr. Michael, an Englishman, located in Mercer, and conducted services in the court-house for a number of months. For a period of about thirty years following this date only occasional services were held at the mission. In the list of officiating clergymen were Bishop Onderdonk, Rev. Ayres, of Franklin, Dr. Edward Y. Buchanan, Revs. James and Hosmer, of Meadville, Dr. Thomas Crompton, subsequently of Pittsburgh, and Dr. William White, of Butler. The last named gentleman visited the mission for a number of years. In 1868 the late Bishop Kerfoot made an effort to revive the church by establishing monthly services, and securing preaching from clergymen in different parts of the diocese. In 1872 Rev. William Bollard assumed charge, remaining nearly two years. His first service was held in Mercer, May 26, 1872, in the Congregational Church, which was occupied until January, 1873. In 1875 Rev. H. G. Wood, of Sharon, began work, conducting services at first in private houses. His pastorate continued until August, 1882, when he was succeeded by Rev. D. F. Hutchinson, of the diocese of Ontario, Canada. The latter gentleman located in Greenville, and supervised both the Greenville and the Mercer congregations. In October, 1872, a committee decided to purchase the "old Pearson property" for $3,000, but the stringency of money matters in the near future deterred the congregation from making the venture. Recourse was had a second time to the Congregational house for several years preceding 1884. During the pastorate of Mr. Hutchinson, new life was given to the previously discouraged flock. Miss Bay Magoffin donated a lot to the congregation, money was raised for the erection of a neat little chapel of the early English style, 24x51, with a chancel 8x12, and on March 25, 1884, the edifice was consecrated by Bishop Cortland Whitehead, of the diocese of Pittsburgh. The structure cost about $2,000.

Mr. Hutchinson was succeeded by Rev. Alonzo Diller, who remained about six months. He in turn was followed by Rev. George Rogers, of Paducah, Ky., who also remained about six months. The present rector is Rev. John London, of Butler, who conducts services every two weeks. The present membership is about thirty-five.

The New School Presbyterians were organized about 1837 by Rev. Philo C. Pettibone, from members who left the First Presbyterian Church. Its membership increased rapidly until it reached 200, but gradually diminished until it became extinct. Mr. Pettibone was the only pastor, remaining about two years. After his departure "supplies" were insufficient to keep this member of the numerous branches of Presbyterianism in existence.

The English Evangelical Lutheran Church was organized about 1840 or 1842, and included among its members Jacob Eberle and wife, David Achre and wife, Elias Achre and wife, the Nunemakers, Henry Ahrend and others. The house of worship was a frame one-story structure, which cost about $1,000. It was erected on the corner of Otter and Butler Streets, directly north of the present Methodist parsonage. The house was sold about 1854 to Albert Pew, now of Sharon, and has since been occupied by various persons as a private dwelling. The congregation disbanded about the time of the sale, a portion of the membership going to a Lutheran congregation worshipping on the Blacktown road. It, too, has been disbanded, many of the communicants finding a home in the Second Presbyterian Church of Mercer.

The Congregational Church of Mercer was organized on March 27, 1847, with a membership of nine persons, who had separated from the New School Presbyterians. This congregation worshipped in the court-house until April 18, 1852, at which time its own house was dedicated. The organization was effected by Rev. D. R. Barker, who was its first pastor. His death occurred in 1875. He was succeeded by Revs. J. M. Caldwell, Charles P. Mallory, D. L. Greer, W. C. Sexton, S. Manning and others. The congregation was finally disbanded and its house of worship was sold to the Reformed Presbyterians, whose sketch is found in this chapter.

The Free Presbyterian Church, formed from the fragments of the New School, was organized on June 15, 1850, with nine members, and continued a doubtful existence until 1866, when it ceased as a member of the church militant. Rev. George Gordon was the first pastor. He was assisted by his brother, Rev. Joseph Gordon, who was editor of the Free Presbyterian, described in the chapter on the Press. Revs. J. C. Bigham and J. W. Torrence also served as pastors.

The Springfield Reformed Presbyterian Church was organized about five miles northeast of Mercer, on the Crabtown road, nearly fifty years ago. It has had comparatively few preachers in the half-century of its existence, the following pastors having served: Rev. James Blackwood, Rev. J. J. McClurkin (twenty-two years), Rev. J. R. Wylie, from 1877 to 1888. Between the pastorates of Mr. McClurkin and Wylie there was a vacancy for a period of four years. The labors of the former began in 1851. Rev. Blackwood's labors were less than thirteen years. In November, 1886, a portion of the old Springfield Reformed Presbyterian Church came to Mercer and purchased the old Congregational house of worship. Rev. J. R. Wylie, who was the pastor of the Springfield congregation from 1877 to 1888, became the minister of the branch that located in Mercer, and worked hard to have the entire congregation transferred to the town. His labors ceased with the congregation May 1, 1888, he having been called to the pastorate of a church in New Galilee, Beaver County.

SCHOOLS.

The first school-house in the borough of Mercer was a brick structure, which stood near the intersection of the two alleys east of the present St. Cloud Hotel, and not far from the site afterward occupied by the Mercer Academy. It was a one-story brick, about twenty feet square. In it was a ten-plate stove, on which refractory pupils were compelled to sit as a punishment. Its seats were ordinary benches, destitute of backs. In front of these benches stood desks for writing purposes. Into the wall were driven wooden pegs on which to suspend bonnets and hats. The first teacher was St. John Galbreath. He punished Mrs. Margaret H. (Foster) Rogers, at present one of the oldest residents of Mercer, by compelling her to sit on the stove. Mr. Galbreath was succeeded by two excellent ladies from New England, sisters. They were Kittie and Sallie DeWolf. They were good, both in their instruction and government. After the academy was erected these Yankee sisters were employed as instructors. They probably preceded Prof. Kelley in the good work of laying a foundation for educational work in the town.

Mrs. Anna B. Garrett* came from Philadelphia at an early day, probably about 1816, and opened a sort of an industrial school in her own house, which was a two-story log structure that stood on the site of the house now occupied by Mrs. Judge D. W. Findley, of Mercer. The lower part of the house was occupied by the family, and the upper story was used for school purposes. Mrs. Garrett taught sewing, embroidery, etc., in connection with the ordinary subjects of an English education. She was an excellent reader herself, and was successful in making good readers of her pupils. She was a worthy, intelligent woman, and a superior instructor. Dr. David Junkin paid her a merited compliment when he pronounced her the "Hannah Moore of America."

Mrs. Garrett had school at the time of the severe snow-storm of February 4, 1817. Of the many pupils of Mercer and vicinity who were members of her classes, but two are known to be living at this date (May, 1888), viz.: Mrs. Margaret H. Rogers, of Mercer, and Mrs. Mary (Brown) Norton, of Sharon. The former was snow-bound by the severe storm referred to, and had to be carried to her home on the back of her older brother. For six weeks she was unable to return to school, the deep snow continuing with such pertinacity. Mrs. Garret died in Mercer, and sleeps in the old Presbyterian graveyard.

Another early school was kept in the dwelling house of Thompson Clark, a brother-in-law of S. B. Foster, and the father of William F. Clark, whose history is given in the chapter on the Press. The house in question was a two-story log building, and stood on the site of Dr. Hoon's office, on the south side of East Market Street. After Mr. Clark died his wife, Susan, and daughter, Jane, started a school, and continued it for several years. Some of the older residents of Mercer still recall their attendance at the Clark school with great pleasure.

Mercer Academy.—One of the useful and cherished institutions of Mercer, and one which did much to stamp its youth with proper conceptions and laudable ambitions for life's great duties, was the old Mercer Academy. Around its name cluster some of the most precious memories. Though the material structure is entirely gone, there being, as in the case of that grand structure of the Jewish people—the Temple, not "one stone upon another," the fabric of character and intellectual training which it wove in the days of long ago still remains, an imperishable heritage. Many a youth looks back to his alma mater with all the pride that ever characterized the loyal sons of the ancient and highly endowed institutions of more highly favored times and localities. Mercer Academy still lives in the labors of her children. This institution was established by virtue of an act of the Assembly passed on the 30th of March, 1811. The act stipulated that the annual income should not exceed $2,000; that poor children should be taught gratis, and that the name should be "Mercer Academy." An appropriation of $2,000 was granted by the State for its erection. The records seem to have been lost or destroyed, and hence but an imperfect sketch can be presented. The first account of actual work is shown in a report of the following trustees, viz.: Rev. Samuel Tait, Joseph Junkin, Frederick Menner, John Hamill, Hugh Bingham, Robert Patterson, Dr. Epaphroditus Cossitt and T. S. Cunningham, made March 10, 1820, and covering the period from the 30th of March, 1811, to the 31st of December, 1819. It was published at the time in the Western Press.

Debtor: To State appropriation, $2,000; to interest on same to December 31, 1819, $1,016; to donations from former trustees, $65; total, $3,081.

Credit: By investment in N. W. bank, Meadville, $1,000; by amount paid Thomas Templeton for building Academy, $1,500; by balance on hand, $581; total, $3,081.

This report reveals the cost of the structure, and the name of the contractor, one of Mercer's honored citizens. At the same time Rev. Tait, Hugh Bingham and Mr. Cunningham advertised for a person "capable of teaching reading, writing, arithmetic, the mathematics and geography." Who responded to this call is not known. The academy proper did not open until some time afterward. The first principal was Prof. John Kelley. He was a good mathematician, but no linguist. He must have commenced as early as 1824 or 1825, and continued until about 1830, when he was succeeded by Prof. D. B. Cook, who was assisted by his wife, Mrs. Mary Ann Cook. In an advertisement found in the Press of the 28th of July, 1832, Mr. Cook gives some idea of the rates of tuition, and line of studies pursued. The following is the tuition per quarter: Reading, $1.50; writing and arithmetic, $2.00; algebra, surveying, navigation, rhetoric, mensuration and book-keeping, $3.00; Latin and French, $4.00. Mr. Cook was succeeded in 1834 by William M. Stephenson and a Mr. Matthews, the former in charge of the English and the latter of the classical department. John Keek was president of the board that employed them. In December, 1835, Mr. Stephenson alone was in charge of the institution. After a vacancy of about a year, Rev. D. H. A. McLean, then a student in the theological seminary, at Canonsburg, was secured, his work beginning in May, 1837. During the winter months the academy was idle, he spending his time at the seminary, but returning in May, 1838, to resume his work. Mr. McLean was succeeded by Rev. Mitchell and an associate, who seemed to be unable to work together harmoniously, and finally separated. The board likewise was divided. After they had been in charge a short time McLean taught a third short term in the summer of 1839. He leaving, they secured the services of John W. Duff, a recent graduate from Jefferson College. After Duff the principalship devolved upon Rev. D. R. Harper, D. D., then a student in theology. Rev. G. C. Vincent, D. D., now located at Latrobe, Westmoreland County, became his successor. He was pastor of what became the First U. P. Church, of Mercer, and remained in charge of the academy for several years. The following named gentlemen were also connected with the academy as principals or instructors: Hon. Samuel Griffith, J. L. Rogers, William A. Mehard, G. W. Zahniser, Hiram Leffingwell, J. T. Smith, J. R. Wilson, William Butler, John Armstrong, William Dickson, Miss Marsh, Miss Greenfield, Mr. McCune and William Scott.

The site of the building was Lots Nos. 249 and 250, lying north of East Market Street, between Otter Street and the diamond. On the 17th of March, 1849, a meeting was called at the court-house to take steps to erect a new building. Hugh Bingham was chairman and William F. Clark, Sr., secretary. Messrs. Stephenson, Garvin and Patterson were appointed a committee to prepare an address to the public on the necessity of such a step being taken. The address was read at a subsequent meeting. It urged the erection of a new building, in very decided terms; the scheme met with opposition, and was finally abandoned. The old structure was from time to time repaired. Finally, by act of the Assembly approved 13th of May, 1856, the Mercer school district was formed with the view of establishing a union school. Joseph Kerr, Samuel Giebner and William M. Stephenson were appointed commissioners to sell the academy property. The sale was made, Levi Jones being the purchaser, July 8, 1857. By him it was sold July 19, 1864, to John W. Parks. On the 15th of April, 1865, it was repurchased by Jones, by whom it was deeded on the 13th of January, 1868, to Mrs. Clarissa E. Jones, in consideration of $2,000. The building was burned down in January, 1879; but in the language of an American statesman, "the soil still remains."

Time would fail to give a full list of the men who, at various times, acted as trustees of the academy. It would embrace the names of such men as Rev. Samuel Tait, Frederick Menner, Joseph Junkin, John Hamill, Hugh Bingham, Robert Patterson, Dr. E. Cossitt, T. S. Cunningham, Andrew Patterson, Jonathan Smith, John Keek, Samuel Holstein, J. L. Dinwiddie, James Thompson, William M. Stephenson, Joseph T. Smith, William T. McAdam, B. F. Baskin, Samuel Giebner, William Stewart, D. W. Findley, A. H. Snyder, Samuel Woods, John Forker, John Carnes, Henry Forker, John McGill, James Sheriff, Andrew Harsha, etc.

In like manner the list of students who have attended the old academy would be a formidable one, embracing a large portion of the prominent families of the town of Mercer and other parts of the county. It would not detract from the honor of having once been a student within its walls to be reminded that it had afforded educational facilities to Dr. George Junkin, Rev.

D. X. Junkin, Judge J. J. Pearson, Hon. John A. Bingham, and others of State or national reputation. The old Mercer Academy is gone, but the young people of to-day are afforded excellent educational facilities in the public schools of the town and country. If they shall improve their facilities as carefully as their ancestors did at the "academy," the State will not be destitute of true men and women.

The present Public Schools date their origin properly from the sale of the old Mercer Academy, as related in the previous portion of this sketch. The money thus accruing, the commissioners thus appointed were permitted to augment by borrowing a sum not exceeding $5,000 for the erection of a suitable school building, the one now used. The board of directors of the school district were required to support a school at least ten months in the year, for the education of all youth from five to twenty-one, "in the branches of a complete English and classical education; but all students pursuing classical studies may be required to pay the prices usual for such branches in academies or private schools; also for those branches denominated ornamental, such as painting and drawing and instrumental music;" and it was further declared that "foreign modern languages may also be taught in said school, but to be considered extra, and to be paid for by the persons receiving instruction in them." The projectors of the common schools of Mercer were liberal in their plans for securing more than the mere English elements. The principal building was erected in 1867, at a cost of some $15,000. It is a brick structure, three stories in height, and situated so as to command the town and surrounding country. A second structure, a two-story brick with two rooms, was erected in 1875, at a cost of about $4,700. The following have served as principals of the schools: David Rambo, A. J. Warner, Charles Beemis, J. G. White, David Blakeley, Robert Murry, John Albin, Robert McFeeter, Rev. G. Kerr, H. R. Stewart, James C. Graham, Miss Callie G. Forrest and George H. Lamb.

Soldiers' Orphan School.—This benevolent and valuable school was established on the 1st of January, 1868, by J. G. White and George Reznor, on a tract of land owned by the former. The site and some of the buildings had been previously used for a water-cure. The location is a favorable one, being in the valley which lies between the hill on which Mercer is situated and Bald Hill lying to the northeast. The grounds, embracing seventy acres, are abundantly supplied with living water, that gushes from the base of Bald Hill. In addition, McCollough's Run, fed by springs, flows near by, affording a copious supply of the liquid element for all practical purposes. In the distribution of labor Mr. White became the superintendent of the educational department, and Mr. Reznor the general business manager. Mr. Reznor, however, retired from this position at the expiration of a year, but Mr. White continued as proprietor and principal until the first of March, 1874, when the proprietorship was transferred to Messrs. G. W. Wright, R. R. Wright, John I. Gordon and S. F. Thompson, its present owners. When the institution opened the attendance was necessarily small, and limited to a younger class of pupils. It is said that of the first hundred admitted nearly all were between the ages of four and eight years, a few even falling under the lesser number. This was in consequence of the theory first held, that pupils of about the same age should be sent to the same school. In a few years, however, this theory was discovered to be a false one, and children of the same family, whatever their ages, were sent to the same school. Mr. J. G. White, now a leading attorney at the Mercer bar, was, as has been already stated, the first principal. His duties in other directions required, however, that he should be relieved from such labors.

He selected Rev. William T. Dickson, a man of intellectual power and experience. He occupied the position but a few months when ill health compelled him to resign. He was succeeded by Miss Sarah Pew, a Mercer lady, who, during the two years of her incumbency, gave efficiency to that department of the school. She in turn was succeeded by Prof. William Bogle and G. W. Mays.

The first matron selected for the responsible place of governing these little ones was Mrs. Jane Findley, of Erie, widow of a distinguished minister. She faithfully performed the duties belonging to her position until 1870, when failing health compelled her to resign. Her memory is lovingly cherished by those who knew her in any capacity.

The second matron was Mrs. William F. Dickson, wife of Rev. William F. Dickson, who acted as the second principal. On account of his removal by reason of ill health, her stay was of short duration. Her successor was Mrs. Mary C. Galbraith, who held her position with success and general acceptance for a period of over four years. During her administration order, system and harmony prevailed. At the termination of Mrs. Galbraith's term of service Miss Jennie Martin, formerly connected with the Dayton Soldiers' Orphan School, was chosen. She had had quite a varied experience in similar work, and was, besides, the daughter of a soldier, who was a victim of the horrors of Andersonville. The wisdom shown in her selection was vindicated in the fact that she still occupies the position with honor and acknowledged success.

SECRET AND OTHER SOCIETIES.

On the 3d day of June, 1822, a warrant was issued by the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania, for the organization of Mercer Lodge No. 182, A. Y. M. The officers named in the charter were: Epaphroditus Cossitt, W. M.; Jacob Herrington, S. W.; William Budd, J. W. The charter members present at the first meeting, which was held on July 4, 1822, were: Epaphroditus Cossitt, Jacob Herrington, William Budd, William Haywood, James Mitchelsok, Samuel Hawthorn, Benjamin Hartley, William Jones, Andrew Titus and Thomas H. Trump. The meetings were held in the second story of the stone building now owned and occupied by Mrs. J. H. Robinson, on North Pitt Street. The sessions were interesting, and the order grew until 1827, when, owing to the strong anti-Masonic excitement, resulting from the abduction and melancholy fate of Morgan, it was compelled to yield to popular clamor, and passed gently into a state of non-existence. The last return of the lodge was dated 1827, but its warrant was not vacated until the 6th of February, 1837. A state of inactivity was indulged until the 27th of November, 1850, when Hebron Lodge No. 251 was constituted by Samuel McKinley, D. D. G. M., on a warrant from the Grand Lodge. The charter members consisted of Branton H. Henderson, now of Sharon, John Hoge, John McGill, Dawson Wadsworth and Ashel Tyler. In the warrant John Hoge was designated W. M.; J. P. Garrett, S. W., and John McGill, J. W. On the register was written in lead pencil, "J. P. Garrett not a member," from which it is inferred that he changed his mind as to becoming a member after he signed the application for a warrant. Difficulties of an internal character finally interfered with the prosperity of Hebron Lodge, and its meetings became less largely and enthusiastically attended. Finally, on the 5th of September, 1877, its warrant was vacated.

In June, 1888, as the result of some agitation, a new charter was secured for Hebron Lodge No. 575, by the following warrant members: T. K. Adams, W. M.; S. B. Griffith, S. W.; C. M. Derickson, J. W.; A. B. Filson, Secy.;

Richard Smith

W. D. Keck, Treas.; C. W. Whistler, John M. Findley, J. H. Chandler, D. R. Vaughn, John Carter, J. T. Moore and S. H. Miller. The lodge was accordingly constituted.

Mercer Lodge No. 323, I. O. O. F., was instituted July 31, 1848, with Samuel Henderson, N. G.; Joseph R. Hunter, V. G.; Robert C. Rankin, Sec.; Charles Curtis, Asst. Sec.; and Dawson Wadsworth, Treas. The first meetings of the order were held in the old academy building. From there the lodge removed to the stone house at present used as a dwelling by Mrs. J. H. Robinson, in the upper story of which was a room which had been used many years before by the original Masonic order of Mercer. This was now repaired and occupied for a time. Becoming dissatisfied with these quarters, the lodge, in connection with the Sons of Temperance, built a hall on what is now a vacant lot, near the First Presbyterian Church. This being rendered untenable, the Burwell Block was occupied for a time, after which the present quarters, located in the third story of the Thompson and Miller Block, were secured. The most prosperous period of the lodge was during and immediately following the war. Its membership at this time numbered as high as 158. During a period of intense political excitement, a disaffection was created among the more influential members, which resulted very disastrously to the lodge, and from which it has never recovered. The falling off in membership at this time, and from the cause which produced it, had such a tendency to weaken the interest in the order which had so long been maintained, that at one time but ten members constituted the organization, and it was only through the utmost efforts on the part of these few that the charter, which is one of the oldest in Mercer County, was retained. During several years past the lodge has been attended with alternate success and failure, in its efforts to rebuild its membership, until at last the young men of the town have become interested, and the prospect of its progress is more favorable than for many years. The present membership is thirty, nearly all young men. There was at one time an encampment in Mercer, known as Shenandoah Encampment No. 25. Its meetings covered a period of nearly twenty years, but it has been defunct for about ten years.

Mercer Lodge No. 87, A. O. U. W., was organized March 3, 1875, by E. Harvey, D. D. G. M. W., with the following charter members: A. Hildebrand, H. A. Gamble, G. H. Smith, F. H. Braggins, J. S. McKean, C. A. White, A. Newell, J. E. McClure, D. A. Eberly, John H. McKean, J. Borland, S. S. Robinson, J. D. Moore, A. C. Ray, A. McKean, H. R. Stewart, J. W. Mehard, B. A. Ride, George King and R. McAdoo. The first officers installed comprised John Borland, P. M. W.; B. R. Welch, M. W.; R. McAdoo, F.; G. H. Smith, O.; J. S. McKean, R.; J. D. Moore, Fin.; J. E. McClure, Rec.; H. R. Stewart, G.; George King, Watchman; and F. H. Braggins, A. Newell and B. A. Ride, Trustees. The lodge is in a prosperous condition. It has at present thirty-three members, who meet every Tuesday evening in Masonic Hall.

W. C. T. U.—The local Union was organized in June, 1875, with the following members: Mrs. Rev. McWatty, Mrs. Rev. Kerr, Mrs. Rev. Small, Mrs. Ellen H. Mowrey, Mrs. Hannah Stevenson, Mrs. Rachael Crawford, Mrs. Catherine Bell, Mrs. Nancy Pew, Mrs. Amanda Donaldson, Mrs. Mary Stewart, Mrs. Susanna Moore, Mrs. G. Powell, Mrs. Susan Taylor, Mrs. Sarah Findley, Mrs. Nancy Logan, Mrs. E. E. Robinson, Miss Sarah Thompson, Miss Tillie Hays, and Miss Lizzie Forrest. The first officers were: Pres., Mrs. Margaret H. Rodgers; Rec. Sec., Miss Sarah Pew. Weekly meetings were held and public prayer-meetings in the court-house yard during summer time. The officers since the beginning have been: Presidents—Mrs. Rev. B. M. Kerr, Mrs. A. J. Kerr, Mrs. S. H. Braden and Mrs. H. E. Bigham; Rec. Secys.—Miss Sarah Pew and Mrs. Whitney; Cor. Secys.—Mrs. Mamie Burwell and Miss Sarah Pew; Treas.—Mrs. Belle Foster. Lectures and temperance addresses have been given under the auspices of the local Union every year since its organization, and all possible efforts have been made to suppress the consumption and sale of intoxicating liquors. The result has been, and this result is due alone to the Women's Christian Temperance Union and its co-operators, that there are now no open bars in Mercer, and the sentiment is so strong against the traffic, that it is improbable that any will be soon re-opened. This success has not been achieved without severe struggles; and nothing short of almost invincible courage enabled the members of the local Union to persevere in the face of so many hardships. At present monthly meetings are held, the place of holding these alternating among the various churches.

Mercer Post No 169, G. A. R., Department of Pennsylvania, was chartered May 14, 1880, with the following named members: John I. Gordon, S. F. Thompson, A. B. Filson, S. H. Miller, R. G. Madge, Johnson Rigby, H. R. Stewart, J. S. McKean, Silas Hunter, James Patterson, G. W. Riddle, Robert Stranahan, William Kile, J. L. Cook, H. A. Gamble, J. K. Rayen, A. G. Urey, J. S. Henderson, William Eastlick, H. H. Conway, Charles M. Derrickson, Robert Stewart, James Murphy, John Forker, P. E. Shipler, Charles Livingston, Charles Clawson, Patrick Blake, D. L. Burton and J. B. Nickum. The first officers of the post were: John I. Gordon, commander; William Kyle, senior vice-commander; H. A. Gamble, junior vice-commander; A. B. Filson, quartermaster; Robert Stranahan, surgeon; H. R. Stewart, chaplain; R. G. Madge, adjutant; J. S. McKean, officer of day, and James L. Cook, officer of guard. The following have been post commanders of the post: John I. Gordon, William Kile, H. A. Gambel, Robert Stranahan, J. S. McKean, D. L. Barton, M. C. Zahniser and Charles Clawson. The post is at present in good condition, having a surplus in the treasury of over $200, and a membership in good standing of seventy-seven. Since its organization there have been but three deaths, those of John Forker, J. S. Penroid and Jason Comstock. Meetings are held in Masonic Hall, on the north side of the public square.

Mercer Lodge No. 3157, K. of H., was organized April 8, 1885, with the following named charter members: J. F. Hindman, F. M. Temple, R. G. Madge, A. Levino, J. W. Nickum, H. D. French, L. M. Ormsby, M. Diferderfer, J. S. McKean, John H. McKean, James Orr, William M. Miller, L. C. Robinson, S. Redmond, George E. Patterson, S. P. Johnston, P. C. Emery, Ira C. Zahniser, A. B. Thompson, T. A. Black and J. T. Myers. The first officers chosen, were: George E. Patterson, D.; L. M. Ormsby, P. D.; R. G. Madge, V. D.; A. B. Thompson, A. D.; James McKean, G., and J. F. Hindman, C. Meetings are held in the Masonic Hall every alternate Thursday evening.

Keystone Circle No. 10, P. H. C., was organized February 28, 1887, with a long list of charter members, among whom were: T. J. Nickum, J. M. Albin, John Hughes, A. C. Ray, J. A. Myers, William Kilner, G. M. Williams, Charles Barnes, and Miss M. M. Wilson. The first officers elected comprised: President, J. M. Albin; vice-president, John Hughes; guardian, A. C. Ray; accountant, J. A. Myers; treasurer, William Kilner, and secretary, G. M. Williamson. There are twenty-nine members. Meetings are held on the first and third Monday evenings of each month in the Masonic Hall.

Solid Comfort Fishing Club was organized in 1878, with James A. Stranahan, S. B. Griffith, Herman Frankel, John Robinson, S. H. Miller, H. B. Bowser,

R. R. Wright, M. B. McKinley, J. M. Ewing, R. A. Stewart, M. P. Martin, E. L. Garvin, George Pearson, W. C. Alexander, H. H. Zeigler, John I. Gordon, J. R. W. Baker, W. D. Keck, C. M. Derickson and Hon. S. S. Mehard, as original members. A charter was granted in 1884, upon which appears the object of the organization: "The protection and propagation of game and game fish, the enforcement of all laws against the unlawful killing of the same, the advancement of fellowship, unanimity and a higher standard of action among sportsmen, and the provision of recreation and pleasure for its members." At the time of the issue of the charter the officers were: Samuel B. Griffith, president; B. J. Haywood, vice-president; William Miller, Jr., secretary; A. B. Filson, treasurer, and James A. Stranahan, Charles Clawson and N. C. Packard, executive committee. The members not originally belonging were, in 1884, A. B. Filson, Henry Hall, Thomas Farmer; William Kile, Charles Clawson, A. H. McElrath, R. J. Zahniser, B. J. Haywood, J. McMichael, N. C. Packard and C. Q. Carver. The first encampment, held in 1878, occurred at Sugar Lake, in Crawford County; in 1879, at Burke Lake, Mich.; in 1880, at Muskoka Lake, near Beaumaris, Ontario; in 1881, again at Burke Lake; and in 1883 buildings and grounds were purchased at Muskoka Lake, on what is known as Point Comfort, Tondern Island, since which time annual summer encampments, lasting one month, have been held at the club's grounds. The property of the club, consisting of canoes, guns, dishes, tenting and other equipments, is valued at $1,000. The occasion of the annual encampment, usually held in July, is looked forward to with great interest by the members of the club, as it is always one of surpassing enjoyment. The membership is quite large, extending over several adjoining counties. The last officers elected comprised, president, Herman Frankel; vice-president, Thomas Tanner; secretary, Q. A. Gordon; treasurer, Charles Clawson; executive committee, Johnson Zahniser, Charles Clawson and F. P. James.

BANKING INSTITUTIONS.

First National Bank.—The predecessor of the present bank was a private banking and brokerage concern operating under the firm name of Stevenson, Van Horn & Hanna, which was organized about the outbreak of the Rebellion. The present institution was chartered in May, 1864, and began business with a capital stock of $60,000, which was doubled in May, 1875. The first corps of officers comprised A. G. Egbert, president, and John R. Hanna, cashier. By the resignation of Mr. Egbert, which occurred January 13, 1869, Hon. Samuel Griffith became president. He was succeeded by William Logan. Mr. Hanna was succeeded by O. L. Munger, and he by W. C. Alexander; he, in turn, by C. S. Burwell, who left Mercer in April, 1888. Mr. W. Miller became his successor, and is the present incumbent. The present officers consist of William Logan, president; William Miller, cashier; C. P. McKean, teller, and A. J. McKean, Thomas R. Sheriff, John B. Mowry, B. A. Williams, S. H. Miller and R. R. Wright, directors. A very fair business is transacted by this institution. It has recently removed into handsome quarters in the Miller & Gordon Block, where it enjoys unsurpassed facilities for conducting a general banking business.

Farmers' and Mechanics' National Bank was chartered May 11, 1875, with a capital stock of $80,000, and began operations in June of the same year. The first officers were: President, B. Magoffin; vice-president, C. M. Stewart; cashier, L. Hefling. Dr. R. V. Bellis acted as president for several years, and was succeeded by Mr. Magoffin, the present incumbent. Mr. Hefling was succeeded by John Robinson as cashier. The present officers comprise B.

Magoffin, president; Levi Morrison, vice-president; John Robinson, cashier; Henry Robinson, assistant cashier; and C. M. Stewart, P. J. Pierce, John I. Gordon, S. F. Thompson, John M. Magoffin, S. C. Koonce and John Hutcheson, directors. The bank enjoys an extensive patronage, and occupies commodious and accessible quarters on the north side of the diamond.

Building and Loan Association.—The advantages which an organization with a purpose of assisting by loans in the erection of houses and in the purchasing of real estate led to the formation of the Mercer Building and Loan Association, which was incorporated December 18, 1873, with the following named gentlemen as charter members: Hon. S. H. Miller, A. J. Greer, William Bell, A. B. Filson, O. L. Munger, John G. Kline, A. J. McKean, E. L. Garvin, J. E. McClure, W. C. Alexander, W. J. McKean, Thomas R. Sheriff, P. J. Pierce and James A. Stranahan. The association continued in existence with varying fortunes until July, 1883, when a dissolution was agreed upon, and the effects of the enterprise were closed out. The officers at time of dissolution were S. F. Thompson, president; R. R. Wright, secretary and treasurer, and A. P. Burwell, James Denniston and Dr. C. M. Stewart, directors.

GAS AND WATER COMPANIES.

Mercer Heat, Light and Power Company was chartered November 19, 1883, for the purpose of supplying the borough with natural gas, or rather to develop a sentiment favorable to the use of the new fuel. The capital stock was fixed at $2,000, divided into forty shares of the par value of $50 each. The directors of the company were William Paden, H. H. Lininger, Robert Orr, Herman Frankel and R. A. Stewart. Nothing further was done by the company than to secure a charter.

Mercer Gas Company was chartered December 28, 1883, with a capital stock of $5,000, divided into 100 shares of the par value of $50 each. The first directors of this company were William Logan, B. Magoffin, P. J. Pierce, A. J. McKean, George Pearson, R. R. Wright and Levi Morrison. Although a charter was secured nothing further was accomplished.

Mercer Gas Light and Fuel Company.—The result of previous agitations relative to the introduction of natural gas into Mercer was the organization of this company, which was chartered October 6, 1886, with a capital stock of $12,500, divided into 250 shares of the par value of $50 each. The original shareholders were John I. Gordon, S. H. Miller, John Robinson, B. Magoffin, C. W. Mackey, John M. Dickey, William Miller, Jr., Montrose M. Magoffin, Peter J. Pierce, H. H. Zeigler, G. W. Wright, J. F. Hindman, A. Newell, G. K. Smith, W. R. Montgomery, A. H. McElrath, C. S. Burwell, J. W. Nickum, C. E. McWatty, R. S. Madge, Herman Frankel, R. R. Wright, A. J. McKean, R. A. Stewart, Henry Robinson, S. F. Thompson, J. M. Douds, Mrs. M. Magoffin, Grace A. Jackson and Jennie M. Jackson. The first board of directors comprised John I. Gordon, president; S. H. Miller, S. F. Thompson, A. J. McKean, Herman Frankel and B. Magoffin. The gas, with which the town is thoroughly supplied through a net-work of pipes, was originally obtained from the Columbia Gas Company, but that organization being merged into the Standard Company, the latter furnishes the Mercer supply. The fuel is used quite extensively in the borough, one or more stoves being supplied with it in nearly every house.

The Mercer Water Company was incorporated September 7, 1886, with a capital stock of $24,000, divided into 240 shares of the par value of $100 each. The first directors consisted of S. H. Miller, president; John I. Gordon, C. W. Whistler, R. R. Wright, A. J. McKean and B. Magoffin. The water with which this company supplies the town is obtained from the Neshannock Creek, whence it is forced by a steam pump into a large reservoir tank, holding, when full, 1,500 barrels, situated on the brow of the hill on which the city is built, from which, by a system of pipes and mains, the supply is distributed to patrons. There are 222 consumers in the borough, necessitating 14,500 feet of main piping. The present officers of the company are S. H. Miller, president; John Robinson, secretary and treasurer.

Cemeteries.—Mercer has two burial places. One of these is the burial ground north and west of the First Presbyterian Church. It was established at a very early period, and served to be the last resting-place of many of the old and prominent citizens of Mercer and the vicinity. Of late years it has been much neglected, weeds and briars growing luxuriantly, and, in many cases, rendering it almost impossible to reach the monuments and tablets erected over graves.

The other is the Citizens' Cemetery, which was established by act of the General Assembly, approved April 14, 1852. It embraces about four acres in the south part of the borough, and was incorporated by Lewis Weaver, Henry Forker, R. L. Maxwell, William Maxwell, R. T. Clark, J. R. Hunter, Joseph Gordon, Samuel Griffith, R. Hanna, J. Sykes, W. McMillan, J. McBirney, John Sloss, B. Lindsay, W. S. Rankin, B. H. Henderson, John S. Pearson, William M. Gibson, E. F. Pearson, William Stewart, J. Pew, George Kline, W. Gregory, Joseph Sheriff, T. Graham, R. Shieler, J. Phipps, J. Pearson, J. Hosack, A. Stewart, Joseph Shieler, Joseph Forker, E. W. Carter, W. M. Stephenson, J. L. McQuillan, Thomas J. Mowry, Joseph Thompson, John Moore, A. E. Eberhart, T. J. Hirst, J. Baskin, John Forker, George Bell, Adam Forker and J. D. McGill. By charter the affairs of the organization are to be directed by a president and six managers, to whom is entrusted the management of the institution. The grounds are neatly laid out, and shaded, and contain some neat and handsome monuments.

Population.—The growth of Mercer has never been rapid, its lack of railroad and shipping facilities, until quite a recent date, confining its population to a slow but steady natural increase. In 1850 it contained 1,004 inhabitants; 1860, 1,249; 1870, 1,235, and 1880, 2,344. It has now an estimated population of about 3,000.

ON the boundary line between the second and third States of the Union, in point of size, safely nestled between gently sloping hills, along whose bases flows the historic Shenango, lies the metropolis of Mercer County—Sharon. Its early settlers came during the second administration of President Washington, and began to open up homes for themselves and their families. One of the first of these was Benjamin Bentley, who came from Washington County, Penn., in April, 1795, and took up a tract of 400 acres, embracing what is known as the Quinby farm, on the east side of the Shenango River, in the southern part of Sharon. According to James Bentley, a son still living one and a half miles west of Sharon, in his ninety-first year, Mr. Bentley brought his family from Washington County in May, 1796, in a canoe, down the Ohio and up Big Beaver and Shenango Rivers, to the place where, on his "tomahawk claim," he had erected his rude cabin the previous year, to hold possession. His family, at the time, consisted of his wife and these children: Robert, Adamson, George, Benjamin, Elizabeth and Hannah. After reaching his new home, were born James, Martin, Sheshbazar, Mary and Aholiab. James and Aholiab are still living. James was the first white child born in this portion of the Shenango Valley, that important event in his history having occurred on the 23d of May, 1798.

Benjamin Bentley built a grist and saw-mill on his place in 1802. It was the first of the kind on the Shenango within the limits of Hickory Township. The Indians, who were then numerous in this region, came to Mr. Bentley to get their meal. On one occasion they traded a dog that was half wolf for three bushels of meal. After the meal was consumed they returned to get their dog. Bentley was inclined to grant their request, lest they would destroy the mill. The Bentley boys, however, would not permit the dog to go. When the Indians were asked why they wanted the animal, they said, with true Indian duplicity, "To trade for more meal." In 1808 Mr. Bentley sold his farm to Samuel Quinby, and removed across the line into Ohio, locating in Brookfield Township, about half a mile north of where his son, James, now lives. He continued to live there until the time of his death, in September, 1818, in his sixty-third year. His wife, Mary (Baldwin) Bentley, died many years afterward, aged eighty-six years. Both are buried in Oakwood Cemetery.

In the spring of 1796 William Budd came from Washington County, Penn., and took up a tract west of the Shenango, opposite that of Bentley. He erected a log cabin, and for quite a year or two indulged in keeping "bachelor's hall." The year following (1798) he joined his interests in ties of wedlock with Drusilla Hulse, of Washington County, Penn., whom he brought to share with him the hardships and privations of pioneer life on the Shenango. From this union sprang five sons and two daughters: Joseph, William, Edward Schofield, Henry Hoagland, Daniel Upson, Elizabeth and Sichy. These children lived to be prominent residents of the community, where many of their descendants are still to be found.

William Budd laid out and platted Sharon in the year 1815, on the west side of the river. During his life-time he erected four different dwellings on his land. He died May 23, 1849, aged seventy six years. His first wife died June 10, 1815, and he was again married in 1821, and survived his second wife.

His parents, William and Sichy Budd, brothers Daniel and John, and sisters Patience, Nancy, Sallie, Elizabeth and Mary, came from Washington County, Penn., soon after, and located on the land entered by William. The parents died on the homestead at an early day, and Daniel was the only one of their children, except William, who remained in Sharon. Daniel married Elizabeth, daughter of Samuel Quinby. He laid out a portion of the town east of the river, and died October 7, 1841. His widow survived him till February 22, 1880, and his two living children, Mrs. Sarah Malin and Lafayette, reside in Sharon.

Charles and Frances Reno came from Allegheny County, and located on a farm on the east side of the Shenango, in the year 1798. The greater portion of East Sharon is built on this farm. They had twelve children, seven sons and five daughters, all of whom lived to have families of their own. Three of the daughters, Mrs. Julia A. Trotter, Mrs. Jane Byers and Mrs. Amanda Christy, and two sons, C. L. P. Reno and W. N. Reno, are still living. Charles Reno died November 4, 1840, and Frances, his wife, May 16, 1820. A grandson of Charles Reno, that is, a son of Lewis T. Reno, became prominent in military affairs. Reference is had to Maj.-Gen. Jesse Lee Reno, who was born near Wheeling, W. Va., in 1825; was appointed a cadet from Franklin, Penn., to West Point in 1842, graduated with honor in 1846; joined Scott's army in Mexico, where he did valiant service; was made brigadier-general of volunteers in 1861, and did efficient service with Burnside in North Carolina, and McClellan in the Peninsula campaign in 1862; served with Pope in the second battle of Bull Run, and was finally killed in the battle of South Mountain, September 14, 1862.

In 1802-03 Isaac Patterson, a native of Adams County, Penn., secured quite a body of land lying north of State Street and west of the Shenango. It was part of an extensive tract taken up by Samuel Stokely. In 1814 or 1815 Patterson removed across the line into Ohio. Elias Jones bought 100 acres from Patterson at this time, lying along State Street from the Shenango to the State line, and extending north to the lands of Daniel Hull, who owned 200 acres. Jones farmed this land, first clearing off the timber with which it was covered. He erected a distillery near the site of the present Catholic Church soon after he came to the locality. After it decayed he tore it down. Jones had the first distillery, the first dry goods and grocery store, and kept the first hotel or inn in the place. He was also the first postmaster. The log building used for tavern, store and post-office stood near the site of Dr. Salem Heilman's dwelling, corner of Main and State Streets. His daughter, Mrs. Jane Dillinger, an octogenarian, is still living in Sharon.

Samuel Quinby, a farmer and miller, became the successor in 1808 of Benjamin Bentley, owning all the land now occupied by the Stewart Iron Works, upon which the grist and saw-mill stood. He sold the property to Conrad G. Carver, who ran the mill for many years. He reared ten children: Sarah (Reeves), Rebecca (Reno), Nancy (De Forest), Elizabeth (Budd), Julia (Porter), Terressa (Carver), Ephraim, Charles, Parks and Samuel. Mr. Quinby served in the Revolution, and was buried with military honors September 10, 1842, the anniversary of Perry's victory.

Col. Henry Hoagland with his wife, Catherine, and five children, John, Samuel, Richard, Mary and Matilda, settled on the west side of the Shenango, about a mile above the town, in 1798. He came from Washington County. He was an active member of the Baptist Church, and was instrumental in establishing that denomination in Sharon. He participated in the War of 1812, assisting at Erie in lifting the brig "Niagara" over the bar in 1813. His descendants became prominent citizens in the development of the county, and many of them reside in the vicinity of Sharon.

Daniel, Bashara and John Hull were among the early settlers near Sharon. Daniel's land lay west of the Shenango, and north of what is now State Street. His brothers located close to him, and all came as early as 1798 or 1799. Daniel and John died on their respective homesteads, while Bashara removed to Iowa.

Capt. John Elliott came shortly before the Hulls, and settled in the same neighborhood. His daughter, Patience, married John Hull. Capt. Elliott was a veteran of the Revolution.

At a later date than the foregoing came Abraham De Forest, a captain in the Revolutionary War. He lived south of Sharon, and subsequently removed to Ohio. Emanuel Hoover lived near De Forest. South of De Forest lived Benjamin Haywood, Sr., on the farm now owned by John J. Spearman. He committed suicide. George McCleery, father of Joseph McCleery, still a resident of Sharon, owned 400 acres north of State Street, on the hill. His tract lay east of the residence of Thomas J. Porter. Opposite the McCleery farm lay the farm of Samuel Stambaugh, some 350 acres.

In April, 1825, Thomas J. Porter removed from Mercer to Sharon, where he became prominent in the development of the place. He is still a resident of Sharon, and is in his eighty-eighth year. He erected the third tavern in the place, the second having been kept by Daniel Budd in his farm house on the east side of the Shenango. Porter's building was a two-story frame, about 20x60, and stood on the site of the present Carver House. It was built in 1831. It contained a store-room and a post-office, both under the management of Mr. Porter. He sold it to Henry Barnhart, who continued to run the store and tavern for a time. The building was finally burned down and replaced by the Carver House.

As already stated, Elias Jones kept the first grocery and dry goods store, the first hotel, and was the first distiller and postmaster. Soon afterward Dr. Ephraim Quinby and Lewis Reno conducted a store in a log house which stood on the triangle now occupied by the residence of B. H. Henderson and the railroads, south of State Street.

The first physicians who practiced in Sharon were Drs. Elijah Flower and John Mitcheltree. Flower lived in Brookfield, and Mitcheltree on a farm about three miles south of town. The latter was the brother-in-law of Dr. J. M. Irvine, who subsequently became one of the prominent business men of Sharon, and whose sketch will be found in the Medical Chapter.

The first resident physician is admitted to have been Dr. Robert McCormick. He came from Carlisle, Cumberland County, about 1839. He was well read and skillful, and a Christian gentleman. "Some physicians," he used to say, "pride themselves on raising their patients from the borders of the grave, but my effort is to keep my patients from getting down there." He removed to Illinois, where he died some years ago. Afterward came Drs. Martin, Reynolds, Christy and Wolf. They all preceded Dr. Irvine, who appeared in the forties. Dr. W. N. Reno practiced from 1841 to 1850. He is now engaged in the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal Church, being a member of the Erie Conference.

The first justice of the peace was William Budd, Jr., whose history has been detailed. He was still holding the position in 1825, when Mr. Porter located in the place and filled the office about thirty years.

MANUFACTURES.

Sharon has been noted as a manufacturing point. Its importance has been the outgrowth of the enterprise exhibited in that direction. As an account of the iron and steel industries will be found in the chapter devoted to the Iron, Steel and Coal Industries of the county, the reader is referred to that chapter for information on these important interests.

The mill previously mentioned in this chapter as being purchased from Benjamin Bentley by Samuel Quinby was operated by the latter for many years, and subsequently by his son-in-law, Conrad G. Carver, until its water power was destroyed by the construction of the canal.

The next grist-mill was built in 1822 by Giles Clark, on the west bank of the river, opposite the site of the Sharon Iron Works. A few years afterward he put in fulling and carding machinery. These mills were operated by Giles and Lemuel Clark, and subsequently by Conrad G. Carver, a well-remembered citizen of Sharon, and were finally abandoned.

In 1840-41 Giles Clark erected the old Sharon flouring mill, on the canal near the site of Kline's planing mills, obtaining his power from the canal. Samuel and John P. Wright succeeded him, and J. C. Thompson obtained an interest upon the death of John P. Wright, in October, 1860. It was at a later date purchased and operated by Benjamin & Sons, who sold it to George W. Johnson, of New Castle. Upon the abandonment of the canal steam power was introduced, and the mill was kept in active operation until its destruction by fire, Mr. Johnson being then proprietor.

The large ruins of the old furniture factory near the Kimberly mills remain as an evidence that the manufacture of furniture was once carried on in Sharon on quite an extensive scale. This business had its inception in February, 1845, when the firm of Willson, Logan & Partridge commenced the manufacture of all kinds of furniture. Several changes in the firm occurred through the passing years, though James M. Willson has always remained in the business. The firm of Willson & Robinson erected and operated the factory spoken of many years. Several years ago the local manufacture of furniture became unprofitable, and the factory was then closed and the business abandoned.

The Empire planing mills of Wallis & Carley is the largest institution of the kind in Mercer County. This firm is the lineal successor of Faas, Kanengeiser & Co., contractors and builders, established many years ago, of which they were members, and which the present firm succeeded early in 1876. They purchased the old Carver & Trout planing mills in March, 1876, which were burned the following October. Wallis & Carley, with characteristic enterprise, at once rebuilt them, and have ever since continued to successfully carry on the leading planing mills and lumber yard in this portion of the valley. The firm are very extensive contractors and builders, and give steady employment to a large force of men. The members of the firm are William L. Wallis and John Carley, whose names are the synonym of business push and enterprise.

The Sharon planing mill is also one of the manufacturing institutions of Sharon. It was established by Harry Kline, its present proprietor, and is doing quite a fair business. Mr. Kline carries on a lumber yard in connection with his mill.

Sharon can also boast of two first-class flouring mills, the older of the two being owned and operated by Samuel F. Stambaugh. It is a frame structure, and equipped with the most improved machinery of the gradual reduction process. Mr. Stambaugh ranks among the oldest and best known citizens of Sharon.

The City Roller Mill was built by its present proprietor, Thomas Moses, and is a large brick building of solid and substantial appearance. It, too, is furnished with a first-class roller process. Both these mills turn out a fine grade of flour, and are doing a good business.

Many other smaller manufacturers in different lines might be mentioned, but those given embrace the principal ones outside of the iron and steel industries.

ADDITIONS.

The town has had a rapid growth by the accession of territory in various directions. The records show as follows: Benjamin Reno's, June 12, 1854; Strawbridge's, August 15, 1868; Reuben Williamson's, July 24, 1869; Hull's first addition, May 16, 1870; C. G. Carver's, October 18, 1873; Dr. J. M. Irvine's, October 20, 1873. Several other additions have also been made.

INCORPORATION AND BOROUGH OFFICERS.

Sharon was regularly incorporated as a borough October 6, 1841. The first election was held the fourth Monday in November, 1841, resulting in the choice of M. C. Trout as burgess, and A. W. Porter, John Phillips, John Patterson, W. C. Malin and C. G. Carver as councilmen. At a meeting of the council, held March 19, 1842, the following officers were appointed: Street commissioner, Joseph Budd; assessor, J. M. Irvine; clerk, L. W. Mears; treasurer, Benjamin Reno.

The records of the borough are incomplete. So far as they could be reached, the borough officers are given:

1842—Burgess, John Patterson; council, William Budd, Isaac Patterson, Adam M. White, Robert McFarland, William McMillen; constable, J. F. Satterfield; assessor, John Patterson; school directors, M. L. Murdock, C. G. Carver.

The voters at the election held in the borough on April 2, 1844, were: Joseph Budd, M. L. Mordock, Isaac H. Davis, Benjamin Keefer, Solomon Dillinger, Jacob Cozad D. C. Terrill, Henry Wadsworth, John Mounts, Benjamin Stewart, William McMillen, Jones Blackstone, John Phillips, Thomas Bowden, Andrew Reeves, Norton Wheeler, William M. Reno, John H. McCleery, Isaac Patterson, David W. Totman, Thomas Barrett, Charles Moore, William Budd, Edward St. Lawrence, Robert McFarland, Erastus Rice, P. L. Williams, David Clark, Daniel Sager, Henry Boyd, L. W. Mears, Elias Zigler, James Kennedy, Daniel W. Totman, E. C. Sweetland, Frederick Heiliger.

1845—Burgess, M. L. Mordock; council, T. J. Porter, Joseph Budd, Edward Graham, John Phillips, John Mounts.

1846—Burgess, Edward Graham; council, David Clark, Philip Rees, Norton Wheeler, A. M. Reeves, L. W. Mears.

1847—Burgess, Isaac Patterson; council, David T. Porter, Benjamin Reno, Robert McFarland, B. F. Flower, Charles Curtis.

1848—Burgess, Charles Curtis; council, John Green, E. C. Sweetland, William Logan, Milton Hull, Daniel Upson Budd.

1861—Burgess, Robert McFarland; council, John Green, James Thompson, Archibald Titus, Morris Alexander, J. M. Irvine.

1862—Burgess, Abner Applegate; council, Alfred N. Curtis, John M. Ward, William Morganthal, C. C. Conover, C. Bowden.

1863—Burgess, Abner Applegate; council, Robert McFarland, T. J. Porter, William Henlan, John Phillips, C. N. Prindle.

1864—Burgess, Abner Applegate; council, C. M. Rice, Thomas Taylor, John Phillips, H. J. Evans, Edward McGilvray.

1865—Burgess, P. W. Keller; council, William Morganthal, John M. Mordock, Samuel Watson, Henry Crosthwaite, J. R. McCleery.

1866—Burgess, Thomas Bowden; council, Joseph King, George Tribby, N. L. Williams, C. Bowden, James Westerman.

1867—Burgess, William Henlan; council, P. L. Williams, John Phillips, John Ashton, Samuel F. Stambaugh, J. R. McCleery.

1869—Burgess, J. A. Irvine; council, John Fisher, H. B. Chandler, J. J. Wilson, J. W. Hyde, James Westerman.

1870—Burgess, J. J. Wilson; council, D. C. Strawbridge, Richard E. Bell, J. W. Hyde, William Wilkes, Simon Perkins.

1871—Burgess, J. J. Wilson; council, W. O. Leslie, T. J. Gillespie, Terrence Sweeney, Jacob Grim, J. R. Potter.

1872—Burgess, A. G. Whitcraft; council, George Westerman, F. M. Hull, J. C. Marshall, Joseph Higgs, John Stewart, Fred Hoelzle.

1873—Burgess, W. C. Bell; council, Robert F. Wolfkill, Robert S. May, H. B. Linn, Jacob Faas, S. Runser, George W. Thompson.

1874—Burgess, I. K. Whitcraft; council, S. Runser, R. F. Wolfkill, Robert S. May, H. B. Linn, Jacob Faas, W. C. McClain.

1875—Burgess, J. K. Whitcraft; council, J. L. Weaver, H. B. Linn, Joseph Barber, C. Bowden, S. Runser, and Robert F. Wolfkill, secretary.

1876—Burgess, E. G. Mixsell; council, John Ambler, Joseph Higgs, F. M. Hull, P. McManus, James Burnett, and Robert F. Wolfkill, secretary.

1877—Burgess, T. J. Gillespie; council, Joseph Forker, C. McCleery, J. W. Higgs, John Wilson, S. C. Yoder, John Ambler, and C. W. Ray, secretary.

1878—Burgess, T. J. Gillespie; council, Joseph Forker, S. C. Yoder, T. B. Taylor, W. M. McCormick, Edward Wilson, Henry Smith, and C. W. Ray, secretary.

1879—Burgess, Robert McFarland; council, John Ashton, H. J. Evans, John P. Walsh, Edward Wilson, Samuel F. Stambaugh, A. E. Graham, and secretary, A. E. Graham, who resigned December 18, and S. C. Simonton, Jr., was chosen his successor.

1880—Burgess, John Ashton; council, Thomas B. Beil, C. E. Bundel, Jacob Dresch, B. Love, Jacob Messersmith, John H. Fisher, and S. C. Simonton, Jr., secretary.

1881—Burgess, Robert McFarland; council, John P. Walsh, Samuel Lester, John Deveraux, John Phillips, A. S. Service, Frank Davis, and S. C. Simonton, secretary.

1882—Burgess, Joseph H. Chandler; council, W. O. Leslie, Fred. Hoelzle, John Phillips, Richard James, John I. Davis, Joseph Tyler, and Thomas B. Beil, secretary.

1884—Burgess, J. H. Chandler; council, John Ashton, W. H. Mallory, W. L. Wallis, William C. McClain, C. L. Robinson, John I. Davis, and Thomas B. Beil, secretary.

1885—Burgess, W. M. McCormick; council, William C. McClain, W. G. Morgan, John H. Fisher, W. H. Mallory, John Ashton, W. L. Wallis, and Thomas B. Beil, secretary.

1886—Burgess, W. M. McCormick; council, John Ashton, W. L. Wallis, John H. Fisher, W. G. Morgan, J. W. Higgs (resigned), J. L. Ray (appointed), A. Alderman, and Thomas B. Beil, secretary.

1887—Burgess, Harry Orchard; council, W. G. Morgan, A. Alderman, Harry Taylor, Uriah Spencer, J. H. Fisher, J. L. Ray, and Thomas B. Beil, secretary.

1888—Burgess, Harry Orchard; council, Uriah Spencer, A. Alderman, Harry Taylor, J. H. Fisher, J. L. Ray, Samuel Davis, and Thomas B. Beil, secretary.

SCHOOLS.

Mr. James Bentley maintains that a log school-house was built about 1800, some three-fourths of a mile east of Sharon. In it taught Thomas Rigdon. In 1803 Daniel Hull, Henry Hoagland and others built a log house on the Hoagland place. David Hayes, a Revolutionary soldier, was the first teacher. The first school edifice in town was built of logs, and stood near the present Baptist Academy building, known as Hall Institute. Mr. Bentley claims to have attended school in it in 1803. Some years afterward a round log structure, about 18x25, one story high, was erected on the site of the present Exchange Hotel. It was rustic in its make-up, the fire-place occupying one end of the building. The chimney was made of sticks and mud. It had a puncheon floor; desks about the wall, facing outward, and small glass-light windows. Amos Ulp, living near Sharon, and born there August 24, 1813, remembers to have attended school in this rustic building in 1820. James Schofield, from near Warren, was one of the first teachers, and a good one, too. Joseph Budd, son of William Budd, was one of the early teachers. A law which obtained on Christmas holidays at that early date was: "If the teacher reaches the school building before his pupils do, he holds possession without being compelled to treat them. Otherwise not." The third building was a frame, which stood in the rear of the present Methodist Episcopal Church. It was built prior to 1840, and stood until a few years ago. About 1850 two frame buildings were erected, one on Ohio Street, near the South Ward house of to-day, the other corner of Silver and Erie Streets, north of the old Christian brick church. These three frame houses, one story each, had a teacher for each one.

About 1859 a brick two-story union house was built near the E. & P. depot. It accommodated the town. When the E. & P. Railroad was built, in 1862-63, it was bought for a round-house. In 1864-65 the Central building, with eleven rooms, was erected. The Legislature authorized the issuing of bonds for $8,000 to erect the structure. The house cost more than twice that amount, everything being then at war prices. It was dedicated November 7, 1865, Prof. J. A. Cooper, of the Edinboro Normal School, delivering the address on "Mistakes in Education." The South Ward house was erected in 1876-77, to accommodate the people in that part of the town. The East Ward structure was built about two years later, and the West Ward structure about 1885.

The union school system under a principal began after the Central building was completed. The first principal was S. P. Dame, a son-in-law of Dr. J. M. Irvine. He is a graduate of Bowdoin College, Maine, and subsequently took a course of study at Edinboro Normal School. He is at present engaged in business in Pittsburgh. The first term opened in the new building November 20, 1865. The attendance the first day was 353 pupils; the second, 370. His associates the first year were Misses S. Plant, A. L. DePue, M. G. McGowan (still in the schools), M. W. Daggett, C. A. Hamilton, L. Spearman, S. E. Whiting and E. Carr.

The principals of the schools have been as follows: S. P. Dame, four years; F. S. Abbott, one year; C. W. Townsend, four years; G. W. Kratz, four years; J. W. Canon, three years; J. W. Canon, superintendent, six years. On the 29th of July, 1882, State Superintendent E. E. Higbee authorized a commission to be given J. W. Canon as borough superintendent. It releases him from examination and supervision by the county superintendent.

The present enrollment in the public schools of Sharon embraces 1,200 names, with an average attendance of 1,100. If we add to this the 300 pupils attending St. Michael's parochial schools, we find that 1,400 children are being educated in the schools of Sharon.

Commencing with 1875 the officers of the school board have been as follows:

1875—President, Joseph McCleery; secretary, D. R. Shiras; treasurer, John M. Mordock.

1876—President, Joseph McCleery; secretary, D. R. Shiras; treasurer, John M. Mordock.

1877—Charles Grim; secretary, L. Buchholz; treasurer, John M. Mordock.

1878—President, Charles Grim; secretary, L. Buchholz; treasurer, James E. McCarter.

1880—President, Dr. H. M. Bishop; secretary, S. C. Yoder; treasurer, Alex. McDowell.

1884—President, Dr. H. M. Bishop; secretary, Dr. J. H. Reed; treasurer, C. W. Ray.

1885—President, Dr. H. M. Bishop; secretary, D. R. Shiras; treasurer, C. W. Ray.

1886-1888—President, Thomas Tanner; secretary, D. R. Shiras; treasurer, C. W. Ray.

Old Baptist Academy.—At an early day in the forties an academy was established in Sharon. It continued a number of years, but was never very prosperous. It stood near the site of the present Hall Institute. Rev. T. W. Greer, William Storrs and C. G. Carver were leading spirits in its establishment. The building was sold at sheriff's sale in 1854, Mr. Carver buying the structure and using the brick in erecting his own residence.

Hall Institute.—In 1887 Rev. H. C. Hall, pastor of the Baptist Church, began agitating the establishing of an institute in Sharon. The project was kept before the people until a corporation was formed in the spring of 1888, and steps were undertaken to convert the old Baptist Church edifice into a school building. This idea was abandoned, and in the spring of 1888 a contract was let to John Cook for the erection of a new frame structure. The contractor purchased the old building, and utilized a part of its material in the construction of the new one. It is located close to the Baptist Church, upon a commanding eminence, overlooking the town, and embraces all the modern conveniences. The entire cost of the building was about $8,000.

Hall Institute was incorporated as a Christian (but not sectarian) school of higher grade, May 21, 1888. The management of the school is committed to a board of twenty-five trustees, chosen by the contributors toward the erection of the institute, at an annual meeting held each year in June. The charter confers upon the institution power to institute courses of study, elect a faculty of instruction, and empowers them to confer degrees and honors upon such students as faithfully pursue the prescribed courses of study and pass satisfactory examinations therein. It is proposed to form a school, second to none of its grade, where the young people of Sharon and the surrounding country shall be given opportunities for securing that broad and careful culture which is requisite to the highest success and greatest usefulness in life. The people most interested have thus far shown a commendable spirit in the liberal assistance rendered and encouragement given. It only requires a continuance of the same in order that the highest ideals of its projectors may be fully realized.

The institute opened its first term September 18, 1888, with the following faculty in charge: Rev. H. C. Hall, A. M., president, and professor of psychology and ethics; Rev. Henry Madtes, A. M., principal, and professor of languages and sciences; J. B. Scott, principal of normal department, embracing higher mathematics and English branches; F. T. Aschman, Ph. B., professor of chemistry and physics; Alice Luse, instructor in history and composition; Cora McDaniel, principal of musical department; E. Griswold, M. D., lecturer on physiology and microscopy; Mrs. A. M. Hope, principal of art department; J. B. Scott, principal of business department; Rev. Henry Madtes, secretary of faculty and librarian; Mrs. M. E. Hilton, matron.

CHURCHES.

The Baptist Church of Sharon is one of the pioneer churches of the Shennango Valley. Its origin may be traced to the efforts of Rev. David Philips, of Peter's Creek, who came to this community in 1802, and finding in the sparsely settled country a few Baptists, concluded to preach to them, and finally organized a church. On the 29th of April, 1804, the organization formally occurred, Rev. Philips being aided in his work by S. David and B. Smith, Jr. Nineteen members were enrolled, embracing thirteen who had been identified with the church elsewhere, and six who had recently been baptized. The following are their names: John and James Morford and their wives, Henry and Catherine Hoagland, Isaiah and Sarah Jones, Charles and Fanny Reno, Thomas and Charles Rigdon, Christopher North, John Gravat, Adamson Bentley, Mary Bentley, Drusilla Budd, Elizabeth and Susannah Bentley. Of these John Morford and Henry Hoagland were chosen deacons. The 29th of April was an important day to this congregation, and to the surrounding country for many miles. It was made memorable by the fact that on every anniversary occasion special services were held, commencing on Friday and continuing until the following Monday. These convocations were modern Pentecosts, that attracted saint and sinner from far and near. They were religiously what a full grown agricultural fair is to the people of the county to-day, a general turnout of the people of all ages, sexes and conditions.

A pastor was at length needed. Negotiations were made to secure the services of Rev. Thomas Jones, a resident of New Jersey, from which some of the members came. Money having been raised to defray his traveling expenses hither, an ox team was started after him, Adamson Bentley being given the post of honor of commanding the expedition. The journey, a distance of some 400 miles, was at length made, and the preacher and his family were successfully landed at their rustic western home, which was a log cabin on the farm now owned by Robert Luse. This occurred in 1805.

For a time services were held in houses, barns and groves. At length, in 1807, the necessity of a regular place of worship was felt. William Budd donated a lot large enough for the church and grave-yard. A log meeting-house, 20x30, was erected upon it, the site being nearly the same as that occupied by the old frame meeting-house recently removed. Its equipment was simple, as were the habits and customs of the people of those days. It served well, however, the wants of those early Christians. It was the first and only house of worship in what was subsequently called Sharon. The same year (1807) a branch of the Sharon Church was organized in West Salem Township, Rev. Jones preaching for it likewise. The relationship between these two congregations continued uninterrupted until 1826. In 1811 Mr. Jones resigned his pastorate and went to Wooster, Ohio, where he died.

The second pastor was Rev. Joshua Woodworth, who remained through the trying period of the second war with Great Britain, his labors ceasing in 1816. Following his work is a series of uncertain pastorates, the dates being lost. The workmen were Samuel McMillen, Sidney Rigdon and G. W. McCleery. Sidney Rigdon subsequently became an apostle of Mormonism, and, in 1846-47, after the death of Joe Smith and the ensuing advancement of Brigham Young to the presidency of the Mormon Church, enlisted the co-operation of a number of men and women in an effort to establish a Mormon colony near Greencastle, Franklin Co., Penn. After the expenditure of many thousands of dollars and some two years of time, the enterprise proved abortive. Mr. McCleery, the father of Joseph McCleery, at present a resident of Sharon, joined the members who seceded in 1828, and became known subsequently as a Disciple. The records show the membership of the church to be as follows: In 1820, 52; in 1823, 69, and in 1825, 75. In 1825 Rev. Henry Frasure was called to the pastorate, and remained until 1829. During his term a new trial came upon the Baptists. Many of its members became converts to the doctrines of Campbell. This ferment culminated in the going out of a sufficient number to organize a congregation in the latter part of June, 1828, the particulars of which are found in the sketch of the Christian Church of Sharon. The church property, however, was kept by the Baptists, they having retained a majority of the voting members. After Mr. Frasure's efforts Revs. Woodworth, of Ohio, and Stoughton, of Muddy Creek, paid the congregation visits. In 1834 Rev. Jacob Morris was employed as pastor, and continued in that capacity until 1837. He was followed, in the latter year, by Rev. David Thomas, who continued one year. In June, 1840, Dr. John Winter began his pastoral work. The church entered upon a new era. Dividing his time between Sharon and Warren, Ohio, he infused new life into the struggling membership. Forty-five were baptized, and former members were reclaimed, and the first Sunday-school was established. On the 31st of March, 1843, the congregation was regularly incorporated as "The Regular Baptist Church of the Borough of Sharon." Its first board of trustees included Edward S. Budd, Elam Bentley, John Hazen, Conrad G. Carver and Thomas Clark.

The old log meeting-house being too small, it was decided to erect a frame one. The result was the old structure, till recently standing on the hill, 40x50. While it was in process of erection the congregation worshiped in the house of the Protestant Methodists. This privilege was cut short, however, by the fact that the practice of the Baptists on the subject of baptism and close communion gave offense to the owners of the church, who closed their doors upon them. In 1844 Dr. Winter resigned, and devoted his whole time to Warren. Rev. W. B. Barris was pastor from 1844 to 1847. He was succeeded by Rev. Thomas W. Greer in October, 1847, who continued until June, 1851, when he resigned. During his pastorate a Ladies Missionary Society, the first of its kind, was organized. During the same time an academy was established, and a two-story brick building was erected. Its history is given under the head of Schools. In 1849 William Budd, who had given the site of the church, and liberal contributions for the church and the bell, was called away. His memory has always been revered by the congregation. Changes now were quite frequent. Rev. William Storrs was pastor, under trying difficulties, during 1851-52. A vacancy occurred until May, 1853, when

Rev. S. H. Ruple became pastor, and continued until 1855. During his stay the church divided, one portion conducting a Sunday-school in a rented room, and church services in their own houses, while the congregation proper worshipped in the church. In 1856 Rev. A. G. Kirk, the next pastor, drew up an agreement and secured a partial reconciliation between the two factions, thirty-six returning to their allegiance. Rev. M. C. Hendron preached from September, 1856, to September, 1857. Rev. J. Moses was a supply until February, 1859, when Rev. John Parker began his labors, which continued until 1863. During this period the membership increased from eighty-four to 122. The intense feeling resulting from the War of the Rebellion divided the congregation. Rev. Dinsmore ministered to one faction in the church, and Revs. Winter and Parker to another in a rented church. Reorganization followed with the close of the war, and Dr. Winter again became pastor in March, 1866. He began to collect funds for refitting the church, and secured $1,066, with which the house renewed its primitive attractiveness, and was dedicated a second time at the June meeting, 1866. He resigned in March, 1867. At the close of his pastorate the membership was eighty-seven. Rev. J. V. Stratton was pastor from April, 1867, to April, 1869. Rev. David Williams was pastor the succeeding year. He was followed by Rev. Jesse Williams, who continued from April, 1870, to the day of his death, in the ensuing August. Rev. J. T. Griffith was here a few months; Rev. C. H. Harvey from April, 1871, to 1873; Rev. A. Wilson for about two years; Rev. J. B. Solomon from October, 1875, to 1879. During his period the dead were removed from the old grave-yard to Oakwood Cemetery. In April, 1880, Rev. E. Wells began his work, and remained two years.

On the 2nd of July, 1882, the present pastor, Rev. H. C. Hall, began his pastoral labors, and was regularly ordained the 3d of August following. At the beginning of his pastorate a site was selected and steps were taken to erect a new church edifice. The building committee was Rev. H. C. Hall, J. Hunter, Malin Ewing and Robert Luse. In April, 1883, J. L. Weaver took the contract for erecting the new brick edifice, at a cost of $11,600. Completed and furnished the expense amounted to about $15,000. The structure was dedicated June 28, 1884, Rev. H. I. King, of Cleveland, preaching the morning and Rev. J. W. Gordon, of Buffalo, the evening discourse. The sum of $2,700 was raised to liquidate the indebtedness on the house. In 1886 a neat parsonage, just west of the church, was erected at a cost of about $2,000.

Methodist Episcopal Church.—The origin of this congregation is veiled in some obscurity, and can be reached only inferentially. It is known that the whole Shenango Valley was, from 1800 to 1816, embraced in the Shenango Circuit, and that preaching was done in the pioneer settlements by the itinerant preachers of those days. Among these preachers were the following presiding elders of the district: P. B. Davis, Joseph Shane, Asa Shinn, George Askins, Joseph Hall, R. R. Roberts, James Reed, James Watts, Thomas Church, James Charles, Jacob McDowell, Eli Towne, Abel Robinson, William Knox, Jacob Gurwell, John Elliott, J. Summerville and R. C. Hatton. It is not at all improbable that some of these pioneer preachers were in this region at the opening of the century, and proclaimed their doctrine to the people. Isaac Patterson, one of the organizers of the church, came to this region from the eastern part of the State in 1802 or 1803, and was an early convert to Methodism. In an address made in the church on the present site, in 1855, he announced that he was converted on those grounds among the hazel bushes fifty years ago. From this statement it is inferred that Methodism had some advocates in the vicinity of Sharon as early as 1805 or 1806. The venerable James Bentley informed the writer that the earliest opening in the dense forest of hazel bushes, which covered the present borough of Sharon, was on the site of the Methodist Church. It was a small Indian bean patch, about 30x40, the cultivating being done by the dusky savages with sharpened sticks. As a mere boy he joined with them in their crude agricultural employment. As early as 1820 meetings were held in a log school-house which stood on the site of the present Exchange Hotel. Afterward they were conducted in Reno's barn. The first class was organized, it is said, in 1810, though individual members had lived here prior to that date, but had membership elsewhere. Among the original members of the congregation were Isaac Patterson and his wife Margaret, Hezekiah Reader, James Reader and his wife Nancy, Matthias Mounts, John Dunlap and his wife Elizabeth, James Patterson, Joseph McDowell and his wife Esther, William Moore, Septimus Dunlap and his wife Esther, William Ulp, Sarah Newcomb and others. At a later date the membership embraced such people as Margaret Patterson, Samuel Clark and his wife Susan (nee Patterson), David Clark, William Budd and wife, Jones Blackstone and wife, David Strawbridge and wife, Abram De Forest, William Clark and Mary Clark, who subsequently married Rev. William Bear.

The first church structure was erected on State Street, above the present Baptist house, in 1831. Isaac Patterson and Matthew Mounts were trustees. It was a frame building, and is now used by George Burnett as a livery stable on Dock Street, in the rear of the American House. The next was likewise a frame structure, about 36x50, erected in 1842. It stood on the site of the present building. In 1866 it was repaired and enlarged at a cost of $3,300, a basement being put under it for Sunday-school purposes. It was burned down on New Year's eve, 1877, during the pastorate of Rev. O. L. Mead. The present comfortable and commodious frame structure was erected in 1878 at a cost of some $14,000. A parsonage was bought in 1880 for $2,200, and repaired at an expense of about $400. In 1887 the building of the Lake Shore Railroad branch in front of the church occurred, resulting in a damage of $3,000 to the property. This sum was invested by the trustees in several lots, together with the accompanying buildings, near the Central school building. The rents afford quite a handsome dividend on the investment. Some day the church hopes to build upon the newly acquired site.

The names of the early preachers have not been secured. It is claimed that Rev. J. J. Steadman was the first regular preacher. Sharon has belonged to several districts. From 1836 to 1840, and again from 1847 to 1852, it belonged to Meadville; from 1840 to 1843, from 1852 to 1856, and from 1860 to 1862, to Warren; from 1843 to 1847, to Franklin; from 1856 to 1860, and from 1862 to the present time, to New Castle. The following is its list of pastors from the day of certainty in its records, 1836: Revs. William Carroll, H. S. Hitchcock, 1836; C. Brown, 1837; Ahab Keller, John Crum, 1838-39; J. Vanhorn, J. E. Bassett, 1840; B. O. Plimpton, R. J. Sibbey, 1841; Thomas Ingraham, Thomas Stubbs, 1842; Joseph Uncles, 1843; J. R. Lock, H. Winans, 1844; John McLean, J. W. Klock, J. W. Ingraham, 1845; J. McLean, H. Luse, 1846; Bryan S. Hill, William Bear, 1847-48; D. H. Jack, S. Hubbard, 1849; J. H. Vance, D. H. Jack, 1850; Josiah Flower, M. Wood, 1851; D. C. Wright, 1852; William C. Henderson, 1853; C. W. Reeves, 1854; E. A. Johnson, 1855; N. G. Luke, 1856; J. Uncles, 1857; R. M. Bear, 1858; W. D. Archibald, 1859-60; T. P. Warner, 1861; P. P. Pinney, 1862-63; A. Hall, 1864; J. O'Neal, 1865-66; J. S. Albertson, 1867-68; W. H. Mossman, 1869-70; J. R. Lyon, 1871; L. W. Day, 1872-73; D. Latshaw, 1874-75; O. L. Mead, 1876-77; J. W. Blaisdell, 1878-79; D. Latshaw, 1880; W. P. Bignell, 1881-83; J. A. Kummer, 1884-86; R. S. Borland, 1887, present incumbent. The membership is 534, and the church is in a flourishing condition.

Disciples or Christian Church.—This organization in Sharon owes its origin to the visit of Adamson Bentley and Walter Scott, in the spring of 1828. These gentlemen were advocates of the doctrines then being promulgated by Alexander Campbell, and came to Sharon by invitation of the Baptists of the village, for whom they held a series of meetings. Thirteen candidates were baptized, but a difficulty arising as to the manner of their reception into the church they, with twenty from the Baptist organization, thirty-three members all told, formed themselves into a new organization on the last Monday of June, 1828.

Of these charter members the following names have been recovered by Joseph McCleery, to whom we are indebted for the collection of most of the facts herein contained. The following is the list: Bashara Hull and wife Rhoda, Obadiah Hull and wife Mary Ann, Anna Hoagland (still living), John McCleery and wife Margaret, George McCleery, George Bentley and wife, Mary Bentley, Sr., Samuel Hull and wife Drusilla, Hugh McCleery and wife Margaret, James McCleery and wife Polly, Robert McCleery and wife Eleanor, Elizabeth Morford, Harriet Morford, Lucretia Hull, Thomas Chew, John Briggs, Temperance Bentley wife of James Bentley, Rebecca Laird, Benjamin Reno and wife, James Morford and wife, Mary Briggs, Catherine Higby, Betsey Truesdale.

Within three years from the date of the organization the following, with others whose names cannot be recalled, were added: Jesse Hoagland and wife Elizabeth, Joseph Hoagland and wife Anna, Richard Hoagland, John McCleery and wife Sarah, Samuel McCleery, John Dunlap, Daniel Upson Budd, Martin Dunham and wife Polly, Hannah Morford, Phoebe Morford, Almira Hull, Lemual Clark and wife, Sarah DeWolf, Rachel Hover, Leah Hover, Mary McCleery, Sr.

The first preaching was done in the barn of Daniel Budd, who prepared the building specially for such use. This building answered the purpose well enough for summer and autumn services. It was occupied because the feeling engendered by the organization of a new congregation prevented their using the Baptist house. The second regular place of worship was the cabinet-shop of Jesse Hoagland, which was so occupied for several years. When he sold it preaching was done in private houses and school buildings until 1840. At that time a frame structure, about 30x40, was erected outside of the town limits, near the present furnace of Spearman, Collord & Co. It was occupied until 1852, when, owing to its ineligibility as a place of worship, it was sold to the furnace for a store-house. In 1852 a brick edifice, 40x54, was erected on Rail Road Street at a cost of about $2,000. It was dedicated in December of that year, Elder Isaac Errett, then of Warren, Ohio, but now editor of the Christian Standard, of Cincinnati, delivering the address. In October, 1881, the congregation purchased its present house on the corner of Vine and Pitt Streets for $3,500. It was erected in 1874 by the Second Presbyterian Church, and dedicated by them February 14, 1875, the entire expense being $10,500. It was re-dedicated by the Christian Church, Prof. Burke A. Hinsdale, of Cleveland, Ohio, delivering the address.

This congregation has had quite an array of preaching talent. At the organization were present Walter Scott, Adamson Bentley and Thomas Campbell. As an assistant in this preliminary work was George McCleery, father of Joseph McCleery, who is still a resident of Sharon, and an active worker in the congregation which his father assisted in establishing. George McCleery was for many years after the organization of the congregation its cherished pastor and spiritual adviser. Following George McCleery came, in regular succession, John T. Smith, John T. Phillips, Harvey Brockett, Calvin Smith, Thomas Munnell, C. C. Foot and Edwin Wakefield. These men, employed usually about a year each, nurtured the congregation from the time the pastoral labors of George McCleery ceased to the year 1857, when the records begin to be more definite and authentic. Matthias Christy, H. D. Carlton and Dr. Goodrich were then employed a portion of their time for a year or so each. Their labors preserved the flock up to 1862. From this date to 1870 meetings were suspended on account of the agitations of the war, sickness, removals, apathy, etc. From July to October, 1870, John T. Phillips preached every two weeks. In October of that year William Baxter, of New Lisbon, Ohio, reorganized the congregation with seventy-two members. Its sustenance from the close of this meeting until April, 1871, was obtained from supplies received from various quarters. In April, 1871, Orange Higgins was employed, and remained as pastor four years. He was succeeded by Peter Vogel, who continued one year. In September, 1876, T. B. Knowles was secured, and remained as pastor two years. For a year following the congregation again depended upon supplies, John T. Phillips and William Baxter being the chief reliance. In February, 1880, W. F. Parker was employed, and continued to labor one year. In April, 1881, E. A. Bosworth was secured. He staid three years. C. G. Brelos was in charge of the work from February, 1885, to September, 1886. Resort was again had to supplies until the summer of 1887. From that time to February, 1888, L. Osborn, of Youngstown, preached every two weeks. During the month of January, 1888, a protracted meeting was held by H. B. Sherman, of Lock Haven, Penn. A. A. McCorkle has been employed to take pastoral charge of the church, commencing February 1, 1888. There have been many irregular preachers at Sharon, preachers who have aided in protracted meetings and on special occasions. Among these may be mentioned Isaac Errett, William Hayden, A. S. Hayden, John Henry, Jonas Hartzell, B. A. Hinsdale, Dr. W. A. Belding, Wesley Lanphear, J. Harrison Jones and H. B. Sherman. The membership at present is about ninety.

Protestant Methodist Church.—About 1836 or 1837 a number of families of English descent came to Sharon. They were disposed to join a Protestant Methodist rather than a Methodist Episcopal congregation. The result was an organization of a church of that faith about the time just referred to. Among the original members of the congregation were Moses Troutman and wife, Benjamin Troutman and wife, John Urmson and wife, Fred Urmson and wife, and others whose names cannot be recalled. In the ranks of its primitive preachers were Revs. Inskip and Clark. The house of worship, the second one erected in the place, was a frame building of spacious dimensions, and was, for a time, owned jointly by the Protestant Methodists and the Presbyterians. The latter finally sold their interest to Judge David T. Porter. It is still standing, and is owned and used as a dwelling. The congregation was disorganized many years ago.

First Presbyterian Church.—This congregation was organized by a committee of the Presbytery of Beaver, consisting of Revs. Samuel A. McLain, B. C. Critchlow and Elder Marcus Best, on the 16th of August, 1844. The original membership included twenty-four persons, viz.: Andrew McBride, Samuel McBride and wife, Benjamin Love and wife, Jane Haywood, John Dennison, Nancy Campbell, Mary Annie Love, Esther Stewart, Margaret Satterfield, Hannah Budd, Rachel McRay, Elizabeth Riggs, H. Jacobs and wife, Nancy Jane Rankin, James S. Moore and wife, John Rankin and wife, Susannah Bell, Sarah Gray and Adelaide Moore. The first eldership consisted of James S. Moore, H. Jacobs and John Rankin. The following persons have likewise served in that capacity: Alexander Porter, Smith Agnew, Samuel Shilling, John Phillips, David Agnew, N. McGowan, James M. Willson, James K. Bell, S. C. Yoder, Joseph King, John A. Robinson, John Paisley and C. M. Rice. The brick church edifice, standing on Main Street, north of State, was built in 1857, at a cost of about $2,500. The original members came largely from the old Moorefield Church, and worshiped with the congregation in the old Protestant Methodist house, then known as "the barn." The congregation had a half interest in this house, which it finally sold to Judge David T. Porter. The following pastors have served the congregation: Revs. H. Webber, W. T. McAdam, Dr. Riggs, J. B. Dickey, W. S. Falconer, R. J. Graves, J. C. Truesdale, Perry S. Allen, James H. Snowden and W. G. Nevin, the present incumbent. The congregation has a membership of 250, and is one of the most substantial religious societies in the borough.

Sacred Heart Catholic Church.—During the building of the Pittsburgh & Erie Canal a large number of Catholics were employed on that public work, and missionary priests made periodical trips along the line of the canal to hold services and minister to the spiritual wants of the members of that faith. Sharon being one of the principal points on the route, was also one of the places where mass was occasionally celebrated. It was, however, some years after this period before the town possessed any Catholic settlers, though several German families of that faith located east of Sharon, around Hickory Corners, in the decade between 1845 and 1855, while other Catholic families, both Irish and German, settled in the vicinity of the blast furnaces erected in the Shenango Valley during the same decade. For a few years those settlers were compelled to attend services at the pioneer Catholic mission north of Mercer, then known as the "Irish Settlement," or go without the consolations of their religion. But prior to 1850 Rev. Andrew Skopez, who died in the fall of 1887, began his visits to the German settlement at Hickory Corners, and held services in the houses of the members, usually at Martin Scholl's. He was followed in succession by Revs. J. Reiser, J. J. Gallagher, Andrew Schweiger and Joseph Gobbels.

The first Catholic residents of Sharon were Henry and William Crowthwaite, natives of Ireland, who came to the village from the vicinity of Pittsburgh in 1851; Charles O'Hare and family, who arrived in Sharon in 1854; Gerhard Wengler, a native of Germany, who emigrated from that country to New Castle, Penn., in May, 1854, and in the following December took up his residence in Sharon, where he yet lives; Peter Froelig and John Muck, two Germans, who arrived in the borough about 1854-55, having come for the purpose of securing employment from the old Sharon Iron Company; Patrick Kane and his two sons, John and Patrick, who began working in the steel mill in 1856, having arrived but a short time previous; Terrence O'Hare, a brother of Charles, who, with his family, emigrated from Ireland to the Big Bend in 1851, and eight years later removed to Sharon, where he yet resides; John Thornton, a leading dry goods merchant of the borough, who, in November, 1848, arrived in Mercer County, having emigrated a few months before from Ireland, and began working in the Clay furnace, in Jefferson Township, removing to the vicinity of Sharon, where he now resides, in the fall of 1860;

Jacob Huether, a German, who located a short distance east of Sharon about 1858, and opened a shoe-shop, which he subsequently removed to the borough, and conducted it until his death in 1876; Nicholas Wiesen, a German, whose residence in Sharon dates back to the fall of 1860; Hon. Norman Hall, the present member of Congress from this district, who located near the borough in 1862; Edward M. McGillin, who arrived in Sharon from Philadelphia in 1863, and his brother William, accompanied by their mother and sister, one year later; and John Sullivan, Patrick Fettigan and wife, Bernard Brennan and Lawrence Clifford, the latter of whom, as also Mrs. Fettigan, yet resides in the town.

The first Catholic settlers in Sharon attended services at Mercer, and subsequently at Hickory Corners, and the priests who had charge of the latter mission held an occasional service in Sharon. Father Gobbels came more frequent than any of his predecessors, and is therefore best remembered. He celebrated mass at the houses of Peter Froelig, John Muck, Charles O'Hare, Bernard Brennan and other early Catholic families. In 1859 he was succeeded by Rev. F. J. Hartmann, now pastor of St. Rose Church at Hickory Corners. Father Hartmann had charge of the Sharon Mission until the coming of Rev. John J. O'Keeffe, the first resident pastor of Sharon. The latter held services in the houses of members until he erected the present pastoral residence south of the church, and a room in that building was then utilized. In 1864 the corner stone of Sacred Heart Church was laid with appropriate ceremonies, on a lot donated by Dr. J. M. Irvine, on the corner of State Street and Irvine Avenue, and as soon as the basement was ready for occupancy it was used for religious services until the main structure was completed. The building was afterward considerably enlarged, and is a substantial brick edifice with a seating capacity of about 800. The basement has been used for a school-room ever since the parochial schools were established. Both the residence and church were commenced and finished under Father O'Keeffe's pastorate, though a very large debt was hanging over the property when, in 1872, Rev. Kearn O'Branigan succeeded him as pastor. This debt has been paid off, and a fund commenced by the late Father O'Branigan toward securing a larger parochial school property in the near future.

The growth and progress of Sacred Heart congregation is a fair illustration of the parable of the mustard seed. Forty years ago there was not a single Catholic family in Sharon, and when the war broke out less than a dozen families comprised the full strength of that faith inside the borough limits. Within the last quarter of a century Sacred Heart Church has had a remarkable growth, and embraces a membership of about 200 families. It supports a flourishing parochial school, established by Father O'Keeffe, which is under the efficient charge of the Sisters of Mary. The usual branches taught in the public schools comprises the curriculum of the Sacred Heart school, but there is also imparted daily religious instruction in the fundamental doctrines of the Christian faith. The old Sacred Heart Cemetery was located on the east hill, but the growth of the borough necessitated its abandonment. The present grave-yard lies immediately northwest of Sharon, and is a very suitable resting-place for those who have "fallen asleep in the Lord." The ground was purchased by Father O'Keeffe, but paid for by the late pastor. While giving to Father O'Keeffe full credit for the work he accomplished during his pastorate, it is nevertheless true that to the earnest labors of Father O'Branigan is largely due the present prosperity of Sacred Heart Parish, and his death, which occurred August 7, 1888, was a severe loss to the congregation.

United Presbyterian Church.—The inception of the movement toward establishing an Associate Reformed Presbyterian congregation at Sharon was brought about through a passing visit of Rev. M. M. Brown, now of New Wilmington, Penn., who at the next meeting of the Lawrence Presbytery recommended that a committee be sent to look over the field. This was accordingly done, and in June, 1858, Rev. William Findley, D. D., acting under the direction of that presbytery, organized a congregation in Sharon. The following comprised the first members: David T. Porter, Mrs. Ann Porter, John Titus, Mrs. Mary Titus, Miss Ann Eliza Titus, Miss Rosanna Titus, Mrs. Mordock, Mrs. Adams, Mrs. Duncan, Miss Mary McHenry, James Raney, Mrs. Mary Raney, Miss Margaret Raney, John Raney, Mrs. Tirza Love and Miss Mary McClelland. The building at present occupied was erected in 1865 at a cost of $11,000. It is a brick, and is commodious and convenient for the purposes to which it is devoted. The pastors of the congregation have been Rev. B. K. Ormond, its first minister, who began preaching in Sharon in April, 1858, before the organization of the flock into a regular congregation, and who was installed regular pastor shortly afterward, at first dividing his time between the Sharon and Clarks-ville charges, and afterward serving the former church exclusively until December 31, 1880; and the present pastor, Rev. John A. Bailey, who entered upon his ministry in January, 1883. In the opening part of the year 1881 the congregation, through unfortunate occurrences, became disorganized. April 19, the same year, a reorganization was, however, effected through the instrumentality of Rev. Robert McWatty, D. D., acting under the direction of the United Presbyterian Presbytery of Mercer. The membership at that time was fifty; now it is 140. Following is a list of ruling elders: John Titus, David T. Porter, Robert Strain, William L. Thompson, William J. Hamilton, Robert Templeton, J. H. McElheny, M. D., J. E. McGeehan, E. M. Stapleton, Jesse Huff, G. A. Hawk, J. W. Paisley, M. K. Hamilton, A. G. McNabb, William A. Kelley and Thomas Ray.

St. Paul's German Reformed Church was organized about thirty-three years ago. The congregation was located two miles east of Sharon, and was presided over by Rev. L. I. Mayer. He remained with it about eight years, at the same time preaching for the "Jerusalem" congregation in Hickory Township, which he also organized. He was succeeded by Rev. J. H. Stepler, now of Lima, Ohio, who remained nearly nine years. In 1873 Rev. F. B. Hartzmetz, now of Archibald, Ohio, began his pastorate, which also continued nearly nine years. During his administration St. Paul's congregation bought a lot on Sharpsville Street, in Sharon, and erected the present frame house in 1874, at a cost of about $4,000, including the lot. In March, 1882, the late pastor, Rev. E. Gr \ddot{u} enstein, began his ministry here. In 1883 he concluded that a parsonage was needed. Obtaining the consent of his congregation he set to work, and in five weeks had $700 secured for that purpose, and erected the house which adjoins the rear end of the church. The present membership is 165 confirmed, and 138 unconfirmed. Jerusalem congregation, at Hickory, was joined with Sharon until September, 1882, and was ministered to by the same preachers. Since that time it has been a separate charge.

St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church.—On the 10th of December, 1865, Rev. Thomas Corlett, rector of Grace Church, Kinsman, Ohio, conducted services in the Baptist Church. These are said to have been the first Episcopal services in the place. On the 11th of the ensuing February Rev. Dr. Killikelly held services. A few days later, viz., February 14, 1866, Bishop Hopkins, on a visit to the place, conducted services at the Presbyterian Church, assisted at the time by Rev. Corlett. It was during this visit that Bishop Hopkins baptized Elizabeth Kent, infant daughter of Reuben Will-iamson, it being the first administration of that rite by an Episcopalian in Sharon. On the 17th of June following the first regular services were held in the old brick building belonging to the Christian Church, by Rev. William L. Haywood, missionary. On the 20th the parish was organized, the first vestry consisting of Alexander Adams, Reuben Williamson, H. Jaques, Curtis McFarland, E. M. Cotton and George Brooks. Messrs. McFarland and Cotton were appointed wardens, and Mr. Williamson, clerk. On the 23d of August, 1866, the congregation was regularly incorporated. Rev. Haywood held his position until February, 1869, when he resigned. The erection of a church edifice was discussed at once, but the matter was deferred owing to financial depression. In 1868-69 a small, plain frame structure was built at a cost of $1,500. It still meets the demands of the congregation. The pastors succeeding Mr. Haywood were: Revs. H. E. Tschudy, John E. Doris, W. R. Mackay, J. B. Calhoun, H. G. Woods and the present pastor, Rev. George W. Williams.

The Welsh Congregational Church was organized April 2, 1854, by Rev. Thomas Evans, of Youngstown, Ohio, with some fifteen members, viz.: John L. Jones, Thomas Jones, William Rees, Ann Rees, Mary Jones, William Davis, Mary Phillips, Margaret Phillips and John Morris and wife. Revs. Thomas Evans, Thomas Davis, John Edwards and others have supplied the pulpit. The church edifice on Pennsylvania Avenue was erected in 1856. The membership is largely engaged in the iron works, and hence its condition fluctuates with that business.

Welsh Baptist Church.—This congregation was organized in 1869 with seven members: John Reynolds, Eliza Reynolds, James Reynolds, Hannah Reynolds, John Propert, Elizabeth Llewellyn, and one whose name could not be secured. Rev. David Propert was the first preacher. The house of worship was erected in July, 1870.

German Lutheran.—This congregation was organized November 1, 1872, by Rev. H. Schmidt, of Hubbard, Ohio, with twenty members. As early as 1853 preaching was done in the place by Rev. T. H. Hengist, of Brookfield, Ohio. The pulpit was occupied at various times by Revs. L. Krebs, N. Wolf, J. G. Beetz, T. H. Hengist and H. Schmidt. The last named has been pastor for fifteen or sixteen years, and still occupies the position. The congregation was without a place of worship of its own until the year 1888. On the 5th of February, of said year, its frame house of worship, costing about $700, was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies. For a long time its services were held in the Christian Church.

SECRET AND OTHER SOCIETIES.

Sharon Lodge No. 347, I. O. O. F., was instituted on the 19th of February, 1849, its charter members consisting of Charles E. Curtis, Robert McFarland, John J. Spearman, James Hazelton, Milton Hull and Hugh Fox. Of this number only two representatives are still living, Mr. McFarland, retired from active business, and Mr. Spearman, president of the First National Bank of Sharon. In the distribution of official honors every member received a position except Hugh Fox. Curtis was N. G., McFarland was V. G., Spearman was Sec., Hazelton was Assist. Sec. and Hull was Treas. The inference is that Fox was reserved for committee work. The room in which this charitable order was born is still standing on Main Street, in the lower part of the city. It is a frame structure, erected in 1838 by Mr. E. C. Sweetland, and is now owned by Mr. William McClain. At the time it was used as a wagon-shop. It deserves to be specially remarked that its floor was neatly carpeted with sawdust. In the same building, with similar equipments, Masonry had its origin a year or two later. From the wagon-shop the lodge was removed to the brick academy, which stood near the site of the old Baptist Church edifice. The Masonic lodge was removed to the same building, and occupied the same room. In course of time the Odd Fellows bought out the right and title to the property possessed by the Masons, and, feeling disposed to change quarters, secured a hall in the Carver and Porter block, a little east of the present Sharon National Bank. After the lapse of years the lodge secured quarters in Hyde & Brown's Hall, part of the building now used by the Sharon Iron Company's store. This room was occupied until the order was able, by wise and judicious business management, to erect and occupy its own valuable and handsome structure on the corner of State and Vine Streets.

The site of the present building was bought in 1857, at a cost of $175 in gold. Shortly after the purchase it was occupied by a little frame shanty, some twelve feet square, used for a jewelry store. Finally the lodge bought this property and made some necessary additions to it. About 1864 this perishable property began to be rented at $700 per annum, which paid a handsome dividend on the investment. This money, together with funds accumulating from other sources, finally aggregated $5,000. It was then proposed to erect a building in partnership with other interests, but the scheme was opposed by some members of the lodge, and the matter was deferred until 1880. At that time sufficient money had accumulated to undertake the enterprise without any entangling alliances with alien parties. The building was erected in 1880, at a cost of some $12,000. To complete the payment $2,000 was borrowed, all of which was repaid within a year, leaving the lodge entirely free from indebtedness of all kinds. The new hall was dedicated December 23, 1880. The entire property, including ground, building and equipment, is worth $25,000. After reserving all of the third floor and a room on the second, the lodge realizes nearly $1,000 a year from its rentals, and is thus accumulating a handsome fund for any needed improvements or paying investments as they arise.

Notwithstanding Calvin Lodge No. 777, New Virginia Lodge No. 841, Adoniram Lodge No. 739, West Middlesex Lodge No. 593 and White Oak Lodge No. 569 have all been drawn from Sharon Lodge, it still numbers 173 members, and shows all possible signs of inherent health and continued prosperity.

The faithful few who began their work on the saw-dust floor in the old wagon-shop, and with kindred spirits persevered through all the discouraging migrations of subsequent years, have much reason to rejoice at the success that has finally crowned their efforts.

Calvin Lodge No. 577, I. O. O. F., was organized June 8, 1865, by George Tribby, D. D. G. M., with the following named charter members: Fredrick Hoelzle, Louis Buchholz, Christian Boeshar, Jacob Hoelzle, Jacob Reiter, Jacob Hoffman, John Boeshar, Philip Müller, Christian Hoffman, Henry Krallman, John Ulrich, James L. Rich, Nicholas Fenzel, Jacob Sontag, Johannes Kolb and George Hassel. The membership of the lodge is eleven.

Sharon Lodge No. 250, F. & A. M., was organized under charter dated September 2, 1850. It was known and recognized as A. Y. M. until about 1872, when the present title was adopted. In the charter Dr. J. M. Irvine was designated as Worshipful Master, James Campbell as Senior Warden, and James McMullen as Junior Warden. The organization occurred in a wagon-shop in the lower end of town, now owned by William McClain. Some of the other members at the time were James Bentley, Marvin Hyde and J. F. Satterfield. From the wagon-shop the lodge removed, in a short time, to the second story of the old Baptist Academy, which was fitted up by the Odd Fellows and Masons conjointly. After a time the Masons sold their rights to the Odd Fellows, and then removed to the third story of the old Carver & Porter block, the Odd Fellows securing the second story. The building, now standing near the Sharon National Bank, is the property of T. J. Porter. This hall was used without interruption until the erection of the present hall building in 1874, by the First National Bank and T. J. Porter. The present commodious and comfortable hall was fitted up in the third story of the building just referred to in 1874, and dedicated with the usual Masonic ceremonies in May, 1875. Including the furnishing, the expense involved amounted to about $5,000. The hall is said to be one of the finest of its kind in Western Pennsylvania, not excepting even those in larger cities.

Dr. John M. Irvine was Worshipful Master from the organization to 1857. His successors, in order, were as follows: Dr. Elisha Griswold, 1857; John S. King, 1858; William McGilvray, 1859; Dr. John M. Irvine, 1860-62; William McGilvray, 1863; E. A. Wheeler, 1864-65; William Henlan, 1866; E. A. Wheeler, 1867; John M. Mordock, 1868-70; Alfred Williams, 1871; W. B. Marshall, 1872; R. E. Bell, 1873; A. S. Service, 1874; James G. McKnight, 1875; Thomas B. Taylor, 1876; A. S. Service, 1877; John Ambler, 1878; John Murchie, 1879; Harry Orchard, 1880; S. C. Yeder, 1881; James D. Caldwell, 1882; Michael Zahniser, 1883; George L. Williams, 1884; William M. McCormick, 1885; John C. Owsley, 1886-87; E. N. Ohl, 1888. The present membership is about 120.

Norman Chapter No. 244, R. A. M., was constituted May 12, 1873. The charter members were: Matthias H. Henderson, Edward P. Foster, Frank W. Morrison, Reuben Williamson, Richard E. Bell, Branton H. Henderson, James G. McKnight, James E. McCarter, Jesse Reeves, Joseph N. McClure, Thomas B. Taylor, William Leipheimer, Joseph A. Starkey. M. H. Henderson served as M. E. H. P. until 1876, and his successors have been Richard E. Bell, 1877; M. H. Henderson, 1878; Harry Orchard, 1879; John Ambler, 1880; John Murchie, 1881-82; George Tribby, 1883; John C. Owsley, 1884-85; Michael Zahniser, 1886, and Edwin N. Ohl, 1887-88. The present membership of the chapter is seventy-five. M. H. Henderson, the first High Priest of this chapter, was elected Most Excellent Grand High Priest of Pennsylvania in December, 1886, installed the 27th of that month, and is the present G. H. P. of Pennsylvania. The chapter meets in the Masonic hall.

Rebecca Commandery No. 50, K. T., was authorized by dispensation dated August 21, 1873, and was regularly constituted June 25, 1874. The charter members were: Reuben Williamson, B. H. Henderson, Joseph N. McClure, Matthias H. Henderson, James E. McCarter, Charles W. Whistler, Samuel C. Simonton, Samuel W. Smith and Thomas Marshall. The Eminent Commanders from and including the first have been the following: Reuben Williamson, 1873-75; J. N. McClure, 1876; Matthias H. Henderson, 1877-78; John Ambler, 1879; Ansley S. Service, 1880-81; Harry Orchard, 1882; John Murchie, 1883; George Tribby, 1884; Michael Zahniser, 1885; Ed. N. Ohl, 1886-87; George L. Williams, 1888. The commandery meets in the Masonic hall.

The Apollo Maennerchor was organized in 1869. Among its first members were G. W. Fischer, Frederick Hoelzle, Jacob Hoelzle, Carl Doerr, James L. Rich, John Rich, Paul Assion, Jacob Dresch and others. At its most prosperous period there were sixty members. Sessions are held monthly.

Sharon Lodge No. 13, A. O. U. W., was organized July 11, 1872, in a room on State Street, by J. M. McNair and W. S. Black, of New Castle, Penn. The charter members were: John A. Porter, J. L. Dunlap, William

C. Manning, A. J. Jewell, D. Starkey, James Clelland, Henry Harwood, William Henlan, John G. Gay, Charles Alquist, W. D. McMillen, Joseph McElhaney, Thomas McChesney, John Murchie. The first presiding officer was John A. Porter, and the first secretary was Charles Alquist. Meetings are held in the lodge's own hall over Henlan's butcher shop, on each Monday evening of the year. The membership numbers sixty-four.

Sharon Lodge No. 398, K. of P., was instituted June 16, 1873, with the following charter members: S. P. Ash, J. C. Owsley, S. C. Simonton, Jr., S. A. Rice, M. C. Williams, Ellis Morrison, R. F. Rodgers, S. W. Isenberg, A. Van Fossen, E. J. Pease, William Bert, W. C. Bryant, P. Desmond and D. P. Stewart. Meetings are held every Thursday evening in Thompson's Hall, on State Street. The membership is 177. The lodge has two insurance organizations connected with it, the Pennsylvania Relief Association and the Endowment Rank.

Court Rose of Sharon No. 5964, A. O. F. was instituted the 5th of September, 1874, by Joseph Stead, D. C. R., of Cleveland, Ohio, with the following named charter members: John Stephens, William Parry, E. Powell, George Powell, Samuel Westwood, Edward Tague, J. Smith, William Jones, Job Durban, James Gardner, H. Gardner, Joseph Chintery, J. Matthews, Benjamin Powell, James Rosser, Benjamin Jones, E. D. Evans, William Davis, Joseph Wheedle, Thomas Mould, D. C. Hughes, James Andrews. The presiding officers were Thomas Davis, C. R.; John Gething, S. C. R.; Jesse Martin, S. W.; William L. Morgan, Jr., W.; John Lloyd, J. B.; Thomas Lloyd, S. B., and Robert White and Charles Rowlands, secretaries. Meetings are held in the A. O. F. hall, on State Street, on alternate Saturdays. There are about 158 members in good standing at the present time, with a total membership of 170. The purpose of the order is "Unity, Benevolence and Concord."

Connected with the above order is a juvenile branch called the Court Rose Bud No. 25, organized about one year ago (1887) for a similar purpose, with a membership of about sixty.

Branch No. 6 Catholic Mutual Benefit Association was organized November 6, 1878, by M. I. O'Brien and P. McManus. The original members were M. I. O'Brien, P. McManus, John Kirk, Albert Mehler, Joseph Mehler, L. Daubach, Otto Herrmann, James Duffy, N. Bower, Andrew Lattau, Peter Doney and Michael McGovern. The object of the organization is to improve the moral, mental and social condition of its members, to educate them in integrity, sobriety and frugality, and to aid and assist members, or their families, in case of death with a beneficiary of $2,000. The presidents have been M. I. O'Brien, P. McMannus, John Kirk, Joseph R. Mehler, P. Morairty, H. F. Dougherty and M. I. O'Brien; the secretaries, Thomas Marshall, M. I. O'Brien, H. F. Dougherty, and the present official, Thomas Marshall. Meetings are held semi-monthly at the Amalgated Association hall. The membership is forty.

Sharon Council No. 25, R. T. of T., was organized in Hoelzle hall January 14, 1879, by C. L. Fisher, G. L., with the following as charter members: F. J. Dahringer, W. H. Robison, Joseph Dodds, L. B. Tupper, Charles Rosser, John M. Yahres, Sarah Smith, Mary R. Mendenhall, Ella Kratz, Kate Dahringer, H. D. Foat, John Kennedy, William Leipheimer, John Ambler, James Skinner, Alvin Heckman, Nancy McKnight, H. L. Robison, Margaret Kennedy, Martha McCune, Lydia Foat, Mary E. Dodds, W. H. Cover, D. Cartwright, Charles S. Foat, Cyrus Hann, John Fullerton, Hannah McEl-downey, Elizabeth Robison, Caroline Rice, Mary Ambler, Mary J. Skinner, Mrs. A. W. McKnight. The first officers elected were: S. C., J. G. Mc

Knight; V. C., C. M. Rice; P. C., J. A. Robison; Chap., Rev. J. K. Mendenhall; R. S., Prof. G. W. Kratz; F. S., Prof. G. W. Kratz; Treasurer, Mrs. E. V. Cover; H., C. Bowden; D. H., Mrs. L. W. Garner; Guard, Mrs. E. Robison; Sent., D. S. Foat, and Med. Ex., Dr. J. K. Mendenhall. The purpose of the council is to promote the cause of temperance, of total abstinence, by a beneficiary society on the mutual assessment plan. Meetings are held on the first and third Tuesdays of each month in the G. A. R. hall. The membership is sixty-eight.

Sharon Union No. 360, E. A. U., was instituted September 8, 1881, in the German Odd Fellows' hall, by D. S. P., G. W. Brown. The charter members were T. B. May, Chancellor; J. R. McNabb, Advocate; J. Ambler, President; F. Lawson, Vice-President; D. P. Stewart, Treasurer; W. L. Prindle, Secretary; F. B. Test, Accountant; T. B. Van Fossen, Warden; Mrs. J. Craft, Sentinel; John Craft, Watchman. The general purposes of the Union are for uniting fraternally all people of good health, character and morals, of both sexes; to assist one another, and to promote benevolence and charity by establishing a relief fund for the aid of fellow members who may become afflicted and needy, and also for the paying to the dependents of deceased members an insurance sum not exceeding $3,000. Meetings are held on the second and fourth Tuesdays of each month in the G. A. R. hall. The present membership is ninety, just seventy in excess of the number at organization.

West Penn No. 546, E. A. U., was organized July 21, 1886, with over thirty charter members. The first officers were J. D. Test, Chancellor; W. W. Service, Advocate; W. H. Dickson, President; James F. Hanna, Vice-President; William Henlan, Treasurer; Amy M. Bussey, Secretary; C. L. Robison, Accountant; P. F. Davis, Warden; Mrs. J. H. Nikirk, Sentinel; J. E. Berry, Watchman; Mrs. M. D. Bussey, Chaplain; Mrs. S. M. Ulp, Auxiliary. The present membership is fifty-four, and the lodge meets the second and fourth Tuesdays of each month in the Forrester's hall.

Sharon Post No. 254, G. A. R., Department of Pennsylvania, was organized June 29, 1882, with the following named charter members: James C. Nolan, Samuel B. Clark, Jacob Miller, Elisha Griswold, James D. Caldwell, Alexander McDowell, Malin Ewing, John Stewart, William Jackson, William H. Robison, John M. Yahres, C. E. Bundel, Albert Robison, J. A. Robison, D. C. Robison, Alfred Robison, John C. Roberts, J. C. Maxhimer, Josiah Selah, Edward J. Foutz, D. P. Stewart, Cyrus Haun, William H. Dubes, George B. Miller, Henry Scott, L. S. Winnel, David E. Moses, Sylvester F. Barker, Samuel Mahanna, John Lockhart, Baldwin Chew, Albert McDowell, Joseph J. Hunter, T. D. McFarland, William W. Hanna, James M. Mitchell, Sebastian Steese, J. R. McNabb, Jeremiah Sullivan, L. N. Dodd, J. P. Neiler, Charles Sever, D. C. Stambaugh. Since then the following Post Commanders have served: James C. Nolan, one term; Malin Ewing, two terms; L. N. Dodd, one term; and S. F. Barker one term, and also re-elected in December, 1887. The Adjutants have been Malin Ewing, John Lockhart, S. F. Barker and Walter Moyer. The meetings of the post are held in the G. A. R. hall, which is rented by it; but the furniture of the room is the post's property. Since 1882 but two deaths have occurred. The membership is at present fifty-two.

Pymatuning Tribe No. 259, I. O. R. M., was organized March 28, 1884. Its charter members were J. G. Lewis, D. E. Thomas, John Deveraux, T. M. Griffiths, Joseph Prue, L. P. Lewis, William G. Morgan, R. James, Stephen Williams, Charles Haybes, J. Thomas, R. Gray, D. R. Jones, T. T. Burn, J. Breeze, M. Jenkins and others, to the number of 100. The first officers were

D. E. Thomas, S.; James Thomas, S. S.; W. G. Morgan, J. S., and J. Deveraux, C. of R. The present membership is 154. Meetings are held in the Forrester's hall. The tribe has over $2,000 in cash investments and is in a flourishing condition.

Grant Assembly No. 6,748, K. of L., was organized April 26, 1886, in the hall in which it now assembles, A. A. of I. and S. W. hall, by Homer L. McGain, of Pittsburgh. Meetings are held every Monday evening. The membership is about 450. The condition of the order is good both financially and numerically.

Shenango Council No. 224, National Union, was instituted in Sharon, Penn., by Mr. C. S. Snyder, Senate Deputy, June 3, 1886, with sixty charter members. Have admitted eight and lost four since organization. None by death. Present membership sixty-four. First officers were: Ex-President, C. W. Ray; president, W. W. Service; vice-president, T. J. Gillespie; financial secretary, W. B. Hull; secretary, George A. Baird; treasurer, M. Zahniser; speaker, P. McDowell; chaplain, L. A. Burrell; sergeant-at-arms, W. H. Jackson; usher, C. W. Test; doorkeeper, W. A. Gebhardt. It meets in the G. A. R. hall the second and fourth Wednesdays of each month.

The Protected Home Circle.—This organization, now extending its branch circles into every part of the United States, owes its origin to Rev. H. C. Hall, P. D. Stratton, A. S. Service, Dr. Salem Heilman, J. V. Rose, W. H. Horton, Alex. McDowell, A. W. Williams and Michael Zahniser, who established it August 7, 1886. The above names include the original members of the supreme organization, of which there was a local circle organized in Sharon, called the Sharon Circle No. 1, P. H. C., which includes in its membership many of the prominent citizens and business men of the place. The object of the Protected Home Circle, as enunciated in the general constitution, "shall be to associate white people of both sexes, of good moral character, health and physical constitution, between the ages of fifteen and fifty-six years, in fraternal societies for mutual assistance of a moral, social, intellectual and pecuniary nature." It proposes to organize such people into fraternal societies, in each community, who shall hold regular meetings, as prescribed by its laws, for culture in social, literary and parliamentary discipline; for the promotion of pure morals among its members; making provision for clean and helpful society; caring for the sick, promoting the welfare of the living, and making adequate, safe provision for the pecuniary assistance of the dependents of members removed by death. The growth of this society, has been almost phenomenal. At the first annual meeting of the supreme circle, held August 9, 1887, it was found that an extension and a development had been made in one year that surpassed anything before known in the history of fraternal insurance societies. This growth, one both in numbers and quality, was made in the face of the fact that the Protected Home Circle occupied the ground where other societies were strongly entrenched, and, in some cases, opposed to the advent of the new comer. The first Supreme President was Rev. H. C. Hall, and the Secretary, P. D. Stratton. The present officers of the Supreme Circle, which meets annually in its regular office in Duffy's Block, Sharon, Penn., are: S. P., H. C. Hall; S. V. P., J. V. Rose; S. S., P. D. Stratton; S. A., W. S. Palmer; S. T., Alex. McDowell; S. M. D., Salem Heilman; S. S., A. W. Williams. Board of directors: H. C. Hall, J. V. Rose, P. D. Stratton, Salem Heilman, A. S. Service, Alex. McDowell, M. Zahniser, W. S. Palmer and A. W. Williams. The condition of the society is flourishing. Over 2,200 certificates have been already issued, and there are ten local circles in Mercer County. In the State there are about 900 members, each paying a membership fee of $5, to which is added an average annual expense of $3, and the monthly assessment ranging according to age.

Sharon Circle No. 1, P. H. C., was organized August 17, 1886, with nearly thirty charter members. Its first officers were: President, M. Zahner; Past President, J. R. Hewitt; Vice-President, A. S. Service; Secretary, John L. Morrison; Guardian, W. E. Van Orsdel; Accountant, H. W. Horton; Treasurer, James V. Rose; Porter, Mrs. E. Cope; Watchman, D. Cartwright; Guide, Samuel Potter; Companion, Mrs. R. Potter. The circle has grown rapidly, and has now nearly 300 members.

Algonquin Lodge No. 1206, K. & L. of H., was instituted November 22, 1886, by L. B. Lockwood, the Grand Protector of Pennsylvania, in Hoelzle Hall, with the following named charter members: J. H. Gilmore, Henry Ohl, Mrs. DeEtta Ohl, J. E. Lightner, C. J. Bussey, S. A. McKay, Mrs. S. A. McKay, Charles M. Couch, Dr. Charles W. Hoyt, Mrs. Emeline Hoyt, Dr. J. H. Reed, Mrs. Kate L. Reed, D. R. Shiras, Mrs. Lydia E. Shiras, John Hannah, Mrs. Lulu Hannah, Prof. J. W. Canon, Mrs. M. E. Canon, Mrs. Mary J. Ray, Mrs. R. J. Southard, Miss Millie F. Rose, Mrs. John Fullerton, Mrs. L. A. Burrell, J. W. Vandeventer, Mrs. J. W. Vandeventer. The first officers comprised: P. P., Mrs. De Etta Ohl; P., Charles M. Couch; V. P., J. H. Gilmore; Secretary, J. W. Vandeventer; F. S., S. A. McKay; Treasurer, C. J. Bussey; Chaplain, J. W. Canon; Guide, Mrs. John Fullerton; Guardian, Mrs. R. J. Southard, and Sentinel, Henry Ohl. Meetings are held on the first and third Mondays of each month in Hoelzle Hall. The membership of the lodge is twenty-three.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Sharon owes its origin to a "league" organized March 17, 1874, in the U. P. Church, when 120 ladies met and effected a temporary organization. On the following day Mrs. Mary H. Wolfkill was chosen president; Miss Della Hammond and Mrs. G. W. Porter, vice-presidents; Mrs. S. C. Yoder, recording secretary; Mrs. Clara E. Clark, corresponding secretary, and Mrs. James M. Willson, treasurer. Committees were appointed to secure names to the pledge, and visit places where intoxicating liquors were sold. Meetings were held daily, and the temperance crusade worked up to a white heat. The saloons were invaded, the proprietors reasoned with, and prayers offered, and so persistent was the work prosecuted that the people of the town became divided into factions, and much bitter feeling was engendered. Beside those previously mentioned, the following ladies served on the committees engaged in the crusade: Mrs. Alfred Williams, Mrs. John Gay, Mrs. A. P. Hamilton, Mrs. M. Kennedy, Mrs. J. J. Hunter, Mrs. B. K. Ormond, Mrs. J. McKnight, Miss Jennie Strawbridge, Mrs. M. Christy, Mrs. Kate Moore, Mrs. Joseph McCleery, Miss Jennie Dunn, Mrs. Dr. McArthur, Mrs. J. T. Wilson, Mrs. H. Brown, Mrs. E. Elliott, Mrs. E. Hyde, Mrs. J. P. Reed, Mrs. J. Hyde, Mrs. J. Wright, Mrs. Corpe, Mrs. Stewart, Mrs. George Williams, Mrs. Dickey, Mrs. Lockhart and others. The following ministers took a leading part in the movement: Revs. L. W. Day, B. K. Ormond, Orange Higgins, A. S. Willson, Latshaw, Truesdale and Vogel; also Messrs. J. M. Irvine, E. A. Wheeler, J. P. Reed, Joseph McCleery, P. L. Williams, Alfred Williams, John Titus, W. C. Bell, S. C. Yoder, J. B. King, Isaac De Forest and many others. A large number of dealers were prosecuted and fined for illegal liquor-selling, and hundreds of dollars were thus secured and turned over to the Sharon school fund. The crusade of 1874 is still vividly remembered as one of the leading national temperance movements of the century. The local union is still vigorously pushing the cause of temperance, and bitterly fighting against the sale of intoxicants.

Sharon Y. W. C. T. U. was organized September 12, 1886, in the Methodist Episcopal Church, by Henrietta Moore, with the following members: Sadie Stambaugh, Met Stambaugh, Etta Stambaugh, Millie Boyer and Mattie Harper. Millie Boyer was first president, and Sadie Stambaugh, secretary. The order numbers some sixty members at present, and is in good condition.

FIRE DEPARTMENT AND FIRES.

Sharon has an efficient fire department, of which its citizens feel justly proud. The history embraces some interesting items. On the 8th of March, 1856, the town council decided to "procure and furnish six ladders, six fire hooks and poles, for use of said borough in case of fire; two of said ladders to be fifteen feet, two twenty, and two twenty-five feet long, and to be made in a good and substantial manner." This equipment was the means of protection until June 16, 1873, when the present department was regularly organized as follows: President, W. I. Mordock; vice-president, W. O. Leslie; secretary, J. L. Morrison; treasurer, Thomas S. Alexander; ex-commissioners, E. T. Higgs and George F. Shaeffer; foreman, T. K. Perkins; first assistant foreman, James F. Golden; second assistant foreman, C. E. Bundel; engineer, S. M. Blystone; assistant engineer, J. E. Beebe; fireman, H. K. Neiler; suction men, J. J. Hunter, E. N. Ohl, Isaac Wise and W. W. Davidson; axe men, William Roberts, James P. McKnight, George F. Shaeffer and James Burnett; pipe men, Phil. Leonard, E. T. Higgs, W. D. McMillen, James H. Ash, Perry Byard and Vulk Brooks; hose directors, John Marshall, Alvin Bronson, James Wright and Daniel Williams; reel No. 1, Thomas S. Alexander, William Bide-man, John H. Fisher, Joseph Higgs, G. B. Johnson, W. I. Mordock, John L. Morrison, Thomas J. Montgomery, W. J. Watson and Ben. R. Williams; reel No. 2, C. A. Ashton, James A. Boyd, W. V. Byard, M. B. Hofius, George S. Kirk, W. O. Leslie, R. G. Morrison, J. C. Offutt, J. C. Owsley and J. W. Scott.

Robert S. May was appointed by the council as chief in 1873, and filled the position about three years, when he was succeeded by Thomas K. Perkins, who held the office about two years. May was again appointed, and continued until 1881, when the present efficient chief, C. E. Bundel, succeeded him, and has since filled the position in a very creditable manner. The organization since 1873 has been as follows:

1875—President George S. Kirk; vice-president, William M. Jackson; secretary, C. McTaggart; treasurer, W. O. Leslie.

1876—President, J. C. Owsley; vice-president, Mark Cohen; secretary, C. McTaggart; treasurer, J. J. Hunter.

1877—President, J. C. Owsley; vice-president, Mark Cohen; secretary, C. McTaggart; treasurer, J. F. Golden.

1878—President, William M. Williams; vice-president, Thomas D. McFarland; secretary, C. E. Bundel; treasurer, J. F. Golden.

1879-80—President, Thomas D. McFarland; vice-president, J. J. Hunter; secretary, C. E. Bundel; treasurer, J. F. Golden.

1881—President, Harry Orchard; vice-president, John W. Mason; secretary, C. E. Bundel; treasurer, J. F. Golden.

1882-83—President, John W. Mason; vice-president, W. S. McGowan; secretary, H. B. Robison; treasurer, J. W. Fisher, 1884—President, John W. Mason; vice-president, Robert Leipheimer; secretary, H. B. Robison; treasurer, B. F. Budd.

1885—President, John W. Mason; vice-president, Robert Leipheimer; secretary, C. E. Gibson; treasurer, B. F. Budd.

1886—President, S. H. Sisson; vice-president, Fred. McClain; secretary, John W. Mason; treasurer, B. F. Budd.

1887—President, S. H. Sisson; vice-president, James N. McClain; secretary, Charles A. Hazen; treasurer, C. E. Bundel.

1888—President, Robert Leipheimer; vice-president, H. B. Robison; secretary, Charles A. Hazen; treasurer, C. E. Bundel.

The first meetings of the company were held in a barn on Bridge Street. The present city building, which serves as headquarters for the department, stands on Chestnut Street. It was erected in the autumn of 1873, being occupied in November. The lot and building cost about $10,000. In February, 1874, the Shenango Hook and Ladder Company was organized. It was composed of substantial business men of the place, from whom the romance of pulling a heavy truck with a forty-five foot ladder soon departed. It passed through many changes and reorganizations, and ceased as an organization in 1887. After the decease of the Shenango Hook and Ladder Company, the Sharon Engine and Hose Company was reorganized, May 3, 1887, as the Sharon Fire Department. It now consists of three officers and twenty-seven men. The first equipment was a third class (size) Silsby engine, two hand hose reels, and one two-horse carriage and the hook and ladder truck. At present, under the water-works regime, the steamer is held as a reserve. Instead of the hand reels a two-horse hose wagon has been added.

The first fire after the organization was at New Castle June 21, 1873. The company was present and won laurels. The first fire in Sharon was a small frame building on the corner of State and Dock Streets, October 3, 1873. The most extensive fire occurred on Thursday, October 5, 1876, a planing-mill owned by Wallis & Carley, on Dock Street, being burned. Some eight buildings were consumed, at a loss of $30,000. On the 25th of July, 1878, Frederick Hoelzle's Block was consumed, the fire starting in Bowden's carriage shop on Vine Street. Some fourteen buildings were consumed, with a loss of more than $30,000. It was the Chicago fire of the place.

BANKING INSTITUTIONS.

The pioneer bank of Sharon was established by C. B. Wick, S. Q. Porter and William Coleman, early in 1865, under the firm name of Wick, Porter & Co. The following November Simon Perkins purchased the interest of Mr. Coleman and a part of Mr. Wick's, Mr. Porter buying the remainder, the name of the firm then becoming Porter & Perkins. This bank carried on a large business, and had very extensive deposits, as it was then the only banking institution in Sharon. It continued business until early in 1870, when Porter & Perkins sold out to the First National Bank, both taking stock in the latter at the same time.

McDowell's Bank is the successor of the second banking institution of Sharon, established by D. C. Strawbridge May 1, 1868. In March, 1870, James Bleakley, Son & Co. bought the Strawbridge Bank, and began a general banking and exchange business, with a financial basis of $100,000. Mr. Bleakley withdrew from the bank in 1873, and his son-in-law, Alex. McDowell, the previous "Co." of the firm, took full charge, and has since conducted its operations. It has a capital of $100,000, and is doing its full share of the banking and brokerage business of Sharon. Its quarters are in the substantial brick block owned by the I. O. O. F., on the corner of State and Vine Streets, and its financial standing is recognized as substantial as the block it occupies.

The First National Bank of Sharon was organized on the 31st of August, 1868, and began business operations on the 1st of November same year, with a capital stock of $100,000, which has since been increased to $125,000. The first officers of the bank were: President, George Prather; vice-president, James Westerman, and cashier, J. T. Wilson. In the autumn of 1871 Mr. Prather died, and his place was filled by the election of J. J. Spearman, the present president. The bank occupies an excellent building on State Street, erected in 1875, and owned by itself, a model of convenience and comfort, containing banking office, cashier's office and directors' room. The vault is one of the most complete in Western Pennsylvania, outside of Pittsburgh, being fire and burglar proof, and fitted up with the latest time and combination locks. The present officers of the bank are: President, J. J. Spearman; vice-president, B. H. Henderson; cashier, A. S. Service; assistant cashier, W. F. Porter; teller, Benjamin Spearman. The institution has a surplus and undivided profits of $100,000, while the line of deposits averages $500,000.

The Sharon Savings Bank was chartered September 14, 1869, with a capital stock of $50,000, and began business in the following May, under the supervision of: President, John M. Mordock; cashier, J. E. McCarter; book-keeper, A. E. Graham. It did a good business till August, 1878, when it failed because of a large amount of bad paper it had taken. It, however, finally paid up the larger part of its indebtedness to depositors and others, the stockholders being the principal losers.

Sharon National Bank.—In 1870 Mr. M. Zahniser and L. Hefling, Esq., organized the "Sharon Banking Company," with a capital of $200,000. Under this name a general banking business was carried on until May, 1875, when a reorganization was effected, under the present title of "Sharon National Bank." During the good times preceding the change deposits in the old institution amounted upon several occasions to upward of $700,000. The first officers of the bank were: President, Joseph Forker; vice-president, James Westerman; cashier, M. Zahniser; assistant cashier, T. K. Perkins. Mr. Westerman became president in 1878, and held the office till his death, July 20, 1884. He was succeeded by Joseph Forker, who still fills the position. M. H. Henderson is vice-president, and John Forker, assistant cashier and book-keeper. The building occupied by the reorganized bank since 1875 is near the E. & P. Railroad, on State Street. In it the bank has enjoyed fair prosperity, and is yet conducting an increasing business. The capital stock is at present $125,000. Mr. Zahniser has been cashier of the bank since its inception.

The Sharon Building and Loan Association was incorporated December 17, 1872, by J. G. Elliott, A. W. Phillips, Alex. McDowell, C. E. Bundel, George F. Shaeffer, R. W. Morrison, William Henlan, John L. Morrison, Thomas S. Alexander, I. K. Whitcraft, A. B. Llewelyn and Robert Boyce. The purpose of the association, as expressed in its constitution, was that of accumulating a fund by the contributions of members, and to loan the same to them to enable them to purchase real estate, erect buildings or engage in any legitimate business. This association lasted seven years, its affairs being wound up early in 1880. During its existence it fully accomplished its object, and was a great assistance to its members. On May 21, 1887, a similar association was chartered by Alex. McDowell, A. W. Williams, John L. Morrison, C. W. Ray, R. Hanlon, C. M. Rice, George Tribby and Thomas B. Beil, with a capital stock of $500,000, divided into 2,500 shares of the par value of $200 each, but nothing further was done, and the project has from all appearances been abandoned.

GAS AND WATER COMPANIES.

The Sharon Gaslight and Water Company, was chartered in 1863, and in the spring of 1871 began the erection of works on the corner of Silver and Railroad Streets. The plant was built and mains laid under the supervision of D. R. Shiras, and in September, 1871, the town was lighted for the first time with gas. The first corps of officers were C. G. Carver, president; D. R. Shiras, secretary and general manager; S. P. Dame, treasurer. Mr. Dame was succeeded in a short time by M. Zahniser. The present officers consist of Simon Perkins, president, and J. L. Carver, secretary and manager. The company's plant embraces five miles and a half of mains, and it furnishes the borough with fifty-one street lamps.

The Columbia Gaslight and Fuel Company, organized at Franklin in 1886, opened a main to Sharon in May, 1887, and supplies the town with natural gas at a distance of fifty-four miles. The supply comes from the Speechly District. About sixteen miles of pipe are laid in town. D. R. Shiras manages the Sharon plant. This fuel has proven a great boon to the people of Sharon, as well as to its manufacturing interests, and few would care to return to the use of wood and coal.

The Sharon Water-works were incorporated November 20, 1883, with a capital stock of $20,000, divided into 200 shares of the par value of $100 each. The first board of directors consisted of John C. Owsley, J. S. Fruit, Ellis Morrison, Charles S. Wallace and W. D. Wallace. The present officers are: President, Samuel R. Bullock; vice-president, John C. Owsley; directors, William S. Mercer, Alex. McDowell and Ellis Morrison; secretary, Ellis Morrison; treasurer, E. Waltman; superintendent, E. J. Robinson. The borough is supplied from a reservoir elevated 319 feet, located northwest of Sharon, in Ohio, into which water is forced from the Shenango River. There are eighty fire plugs and ten miles of mains inside the corporation.

CEMETERIES.

In 1807 William Budd donated to the Baptist Church a lot for church and grave-yard, the latter, however, to be for the general use of the community at large. This ground was the first one used in Sharon, and extended up the hill west from the Catholic Church. At a later day Mr. Budd gave an adjoining lot to the Methodists, and the two lots were thrown into one cemetery for the use of the town. This was used as a burying-ground until Oakwood was opened, when Dr. J. M. Irvine got a bill passed by the Legislature prohibiting interment within the borough limits. In 1876 the dead were removed to Oakwood, and the old site is now principally occupied by dwelling-houses.

Oakwood Cemetery Association was chartered April 11, 1866, by Dr. J. M. Irvine, T. J. Porter, C. Q. Carver, E. A. Wheeler, James Westerman, Samuel Kimberly, Thomas Bowden and E. J. Fish. The first officers chosen were: President, T. J. Porter; secretary and treasurer, Dr. J. M. Irvine. The grounds include thirty-two acres, which were purchased of James McCleery, in 1867, at $100 per acre. The surveying and platting was done by P. Butz, of New Castle, Penn. The superintendent, John Randall, was instrumental in ornamenting the grounds. This city of the dead lies northeast of the borough, and reflects much credit upon the enterprise of its originators, as well as upon the affectionate regard exhibited by the people of Sharon toward their deceased friends.

GROWTH AND POPULATION.

The growth of Sharon throughout its earliest history was, indeed, very slow, and at the close of its first half century had embraced only 900 inhabitants. In 1840 we find a scattered village of about 400 people, and on this population it was incorporated the following year. In 1850 the town had only 541 inhabitants, an increase of but 141 in ten years. The next decade it almost doubled, having in 1860 a population of 900. During the war a boom struck the town, and the census of 1870 gives Sharon 4,221 inhabitants. It has kept on growing ever since. In 1880 it had 5,684, while its present estimated population, based on the school enumeration, is about 7,000. The growth of Sharon is of course principally due to her large manufacturing interests, and to the enterprise and public spirit of her citizens.

THIS borough, the most beautiful one in the county, is gracefully and pleasantly situated at the confluence of the Little Shenango and Shenango Rivers, on "warrants lands" represented in the early times as belonging to William Hall on the west side and J. Stenger on the east. To know how the settlement of Greenville was brought about, it may be well to be informed that the Fifth Donation District, embracing 100 tracts of 400 acres each, for which no soldiers' warrants were issued, the roll of soldiers being exhausted before the land on the west end was taken up, lay in this region. Judge Wilson, of Philadelphia, obtained from the State, warrants bearing fictitious names, at a mere nominal price, being bound to have each tract settled within five years or forfeit his claim. Wilson failed, and John Nicholson became the purchaser at sheriff's sale. Probst, Lodge & Walker, agents for Nicholson, proceeded to bargain with settlers and have their boundaries defined. Wilson, during his ownership, engaged to give half of each tract to the settler, but the agents of Nicholson were willing to allow only 100 acres. The result was a great deal of litigation before the question was settled, with varying fortunes on each side.

Probst, Lodge & Walker, about 1798 or 1799, laid out, on a tract of fifty acres which they obtained from Jacob Loutzenhiser, in exchange for 100 acres up the Little Shenango, the village of West Greenville, Walker doing the surveying. It was so called because of two circumstances. 1. The west bank of the Shenango was covered with hemlocks, whose green foliage suggested the idea of a green villa. 2. Its location on the west side suggested the prefix.

Tobias Shank bought the first one of these lots, and at once erected a log tavern near the west end of the bridge, thus becoming the first innkeeper of the place. His house stood on the northwest corner of Main and First Streets, the site now occupied by the two-story frame house dwelt in by Art. Weir. He also kept a canoe for the convenience of foot travelers, aiming, it seems, to cater to the wants of the public. A little below was a ford at which horsemen and wagons could cross. The place was familiarly called "Shank's Ford" for several years.

Greenville is thus the oldest town in the county, its origin dating back to the close of the last century. Other lots than the one sold to Shank were disposed of, but none seem to have been built upon; nor was this first town plat recorded. At least no record has been made to guide posterity. The entire property, after passing through the hands of Jacob Loutzenhiser, Sr., and John Walker, fell into possession of William Scott, who had it resurveyed, retaining the old name. This occurred in 1815, and Scott sold off the lots quite rapidly, and furnished good titles to purchasers.

PIONEERS.

The first settlements in this vicinity were commenced in the autumn of 1796 by a hardy band of land prospectors from Westmoreland County, Penn., comprising the Klingensmiths, Kecks, Loutzenhisers and Christys. They selected sites for future homes, upon which they settled permanently in the spring of 1797. Daniel Klingensmith, Sr., located on the site of the rolling mills. His sons, Peter and John, also took up lands in what is now West Salem Township. Peter, Abraham, Jacob, Joseph and Daniel Keck settled in the same vicinity, their locations extending down the Shenango for several miles. Joseph and Abraham were sons-in-law of Daniel Klingensmith, Sr.

Jacob Loutzenhiser settled first on the site of Orangeville, where he built a grist-mill in 1798. He, too, was a son-in-law of Daniel Klingensmith, and with the latter purchased a large tract of land where Greenville now stands. He sold his property on the Ohio line to Adam Haun in 1802, and settled near his father-in-law. In 1798 he sold 100 acres northeast of Greenville to John Williamson, who built thereon a saw and grist-mill. This came back into the possession of Loutzenhiser in January, 1806, who retained it up to his death in 1821. In 1815 Loutzenhiser constructed a dam across the Shenango and erected a log grist-mill on the site of the Mathers mill. This he owned and operated up to his death, when it was sold by his executors to Joseph Keck, who ran it for many years. Loutzenhiser's son, Jacob, was afterward sheriff of Mercer County.

Col. Andrew Christy settled two miles east of Greenville, in what is now Hempfield Township. He was quite a prominent man in the early development of the county, and served as lieutenant-colonel in the War of 1812, his regiment being composed principally of Mercer County pioneers. He was elected sheriff in 1827, and served one term. His father, John, a native of Ireland, and brothers John and Samuel, also two sisters, accompanied him from Westmoreland County in the spring of 1797. They settled on what is known as the Callen farm, south of Greenville. John Christy, Sr., is said to have been the first justice of the peace in the county. His son John afterward filled the same office for many years. Col. Christy went to Erie several times to prevent the capture of that place by the British. He subsequently held the position of brigade inspector. His son James W. is a resident of Greenville.

John Williamson came the following year (1798), and bought 100 acres of land from Jacob Loutzenhiser, lying on the Little Shenango, northeast of Greenville. He came from near Carlisle, Cumberland County. On this tract Williamson and James King, the latter a mill-wright, erected a saw-mill with a grist-mill attachment the next year. Two years later (1800), their families having meanwhile arrived, these two men built the first grist-mill on the Little Shenango. At the time of Williamson's arrival his family consisted of wife and five children: Anne, James, Agnes, Susan and Eliza. Two more were finally born in Mercer County, John and Melinda. Of these, the former is still living at Jamestown. Mr. Williamson is said to have been a man who could not do too much for a neighbor that needed assistance, and was much respected. The mill erected by Williamson, together with the one at Orangeville, Bentley's at Sharon, and Peter Wilson's on Yellow Creek, in Jackson Township, were the pioneers of their kind in the county. Williamson died July 21, 1840, aged eighty-one years.

Another family, quite numerous at the time, was that of the Beans. They located on the east side of the river, in what is now Hempfield Township, about 1798. The names were: Robert, James, Thomas, Hugh, William, Alexander and Andrew. These were all brothers. They had one sister, married to Robert Bole, one of the first board of county commissioners. Of this number Thomas became a tavern-keeper, beginning in the house which Tobias Shank kept. Near it he subsequently erected a much superior structure, which is still standing. He was somewhat of a military character, and attained the position of colonel and brigade inspector, a position much sought in those days. Robert, a half brother of Thomas, went out in the War of 1812 an enlisted soldier, but returned with a lieutenant's commission in the regular army, as a reward for meritorious service in the battle of Lundy's Lane. He subsequently became postmaster and justice of the peace at Greenville.

Hugh Brown, a native of County Down, Ireland, and a weaver by trade, came from Fayette County via Beaver, along an Indian path, in 1799, to New Castle, then just laid out; and thence continued his journey up the Shenango to his settlement in the forks of the two Shenangos, a mile above town. At the time of his settlement he had four children: John W., Mary K., James W. and Jane. His grandson, J. C. Brown, is at present editor of the Advance-Argus.

John Ferguson, William McClimans, Robert McKean, the McCulloughs, Hugh Donaldson, James Stinson, Robert Bole, Alexander Dumars, William McMillen and James Dumars all settled east of the Shenango, in the vicinity of Greenville, in 1798, 1799 and 1800. Besides the Klingensmiths and Kecks, the nearest settlers to Greenville, on the west side of the river, were Joseph Loutzenhiser, Sr. (father of Jacob) and sons, John and Peter, who came in 1800; Joseph and William McClurg, Richard Tunison and James Nelson, all of whom settled along the west bank of the Shenango before the commencement of the present century.

William Scott, concerning whom some mention has already been made, came from Fayette County, in 1799 or 1800, and settled in the east part of what is now West Salem. He afterward became possessor of the fifty acres laid out by Probst, Lodge & Walker, and some of the lands surrounding. He was the first justice of the peace in Greenville, where he continued to reside until his death, April 9, 1849.

Maj. John Sims, a brother-in-law of Col. Andrew Christy, was the first tanner in the northwest part of the county. He lived in what is now Hempfield Township, not far from Greenville, where he opened a tannery in 1803.

Nathan Patterson, an uncle of the sheriff of the same name brought the first store into this quarter of the county, about the year 1806. The store was a small one, but the assortment was judicious and was a great convenience to the neighbors. It stood about one mile east of Greenville.

Arthur G. Long was the next merchant that located in the vicinity, afterward going to New Castle. He was the father of the Hon. Alex. D. Long, who represented the Cincinnati district in Congress during the dark days of the Rebellion, and whose speech, defending the constitutional right of secession, in the midst of the war, created such a profound sensation.

KECK'S ADDITION TO WEST GREENVILLE.

On the 24th of February, 1826, Joseph Keck placed on record his addition to West Greenville, on lands lying east of the Shenango River, which he had purchased of Jacob Loutzenhiser's executors. The names of the streets in this addition, running east and west, commencing on the north, are: Eagle, Shenango, Mill (now called Main) and Clinton. The alleys in the same direction are Cherry, Talisman, Swamp and Clinton. The streets commencing on the west and running north and south are Race (now Water) and Mercer. The alleys in the same direction are Race (now Race Street) and Canal (now called Canal Street); while the streets east of Mercer are not named on the plat.

The first sale of lots occurred in the spring of 1826, and as far as the names could be deciphered from the original time-eaten plat, now in the possession of L. L. Keck, Esq., the principal lots sold at that time, with their purchasers, are as follows:

EARLY BUSINESS INTERESTS.

The first mills were the saw and grist-mills, erected by John Williamson at the close of the last century, an account of which has already been given, and the one built by Jacob Loutzenhiser on the site of Mathers mill in 1815.

George and Samuel Lodge established the first tannery; Robert G. Mossman the first cabinet factory, and Paul Everhart the first pottery, all being on the west side, though Mossman afterward established quite a large factory on the east side of the river.

The first hotel man, as previously mentioned in this chapter, was Tobias Shank.

The first distillery in this vicinity, and probably the first in the county, was built in 1801 by Joseph Keck on the site of Shenango, who was therefore the pioneer distiller.

The first justice of the peace in this locality was John Christy, and the second was William Scott, the latter being the first in Greenville.

In 1824 J. & A. P. Waugh opened a general store on the west side, and the latter located in the village. He conducted the business alone until 1828, when his brother joined him, bringing his family at the same time. They were for many years the principal merchants of the town. James was the father of Judge William Waugh, late president of the First National Bank, who came here with his father, and is yet a resident of Greenville.

The first post-office was established January 9, 1828, with A. P. Waugh as postmaster.*

The earliest physicians will be remembered, Drs. Hardscrabble, Lane, Obadiah Hall, H. D. La. Cossitt, Samuel Wylie, Beriah Magoffin and R. E. Breiner.

The first newspaper man was Richard Hill, concerning whom information is given in the Press chapter. In it also will be found the sketch of all Greenville papers. Mrs. Simeon Betts, a daughter of Mr. Hill, is living northeast of the borough.

The first canal boat from Greenville was built by Robert G. Mossman, and was called the "Milnor Roberts," in honor of the chief engineer of the canal. The builder was the father of Rev. W. H. Mossman, of West Middlesex, and of Dr. B. E. Mossman, of Greenville. On the night of her first trip there was a jollification in Greenville, and the town was filled with enthusiasm over the completion of this, then, great public improvement.

The first canal boat of coal was taken through to Erie in December, 1844, and was under the charge of Capt. Gregory, of Mercer.

In 1850 James R. Wick began a brokerage business; but the first regular banking firm was established in 1856, by William Achre, A. L. Wick and George A. Bittenbanner.

The first burgess was James R. Wick, and the first clerk of the council was John Keck.

WEST GREENVILLE IN 1833.

In the spring of 1888 the late W. P. Hanna, of Greenville, prepared an outline map representing West Greenville in 1833, the time of his first appearance in the village. This map has been carefully scrutinized by old residents of the borough, and is pronounced very accurate, showing who lived in the place at the time, what occupations they followed, and what buildings were in existence. It is a remarkable production from memory. From it we are permitted to make some extracts. These residents and buildings are divided into two groups, viz., West Side and East Side.

Additions to the borough have been made at different times by Robert Bean, on the west, and by Joseph Keck, Power & Sankey, John A. Waugh, R. M. Waugh, Wick & Goodwin, J. R. Wick, Robert McMasters, R. G. Mossman, J. B. Plumer and J. W. & J. C. Brown, on the east.

INCORPORATION AND BOROUGH OFFICIALS.

Greenville was incorporated into a borough May 29, 1837, in compliance with a petition signed by sixty-eight citizens of the village, and presented to the court in December, 1836. The town had then, according to the petition, 495 inhabitants. The first election was held at the house of Col. Bean, on the third Monday of June, 1837. The following is the list of officials controlling the destiny of Greenville for the past fifty-one years. It is taken from the records, and is complete except for the year 1844, which is missing from the minute book, where strong evidence exists to prove that if there was a council no minutes were kept of its meetings.

1837—Burgess, James R. Wick; council, Moses Varney, Andrew Campbell, William J. Woods, McClure Cowan, Josiah McPherrin; treasurer, Samuel Goodwin; clerk, John Keck.

1838—Burgess, John Keck; council, Harvey Walker, John Nelson, John M. Graham, Paul Everhart, William G. Fell; treasurer, Samuel Goodwin; clerk, George A. Bittenbanner.

1839—Burgess, Robert McMaster; council, McClure Cowan, Adam Seiple, John Keck, Josiah McPherrin, John Service; treasurer, Samuel Goodwin; clerk, George A. Bittenbanner.

1840—Burgess, William McCrum; council, John Service, Adam Seiple, I. R. Bearce, Isaac Hildebrand, R. G. Mossman; clerk, J. M. Waugh; Waugh's salary was fixed at $5 per annum, payable quarterly.

1841—Burgess, Samuel Goodwin; council, Samuel Wortman, Samuel Reznor, Samuel Melvin, Gardner Bond, Samuel Wilson; clerk, W. C. Lawson.

1842—Burgess, Samuel Wortman; council, Harvey Walker, David Loutzenhiser, William G. Fell, Samuel Reznor; clerk, W. C. Lawson.

1843—Burgess, Adam Seiple; council, William G. Fell, Gardner Bond, Paul Everhart, Thomas McDonald, John M. Graham; clerk, George W. Hunstable.

1845—Burgess, McClure Cowan; council, David Loutzenhiser, Joseph Woodworth, Jonathan Long, A. A. Heath, John Moore; clerk, J. K. Hamblin.

1849—Burgess, S. P. Johnston; council, Gardner Bond, R. Gardner, R. Root, R. S. Huling, A. Law; clerk, J. K. Hamblin.

1850—Burgess, Josiah McPherrin; council, Matthias McDowell, Thomas Callen, F. H. Judd, William Cowan, John McMillen; clerk, A. D. Gillespie.

1851—Burgess, William Achre; council, Robert Dickey, A. D. Gillespie, Adam Huber, John Eckels, William Sutton; clerk, A. D. Gillespie.

1852—Burgess, Joseph B. Campbell; council, A. P. Waugh, S. M. Davis, D. B. Packard, R. Root, A. J. Christy; clerk, D. B. Packard.

1853—Burgess, John M. Graham; council, A. P. Waugh, S. P. Johnston, Matthias McDowell, A. D. Gillespie, Samuel Melvin; clerk, A. D. Gillespie.

1854—Burgess, A. D. Gillespie; council, William Keck, Charles Stahr, C. Townsend, Ichabod Goodwin, John Brackin; clerk, A. D. Gillespie.

1855—Burgess, R. Root; council, J. K. Hamblin, R. S. Huling, John Eckels, Henry Austin, James Ellinger; clerk, W. W. W. Wood.

1856—Burgess, A. D. Gillespie; council, S. P. Johnston, James Carson, James Law, A. M. Campbell, Charles Hoge; clerk, Charles Hoge.

1857—Burgess, William Achre; council, Robert Dickey, Sr.; J. K. Hamblin, William McDowell, Samuel Melvin, John Brackin; clerk, W. W. W. Wood.

1858—Burgess, Robert Dickey, Sr.; council, Samuel Melvin, S. M. Hanna, John Keck, A. J. McDowell, Samuel M. Davis; clerk, W. W. W. Wood.

1859—Burgess, Henry Austin; council, John Keck, Samuel Melvin, A. J. McDowell, James Mills, D. B. Packard; clerk, D. B. Packard.

1860—Burgess, John Eckels; council, R. S. Huling, A. L. Wick, James Mills, Samuel Melvin, John Keck, D. B. Packard; clerk, D. B. Packard.

1862—Burgess, Samuel Goodwin; council, Joseph Vickers, D. B. Packard, George W. Carskadden, R. S. Huling, Charles McMichael, A. L. Wick; clerk, D. B. Packard.

1863—Burgess, James Ellinger; council, H. N. Shrom, S. C. Dickey, D. B. Packard, Joseph Vickers, Charles McMichael, George W. Carskadden; clerk, D. B. Packard.

1864—Burgess, Charles Hoge; council, Joseph Partridge, W. C. E. Martin, H. N. Shrom, S. C. Dickey, D. B. Packard, Joseph Vickers; clerk, D. B. Packard.

1865—Burgess, A. L. Wick; council, Ichabod Goodwin, D. C. Moyer, W. C. E. Martin, Joseph Partridge, H. N. Shrom, S. C. Dickey; clerk, S. C. Dickey.

1866—Burgess, Marvin Loomis; council, W. P. Leech, J. K. Hamblin, Joseph Partridge, D. C. Moyer, W. C. E. Martin, Ichabod Goodwin; clerk, J. K. Hamblin.

1867—Burgess, D. B. Packard; council, John Ramsey, Joseph Vickers, W. P. Leech, D. C. Moyer, J. K. Hamblin, Ichabod Goodwin; clerk, J. K. Hamblin.

1868—Burgess, Henry Austin; council, G. D. Kughler, Robert Clark, W. P. Leech, John Ramsey, Joseph Vickers, J. K. Hamblin; clerk, J. K. Hamblin.

1869—Burgess, A. D. Gillespie; council, S. P. Johnston, W. R. Fessler, A. G. Boies, G. D. Kughler, John Ramsey, Joseph Vickers; clerk, A. G. Boies.

1870—Burgess, W. P. Leech; council, J. R. Bean, D. B. Packard, S. P. Johnston, W. R. Fessler, A. G. Boies, G. D. Kughler; clerk, J. R. Bean.

1871—Burgess, James Mills; council, H. C. Hendrickson, D. C. Moyer, W. R. Fessler, A. G. Boies, D. B. Packard, J. R. Bean; clerk, J. R. Bean.

1872—Burgess, A. D. Gillespie; council, C. Seigfried, D. C. Moyer, James Sheakley, J. R. Bean, H. C. Hendrickson, D. B. Packard; secretary, A. G. Boies.

1873—Burgess, A. D. Gillespie; council, B. Henlein, L. B. Speir, D. C. Moyer, C. Seigfried, H. C. Hendrickson, James Sheakley; secretary, Eugene Gillespie.

1874—Burgess, A. D. Gillespie; council, John J. Hutcheson, Frank Bennett, D. C. Moyer, C. Seigfried, B. Henlein, L. B. Speir; secretary, Eugene Gillespie.

1875—Burgess, A. D. Gillespie; council, S. P. Johnston, W. A. Vaughn, L. B. Speir, B. Henlein, J. J. Hutcheson, Frank Bennett; secretary, A. F. Henlein.

SCHOOLS.

In 1802 a small log school-house was built on the farm of John Speir, about one mile west of Greenville, in which Mr. Speir opened a school. The venerable Jacob Loutzenhiser, ninety-two years old, now lives on the place. This is believed to have been the first school-house erected and opened in this part of the county. William Scott taught in it about 1826. The history of the schools of Greenville proper is traceable to the efforts of James Rodgers, who taught a small grammar school in 1824. Dr. H. D. La. Cossitt and William Scott contributed toward the building of a small frame school building, which answered for school purposes for several years. Samuel Webster, of New Hampshire, came in 1825, and became a prominent teacher in Greenville, continuing in that capacity for a number of years. Rev. John Gamble, concerning whom something is said in the sketch of Jamestown borough, was an early teacher in the place. He left a strong impression upon the people. Among his pupils were two sons-in-law of the eloquent Mercer attorney, Samuel B. Foster, viz.: William M. Stephenson and Samuel Griffith, both prominent educators and attorneys. They were both teachers in Greenville in the early days. The former, as will be seen by reference to the sketch of Mercer, was principal of the Mercer Academy, and the principal agent in founding the Mercer public school system. The latter, still living, has been both an educator and an attorney. Besides, he represented his district in Congress. Hon. John A. Bingham, late Minister to Japan, likewise taught at Greenville.

Greenville Academy, established largely through the agency of James R. Wick, became for a time a popular institution, and served its purpose in fostering an educational spirit in the community. The school was incorporated July 1, 1848. It erected a two-story frame structure of two rooms, which stood on Shenango Street. It was converted into two dwelling houses, now the property of William McDowell, of Greenville, and Harlan Book, of Butler County, Penn.

Before the erection of the present Union school building, on east Main Street, the schools of Greenville consisted of two rooms on the east side and two on the west side, presided over by four lady teachers. Early in 1865 the fine Union school building on east Main Street was commenced, and pushed toward completion through that and the following year; but it was not until 1867-68 that it was entirely finished, its total cost being about $25,000. It is a brick structure, 60x74, three stories in height, and contains eleven rooms. In 1878 the west side building was erected, likewise made of brick, containing eight rooms, at a cost of some $10,000. It is pleasantly located, and is used at present as the High-school building.

The Union school system was established in Greenville in 1867, by the selection of Prof. E. C. McClintock as principal, July 20 of that year. He reorganized the schools, and served until March, 1868. His successors, with dates of appointment, are as follows: Profs. C. C. Donnell, March, 1868; J. W. Walker, 1870; D. McKee, 1872; Thomas B. Roth, 1875; Jerome Leech, 1876; F. M. Bullock, 1880, and John E. Morris, the present incumbent, 1887.

The officers of the school board since 1865 have been as follows:

1865—Samuel Goodwin, president; T. M. Reznor, secretary; A. L. Wick, treasurer.

1866-67 and 1868—William Achre, president; T. M. Reznor, secretary; A. L. Wick, treasurer.

1869-70—Philip Clover, president; T. M. Reznor, secretary; A. L. Wick, treasurer.

1871—William Achre, president; T. M. Reznor, secretary; A. L. Wick, treasurer.

1872—William Achre, president; J. A. Leech, secretary; A. L. Wick, treasurer.

1873—T. M. Reznor, president; J. A. Leech, secretary; A. L. Wick, treasurer.

1874—J. C. Brown, president; J. A. Leech, secretary; W. H. Beil, treasurer.

1875-76-77-78—J. C. Brown, president; D. McKee, secretary; W. H. Beil, treasurer.

1879—J. C. Brown, president; D. Hum, secretary; W. H. Beil, treasurer.

1880-81—J. T. Blair, president; D. Hum, secretary; W. H. Beil, treasurer.

1882—E. S. Templeton, president; D. Hum, secretary; W. H. Beil, treasurer.

1883—H. M. Hamblin, president; D. Hum, secretary; W. H. Beil, treasurer.

1884—J. E. Brockway, president; D. Hum, secretary; W. H. Beil, treasurer.

1885-86—A. F. Henlein, president; D. Hum, secretary; W. H. Beil, treasurer.

1887—Rev. C. S. Tinker, president; Anson T. Clark, secretary; W. H. Beil, treasurer.

1888—J. C. Brown, president; Anson T. Clark, secretary; W. H. Beil, treasurer.

The general progress of the Greenville schools during the past thirty years has been highly satisfactory, and it is very doubtful if any other town of its size in Pennsylvania furnishes superior facilities to its youth for a thorough common school education. The present enrollment is about 950, and the average attendance 100 less.

Thiel College owes its existence remotely to a bequest for benevolent purposes made in 1865 by Mr. A. L. Thiel, of Pittsburgh, Penn. The sum, $5,500, was placed in the hands of Rev. W. A. Passavant, to be used for some benevolent purpose connected with the cause of Christianity. It was accepted, and the following year was invested in some lands and buildings which had been devoted to a water cure at Phillipsburg, Beaver Co., Penn. An institution of learning, known as "Thiel Hall," was in operation at Phillipsburg for several years under the direction of Revs. E. T. Giese, H. E. Jacobs, W. Kopps and others. In October, 1869, Mr. Thiel offered to the Pittsburgh Synod of the Lutheran Church, held at Greensburg, Westmoreland County, the entire property known as "Thiel Hall" on two very liberal conditions, which were intended to secure for the denomination an institution of learning of a high order. The gift was accepted, and accordingly put under church control.

In the early part of 1870 the people of Greenville made to the board of trustees a very flattering offer as an inducement to have the enlarged institution located in their midst. The proposition included the gift of seven acres of land as a site, and a bonus of $20,000. The offer was accepted, and the institution was transferred from Phillipsburg to Greenville, the opening exercises at the latter place occurring in the academy building on the 1st of September, 1871. Mr. Thiel, prior to his death, which occurred on February 16, 1870, had made some additional bequests to the institution. The college grounds were afterward increased by seven acres, donated by Dr. D. B. Packard; one acre by Samuel Ridgeway, and the balance by purchase from Mr. Ridgeway.

The first of the college buildings, known as "Greenville Hall," out of compliment to the liberality of the citizens of Greenville, was erected in 1872-74. The corner-stone of the structure was laid August 15, 1872, with suitable ceremonies, appropriate addresses being made by A. D. Gillespie, Esq., Hon. James Sheakley, Rev. G. A. Wenzel, Hon. M. C. Trout and Hon. Samuel Griffith. The regular address was made by Rev. W. A. Passavant, of Pittsburgh, who gave the history of the institution. The structure, made of brick, three stories in height, 53x76, and containing thirty-three rooms, was erected by T. E. Heilman, of Greenville, for $22,649.79, of which amount the citizens of Greenville paid $14,307. The architects were Gries & Weile, of Cleveland, Ohio. The building committee consisted of Revs. H. W. Roth and J. B. Fox, and Dr. G. D. Kughler, A. D. Gillespie and Dr. D. B. Packard. The dedicatory services were held on June 25, 1874, addresses being delivered by Rev. J. G. Pfuhl and Prof. H. E. Jacobs. The services were under the direction of Prof. H. W. Roth, Prof. H. E. Jacobs and Rev. W. A. Passavant. Until the completion of "Greenville Hall," in June, 1874, the old academy building, and afterward three rooms in the union school building, were used.

Memorial Hall was commenced in 1885, the laying of the corner-stone taking place on June 25, of that year, Rev. J. A. Kunkleman, D. D., performing the ceremony. It was completed and dedicated with appropriate ceremonies November 10, 1886. It is a substantial three-story brick structure, and was erected at a total cost of about $8,000. This building contains the chapel and the recitation and society halls, and is quite a convenient addition to the original college building.

Thiel College has a good equipment and a fine library, and affords the regular college course. The usual attendance is over 100 students. Rev. H. W. Roth, at first connected with the institution in the capacity of an instructor, was chosen president in August, 1875, and filled that position with commendable credit until the close of 1887, when he resigned, and removed to Chicago, Ill. The board has recently chosen Rev. William A. Beates as his successor. The other members of the faculty are Rev. David McKee, professor of mathematics; Rev. Josiah R. Titsel, professor of Greek, and Rev. Herman Gilbert, professor emeritus of German. Prof. McKee has been connected with the college since its inception, Prof. Gilbert since 1872, and Prof. Titsel since June, 1874. The following instructors are also connected with the college: Rev. H. K. Shanor, A. M., principal of the academic department; S. H. Miller, A. M., instructor in natural sciences; Rev. William Rehrig, instructor in the German language, and Miss Julia Ackerman, musical instructor. The duties of the Latin chair are distributed among the members of the faculty. Thiel College is a great advantage to Mercer County, but more especially to Greenville, as it furnishes her ambitious youth an opportunity of obtaining a first-class collegiate course without leaving home. Its most enterprising citizens fully appreciate this blessing, and while proud of its past history, are also sanguine of the future prosperity of this local home of learning.

CHURCHES.

United Presbyterian Church.—The origin of this congregation, the oldest in the town, dates back to the first of the present century. In the year 1800 the Chartiers Presbytery, under whose charge were placed all congregations and vacancies west of the Alleghenies, was formed by a division of the Associate Synod of North America. In the year following it began its work of caring for the scattered flocks of its faith by sending Rev. Daniel McLean into the Shenango Valley to minister unto them. In this work he visited Mercer and Crawford Counties, and succeeded in effecting an organization of the Presbyterian and Associate families that were settled to some numbers in a region of country lying near the Shenango River, on Sandy Creek, known as the "Big Vacancy." The union of the two beliefs was brought about by the followers of the former, who were in the majority, agreeing that the first suitable candidate for pastor, be he of either denomination, should be chosen. This choice fell upon Rev. McLean, who began his labors on the 1st of January, 1802, and who was paid therefor the annual sum of £135 of Pennsylvania currency. Of the members of this congregation, the following were afterward added to the Greenville Church: David Beatty, Hugh Brown, Francis Mossman and Robert Bean. These members organized themselves into a separate congregation sometime in 1802, and, three years later, by petition to the Presbytery, received one-half of Rev. McLean's time, the remainder being devoted to the Shenango flock. His first preaching in what is now Greenville was held in a private house, known familiarly as Shank's Tavern, located on the west bank of the Shenango, on Main Street. It is said a tent was afterward put up, and occupied until the first regular building, a log hut, situated on the present site of the old United Presbyterian Cemetery, was erected. The latter was followed by a more commodious frame, which stood on the site of the present church, on ground donated by William Scott. It was, however, so poorly constructed and devoid of beauty that it was torn down in 1844. Rev. McLean severed his connection with the Greenville congregation in May, 1840, after having ministered to their spiritual wants for thirty-eight years. His labors had been richly successful, for at his departure he left a flourishing flock of 179 members. He was succeeded by his son, Rev. D. H. A. McLean, who, in May, 1841, received and accepted a call from the congregations of Greenville and Mercer. Four years later the presbytery relieved him of the Mercer charge, and he thereafter devoted his time entirely to Greenville, holding occasional services in some of the outlying villages. His relations terminated in 1852, having built up the church membership to 235. During his pastorate, also, the old frame church gave place to a new brick, erected in 1844, at a cost of $3,000. Rev. W. C. Jackson, the third pastor of the congregation, was installed in February, 1854, and remained in charge until June, 1861. Nothing of special incident occurred during the time of his stay beyond the union of the Associate and Associate Reformed Churches of the United States, which was effected at Pittsburgh May 26, 1858, and the excitement and consequent fervor of religious endeavor growing out of the anti-slavery agitation, in which Rev. Jackson was not silent. The fourth regular minister was Rev. James H. Tedford, who remained a little over three years. He was released in the fall of 1865, the membership having decreased during his stay to 140 by the formation of new congregations in neighboring villages. On the 1st of July, 1866, the congregation was placed in charge of Rev. J. R. Brittain, who was installed by Rev. Joseph H. Pressly, D. D., in the following September. His ministry, which lasted until February 26, 1888, was the culmination of the church's growth and development. During it the present building, a convenient brick, was erected, at a cost of $18,000, and dedicated in April, 1868. During it the membership has been increased to 300, the Sunday-school has grown to enroll a membership equal to that of the church, and prosperity has marked the progress of the congregation. Rev. J. C. Scouller succeeded to the pastorate in September, 1888.

Following is the roll of session as far as it could be obtained: David McKnight, David White, Alexander Hunter, James McConnell, James Calvin, Samuel Latta, J. W. Brown, David Brackin, William Melvin, Hugh Nelson, Thompson Wier, Adam Thompson, William Dickey, Robert Dickey, McClure Cowan, James W. Linn, Alexander P. Waugh, Robert Calvin, John Donaldson, John S. White, James Say, Benjamin Wiley, John Davidson, J. M. Bean, James C. Brown, J. G. McFate, M. J. McElhaney, Andrew Davis, John M. Linn and Abner Bean. The present elders are Robert Dickey, Sr., Benjamin Wiley, James Say, J. M. Bean, James C. Brown, J. G. McFate, John Davidson, M. J. McElhaney, Andrew Davis, John M. Linn and Abner Bean. The board of trustees are A. R. Davis, S. R. Cochran, John Phillips, J. M. Linn and Abner Bean. Connected with the church is a prosperous Sunday-school of about 300 pupils, under the superintendency of Hon. James C. Brown, whose grandfather, Hugh Brown, was one of the organizers of the Seceder Church.

The Presbyterian Church was organized in 1825, with a membership of thirty-one. Robert Mann and Samuel Webster were elected ruling elders. For a few years it was connected with the old Salem Church, on the Mercer road, the two forming a pastoral charge. From the existing records of the church it appears that the following named members were the pioneers of this organization: Robert Mann, Mary Mann, Samuel Webster, Susannah Webster, Polly Christy, Annie Robinson, Polly Robinson, Martha Lyon, Margaret Williamson, Eliza Latimer, Lydia Cossitt, Elizabeth Haver, Catherine Haver, Jane Hastings, Adam Wier, Mary Ann Wier, Mary Woods, Rebecca Woods, William Woods, Polly Potter, Susannah Potter, Elizabeth Bean, Lettie Bean, William Stinson, Martha Stinson, Jane Brown, Rachael Porter, Rebecca Alexander, John McLaughlin, Lavina McLaughlin and Hannah Robinson. The first services of the new congregation were held in private houses, then in a log structure, which was erected in 1830, and used by the Methodists of the community. In 1833 a brick building somewhat smaller than the present one, was erected on the present site, and served for over sixteen years, when it became unsafe, and was torn down, after which the present edifice was begun. The latter has been remodeled once (in 1870), and has also undergone several repairs. Following is a list of the pastors of the congregation since its inception: Revs. James Alexander, 1828-34; James G. Wilson, 1836-42; Henry Webber, 1843-44; L. W. Williams (supply), 1845-47; James H. Callen, 1848-52; David Grier, 1854-59; A. C. Junkin, 1862-67; J. E. Wright, 1869-74; B. C. Critchlow, 1875-81; O. V. Stewart, 1881-87, and the present pastor, Rev. C. B. Wakefield, installed in 1887. Several other ministers filled the pulpit as supplies during the periods when there was no regular pastor. The following persons filled the office of ruling elder since the organization of the church: Robert Mann, 1825-53; Samuel Webster, 1825-32; George Lodge, 1831-54; James Waugh, 1837-46; John B. Plumer, 1837-54; Robert Bean, 1837-46; William Sutton, 1849-53; G. E.

Lashell, 1849-61; John Wiley, 1855-74; G. A. Bittenbanner, 1855-88; B. F. Baskin, 1855-59; Samuel Wilson, 1843-44; Joseph Pearce, 1843-59; Thomas M. Reznor, 1860-88; Henry Moore, 1860-63; John W. Stinson, 1864-66; William Fruit, 1865-66; Jacob Miller, 1865-74; S. M. Ross, 1868-75; Chambers Templeton, 1871-88; John Love, 1871-88; James Williamson, 1876-88; M. Dawson Moore, 1876-82; John A. Beatty, January, 1876-July, 1876; J. E. Brockway, 1885-88, and W. T. Alan, 1885-88. The present elders are: George A. Bittenbanner (not acting), Thomas M. Reznor, Chambers Templeton, John Love, James Williamson, J. E. Brockway and W. T. Alan. It is estimated that 1,100 names have been enrolled on the list of membership since the organization. The present membership is 325. A flourishing Sunday-school is connected with the church, with about 265 pupils and teachers. J. E. Brockway is superintendent, and E. S. Templeton and A. T. Alan, assistants.

Methodist Episcopal Church.—The first class of this denomination in Greenville was organized in 1828, in a frame building on the west side, where the "red front" now stands. There were just seven members in this class: John Nelson, Lilly Nelson, Jane Nelson, John Keck, Mary Ann Keck, Father Fisher and Catherine Nelson, who afterward married John McMillen. The class was supplied by numerous itinerants from the Mercer and Salem Circuits until 1837, when Rev. J. R. Locke was appointed by the Erie Conference to take charge of Greenville, and served through 1837-38. From 1839 to 1841 Greenville and Clarksville were united as one charge, and served successively by Revs. Keller, Crum, Vanhorn, Bassett, Plimpton and Sibley. In 1842-43 Rev. Thomas Stubbs was pastor of the Greenville flock, which appears as a separate charge; but in 1844 it seems to have been again united with Clarksville, with Revs. J. R. Lock and H. Winans as preachers. In 1845 they were succeeded by Revs. J. McLean and J. W. Klock; 1846, Revs. McLean and H. Luce; 1847-48, Revs. B. S. Hill and W. M. Bear. In 1849 the Greenville charge was once more permitted to stand alone, with Rev. G. L. Little as pastor. From that time forward the congregation has remained independent of any other, and has been under the ministry of the following pastors, in the order named: Rev. J. R. Locke, 1850; Rev. A. Hall, 1851; Rev. E. Jones, 1852; Rev. J. D. Norton, 1853-54; Rev. G. W. Chesbro, 1855; Rev. John Graham, 1856-57; Rev. J. H. Tagg, 1858-59; Rev. J. Whiteley, 1860; Rev. D. M. Rodgers, 1861; Rev. A. J. Merchant, 1862-64; Rev. W. P. Bignell, 1865-67; Rev. John O'Neal, 1868-70; Rev. J. Lytle, 1871; Rev. O. G. McIntire, 1872-74; Rev. J. C. Schofield, 1875-77; Rev. F. H. Beck, 1878; Rev. R. M. Warren, 1879-81; Rev. J. N. Fradenburg, 1882; Rev. John Peate, 1883; Rev. J. W. Blaisdell, 1884-87; and the present pastor, Rev. H. E. Johnson, who began his ministry in the latter half of 1887.

In 1830 the society removed from their temporary place of worship on the west side to a log church, 35x45, which they built on the site of the present structure. Worship was conducted in this building until 1840, when a frame edifice, yet standing, was placed in its stead. This latter building was used until 1863, when it was enlarged and repaired, in which improved condition it served as a place of worship until February 9, 1885, when the new structure was dedicated by Rev. I. C. Pershing, of Pittsburgh, Penn. Ground was broken for this building March 25, 1884, and the corner-stone laid May 30, following. It is a substantial brick, and cost $22,500. A fine pipe organ has recently been put in, and many other improvements made since the main structure was completed. The present membership of the congregation is over 600, and connected therewith is the largest Sunday-school in Mercer County, with an enrollment of about 500 pupils and teachers. G. B. Chase is superintendent, and Philip Clover, assistant superintendent. The school has a library of 432 volumes. This congregation is in a highly prosperous condition, and under the vigorous pastorate of Dr. Johnson has had a very rapid growth.

The Congregational Church was organized in 1840. On the 5th of October, 1841, a meeting was held "in the school-house near Mr. Townsend's, and, after prayer by Rev. William Bliss, voted and chose George W. Hunstable clerk pro tem. After due deliberation, on account of their former clerk having left this section of country, and not being able to find any records of the church, the members were reorganized." So reads the old minute book of a congregation that was once vigorous with active Christian endeavor. The dust of years has almost blotted its quill-traced characters. Of the original congregation organized by Rev. Barras the following is a list, comprising those who afterward joined the organized body: Timothy Dumars, William Dumars, Isaac R. Bearce, Owen N. Rice, John Keck and John Babbitt. The first deacons were G. W. Hunstable and Timothy Dumars. The first regular pastor was Rev. J. J. Bliss, who continued until July 1, 1843. In the early records mention is made of a meeting held in the Presbyterian Church January 20, 1842, at which time a building committee, consisting of William Waugh, G. W. Hunstable, James Kendall, Owen N. Rice and A. A. Heath, was appointed to take measures toward the erection of a house of worship. No report is recorded, but notice is made of regular church meetings having been held in the public school-house, in the Presbyterian and in the Methodist Episcopal Churches. But the committee, it seems, was not idle, as it is chronicled in the minute book that "on the 16th of February, 1843, the new frame church on Clinton Street (now used by the Protestant Episcopal congregation) was dedicated by Rev. Keep, of Hartford, Ohio. James M. Power was one of the principal contributors toward its erection. The records are now quite fragmentary. In April, 1843, the congregation was removed from connection with the Ashtabula Association, and attached to the Western Pennsylvania Association. On the 8th of July, the same year, Rev. L. B. Beach was chosen pastor of the congregation, but was evidently unsatisfactory, as he remained no longer than October 7, 1843. He was succeeded by Rev. D. C. Sterry, who continued in charge one year. An intermission then occurred for nearly three years, during which none but occasional services, usually presided over by Rev. Penfield, were held. On May 23 Rev. L. L. Radcliffe was placed in charge, and was succeeded by Rev. D. B. Barker, who began his ministry September 30, 1848. For thirteen years thereafter no minutes were kept. The last record of the Greenville Congregational Church states that a "meeting was held May 21, 1863, at the house of J. K. Hamblin, at which time it was determined to dispose of the property of the congregation," which was done May 30, 1863, to Rev. H. F. Hartman, who purchased the building in behalf of the Reformed Church.

St. Michael's Catholic Church.—This congregation had its inception in 1838, when a missionary priest, sent out by the bishop of Philadelphia, made a tour of Northwestern Pennsylvania, and, among other places, celebrated mass at the house of Bryan McNally, in Greenville. Mr. McNally was a native of Ireland, and for a time served in the British army, but immigrated to the United States, located in Meadville, Penn., where he was married, and in March, 1830, removed to Greenville, where he took up his residence near the southwest corner of Main and Race Streets. He was a tailor by trade, and was the pioneer of that occupation in the village. In 1837 he erected the frame residence on Race Street in which he died, and where two of his children yet reside. It was in this structure that the first Catholic service in this portion of the county was held. Besides Mr. McNally there were present at this service John and Ferdinand Schmidt, Martin Lindeman, John O'Hara, John McCoy and John G. Hoffman, all of whom had previously settled in the county. Of these the Schmidt brothers were of German parentage, and were attracted to Greenville by employment offered on the canal; Mr. Hoffman, also a native of Germany, immigrated in 1837, and came to this place to do blacksmith work for the canal constructors, while O'Hara and McCoy were Irishmen, the latter being a contractor upon the canal. The Catholic families scattered over the northeastern portion of the State afterward received occasional visits from missionaries sent out by the bishop to minister to their spiritual wants. In the summer of 1842 Rev. Hugh Gallagher, of Loretta, Cambria Co., Penn., followed the path of the canal on one of these visits, and celebrated mass in Mr. McNally's home. Besides some of those previously mentioned there were present at this service Mark and Bridget Doyle, Patrick and Ann Doyle, and James Doyle, all of whom lived in Trumbull County, Ohio, but afterward settled in West Salem Township, Mercer County; Richard, John and Patrick Marly, of Greene Township; John Savage and Mrs. Schoonmaker, all of whom were natives of Ireland except the last one mentioned. Father Gallagher, who died in California a few years ago, returned to Greenville at intervals for over a year, and was succeeded by Rev. John Reed, of Pittsburgh, who ministered to the little flock for a number of years following. The services conducted by both were frequently held in the houses of Ferdinand Schmidt and Mrs. Schoonmaker. During the ministrations of Father Reed several families were added to the congregation, among the number being Michael Mitchell, a native of Ireland, and family, Michael and Matthias Schumacher and wives, Bernard George and father, Nicholas Rommelfangen and family, Leonard Sauers, Christopher Frum and Theodore Kirk, all except the first being of German origin.

The necessity of a church now became apparent. Upon Father Reed devolved the task of selecting the site. He encountered considerable opposition from property owners, who were averse to selling land for the purpose of locating a Catholic structure, but he overcame this by a clever stratagem. Two parishioners, John and Ferdinand Schmidt, who were then laboring in the blast furnaces, purchased the desired land for the ostensible purpose of erecting private residences thereon, and when it was secured they promptly turned it over to the congregation. The building, a part of the present edifice, was erected in 1848. The committee that superintended its erection consisted of John McCoy, John Savage, John O'Hara, Ferdinand Schmidt and Matthias and Michael Schumacher, the last mentioned subsequently giving place to John Schmidt. In the same year the structure was sufficiently enclosed to hold services therein, and in the following year was dedicated by Father Reed as "St. Michael's Church." Following Rev. Reed in the ministry came Revs. M. J. Mitchell, August, 1850-51; T. A. Smith, October, 1851-53; C. M. Sheehan, March, 1854, to May, 1854; Peter M. Garvey, May, 1854, to August, 1854; Arthur McConnell (the first resident priest), September, 1854, to September, 1856; J. Reiser, September, 1856, to December, 1856; J. J. Gallagher, July, 1857, to March, 1858; Andrew Schweiger, March, 1858-59; Joseph Gobbels, 1859-61; F. J. Hartman, 1861-64; John J. O'Keefe, 1864 to February, 1866; Kiearn O'Branigan, March, 1866, to September, 1868; Thomas Tracy, October, 1868, to July, 1876, and the present pastor, Bernard Donohue, who began his labors in July, 1876. The lots on which the pastor's residence stands were purchased by Father O'Branigan, and a story-and-a-half frame building built thereon. The ground north of the church had been in use for burial purposes since 1848, and during Father O'Branigan's pastorate the present cemetery, in rear of the church, was secured from Eugene Rooney, Esq. The latter had purchased the land from the mother superior of a Cleveland, Ohio, convent, to which institution it had been willed by William C. Daly, of the Mercer congregation. The addition to the church, including the belfry and bell, was made during Father Tracy's pastorate, the choir gallery having been also built at that time. Under the present pastor many additions and improvements have been made to the church property, and the congregation has enjoyed both spiritual and material prosperity. The cemetery has been enlarged, the membership has grown until it now numbers over 500 souls, and a flourishing Sunday-school of 100 pupils has been maintained.

First Baptist Church.—In the winter of 1847–48 Rev. Jeremiah Hazen, of Sheakleyville, began preaching in the old academy building in Greenville to a few adherents of the Baptist faith residing in Greenville and immediate vicinity, among whom were Ransallear Heath and wife, George Hubbard, wife and mother, Mrs. Turner, Miss Porter and the Leet family. During the summer of 1848 Rev. Hazen took preliminary steps toward the erection of a house of worship, and succeeded so far as to secure a subscription of several hundred dollars and considerable building material. The building committee were Rev. Hazen, George Hubbard and Ransallear Heath, who let the contract for the erection of the frame work to a Mr. Dumars. Before the erection of the frame Mr. Heath returned to Sheakleyville, and the work was abandoned. No further effort was made toward erecting the building till the winter of 1851, when, at the urgent solicitation of contributors, Rev. Nimrod Burwell, of West Salem Township, took an active interest in the project, organized a conference in Greenville, and invited Rev. Hazen to return. That gentleman consented, and in the summer of 1852 work on the structure was resumed, and the frame put up. The following autumn Mr. Hazen found it necessary to confine his efforts to the Sheakleyville charge, and suggested to the conference the desirability of their obtaining Elder Burwell's services. The conference, acting on this advice, extended a call to Mr. Burwell, which he accepted. In December, 1852, Rev. Burwell took up his residence in Greenville, and began the prosecution of his labors. In the three years that he had charge of this church Mr. Burwell completed the building, except plastering the interior, and by vigorous and judicious management he paid for the work as it progressed, leaving no debt for his successor to pay, but considerable material to finish the interior. During the erection of the church, outside of the members of the conference, the following persons assisted Mr. Burwell by contributing labor and material: Col. Andrew Christy, David Loutzenhiser, John Speir, Dr. D. B. Packard, Samuel Goodwin and others. In November, 1855, Mr. Burwell resigned the pastorate, and for some time there was no resident minister till the coming of Rev. Demas L. Clouse in 1857.

The church was reorganized June 24, 1857. The first members of the new society were: Joseph Partridge, Bethany Partridge, Friend Cook, Emeline Cook, F. H. Leet (M. D.), Mary Leet, Susannah Leet, Elizabeth Pyatt, Miranda Hardy, Catherine Tunison, A. R. Heath, Marilla Heath, Robert Everett, Mary Ann Everett, William Emery, Lyda Emery, Samuel Godshall, Sidney Godshall, Mary Ann Godshall, Esther Ann Godshall. The first officers were: Trustees, Joseph Partridge, Friend Cook and Robert Everett; treasurer, Joseph Partridge; church clerk, Sidney Godshall; deacons, Friend Cook and William Emery. The dedication of the church edifice occurred February 17, 1858, the program consisting, so the records say, of the following exercises: Elder H. Steedman preached the sermon; Elder Godshall read the Scriptures, and Elders M. C. Hendrew and Jacob Morris offered prayer. The building is a neat frame structure, and, with the lot on which it stands, cost over $3,000. On January 12, 1878, a schism occurred which threatened, for a time, the integrity of the church. A portion of the congregation withdrew, crossed the Shenango, and organized the Tabernacle Baptist Church. This society was kept up until July 9, 1881, when it decided to abandon the idea of maintaining a separate organization, and returned to the parent church in a body. Following is a complete list of its pastors, with time of service: Revs. Demas L. Clouse, January, 1858, to March, 1863; Winham Kidder, December, 1863, to November, 1865; R. L. Fuller, April, 1866, to December, 1866; J. M. Perry, May, 1867, to December, 1870; John Owens, November, 1871, to March, 1873; J. T. Griffith, June, 1876, to September, 1877; W. W. Wilgus, September, 1878, to May, 1879; E. F. Crane, January, 1880, to August, 1880, and C. S. Tinker, the present pastor, who began his labors in October, 1880. The total number of members who have joined since the church's reorganization is 465; present membership, 233. Connected with the church is a Sunday-school, of which the pastor is superintendent, with an enrollment of 225 pupils and teachers.

Zion Reformed Church was organized January 27, 1861. The organization was perfected through the efforts of Rev. Henry F. Hartman, who continued with the new congregation until the winter of 1864-65, by the election of Daniel Saul, Sr., as elder, and Aaron Saul and John Kern as deacons. The first building used by the newly organized flock is still standing, a frame one, now owned and occupied by the Episcopalians. It was originally a Congregational church, but was purchased by the Reformed congregation in May, 1863, and repaired, and used until February, 1886. The first members of the church were John Kern, John Kyle, Mrs. Kyle, Mr. Enterline, Mrs. Enterline, William Saul, Miss Sallie Saul, John H. Beachler, Miss Mary Snyder, Henry Snyder, Mrs. George Snyder, Marietta Ash, Julia Loch, William Miller, Josiah Garber, Mariah Hottel, Stephen Hecker, Mrs. Hecker, Miss Hecker, Mrs. Elizabeth Hartman, Rose Miller, Aaron Saul, Daniel Saul, Mrs. Beachler, J. W. Snyder, George Snyder, Edwin Ash, Jeremiah Loch, Elizabeth Gaiser, Susanna Miller, Catherine Garber, Mrs. Everett. At the close of 1864 nearly all of these had removed or fallen from membership. In the spring of 1865 the classis of St. Paul's detached the Greenville congregation from the Shenango charge, and established it as a separate mission. Since that period the succession of pastors has been: Revs. C. R. Dieffenbacher, April, 1865, to April, 1878; F. B. Hahn, June, 1878, to September, 1884, and the present pastor, S. H. Eisenberg, who took charge December 1, 1884. January 1, 1885, the contract for a new building was let, and February 14, 1886, the present imposing edifice of brick was first occupied by the Sunday-school classes. The building was completed and consecrated with imposing ceremonies September 4, 1887. The property of the congregation is valued at $20,000. As an instance of the church's growth, it might be mentioned that on the 1st of April, 1865, there were sixteen communicant members; on the 1st of December, 1884, there were 198 members in good standing, while the present membership numbers over 300. There has always been a Sunday-school connected with the congregation, which April 1, 1865, numbered five pupils. It now enrolls about 200. Its superintendent is Rev. Eisenberg, and the assistant is Charles T. Meacham.

Church of the Holy Trinity.—This congregation, although dating its history as an organization no further back than 1865, had really one anterior to that period. For a number of years previous, as a settlement of Germans gradually clustered about Greenville and spread out into the surrounding country, there came to the believers of Lutheran faith a longing for collective worship. In 1826 Rev. Michael Kuchler, one of the pioneer Lutheran ministers of Shenango Valley, began holding regular services in Mercer County, though for several years prior to that date he had been engaged in giving religious instruction. From that time until the permanent organization of the Greenville congregation, he conducted worship in various portions of the valley with untiring zeal. His preaching was always done in the German language. The first step toward the establishment of a permanent congregation was taken by Rev. William F. Ullery, a traveling missionary of the Pittsburgh synod, who made a visit to Greenville in October, 1863, for the purpose of reporting the spiritual condition of the members of the Lutheran faith in the village to the general synod. On his recommendation a mission was established in 1864. The first service occurred on Christmas day, and was held in the old academy building. Exercises were maintained at intervals during the following winter; and on the 14th of March, 1865, a meeting was held to take measures for the erection of a church. The mission had been composed of Germans alone. Accordingly, on the 15th of April, 1865, the English Lutherans of the vicinity met and formed themselves into a regular organization. A union was shortly afterward effected upon condition that occasional services should be held in the German language. On the 25th of April, 1865, a building committee, comprising Chas. Bortz, George Voltz and Rev. M. Kuchler, was appointed to secure funds for erecting the new house of worship, and Dr. G. D. Kughler was chosen treasurer of the building fund, and Rev. W. F. Ullery, collector. Meantime, the old academy building served the congregation as a place of worship until May, when the Baptist Church was secured and occupied during the succeeding winter. On the 23d of September, 1865, the corner-stone of the present commodious brick structure was laid with imposing ceremonies, English and German sermons being preached by Revs. G. A. Wentzel and W. A. Passavant. The church, however, was not ready for occupancy until January, 1867, and was not dedicated until October 13, same year, when the edifice was consecrated by Rev. S. Laird of Pittsburgh, Penn. The first elders of the congregation were Conrad Bittenbanner and Joseph Weber, while the first deacons were Daniel Phillips and Charles Bortz. Rev. Ullery remained with the church until 1875. He was succeeded by Rev. H. W. Roth, who served till the coming of Rev. J. Fishburn, February 23, 1879. The latter was released March 25, 1883. Rev. H. W. Roth served as provisional pastor until September, 1883, when the present minister, Rev. Dr. J. A. Kunkleman, was installed by Rev. E. Belfour, D. D. Connected with the congregation is a Sunday-school enrolling 160 pupils, of which Prof. S. H. Miller is superintendent, and T. E. Heilman, assistant. The congregation embraces a membership of over 200 communicants, and as a whole is in a flourishing condition.

St. Clements Protestant Episcopal Church was organized by Bishop John B. Kerfoot, of Pittsburgh, Penn., in November, 1866. He was assisted by the Rev. M. Bilbsby, who held occasional services for the new congregation. The first regular minister was Rev. Henry Fitch, at one time residing in New Haven, Conn., who removed to Meadville, Penn., and was placed in charge of the congregations of Townville and Greenville. During his ministry worship was held in Packard's Hall, but during the pastorate of his successor, Rev. Samuel B. Moore, in 1866 and 1867, one of the rooms of the new public school building was fitted up and used. Subsequent to Rev. Moore's departure a lapse of several years occurred, during which no services were held. The next pastor in charge was Rev. D. F. Hutchinson, of Canada, who conducted services in Bond's Hall, on Canal street, in the room now occupied by the Shenango Valley News. By him the name of the church was changed to "St. Paul's Protestant Episcopal Church," an alteration which was never legalized, however. Succeeding him came Rev. Alonzo Diller, who remained but a few months, and the Rev. Rogers, who continued for a few Sundays only. Under these two services were held in the old Reformed Church building on Clinton Street, which had been secured by the congregation in February, 1883. Since that time only occasional services have been held, by Rev. Charles A. Bragdon, of Pittsburgh, Penn. The first vestry of the church was composed of John R. Packard, James R. Burchfield, George G. Stage, S. L. Hendrickson, Dr. D. B. Packard and W. R. Fessler.

CEMETERIES.

The pioneer burial ground of the borough was the old grave-yard, on the west side, attached to the Seceder Church, and familiarly known as the U. P. Cemetery. This old ground contains the dust of many of the prominent early settlers of Mercer County, and was started before the organization of the Seceder Church, in 1802, whose first place of worship, a log building, stood upon a part of these grounds. Here lie the remains of the following: John Richardson, died March 18, 1805, in his fifty-third year, and wife Nancy, who died in 1848 in her ninety-sixth year; John Moreland, died in 1823, aged eighty-four, and wife Letitia, in 1838, aged ninety-six; Mrs. Jane Dumars, died March 7, 1811, aged thirty-nine, and Alex. Dumars, May 25, 1854, aged eighty-four; John Ferguson, Sr., died in 1842, in his eighty-eighth year, and wife Jane, in 1853, aged seventy-nine; David White, died in 1848, in his seventy-ninth year, and wife Margaret, in 1853, aged seventy-seven; Hugh Brown, died November 25, 1845, aged eighty-three, and wife Sarah, June 15, 1838, aged sixty-eight; Adam Thompson, died in 1849, aged seventy-four, and wife Elizabeth, in 1872, in her eighty-third year; William McClimans, died in 1825, aged sixty-one, and wife Mary, in 1854, aged eighty-four; William Scott, died April 9, 1849; Hugh McGill, a Revolutionary soldier, died in 1850, aged ninety-seven; William Moreland, died in 1850, aged seventy-five, and wife Jane, in 1857, aged seventy-eight; James Campbell, died in 1850, aged ninety-seven, and wife Margaret, in 1851, aged ninety-one; Isaac Moreland, died in 1851, in his eightieth year, and wife Lillias in 1845, aged eighty; John Stephenson, died in 1851, aged seventy-three; Adam Hill, died in 1852, aged sixty-eight; Squire John Ferguson, died in 1857, in his seventy-first year, and wife Rachel, the same year, aged sixty-five; Thomas Bole, died in 1858, in his seventy-eighth year, and wife Margaret, in 1859, aged seventy-two; William McClurg, died in 1858 in his eighty-second year, and wife Margaret, in 1849, aged sixty-three; Joseph McClurg, died in 1864, aged 90, and wife Mary in 1852, aged seventy-four; John Snodgrass, died in 1863 in his seventy-first year, and wife Ann, in 1874, aged sixty-six; Samuel Long, died in 1863 in his eighty-fourth year, and wife Catherine, in 1846, aged sixty-two; Joseph Long, died in 1863, aged eighty-six, and wife Mary in 1868, in her eighty-first year; Andrew Chestnut, died in 1867, aged ninety, and wife Mary, in 1854, in her fifty-seventh year; also Thomas Listen, John and Mary Latta, and many others over whose graves no stones remain to furnish even the brief record of their names. In looking over this list one is forcibly struck by the ripe old age attained by most of these pioneer fathers and mothers, and cannot but conclude that their simple, industrious lives, and their pure surroundings, were conducive to longevity.

The Presbyterians and Methodists of the village had separate burial grounds. The former opened a grave-yard about the time their church was organized (1825) north of the present building, and extending to the Little Shenango. The Methodist ground was where the present church stands, and was established about one year after the society was organized, perhaps as early as 1830. Both of these grounds were used until Shenango Valley Cemetery was opened, when they were gradually abandoned, and the dead finally removed to the new cemetery.

In 1848 the Catholics opened a cemetery near their church, erected that year. Before that time they had taken their dead to the "Mercer Settlement," but since 1848 the Catholics of this portion of the county have used St. Michael's Cemetery. Considerable land has been added to the original purchase by Fathers O'Branigan and Donohoe, and St. Michael's is indeed a very suitable resting place for those who have "fallen asleep in the Lord."

The Shenango Valley Cemetery, of Greenville, is the most beautiful home of the dead in Mercer County. Its inception is attributed largely to the enterprise and liberality of two of Greenville's prominent citizens, James R. Wick, deceased, and William Achre, now a resident of California. The incorporation occurred July 22, 1864, under the name of the "Shenango Valley Cemetery Association." The incorporators were James R. Wick, Samuel P. Johnston, John Keck, James C. Brown, William Achre, Jacob Loutzenhiser, William Waugh, W. P. Leech, Charles Hoge, Samuel Goodwin and Dr. D. B. Packard. The first corps of officers consisted of Samuel P. Johnston, president; George A. Bittenbanner, secretary, and John Keck, treasurer. James A. Leech, late of New Lebanon, surveyed and platted the grounds, which were bought at a cost of some $2,000 of Samuel Goodwin and Robert Dicky. The tract embraces about twenty-two acres of undulating land, pleasantly situated so as to command a good view of the surrounding country. It is finely laid out and scrupulously kept. Much of the success of the association in beautifying its grounds and putting the business upon a sound financial basis is attributable to Marvin Loomis, who held for a long time the position of superintendent of grounds, and also to the present efficient superintendent, H. N. Shrom.

SECRET AND OTHER SOCIETIES.

Alhambra Lodge No. 293, I. O. O. F., was instituted January 31, 1848, at which time the following officers were installed: Charles R. Bell, N. G.; William Buck, V. G.; John T. Ray, Sec.; David Garber, Asst. Sec.; T. P. Boyd, Treas. The early records of the lodge have been lost, and no list of its charter members is known to be in existence. The present membership of the lodge is 104. It meets every Thursday evening in the I. O. O. F. hall, in Bortz Block, on Main Street. The lodge is in a prosperous condition, having, in addition to paying sick and funeral benefits and other expenses, furnished a hall at an expense of $1,500. It has also a permanent investment of over $3,000.

Eureka Lodge No. 290, F. & A. M., the second oldest and, perhaps, the most influential secret order in the city, was organized on the afternoon of the 12th of September, 1854, in the upper room of the building now owned by John R. Packard. The first officers were Dr. John T. Ray, W. M.; B. F. Baskin, S. W.; J. Ross Mills, J. W., and James Mills, Treas. In addition to the above there were among the charter members R. E. Breiner, David Garber and R. P. Crawford. In the evening of the day of institution another meeting was held, and Isaac R. Bearce, Henry Austin and A. McLean White were admitted and passed all degrees by dispensation. Of the charter members all are dead except Mr. White, who resides in Meadville. The lodge has had a varied history. Its first meetings were held in the Packard building, but shortly afterward were removed to Henlein's Block, which was entirely destroyed by fire on the 28th of August, 1874, together with all the records and papers of the lodge. Then the Odd Fellows' Hall was used, after which meetings were held in Goodwin's Block, and, lastly, in the present richly finished and furnished quarters in Masonic Hall, corner of Main and Mercer Streets, on the first and third Mondays of each month.

Mound Chapter No. 212, R. A. M., was instituted November 28, 1866. Its charter members were Henry Austin, James R. Burchfield, Beriah E. Mossman, George D. Kughler, H. N. Shrom, Thomas B. Hoover, Henry M. Hamblin, H. C. Hendrickson and J. R. Hubbard. Its first officers comprised Henry Austin, M. E. H. P.; H. C. Hendrickson, K.; B. E. Mossman, Scribe; H. N. Shrom, Treas., and H. M. Hamblin, Sec. Its membership is fifty-nine. Meetings are held in the Masonic Hall, corner of Main and Mercer Streets, on the fourth Monday of each month.

Greenville Lodge No. 64, A. O. U. W., was instituted November 25, 1873, with the following named charter members: W. J. Cummings, A. J. Zahniser, R. Emerick, I. Leech, W. C. Ferguson, J. L. Smoyer, J. J. Donahue, J. Welk, M. Hamill, J. T. Evans, W. H. Dunn, John Bloodhart, Jr., J. S. Chapman, F. Hammor, B. E. Mossman, W. G. Taylor, W. T. Sample, T. McClimans, John E. Sankey, George R. Scott, W. H. Clift, W. C. Flemming, A. Pifley. The present membership is ninety-six. Only four deaths have occurred in its ranks since organization, three of which were original members, and the fourth a member who had joined by card. Averaging the annual membership for fifteen years at fifty, would make $11,000, the total amount paid in. Meetings are held every Tuesday evening in Masonic Block, corner of Main and Mercer Streets.

Excelsior Legion No. 11, Select Knights, A. O. U. W., was organized January 2, 1884, with the following as charter members: William McMillen, H. V. Powell, H. Book, W. H. Clift, A. Hildebrand, J. B. Richards, John Bloodhart, Jr., W. C. Ferguson, A. D. Walker, W. H. Miller and W. H. Miles. The present membership is thirty. Meetings are held on the first and third Monday evenings of each month in the A. O. U. W. Hall, Masonic Block, corner of Main and Mercer Streets.

Apollo Lodge No. 966, K. of H., was instituted March 20, 1878, by S. A. Hughes and Mr. McCarnes, with the following named charter members: A. E. Achre, J. T. Blair, Alexander Bright, George H. Brown, C. Davidson, J. W. Fruit, Aaron Fell, S. L. Hendrickson, W. P. Leech, L. D. Leech, R. J. McDonald, F. H. Oliphant, Jr., J. S. Price, W. J. Lohr, D. P. Packard, W. J. Sutton, John H. Waugh, N. Beck, J. R. Artherholt, W. Beatty, E. T. Beatty, J. F. Carmichael, W. W. Davis, W. H. Findley, W. B. Henry, H. C. Hooper, James Loutzenhiser, William McMillen, B. E. Mossman, John B. Osgood, I. D. Stinson, J. N. Whiteman, William Paden, R. Turan, H. E. Camp, H. N. Shrom, J. P. Beatty. Its first officers were J. N. Whiteman, Dictator; William McMillen, V. D.; J. S. Price, A. D.; William Paden, Chaplain; D. P. Packard, Guide; E. T. Beatty, Treasurer; W. J. Lohr, F. R.; John B. Osgood, R.; J. P. Beatty, Guardian; Robert J. McDonald, Sentinel; J. T. Blair, Alexander Bright and A. E. Achre, Board of Trustees. The lodge meets every second and fourth Friday of each month in Apollo Hall. It has a membership of forty-two.

Blair Council No. 21, R. T. of T., was instituted December 27, 1878, with the following charter members: E. C. Thompson, Daniel Whiteman, L. B. Speir, Robert J. McDonald, John E. Hull, David Crowell, George H. Hotham, J. T. Carmichael, J. T. Blair, W. C. E. Martin, Charles R. Wray, G. W. Carskadden, Mrs. M. E. Peate, Mrs. M. J. Hull, Mrs. Hannah Thompson. The first officers were Charles R. Wray, S. C.; R. J. McDonald, V. C.; E. C. Thompson, P. C.; G. W. Carskadden, Sec.; L. B. Speir, Treas.; Daniel Whiteman, Chap.; David Crowell, Herald; Mrs. Hannah Thompson, Guard; George H. Hotham, Sent.; W. C. E. Martin, Med. Ex.; Trustees, J. T. Blair, W. C. E. Martin and, J. T. Carmichael. The present membership of the council in good standing is sixty-five. Since the institution of the order only eight have died, their families receiving over $14,000 in benefits. Meetings are held on the second and fourth Tuesday of each month in Alhambra Hall, Main Street.

Branch No. 7, Catholic Mutual Benefit Association, was instituted in December, 1878, by C. B. Freedman, of Titusville, Penn., who was induced to come by Michael Hamill, a member of the first branch instituted in the State. The first officers were M. Hamill, Pres.; P. Jones, Treas.; P. M. Ryan, Rec. Sec.; James Kerr, Fin. Sec.; M. O'Day, Jr., First V. P.; John O'Brien, Second V. P.; Thomas Aheran, Chancellor; M. O'Day, Sr., Guard, and M. Hawkins, Marshal. The branch now contains over thirty members. The insurance is $2,000. Meetings are held on the first and third Thursday of each month in Johnston's Block.

Equitable Aid Union, No. 356, was instituted the 20th of August, 1881, with the following named charter members: D. P. Packard, William A. Taft, Mrs. J. H. McCafferty, Henry Austin, Edward McMannus, Burton Adsit, John Likens, Dr. G. D. Kughler, J. T. Blair, D. H. Ford, Mrs. William Beatty, I. W. Jones, Mrs. D. P. Packard, Mrs. L. A. Carmichael, John E. Sankey, J. E. Millhouse, J. R. Bean, J. P. Dickey, J. W. Koonce, Mrs. J. W. Koonce, I. D. Stinson, Mrs. William A. Taft, William McMillen, John Beatty, William Beatty, Mrs. John Beatty, Mrs. William McMillen, Dr. B. E. Mossman, Charles R. Wray, William McDowell, Mrs. William McDowell, Mrs. B. E. Mossman, T. P. Garber, N. R. Beck, Mrs. N. R. Beck, Albert Fiske, Mrs. Albert Fiske, L. B. Speir, Mrs. L. B. Speir, Peter Durst, G. G. Stage, C. R. Beatty, Mrs. C. R. Beatty, Mrs. G. G. Stage, H. N. Shrom, Mrs. H. N. Shrom, Abbie Gangaware, Charles L. Dilley, J. T. Harney, Joseph Partridge, Mrs. Joseph Partridge, Jacob Burghart, Adam Miller, Mrs. N. Block, Ella C. Beatty, W. H. H. Dumars, Mrs. W. H. H. Dumars, T. H. Linnell, Mrs. T. H. Linnell, F. W. Looser, Mrs. William McDowell, A. R. Davis, W. W. Sankey, Mrs. W. W. Sankey, Mrs. I. D. Stinson, J. H. McCafferty, Mrs. L. D. Brown, Peter Saal, I. D. Keck, Mrs. Priscilla F. Peck, Frank Keck, A. Hildebrand, Mrs. A. Hildebrand, Mrs. Dr. G. D. Kughler, Mrs. Charles Wray, Mrs. John Likens, Mrs. D. H. Ford, Stanley W. Brown, Mrs. Stanley W. Brown, B. A. Higley, Mrs. B. A. Higley, James L. McCray, Mrs. James L. McCray, Jack McCray, A. T. Kreps, Mrs. A. T. Kreps, Mrs. Florilla Kreps, H. V. Powell, Mrs. H. V. Powell. The first officers were: D. P. Packard, Chancellor; I. D. Stinson, Advocate; William A. Taft, President; Mrs. William A. Taft, Vice-President; Mrs. J. H. McCafferty, Auxiliary; William McMillen, Secretary; Henry Austin, Treasurer and John Beatty, Acct. The first meetings of the union were held in the Knights of Honor hall. After a time the I. O. O. F. hall was occupied. The meetings are now held in the A. O. W. W. hall in the Masonic Block, corner of Main and Mercer Streets. The present membership is forty-two, and only four deaths have occurred since the organization of the society.

The Woman's Christian Temperance Union was organized on the 18th of December, 1883, with Mrs. Charles R. Wray, president; Miss Mary Dumars, secretary, and Mrs. Mercy Finley, treasurer. The work of the new organization, imperfect and crude at first, has been systematized until at the last county convention of the unions, the Greenville union was credited with having accomplished one-third of the total evangelistic and temperance work of the county. A room has been recently rented over Wagner & Kamerer's store, and in this a library, containing standard temperance and miscellaneous periodical literature, is already placed. It is intended to make this a leading feature of the work hereafter. The present membership is 140.

Sergt. J. C. Dickey Post, No. 433, Department of Pennsylvania, G. A. R., was organized April 23, 1884. It was named in honor of Sergt. J. C. Dickey, who was born in Pittsburgh, Penn., January 2, 1839. His parents were Robert and Matilda Dickey, the former still a resident of Greenville. Several years prior to entering the service he attended Wilmington College, but the breaking out of the Rebellion brought him to the field, and on August 29, 1862, he enlisted in Company G, One Hundred and Forty-fifth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers. While on duty he participated in the battles of Antietam, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Gettysburg, Culpeper Court House, Mine Run, Wilderness, Spottsylvania Court House, Cold Harbor, Petersburg, Deep Bottom (two engagements), Weldon R. R., besides numerous skirmishes. In the encounter at Weldon R. R., August 22, 1864, he was captured by the enemy and confined in Salisbury prison, where he died February 2, 1865, from starvation and exposure. The charter members of the post were: E. C. Thompson, Plimpton Leech, W. H. H. Dumars, Isaac Keck, D. D. Kreps, W. A. Keck, J. E. Brown, Curtis Arnold, John Love, G. O. Keck, W. A. Kreps, John Bacher, A. L. Koser, H. Reagle, John W. Woods, J. T. Loutzenhiser, E. F. Bennett, J. E. Brockway, J. C. Campbell, J. H. Morford, W. F. Harpst, A. T. Clark, M. D., S. H. Larmer, W. F. Braden, U. Forrest, O. A. Carlin, W. C. E. Martin, D. H. Weikel, J. R. Bean, J. B. McClimans, Abraham Sahn, D. H. Ford, Henry Roadhouse, W. H. Beil, Valentine Beaver, Harmon Miller, E. Hawks, James R. Snyder, H. H. Boies, A. Hildebrand, S. C. Dickey, William W. Washburn, Theodore Betts, J. G. Nunemaker, William Amon. The first officers were: W. H. Beil, P. C.; J. C. Campbell, S. V. C.; E. C. Thompson, J. V. C.; W. A. Kreps, O. D.; E. F. Bennett, O. G.; J. E. Brockway, Chap.; A. L. Koser, Q. M.; Dr. W. C. E. Martin, Surg.; O. A. Carlin, Adjt.; J. R. Bean, Sergt. Maj.; H. H. Boies, Q. M. Sergt.; Trustees, A. T. Clark, W. A. Keck and A. Hildebrand. The first meetings of the post were held in the A. O. U. W. Hall, but subsequently, in the I. O. O. F. Hall. A room was then secured in the Merchants Block, corner of Main and Mercer Streets, and a G. A. R. hall fitted up, in which the meetings were held till recently, when they sold out and rented a furnished hall in the Masonic Block.

Custer Lodge No. 469, K. of P., was organized September 24, 1884, with the following named charter members: G. W. Rector, Jerry Haskins, W. A. Kremm, W. J. Christman, J. M. Saul, H. J. Bishop, J. T. Harvey, H. V. Powell, H. Rudkin, E. Beil, C. E. Greenawalt, S. Gravatt, George Aldenderfer, August Deifenderfer, L. F. Deifenderfer, Marcus Deifenderfer, J. B. McClimans, G. F. Shaeffer, J. A. Donaldson, F. H. Gaiser, A. T. Clark, C. Rice, J. B. Heilman, William Miller, C. J. Strachen, J. B. Kyle, Augustus Sieger, W. A. Clift, M. G. Van Wagner, M. B. France, M. G. Fritz, R. C. McClure, Andrew Blair, W. A. Steckel, B. F. Huber, C. V. Huber, E. Bellows, William McKinley, Joseph McGrath, Louis Grim, J. A. Heilman, V. Beaver, A. Huber, W. S. Steel. The first officers of the lodge were: A. Huber, P. C.; C. J. Strachen, C. C.; G. W. Rector, V. C.; M. Deifenderfer, Prel.; A. Blair, K. of R. and S.; B. F. Huber, M. of E.; R. C. McClure, M. of F.; J. Haskins, M. of A.; H. J. Bishop, I. G.; V. Beaver, O. G. The first meetings were held in the Haurigauri Hall, but are now held in the Opera Block, corner of Race and Main Streets. The membership of the lodge is at present seventy-five.

General Vincent Camp No. 179, S. of V., U. S. A., was organized March 17, 1887. Its charter members were: F. H. Keller, J. W. Leonard, A. W. Woodward, W. F. Heilman, G. R. Reagle, T. C. Roberts, A. P. McClure, F. D. Brown, C. F. Kidd, R. F. Campbell, John J. Kreps, A. G. Beaver, J. A. Boord, A. M. Woodward, J. C. Kemp, R. W. Brown, Miles Reagle, W. D. Christy, Frank Wright, A. W. Roberts, Charles Ort, Till Reiss, W. J. Rodgers. The following were chosen officers at the first election: F. H. Keller, captain; J. W. Leonard, first lieutenant; T. C. Roberts, second lieutenant; J. A. Bond, chaplain; R. W. Brown, first sergeant; John J. Kreps, quartermaster sergeant; J. C. Kemp, sergeant of the guard; C. F. Kidd, color sergeant; Frank Wright, chief musician; R. F. Campbell, corporal of the guard; A. P. McClure, camp guard; W. F. Heilman, ticket guard; camp council, J. A. Boord, Till Reiss and A. W. Woodward. Meetings are held on the first and third Friday evenings of each month in the S. of V. Hall, Commercial Block, corner of Main and Mercer Streets.

Greenville Circle No. 18, P. H. C., was organized August 14, 1887, with the following officers: James Heilman, past president; Rev. R. H. Eisenberg, president; James Madge, vice-president; Henry Garrett, guardian; Rev. George Brown, chaplain; C. Van Tine, recorder; Mrs. N. M. Dumars, accountant; John H. Martin, treasurer; F. M. McCoy, guide; Miss Nelson, commander; Mrs. James Madge, porter. The membership is ninety-four. Meetings are held on the second and fourth Monday of each month in the A. O. U. W. Hall.

Midnight Ruling No. 36, F. M. C., was instituted in 1887. The charter members are: George Aldenderfer, J. R. Baxter, J. A. Clark, George Draves, M. H. Fetzer, W. A. Kremm, J. B. McClimans, B. E. Mossman, I. D. Morse, Ed. McMannus, J. B. Richards, D. A. Smith, Lyman B. Speir, W. A. Washburn, J. H. Baker, F. M. Bullock, John P. Derr, W. S. Davis, T. P. Garber, J. D. Madge, C. L. Meacham, G. W. Miller, Thomas McMillen, M. L. Osterhout, J. M. Roland, R. E. Thorn, J. O. Wasser, M. L. Hengist.

MANUFACTURES.

The first mill erected in the vicinity of Greenville, the saw and grist-mills of John Williamson, constructed in 1799 and 1800, was a log structure. In 1825 a frame 30x40 feet in dimensions was built in its place. This stood until 1840, when it was torn down by the digging of the canal. Grist was brought from fifteen to twenty miles on wagons and sleds, a dozen families often joining and sending their grain by some neighbor. It is related that the business of the mill was so brisk that farmers were frequently compelled to wait two whole days for their turn. The price charged was one bushel for every ten ground. The original mill of Williamson remained in his possession until January 7, 1806, when it was purchased by Jacob Loutzenhiser, by whom its business was directed until his death in 1821. The sons of the latter, especially David, continued its operation until the building of the canal necessitated its removal. In 1851 they rebuilt near the site of the demolished structure, and continued the milling business until 1864, when they were bought out by Stinson & Reznor. The latter firm met with the misfortune of having their building destroyed by a fire that occurred in 1867. Immediately afterward the present structure, known as the "Old White Mill," was built and fitted out with five run of stone, and with machinery capable of producing 100 barrels of flour daily. On the death of Mr. Stinson in 1867, and the admission of William Achre, the firm became Stinson, Reznor & Co. Since 1884 the mill has been idle, its dam having been broken down, and the newer process of manufacturing flour having rendered its machinery obsolete.

The City Flouring Mills, owned and operated by Mathers Bros., stand on the site of the original log grist-mill erected in 1815 by Jacob Loutzenhiser. The latter conducted it till his death, in 1821, when his executors disposed of the property, together with the tract of land upon which the main business portion of Greenville stands, to Joseph Keck. The mill was kept in active operation by Mr. Keck till 1828 or 1829 when he failed in business, and the property was sold at sheriff's sale, and bid in by Jacob Loutzenhiser, Jr. In the fall of 1829 it was purchased by Andrew Campbell, who replaced the old log mill by a frame structure in 1832 or 1833. He ran the new mill some four or five years, when he got into difficulty with the canal authorities about the water-power, and sold out to Ezekiel Sankey. After about one year's experience the latter disposed of it to Matthias McDowell and F. R. Sill. This firm operated it till 1841, when the late James Mathers obtained an interest, but did not remain long in the business. It afterward passed through numerous changes, Messrs. Irvin, James C. Brown and James Mathers, George A. Bittenbanner and Achre & Co., all having been connected with it. In 1870 it again came into possession of Mr. Mathers, who controlled the business up to his death, in February, 1888, since which event his sons James F. and Mead P. have carried it on. The frame mill was burned down in August, 1880, and in the fall of the same year the present brick building was erected. It was furnished with the old grinding process, but in 1882 the Odell roller process was put in. In 1885 the building was enlarged and remodeled, and the capacity of the mill largely increased, its daily output being now 150 barrels of first-class flour.

The Pacific Flouring Mills, familiarly known as the "Evans Mill," were erected by Samuel Goodwin in 1865. Mr. Goodwin was a native of Maine, and came to Greenville in 1831. In 1843 he purchased the machinery and land belonging to John Christy and Owen N. Rice, who had dammed the Little Shenango about 1832, and erected on the north bank a carding, fulling and grist-mill shortly afterward. His son-in-law, Clark Evans, succeeded Mr. Goodwin in operating the mill, and after the death of Mr. Evans it was carried on by his widow till January, 1888, when she sold it to Davis & Wiley, who now conduct it.

Robert G. Mossman was one of the earliest manufacturers of the town. Prior to 1820 he established a chair and cabinet factory on the west side, which he carried on several years. He was also engaged for a time in operating a tan-yard. In 1834-35 he erected a grist-mill and furniture factory at the east end of the bridge, on the north side of Main Street, and constructed a dam across the Shenango just above the bridge. It was known as the "little grist-mill," to distinguish it from the larger one then operated by Andrew Campbell. William Laird purchased an interest in the business in 1835. They soon after established a woolen mill on the opposite side of the street, and, taking John M. Graham into partnership, placed him in charge of that factory. In 1836 Mr. Mossman was elected sheriff of Mercer County, and soon afterward sold out to Mr. Laird, who added thereto a saw-mill. In 1838 Laird disposed of the property, and it was operated as a furniture factory until the business ran out as unprofitable. The building was afterward used for various purposes, and finally burned, which fate also overtook the woolen factory on the opposite side of the street.

Vaughn's Carriage Works.—The establishment of W. A. Vaughn & Son, the oldest carriage works in the city, was opened by the senior member of the firm, W. A. Vaughn, in June, 1847, across the street from its present site. The business, as may be supposed, was small at starting, and the buildings cheap and simple. In the spring of 1850 he put up a shop where he now carries on business. The present works were erected in 1873, and consist of a brick warehouse, two stories in height, 60x28 feet; a blacksmith shop, two stories, 65x32 feet; a painting and finishing shop, two stories, 60x32 feet, and a wood-working department, two stories, 24x18 feet. The specialties of the firm are carriages, track-sulkies, road-wagons, track-wagons and break-carts, while a general repairing business is also carried on. The productions of this company, notably the Vaughn road-wagon, are used in various parts of the United States, thus giving the firm an ample market. The firm at present consists of W. A. Vaughn and his son, J. W. Vaughn.

Excelsior Carriage Works.—The first proprietor of the works from which the present establishment sprang was William McDowell, who opened in a small way a wheel-wright's business in 1844. He afterward took in Mr. Cook, and McDowell & Cook were succeeded in 1873 by the firm of Cook & Ford, who conducted a general carriage manufacturing and repairing business up to October, 1884. Mr. Ford then ran it alone until January, 1886, when the present firm, consisting of D. H. Ford and R. E. Thorn, took charge as Ford & Thorn. A two-story frame building, 60x120 feet, conveniently divided into suitable apartments, is now occupied. A large local trade is supplied with the products of the Excelsior Works, and the "Milburn wagon," for which the firm are agents.

West Side Carriage Works.—This establishment, owned by John Smoyer and Charles Frey, was first opened by a gentleman named Charles Stahr, in 1862. In 1864 his business was bought out by Moyer & Smoyer, under which name the works were run until 1880, at which time the title of the firm became Smoyer & Son. The present firm of Smoyer & Frey was formed in 1884. The products of the concern are wagons and carriages of all grades, sleighs and sulkies.

Pearce Woolen Mills.—The company that operates these mills, the Pearce Woolen Mill Co., Limited, was organized in Harmony, Penn., in 1865. The mills were conducted in that city until February, 1885, when the superior advantages offered by Greenville secured their removal to the latter place. Their products are flannels, yarns and blankets of all grades, and in the manufacture of them twenty-five workmen are employed. The motive power is supplied by an 80 horse-power boiler and a 50 horse-power engine. The building is a brick, 50x120 feet, and three stories high, erected in 1885. The secretary, treasurer and general manager of the company is Mr. John Pearce.

Greenville Planing Mill.—This establishment was opened in 1865 by McPherrin & Son, who were succeeded by the present owners, J. A. & J. B. Heilman, in May, 1879. T. E. Heilman also had an interest, which he sold to his partners in 1880. The premises now comprise an acre of ground, upon which are located the mill, the dry-kiln, the warehouse and the office. In the mill is found the latest improved machinery, which is operated by a 40 horse-power engine. The products of the firm are doors, sash, mouldings, blinds, brackets and general planed lumber, which receive a ready sale in local markets.

Hamblin, Sons & Co., manufacturers of automatic balance slide valve steam engines, circular saw-mills, head blocks, saws, brass goods, pipe and fittings, are the successors of a business enterprise that was established in March, 1838, by J. K. Hamblin and Gardner Bond, in a small frame building directly opposite the present site. It is claimed for the firm of Hamblin & Bond that they were the first foundry operators in Greenville, and one of the first in Mercer County. Their products were mainly plows and lock castings for the Erie Canal, which was then in course of construction. In 1850 the name of the firm was changed to Bond, Heath & Co., and three years later to Hamblin & Heath, under which title the enterprise was continued with varying success until 1866, when the works were destroyed by fire, with a total loss of all machinery and products. Shortly afterward, however, the business was resumed by J. K. Hamblin, who built and occupied the present quarters. March 15, 1870, by the association of Hon. Jacob F. Kreps, of Westmoreland County, Penn., and Samuel Hamblin, a member of the present firm, the title of the business became Hamblin, Kreps & Co. On the 28th of August, 1871, a reorganization took place, and the present firm, consisting of J. K. Hamblin, Samuel Hamblin, H. M. Hamblin and A. T. Kreps was formed. Since then the business of the foundry has been considerably increased, and the market now extends into several States, as far south as South Carolina, and west through Ohio. Connected with the enterprise is a general jobbing department, in which all sorts of castings are made and miscellaneous repairing done.

Hodge Manufacturing Company.—The nucleus around which the present establishment bearing this name gathered was a small shop 11x17 feet in dimensions, opened in 1876-77 by Mr. E. W. Hodge, a native of England. He began a small brass foundry, which became the Hodge Brass and Iron Foundry and Machine Shops; the business increasing, a company was formed in April, 1883, with a capital stock of $10,000, divided into 100 shares of the par value of $100 each, and composed of W. R. Field, president; P. E. McCray, secretary, and E. W. Hodge, treasurer and general manager. The works consist of a machine shop 25x40 feet, a blacksmith and engine room 20x40 feet, and a foundry 40x60 feet, in which is placed the best improved machinery, the motive power of which is furnished by a 100 horse-power boiler and a 25 horse-power engine. The products of the company, which find a ready sale in a market embracing the entire State, are railroad, rolling-mill, coal bank and saw-mill castings, sash weights, sled soles, school and farm bells and heating stoves, in addition to which repairing work is also done.

Tanneries were at one time paying institutions in Greenville, though none are now in existence. Early in the twenties George and Samuel Lodge started a tan-yard on South Third Street, west side, which they carried on several years. It was then purchased by Robert G. Mossman, and after a few years' operation turned over to James W. Christy and Joseph Walker, who took charge of it. About 1844 R. S. Huling got possession, and conducted a very successful business for many years. During the most prosperous times he turned out 1,000 hides annually.

In 1866 Hubbard & Co. started a steam tannery on the west side, near the dam, but it did not prove successful under their management. William Achre and John Allison purchased the property in 1867, and afterward leased it to John A. Dufer. It was finally burned down, and never rebuilt.

Marshall Bond ran a third tannery for some time on the east side, but it, too, was finally abandoned as an unprofitable enterprise.*

BANKS.

The first banking institution in Greenville was opened about the year 1850, by James R. Wick, who conducted a private brokerage business. In 1856 he was succeeded in this by Achre, Wick & Co., the first firm to begin a regular banking business in the county. Its members were William Achre, A. L. Wick and George A. Bittenbanner. The business was located in the second story of a building situated on the spot where the First National Bank now stands. In the year 1859 the present building of the Greenville National Bank was erected by this firm, and used by them until April, 1875, when William H. Beil and George O. Keck were admitted. William Achre purchased the interests of Mr. Bittenbanner and Mr. Wick, and the institution was chartered under the name of the "Greenville National Bank." The capital stock of the old bank had been $25,000, which was amply sufficient at the time, although a large and profitable business was carried on; but under the new name this was increased to $110,000. The first officers were William Achre, president; William H. Beil, cashier, and George O. Keck, assistant cashier. The bank at present is in good condition, having a capital stock of $90,000, a surplus of $8,000 and deposits amounting to upward of $80,000. Its business, while local, is good, and the institution is credited with the confidence of its patrons. The present officers are A. F. Henlein, president; William H. Beil, cashier, and Harry Watson, assistant cashier.

The First National Bank was chartered in 1864, under the corporate name of the First National Bank of West Greenville, and began operations with a capital stock of $60,000. One year later this was increased to $100,000, and five years thereafter to the present amount, $125,000. The prefix "West" was dropped at the same time the name of the borough was changed. The building in which the bank first commenced business was a brick structure on Main Street, the dwelling of its first president, Samuel P. Johnston. Subsequently the room occupied by Brittain & Johnston was secured, and the business of the bank was conducted therein until 1876, when the building was destroyed by fire, and the present quarters, costing $14,000, erected. The present officers of the institution are: President, Marvin Loomis, elected in 1888 to succeed Hon. William Waugh, who served from 1875; vice president, Robert S. Johnston; cashier, Calvin R. Beatty. The general history of the bank's operations has been one of gradual enlargement and growth. There have been no serious reverses, and the condition of the establishment to-day is best evidenced by the fact that it has a reserve fund of $35,000, and that its deposits amount to over $150,000. Under the name of First National Bank of Greenville it was re-chartered in 1884 for a period of twenty years.

*For iron interests see Chapter VI.

BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION, AND BOARD OF TRADE.

The Greenville Building and Loan Association was incorporated October 13, 1873, with a capital stock of $400,000, and with a purpose, as expressed in the charter, "for the accumulation of a fund by the saving of its members, to assist them individually to purchase real estate, erect houses, satisfy mortgages, or invest in such other manner as shall be most advantageous." The members of the new association were C. R. Beatty, D. C. Moyer, E. F. Bennett, Thomas C. Gibson, W. P. Leech, J. J. Hutcheson, F. Herrick, William Achre, David Hum, A. Burnett, L. L. Keck, William Waugh, H. K. Reiss, W. L. Fleming, W. A. Vaughn and William Paden. The first officers of the association were: J. J. Hutcheson, president; T. C. Gibson, vice-president; C. R. Beatty, treasurer; W. L. Fleming, secretary; directors: A. Burnett, William Achre, William Paden, D. C. Moyer, L. L. Keck, William Waugh, W. A. Vaughn, F. Herrick and David Hum. Mr. Hum became secretary in 1874, and filled that office until the association wound up its business in July, 1882.

The Board of Trade was incorporated May 31, 1887, with a purpose, as expressed in the charter, of "assisting in building up the business of the borough of Greenville in all legitimate ways, by leasing lands, drilling for gas, oil and other minerals, assisting those who may desire to locate in said borough, inviting manufacturers to locate their works in or near it," and, in general, watching over the city's commercial interests. The capital stock of the board was $4,050, divided into 162 shares of the par value of $25 each. The managers elected for the first year were: A. F. Henlein, president; R. S. Johnston, secretary and treasurer; G. G. Stage, William Paden, T. C. Gibson, James F. Mathers and E. P. Gillespie.

GAS AND WATER COMPANIES.

The Greenville Gas Company was organized in 1877, and works were built in the same year. Among the originators of the enterprise were: J. H. Miller, Frederick Girebell, Judge William Maxwell, A. L. Wick, William Achre, C. R. Beatty and others. The capital stock was $25,000. Eleven retorts were secured, and the company now has a capacity of 20,000 feet per day. Over five miles of pipe are laid, supplying nearly 300 consumers, and fifty-nine lamps furnish light to the borough. The product is coal gas, which, by the introduction of an exhaustor and condenser into the establishment, has been greatly improved in quality. The present officers of the company are: C. R. Wray, president; E. S. Templeton, secretary; H. N. Shrom, treasurer and general manager; directors: C. R. Wray, M. H. Hamlin, A. F. Henlein, Marvin Loomis, John R. Packard, H. C. Hooper and E. S. Templeton.

The Greenville Natural Gas Co. was incorporated the 6th of November, 1886, with a capital stock of $50,000, divided into 1,000 shares of the par value of $50 each. The shareholders were Peter L. Kimberly, Mary L. Packard, Edwin S. Templeton, W. P. Leech, G. B. Chase, Robert S. Henderson, John R. Packard, James W. Vaughn, Tillotson Bros., Carl Buck and John J. Hutcheson. The directors were John R. Packard, James W. Vaughn, Robert S. Henderson, Peter L. Kimberly and J. J. Hutcheson. The purpose of the company was to rent a gas privilege from the Columbia Gas Co., and thereby supply the borough with natural gas. In execution of this project the city was underlaid with pipes, and arrangements perfected for the introduction of the new fuel into Greenville homes. When the time came for the Columbia Company to fulfill its part of the contract, it was found that that company would not fulfill its contract. It was afterward absorbed by the Standard Company, which also refused to assume the obligation. Suit was brought by the Greenville Company, and this has recently been settled, but natural gas has not been obtained for the borough.

The Greenville Water Co. was incorporated the 17th of November, 1883, with a capital stock of $84,000, divided into 1,680 shares of $50 each. The stockholders were James Sheakley, J. T. Blair, A. J. Haws, A. R. Davis, Forbes Holton, Chambers Templeton and D. H. Wallace. The first directors were: J. T. Blair, A. J. Haws, Forbes Holton, James Sheakley and Chambers Templeton. The purpose of the company is to supply the borough with water. The reservoir is conveniently located about a mile east of the city, and will hold about 8,000,000 gallons of water. The water is secured from springs, and the company has four and one-half miles of mains inside the town limits and thirty-three fire plugs. S. R. Cochran is superintendent, and Thomas Stone, assistant.

LOCAL INSURANCE COMPANIES.

The Pymatuning Mutual Fire Insurance Co. was chartered February 27, 1860, with the following charter members: Nathan Morford, Jesse Fell, David Kamerer, S. M. Loveland, S. Wortman, Peter Reichard, Joseph Hause, John Adams, Charles Bortz, Peter Rickert, Jr., Daniel Bortz, Andrew Busch, W. H. Clark, Aaron Blank, F. J. Bean, Jacob Klingensmith, Abraham Ludwig, Cephas Comstock, Peter Pauly, John Durst, Robert McKean and H. George. The first president was Peter Rickert, Jr., A. Ludwig, treasurer, and David Kamerer, secretary. The latter held the secretaryship until January 21, 1887, when he was succeeded by his son, D. L. Kamerer. This company carries over $3,500,000 of insurance.

The Keystone Mutual Storm Insurance Company was chartered August 6, 1888, by D. L. Kamerer, J. A. Kunkleman, D. D., C. J. Achre, John P. Derr, S. H. North, James C. Brown, John Perkins, P. H. Doyle, Samuel Busch and Reuben Baker. The officers are: John Perkins, president; D. L. Kamerer, secretary; John P. Derr, treasurer; John Perkins, D. L. Kamerer, S. H. North, P. H. Doyle and Samuel Busch, directors. It commenced business with 262 members, and an insurance of $220,000.

FIRE DEPARTMENT AND MOST DESTRUCTIVE FIRES.

The first effort made by the borough toward organizing a fire department was in 1840, when a small engine was purchased and paid for by general subscription. An engine house was afterward built, and a few fire ladders added to the apparatus. This engine was used ten or twelve years, and finally sold in 1854. It was often manned by the leading citizens of the borough, and was no doubt a wonder to the youth of the town. Another hand engine was subsequently purchased in the fall of 1866, and up to 1880 the apparatus of the department consisted of this engine and general apparatus of hose, hooks, ladders, etc. The company, a volunteer one, numbered ninety members, who, upon the alarm of fire, would valiantly rush to the rescue of life and property, fighting the lurid element with what means they had, but, owing to the lack of hose and other apparatus, the results were very unsatisfactory. In 1880, however, the borough procured a new outfit, and the present department was accordingly organized. It, too, is a volunteer service, the chief being elected by the members of the company. The appliances of the new company consist of one Silsby steamer, 2,000 feet of improved hose and three hose carts. The fire plugs of the water works, thirty-three in number, furnish abundant water. The department is made up as follows: Chief, Plimpton Leech; first assistant chief, W. F. Braden; second assistant chief, D. F. Hum, Jr.; secretary, William A. Pearce; treasurer, J. L. Caldwell. The divisions consist of three companies, each comprising thirty men, named, respectively, D. P. Packard Hose Co., No. 1, Citizens' Hose Co., No. 2, and T. C. Gibson Hose Co., No. 3.

Destructive Fires—On Tuesday night, January 21, 1871, commencing at 12 o'clock, occurred the heaviest fire Greenville had ever encountered to that time. It began in a three-story wooden structure, Laird's Block, on Main and Race Streets. It spread along the street consuming property to the value of $44,000. The heavy losers were William Laird, $5,000; R. & A. Manheimer, $4,500; Harlan Book, $5,500; Eli Wasser, $300; S. P. Johnston, $6,000; Kasper Reichard, $1,500; Dr. David Edgar, $2,500; E. Miller, $100; William Keck, $600; John B. Smith, $300; Samuel West, $150; Benjamin Henlein, $6,000; S. W. Manheimer, $4,000; Mrs. Gilkison, $1,000; Dr. R. N. Hayes, $100; Mound Chapter A. Y. M., $800; Eureka Lodge A. Y. M., $500; Seth Hull, $2,500; A. D. Gillespie, $100; J. E. Hull & Sons, $2,000; E. Rooney, $500; W. T. Phelan, $400; E. Kyle, $100.

The fire of 1873 was the Chicago conflagration of the town. It broke out on the night of January 15, in a building the first floor of which was occupied by T. J. Brundage, and the second by the Misses Durst. It is conjectured by some that an incendiary was the cause, but the question still hangs in doubt. The burned district embraced about 300x120 feet on the south side of Main Street, and the same extent north side of Main. Everything on Main, between Canal and Mercer, except Achre, Wick & Co's. banking house, Achre & Bright's wholesale grocery and the Merchants' Block, owned by William Achre, was consumed. The total loss was thirty-five buildings, including twenty-two stores and shops, six dwellings, one hotel, one office and five barns. In addition there were some six dwellings on the second floor of business rooms. The aggregate loss was $83,000; insurance, $50,000, leaving a net loss of $33,000. The losses were distributed as follows: William Achre, wholesale grocery and Merchants' Block, $3,500; J. E. Hamlin's drug store, occupied by M. C. Roberts, $3,000; M. C. Roberts, drug stock, $1,700; W. B. Pearson, photographer, $1,700; B. Grim & Son, building and stock, $2,500; Simon Donner, building, $2,500; T. J. Brundage, stock, $4,500; Misses Durst, $800; J. & A. Stinson's building and stock, $2,000; O. A. Carlin, express agent, $700; J. H. Becker, building, $2,000; George Becker, stock, $1,000; Tillotson Bros., building and stock, $6,000; Mrs. E. Connolly, building, $2,000; Jonathan Hottle, St. Charles Hotel, $2,500; Hugh Montgomery, furniture, $2,000; Thomas Callen, building, $2,000; A. L. Wick, building, $1,000; Miss Breckenridge, building, $2,000; John Ramsey, dwelling, $100; Henry Grauel, shop, $300; Vance Stewart, $300; Breiner heirs, $1,225; Aaron Saul, stock, $208; J. C. Brown, assessor, $100; Mrs. Hoge, furniture, $800; William Weimer, building, $1,500; J. E. Millhouse, building, $2,132; Hamlin's estate, three buildings, $5,000; John Keck, building, $2,000; Philip Frederick, household goods, $300; Dr. S. M. Ross, office, $100; Henry Keck, goods, $4,000; C. Seigfried, building, $2,500; C. W. Rolls, stock, $100; Dickey & Boies, shop, $3,000; S. C. Dickey, dwelling, $2,400; S. L. Hendrickson, house, $600; J. E. Hull, $3,000; Presbyterian Church, $195; Mrs. E. Boies, house, $1,000; William McMillen, barn, $500; Dr. D. B. Packard, stable, $300; Achre, Wick & Co., banking house, $100. Besides there were other losses aggregating several thousand dollars.

Another destructive fire occurred on the 28th of August, 1874, consuming the Henlein Block, and entailing a loss of $30,000. On the 2d of April, 1875, the devouring flames consumed Batteiger's brewery and the Exchange Hotel.

The last named structure was one of the time honored and popular institutions of the place. The fire fiend seemed to be unsatisfied until he had, on the 2d of March, 1876, swept away the Greenville Woolen Mills, owned by the Tiltonson Brothers, C. R. Brown and W. J. McCray. The property was wholly destroyed. It likewise swept away the flouring-mill of James Mathers & Sons, N. C. Packard's hotel, and a dwelling belonging to William Keck's heirs.

BRIDGES.

The town is furnished with four iron bridges. The one over the Shenango, uniting East and West Greenville, was built in the fall of 1876 by the Massillon Bridge Company. It supplanted a lighter iron structure previously erected, which was found unable to bear the heavy travel, and was removed to the crossing over the Little Shenango, on the Jamestown road, near the cemetery. It is 108 feet long, with double roadways and sidewalks, and is one of the finest bridges in the county. The first bridge that spanned the Shenango at the same place was a plain country bridge, and was built early in the present century. In 1832 it was torn down, and a more substantial covered bridge commenced. Joseph Leech was the contractor, and Simon Snyder the carpenter, on the second bridge. It was one of the best wooden bridges in Mercer County, and did splendid service for thirty-two years. In 1864 it was supplanted by another wooden structure, built by Breckinridge & Co.; James C. Brown and the late James Mathers built the abutments. The old bridge was purchased and removed by Mr. Brown. Besides the iron bridge on the Jamestown road there is also one at the north end of Race Street, and another near Stinson's mill on the Meadville road, both spanning the Little Shenango.

RAILROADS.

Greenville has been for years one of the railroad centers of the county. Its main line is the Erie road, a first-class east and west trunk line. It was first a broad gauge and known as the Atlantic & Great Western. It was subsequently changed to the New York, Pennsylvania & Ohio (Nypano), then to the New York, Lake Erie & Western, and finally to its present title.

The Erie & Pittsburgh, under the control of the Pennsylvania Company, is an efficient north and south line. The Pittsburgh, Shenango & Lake Erie, formerly the Shenango & Allegheny, is also a north and south line. Until recently Greenville was its northern terminus. Under the reorganization the road has been extended from Greenville to Amasa Crossing, a station on the Jamestown & Franklin branch of the Lake Shore Road. The first passenger train from the new station on Main Street was drawn out on Monday, July 24, 1888. The extension of the road adds much to its efficiency and greatly to the convenience and satisfaction of the people, reflecting great credit upon the officials concerned in the enterprise. It is the intention of the managers to extend the road to the lake in the near future.

NAME CHANGED TO GREENVILLE.

From the time the town was first laid out by Lodge, Probst & Walker up to November 22, 1865, it bore the name of West Greenville, and during this period of more than half a century no effort was made to do away with the useless prefix. The following communication from one of Greenville's prominent citizens tells when and how the change was finally effected:

LAKEWOOD, N. Y., September 5, 1888.

R. C. BROWN, ESQ.—Dear Sir: Yours of Saturday received. When I began business in West Greenville in 1834, having moved there from Ohio, I, in common with all the citizens spoken to on the subject, were of the belief that another place in our State had the name of "Greenville P. O.," and hence the prefix to the name of our borough and post-office remained unaltered. Having carried this burdensome prefix along in the large and growing business of our town, I began to investigate, and, if possible, adopt means to cut it off. This was in the fall of 1865. In consultation with William Keck, then postmaster, we discovered that "Greenville P. O." had never been adopted by any of the several cross-roads and hamlets of that name in Indiana, Clarion, Montgomery and other counties in Eastern Pennsylvania. I carried a petition among our citizens asking the department to change the name of the post-office from "West Greenville" to "Greenville." The petition met with a unanimous and hearty endorsement, and without any red tape or delay the change was made. The time tables of the railroad at once gladly adopted the change. Thus have we saved several barrels of ink and much nerve power in doing away with an exasperating and useless prefix, and only wonder now that we were so slow in consummating this really important event in our local history. Yours truly,

JOHN R. PACKARD.

The name of the borough was, on petition, soon afterward changed, by order of the court at Mercer, from "West Greenville" to "Greenville," to harmonize with the name of the post-office.

EFFORT TO OBTAIN THE COUNTY SEAT.

No other event in the local history of the town excited a deeper or more wide-spread interest than the determined effort made by its citizens to remove the county seat from Mercer to Greenville. In fact, it aroused the people in every part of the county for and against the measure. John R. Packard, Esq., of Greenville, has kindly furnished us with the following pithy account of this important event:

"During the autumn of 1865 a number of enterprising citizens of Greenville conceived the idea of making an effort to change the county seat from Mercer to their own town. Greenville was then, as now, a railroad center of considerable importance, while Mercer, at that time, was an inland borough, without railroad or even canal communications. The Erie & Pittsburgh Railroad, passing through Greenville, traverses the entire length of the county, north and south, through the prosperous valley of Shenango, teeming with manufactures representing large wealth and a preponderance of the commerce of the county. The old Atlantic & Great Western Railroad (now the Erie), had also been completed, and the northern and eastern portion of Mercer County was then, as now, traversed by the Jamestown & Franklin Railroad, a feeder to the Erie & Pittsburgh road at Jamestown, and running only two and one-quarter miles distant from Greenville.

"With these facilities it was believed that a larger number of the citizens of the county would be accommodated doing business at the county seat, thereby justifying the proposed removal. The location of Greenville, in one corner of the county, argued against the scheme, while on the other hand its friends contended that steam quite annihilated space, and were therefore earnest and determined in forcing the conflict. Enthusiastic meetings were held at Greenville and elsewhere in the interest of the proposed change, and a considerable sum of money pledged to carry on the fight. A vigorous petition to the Legislature was prepared by a committee, of which Hon. William Waugh was chairman, reciting the advantages to the public at large by having the county seat at Greenville. Printed copies were circulated and numerous signed throughout the towns and villages friendly to the enterprise, exciting alarm and organized resistance at Mercer. John R. Packard was sent to the capital at Harrisburgh, at the opening of the Legislature, to begin the preliminary skirmish on behalf of Greenville. He met there, by appointment, the late Hon. David Derrickson, of Meadville, then a property owner at Greenville, who prepared a bill, asking the Legislature to authorize the citizens of Mercer County to vote on the proposed change of county seat.

"Discussions over the project filled the local press for several months. A new court-house was an imperative necessity, and this seemed an opportune time to secure another site, if ever. Mercer in due time waked up and began their defense with surprising emphasis. The late Hon. Arcus McDermitt and other residents of Mercer were dispatched to the capital determined to leave no stone unturned to defeat their rival. The senator from Lawrence County was appointed chairman of the committee on county seats, and after some weeks of deliberation and delay reported the bill adversely, followed swiftly by the destruction of the old court-house by fire, the smoke yet ascending from the ruins when the present fine structure was contracted for. The citizens of "the Athens of Western Pennsylvania" made an honorable defense, won the fight, and have the seat of justice permanently anchored there.

"F. H. Braggins, editor of the Greenville Argus, dramatized the incidents attending the conflagration, and the play, entitled "Burning of the Court House," introducing leading characters of Mercer in their grotesque and dubious efforts to save the building, was given on the stage in Packard Hall with great eclat."

GROWTH AND APPEARANCE.

According to the petition presented to the court in December, 1836, asking that the town be incorporated, Greenville had then a population of 495. It doubled its population in the next decade, the census of 1850 giving it 1,036 inhabitants. It only gained sixty-five in the next ten years, having 1,101 in 1860. In 1870 it had 1,848, and in 1880, 3,007, while its present estimated population is between 4,000 and 5,000. Thus it will be seen that although its growth has never been rapid the increase in population has always been substantial.

The general appearance of the borough is very prepossessing. Its streets are wide, well built and finely shaded, and it can boast of many very handsome residences. The several destructive fires that swept over the town from 1871 to 1875 have proved a blessing to it, as the clean, solid and substantial appearance of Main Street fully attests. Few towns of its size have so many modern, well-built business blocks, and such substantial church and school buildings, and its citizens have just reason to be proud of their beautiful and prosperous little borough.

CHAPTER XXI.

BOROUGH OF SHARPSVILLE—LOCATION AND POPULATION—NAME—ORIGINAL SETTLERS—EARLY MILLS—GROWTH AND PROSPERITY—MANUFACTURES—RAILROADS—INCORPORATION AND BOROUGH OFFICERS—SCHOOLS—EARLY SCHOOLS—THEIR PROGRESS AND DEVELOPMENT—CHURCHES—SOCIETIES AND ASSOCIATIONS—RIVERSIDE CEMETERY—IRON BANKING COMPANY.

THIS substantial borough is pleasantly located on the Shenango River, on the boundary between Hickory and Pymatuning Townships. Picturesque in scenery, healthful in location, thrifty in the composition of its people, the place is recognized as one of the most enterprising in the valley. Many of its dwellings would well become a city of 50,000 people, and though the census of 1880 gives the borough a population of 1,824, it has to-day about 3,000 inhabitants.

It was named in honor of James Sharp. Originally it was called Sharpsburg, but there being a village of the same name in Allegheny County, the more euphonious suffix ville supplanted the burg.

In 1798 Jonathan Dunham purchased from the commonwealth tract No. 857. He was married, in 1801, to Mary, daughter of Henry Clark, who the year previous had settled on the farm subsequently belonging to Gen. James Pierce. He had thirteen children, six sons and seven daughters, viz.: Justus, George, Clark, Azariah, Phineas and James, Margaret, Jane, Experience, Agnes, Mary Ann, Rachel and Mary. Mr. Dunham first located on what is now the Andrew Byerly place, building there a shanty of poles. He remained but a short time, when he concluded to go to the hill, where he erected a log house about twenty rods west of the residence of his son Phineas. He was a great hunter, and lived largely upon the game which was found in great abundance all about him, and which his trusty rifle was successful in bringing down at every shot.

A few years after his settlement Mr. Dunham found it necessary to erect a barn to secure his crops and animals. The structure was intended to be a double log barn. In order to put it up a "raising" was necessary, which taxed the sparsely settled neighborhood to its utmost capacity. Samuel Clark, the pioneer of Clarksville, prompted by the natural impulse that "a fellow feeling makes us wondrous kind," came to Dunham's relief. Hearing of his difficulty, he circulated among his own neighbors and secured the services of ten willing neighbors, who aided Mr. Clark to assist in raising the barn. They even went to the pains of carrying their own cooking utensils and provisions to the raising. Some of Mr. Dunham's early neighbors were Mr. Nelson, at Prichard's Corners, and Godfrey Carnes, an old Revolutionary soldier, who dwelt near the State line, distant two and one-half miles northwest. A little later, in 1832, Joseph Byerly, from Westmoreland County, settled at Prichard's Corners, where he lived until his death, in 1864. Mr. Dunham lived upon his farm until the day of his death, March 6, 1856. He held several township offices with acceptance, and was a worthy citizen in the new community.

The Dunham land was purchased by Thomas Means, who in turn sold to his son-in-law, James Sharp. The last named gentleman owned, all told, about 150 acres, lying on both sides of the river. On this land he laid out a few lots along the river and canal in the lower part of town, which became the nucleus of the future borough.

About 1820 he built a dam and log grist-mill, which he operated for several years. It was finally destroyed by floods in the river, which compelled him to make a new dam and a long race, and to erect a new grist-mill and a saw-mill where the iron bridge now stands. This occurred about 1836. Becoming financially involved, his dam, water power and mills were sold at sheriff's sale in 1847, when he left the place. Thomas A. Scott (afterward the railroad magnate), and Paul Hamilton, of Philadelphia, purchased the property, and operated it for a number of years. It was subsequently owned by Vance and Josiah Stewart, brothers; Morris & Guild, Lewis Lightner, Chambers Templeton and J. H. Miller. The last mentioned has remodeled the mill and put in a full roller process.

The substantial growth of the place dates from the advent of Gen. James Pierce, who became the presiding genius and inspiration of the community. This occurred about 1856. Antecedent to that time there were only a dozen houses that grew up around the mills. The General employed his time and means and energies in building up the place in its various industries, making it one of the most active business centers in the entire valley. Operating extensive coal mines, building and managing furnaces, projecting and completing railroads, aiding struggling industries, he gave an impetus to the productive energies of the region which have continued unabated to the present time. His work soon attracted men of means and enterprise, who pushed forward the work so ably and auspiciously begun.

Sharpstown has maintained a conspicuous position as a manufacturing center, as will be made more manifest by knowing that its shipments of freight are larger than those of any inland town in the valley. These establishments are described more particularly in Chapter VI, to which reference is made.

Railroad communication is of the best kind. The Erie & Pittsburgh, the N. Y. P. & O. (Erie), the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern, and the Baltimore & Ohio lines are all represented by branches through the place. The facilities for transportation are of the best possible kind, being greatly cheapened by the necessary competition between rival lines.

INCORPORATION AND BOROUGH OFFICERS.

Sharpstown was incorporated as a borough May 21, 1874. The first election thereafter was held June 9, 1874, resulting as follows:

1874—Burgess, J. J. Hofius; high constable, M. R. Zahniser; constable, T. O. Hazen; secretary and treasurer, C. E. Agnew; council, C. F. Eldredge, three years; G. C. Carnes, three years; S. W. Johnston, two years; Fred Patterson, two years; F. B. Pauley, one year; Dr. T. M. Brown, one year; judge of elections, J. M. Kimball; inspectors, L. D. Bumpus, Isaac Lynch; assessor, G. T. Robinson; auditors, J. T. Carmichael, W. S. Bebout and John P. Derr; school directors, Samuel Dunham, treasurer, three years; J. R. Lytle, secretary, three years; John D. Milliken, president, two years; M. A. Johnston, John W. Stanton, D. M. McMillen.

1875—Burgess, Isaac Lynch; constable, M. R. Zahniser; secretary and treasurer, C. E. Agnew; council, Henry Mertz, John W. Wick, C. F. Eldredge, G. C. Carnes, S. W. Johnston and Fred Patterson; school directors, John D. Milliken, president; J. R. Lytle, secretary; Samuel Dunham, treasurer; J. J. Pierce, Frank Allen and M. A. Johnston.

1876—Burgess, J. J. Pierce; secretary and treasurer, C. E. Agnew; council, James Milliken, Fred Patterson, Henry Mertz, C. F. Eldredge, G. C. Carnes and S. W. Johnston; school directors, J. J. Pierce, president; J. R. Lytle, secretary; Frank Pierce, treasurer; J. D. Hadley, P. J. Bartleson, Frank Allen and Samuel Dunham.

1877—Burgess, J. J. Pierce; secretary and treasurer, C. E. Agnew; council, E. W. Hawk, J. R. Willard, J. R. Milliken, L. A. Ormsby, G. D. Gibson and Isaac Lynch; school directors, J. J. Pierce, president; P. J. Bartleson, secretary; Frank Pierce, treasurer; Samuel Dunham, Frank Allen, J. D. Hadley and Dr. J. H. Twitmyer.

1878—Burgess, James R. Milliken; secretary and treasurer, C. E. Agnew; council, Ivans Rambo, Eli Hawk, F. B. Pauley, J. D. Hadley, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer and George D. Kelly; school directors, J. D. Hadley, president; P. J. Bartleson, secretary; C. E. Agnew, treasurer; C. F. Eldredge, James Mell, Samuel Dunham and Dr. J. H. Twitmyer.

1879—Burgess, Walter Pierce; secretary and treasurer, C. E. Agnew; council, S. A. Koonce, James C. Mell, A. C. Andrews, George D. Kelly, R. M. Seaton and M. A. Johnston; school directors, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer, president; P. J. Bartleson, secretary; C. E. Agnew, treasurer; Jonas J. Pierce, James Mell, C. F. Eldredge and Samuel Dunham.

1880—Burgess, George D. Kelly; secretary and treasurer, J. L. Deeter; council, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer, R. M. Seaton, G. A. Miller, C. B. Allen, Seth Hofius and Pat Cahill; school directors, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer, president; P. J. Bartleson, secretary; C. E. Agnew, treasurer; Seth Hofius, Jonas J. Pierce, C. F. Eldredge and James Mell.

1881—Burgess, George D. Kelly; secretary and treasurer, J. L. Deeter; council, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer, Robert Russell, Seth Hofius, Pat Cahill, Benjamin Reichard and Thomas Eagan; school directors, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer, president; P. J. Bartleson, secretary; C. E. Agnew, treasurer; Jonas J. Pierce, Seth Hofius, J. M. McMurray and G. C. Carnes.

1882—Burgess, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer; secretary and treasurer, J. L. Deeter; council, George D. Kelly, James B. Pierce, W. A. Lynch, J. R. Gemmill, Benjamin Reichard and A. M. Smith; school directors, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer, president; P. J. Bartleson, secretary; C. E. Agnew, treasurer; Jonas J. Pierce, G. C. Carnes, J. N. McMurray and Seth Hofius.

1883—Burgess, B. D. Palmer; secretary and treasurer, T. O. Hazen; council, J. G. Maxwell, George Miller, J. J. Hofius, Lewis Raddick, A. Roberts and E. W. Hawk; school directors, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer, president; P. J. Bartleson, secretary; C. E. Agnew, treasurer; C. F. Eldredge, Jonas J. Pierce, G. C. Carnes and J. N. McMurray.

1884—Burgess, Ivans Rambo; secretary and treasurer, J. L. Deeter; council, Isaac Lynch, F. C. Ramig, A. D. Palmer, Andrew Clark, William Reichard and A. M. Smith; school directors, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer, president; P. J. Bartleson, secretary; C. E. Agnew, treasurer; Albert Roberts, G. C. Carnes, C. F. Eldredge and Jonas J. Pierce.

1885—Burgess, De Walt Wiles; secretary and treasurer, J. L. Deeter; council, A. M. Smith, Lewis Barlett, Isaac Lynch, F. C. Fannig, A. D. Palmer and Andrew Clark; school directors, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer, president; P. J. Bartleson, secretary; C. E. Agnew, treasurer; J. J. Pierce, G. D. Devitt, C. F. Eldredge and Albert Roberts.

1886—Burgess, James C. McDowell; secretary and treasurer, J. L. Deeter; council, Daniel Carbaugh, James Harris, A. M. Smith, Lewis Barlett, Isaac Lynch and F. C. Ramig; school directors, J. J. Pierce, president; P. J. Bartleson, secretary; C. E. Agnew, treasurer; J. D. Hadley, J. H. Perry, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer and George A. Miller.

1887—Burgess, J. C. McDonald; secretary and treasurer, J. L. Deeter; council, H. P. Hoover, Michael Minnehan, Daniel Carbaugh, James Davis, A. M. Smith and Lewis Barlett.

1888—Burgess, James Blaney; secretary and treasurer, J. L. Deeter; council, Frank Miller, Edward A. Rogan, H. P. Hoover, Michael Minnehan, Daniel Carbaugh and James Harons; school directors, Walter Pierce, James R. Gemmill, J. D. Hadley, J. H. Perry, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer, George A. Miller.

SCHOOLS.

It is claimed that the first school building in the vicinity of Sharpsville was erected as early as 1820, on land belonging to Mr. Byerly. It was a log structure. At least ten years prior to that date school had been conducted by John Dunlap, an early settler, and noted Indian hunter, in a private dwelling belonging to a Mr. Hill, between Sharpsville and Sharon.

The first building for school purposes within the present borough limits was erected in 1847, by Messrs. Vincent, Himrod & McClures, then engaged in the furnace business. Its purpose at the time was to accommodate the attaches of the furnace. About 1870, Gen. Pierce bought the old building from the school district, to which it had been transferred by the proprietors, paying therefor $1,000, and donating lots on which was erected the first school building. Some difficulty existed in 1874 in securing from Hickory Township the quota of money belonging to the Sharpsville District. At the suggestion of legal counsel, the board was directed to petition the court to appoint auditors to ascertain how much money, if any, belonging to Hickory Township funds properly and justly belonged to Sharpsville. This course resulted in securing the proper division, and obtaining what was equitably due. The land on which the Sharpsville school building is located was donated to the Hickory Township school board. The building, of four rooms, was erected by the township board. Frank Allen gave the board a donation, as did also Gen. Pierce, the latter supplying the bell. All these matters were taken into account in the adjudication.

In 1876 an addition to the building was made, at a cost of $2,875, the contractor being Josiah McDowell. In 1883 a second addition was made by J. J. Hofius, at a cost of $4,385. Heating apparatus was put in the same season by Kelley & Jones, of Pittsburgh, at an expense of $1,814. The building now consists of nine school rooms, one recitation and one library room. It presents a commanding appearance. The first corps of teachers, 1874-75, embraced the following: James F. Burwell, of Linesville, at $75 per month; his assistants, John P. Derr, Anna Groves, Florence Albin, Alma Kelly and Eva Stranahan. The report of L. T. McCartney, principal, for the month ending April 6, 1888, shows an aggregate enrollment of 454, with an average attendance of 399.

CHURCHES.

The Methodist Episcopal Church is the oldest religious society in Sharpsville. The first preaching by Methodist ministers in this region was on the farm of William Fruit, whose tenant, William Hays, was a follower of the Methodist faith. This occurred about the year 1835. The place of meeting was changed shortly afterward to the house of Andrew Byerly, where services were conducted for several years. A class had been formed soon after the first preaching was heard, and this was organized into a regular society in 1836, under the supervision of Andrew Rice, the first class-leader. Mr. Rice was succeeded by Andrew Byerly and Phineas Dunham. The class when first organized belonged to the Pittsburgh Conference. The next year, the Erie Conference being formed, the class was transferred to that.

The first preachers were Ensign B. Hill and R. Peck. The circuit was known as the "Salem Circuit," and belonged to the Meadville District. In 1837 the society became one of the constituents of the "Old Clarksville Circuit," among the other preaching places of which were then Greenville, Sharon, Clarksville, Orangeville, Charlestown, Big Bend and Keel Ridge. Sharpsville remained in this circuit from 1837 to 1869, when it became a separate charge, under the pastorate of Rev. L. Wick. The first church edifice was erected in 1858, under the pastorate of Rev. R. A. Caruthers. It was a frame structure 30x40 feet in dimensions, and stood on Mercer Avenue. During the pastorate of Rev. John Perry, 1874-75, it was remodeled and enlarged. For over ten years prior to the erection of this church building the society worshipped in a school-house belonging to the first furnace established in Sharpsville. The membership of the church is 201 at present. Their condition is good. Following is a list of pastors since the establishment of the Sharpsville congregation as a separate charge, with term of the service of each: Rev. L. Wick, 1869-70; Rev. J. E. Johnson, 1870-71; Rev. J. H. Merchant, 1871-73; Rev. John Perry, 1874-75; Rev. W. H. Mossman, 1876; Rev. F. Fair, 1877-78; Rev. C. W. Darrow, 1879-81; Rev. J. A. Ward, 1882-84; Rev. S. M. Clark, 1885-86, and Rev. A. O. Stone, the present pastor, who began his ministry in 1887.

The United Brethren Church was organized in September, 1866, by Rev. H. F. Day, its first pastor, who remained in charge two years. There were thirty members at the beginning, among the number being George Tait and wife, George Fry and wife, Andrew Byerly and wife, James Barnett and wife, Johnson Patton and wife. The organization was effected in the Methodist Episcopal Church, in which exercises of worship were conducted for over two years. During the seven years that followed, the store-house of the old Erie Canal was utilized as a house of worship, occasional services being also held in private houses. The present structure, erected in 1884 at a cost of $1,500, the contract being taken by William Reichard, is a one-story frame, 28x42 feet in dimensions, and was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies June 2, 1885. In it the society has since worshiped. In addition to this there belongs to the organization a parsonage, purchased of Isaac Byerly in 1880, and since repaired, valued at $300. The congregation is in good condition, having a membership of fifty earnest workers. The first class-leader was George Tait. Following Rev. Day in the ministry came Rev. Traver, who remained two years; Rev. John Smith, one year; Rev. Casteline, one year; Rev. William Excel, one year; Rev. O. D. Cone, two years, Rev. John Williams, one year; Rev. H. F. Day, again, one year; Rev. Rufus Smith, two years; Rev. D. D. Landaw, one year; Rev. O. J. Gage, three years; Revs. J. W. Clark, J. C. Andrews, H. Bedow, William Robinson and Z. Z. Dille, each one year, and Rev. N. C. Foulk, the present pastor. The present class-leader and steward is A. J. Nickle; the trustees are James Mills, James Fisher, Philip Nickle, Harmon Jennings and A. J. Nickle.

The First Presbyterian Church of Sharpsville was organized on May 12, 1870, with twenty-eight members, by a committee of the Beaver Presbytery, consisting of William M. Taylor, J. M. Mealey and Elder James Wilson. The original members embraced Albert Lightner, Mrs. Susan Lightner, R. T. Hadley, Mrs. Louisa J. Hadley, Matthew Gemmill, Mrs. Margaret Gemmill, Mrs. Julia Kirkland, Mrs. Sarah Drumm, David Agnew, Mrs. Eliza C. Agnew, Miss Mary Agnew, David M. McMillan, Mrs. Nancy McMillan, Mrs. Martha Hobough, Thomas Carmichael, Mrs. Rebecca Carmichael, Mrs. Eliza Moore, William Fruit, Mrs. Sarah Fruit, Miss Callie Fruit, James E. McMillan, Mrs. Mary McMillan, Michael Keith, Mrs. Susannah Keith, Mrs. Melissa P. McMurray, John R. Forest, Mrs. Martha Forest and Miss Eva Keith. Services had occasionally been held at Sharpsville for a year or two previous to the organization of the congregation, Rev. Falconer, then pastor of the Sharon Church, doing the preaching. The early preaching of the congregation was done as a supply by the pastors of the churches at Sharon and Clarksville. The first regular pastors were Revs. A. B. Wilson and S. H. Wallace, both of whom served the congregation two years each. They were succeeded by the present pastor, Rev. S. L. Boston, who began his labors in 1887, and is working efficiently for the development of his people. The first eldership of the congregation consisted of David Agnew and David M. McMillan. Subsequently L. M. Ormsby, C. F. Eldredge and I. D. Hadley were chosen as additional ruling elders. The present neat and commodious frame house of worship was erected in 1882, at a cost of $4,000. The congregation enrolls at present some 115 members, and is in a fair condition. Its pastor is a young man, and believes firmly in earnest work, both on his own part and that of his people. The aggregate annual expenses are about $1,900.

The First Baptist Church was organized on June 11, 1871, in a school-house opposite the old Methodist Church, where meetings were then held by Rev. J. T. Griffith. The members who were thus formed into a separate congregation were Robert Dunham, Isaac Lynch, James H. Garrison, Joseph Byerly, John J. Hofius, John A. Porterfield, A. G. Dunham, Sarah Lynch, Elizabeth Hofius, Augusta Lightner, Mary Hofius, Alice Garrison, George Hofius. At the time of organization Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Hazen, Sophia Byerly and Mary Lynch were added by baptism. In 1872 the church building was erected on lots donated by Gen. James Pierce, at a cost of $3,000. The successive pastors of the congregation have been Revs. J. T. Griffith, April 30, 1871, to April 20, 1873; Jacob Morris, May 25, 1873, to November 1, 1874; W. P. Hile, June, 1875, to April, 1879; J. T. Bristow, May, 1879, to April, 1881; F. W. Cramer, September, 1881, to April, 1883; W. E. Feeman, June, 1883, to April, 1885, and Henry Madtes, who began his ministry June 28, 1885, and who yet serves.

St. Bartholomew Catholic Church was founded in 1872 by Rev. Thomas J. McManus, with a membership of sixty-five, nearly all of whom lived in Sharpsville and the immediate vicinity. Father McManus was a very zealous priest, and labored for a period of three years, when, through exposure in the discharge of his duties, he contracted a sickness which ended in death. Rev. William Coonan, of Wheatland, then took charge of Sharpsville, in connection with his own congregation, and he was succeeded by Rev. Bernard Lynch, also of Wheatland. It was next placed under the late Rev. K. O'Branigan, of Sharon, who assisted materially to reduce the debt during the few months he had control. Rev. Patrick Cosgrove, of Wheatland, succeeded Father O'Branigan, and labored faithfully to build up the spiritual and material interests of the congregation. In 1881 Rev. J. C. McEntee was appointed resident pastor of St. Bartholomew, and remained as such five years, during which time he did a great deal for his flock. He was succeeded by Rev. Thomas J. Clark, the present pastor, who began his labors October 1, 1885.

The first house of worship, a frame building of modest pretensions, was erected during the pastorate of Father McManus. This church, with its common board pews and temporary altar, was occupied until the beginning of Father Clark's pastorate. It was burned August 16, 1886, just after he had conceived the plan of frescoing and otherwise ornamenting it. An immediate attempt at rebuilding was begun, amid discouraging difficulties. The result of this was the erection of the present brick structure, 45x90 feet in dimensions, with a tower 120 feet in height, and nicely finished and furnished throughout the whole interior. Its seating capacity is 300, and it was fully tested at the dedication, which occurred August 12, 1887. The cost of the entire structure, with its furnishings, was $7,000. The ground on which it stands was donated by John Milliken. In addition to this the congregation owns a parsonage, built during the pastorate of Father McManus, and enlarged during Father Clark's ministry. It now presents a pleasant and comfortable appearance. St. Bartholomew's is one of the flourishing Catholic congregations of the county, and now embraces about sixty-five families. A growing Sunday-school is connected with the church, in which the children of the parish are taught the divine precepts of Christian faith.

versalism in Sharpsville were Rev. B. F. Hitchcock, of Conneautville, Penn., who preached two or three times in the winter of 1870-71, and Rev. C. L. Shipman, of Girard, Penn., who preached more or less regularly until 1875, without any particular organization, but mainly through the influence and by the efforts of Gen. James Pierce, who died in 1874. In January, 1875, a parish organization was formed in the old Pierce hall, with twenty-eight members, properly officered to carry on systematic work, and still ministered to by Rev. Shipman. These members were Nathan Morford, Mrs. Mary A. Morford, Mrs. Chloe Pierce, Mahlon Fell, Jonas J. Pierce, Walter Pierce, Frank Pierce, T. M. Ford, Mrs. Kate Pierce, Mrs. Julia A. Fell, Aaron Fell, Andrew Fell, Jesse Fell, H. Phelps, Seth Hofius, J. W. Fuller, Charles Wilson, A. C. Andrews, S. W. Johnston, A. Lamont, T. O. Hazen, Mrs. Emeline Fell, Mrs. Ursula J. Fuller, R. J. McDowell, J. L. Weaver, J. V. Lynch, Mrs. Susan Phelps, Mrs. Sarah Meacham. In February, 1876, a church organization was formed, with Rev. C. L. Shipman as pastor, and the following thirty members taken into fellowship: Jonas J. Pierce, T. O. Hazen, S. O. Morford, J. T. Oliphant, T. M. Ford, Mrs. Eva Hazen, Mrs. Mariah Lynch, Miss S. Meacham, Miss Fannie F. Ford, Mrs. Mary Wiles, Aaron Fell, S. W. Johnston, Mahlon Fell, Dewalt Wiles, Mrs. Chloe Pierce, Mrs. Ursula J. Fuller, Mrs. Emeline Fell, Miss Allie M. Fuller, Miss Emma Laux, Mrs. Mary A. Morford, A. C. Andrews, J. W. Fuller, R. J. McDowell, Nathan Morford, Mrs. Kate Pierce, Mrs. Sarah A. Johnston, Mrs. Sarah M. Oliphant, Miss Minnie Andrews, Mrs. Carrie Fuller, Mrs. Emeline J. Morford. The first church officers elected were Jonas J. Pierce, moderator; Nathan Morford and A. C. Andrews, deacons, and T. M. Ford, clerk and treasurer. In September, 1882, ground was broken and work commenced for a church building. The corner-stone was laid October 10, 1882, and the building completed and dedicated with appropriate ceremonies February 10, 1884. It fronts on Mercer Avenue, is constructed of pressed brick with stone trimmings and slate roof, forming a handsome structure, probably second to none in the county, and cost when completed $16,000, the larger part of it being donated by Mrs. Chloe Pierce, widow of the late Gen. James Pierce. She also placed in the church a fine pipe organ, the only one in Sharpsville, as a memoir to her sister, Mrs. Abida H. Boles. In 1887-88 the sons of Mrs. Chloe Pierce built a beautiful and substantial parsonage, costing about $4,000, and donated it to the church as a memorial to their mother, making the present church property one of the most complete and desirable in the county. The present official members are: Moderator, T. O. Hazen; trustees, J. J. Pierce, Aaron Fell and Frank Pierce; deacons, T. M. Ford, Dewalt Wiles and W. W. Kitch; T. M. Ford, clerk and treasurer, which office he has held since 1871. The following is a list of the successive pastors of the church, with date of their "calls": Rev. C. L. Shipman, 1876; Rev. Samuel Hough, 1877; Rev. C. L. Shipman, 1880; Rev. William A. Pratt, 1884; Rev. DeWitt Lamphear, 1885; Rev. W. S. Williams, 1887, and is the present pastor. The present church membership is forty-nine. A successful Sunday-school was organized in 1874, and is still in a flourishing condition.

Free Methodist Church.—This congregation was organized in 1885, by Rev. J. H. Bentley, although a farmer named Davis, from Prospect, Mercer County, was the first one to begin active agitation of the subject. The present structure was built in 1887, at a cost of $1,200, and is a frame, neat and convenient. The church is weak in membership, numbering only twenty-two, but the outlook is promising. Following Rev. Bentley in the pastorate came the present pastor, Rev. W. B. Roupe.

The Reformed Church was organized in July, 1887, by Rev. Sumpe, with some sixteen members, among whom were Fred Castbohm, Lewis Castbohm, Henry Castbohm, John Coffler, Charles Molston, William Reichard, Benjamin Reichard, William Swartzbeck, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer and William Graber. Meetings are held in the United Brethren Church.

SOCIETIES AND ASSOCIATIONS.

Adoniram Lodge No. 739, I. O. O. F., was instituted November 10, 1870, in the second story of Bebout's drug store, on Mercer Avenue, by D. D. G. M. J. E. Millhouse, from Greenville. The charter members were H. Buchanan, W. I. Bebout, W. S. Bebout, Thomas B. Beil, A. T. Clark, James Crawford, James A. Curry, J. T. Carmichael, Robert Dunham, Henry Jaxtheimer, George W. Deeter, Eli W. Hawk, Seth Hull, Robert Hunter, G. C. Hofius, Daniel Groscost, Martin Achre, Fred Patterson, John W. Wick, Hiram P. Ramsey and R. H. Law. The first officers were: N. G., W. S. Bebout; V. G., W. I. Bebout; secretary, Daniel Groscost; treasurer, J. W. Wick. The following have been Noble Grands: W. I. Bebout, Eli W. Hawk, Daniel Groscost, Fred Patterson, John W. Wick, George D. Hofius, Samuel Dunham, Thomas Downing, T. O. Hazen, George Moyer, A. C. Hewitt, J. H. Groscost, F. B. Pauly, W. F. Hazen, Charles H. Peters, Joshua Buck, John Williard, C. W. Rapp, A. L. Metzger, George W. Deeter, D. A. McKnight, B. A. Jones, L. M. Jaxtheimer, C. E. Stamm, Jacob Snyder, J. M. Kohn, G. M. Dull, F. C. Raning, U. S. Alderman, B. F. Sherman, C. C. Jones, J. W. Bell, Andrew J. Nickle and J. A. Sturgis. The secretaries have been Fred Patterson, J. W. Wick, George D. Hofius, Samuel Dunham, T. O. Hazen, J. H. Groscost, F. B. Cauly and Samuel Dunham, who has held the position for the past ten years. The lodge at one time owned a hall of its own in McMillan's Block, but this was destroyed by fire in 1874, since which time meetings have been held in the A. O. U. W. hall in Fisher's Block. The membership of the lodge is sixty.

Sharpsville Lodge No. 517, F. & A. M., was granted a charter September 4, 1872, and its first regular meeting was held October 21, same year. Its charter members were J. R. Lytle, George Fuller, T. M. Ford, Joseph Roys, J. J. Hofius, H. C. Harshaw, William McIntyre, Ivans Rambo, A. D. Palmer, J. J. Richards, John Gilchrist, James Gilchrist. The first officers were: W. M., James R. Lytle; S. W., Jonathan J. Hofius; J. W., Alfred D. Palmer; treasurer, George Fuller; secretary, H. C. Harshaw; S. D., James J. Richards; J. D., Theodore M. Ford; purser, William McIntyre; S. M. C., John Gilchrist; J. M. C., Joseph Roys; guide, Ivans Rambo; tyler, James Gilchrist. The succeeding presiding officers have been Ivans Rambo, J. J. Hofius, T. M. Ford, H. C. Harshaw, Thomas Downing, J. J. Richards, W. S. Bebout, J. R. Gemmill and W. W. Kitch, while the secretaries have been J. R. Lytle, George D. Hofius, W. S. Bebout and T. M. Ford. Meetings are held on the first Monday evenings of each month, in Masonic Hall, on Mercer Avenue. The membership at present numbers twenty-seven.

Sharpsville Lodge No. 71, A. O. U. W., was organized April 3, 1874, by D. D. G. M. W., E. Harvey. The first officers of the lodge were: P. M. W., B. R. Welch; M. W., Harvey Logan; Foreman, S. B. Jones; O., J. W. Wick; Rec., J. L. Deeter; Fin., T. O. Hazen; Rec., Seth Hofius. Following are the presiding officers in succession: T. O. Hazen, J. E. Swapp, J. D. Hadley, G. C. Carnes, Dr. J. H. Twitmyer, C. H. Peters, S. W. Johnston, J. R. Trout, O. Byers, T. G. Robinson, Joseph Byerly, L. H. Redrick, Edward Hecker, C. R. Frasier, H. Sandhagan, James Milne, Henry Mertz, J. R.

Gemmill, C. W. Hazen, E. W. Hawk, J. R. Rockwitt, R. D. Gill, Charles Dettman. The recorders have been J. L. Deeter, J. W. Fuller, S. W. Johnston, C. H. Peters and T. O. Hazen, who has served since 1877. Meetings are held every Tuesday evening in the A. O. U. W. Hall, in Fisher's Block. The membership of the lodge is sixty-three. There is over $200 in the treasury, and the affairs of the lodge are in a very prosperous condition.

Sharpsville Council No. 27, R. T. of T., was instituted January 22, 1879, by C. L. Fisher, Grand Lecturer of the order. The charter members were J. H. Logan, James Titus, George M. Dull, Thomas Eagan, A. C. Patton, James Hunter, Worth E. Kelly, P. J. Bartleson, S. M. Vance, L. W. Woodruff, O. H. Jessup, Leah E. Palmer, Maggie E. Hough, Mary S. Logan, Fannie E. Hopkins, Ada M. Gowdy, Lizzie Hewitt, Mary McClure, Maggie M. Bartleson, Alice M. Pierce, Phoebe Ford, Hannah Dull, Sarah A. Carnes, Sadie E. Stephenson, Eva Bolton, Lydia Young, Melinda Showers, Aggie H. Logan, Hattie M. Woodruff, Anna L. Jessup, Florence A. Albin and Lucy M. Albin. The first officers of the council were: S. C., A. D. Palmer; V. C., N. Showers; P. C., Walter Pierce; chaplain, Rev. S. Hough; R. S., L. B. McCord; F. S., T. M. Ford; treasurer, C. M. Hopkins; herald, Mrs. Sarah M. Oliphant; deputy herald, Mrs. Leah E. Palmer; guard, Mrs. U. Fuller; sentinel, Melville Oliphant; medical examiner, Dr. T. M. Brown. Since then there have been installed the following presiding officers: P. J. Bartleson, N. Showers, Samuel Hough, George M. Dull, L. W. Woodruff, T. M. Ford, O. H. Jessup, James Titus, J. W. Jackson, C. L. Truesdale, W. W. Saylor, Isaac A. Beggs and Maria Truesdale, while the secretaries have been P. J. Bartleson, recording, and Thomas Eagan, T. M. Ford and Isaac A. Beggs, financial. Meetings are held on the second and fourth Saturdays of each month in Masonic Hall. The membership at present numbers fifty, the expenses of each of which amount to about $4.00 per annum.

Sharpsville Post No. 234, G. A. R., Department of Pennsylvania, was instituted October 10, 1881, in the A. O. U. W. Hall, by J. H. Payne, of Butler County. The charter members were B. J. Outsler, C. E. Stamm, Henry Duvall, Herbert Duvall, S. C. Foster, James Buchanan, Fred Patterson, Andrew J. Sturgis, Dan Barnacle, Isaac Byerly, David A. McKnight, S. W. Johnston, G. W. Hildebrand, James Bentley, M. R. Zahniser, S. M. Vance, L. W. Woodruff, W. T. McMullen, Jonas J. Pierce, Robert Dunham, Thomas Levitt, Wesley E. Moyer, G. M. Dull, Samuel Dunham and J. J. Maisenberger. The first officers were: P. C., Samuel Dunham; S. V. C., G. M. Dull; J. V. C., Herbert Duvall; adjutant, Charles Stamm; Q. M., Fred Patterson; chaplain, Robert Dunham; O. D., M. R. Zahniser; O. G., W. E. Moyer; surgeon, Dr. S. W. Johnson. Meetings are held every Wednesday evening in Park Hall. There are at present thirty-nine members in good standing. The annual expenses of the post are about $75 per annum.

The Protected Home Circle was organized in September, 1886, by Rev. H. C. Hall, of Sharon, the supreme president. The charter members were Rev. H. Madtes, Mrs. J. D. Hadley, Gilman Miller, F. A. Jewell, Dr. J. M. Scoville, Mrs. S. W. Johnston, W. C. Hadley, J. D. Hadley, J. L. Fillman, I. A. Beggs, A. W. Smith, S. W. Johnston, D. T. Watson. The first officers were: President, J. D. Hadley; vice-president, J. L. Fillman; accountant, J. W. Smith; treasurer, Mrs. J. D. Hadley; guardian, F. A. Jewell; chaplain, Rev. H. Madtes; medical director, Dr. J. M. Scoville. Since then the presiding officer has been J. L. Fillman, and the accountant J. W. Smith. Meetings are held in the A. O. U. W. Hall, on the first and third Thursdays of each month. The members number thirty, and the circle is in good condition.

Tempo Lodge No. 163, K. of P., was organized May 4, 1887, by D. D. G. C. Thomas Perry. Its charter members were Samuel Dunham, J. E. Cole, J. H. Groscost, Calvin Hadley, Andrew Nickle, G. B. Troutman, William Hawk, H. W. Downing, Thomas Orr, J. K. Barlett, J. A. Sturgis, C. E. Stamm, John Shell, E. M. Peters, C. M. Smith, C. R. Frazier, J. J. Bennie, V. H. Dunham, W. S. McFarland, John Orr, William Peate. The presiding officers of the lodge have been C. E. Stamm, Andrew Nickle and J. E. Cole; the secretaries, C. M. Smith and J. H. Groscost. The first corps of officers in full was: P. C., Samuel Dunham; C. C., C. E. Stamm; V. C., Andrew Nickle; M. of F., F. C. Hadley; M. of Ex., H. W. Downing; K. of R. & S., C. M. Smith. Meetings are held each Wednesday evening in the A. O. U. W. Hall. The membership of the Lodge is forty, and the number is steadily increasing.

Riverside Cemetery Association was organized April 5, 1872, through the instrumentality of Gen. James Pierce, for the purpose of selecting and maintaining a suitable and decent burial place for Sharpsville and vicinity. The first members of it were James Pierce, David Agnew, Jonas J. Pierce, James H. Stokes, Isaac Lynch, J. McDowell, W. S. Bebout, R. Templeton, J. W. Wick and George D. Kelly. The grounds chosen are situated east of the borough, bordered on the north by Shenango River, on the west by the borough itself, on the south and also on the east by Hickory Township. The cemetery is a wooded hillside, and is laid out with walks and drives, forming an exceedingly attractive spot for the burial of the dead. Since the organization of the association it has been presided over by James Pierce and Jonas J. Pierce, while the secretaries have been David Agnew, T. M. Ford and Scott Pierce. Its membership is 146, and the condition of both the association and the cemetery is good.

The Iron Banking Company was established in 1873 by Gen. James Pierce & Sons, L. Hefling and J. W. Ormsby, with a capital stock of $50,000. Its first officers consisted of: President, James Pierce; cashier, L. Hefling. In 1883 it was reorganized with Frank Pierce as president, and C. E. Agnew as cashier. Nine years prior to the reorganization Gen. Pierce had died. The new firm consisted of Walter Pierce, Wallace Pierce, Frank Pierce, James B. Pierce and C. E. Agnew, its present stockholders; Frank Pierce is president, and C. E. Agnew cashier. It is a bank of deposit, and the stockholders are personally liable for the business generally, to the extent of $200,000.

IN 1849 Thomas J. Brown laid out, in Sandy Lake Township, a village which, in honor of its founder, was called Brownsville. A rapid growth occurring, the village was incorporated as a borough on August 20, 1859. The petitioners for the right of incorporation were Alexander Brown, A. Voorhies, A. G. Brown, E. C. Voorhies; J. McElwain, E. Thompson, James Brown, John Snow, John M. Kitch, A. Wilson, Robert Dunn, Adam Kerr, Hugh Beard, A. F. Brown, T. H. Fulton, C. H. Brown, J. F. Noble, M. W. Humason, James McKinney, John T. Cox, Anthony Runkle, E. X. Giebner, Benjamin Card, T. J. Bealse, Jonas Blatt, J. P. Cummings, C. W. Humason and J. M. Hinkson.

A difficulty soon arose. It was discovered that there was another Brownsville within the State, which fact caused confusion in the distribution of mails. In consequence of this difficulty the name of the borough was changed to that of Sandy Lake on November 16, 1868.

The borough takes its present name from the beautiful sheet of water near which it is located. This lake is about a mile in length, and has an average width of probably 250 or 300 yards. The water is clear and deep. Its myriad specimens of the finny tribe were once eagerly sought by the sportsman, but the drainage into it of the water from the coal mines, impregnated with sulphur, has quite exterminated those creatures. When the lake was first discovered by the white man is not known. It was visited by whites as early as 1753, when Washington made his tour of inspection through that portion of the country.

Sandy Lake was laid out on land which belonged to Alexander Brown, the first settler in that region. He located in the year 1800. His wife died three years later—the first death that occurred in the township. His son, Alexander, born September 1st, 1802, is said to have been the first native white child in the township. From this original settler sprang a numerous progeny, who have remained prominent factors in the subsequent development of the place. In this number were Alexander, Thomas J. and James F., all of whom participated in the growth of the community.

Robert Dunn, son of Allen Dunn, a north suburban resident, built the first blacksmith shop. This occurred in 1825. He continued at the business for more than a quarter of a century. Martin Davis had, two years earlier, viz., 1823, established a shop a mile and a half north of the settlement.

At that early date shoemakers had not found the village. Three miles south, however, in Sandy Lake Township, William Egbert had a shop, at which he did such work as the surrounding country demanded. A grandson of his ultimately became a prominent physician, and now resides in Franklin, Penn.

Alexander Brown built the first grist-mill about 1820, just north of town, near the bridge. Some ten years later a second was erected by his sons. These structures, together with the consequent buildings they necessitated, and the general thrift they produced, may be regarded as the origin of this beautiful borough. But this was not sufficient. Half a dozen years later witnessed the existence of a saw-mill, a fulling mill, an oil mill and a woolen mill. These have all served their purpose and disappeared.

Thomas J. Brown began the hotel business by erecting a structure in 1835, for simple boarding purposes. It was subsequently converted into a regular hotel. John Brownlee is said to have been the first hotel-keeper in the place. A complete list of licensed houses will be found in the chapter on Internal Affairs.

The first wagon-shop was run by William Dickey, prior to 1840. Alexander Hays was a grocer as early as 1837, his building then being the one also occupied by Thomas J. Brown. The Brown brothers were next to engage in mercantile business.

In the list of early physicians were the names of Drs. Brainard and John Vath. Concerning them not much can be said. Dr. Vath is said to have been somewhat eclectic in his practice, and was quite successful. Some reference is made to him in the Medical chapter.

Schools.—The first teacher in what is now Sandy Lake was Allen Dunn, who conducted a school in a log cabin owned by Alexander Brown, Sr., more than sixty years ago. The first school-house was erected shortly before the public school system was established. It was made out of pine lumber four inches in thickness, and was located near where Austin Potter's green-house is standing. It was built by subscription. Among the donors to this worthy enterprise were the Brown family, Eli Butler, Robert Dunn and Homer Bailey. Anson D. Williams and Desire and Loraine Bailey were among the earliest teachers in this house. A second building was erected some time after 1850 on the same hill but a few rods north. This served the purpose until 1868, when the present substantial building was put up. A part of the old building forms a section of Austin Potter's barn.

The present site was purchased of the Browns at a cost of $400. The original structure cost $2,500, and the wing which was subsequently added cost $1,300 more. The first teachers in this building were Miss Anna M. Carver as principal, and Mrs. S. D. Owen as primary instructor. Since the erection of this building the school has taken on new life, and under the principalship of M. E. Hess, 1887-88, a catalogue giving the course of instructions was issued. It was during the management of A. J. Devereaux that the school was graded, and it is now divided into five departments. The following persons have been principals: Prof. McClelland, G. W. Mayes, Robert Glenn, J. M. Dight, George E. Patterson, C. I. Mullen, W. H. McMullen, L. D. Brown, A. J. Devereaux, W. J. McClintock and M. E. Hess.

Churches.—The Presbyterian Church, the oldest in the borough, was organized October 3, 1835. Its first members were Theodore Bailey, Loraine Bailey, Homer Bailey, Minerva Bailey, Myron Bailey, Charity Bailey, Freeloove Barker, Sallie Bierce, Eli Butler, Desire Bailey, Alexander Brown, Elizabeth Brown and William C. Bogart. The first elders consisted of Alexander Brown, Homer Bailey and Eli Butler. The building now occupied by the church was not erected until 1841. It is a substantial frame, 40x50 feet in size. The first pastor was Rev. Robert Glenn, who labored in the church as stated supply for eleven years. Following him came Rev. J. W. McCune, two years; Rev. John G. Condit, two years; Rev. John Rice, five years; Rev. James Lafferty, two years; Rev. Joseph M. Duff, two years; Rev. Samuel Glenn, two years; Rev. J. Logan Sample, three years, and the present pastor, Rev. E. A. Nelson. The congregation is now in a flourishing condition, free from debt, and with a membership of 140. Its present officers are: Elders, T. S. Bailey, Thomas Clingan, E. M. McGinnis, John Gilmore, S. A. McClure and James DeFrance; trustees, A. G. Hoovler, James Yanney, Joseph Bowers and William DeFrance. There is a Sunday-school enrolling 100 pupils connected with the congregation. There are also two missionary societies maintained by the ladies of the church, the Ladies and the Young Ladies. Of the former Mrs. Phoebe Snider is president; Mrs. Mary Clingan, vice-president, and Mrs. A. G. Hoovler, treasurer; while the president of the latter is Miss Anna McDondald, and its secretary, Miss Maggie Clingan.

The Methodist Episcopal congregation owes its origin to Rev. Sullivan, who assembled the Methodist families in the neighborhood together in 1864, and began holding religious devotions with them. Among the number of these early members are found the names of Thomas H. Burns, Mrs. T. H. Burns, E. W. Latham, Mrs. Nancy Latham, Samuel Newkirk, Mrs. Sarah Newkirk and Mr. and Mrs. Voorhies. The first exercises were held in the Presbyterian Church. This was occupied for a period, and then the Covenanters' Church was secured and used for meeting purposes for about two years. The congregation having by this time become stronger in numbers and wealth, it was determined to erect a house of its own. Accordingly a frame building 30x40 feet in dimensions, now occupied by Carver & Bower as a wagon-shop, was built, and the regular services held therein. In 1878, however, work on the present handsome structure was begun, and in the same year was completed the church now occupied. This is an elegant brick edifice, with an audience room 40x70 feet, chapel and class rooms 30x45, and slated roof. The ground on which it stands was donated by Milton Egbert. The total value of the church property is estimated at $10,000. The following have been pastors of the congregation: Rev. W. Schofield, Rev. — Brown, Rev. S. K. Paden, Rev. John Abbott, Rev. H. Beatty, Rev. John Eckels, Rev. W. Moore, Rev. John Graham, Rev. A. R. Rich, Rev. E. K. Creed, and the present pastor, Rev. O. L. Mead, who began his ministry at the close of 1887. The congregation is in a flourishing condition, having a membership of 240. Its class-leaders at present are Edward H. Stekel, E. X. Giebner, George Fowler and Hugh Bradberry.

The Disciples' Church was organized April 15, 1874, by B. E. Baker. The original members were John Kirk, Ann S. B. Kirk, John Cook, Jacob Davis, J. L. Cross, B. H. Harmon, W. R. Harmon, A. K. Turner, Mary A. Turner, Mrs. J. F. Eberman, Mrs. K. Thompson, Miss C. E. Thompson, Miss E. L. Thompson, Mrs. M. L. Bowers, Mahan Patton, Helen Patton, Matthew Park, Mrs. E. Park, Mrs. Amelia Potter and Mrs. S. F. Harriott. The first elder was John Kirk, while the first deacons selected were John Cook and J. L. Cross. The church structure is a frame building, erected in July, 1881, at a cost of $2,500. The congregation also owns a parsonage, estimated to be worth $1,800. The first pastor of this church was Elder B. E. Baker. Following him in order came Elder W. B. Young, Elder Frederick Hoffman, Elder N. L. Atwood, and the present pastor, Elder G. J. Massey. The present officers are A. Turner and John Vogan, elders, and J. L. Cross and S. L. A. Smith, deacons. The congregation numbers sixty members. It is free from debt, has money in the treasury, and is in good condition both spiritually and temporally.

The Cumberland Presbyterian congregation was organized in April, 1875.

by Rev. J. M. Gallagher, of Jackson Centre, Penn. The first members of the church were C. H. Walker, N. A. Watson, C. C. Armstrong, M. L. Zahniser, Margaret E. Walker, Allie Balliett, S. S. Balliett, Alexander Brown, Elizabeth Brown, Jesse Edmund, Flora Edmund, Lilla McCormick, T. S. Sanford, I. H. Robb, Adam Niece, Ellen Niece, C. Carver, Mrs. C. Carver, Martha Porter, R. A. Long, D. J. Brown, George Kilch, Frank B. Eberman, Frank Niece, Henry Flickinger, Lydia Kilch, Robert Adams, M. A. Balliett, Joseph Infield, S. E. McMichael, Mary Infield, M. C. S. Washbaugh, Andrew George, Mary R. C. George, Mary A. Adams, S. E. Barnes, Laura Barnes, Jane Amon, T. S. Powell, T. E. Porter, W. H. Milford, C. E. Robb, W. R. Martzall, E. D. Martzall, N. Amon, H. S. Blatt, H. M. Blatt, T. H. Fulton, Eva Fulton, C. B. Fulton, L. B. Fulton and John B. McMichel. The first officers of the congregation comprised H. S. Blatt, S. S. Balliett, A. George and M. L. Zahniser, elders, and C. Carver, T. E. Porter and N. Amon, trustees. The handsome brick structure at present occupied by the congregation was erected in 1876. It is a very commodious building, 40x75 feet in dimensions, and cost $8,000. Since the organization of the church there have been three pastors in charge. The first, Rev. J. M. Norris, died in 1878, and was succeeded by Rev. P. R. Danley, who resigned in 1883, and who was followed by the present pastor, Rev. J. A. Bowman, called in 1884. Under his pastorate the congregation has been increased both in faith and numbers, its membership now being 125. The present officers of the congregation are H. S. Blatt, R. D. Pringle, A. George and M. L. Zahniser, elders, and I. H. Robb, George W. Worrell and H. Rogers, trustees. Connected with the church is a flourishing Sunday-school, which is superintended by Mr. A. George, assisted by Mr. W. J. Lyons, and which has an average attendance of eighty pupils, necessitating the maintenance of eight classes. The secretary and treasurer of the school is Mr. G. W. Worrell.

Societies.—Sandy Lake Lodge No. 573, I.O.O. F., was chartered November 17, 1863. Its officers were E. X. Giebner, N. G.; Martin McMillen, V. G.; A. N. Heard, Sec.; Samuel Newkirk, Asst. Sec.; Jason W. Barker, Treas. The first meetings were held in the upper story of Jonas Blatt's wagon-shop, which was occupied for a period of six years. The room above Devore & Stevenson's store, corner of Main and Mercer Steets, was then secured and services held in it. The old Grange Hall, at the north end of Main Street, was then occupied for a season, from which quarters the lodge removed to its present location in the I. O. O. F. Hall, in the Ride Block, which has been furnished and fitted up at an expense of $2,700. In the new room meetings are held every Friday evening. The lodge has a membership of 100.

Big Sandy Lodge No. 514, K. & L. of H., was instituted March, 23, 1882, by Grand Protector L. B. Lockwood, of Franklin, Penn., with the following charter members: C. Carver, Mrs. C. Carver, J. A. McCormick, Mrs. J. A. McCormick, D. J. Brown, Mrs. D. J. Brown, James Infield, Mrs. James Infield, J. F. Johnston, Mrs. J. F. Johnston, J. L. Cross, Mrs. J. L. Cross, George E. Patton, J. H. McClure, Catharine J. McClure, G. W. Worrell, Mrs. G. W. Worrell, Mary Lyons, H. S. Blatt, Mrs. H. S. Blatt, Richard Lyons, S. A. McClure, Mrs. S. A. McClure, Hiram Flickner, I. J. Harrison, Mrs. I. J. Harrison, W. J. Lyons, E. C. Waid, Mrs. E. C. Waid, M. L. Zahniser, Mrs. T. M. Cooley, J. F. Rayen, Mrs. J. F. Rayen, N. A. Watson, Mrs. N. A. Watson, H. T. King, A. George, Mrs. A. George, W. H. Harrison and Mrs. W. H. Harrison. The first elected officers consisted of P. P., H. S. Blatt; P., J. A. McCormick; V. P., W. H. Harrison; Sec., S. A. McClure; F. S., W. J. Lyons; Treas., J. L. Cross; Chap., G. W. Worrell; Guide, N. A.

Watson; guardian, George E. Patton; Sent., H. T. King; trustees, M. L. Zahniser, E. C. Waid and A. George, and Med. Ex., Dr. T. M. Cooley.

The purpose of the lodge is to provide for creating a fund for the relief of sick and distressed members. There have been two deaths in the ranks of the society since its organization, those of Mrs. James Infield and Mrs. N. A. Watson. Since the beginning the following gentlemen have been elected Representatives to the Grand Lodge: H. S. Blatt, S. A. McClure and George W. Worrell. The lodge numbers thirty-eight members at present. Its condition is good, and the outlook for the future is hopeful. Meetings are held on the second and fourth Tuesdays of each month in the Odd Fellows Hall.

The local lodge of the Ancient Order of United Workmen was instituted March 4, 1873, by Elliot Harvey. The charter members of it were: M. C. Burns, G. W. Clark, J. F. Williams, L. A. Cleary, S. C. Niece, John Cain, L. P. Foster, H. S. Blatt, W. H. Davis, H. H. Henderson, J. A. McCormick, I. J. Harrison, J. D. Powell, T. E. Porter, Samuel Newkirk, W. J. Barnes, E. C. Waid, D. J. Brown, Robert Adams, T. S. Sandford, M. Smith and Henry Niece. The first corps of officers embraced H. S. Blatt, M. W.; J. A. McCormick, F.; Thomas Porter, O.; J. D. Powell, recorder; M. Smith, Fin.; S. C. Niece, Rec.; J. F. Williams, guide; Robert Adams, I. W., and I. J. Harrison, O. W. The purposes of the order are: "1. To embrace and give equal protection to all classes and kinds of labor, mental and physical; to strive earnestly to improve the moral, intellectual and social condition of its members; to endeavor, by wholesome precepts, fraternal admonitions and substantial aid, to inspire a due appreciation of the stern realities and responsibilities of life. 2. To create a fund for the benefit of its members during sickness or other disability, and in case of death to pay a stipulated sum to such person or persons, as may be designated by each member, thus enabling him to guarantee his family against want. 3. The adoption of such secret work and means of recognition as will insure the protection of its members wherever the order may exist. 4. To hold lectures, read essays, discuss new inventions and improvements, encourage research in art, science and literature, and, when practicable, maintain a library for the improvement of members." Since the establishment of the lodge there have been four deaths within its ranks. There has been paid for charitable purposes, $354; for beneficiary purposes, $10,000; and there has been received for beneficiary purposes, $8,000. The present membership is forty-five.

Star Lodge No. 1467, K. of H., was organized March 14, 1879, in Grange Hall, by John N. Whiteman, D. G. D., of Greenville, Penn., with the following named charter members: William M. Dunn, N. A. Watson, D. C. Reed, W. H. Lostetter, W. A. Eckels, Henry Patton, J. F. Johnston, J. L. Cross, Warren Irwin, Andrew George, E. X. Giebner, S. A. McClure, S. A. Wilson, J. T. Cook, J. H. Robb, James Lindsey, J. A. McCormick, C. B. Fulton, T. S. Bailey, S. P. Turner, W. S. Watson, L. P. Foster, W. F. Maxwell, C. Carver, William M. Knapp, E. G. Eberman, Albert Glenn, J. R. Eberman, C. F. Jewell, W. E. MacDonald, E. F. Walker, Frank Brown, A. B. McCormick, J. J. Grace, O. P. Clarke, T. M. Cooley, A. A. Walker, W. J. Lyons, W. T. Stevenson and Charles G. Larned. The first officers were: Dictator, E. X. Giebner; A. D., O. P. Clarke; F. R., C. F. Jewell; chaplain, S. A. Wilson; guardian, J. F. Johnston; P. D., W. T. Stevenson; V. D., C. Carver; representative, S. A. McClure; treasurer, J. L. Cross; guide, A. B. McCormick; sentinel, S. P. Turner, and trustees, L. P. Foster and J. J. Grace. The expressed purpose of the order is to unite fraternally all acceptable white men, and to promote benevolence and charity by establishing a widows' and orphans' benefit fund, paying a sum not exceeding $2,000 on the death of a member. The following members have represented the lodge as Representatives to the Grand Lodge of Pennsylvania: W. T. Stevenson, E. X. Giebner, M. D., C. Carver, S. A. McClure and A. George. Of these Mr. S. A. McClure has been chosen an officer of the Grand Lodge, and has served as Grand Guardian, Grand Guide and Grand Assistant Dictator, the latter of which offices he at present fills. Since the institution there have been but two deaths, W. E. MacDonald and W. T. Stevenson. The present membership is thirty-two. Meetings are held in the Odd Fellows' Hall on the first and third Thursday evenings of each month.

Mountain Council No. 30, R. T. of T., was instituted September 8, 1879. Its charter members were D. J. Brown, T. H. Fulton, H. H. Henderson, W. E. MacDonald, S. T. Robins, Albert Glenn, John Gilmore, A. E. Long, E. M. McGinnis, L. A. Cleary, G. W. Turner, E. G. Eberman, Philip Rupert, J. A. Cleary, W. S. Eberman, Eugene McElwain, James McElwain, J. P. Vath, J. F. Johnston, Martha A. Porter, Catharine Reed and Jane G. Cummins. The first officers of the council were: D. J. Brown, S. C.; L. A. Cleary, V. C.; E. E. Evermann, P. C.; E. M. McGinnis, chaplain; Albert Glenn, recording secretary; S. G. Robins, financial secretary; G. W. Turner, treasurer; A. E. Long, herald; Philip Rupert, guard; H. H. Henderson, sentinel, and T. H. Fulton, medical examiner. The present membership is forty-nine. Meetings are held on the first and third Tuesdays of each month, in the Odd Fellows' Hall. The latter quarters have been used since 1884, previous to which time the exercises of the council were conducted in the Grange Hall.

Col. Dawson Post, No. 224, G. A. R., Department of Pennsylvania, was chartered September 28, 1881, with the following charter members: Joseph Cleary, J. L. Benn, A. H. Burnett, Archibald Barnes, J. L. Cross, L. A. Cleary, T. M. Cooley, William Bailey, Henry B. Bailey, James G. Bailey, J. A. Bond, I. C. Feather, J. F. Johnston, William H. Patton, Nathan Patton, Isaac St. Clair, S. P. Turner, E. C. Voorhies, Solomon Zedaker. The first officers of the post were: Joseph Cleary, commander; L. A. Cleary, officer of the day; J. A. Bond, quartermaster; I. C. Feather, surgeon; A. H. Burnett, senior vice-commander; J. L. Benn, junior vice-commander; George J. Patton, adjutant. The organization was effected in the old Grange Hall, where for years the meetings of the post were held. The quarters now occupied is the I. O. O. F. Hall, in the Ride Block, where meetings are held on the second Thursdays of each month. The present membership of the post is forty-seven.

Economical Mutual Benefit Association, of Sandy Lake, was chartered June 2, 1880. Its expressed object was "to create and maintain a fund, by the collection of admission fees, annual dues and assessments, upon surviving members, to defray expenses of carrying on the business of the company, and to provide a sum to be paid upon the death of a member to the beneficiary or beneficiaries named in his certificate of membership, or to the insured at the end of a certain period of time." The original members were James Lindsey, T. S. Bailey, William H. Clawson, William J. Patton, Charles Powers, Jay. Con. Wilson, D. Perrine, E. G. Eberman, T. M. Cooley and Cassius B. Fulton. The first officers were: President, T. S. Bailey; vice-president, W. H. Clawson; secretary, E. G. Eberman; treasurer, D. Perrine; directors (in addition to officers), James Lindsey, W. J. Patton, Charles Powers, Jay. Con. Wilson, T. M. Cooley and C. B. Fulton. The officers for 1888 are: President, T. S. Bailey; vice-president, H. C. Zeigler; secretary, Cassius B. Fulton; treasurer, D. Perrine; general agent, Charles Powers; medical examiner, Dr. T. M.

Cooley; directors, H. C. Zeigler, C. W. Smith, W. J. Patton, E. G. Eberman and J. L. Jewell. This organization is said to be in a flourishing condition, pays benefits in full, and ranks high among the institutions of the kind in the United States.

The W. C. T. U., of Sandy Lake, was organized in the Methodist Episcopal Church on the 22d of November, 1881, by Miss Narcissa E. White, then of Pine Grove (now Grove City), with forty-three ladies. Ten honorary members from among the lords of creation were also in the organization. The presidents, during the two years of its existence, were Mrs. Rev. A. R. Rich and Mrs. C. H. Walker; the treasurers, Mrs. Hettie Johnson and Mrs. Joseph Clary; and the secretaries, Mrs. Rev. I. L. Crawford and Miss Emma J. George. Weekly meetings were held at the various churches, at which plans were devised for furthering the cause of temperance. The society did much efficient work during its brief existence, and aided materially in developing the healthful temperance sentiment existing in the community.

The Y. W. C. T. U., of Sandy Lake, was organized on the 31st of March, 1885, at the residence of Rev. I. L. Crawford, by Misses Nettie Niece, Mary S. Gilmore, Emma J. George and M. Luella Crawford. At first meeting there were but three members, but a week later seven additions were made to the ranks. Misses Effie J. Powell, Nettie Niece and Mary S. Gilmore have been the successive presidents; Misses Mary S. Gilmore, Maggie Perrine and M. Luella Crawford the recording secretaries; and the last named young lady has acted all the time as the corresponding secretary. The membership has fluctuated between ten and sixty. The society has had a number of valuable lectures and entertainments, and for a year published a monthly paper called the White Ribbon. It maintains likewise, for the benefit of children, a Loyal Temperance Legion, with a membership of 110.

Banks.—Sandy Lake Bank was organized in 1873 for the convenience of the community, who previously possessed no safe means of transmission of money, and which, being chiefly of an agricultural class, were unable to transact such business in the larger villages of the county on account of their distance. The quarters it now occupies are in a handsome brick structure, 40x70 feet in dimensions. The banking rooms are supplied with all necessary equipments for conducting the usual business of such establishments. The capital stock is $50,000, while the average deposits reach $100,000. The present officers of the bank are D. Perrine, president; T. S. Bailey, vice-president; M. L. Zahniser, cashier; Q. B. Gilmore, assistant cashier; and T. S. Bailey, H. C. Zeigler, Daniel Perrine, William S. Devore, John Zahniser, M. L. Zahniser, D. Zahniser and Cassius B. Fulton, directors.

In 1876, a private banking institution was opened in Sandy Lake by the firm of Brown & Foster, in a building which is yet standing on the corner of Main and Mercer Streets. A general loan business and private brokerage was carried on for a period of about seven years. The death of Mr. Brown occurring in November, 1876, threw the enterprise under the management of L. P. Foster. The latter gentleman conducted the business in a satisfactory manner, but finally discontinued it after having paid off all deposits.

Manufactures.—Sandy Lake has never been a manufacturing center. In 1866, however, the Sandy Lake Foundry and Machine-shop was under the title of the Brownsville Manufacturing Company. After doing business on a small scale for several years, the property became the possession of W. W. West. He continued the business until 1872, a period of two years, when the plant passed into the hands of W. S. Eberman & Sons. They enlarged its sphere, but were pained to see the property destroyed by fire in May of the next year. New buildings, however, were erected in the coming autumn, thus preserving to the borough one of its early and important industries.

The population of Sandy Lake in 1870 was 428, and in 1880, 730. The next census will give it over 1,000 at least.

STONEBORO.

This enterprising place, situated on the beautiful sheet of water known as Sandy Lake, was first settled as early as 1825 by a colony of colored people. After the lapse of time this republic of Liberia gradually disintegrated, so that by the middle of the present century but one lone specimen of the sons of Ham remained. His tastes were commercial in character, and consequently from his hut on the lakeside he retailed cigars and whisky to those disposed to patronize him. The land on which this negro colony lived was ultimately sold to Messrs. John F. Hogue and William Shields, who, in turn, sold it in 1862 to Jeremiah Bonner and the Mercer Iron and Coal Company, Bonner purchasing Hogue's interest, and the company that of Shields. J. M. Goodwin, now a resident of Sharpville, surveyed these lands and laid out the village of Stoneboro in 1865, on territory belonging to both Lake and Sandy Lake Townships.

W. H. Bonner was the first merchant. He had a frame building on the corner of Lake and Walnut Streets. The building has since been destroyed. Mr. Bonner is deceased. His father, Jeremiah Bonner, was one of the pioneers of the place.

The first blacksmith shop was the property of James Lisle, and the first wagon shop, that of William Beatty.

The first physician was Dr. D. A. Philips. He is now in Sheakleyville. He was succeeded by Dr. J. H. Christler, at present a resident of Texas, and he in turn by Dr. B. D. Hanna, who still resides in the borough.

The first postmaster was Robert P. Cann, now secretary and general manager of the Mercer Iron and Coal Company. He held the office a second time, the latter being sandwiched between the terms of S. A. Wilson and J. P. Hines, the latter being the present incumbent. For dates see chapter on Internal Affairs.

The first school building, a two-story, two room structure, was erected in 1868. It soon proved to be too small. It was enlarged in 1885 at a cost of $2,500, until the present spacious structure of six rooms was secured. The school enrollment is 346, with an average attendance of 275.

Incorporation and Borough Officers.—Stoneboro was incorporated on the 25th of August, 1866. The first election was held on the third Friday of March, 1867, Frank W. Hubley acting as judge, and Samuel Hines and Evan Evans as inspectors. The following is a list of the principal borough officers:

1867—Burgess, H. B. Blood; council, F. M. Finney, J. C. Cornwell, J. C. Nolan, A. S. Troop, Samuel Custer; clerk, J. A. B. Atwater.

1883—Burgess, D. Sloss; council, Richard Jones, William Spence, J. L. Greer, C. G. Larned, W. H. McIntire and B. F. Esgar; clerk, F. T. Mears.

1884—Burgess, D. Sloss; council, J. C. Cornwell, B. F. Esgar, William Spence, John Kelley, W. H. McIntire and H. Edwards; clerk, W. H. Davis.

1885—Burgess, J. C. Cornwell; council, W. H. McIntire, W. C. Miller, Robert Hodgson, John Kelley, B. F. Esgar and William Spence; clerk, W. H. Davis.

1886—Burgess, A. S. Troop; council, F. T. Mears, B. F. Esgar, James Lyle, John Kelley, W. H. McIntire and W. C. Miller; clerk, W. H. Davis.

1887—Burgess, A. S. Troop (paralyzed June 3, 1887; J. C. Cornwell appointed by court); council, B. F. Esgar, W. C. Miller, F. T. Mears, James Lyle, R. P. Cann and G. W. Porter; clerk, W. H. Davis.

Churches.—The Methodist Episcopal congregation was organized in the winter of 1869, through the agency of Rev. John Eckels. In the first organization there were forty-one members. The first regular services were held in the school-house, then a two-story, two-roomed building. The first class-leader was Edwin Egbert, of Sandy Lake. Adam Davis was the first steward. The building at present used by the congregation was erected in the year 1875. It is a frame and is quite commodious. The succession of pastors has been, as nearly as can be ascertained, Rev. John Eckels, Rev. A. S. Goodrich, Rev. Robert Beatty, Rev. J. Kinney, Rev. John Graham, Rev. A. R. Rich, Rev. Gilfillan, Rev. Charles Reeves, under whose ministry the congregation became a separate charge, Rev. W. S. Shepard and Rev. John Eckels, the present pastor, who began his labors in the fall of 1886. The congregation is at present in a prosperous condition, numbering ninety-five members. There is a Sunday-school connected with it, of which the superintendent is Mr. F. T. Mears. The enrollment of the school is 132.

The First Baptist Church of Stoneboro was organized October 9, 1870, by Revs. J. M. Perry, Ross Ward, E. T. Crane and R. H. Austin. The first members of the new society were: David Griffith, Miriam Griffith, Nancy Gom-forey, T. H. Price, D. A. Phillips, Parmelia M. Phillips, Sarah A. Vernon, Susan McCormick, D. T. Davis, Eliza Davis, Sarah B. Haskell, Sarah Olds, Elisha Flickinger, Mrs. Flickinger, Sarah Corbin, Deliah, Hannah and Rebecca Woolford. The congregation was incorporated September 24, 1883, upon petition of Thomas H. Price, James Stubbs, James Lyle, D. A. Phillips, D. M. Griffith, Herbert Davis, William Davis, Edward Rowe, J. R. Cummings and T. B. Martin. The building occupied by the congregation is a frame structure erected in 1873, at a cost of $2,500. The first pastor of the church was Rev. J. T. Griffith, who remained three years. Succeeding him came Rev. W. H. Leet, one year; Rev. E. H. Hovey, two years; Rev. J. T. Bradford, two and a half years; Rev. G. M. Evans, two years, and the present pastor, Rev. J. T. Davis, who was placed in charge in 1886. A list of the secretaries of the congregation is as follows: D. A. Phillips, J. T. Davis, David Wilson, J. C. Wilson, William Phillips, D. C. Bachelor, T. H. Rowe, Herbert Edwards, John Crook and Ed. Rowe. The church at present numbers 138 members, and is in good condition. In connection with it is maintained a Sunday-school which enrolls 125 pupils.

The Catholic Church in Stoneboro celebrated its first mass about twenty-four years ago, the service being performed in private houses. Shortly afterward, however, a house once used as a dwelling, but then recently vacated, was purchased, and for a period of four years prior to the erection of the present edifice was occupied as a place of worship by the congregation. The early Catholic families in the vicinity were not deterred by the smallness of their number from attempting to secure for themselves and children larger and more convenient quarters, in which to conduct their religious services, and by the year 1876 enough money had been raised to begin the erection of the present handsome structure. This, a frame building, 30x50 feet in dimensions, with a sanctuary 12x30 feet, was completed in the same year, at a cost of $3,000, and was occupied and dedicated shortly afterward. It is a very convenient church edifice, and sitting upon the top of a graceful elevation, presents a pleasing spectacle to the eye of the beholder. Among the first members of the congregation were Lawrence Kearns, John Kennedy, Peter Hughes, and Daniel Conley, with their families. The first regular priest that ministered to the little flock was Rev. K. O'Branigan. He was succeeded by Rev. Thomas Tracey, Rev. William Pugh, Rev. P. Brady, Rev. John Smith, Rev. J. H. McAdam, of the Mercer Church, who also has charge of the Stoneboro congregation. The membership numbers forty-two families, earnest in spirit and determined in faith.

The Presbyterian Church congregation was organized November 19, 1878, through the instrumentality of Rev. David Waggoner, Rev. J. Frank Stonecipher and Elder J. H. Carr. Its first regular members were John Parry, Thomas English, Mrs. C. E. English, Miss E. L. English, Mrs. L. Bowen, Mrs. Eliza Bonner, Mrs. J. A. Allen, Miss Mary Pringle, O. V. Porter, Mrs. Margaret E. Porter, Mrs. Mary L. McClurg, V. B. Coulson, Mrs. Mary Coulson, Miss S. R. Downs, R. L. Coulson, S. E. Coulson, J. F. Coulson and Mrs. Margaret Cornwell. The church was incorporated September 17, 1883, at which time the board of trustees consisted of E. Houser, James Hewitt and Charles Runningbrew. The building used by the congregation is a frame, erected in 1883, at a cost of $2,500. The first pastor was Rev. Samuel Glenn. He was followed by Rev. B. C. Critchlow, who in turn was succeeded by Rev. J. C. Chapman. The present pastor, Rev. E. A. Nelson, has been in charge for about three years, and is the first regular pastor the congregation has had, the others having been provisional ministers merely.

The membership of the church is 145. Connected with it is a Sunday-school, of which Robert P. Cann is the superintendent; and also a Ladies' Missionary Society, of which the president is Mrs. Robert P. Cann, and the vice-president, Miss Mary Pringle.

St. Paul's Primitive Methodist Church was organized in the public school-house January 19, 1879, by Rev. Ralph Fothergill, with the following named members: Charles Nichols, Enoch Show, John Arkless, John Jackson, Mary A. Bromley, Mattie Bromiey, John W. Roberts, Thomas Brown, John Squires, Susannah Proud, Duncan C. McLaren, Jane Shaw, Henry Swyres, Maggie Swyres, William Proud, Esther Arkless, Mary Jackson, David Watts, Archie Greenfield, James McWilliams, John Weston, Jacob Swyres, Susannah McLaren Jennie Swyres, John Swyres, John Proud, Gowan Arkless, Peter Henderson, William Swyres, Annie Roberts, Thomas Armstrong, Robert Morris, Samuel Morris, Tillie McIntire, William Brown, Melissa Swyres, John P. Blanchard, George Proud, Lizzie Emon, Lizzie Jenkins, Minnie Pearson, Lizzie Smith, Benjamin Franklin, Samuel Esgar, Carrie Leslie, Robert Finkel, Sarah Henderson, Charles Frye, Lizzie Roberts, William Frye, William Cartwright, Robert Gordon and James Watley. The present church structure was built in October, 1881, at an expense of $1,000. Following is the succession of pastors of the congregation: Rev. Ralph Fothergill, Rev. R. G. Roscamp, Rev. John A. James, Rev. John Atkinson and Rev. Lewis Norman Leith, the present efficient pastor. The secretaries of the congregation have been John Arkless, Duncan C. McLaren, Herbert Timmons, D. C. McLaren, James McKay and D. C. McLaren, who at present officiates in that position. The membership of the church is twenty. The condition of the congregation is very fair.

Secret Societies.—Lake Lodge No. 434, F. & A. M., was instituted February 24, 1869. The first officers elected were: Seth T. Kennedy, W. M.; James B. Nary, S. W.; James Clyde, J. W.; E. X. Giebner, secretary, and Hugh Baird, treasurer. Meetings are held in Masonic Hall, in Ride Block, on the fourth Thursday of each month. The present membership of the lodge is fifty-five.

Lake Lodge No. 1363, I. O. G. T., was organized and chartered November 1, 1879, with the following as charter members: Duncan McLaren, Ed. Rowe, John Price, William Cartwright, E. H. Hovey, George P. Cornwall, Cyrus Cartwright, Henry Shaw, W. W. Fry, Charles Nichols, Thomas H. Rowe, John Brown, George Lavers, Edward Hughes, William Proud, William Swyres, E. S. Nichols, Ida Blancher, Mattie Rowe, Hettie Price, Rachael Price and Annie Morris. The first officers were: Duncan McLaren, W. C. T.; E. S. Nichols, W. V. T.; E. H. Hovey, W. C. & O. P.; George P. Cornwall, W. secretary; Edward Rowe, W. F. S.; W. W. Fry, W. treasurer; William Cartwright, W. M.; Thomas H. Rowe, W. D. M.; Ida Blancher, W. I. G.; Charles Nichols, W. O. G.; Cyrus Cartwright, W. R. H. S.; Henry Shaw, W. L. N. S., and John Price, P. W. C. T. Meetings are held in the K. of P. hall, Bonner Block.

Keystone Mutual Relief Association was chartered April 17, 1880, with the following members: Austin Niles, John P. Hines, F. A. Bliss, F. Wilkins, Dr. J. H. Christler and L. Bonesteel. The first officers were: President, John P. Hines; vice-president and treasurer, F. A. Bliss; secretary, L. Bonesteel; medical adviser, Dr. J. H. Christler; trustees, Austin Niles, John P. Hines, F. A. Bliss, F. Wilkins and L. Bonesteel. The purpose of the association, as enunciated in its charter, is "to render aid to sick and disabled members of the association by a mutual assessment plan."

Stoneboro Union No. 376, E. A. U., was organized December 1, 1881, with forty-one charter members. The first roster of officers comprised Samuel Esgar, chancellor; J. H. Christler, advocate; Lewis D. Lewis, president; A. Jax-theimer, vice-president; S. B. Throop, auxiliary; C. G. Larned, treasurer; S. A. Wilson, secretary; V. Porter, accountant; James Lyle, chaplain; W. J. Cartwright, warden; M. W. Custer, sentinel; B. F. Esgar, watchman; Joseph Brennan, conductor; Mrs. V. Porter, assistant conductor; J. H. Christler, examining physician, and S. B. Throop, V. Porter, Joseph Brennan, M. W. Custer and James Lyle, directors. Meetings are held in the K. of P. hall, Bonner Block.

Stoneboro Lodge No. 501, I. O. O. F., was instituted in the hall it occupies at present, the K. of P. hall, Bonner Block, December 18, 1882. The first officers of the lodge were Lewis D. Lewis, noble grand; Michael Cook, vice-grand; H. Vert, secretary; George Summerson, assistant secretary, and Norbert Houser, treasurer. This lodge is in a flourishing condition.

Lake Lodge No. 1193, K. & L. of H., was instituted October 20, 1886, with the following named charter members: William H. McIntire, George W. Lyons, R. P. Cann, John L. Rossiter, Samuel A. Wilson, B. S. Cleary, David Cartwright, Virginia M. Wilson, William C. Miller, Julia B. Cann, John Kelly, John P. Hines, William C. Esgar, Kate E. Throop, J. W. Wilson, C. S. Niece, Martha E. Wilson, Roderick E. Hamm, Mary McCleary, Maria Clark, Milton Clark, Lizzie E. Hines, Emma Hall, Bertha M. Bonner, Blanche V. White, Callie Davis, Ida M. Gumfory, Walter H. Davis, C. G. Larned, Ellen A. Larned, Henry Hall, Mrs. M. A. McIntire and Mrs. M. R. McIntire. Meetings are held in the K. of P. hall, Bonner Block.

Sandy Lake Circle No. 16, P. H. C., was instituted August 1, 1887, with the following named charter members: W. T. McBurney, Mrs. W. T. McBurney, G. W. Turner, John Lowe, Mrs. John Lowe, S. B. Forker, J. O. Jackson, W. H. Clawson, Lucy Clawson, W. A. Clarke, Mrs. W. A. Clarke, Mary Lyons, F. B. Craig, M. B. Hays, W. H. Rogers, Edward Rogers, Harry Rogers, J. F. Rayen, Mrs. J. F. Rayen and A. G. McElwain. The first officers installed were: W. T. McBurney, P. P.; G. W. Turner, president; John Lowe, vice-president; W. H. Rogers, guardian; S. B. Forker, secretary; W. A. Clark, Acct.; W. H. Clawson, treasurer; Mary Lyons, porter; F. B. Craig, watchman; M. B. Hayes, guide; Lucy Clawson, companion; Mrs. J. F. Rayen, L. D.; A. G. McElwain, chaplain, and J. O. Jackson, medical examiner. Meetings are held in the Odd Fellows' hall on the first Monday of each month. The circle is in good condition.

Manufactures.—The Stoneboro Milling Co. was incorporated into a partnership association February 8, 1887. The shareholders in the new enterprise were Hugh H. Horn, Aaron M. Vaness, George W. Porter, John P. Hines, Alexander Bonner, Alexander S. Throop; John S. Crook, Thomas H. Price, Edward Houser, Jennie F. Houser, John Kelly, Fred T. Mears, James F. Baskin, David B. Hanna, C. G. Larned, R. P. Cann, William H. McIntire, J. Lem Smith, John Parry, Joseph E. Fox and Milton Logan. The company has extensive mills fitted up with the latest and best machinery, and is acquiring for its products a wide and appreciative market. The managers of the enterprise are Hugh E. Horn, Milton Logan, George W. Porter, John Parry, Alexander S. Throop, John P. Hines and William H. McIntire.

The Sandy Lake Ice Company, though in existence a number of years previous, was not formed into a partnership association until the 6th of September, 1882. It has a capital stock of $12,000, divided into 120 shares of the par value of $100 each. The original shareholders were Beriah Magoffin, Richard R. Wright, Robert A. Stewart, Peter J. Pierce, Samuel A. Wilson, Lorenzo P. Foster, Cassius B. Fulton, William T. McBurney and Henry S. Blatt. The first officers elected under the new charter were: Richard R. Wright, chairman; Henry S. Blatt, secretary; Lorenzo P. Foster, treasurer, and Samuel A. Wilson, superintendent. The houses of the company are situated on the margin of the lake, and in winter time an abundant supply of pure, crystal ice, is packed away sufficient to meet all demands in summer. The market of this company extends for miles about, as the superior facilities they have for storing and transporting their products render competition with them almost impossible.

In the winter of 1887-88 a commodious building was erected by Horn, Van Ness & Mears, for storage and creamery purposes, which doubtless will prove of great convenience and usefulness to this part of the county.*

The census of 1870 gave Stoneboro a population of 471. The town grew rapidly in the next ten years, having in 1880, 1,186 inhabitants. The coal mining interest was the leading factor in the growth of the borough, and will continue to be one of its principal supports as long as the Stoneboro coal fields can be worked profitably.

WHAT is now Sheakleyville was originally called "Georgetown," in honor of George Sheakley. The town was christened with considerable ceremony July 4, 1822. When old Sandy Creek was to be sub-divided, and Georgetown was to be erected into a borough, some dissatisfaction existed with the name "Georgetown." It was proposed that it should be dropped and the name "Exchangeville" substituted. Mr. Sheakley, jealous of the honor attached to the name "Georgetown," arranged with Hon. David Sankey, State Senator from the district, to have the passage of the act by the Legislature, authorizing the change, deferred to the next session. Another friend of Mr. Sheakley in the Legislature conceived the idea of having the first two syllables of "Exchangeville" erased, and the name Sheakley substituted. With this modification the bill was passed on the 11th of March, 1851, and a permanent name was fixed upon. When the news of this stratagem reached the village, considerable excitement ensued. Business men had painted their signs Exchangeville. Finally the advice of Mr. Sheakley prevailed, and his neighbors and friends made no further resistance to the new name.

The first election of the new borough of Sheakleyville was held in March, 1851, John Condit acting as judge, and William Dunn and D. M. Beatty as inspectors. The officers elected were as follows: Burgess, G. W. Moyer; council, G. G. Brush, Jacob Vaughn and Cyrus Parks; constable, R. R. Hosack; treasurer, John M. Kitch; collector, James Brush; street commissioners, Thomas Davis and G. W. Moyer.

The site of Sheakleyville was originally part of a tract of 400 acres located by William Byers in 1797. Having been appointed the first sheriff of Mercer County, in 1803, Mr. Byers removed to Mercer, and therefore sold his land to John Sheakley, of Franklin County, Penn., who with his family took possession in 1804. Mr. Byers' earliest neighbor was Martin Carringer, a Revolutionary soldier, who had located about four miles south of the site of Sheakleyville as early as 1797. It is claimed that he was the first settler in this region. In the spring of 1798 a company from Washington and Allegheny Counties came and settled on the belt north of Carringer's, and mostly east of Sheakleyville. It included such men as Thomas Philips, John A. Larimer, David Chess, John Chess, Hugh Minnis and others. They were known as "Ten Milers," and settled on land belonging to the Nathan Axtell tract. They erected cabins, cleared a potato patch, raised a crop, and hid them in a cave on the bank of a stream, and covered them to prevent their being seen by the Indians. They then returned to get their families. These "ten milers" were Jerseymen, while their neighbors were Scotch-Irish and Welsh.

The first house on the present site of Sheakleyville was built by William Byers in 1798. It was a log structure. He also built a small saw-mill on the stream known as town run, but it was soon carried away. The next building occurred in 1818. It was done by George Sheakley, the structure being a frame, which stood where Wentz's house now stands. He also built a large frame tavern, which he used until the town was started, when he sold it to William Dunn. He and his wife were familiarly known as "Billy Dunn" and "Queen Anne."

After this houses began to multiply. John Limber, Thomas Wallace, Philip Mann, Robert Jones (blacksmith), Joseph Culbertson and others came to the place and erected buildings prior to 1825.

The first physician in the place was George Linn. He came from the region of Hartstown, and remained about a year. This was in 1820. The next was Dr. Samuel Axtell, who bought out Dr. Linn, and practiced many years. Concerning him more is said in the Medical chapter. Dr. Barton came and practiced a number of years. He never bought property. His brother was a practitioner at Cochranton.

Schools.—John Holloway taught the first regular school in the place. That was in 1832. He boarded with Isaac Philips. Other early teachers were Elias Wick, Hugh Davenny, John Sheakley, Irene Churchhill (first lady), George W. Baker and F. B. Carrington.

Prior to 1854 schools were taught by subscription. On the 9th of April, 1856, a special school district was formed. On the 14th of October, ensuing, an election was held, which resulted in the choice of the following directors: John W. Stinson and Thomas W. Sheakley, three years; Thomas Cochran and D. F. McDowell, two years, and William Thomas and F. B. Carrington, one year. Two schools were established, and have been maintained ever since. The present house, a two-story frame building with three rooms, was built in 1877-78 at a cost of about $3,000. At the time of its erection the directors were: T. C. Cochran, president; John White, Samuel Sisley, Levi Morrison, Robert Sheakley and E. W. Graham. The building was completed in 1878, Sylvester Logan and John Axtell being the contractors. Among the teachers who have occupied the position of principal were A. J. Umholtz, J. M. Ealy, E. D. Emory, S. H. McCleery, A. J. Palm, W. T. Cozens, M. B. Griffith and M. R. Smith.

Churches.—The Upper Sandy or Georgetown Presbyterian congregation was organized in 1799 by Elisha McCurdy and Joseph Stockton. The first eldership consisted of Alexander McCracken and William Byers. Rev. William Wylie acted as the first pastor, his service extending from April 13, 1802, to December 5, 1804. The next year Rev. Stockton, then located at Meadville, supplied the congregation one-third of his time. The following year Mr. Johnston performed similar service. The eldership removing from the place the congregation became extinct for a time. In 1814 the reorganization of the congregation, under the name of Georgetown, occurred, Rev. Ira Condit becoming their pastor. This relation he sustained until the date of his death, October 24, 1836. Rev. David Waggoner was installed next, July 11, 1838, and continued until May 4, 1853. Rev. James M. Shields succeeded August 9, 1855, and continued until February 28, 1864. In May, 1864, Mr. Waggoner returned and was employed two-thirds of his time, the remainder being devoted to Greenfield. He continued until February, 1872. Rev. J. M. Robinson became pastor in May, 1873. The first meeting-house, built on the farm of Joseph Brush, was made of rough logs. Its floor consisted of mother earth, and its windows of oiled paper. The second was erected about 1818. It was hewed logs, had a floor and glass windows, and was a decided improvement in point of architecture. The highest subscription for its erection was made by Martin Carringer, $10. The present structure was dedicated January 4, 1835. The session of the church has borne such names as William Byers, Samuel Axtell, Andrew McCracken, Robert Tiffany, John Condit, John Stinson, Orison Eels, John Kerr, David Hadley, David Thompson, John W. McCracken, Hugh Lackey, Jacob Vaughn, Andrew De Arment, W. P. McDonald and others.

The United Presbyterian congregation dates its origin in the year 1818, when about half a dozen families, consisting of those of David Gardner, James Brush, Ross Byers, John Caldwell and John Thompson, withdrew from the Upper Sandy Presbyterian congregation and formed an Associate Reformed Church. The separation grew out of the controversy relative to the use of Rouse's version of the Psalms. Subsequently Martin Carringer, John Sheakley and Samuel Cochran joined the new organization. The additional members not already mentioned were: Mrs. Ross Byers, Mrs. John Thompson, Baptist Brush and wife, Ebenezer Miller, Agnes Long, Peter Hazen and wife, A. McCandless, Mr. Elliott and wife, Jonathan Byers and wife, Mrs. Culbertson, Charles Montgomery, Robert Findley and wife and Mrs. Samuel Cochran. The first elders in the new congregation were Baptist Brush, Ross Byers, James Brush and Charles Montgomery. During its existence it relied largely upon supplies, being served by A. Bowers, H. H. Thompson and others. When the union occurred, Rev. James Burrows was installed pastor, and continued in that position from 1858 to 1860. In 1863, union having been formed with the congregation at Mineral Spring, a new organization, to be located in Sheakleyville, was the result. Rev. J. A. Bailey became the pastor of the new congregation June 23, 1863, and continued in that relation until 1869. In June, 1871, Rev. G. C. Brown was chosen, and continued until ill health demanding his release in 1873. On September 6, 1875, Rev. R. Bruce, the last pastor, was chosen. The first edifice in the borough was erected in 1850-52. It was a wooden structure, 44x50, and stood on a site deeded for religious purposes by David Carlyle. This house was supplanted in 1886-87 by a large and commodious brick structure of modern style and advantages. The congregation is said to be in a prosperous condition.

The Georgetown Baptist Church dates back as far as 1807, at which time services were held in this community as often as once a month by a prominent Baptist from Philadelphia, who had been recently stationed at Sharon, Elder Thomas G. Jones. The little flock, to which he preached for the modest sum of $1.50 per month, consisted of James and Isaac Hazen and wives, Joseph Mattox and wife, Thomas Philips and wife and Joseph Nelson and wife. In 1820 these were constituted a branch of the Sharon charge, under the ministry of Elder Adamson Bentley. Rev. Jesse Brown, of Carmel, preached for the new branch for a period of two years. During the years 1826 and 1827 Rev. Henry Frazier conducted monthly services, the sermons being frequently two hours in length. In 1830 the meetings of the branch were held for the first time in the village school-house, the services previous to that time having been conducted either in private houses or in the woods. The regular church organization was effected in August, 1831, by Rev. Samuel Churchill, of Erie County, assisted by Rev. Isaac Davis, of Crawford County. The original members were Joseph Nelson and wife, Thomas Philips and wife, Mrs. Mary Limber, Mrs. Turner, Mrs. Freeland, Isaac Hazen and wife, Asher Williams, William and Mary Lackey, James Wood and wife, Mrs. Jesse Hofford and Stephen Rowland and wife. Rev. Churchill was the first pastor of the new congregation. During his ministry, in January, 1833, the congregation decided to erect a suitable house of worship. This was accomplished, and a new structure dedicated four years later, at a cost of $800. In September, 1841, Rev. Franklin Kidder was employed as pastor, but resigned two years later. Provisional services were then held for a period, until Rev. J. Hicks became pastor in 1845. He was succeeded by Rev. J. H. Hazen in 1848, under whose ministry, which closed in 1853, the membership of the congregation was built up to 177. During his stay a parsonage and eight acres of land were purchased by the church. In July, 1856, Rev. H. Steelman accepted a call. He was succeeded seven years later by Rev. D. L. Clouse, who remained but a few months, and gave place in September, 1863, to Rev. Ephraim Mills. The latter remained a year only. He was followed in the ministry by Rev. J. Winter and Elder John Moses, each of whom remained but a short time. Rev. Ross Ward was called to the charge of the congregation December, 1866, remaining five years. Since then the following have been pastors: Rev. Norman Thomas, 1872-77; Rev. John T. Griffith, 1878-80; Rev. J. T. Bradford, 1881-82; Rev. O. M. Herrick, 1882-84; Rev. G. M. Evans, 1884-86, and the present pastor, Rev. J. T. Davis, whose labors began in 1886.

The Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in August, 1830, its members then consisting of George W. Lee, Griffith Burnett and wife, Cyrus Church, James Dunn and wife and Letitia Hazen. At first preaching was done in the village school-house by Rev. John Somerville, a jolly Irishman, an eloquent preacher and valuable pastor. No rapid growth occurred until 1846, when, under the labors of J. Crum and A. Calender, many additions were made to the hitherto feeble ranks. The first class-leader was Cyrus Church, who held his membership as one of the charter members, and continued in such relation nearly sixty years. He was born October 16, 1803, and died in Sheakleyville February 15, 1888, in his eighty-fifth year. The building was erected in 1842, upon a lot deeded by Justus Holcomb. Jacob Vaughn and James Dunn were the contractors, they receiving for their services something more than $100. The first church bell in the village was put into this structure soon after its completion. It is said to be a sweet-toned instrument for calling worshipers to the place of assembling. We are unable to present a complete list of those who have preached for this congregation. From 1860 to 1888 the pastors have been Revs. J. B. Orwig, S. S. Stuntz, F. Brown, M. Smith, R. C. Smith, J. F. Perry, C. W. Foulke, J. W. Crawford, A. J. Lindsey, J. Boyd Espy, J. H. Vance, J. M. Foster and C. C. Hunt.

Societies.—W. G. Brown Lodge, No. 592, I. O. O. F., was chartered November 20, 1866, with W. G. Brown, Lafayette Larimer, James M. Dunn, Norbert Housen, M. M. Jenkins, S. C. Long and H. M. Hamblin as charter members. The first meetings of the lodge were held in Dunn's Hall, which was occupied until destroyed by fire. Subsequently a hall was secured of T. K. Cochran, but this was abandoned after a time. The order was at one time very strong, but upon its removal to Hadley, October 29, 1884, it gradually weakened until it now has but twenty-six members. The first officers elected by it were: W. G. Brown, N. G.; Lafayette N. Larimer, V. G.; H. M. Hamblin, secretary; Norbert Houser, assistant secretary, and M. M. Jenkins, treasurer.

Elijah Thompson Post, No. 417, G. A. R., Department of Pennsylvania, was organized in the fall of 1883 by Abijah Burnett, of New Lebanon, with the following members: S. A. Fell, Jackson Breakman, John A. McCracken, F. S. McCracken, John Clark, S. T. Bell, Anderson Crawford and S. A. Minnis. The organization was effected in the old Odd Fellows' Hall, in which meetings have since been held until the present. The post commanders have been S. A. Fell, Dr. D. A. Philips and William Brooks. The present officers are; William Brooks, commander; John Clark, senior vice-commander; Jackson Breakman, junior vice-commander; Levi Morrison, adjutant; Erastus Smith, quartermaster; J. A. McCracken, officer of day; John Brooks, officer of guard; F. S. McCracken, chaplain; J. A. Murphy, quartermaster sergeant; S. H. Minnis, surgeon; James Kilgore, sergeant major, and Dr. D. A. Philips, S. H. Minnis and J. A. Murphy, trustees. The membership is about fifty at present.

Elijah Thompson, the comrade after whom the post was called, was one of the prospective charter members. His death occurring before the charter arrived, the post was accordingly named in his honor. He entered the war as a private in Company I, Fifty-seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, and served with the Army of the Potomac, receiving while in the line of duty a wound from which he never fully recovered.

The local union of the W. C. T. U. was organized March 22, 1881, at the Methodist Episcopal Church, by Miss Narcissa E. White. The original members were: Mrs. S. Sisley, Mrs. Levi Morrison, Mrs. W. McDowell, Mrs. William McCoy, Mrs. Joseph Strait, Mrs. L. W. Lee, Mrs. Maggie Morrison, Mrs. S. Carrington, Mrs. L. Larimer, Mrs. Anna Feather. The first officers consisted of: President, Mrs. Rev. N. P. Crouse; vice-president, Mrs. J. B. Espy; secretary, Mrs. Levi Morrison, and treasurer, Mrs. Johnson McCartney. The presidents since organization have been Mrs. Crouse, Mrs. Espy, Mrs. Rev. O. M. Merrick, Mrs. Rev. Foster and Mrs. Anna Feather, while the secretaries for the corresponding years have been Mrs. Morrison and Mrs. W. McDowell. Meetings are held monthly in the houses of members.

The local lodge of the Knights of Honor was instituted in June, 1883, by N. A. Beatty, of Jefferson, Ohio, with the following as among the charter members: A. J. DeArment, T. D. Beatty, S. S. Byers, D. P. Morrison, Frank Beatty, F. L. Beatty, Seth Mook, Hugh Bradbury, A. D. Free and others. The organization was effected in the Odd Fellows' Hall, in which meetings are still held on the first and third Friday evenings of each month. The first dictator elected was A. J. DeArment, while D. P. Morrison was chosen as the first reporter. The present officers comprise William McClure, dictator; Dr. J. C. Bachop, financial reporter; C. J. Bell, reporter; A. K. Steel, treasurer, and A. Davenny, chaplain. The membership is about twenty-five.

Sheakleyville has been comparatively losing ground for many years, and has degenerated from one of the most bustling little towns in the county to one of its quietest hamlets. The census of 1860 gives the borough a population of 218. In 1870 it had 273, which decreased over fifty during the succeeding ten years, as the census of 1880 gives it only 222 inhabitants.

NEW LEBANON.

New Lebanon borough, geographically one of the large ones of Mercer County, is located in the northwestern part of Mill Creek Township, about five miles north of Sandy Lake, and seven miles southeast of Sheakleyville. Its removal from serious competition would, but for the absence of modern railroad facilities, make it a sprightly inland town.

The first settler within its limits was Rynheer Van Voorhies, a German immigrant from Washington County, in 1803. He erected a log cabin and made quite an extensive clearing preparatory to removing his family to the new country. In the course of a few years his cabin was found to be too small. An addition of hewed logs made his home more commodious, and sufficed until a more modern style of architecture supplied the place of the old mixed structure, no part of which remains at the present day. Van Voorhies had no neighbors within the borough limits for some time, but had country neighbors to share in his pioneer loneliness—the Morgans, the Carnahans, the Reeds and others.

The northern part of the village was laid out first. This occurred in 1838, when Ephraim Van Voorhies, of New Vernon, then owning the inherited estate, laid out and began the sale of lots. This plat was increased in 1846 by proper additions, and then the first plank house was erected by Josiah Cratly, on land subsequently owned by Rev. Isaac Bruaman. This accession to the village was on the south.

Jacob Carbon erected the first blacksmith shop, that great necessity of a growing village. This industry was followed by others of like character and necessity.

The first tavern was the east part of what is now the Commercial House, owned by J. L. Peters. It was built in 1851 by John Duff, who ran it until 1854, when he sold it to James Muse. The latter gentleman built the west addition to it about 1858 or 1859, and kept control for a time, and then disposed of it to Peters. By the latter it was continued until April, 1876, when Dr. J. P. Bassett concluded to conduct both the hotel and his medical practice. For a time this plan succeeded, but he finally relinquished the hotel, and it came back into the hands of its present proprietor.

The first store was owned in 1848 by James Muse and John Conduit. It stood in the north part of town. It was a hewed log house, weather boarded. A new building was erected north of it, and the firm changed to Muse & Gordon. The name was subsequently changed to Gordon & Muse. About the time this change occurred (the autumn of 1855,) a steam grist and saw-mill was erected by Gordon & Muse, the contractors being James and Edward Powers. When the structure was approaching completion, Gordon accidentally fell from one of the beams and was killed. The mill was operated a short time, when it was sold to John Sheffler. He continued to run it until the structure was destroyed by fire in 1867.

In 1875 Robert Bell erected a cheese factory in the eastern part of the borough. It flourished from the first, consuming from 2,000 to 5,000 pounds of milk per day.

The woolen mill of Daniel Bruner & Son was begun in the third week of April, 1862, and in six weeks (viz., June 14) was in running order, the timber for the structure having been cut, meantime, from the woods, and put into form for service. A dwelling house was also erected within the same brief period. The mill is still in operation. The following are prices of wool at different periods: 1863, $1 per pound; 1864, 60 cents; 1865, 50 cents, and in 1888, 45 cents.

In the list of physicians at New Lebanon mention is made of the following: John Orwig was the first. He was in the place as early as 1854, and remained several years. He removed to Butler County, where he died. He was succeeded by A. C. Axtell, about 1856 or 1857, who remained six or eight years, and then removed to Youngsville, Warren County, where he still resides.

During the early part of the war R. A. McCormick located, and remained about five years. He now resides in Clarion County. James Chase began to practice about 1868, and continued about six months, when he returned to Meadville, whence he came. J. P. Bassett, an educated man, came from Covington, Ky., about 1870, and remained about five years. He then removed, in succession, to Clark's Mills, Sheakleyville, Girard, Erie and Cleveland, where (last place) he finally died. He was successful in practice, but not in business management. C. F. Daubenspeck, the present physician of the place, came from Clarion County about 1880, and has built up an extensive and profitable practice.

Schools.—Prior to the erection of the borough of New Lebanon the territory was a part of sub-district No. 7, of Mill Creek Township. The first house was a two-story frame, about 24x30, and was erected by David Randall in 1855. On the 11th of March, 1858, it was determined to subdivide the lower room, affording advantages in the two rooms for smaller grades of public school pupils, and using the upper room for the purpose of a select school. The enterprise did not prove very successful. In the summer of 1863 the building was unroofed by a severe storm, which carried the belfry about eighty rods to the property of the widow Farver. In 1882 or 1883 it was burned down, and a two-story frame was built in its stead, at a cost of some $1,300. Among the early teachers in the old building were Clark Farver, H. J. Muse, Allen Smith, and others. Select schools were taught by J. R. Donley, L. Kuder (now attorney at law at Greenville), Rev. Swingle, A. J. Palm, of the Western Press, Mr. McConaughy and probably others.

In the spring of 1880 an institution of learning, known as the New Lebanon Institute, was established. W. T. Solomon was a prominent factor in agitating the subject, but did not see his project thoroughly materialized. The people of the place, recognizing the necessity of greater educational facilities than they had previously enjoyed, subscribed $2,500 for the purchase of land and the erection of a suitable building for academic purposes. Four acres of land were secured, and the erection of a suitable building was begun in the summer of 1880, but not completed until January, 1881. The two-story brick edifice, with four class rooms and two smaller ones for library and office respectively, on first floor, and a hall with capacity for 400, besides two class rooms on second floor, was dedicated February 22, 1881, Prof. G. W. Williams, of Allegheny College, delivering the address. The cost was $7,000. The sum of $4,650 was subscribed at the time of dedication. By vote of the board of directors, the institution was dedicated under the name of the McElwain Institute, in honor of John McElwain, Esq., of New Vernon Township, whose generous benefactions and sympathy gave the enterprise its proper impetus. On the 16th of May, 1883, the institution was incorporated as the McElwain Institute, with the avowed purpose "to establish and maintain an institution for the instruction and education of persons of both sexes in science, literature and art." The directors at that time consisted of John L. McCormick, James Lindsey, James W. McConnell, A. D. McCracken, R. C. Farver, James C. Brown, A. J. Palm and W. P. McElwain. In the list of principals are to be found the names of E. L. Richardson, W. H. Dodds (at present principal of the Pittsburgh High-school), S. H. Sheakley, George H. Lamb and M. B. Griffith.

Among the early settlers around New Lebanon were Adam and A. J. Car-nahan, brothers; Jacob Reed, William, George, John and James Montgomery, Rynheer Van Voorhies, Archibald McCormick, Andrew Borland, Thomas Robb, Ira Conduit and Ezekiel Conduit. Mrs. John Montgomery, one of the pioneers, attained the age of ninety-one, having lived seventy years on one farm in French Creek Township.

New Lebanon was regularly incorporated, by decree of the court dated August 22, 1866. The first election was held September 25, 1866, Abner Dean and William Dean acting as inspectors. John McElheny was chosen justice of the peace, and C. N. Smith, Burgess.

In the campaign of 1880 Mr. S. C. Koonce, of Clarksville, offered to the precinct in Mercer County giving the largest Republican gain over the previous State election, a flag worth at least $50. It was obtained by New Lebanon. It cost $75, and bears this inscription: "Presented by S. C. Koonce to the New Lebanon Republicans for the largest gain in the county, November 2, 1880, 56, 3, 6, 329." Explanation: 56 Republicans, 3 Democrats, 6 Greenbacks; 329, the alleged dividend on Credit Mobilier stock.

Societies.—Lincoln Lodge No. 54, A. O. U. W., was instituted June 26, 1873, with the following charter members: Abram Blatt, A. C. Grove, R. C. Farver, S. S. Overmyer, E. C. Voorhies, J. M. Grove, J. B. Grove, C. C. Dickey, T. M. Cooley, S. Weider, Wilson Bowles, George Bowles, T. M. Wilson, E. Rupert. The first officers consisted of P. M. W., T. M. Cooley; M. W., A. C. Grove; G. F., J. B. Grove; overseer, C. M. Voorhies; Rec., S. S. Overmyer; receiver, R. C. Farver; financier, Abram Blatt; guide, C. C. Dickey; I. W., J. M. Grove; O. W., Wilson Bowles. The lodge meets every Tuesday in Voorhies Hall. It has twenty-eight members.

Norval Muse Post No. 251, G. A. R., was organized May 27, 1882, with the following charter members: A. C. Grove, Emanuel Rupert, Abram Blatt, J. W. Reed, J. M. Gibson, A. F. Klingensmith, D. W. Dilley, Abner Dean, Jr., Joseph Mook, J. L. McCormick, Moses Spencer, John Vorous, Wilson Dean, Isaac Adams, J. S. Moore, M. G. Dilley, Solomon Firster, J. B. Hogue and J. M. Hill. The first officers were: A. C. Grove, P. C.; Abram Blatt, S. V. C.; J. M. Hill, J. V. C.; Wilson Dean, adjutant; John Vorous, Q. M.; J. S. Moore, chaplain; W. G. Dilley, O. D.; J. M. Gibson, Q. M. S. Its maximum membership was sixty. It meets in the same hall as the A. O. U. W.

Churches.—Mount Zion Evangelical Lutheran Church was organized in 1844 by Rev. Henry Zigler, D. D., with these members: Abraham Grove, Elizabeth Grove, Henry and Elizabeth Schreckengast, Henry and Mary Fetterwolf, Peter and Rachael Blatt and George Mook. The church edifice, a wooden structure, was erected in 1855, the dedication occurring January 27, 1856. The cost was $2,000. The following pastors have served the congregation: Henry Zeigler, D. D., Hewn Weicksel, J. Rathburn, John A. Nuner, J. Delo, Isaac Breiniman, D. M. Kamerer, J. M. Long, G. H. Swingle, D. McKee and J. H. G. Bartholomew. The present membership is about forty.

The Methodist Episcopal Church was organized February 10, 1851, by Rev. John Abbott, with the following members: James Muse, Hannah Muse, A. Voorhies and wife, H. C. Jewel, Eli Cole and wife, E. C. Voorhies, Emaline Voorhies, John Smith and wife, A. Smith, Mrs. E. Moore, and Pelina Coie. At first the charge was the Cooperstown Charge, and then changed to that of New Lebanon. The first building was a frame structure, 40x45 feet. It was erected in the fall of 1851 and winter of 1852, and dedicated May 21, 1852. The aggregate cost was $809.87. The first trustees were A. Voorhies, Eli Cole, H. C. Jewell, James Muse and John Martin. To the number have since been added Abel Thompson, J. Smith and E. C. Voorhies. The list of preachers has embraced Revs. John Abbott, George Stocking, Robert Beatty, I. T. C. McClelland, A. L. Miller, J. C. Sullivan, N. C. Brown, M. Smith, Sherwood, R. C. Smith, Robert Gray, J. Schofield, John Eckels, A. S. Goodrich, Robert Beatty, J. B. Wright, C. W. Foulk, J. A. Ward, J. F. Mendenhall, R. A. Buzza and W. A. Marriman. The building was removed from the old to the present site in 1875, and repaired at a cost of $1,000. The congregation is in a flourishing condition.

The United Brethren Church was organized in 1862 by Rev. Rufus Smith, now presiding elder at Uniontown, Penn., with these members: Daniel Bruner, and wife, David Mook and wife, Jonathan Peters, Charles Smith, Perry Kitchen, O. Kitchen. The house of worship, a frame 35x40, was erected in 1865 at a cost of over $2,000. The building committee consisted of David Christie, William Lawson, Elijah Moore, William Moore and Daniel Bruner. The architect was Joseph Jackson, usually called Stonewall Jackson, of Mercer. The finishing was done by G. W. Kline. At that time there were eighty members. In the autumn of 1887 a half interest was given to the Presbyterians for the repairing of the house, which cost about $1,000. In the list of pastors (incomplete) are found the names of Charles Wheeler, Silas Casteline, Rev. Reynolds, Edward Everett, Rev. Franklin, William Ish, Samuel Evans, Rufus Smith, Henry Hotchkiss, D. Meeker, C. Robinson, E. Belden, Rev. Vaughn, and others. The present membership is about fourteen. Deaths and opposition to secret societies have depleted the ranks.

The Presbyterian Church was organized in the McElwain Institute Chapel on October 5, 1885, by a committee consisting of Revs. C. B. Wakefield, A. W. Verner and C. W. Heydrick, an elder from Cochran. Among the charter members were Dr. C. F. Daubenspeck and wife, Samuel S. Overmyer and wife, A. C. Grove, Mrs. A. C. Grove, Nettie C. Grove, L. V. Grove, A. McCaughtry and wife, Kate and Mattie McCaughtry, C. S. Carnahan, Jennie Carnahan, C. C. Christy, Kate Fetterwolf, Allie Grove, Mrs. C. C. Christy, A. T. McElwain and wife, Miss Tressie McElwain and others. The place of worship is described under the sketch of the United Brethren Church. The membership is fifty-three, and is in flourishing condition.

The population of New Lebanon by the census of 1870 was 273, which was increased during the next ten years to 279, a growth of only six inhabitants.

WEST MIDDLESEX is located in Shenango Township, in the southwest part of the county, on both sides of Shenango River. It has the E. & P. and a branch of the N. Y., P. & O. R. Rs. as means of transportation. The region round about West Middlesex was settled as early as any other in the county. It was on the line along which the tide of migration pushed up the Shenango toward Sharon, Clarksville, Greenville, and other northern regions. Samuel Byers and Andrew Wylie, it is asserted, came from the region of Morgantown, Va., as early as 1796, and entered land in what is now Shenango Township. Thomas Campbell, the same year, and the following year Moses Canon, the progenitor of a large family of that name in the county, opened settlements in Hickory Township. In 1798 William Bell began a clearing west of the site of the present borough. On it Samuel Bell subsequently lived.

Richard Vanfleet came from New Jersey in 1798, and settled on a farm near the southwest corner of the county. The warrant was known as the "John Wight Tract" of 400 acres. It was under the Bedford warrant. Vanfleet was ejected about 1804, but subsequently compromised and got half. His early neighbors were William Anderson, John Anderson, William Bell, Granny Black, Joseph Everhart and others. These all lived in what is now Shenango Township, Mercer County.

James McConnell was the first to locate within the limits of the present borough. This occurred in 1821. Another portion of the borough was embraced in a 700-acre tract, which is said to have been patented in 1787 to James Gibson for services in the United States army. It subsequently became the property of Jacob Edeburn, from whom it descended to his son William. The latter had made some improvements prior to 1812 upon that portion of the tract lying west of the Shenango, outside of the present town limits. Six years later (1818) he built on the same side of the Shenango a log grist-mill, which was the first structure of the kind in the vicinity. It was but an ordinary institution, using a pair of native stones. Some three years subsequent to its completion James McConnell bought it and the tract of land upon which it stood for $1,250. A short time afterward he also purchased a small hewed log house, built by James Allen, half a mile west of Middlesex, and removed it to the vicinity of the mill. It with a small addition made a passable residence for himself and family. This was the first residence in West Middlesex, and the beginning of the town.

The town was laid out in the autumn of 1836 by James McConnell, son of Hugh McConnell, a settler of Meadville as early as 1794. The surveying was done by James Gilkey, noted as the first man to raise the celebrated Neshanock potatoes, also called "Mercers" and "Gilkies." He was assisted in his work by David McCleery, subsequently a justice of the peace in the borough. The lots, of which more than a hundred were laid out, were sold at auction, Thomas Mitcheltree being the auctioneer. The first one purchased was that upon which the Millers' and Miners' Bank was subsequently erected.

The place took its name from the fact that it is located about midway between New Castle and Clarksville, then two important places on the river and canal. There being another Middlesex in Eastern Pennsylvania Mr. McConnell prefixed the word West. Hence the full name, West Middlesex.

Business Interests.—Before the town was laid out several industries had developed. A number of settlers having arrived, lumber was also a prime necessity. Accordingly, William Edeburn had erected a saw-mill in 1830, and with it did a flourishing business. A year or two later James McConnell built a flouring-mill on the west side of the Shenango just below its predecessor and competitor, the old log mill. After the new mill, which used burrs instead of native stone, began operations, the old one was removed and occupied as a stable until it had fallen into decay. Demands and supplies are mutual, and constitute the real activity of business. A general store was needed, and one was supplied. D. Foreman kept it.

A tavern was also required; accordingly, W. M. Morrison began the erection of one in the year 1836, and pushed it vigorously until it was completed. May training day was chosen as the time for the grand opening. The attendance was large, as was usual on such occasions, and many inhaled the rich odors of the spiritus frumenti; or using the classic phrase of that time, "all got drunk together." The new town was thoroughly launched upon the sea of municipal existence. Among these early settlers mention should be made of Thomas Miles, J. W. Veach and 'Squire McCreary. The first justice of the peace was Robert Young. He was also the first postmaster, the office having been established in 1840.

The history of the old West Middlesex furnace, erected in 1845, is given in Chapter VI, to which the reader is referred for information on that subject.

The Ella and Fannie furnaces, leased by the Wheeler Furnace Company, of Sharon, is located here. They have two stacks. The Ella furnace, 70x15, built in 1882, occupies the site of the two Shenango furnaces, which were built by G. W. Tift in 1859, and after passing through various mutations, were torn down in 1882. Fannie furnace, 60x12½, was first put in blast October 13, 1873, and remodeled in 1885. These furnaces burn coke and work the Lake Superior ore, producing Bessemer pig iron. The annual capacity of the Ella furnace is 36,000 net tons, and of the Fannie furnace, 26,000 tons. E. A. Wheeler, of Sharon, is general manager, and Pickards, Mather & Co., Cleveland, Ohio, are proprietors and selling agents.

In 1859 David Edeburn built a steam grist-mill on the east side of the Shenango. It was intended mainly for custom work. The Love Brothers erected a steam saw and planing-mill on the same side of the Shenango. After doing an extensive business for a time it was burned down.

In April, 1874, J. D. Logan & Co. erected a steam planing-mill near the same site, and shortly thereafter attached a saw-mill, greatly adding to the facilities of the town.

A machine shop and foundry was commenced in 1874 and completed in 1875 by a stock company, of which Allen Turner was president, and William Jones, William R. Burnett, S. W. Johnson, Julius Turner and J. W. Russell were associate partners.

In 1872 the liberality of the citizens prompted them to offer a bonus of $10,000 in cash and five acres of land to any company which would build and operate a rolling mill in the borough. B. F. Veach, J. J. McFadden and John Winfield, citizens from Ohio, undertook the enterprise. The mill was erected in 1873, and operated for two years, when the company failed, and the works were purchased by the Fannie furnace. They are not running at present.

In 1866 J. W. Veach obtained a charter for organizing the first bank in the place, the Millers' and Miners' Bank. It is still in existence, meeting the business demands of the community. In 1871 W. W. Morrison established a private bank, which continued to do a prosperous business for a number of years.

Incorporation.—West Middlesex was regularly incorporated in 1864. Its first borough officers were: Burgess, D. Edeburn; council, C. W. Watson, Hiram Veach and G. R. Tuttle; justice of the peace, W. R. Burnett; constable, E. C. Kump; high constable, I. S. Newkirk; school directors, J. W. Veach, D. W. Luse and W. C. Shay; auditors, J. W. Porter and B. G. King; assessor, J. W. Porter; judge of election, F. M. Livermore; inspectors, Isaac Rayen and J. D. Risher.

Bridges.—In 1840 the first trestle or wooden bridge across the Shenango was built by James McCandless and Charles Quirrell. Two wooden bridges succeeded this crude structure, but in 1869 the present iron one was built.

Schools.—In 1837 a small frame house was built, which served the double purpose of school and church edifice for a time. It was used for school purposes until 1855, when a contract was made with John McCall to build a two-story frame, the upper story of which was to be used as a place of worship. It was paid for by the citizens in shares of $5 each. It served the educational purposes of the town until 1868, when the present three-story union school edifice was erected at a cost of $24,000. It is an ornament to the town. It is one of the best school edifices in the county. Its schools are well supported and efficiently managed.

Churches.—The Presbyterian is the oldest congregation in the borough. In fact it had an existence long prior to the town itself. The first preaching in the region was done by Rev. James Satterfield, his places of assembly being houses, barns and tents. For some length of time congregations met in a house belonging to the farm of Thomas Miles. Rev. Satterfield, the pioneer preacher of this region, was born in Maryland August, 1767. About twenty years thereafter he removed with his mother and step-father to Washington County, where he performed for a time the duties of a farmer. While in Washington County he was brought under the influence of Rev. Dr. McMillan, a distinguished theologian of those days, from whom he received an impulse in the ministerial direction. Licensed to preach September 3, 1800, he removed to Mercer County in 1801, and on the 3d day of March, 1802, was installed pastor of the congregations of Moorefield and Upper Neshannock (now Neshannock). He continued to preach for fifty-seven years, dying near West Middlesex, November 20, 1857, in his ninetieth year.

His work at Moorefield evidently had a great influence upon the surrounding country. The public school building erected in 1837, as also that of 1855, was a common place for worship by the several congregations of the town. The Presbyterians erected their first house of worship in 1842-43. The present beautiful brick structure was dedicated in the winter of 1887-88, under the pastorate of Rev. K. C. Hays, costing $8,000. The congregation was incorporated under the laws of the State January 14, 1878. Its pastors have been Rev. D. C. Reed, eighteen years; Rev. Brown, six years; Rev. F. M. Woods, seven years; Rev. W. M. Hyde, three years; Rev. Ken. C. Hayes its present pastor, about five years. The congregation numbers 190 members, and is quite prosperous.

The United Presbyterian congregation dates its origin from the year 1839, when some members of the Associate congregation, of Deer Creek congregation, living remote from their place of worship, desired to have preaching at West Middlesex. They requested their pastor, Rev. James Ramsey, to preach in the village for their accommodation, a portion of his time. He was disposed to do so, but was prevented by the unwillingness of his congregation. They then presented their petition to Rev. Douthett, of the Cross Roads congregation. His congregation, unwilling to spare his services on the Lord's day, were content to have him preach occasionally for these people on week-day evenings. He spoke for them several times; but when the intelligence was communicated to the Deer Creek congregation, they reported to the presbytery that the territory of their congregation had been invaded from without. He was ordered to confine his labors to his own congregation. The West Middlesex people then concluded to send to the Associate Reformed Presbytery of the Lakes for aid. Supplies were sent in harmony with the petition. Preaching was held, successively, in the Wilson school-house and Gundy's barn. Among the men sent were Revs. William Braden, Mr. Neal, John and William Friedley. This was about 1840. Two acres of land were purchased for $25, of John Byers, at the Cross Roads, two miles southwest of West Middlesex. The deed for the property bears date October 19, 1841. The congregation worshiped in a tent for a time, and was known as the Turkey Run Church. After the erection of a building, which occurred the same year, the name was changed to Beulah. The session records for September, 1841, bear that title. The house was a large and commodious one.

After the union in 1858, which produced the United Presbyterian Church, a part of the congregation, in 1860, removed to West Middlesex, and purchased the old Methodist Episcopal house for $800. The balance of the congregation refused to make the change, and continues at Beulah as a Reformed Presbyterian Church.

Rev. Thomas Mehard was with the congregation at Beulah from 1841 to 1845, and Rev. R. W. Oliver from 1846 to 1856. Rev. John Armstrong served them there and at West Middlesex from 1856 to 1868, since which latter date Rev. W. J. Snodgrass has been the pastor at West Middlesex. The congregation has now a new brick house of worship, and is said to be in a prosperous condition. It was regularly incorporated on the 19th of March, 1887.

The exact date of the organization of the Methodist Episcopal congregation is not known. The first preaching by a minister of this denomination was done somewhere in the year 1837, by a Rev. Parker, who held service in the dwelling of Charles Schooks. Itinerants passing through this region were generally accustomed to stopping and conducting short exercises of worship among the settlers; and although no records of such services have been preserved, if, indeed, any were made, yet it may readily be supposed that the spiritual wants of the early residents of what is now West Middlesex were not left wholly unprovided for. A revival of considerable intensity occurred in the year 1842, and shortly afterward regular church worship was begun. The present church, however, was not built until 1861. It is a brick structure 45x70 feet, and together with the improvements, made chiefly in 1872, cost $10,000. The complete list of preachers who served the congregation can not be given. It seems to have become a distinct charge about 1855, when its preacher was S. K. Paden. Following him came J. Uncles, 1856; C. R. Pattee, 1857-58; J. M. Green, 1859-60; P. P. Pinney, 1861; E. B. Lane, 1862-63; C. Wilson, 1864; J. W. Stogdill, 1865; W. H. Mossman, 1866-68; S. Albertson, 1869-71; G. W. Clark, 1872-74; J. Graham, 1875-77; J. Perry, 1878-79; R. M. Bear, 1880-83; A. R. Rich, 1884-85; W. H. Mossman, 1886, present pastor.

Societies.—West Middlesex Lodge No. 593, I. O. O. F., was chartered November 20, 1866, with twenty-one members, among whom were D. D. Collins, John Newkirk, Paris Mills, Henry J. Mosier, David Farrell, John Perry, Washington Reed and T. C. White. The first officers were D. D. Collins, N. G.; Paris Mills, V. G.; W. S. Powell and T. C. White, secretaries, and W. T. Reed, treasurer. The first meetings of the lodge were held in the Williamson (afterward called Jackson) House. A removal was made to the Morrison building after a period, into a room above the post-office, which was then located in the same building, near the river bridge. In the latter quarters a disastrous fire broke out October 17, 1880, which destroyed the charter and much valuable property of the lodge, thus necessitating the issuing of a new charter, which was done by the Grand Lodge October 22, of the same year.

Kedron Lodge No. 389, A. Y. M., was instituted June 17, 1867, in the old Jackson Hotel, with the following as charter officers: Andrew Bortz, W. M.; J. Stevenson, S. W.; D. F. Houston, J. W.; James Squire, treasurer; J. W. Hillier, secretary; William S. Powell, S. D.; J. W. Russell, J. D., and Henry Mosier, tyler. The name was selected by Andrew Bortz and Henry J. Mosier. The lodge met for five years in the Jackson House, after which, for a period of six years, meetings were held in the Morrison Building. They are now held in the A. O. U. W. Hall, on the 1st and 3d Mondays of each month, the removal of the lodge to its present quarters having been made about ten years ago, immediately after a fire, by which a large portion of the lodges's property was destroyed. The membership is at present thirty-one. The officers for 1888 are J. M. Johnson, W. M.; Samuel S. Gilbert, S. W.; Harry A. Raser, Jr. W.; R. A. Dunmire, secretary; F. M. Powell, treasurer, and J. B. Livingston, Rep. to G. L.

Post Marion, G. A. R., was established in 1869. It contained thirty members, with H. W. Warren as the first commander. It disbanded in 1872.

Alonzo McCall Post No. 456, G. A. R., was instituted August 12, 1884, with the following named charter members: J. W. Porter, H. M. Walker, George Hollibaugh, John Wood, David Farrell, R. C. Crossman, Cyrus Crossman, Alex. McCabe, George Shearer, R. C. Kemp, R. B. McLain, Joseph Bishop, R. E. Gundy, S. S. Gilbert, R. A. Dunmire, John Swezey, John Stephenson, F. M. Powell, A. W. Porter, Charles Hunt, Thomas Taylor, J. P. Arbaugh, J. W. Lytle, David Chapman, W. A. Rodgers, J. H. Greer, John Gundy and C. H. Mitcheltree. The post was named in honor of Alonzo McCall, son of John McCall, who was mustered as a private into Company B, Tenth Regiment Pennsylvania Cavlary, July 21, 1861, at Harrisburg, and was killed at Gettysburg, July, 1863, at the age of twenty years.

Bowman Lodge No. 12, A. O. U. W., was chartered July, 16, 1872. Its first officers were Mr. Fuisthwait, P. M. W.; N. R. Bowman, M. W.; C. C. Davis, G. F.; John Boal, O.; J. K. McBurney, recorder; D. M. Downing, Fin.; William Mitchell, Rec.; Peter Gundy, G.; James Butler, J. W., and G. T. Dunmire, O. W.

West Middlesex Union No. 409, E. A. U., was organized January 17, 1884, with the following named charter officers: Noah Ginger, Chan.; William A. Reedle, Add.; John A. Glenn, president; Thomas J. Hyde, vice-president; Mrs. Mira Veach, Aux.; Hiram Veach, treasurer; R. W. Jackson, secretary; W. J. Davidson, Aect.; Mrs. M. E. Dunmire, chaplain; F. M. McBride, warden; John D. Truxell, Sent., and Charles Fillenbaum, watchman.

Shenango Assembly No. 8439, K. of L., was instituted August 20, 1886.

It has a large membership, and is one of the important orders of the place.

The local union of the W. C. T. U. owes its origin to the Woman's temperance crusade of 1873-74. This developed into the Woman's Temperance League, organized in March, 1875, which, in the following June, was changed into the West Middlesex branch of the Mercer County W. C. T. U. Among the original members of this branch were Mrs. Maria Pendergast, Mrs. Hannah Edeburn, Mrs. R. A. Henderson and Mrs. Emily Rayen, the latter of whom was appointed vice-president of the Board of West Middlesex and vicinity by the county union. The work was continued under this title until April 30, 1882, when the local union was organized by Mrs. A. P. Hamilton, of Sharon, and the following officers elected: President, Mrs. W. M. Hyde; vice-presidents, Mrs. Emily Rayen, Mrs. S. J. Randall and Mrs. J. B. Livingston; Rec. Sec., Mrs. S. E. Satterfield; Cor. Sec., Mrs. F. M. Powell, and treasurer, Mrs. R. A. Henderson. Among the members were Mrs. G. W. Clark, Mrs. McCall Allen, Mrs. Frank Espy, Mrs. M. J. Downing, Mrs. Rev. Woods, Mrs. J. McConnell, Mrs. R. W. Jackson, Mrs. A. Lyons, Mrs. Belle McFoose, Mrs. A. E. Davidson, Mrs. T. J. Hyde, Mrs. C. Lineberger, Mrs. E. Johnston, Mrs. William Jones, Mrs. J. Byers, Mrs. E. Lytle, Miss Mary Gibson, Mrs. Rev. Graham, Mrs. Rev. Bear, Mrs. J. P. Arbaugh, Mrs. Ella Dunmire, Mrs. H. Gundy, Mrs. R. Turner, Mrs. M. Gundy and Miss H. Brock. Meetings are held on the last Friday of each month in private houses or churches. Since the organization of the union there have been sixty names enrolled, many of whom have removed from the place, and four have died. The regular paying membership is at present seventeen. The condition of the local society has never been better.

West Middlesex had a population in 1870 of 888, and in 1880, 918. It now claims over 1,000 inhabitants.

WHEATLAND.

Wheatland, located on the southwest corner of Hickory Township, is one of the boroughs upon which the word Ichabod has been written; its apparent glory has departed. It was laid out by James Wood and Sons, of Pittsburgh, in 1872. Being a strong Democrat Mr. Wood named the new town Wheatland, in honor of President Buchanan's residence, near Lancaster, Penn. It was created a borough by special act of the Legislature, approved February 21, 1872.

Its first officers were: Burgess, John Horton; council, Joseph Coles, N. N. Allen, Andrew Shilling, F. C. Van Dusen, Thomas Jones and John Watkins; constables, Benjamin Boyer and E. M. Fair; school directors, L. N. Wood, Samuel McClure, Philip Jones, William B. Maxwell, Henry Shilling and David Dorman; justice of the peace, J. G. Walker; police justice, Christopher Lewis.

In the list of early settlers in this region may be mentioned George Shilling. He came from Westmoreland County in 1814, and located on or near the present site of Wheatland. He bought of John Thompson 200 acres of land, against which the New Bedford Land Company held a warrant claim. Suit for ejection was brought against him in the Mercer County courts, and he won. The case was carried to the Supreme Court at Pittsburgh, by which the decision of the lower court was reversed on the ground that Thompson in securing the patent recognized the validity of the warrant claim and took his risk. After many years' experience in one of the most celebrated and bitterly contested law-suits ever prosecuted in Western Pennsylvania, Mr. Shilling had finally to buy the land a second time to quiet the title, paying $2,120 for a 400-acre tract. It was worth the price to get it, and the children made the money to pay for it by raising crops of corn and rye. He was married in Westmoreland County to Elizabeth McBride, by whom he had seven children, the first four of whom were born in Westmoreland, the last three in Mercer County. Their names were George, still living in Lackawannock Township; Andrew, living near Wheatland in his seventy-ninth year; Samuel, residing in Sharon; Henry, deceased; Mary, deceased; Sarah, deceased, and William, residing in Iowa. Mrs. Shilling was buried January 1, 1837, aged fifty years. Mr. Shilling died in February, 1860, at the age of seventy-nine. He lived for a season after his arrival on the place now owned by Elijah Baker, and then removed to the present site of Wheatland, on that portion of land now owned by his son Andrew.

Among his early neighbors were William ("Billy") Haywood, who lived on the farm now owned by John J. Spearman, 'Squire Canon, father of John Canon and great-grandfather of Supt. J. W. Canon, of the Sharon schools; he lived on the Shenango, half way between Wheatland and Middlesex, on the farm now owned by Mrs. John Welch. He arrived in 1797, and was a justice of the peace for many years. He married twice. By the first wife, Rachel, he had Moses, John, Ross and Thomas, and by the second wife, James, William, Samuel and Peggy.

Rev. James Satterfield lived near the Canon place. A sketch of him is found in connection with the Presbyterian Church of West Middlesex. Jacob Trout, father of Hon. M. C. Trout (deceased), came from Westmoreland County about the same time as the Shillings, and settled on part of the land now owned by Mrs. M. C. Trout.

Dr. John Mitcheltree and his brothers, James, Thomas and William, came from Ireland and settled southwest of the Shenango, opposite and a mile and half from Wheatland. Dr. John practiced medicine here. He married Jane, oldest sister of Dr. J. M. Irvine. He was one of the earliest practicing physicians in this region. Contemporaneous with him was Dr. Elijah Flower, of Brookfield, Ohio, a pretty good physician for the times.

William Campbell was a former resident of the Shenango region. He was here when the Shillings came.

Thomas Bronson, colored, joined with George Shilling in buying 200 acres of land near Charlestown. He lived on the Shenango, within the present boundary limits of Wheatland, and was an old man at the time of his death. His descendants are numerous, many of them living near Charlestown and Sharpsville. Pratt Collins, Charles Caldwell, William Elliott and William Jackson were likewise settlers at the same time with Shilling.

Schools.—Andrew Shilling relates that during the "winter of the deep snow," viz., 1817, he attended school on the William Haywood farm, now owned by John J. Spearman. The teacher was "Master Wilson." He was an old man, and wore buckskin breeches. He was accustomed to sit in the corner of the room and rub his pants with clay to clean them. He used to make the girls come and kiss him. Some of the pupils of that day were the Bentleys, the Haywoods, the Quinbys, the Carmichaels, etc. The deep snow which fell February 4, of that year, came nigh preventing his returning home. Fences were all covered except the stakes and riders. Deer were caught by the dogs in the snow. Smaller pupils were kept at home for weeks. Benjamin Reno was also an old teacher.

The borough has, at present, a school building for four departments. The structure was erected in 1871, and is valued at $4,000.

Manufactures.—Wheatland in its palmy days was an enterprising place, numbering from 2,000 to 3,000 inhabitants. Its era of prosperity began when, in 1862, William Byers, of Youngstown, George Rhodeman and others, having bought six acres of ground at $75 per acre, began the erection of furnaces 1 and 2. The second was built in 1863. No. 1 has been repaired twice. Both have been standing idle since the firm went into bankruptcy. At first they did a good business. John J. Spearman, now of Sharon, ran them successfully for about eight years. In 1863-64 Mr. Andrew Shilling sold some fifty-four acres to the furnace for $5,000. Henry Shilling exchanged some land with the furnace for two acres, which they owned. The purpose was to let the company have shipping facilities on the canal. Furnaces 3 and 4 were erected in 1864. They have long since ceased to exist.

On the 11th of February, 1881, was incorporated the Wheatland Bessemer Steel Company, with a capital stock of $25,000, divided into 250 shares of $100 each. Its board of directors was James W. Friend, president; Harry T. Friend, clerk; John C. Arnold, treasurer.

On the 11th of April, 1887, was incorporated, for the purpose of manufacturing iron and steel, the Wheatland Iron Company. Its officers were: B. B. Reath, president; James W. Friend, vice-president; and Harry T. Friend, secretary and treasurer. An active business was done for a time, and new life began to manifest itself in the borough. The works closed in the summer of 1887, and remained in such condition through the rest of the year, and up to the fall of 1888. Operations have recently been resumed, and if successful Wheatland will again become prosperous.

Churches.—The Methodist Episcopal Church of Wheatland owes its existence to the beneficence of Mrs. James Wood, wife of the man who laid out and named the town. She gave the lot and furnished the means for erecting the building. The organization occurred about 1868, Rev. J. Perry supervising the matter. The strength of the congregation depending upon the mills, its prosperity fluctuated with the changes occurring in their business. The neat little edifice was erected about 1870. The congregation was incorporated September 24, 1870. Following is the list of its preachers: J. Perry, 1869; G. Dunmire, 1870; B. F. Delo, 1871; J. H. Vance, 1872-74; J. F. Hill, 1875; J. Graham, 1876; W. P. Graham, 1877-78; C. E. Locke, 1879; James Ballantine, 1880-82; Otho Brant, 1883; John Crill, 1884; John C. Womer, 1885-87; Rev. Knowles, 1887.

The Welsh Congregational Church was organized August 11, 1872, in the Methodist Episcopal Church, by Rev. John Edwards, assisted by Rev. O. Owens, of Pittsburgh, and Rev. O. W. Owen, of Coalburg. The original members consisted of W. Phillips and wife, I. David and wife, Mary Williams, John B. Bowers, M. A. Jenkins, Catt Phillips, J. Price, Nancy Edmunds, D. John and wife, Lewis Griffith, W. Brenan and wife, T. Richard and wife, W. Thomas and wife, W. S. Morgan, W. D. Lewis and wife, J. Jarrett and wife, John L. Phillips, Mrs. E. Armstrong, Ann Jenkins, D. Jenkins, Richard Jenkins, Hanna Williams, Enloe Evans, William Watkins, James Garrett, Ellen Goodhall, W. F. Morgan, Mary Rowlands, M. Yeenis, R. Jones, T. Z. Jones, Ella Thomas, Ann Jones. J. Richard and wife, D. J. Jones and Eliza Jones. The congregation has had but one regular pastor, the present one, Rev. Thomas M. Griffith. The church services are held at present in the school-house, as no regular church building has yet been built, but it is the intention to commence the erection of a suitable chapel in the near future. The congregation has a membership of thirty-three.

Holy Trinity Catholic Church was established by Rev. William Coonan about 1871-72. Wheatland was then a prosperous manufacturing town, and many of the iron workers were Catholics. A large frame church was erected by Father Coonan, and for several years the congregation was in a flourishing condition. In 1878 Rev. Bernard Lynch succeeded Father Coonan, and the following year Rev. Patrick Cosgrove became pastor. He served the congregation some two years, when the decline of the town, caused by the mills shutting down, did not justify a resident pastor, and Holy Trinity was placed under the charge of the pastor at Sharpsville, where it has since remained. Fathers Coonan, Lynch and Cosgrove also ministered to the Sharpsville congregation during a part of their pastorates at Wheatland. Holy Trinity has dwindled down to a few families, but if the mills again start up successfully, which is now probable, its old-time prosperity will doubtless return.

BETHEL.

Situated near the corner of Hickory, Shenango and Lackawannock Townships is the village of Bethel. It was incorporated as a borough May 22, 1872. Prior to that time there had existed a little village known as Sempletown, or Semple's Mills. At the time of incorporation, however, a regular tract, taken from the three townships already mentioned, was laid out in the form of a rectangle.

The first settlement in the place was made in March, 1846, when S. S. Semple, its first resident, erected a small frame dwelling-house. His father, David Semple, had, some years previous, purchased the land from David Kitch, but had made no improvements.

In 1862 James McConnell and Thompson Hyde had erected a steam saw-mill, which rapidly swept away the woods. In 1871 S. S. Semple erected a second mill, of grander proportions, which added much to the business of the village.

Semple, Thompson & Co. erected, in 1863, a large grist-mill, a three-story building with three sets of burrs, and intended mainly for custom work. It became a source of great interest and prosperity to the vicinity.

A store was also needed. This want was supplied in 1868 by S. S. Semple, the enterprising godfather of the place, who was ready to take hold of every enterprise. He erected the building subsequently used by T. J. Marshall & Co., and put in a stock of goods well adapted to the trade. It passed through various changes to accomplish its purpose as a permanent business of the place.

Bethel was named in honor of Bethel United Presbyterian Church, near by, in Hickory Township.

The Christian Church, which for a time held its meetings near the borough, has ceased to exist, owing to the closing of mining operations. The same causes operated also against the United Brethren Church.

The first school-house, a small frame building, in the place was erected in 1871. Miss Sarah White was the first teacher. In 1873 a larger and more commodious structure was erected.

Coal-mining was for years the industry which sustained the place. The subsidence of that industry has had a depressing effect.

The first borough election was held in October, 1872, at which time twenty-eight votes were cast. The result was: Burgess, John Wood; council, James Howard, D. W. Semple and Isaac Hilkirk; assessor, Hugh Bond; constable, John Carter; justice of the peace, W. T. Reed.

The first postmaster was S. S. Semple, the office being called Wheeler. He continued to hold his place until the time of his death, August 22, 1874.

JAMESTOWN is located in Greene Township in the northwest part of Mercer County, at the crossing of the Erie & Pittsburgh and the Lake Shore (Jamestown and Franklin branch) Railroads.

James Campbell, after whom the town was named and on whose land it was built up, was the first settler. He came from County Antrim, Ireland, in 1798. He located on what is known as Seminary Hill, and his dwelling place for several years was a cave. He died in 1850 at the advanced age of ninety-seven years, and his remains rest in the old Seceder grave-yard at Greenville. When Mr. Campbell came to this locality, he secured a "tract" of 400 acres at $1.25 per acre. He had four sons, John, William, James and Nathan, to each of whom he gave 100 acres. His improvements were on the east hundred acre tract, the portion he gave to William. About the year 1799 he built a small log house, into which he removed his family from the cave in the side of the hill, and in which he continued to reside for many years with all the contentment of mind which characterized the pioneer settlers.

Between the years 1815 and 1817 Campbell purchased forty acres additional. This small tract included a mill site and attendant privileges on the Shenango. Upon it John and James Campbell, Jr., built a grist-mill out of hewed logs, a little above the site of the Brackin and Carr Mill, which was burned May 3, 1886. The mill is said to have commenced operations in February, 1817. It stood until 1856, when the new one was built. It was the first grist-mill in the place, and really the first improvement. Like similar enterprises elsewhere, it was the nucleus of the future town. Near this mill a small shanty of round logs was erected about the same time to accommodate the mill hands. It was an inferior abode, but served its purpose. It was subsequently used as a dwelling by James Campbell, Jr., being then the only abode of the kind within the town limits.

The second dwelling within the borough limits was a small frame house erected and owned by James Campbell, Jr. It has undergone many efforts at preservation and ornamentation, and when last heard from was still standing as a relic of the olden times.

Little progress was made in the prospective town prior to 1831. At that time John Williamson, still a resident of Jamestown, built the first store-room in the place, and the second frame structure. It was 18x34 feet, in one end of which, as was the custom in early days, he dwelt. This structure stood upon the lot on which the Reed property was burned a few years ago. Williamson was the first justice of the peace, being appointed in 1832. The next year he became postmaster, and J. B. Herrick was his successor as justice.

In March, 1832, John Keck, Esq., laid out a village, and desired John Williamson to give it a name. In honor of the original settler, James Campbell, it was christened "Jamestown," a designation it has never changed. This was the era of a new growth. People began to flock into the place. Lots were purchased and a spirit of enterprise and thrift began to manifest itself. The town was incorporated in 1854, and assumed the dignity of a borough.

The first tailor was William Rodgers. He put up a frame building in 1832, which was subsequently used by Dr. Gibson as a store-room.

The first tannery was built in 1832 by Andrew Irvin. It stood on land subsequently owned by Dr. Gibson.

The first blacksmith shop was erected in 1834 by Matthew Hunter; the year following the first saw-mill was erected by John Williamson for John Carr. It supplied a long-felt want, lumber being a great necessity in the growth of a town.

Early Physicians.—The first physician who located in Jamestown was Dr. James Dowling. He arrived in the spring of 1832, and lived in a part of Williamson's house. The following year he bought the Williamson property, and soon thereafter built a residence of his own. He was a genial man and a successful physician. He continued in the village until 1836, when he sold to Dr. William Gibson, just arrived, and removed to Brookville, Penn., where he died some time in the seventies.

Dr. William Gibson, whose sketch is found in the Medical chapter, was the second physician. He was a recognized power in Jamestown. Attention is here called to an address that was written by him in 1867. It is an admirably well-prepared document:

To His Imperial Majesty, Alexander I, Emperor of Russia:

We are a handful of private citizens of America, traveling simply for recreation, and unostentatiously, as becomes our unofficial state, and therefore we have no excuse to tender for presenting ourselves before your majesty, save the desire of offering our grateful acknowledgments to the Lord of a realm which, through good and through evil report, has been the steadfast friend of the land we love so well. We could not presume to take a step like this, did we not know well that the words we speak here, and the sentiments wherewith they are freighted, are but the reflex of the thoughts and the feelings of all our countrymen, from the green hills of New England to the snowy peaks of the far Pacific. We are few in number, but we utter the voice of a nation. One of the brightest pages that has graced the world's history since written history had its birth, was reorded by your Majesty's hand when it loosed the bonds of twenty millions of serfs; and Americans can but esteem it a privilege to do honor to a ruler who has wrought so great a deed. The lesson that was taught us then, we have profited by, and are free in truth to-day, even as we were before in name. America owes much to Russia—is indebted to her in many ways, and chiefly for her unwavering friendship in seasons of our greatest need. That that friendship may still be hers in time to come we confidently pray; that she is and will be grateful to Russia, and to her sovereign, for it, we know full well; that she will ever forfeit it by any premeditated, unjust act, or unfair course, it were treason to believe.

Respectfully tendered on behalf of the excursionists on board American steam yacht Quaker City, Yalta, August 26, 1867.

SAMUEL L. CLEMENS, (Mark Twain), Cal.,
WILLIAM GIBSON, M. D., Jamestown, Penn.,
TIMOTHY D. CROCKER, Cleveland, Ohio.
S. N. SANFORD, Cleveland, Ohio.
COLONEL P. KINNEY, Portsmouth, Ohio.

Committee.

D. D. LEARY, New York, Chairman.

Railroads.—In 1853 the Pittsburgh & Erie Railroad project was started, Dr. Gibson being an active participant in the enterprise. After expending about $125,000 upon it, the work stopped for about six years, when a new company called the Erie & Pittsburgh was formed. It completed the line from Erie to Jamestown by December 25, 1859, and thence to New Castle several years later.

The Franklin & Jamestown Railroad, of which Dr. Gibson was president, was started in the winter of 1862–63. Its history will be found in the chapter on Internal Affairs.

Schools.—The first school building was a one-story frame with two rooms, which stood on the hill on the north side of town. It was an academy, and stood in Crawford County. Rev. John Gamble, father of Dr. D. Gamble, was principal. Students came from far and near to attend—some even from Kentucky. Mercer, Meadville, Erie and other places were represented. John Rankin, of Mercer, William M. Stephenson, Samuel Griffith and other men of renown were pupils of his. The building was finally burned down.

The institution of learning which, during its active existence, gave Jamestown notoriety was the Jamestown Seminary, which was regularly incorporated on the 22d of April, 1858, by Dr. William Gibson, Dr. S. G. Clark, John Carr, Jacob Rogers, William Douthitt, W. W. Neverson and Rev. H. H. Hervey. The first corps of officers consisted as follows: President, Rev. H. H. Hervey; secretary, W. W. Neverson; treasurer, John Carr. Two acres of ground, bought from James McMaster, constituted the site, a beautiful one, too. Upon this the two-story frame structure, with three rooms below and two above, was erected in 1862 at a cost of some $2,000. In 1860 Isaac Collins, Joseph McKee and Miss Ellen McKee came to town and organized a school in an old school-house of two rooms. One teacher occupied a hall on Water Street. They continued thus to operate until the Seminary building was completed, when work began in it. The first principal was Isaac Collins. Some of his successors were A. S. Abbey, W. J. Snodgrass, J. R. Wallace, James W. Stewart, James M. Fulton, H. H. McMaster, etc. The building has been standing unoccupied for several years.

The Union Schools were established about 1878, in the building that now stands on Jackson Street, and is used as a town house. The principal teacher was James McConnahey. The next principal in the same building was C. I. Mullen. About the holidays of 1880 the schools were transferred to the present commodious brick building, which had just been completed at a cost of $8,000. In the list of principals were Charles W. Dean, A. S. Abbey, T. S. McCanless, L. T. McCartney and M. A. Sutton, the present incumbent. At the time of the organization of schools the board consisted as follows: President, J. Andrews; secretary, D. Gamble, J. H. Carr, B. F. Underslice, T. G. Moats and James McMaster.

Recent Fires.—In March, 1887, a severe fire occurred, which swept away a large part of the business portion of the town. The Moats House, in which it originated, and five store-rooms, belonging respectively to a citizen of Chicago, William Ross, Mrs. Brown, John Davis and Mr. Raymond, were consumed. These were all on the northwest side of Main Street. Immediately south of the Moats House was the Reed building, used, at that time, as a hardware store by Fred Alden. It, too, was consumed. The fire broke out about midnight in the hotel barn, and soon spread to the adjoining buildings. Its origin was a mystery. The loss was large, amounting to some $25,000 or $30,000, most of which was covered with insurance. Loss, about $25,000.

About a year previous a grist-mill, belonging to Carr, Brackin & Co., was burned. The mill was erected originally by John Reed and Thomas Sherbondy. It was subsequently bought by Henry Homer, who converted it into the roller process.

Banks.—The Jamestown Banking Company was organized July 21, 1874, with a capital stock of $50,000, in shares of $100 each. Its first corps of officers consisted of Dr. William Gibson, president; James McMaster, vice-president, and W. W. Davis, cashier. Dr. Gibson, at his death, was succeeded by James McMaster, the present incumbent. The vice-president is G. C. Campbell, and the cashier, W. A. McMaster. The firm does a general banking business.

About the same time, or probably a month later than the other, was organized the Jamestown Savings Bank, a private banking concern, whose partners were Samuel Gardner, David Anderson, George Fetterman, Capt. William Thomas, Jasper Fetterman, David Carr, Joseph S. Blair and others. The capital stock was $50,000. Its original officers were: George Fetterman, president; David Anderson, vice-president; I. W. Worrell, cashier. The last named gentleman was succeeded by John Morehead and S. R. Martin. It closed business January 19, 1885, by making an assignment to L. A. McCrumb and W. A. McMaster, receivers.

Societies.—Adelphic Lodge No. 424, F. & A. M., was constituted in September, 1868, by G. D. Kughler, D. D. G. M., of Greenville, assisted by William Himrod, D. D. G. M., of Erie, with the following members: L. A. McCrumb, W. M.; William L. Riley, S. W.; E. P. Foster, J. W.; Charles Carr, secretary; James Rogers, treasurer; James McElhager, J. H. Carr, Samuel H. Rogers, Rev. F. A. Archibald and William Laughrey. The first place of meeting was a third story of a frame building now standing on Water Street, and used for society purposes. In 1874 the lodge had rooms fitted up in the Carr Block, and have continued to use them ever since. The membership at present is seventy.

Jamestown Lodge No. 482, K. of P., was chartered June 29, 1882, with forty-five members. Its first corps of officers was as follows: M. G. McElhaney, P. C.; F. P. Calhoun, C. C.; F. L. Belknap, V. C.; W. W. Thompson, prelate; A. H. Bell, M. E.; S. L. Robb, M. F.; F. S. Alden, K. of R. & S.; J. F. Robertson, M. A.; A. J. McElhaney, I. G.; William Eich, O. G. It meets every Thursday evening in Masonic hall.

The Royal Templars of Temperance were organized in the autumn of 1878. Among the early members were D. L. Calkins and wife, George V. Burgess and wife, Nelson McDowell and wife, Charles Truesdale and wife, Henry Forrest and wife, George Forrest and wife, Dr. T. H. Mitchell, and others. In the fall of 1880 a division occurred. The original society, The North Star, was continued in the same hall (Masonic), while the colony, Ross, went to the Grangers' hall on Water Street. The North Star having had some difficulty with the Supreme Councillor, surrendered its charter in 1881. The Ross continues to meet, and has a quasi existence.

About 1872 a lodge of A. O. U. W. was organized, but it surrendered its charter in 1883.

Robert Porter Post No. 326, G. A. R., was organized April 20, 1883, in Adelphic hall, with the following members: N. F. Ellis, William R. Ross, William Eich, William Artman, Albert H. Artman, Abram Artman, William Harris, Henry H. Forrest, John Forrest, Stephen Mosier, John Massena, Robert Q. Snodgrass, T. F. Sullivan, W. H. Harris, C. Sheppard, Joseph Truesdale, Theron F. Cook, James Maxwell and John W. Marshall. Its first corps of officers consisted of N. F. Ellis, P. C.; John Massena, Adjt.; William R.

Ross, O. D.; Stephen Mosier, J. V. C.; Abram Artman, S. V. C.; W. H. Harris, Q. M.; John Forrest, Chap.; T. F. Sullivan, Surg.; Corydon Sheppard, O. G.; R. Q. Snodgrass, I. G.; Albert H. Artman, S. M.; Henry Forrest, Q. M. S. The post meets the first and third Saturdays of every month. Its present membership is twenty-two, with condition prosperous.

The W. C. T. U. was organized in the Presbyterian Church on the 30th of July, 1885, by Mrs. A. P. Hamilton, of Sharon. The original members were Misses Kate Burton and Kate E. Sloan, Mrs. J. L. Dennison, Mrs. James Rogers, Mrs. D. L. Calkins, Mrs. S. Sargent, Mrs. Alexander Calhoun, Mrs. Joseph McClymonds and Mrs. Robert McCartney. These ladies selected, as their first corps of officers, the following: President, Miss Kate Burton; vice-president, Mrs. S. Sargent; recording secretary, Mrs. D. L. Calkins; corresponding secretary, Mrs. James Rogers; treasurer, Mrs. Alex. Calhoun. The union has made vigorous fights against licenses being granted to hotels, and has been successful. The present membership, twenty-five in number, is said to be in a prosperous condition.

Churches.—It seems that Samuel T. Smith, a member of the Lake Erie Presbytery, of the Associate Reformed Presbyterian Church, was one of the first preachers to proclaim the word in this vicinity. This he did in a series of discourses prior to 1840. About this date originated a congregation of that faith, the preaching being done at the house of Andrew McMaster, father of James McMaster. The elders in the congregation at the time were Andrew McMaster and William Calvert. From 1840 to 1846 Mr. Smith preached occasionally, sometimes in the house and sometimes in the barn of Mr. McMaster, and occasionally in the Gamble school-house. Early members were William Calvert and wife, Daniel McClurg, Andrew McMaster and wife, Mrs. Jane Snodgrass, Mrs. Rebecca Carr, James Calvert and wife, James McMaster, Sr., and wife, John Williamson and wife, Samuel Calvert and wife, William Gibson, M. D., and wife; total, seventeen. The regular organization occurred in 1853, about twelve or thirteen years after the first association. After the death of Mr. Smith, in 1846, a number of young preachers gave their labors to the congregation, among whom were Revs. Cannon, McAdams, Forsythe, Robert Audley Brown, John Dick, D. R. Kerr, Kelso, Patterson Mehard, Campbell and Dalzell. Their labors continued up to 1849 or 1850. Following these dates a short vacancy occurred. In 1851 or 1852 Rev. H. H. Hervey was installed pastor of Crooked Creek and North Shenango. He also ministered to Jamestown as a branch of the Crooked Creek charge. Shortly after this, October 28, 1853, he organized a regular congregation under the title of the Associate Reformed Presbyterians of Jamestown, Samuel Calvert and Robert Williamson being ruling elders. It continued to move on peacefully until the union in 1858. About 1847 steps were taken for the erection of a house of worship. The subscription not being all collected, the house was enclosed with difficulty. Finally, about 1852, an agreement was made between the Associate Reformed congregation, of Jamestown, and the Shenango congregation of the Associate Church, by which the latter was to complete the house for the privilege of enjoying its use for worship. Thus was completed the first building.

In 1801-02 Rev. Daniel McLean, who had settled in South Shenango Township, Crawford County, established there a congregation of the Associate or Seceder Church. He began to visit the community of Jamestown about 1852, and his preaching resulted in the organization of a small congregation in 1853. In its ranks were Robert Snodgrass, Sr., and wife, Jacob Rogers and wife, Robert Snodgrass, Jr., and wife, William Douthitt and wife, John Brooks and wife, James M. Snodgrass and wife, Quinton Brooks and wife. Total, fourteen. The first session consisted of Robert Snodgrass, Sr., Jacob Rogers and Quinton Brooks, Andrew Thompson being subsequently added. Rev. Daniel McLean was the pastor by natural selection until his death, in 1854. Subsequently preaching was done for the congregation by Revs. Bruce, Brownlee, Hindman, Strong and Gilmore. The occasional preaching was supplanted by the regular preaching of Rev. Hervey. A friendly feeling finally resulted in the permanent union of 1858. The United Presbyterian congregation was formed of these two elements, by the general union which occurred in Pittsburgh in May, 1858. The union gave to Jamestown about 100 members. Rev. T. J. Kennedy was the first pastor, and continued one-fourth of his time for seven years. Following him were Revs. H. F. Stewart and J. R. Wallace. The present brick house was erected in 1874, costing about $8,000.

The Methodist Church was organized about 1855. Some of its original members were John Fidler, Thomas Sherbondy, D. G. Clark, Jonathan and David Hoover, John Koonce and wife, William F. Johnson, Elias Bates, James Frame, Irvin West and J. W. Clark. The first meetings were held in the borough school-house. This was the case until about 1859-60, when the present frame house, 40x45, was erected, at a cost of $1,800. It was built under the pastorate of Rev. A. J. Merchant. The building committee consisted of Thomas Sherbondy, William F. Johnson, D. G. Clark, J. W. Clark and Irvin West. The builder was a Mr. Moffett, of Jamestown. A parsonage was built on the same grounds in 1865, at a cost of about $1,000.

The church edifice has undergone repairs from time to time. The following is a list of the pastors: E. T. Wheeler, 1858; A. J. Merchant, 1859-60; S. A. Milroy, 1861; I. Scofield, 1862-63; W. A. Clark, 1864; S. S. Burton, one-fourth year, 1865; T. Radcliffe, three-fourths year, 1865; G. W. Anderson, 1866; F. A. Fairchild, 1867-68; S. Heard, 1869; S. L. Wilkinson, 1870; C. Wilson, 1871; A. S. Goodrich, 1872-73; E. D. McCreary, 1874-75; W. Hollister, 1876-77; R. M. Bear, 1878-79; J. M. Crouch, 1880-82; G. W. Chesbro, 1883-85; O. G. McIntire, 1886-88.

The First Baptist Church was organized in the autumn of 1870 by Rev. J. W. Snyder, with J. T. English and wife, Cynthia Moats, Mrs. John St. Clair, Charles Truesdale and wife, William Truesdale and wife and Mrs. Charles Fowler as charter members. The house of worship, a frame structure 40x70, was erected in 1874 at a cost of about $4,000. The congregation has a membership of eighty, with a large Sunday-school in flourishing condition. It has been served, in succession, by the following pastors: J. W. Snyder, G. T. Griffith, W. B. Skinner, J. P. Hile, Rev. Rapson and D. H. Dennison.

The Presbyterian Church was organized November 5, 1873, by Revs. J. E. Wright, of Greenville, and J. R. Findley, of Mercer. In the fall of 1872 (September 5) Rev. John Rice, of Sandy Lake, preached two sermons in Jamestown, and in October following Rev. Isaac McVitty preached one in the Methodist Episcopal Church. This was the beginning of Presbyterianism in Jamestown. At its meeting in Greenville, December 3, 1872, the Presbytery of Erie appointed supplies for Jamestown until the next meeting of that body. The following ministers performed such duty: J. E. Wright, of Greenville; Richard Craighead, of Meadville; J. R. Findley, of Mercer; S. J. M. Eaton, of Franklin; W. S. Wright, of Erie; Rev. Thompson, of Pittsburgh Seminary; J. Vance, of Erie, and Nathan McFertridge, of Oil City. Some of these services were held in the United Presbyterian Church, and some in the Gibson

Hall. At a meeting of the presbytery in April, 1873, Rev. James Lafferty was appointed a stated supply for Jamestown and Sandy Lake. These services were held in Gibson's Hall until the 29th of June, when they were removed to the public school building. Interest increasing steadily, a complete organization was effected in the Methodist Episcopal Church November 5, with twelve members, eight by certificate and four by profession of their faith. In 1874 the present house of worship, a frame 36x60, was erected at a cost of $6,600, including the grounds. The following is the list of pastors: James Lafferty, two years; D. R. Kerr, seven years; J. B. Fleming, three years; J. P. Irwin, present pastor began March, 1887.

St. Bridget's Catholic Church was a mission for many years before it was organized as a congregation, and was occasionally attended by the pastor of St. Michael's Church, of Greenville, who held services in private houses. Among the original families were those of John Savage, Michael Conway, John Flaherty and Patrick O'Donnell. In 1874 Rev. Thomas Tracy, of Greenville, built the present frame church, 40x80, and it was dedicated and the congregation organized in August, of that year, under the name of St. Bridget. Father Tracey announced to the congregation, on the day of dedication, that whoever would give the largest donation toward paying off the indebtedness on the new church would have the privilege of selecting the name. A spirited contest resulted, and to Mrs. Bridget Doyle, wife of Mark Doyle, of West Salem Township, both since deceased, fell the honor of choosing the name of her patron saint as that of the new congregation. In July, 1876, Rev. Bernard Donohoe, also of Greenville, succeeded Father Tracy. He finished the interior and paid off quite a large debt which was hanging over the congregation. He was succeeded in April, 1882, by Rev. Peter Brady, the first resident pastor at Jamestown, who remained until the following autumn. Rev. John Smith was his successor. In May, 1883, Rev. J. H. McAdam became pastor of the congregation, and remained until the spring of 1887, when Father Donohoe again took charge of Jamestown in connection with Greenville. St. Bridget's congregation has decreased in strength, owing to many of its members removing elsewhere, and it now numbers only about fifteen families, though a number of families belonging to St. Michael's, at Greenville, usually attend services at Jamestown.

Cemeteries.—Jamestown has two cemeteries. The first, known as Jamestown Cemetery, was incorporated on the 22d of August, 1867, the petitioners for the charter being J. H. Carr, Thomas Foster, Dr. William Gibson, James Throop and James McMaster. The grounds are pleasantly located.

On the 13th of June, 1887, Park Lawn Cemetery was incorporated by William T. Clark, W. B. Plant, Dr. William Gibson, W. A. McMaster and A. O. Moreland. The capital stock was fixed at 1,500 shares of $50 each. The site is between the Jamestown Cemetery and the village. In it is the fine monument erected to the memory of Dr. Gibson, since deceased.

In 1860 Jamestown had a population of 256; in 1870, 572, and in 1880, 974. This shows a steady growth for the two decades between 1860 and 1880.

CLARKSVILLE.

Clarksville was laid out in 1829 by Samuel Clark, the owner of the land upon which the site is located, and recorded September 13, 1832. Forty-nine lots were laid out and sold. From the plat now on record we find that the streets were Mill, Bridge, Orchard, Meadow and Second. It was incorporated on May 5, 1848. The first list of officers embraced the following: Burgess, Charles Koonce; council, John Wilson, William White, James Trumbull, William Dickson and William Hamilton; constable, M. Leech; assessor, John Carver.

Clarksville is located in Pymatuning Township, on the south bank of Shenango River, about a mile and a quarter from Clarksville Station, on the Erie & Pittsburgh Railroad. It was formerly on the canal, and then one of the most important towns in the Shenango Valley. The removal of the canal and the failure to have immediate railroad facilities has rendered competition with other towns exceedingly difficult. The blow has been a severe one. It will doubtless yet recover.

As already said, the site of Clarksville was once the property of Samuel Clark, a sketch of whom will be found in another part of this work. In 1804 Mr. Clark removed to his tract of land, embracing the site of Clarksville, and erected a log cabin near the present brick hotel owned by Mr. Jones. After a time Mr. Clark erected, upon land now owned by the heirs of his son, Abraham, a more comfortable and commodious house of round logs. From the window of this structure Mrs. Clark, with trusty rifle, shot a bear in the act of carrying away one of the young pigs of the new settler. The first white child born within the limits of the borough was Susannah Clark. This occurred July 15, 1806.

At that time there were few inhabitants in this region. Just north of the mouth of Pymatuning Creek was a clearing made by several families of the Corn-planter tribe of the Seneca Indians. These Indians, among whose leading hunters were Tioga, Flynn, Kindoshawa, Mohawk and Harthegegig, remained to fish and hunt until about 1811, when they removed to North Central Ohio, and subsequently to a reservation in Northern Pennsylvania.

In 1808 Samuel Koonce became a resident of the Clarksville settlement. His son Charles subsequently attained considerable prominence in the settlement, having occupied the positions of second postmaster, first burgess, and member of the State Legislature.

John and William Fruit were early and active business men, having established a general merchandise business as early as 1828. John was the first postmaster, in 1832.

Morris Leech was the first justice of the peace, in 1834, and was subsequently given the same position for six times in succession.

Among the prominent families that lived in the vicinity of Clarksville in primitive days were Alexander Simonton, grandfather of Maj. S. C. Simonton, present postmaster of the village. He had been wounded in the Revolutionary War. David Hayes, who was a prominent school-teacher prior to 1814; he was the progenitor of the numerous Hayes' living in this region. George Moore, two and one-half miles east of Clarksville. He was a vigorous Presbyterian. George Reznor, grandfather of the people of that name still living in the county. David McKnight, who settled, in 1804, some two miles from Clarksville. He came from Washington County. He had twelve children. At a reunion of the McKnights, held at Joseph McKnight's in June, 1885, there were counted 555 descendants of the original David, most of them living in Mercer County. William and Nathan Fell, two brothers, came from Westmoreland County in 1797 and 1798, respectively, and became the progenitors of an extensive family in the county, sketches of whom are given elsewhere. Robert Hodge and John Johnson both belonged to the early settlers. The latter lived two and one-half miles southeast of the place.

Dr. Wilcox, of Vernon, Ohio, was the first physician who practiced in this region. In those days physicians were not in great demand, people not having the leisure to be sick. "Granny Middleshaw," living two miles northwest of Sharon, on the place adjoining the one now kept by "Mother Smith," was the first midwife in the whole region. She had an extensive patronage, and charged a fee varying from $2 to $5. William Clark relates that he was the only messenger boy who would go for her. With pants badly out at the knees, he rode for her a period of four years. His pay for all this arduous service was a constant "bad cold."

The first school-house was erected in 1836. It was a frame structure, plain and unassuming in its appointments, but sufficient for the demands of those days, as the present comfortable one is for the present generation. Abraham Clark aided in the construction of the primitive building.

Secret and Other Societies.—About 1849 or 1850 a lodge of I. O. O. F. was instituted. Among its charter members were Samuel Lowry, Charles Bell, Charles Nims, George Lowry, David Williams, George Pomeroy, Harwood Bell, E. W. Wood, S. C. Simonton and others. It flourished for years, but silently gave up its spirit about the year 1858.

The organization of the Sons of Temperance, which made a heavy drain upon its membership, is assigned as the cause of its decline and final dissolution. The Sons of Temperance were strong for a time. The order built the house now occupied by White & McKinney as a store-room. Its dynasty ceased about the time that of the Odd Fellows did.

A Masonic order had a like fate with that of the Odd Fellows.

A strong Grange organization was established about 1871. It had a large membership, and for a time "carried things by storm," but it, too, had to succumb to the inevitable results of internal strife.

Post No. 222, G. A. R., was organized June 28, 1871, with the following members: S. C. Simonton, Thomas Stewart, John G. Smith, S. C. Koonce, J. Stewart, Isaac Reeker, William White, E. C. Thompson, Joseph T. Brown, W. B. Wilkins, T. M. Young, R. J. Campbell, James J. Smith, Milo White, W. E. Dull, W. S. Maguire, G. M. Dull, S. C. Rust, William Dickinson, W. A. Burns, Thomas P. Seidel, D. B. Hoagland and John W. Fruit. It continued to meet in the Odd Fellows' hall for some two years, and then disbanded.

On the 4th of August, 1887, Clarksville Post No. 557 was instituted, with the following comrades: J. L. Reno, T. P. Dickson, S. C. Koonce, J. H. Seiple, A. N. Rice, D. D. Main, J. G. Smith, S. F. Fingley, A. C. Wolley, E. J. Tidd, David Thompson, Henry Mali, S. C. Simonton, Lester Stull, Samuel Weikal, Reuben Stafford, Anthony Struble and Josiah Stewart. The first corps of officers embraces the following: J. L. Reno, P. C.; Samuel Weikal, S. V. C.; S. C. Koonce, J. V. C.; J. H. Seiple, adjutant; Anthony Struble, chaplain; A. N. Rice, quartermaster; David Thompson, sergeant major. It is in good condition.

On the 23d of January, 1888, there was organized by W. C. Thompson, of Butler, Penn., the S. C. Koonce Camp No. 152, Sons of Veterans, with fifteen members. The camp meets every Saturday evening in the G. A. R. hall, and though but a young organization, promises to accomplish its purpose "to preserve the memory of old soldiers."

Churches.—The Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1820, Rev. Henry Knapp having done evangelistic work the previous year. The first preaching was done in the house of Samuel Clark, chairs and boards being used for seats. The original membership was ten, viz.: Samuel Clark and wife, Mary, and son Abraham; Benjamin Canfield, Rebecca Canfield, Thomas Tomlinson and wife, Charlotte Hayes, William Koon and Thomas Morford. Of this number the late Abraham Clark was the last survivor, he having reached the age of eighty-eight years on the 21st of May, 1888. In his possession was the class book of 1821. At that time William Swayze was presiding elder, and Charles Elliott, Dennis Gladden and John Crawford were preachers in charge. The class was under the leadership of Samuel Clark. The following is the list of members: Samuel Clark, Mary Clark, Benjamin Canfield, David Hayes, Abraham Clark, Thomas Tomlinson, Mary Tomlinson, William Koon, Charlotte Hayes, Mary Hayes, John Woods, Thomas Morford, Catherine Haun, Benjamin Fell, Catherine Fell, Sarah Clark, James Pettitt, Mary Dumars, Mary Fell, Catherine Simonton, James Montgomery, John Siddon, Mary Siddon, Nancy Haven, Richard Mattock, Mary Mattock, George Lucas, Benjamin Culver and John Waters. For a time meetings were held in private houses. On the 2d of February, 1826, a subscription was started to secure funds for the erection of a church edifice. The result was a plank building, the latter part of the year, on a lot deeded by Samuel Clark for religious purposes. About three or four years later it was torn down and removed to the site of the present residence of John H. Seiple, where a more commodious house was erected. The structure was finally sold for a machine shop, and the present frame edifice was erected about thirty years ago at a cost of $2,000. William Budd and John Patterson, of Sharon, were the contractors.

In the list of preachers we find the following: William Tipton, Albert G. Richardson, 1823; Charles Thorn, Job Wilson, 1824; Alfred Brunson, Edward Stephenson, 1825; Hiram Kinley, John Leech, 1827; W. Carroll, H. S. Hitchcock, 1836; C. Brown, 1837; A. Keller, John Crum, 1839; J. Van Horn, J. E. Bassett, 1840; B. O. Plimpton, R. J. Sibley, 1841; T. Graham, 1842; J. Uncles, 1843; J. R. Locke, H. Winans, 1844; J. McLean, J. W. Klock, S. W. Ingraham, 1845; J. McLean, H. Luce, 1846; B. S. Hill, W. M. Bear, 1847-48; D. H. Jack, S. Hubbard, 1849; D. H. Jack, J. H. Vance, 1850; J. Flower, M. Wood, 1851; S. N. Forest, H. M. Chamberlin, 1852-53; H. Luce, W. Lund, 1854; M. H. Bettes, 1855-56; R. A. Caruthers, 1857-58; J. G. Thompson, 1859-60; T. G. McCreery, 1861-62; W. M. Bear, 1863; J. F. Perry, 1864-65; R. M. Bear, 1866-68; A. H. Dorner, 1869-71; J. Perry, 1872-73; J. W. Crawford, 1874-75; John Crum, 1876-77; W. Hollister, 1878-79; John Eckles, 1880-81; John Perry, 1882-84; S. K. Paden, 1885-86; S. E. Winger, 1887.

The Presbyterian Church of Clarksville was organized June 3, 1837, by Rev. William Woods, with thirty-eight members, all of whom except three have gone to their long home, viz.: Mrs. James Stuart, Mrs. Nancy Leim and Mrs. John Lightner. Samuel Ferguson, Josiah Cotton, Joseph Moore and Charles Koonce were elected elders. Rev. William Wood labored for the congregation one-half of his time until the 1st of January, 1838. In the fall of that year the services of Rev. Samuel A. McLean were secured, and the next April a call was extended to him for half of his time. In 1847 the church divided on the slavery question, Rev. McLean leading the anti-slavery wing, which, under his direction, seceded and formed what was known as the Free Presbyterian Church. The pro-slavery wing secured the services of Rev. Thomas P. Johnston. The cause of the division having ceased, the two wings united in 1870, and have so continued. The first pastor of the reunited church was Rev. D. A. Nevill. The house now occupied was built by the McLean wing soon after the division.

The first preaching in the bodies from which the United Presbyterian Church sprang was done by supplies in the Methodist and Presbyterian Churches. This occurred as early as 1848. The first supply was Rev. Bowers. Among the primitive members were William White and family; William Jamison and family, Jesse McClure and a Mr. Hazleton. The house of worship was erected, at a cost of about $1,000, by William Maskrey, of Clarksville, son-in-law of Sheriff Carr. It has been repaired several times at considerable expense. The pastorate has been filled by Revs. B. K. Ormond, 1858-69; C. Cummins, 1870-76, and W. J. Snodgrass, 1878 up to the present. The membership is about seventy.

Clarksville had a population in 1870 of 359, while the census of 1880 gives the borough only 264. This would indicate that the town has not kept pace with other portions of the valley. The abandonment of the canal was a severe blow to Clarksville, and she has not since recovered her old-time vigor.

THE flourishing town of Grove City, located in Pine Township, in the southeastern part of the county, was formerly called Pine Grove, and was laid out in 1844-45 by J. G. and Charles Cunningham. That name was chosen by Valentine Cunningham, William Miller and others, because of the clump of pine trees which stood on the hill west of the present town. The name of Pine Grove was dropped by the post-office department in November, 1882, and the more significant one of Grove City substituted. It was incorporated, by decree of the court of quarter sessions, on the 4th of January, 1883, and the first election for borough officers was held February 3, ensuing.

The site of this educational town was once the farm of Valentine Cunningham, who came from Shavers Creek, Huntingdon Co., Penn., in April, 1798, and took up a tract of 400 acres. Valentine was married to Margaret Glenn. His first cabin stood just above the tan-yard now owned by William A. Young. Some of his neighbors at that time were John Powell, just south of Cunningham's tract, who came from Allegheny County; southeast were William Ward and Alexander White. White came from Westmoreland County, and lived where O. P. McCoy now resides. Samuel Christy, from Westmoreland County, lived east. The place has been sub-divided, and is now owned by John and Henry McMillin, J. Newton White, James Gilman and Newton Campbell. On the north lived James Glenn, and on the west, John Whitaker and James Moore, the former being the father-in-law of James G. Cunningham, lately deceased. Glenn came from Huntington County, Whitaker from Allegheny County, and Moore from near Gettysburg, Adams County.

In 1798 Mr. Cunningham erected, about a hundred yards southeast of the residence of his son James G., lately deceased, the first grist-mill within a radius of twenty miles. It was a log building, whose outer walls were scutched with an ax after the structure was erected, and had one run of stone, quarried on the farm of Minor Gulick, in Pine Township. It remained until about 1806, when, owing to its being a very ordinary structure, it was removed, and another placed upon the same site, in 1807, by Robert and Samuel Glenn. To that structure additions have been made from time to time. It is still standing, the property of Messrs. Lock and McCandless, to whom it was sold by 'Squire Cunningham about five years ago. It is said that to supply a means of "bolting" his meal Mr. Cunningham made use of a deer-skin, which he drew tightly over a barrel hoop, and then punctured by means of a heated fork. This improvised sieve served an excellent purpose in separating both meal and flour from the bran.

Lumber was also a necessity to the early settlers. A saw-mill was erected by Mr. Cunningham about 1800. It and the grist-mill were prime necessities to the pioneers, by whom they were liberally patronized. These industries doubtless laid the foundation for the development of the college town of the present.

Mrs. Valentine Cunningham died in March, 1800, at the age of about twenty-five years. She was buried at the lower edge of town, the first person who died on Wolf Creek. Mr. Cunningham died in November, 1804, being about thirty years of age, and is buried by the side of his wife. His family consisted of Charles, who married Mary McClintock, daughter of Rev. McClintock. He lived to the age of eighty. Elizabeth, who married James Tidball. She died about five years ago. James G., well known as 'Squire Cunningham. He married Elizabeth Whitaker, daughter of John Whitaker, in 1825. The result of this marriage was six children, Margaret, John R., Helena, Elizabeth, Rhoda and Charles M.

At the age of eight years James went to live with his grandparents in what is now Plain Grove Township, Lawrence (then Mercer) County. He remained with his grandfather Glenn until he was sixteen, when he became an apprentice at the cabinet business with Benjamin Wood, about two and one-half miles northwest of Grove City. After twenty years' labor in that direction he went into the milling business, and continued it for nearly fifty years. 'Squire Cunningham held several civil positions. He was county auditor one year and county commissioner six years. Besides he was school director, township auditor and justice of the peace. During the winter of 1888 the writer interviewed Mr. Cunningham, and obtained this general statement of facts. He was then struggling with a severe attack of cancer, which finally proved fatal. The following conversation with his physician illustrated a humorous phase of his life: "I am like an old wagon, Doctor. If you can occasionally put in a new spoke, or part of a fellow, it will help me to run the vehicle a little longer. If you can't it's all right." "But," said the Doctor, "don't you talk too much and become weary?" "The tongue," responded Mr. C., "is the best and strongest part of the wagon." Born June 16, 1796, he died June 16, 1888, aged ninety-two years. He never smoked or chewed tobacco, nor had he touched a drop of liquor for more than fifty years. He was a Presbyterian in religion, and a Whig and Republican in politics.

The first house erected after the town was laid out was built by William H. Morrow. The first postmaster was George Morrow. The first store building was erected by Mr. Crocker in 1835-36; William Flemming was the first store-keeper; George Black owned the first blacksmith shop, and George Kinder the first shoe shop. J. M. Hunter kept the first wagon-shop (1848), and B. R. Welsh the first harness shop.

About 1838 Hiram C. White built the second tannery, on a site formerly occupied for like purpose by Mr. Tidball.

The first hotel in the place was kept by Mr. Snyder, in the building subsequently used for the same purpose by W. T. McKean.

Squire Cunningham insisted that Drs. Nicholas Van Eman and S. R. Petton were the first physicians in the place. Another authority suggests Dr. Rosenburg as first.

On the hill, near the site of the present high-school building, stood in 1830 a frame school building, whose first teacher was Nellie Bolton. She occupied the structure before it was finished. Prior to that time James Alexander had taught a dozen pupils in a log building erected by Valentine Cunningham in 1802 as a dwelling. It stood on the street known as the Mercer and Harrisville road.

John Galbreath was one of the earliest teachers in the region. He lived a mile and a half northwest of the present site. He was a bachelor and a prominent man, an oracle in the community. He was easily flattered, and believed himself destined to become a great leader. He used the rod freely. He was a patriotic Irishman, and at the age of eighteen came to America to secure his liberties. He trained the Roses, the Whites and Charles Cunningham to be teachers.

These preliminary efforts resulted in developing a school sentiment which finally culminated in the present prosperous and efficient public schools of the borough, supplemented by the advantages of Grove City College.

Grove City College, one of the leading educational institutions of the county, is the outgrowth of a small select school started in the village in 1876, by Dr. I. C. Ketler, and known as the Pine Grove Normal Academy. At its opening there were but thirteen pupils. The attendance gradually increased from year to year, as the excellence of the work done within the walls of the academy became manifest. The first annual catalogue showed an attendance during the year (1877) of 115 pupils. In 1886 there was an annual attendance of 556. In 1878 the school was recognized by the leading American colleges as an institution capable of preparing young students for admission to their freshmen classes, without any other recommendation than a certificate of attendance in its preparatory course. Since the academy was enlarged and chartered as a regular college itself, it is not intended as a preparatory school for other institutions, but is considered fully able and prepared to supply an educational training equal to that of any of its contemporaries. The curriculum now embraces four courses of study, viz.: College preparatory, scientific, classical and musical. The officers of the board are: T. W. Dale, president; Capt. R. C. Craig, secretary, and W. A. Young, treasurer. The faculty consists of Isaac C. Ketler, A. M., Ph. D., president and professor of mental and moral science; James B. McClelland, A. M., professor of Greek; Ella A. Kinder, A. M., professor of physics and chemistry; John A. Courtney, A. M., professor of Latin; Frank W. Hays, A. B., professor of higher mathematics; John G. Black, A. B., instructor in mathematics; Julius J. Knoch, B. S., instructor in German and history; John A. Lavelly, A. B., instructor in rhetoric and composition; Effie H. Brown, Mus. M., professor of instrumental music and voice culture; James B. McClelland, A. M., instructor in elocution; John A. Courtney, A. M., instructor in English analysis; Frank W. Hays, A. B., instructor in grammar and arithmetic, and Fina Welch, B. S., librarian.

The Grove City Banking Co., the bank now controlled by this company was started in April, 1882, by A. W. Gealy, who acted as president; J. W. Gealy, cashier, and S. E. Phipps, assistant cashier. The village before this time had no adequate facilities for the transmission and collection of money, and the establishment of this medium of business communication marked an important epoch in the commercial history of the place. The line of the bank's deposits gives evidence of its usefulness. The present cashier is Mr. A. E. Graham, who has recently associated with him Mr. W. C. Alexander, of Mercer. A general banking business is carried on; collections are made on all accessible points within the United States, and drafts, money orders and letters of credit are sold on Great Britain, Ireland, Belgium, France, Switzerland, Italy, Spain, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, Finland, Austria, Russia, Poland and the Orient.

Manufactures.—The Grove City Carriage Works was begun in 1876 by Mr. A. B. McKay, who removed it from Pardoe to the present location. The first buildings were erected on Broad Street, the present quarters not being occupied until 1884. General carriage goods are manufactured, and a superior line of buggies, carriages, phaetons, buckboards, farm and spring wagons is turned out. The market is principally local.

Black & Offutt's Planing Mill was built in 1872 by Mr. J. C. Black, on the lot between Reimold Bros.' and G. H. Welch's store-rooms. Under this management it was conducted until 1880, when W. S. Offutt was admitted to partnership, and the mill removed to its present location on Rail Road Street. The plant consists of a main building, two stories high, 40x60 feet in dimensions; engine room, two stories, 20x30 feet; saw-mill, 18x45 feet, and a general wareroom two stories in height and 30x40 feet in size. A general variety of work is performed by this establishment, such as sash, doors, blinds, siding, flooring, stairs, bracket and veranda work. The market is local.

Porter & Emery's Pottery works were established in 1878, by Joseph N. Emery & Sons. A reorganization took place January 1, 1883, however, J. N. Emery disposing of his interest and retiring, and the firm name being changed to Emery Bros. Mr. F. E. Porter was admitted to partnership January 1, 1885, and by securing a half interest changed the name of the firm to its present title. The products of the pottery embrace nearly everything in stoneware, useful or ornamental, crocks from one-half to twenty gallons in size, churns, fruit jars, flower pots, lawn and window vases, umbrella stands, water coolers and chamber sets, the latter having a particularly large sale on account of their quaint designs. The clay used by this company is of very superior quality, being entirely free from limestone and other impurities, and, by a process known to the firm, is treated so that it does not air-crack. It is obtained in Butler County. The works employ five men at present, and have an annual capacity of 100,000 gallons. The market is gradually widening.

Shaw's Salt Works had their inception in the spring of 1886, when Mr. J. C. Shaw, becoming impressed with the idea that gas could be found by boring for it upon his land, sought for and secured from the council of Grove City a franchise of the streets, for the purpose of supplying the borough, should he be successful, and immediately began operations upon a gas well. After drilling some 800 feet, he suddenly struck a large vein of strongly impregnated salt water. Continuing to the depth of 1,400 feet, and at length abandoning the hope of reaching gas, Mr. Shaw determined to utilize the water by introducing it into an evaporating apparatus, and thus securing its salt deposits. Works were accordingly erected, and the process of evaporation of the solution shortly afterward begun. The product consists of a superior grade of fine white salt, mixed with which is a considerable proportion of bromine, the latter material being separated from the salt by thoroughly washing the sediment with spring water. The works have proven satisfactory.

Churches.—Grace Methodist Episcopal Church was originally a class connected with Harrisville, the earliest traces of which run back as far as 1845. The organization, however, it is claimed, had been effected in connection with Clintonville long before this. The pastors of the church have been: Revs. G. F. Reeser, 1845; J. Wigglesmith, 1845; A. Hildebrand, 1846; W. M. Bear, 1846; T. Benn, 1847; G. Stocking, 1849; R. Norton, 1850; J. W. Wilson, 1851; J. S. Lytle, 1852; J. Schofield, 1854; T. G. McCreary, 1857; F. Vernon, 1857; R. B. Boyd, 1858; W. R. Johnson, 1859; S. A. Milroy, 1860; J. Abbott, 1861; B. Marsteller, 1863; R. Beatty, 1865; J. M. Groves, 1868; J. Crumb, 1869; L. Wick, 1871; J. M. Foster, 1872; N. Morris, 1875; L. G. Merrill, 1877; C. M. Morse, 1879; G. W. Chesbro, 1881; J. B. Espy, 1883, and A. R. Rich, 1886, the present pastor. The present building, a handsome brick structure, costing $12,000, is the successor of an old frame that stood north of town. It was dedicated with appropriate ceremonies February 27, 1885, and is by far the finest church edifice in the borough. The present officers of the congregation are: Trustees: William McConnell, J. N. Emery, J. J. Cornelius, J. P. Locke, W. P. Sutherland, J. N. Kennedy, I. N. Fithian, J. A. Spear and D. G. Courtney. Stewards: James Crawford, D. F. Courtney, Sylvester Gulick, F. E. Porter, C. F. McConnell, B. R. Welsh, A. A. Little, Samuel W. Lawrence, J. G. Perry, Isaac Hil Kirk, and J. P. Locke, the Recorder. Class leaders: Joseph Jackson, F. E. Porter, William McConnell, J. W. Campbell, J. P. Locke, B. S. Atkinson, Henry C. Tear, and J. G. Perry, the treasurer of the board; superintendent of Sunday-school, S. P. Barr. There is in connection with the regular church organization a Young People's Society of Christian Endeavor, of which the president is Miss Ella Kinder; secretary, Miss Florence Perry, and treasurer, J. B. Fithian. A Ladies' and Pastor's Union, of which Mrs. Mary Gulick is president; Mrs. Sarah Gulick, secretary, and Mrs. Christiana Kerr, treasurer; and a Young Ladies Union, which is officered by Miss Milly Porter, president; Miss Carrie McElwain, secretary, and Miss Florence Perry, treasurer. The membership of the congregation is 350, of its Sunday-school, 275.

The Presbyterian Church was organized February 7, 1842, with thirteen original members. The first building was erected in 1857. During the time between the organization and the erecting of the first church, services were held sometimes in the school-house, sometimes in barns and sometimes in private dwellings. For several years the house of worship was a mere shell, with no ceiling, only loose boards for a floor and no pews, simply slabs arranged in tiers and supported at each end by logs running the whole length of the building at right angles to them. Ten years after the organization the membership had increased to nineteen. In February, 1864, a call was made for Rev. W. T. Dickson for one-half his time. Mr. Dickson accepted, and thus became the first pastor of the church. He continued in charge of the congregation until 1874, when he severed his relations with the church, and was succeeded in the following year by the present pastor, Rev. J. W. McConkey. The membership of the church is 500, of the Sunday-school 400. Following is the present session: T. W. Dale, R. C. Craig, J. A. McDowell, James W. Anderson, I. C. Ketler, James Gilman and J. E. Black. The officers of the various societies connected with the congregation are: Sunday-school, J. E. Black, superintendent; J. N. White, assistant. Ladies Missionary Society: Mrs. B. F. Junkin, president; Mrs. A. M. Craig, secretary; Miss M. J. Johnston, treasurer. Young Ladies Missionary Circle: Miss Ina McDowell, president; Miss Flora Craig, secretary, and Mrs. Effie Meyers, treasurer. Children's Band: Miss Flora McDowell, president; Miss Mary Craig, secretary, and Miss Lizzie Laughlin, treasurer.

Societies.—Eureka Lodge No. 60, A. O. U. W., was chartered in September, 1874, with the following officers: Norman J. Maxwell, P. W.; James A. Cutcheon, M. W.; Silas A. Emery, F.; Richard A. Locke, overseer; James P. Locke, recorder; R. C. C. White, Fin.; Joshua A. Kinder, Rec.; Cyrus P. Miller, guide, and W. P. C. Emery, I. W. Meetings are held every Saturday evening in the A. O. U. W. Hall.

Wolf Creek Lodge No. 910, I. O. O. F., was organized June 24, 1875, by George F. Borey, with the following named charter members: S. A. Walker, D. J. Washabaugh, J. C. Weakley, R. G. Black, W. J. Newman, J. M. Rodgers, S. S. Knox, R. A. McCalmont, J. W. Black, C. C. Winder, George W. McBride, John McBride, Perry Uber, J. E. Leth, W. M. Dight, P. C. Uber and H. S. Hunt. The lodge meets every Saturday evening. Its present membership is twenty-seven.

Grove City Lodge No. 35, K. of P., was instituted July 12, 1884, by Thomas Perry, Esq., with the following named charter members: Joseph Bellshaw, William Callahan, James Jeffrey, William Curz, A. P. Buckholdt, George Wistcoven, George McDowell, George W. Crawford, A. Koon and Francis Land. The past chancellors have been: James Jeffrey, William Curz, A. P. Buckholdt, William Callahan, Daniel Kerr, George W. Crawford, William Forest and George McDowell. The membership is sixty-five.

The Protected Home Circle was organized in the spring of 1887, by Rev. H. C. Hall, of Sharon. Its first officers consisted of I. C. Black, president; A. B. McKay, vice-president; L. P. Heasley, Acct.; Mont. Black, secretary, and Edward Jackson, guard. The present membership is twenty, and the society is reported to be in good condition.

Marion Craig Post No. 325, G. A. R., Department of Pennsylvania, was organized April 16, 1883, by D. Barton, Esq., with the following named charter members: Jacob Alabaugh, N. J. Maxwell, John L. Cochran, R. C. Craig, J. A. Bolander, W. P. C. Emery, S. A. Emery, W. P. Sutherland, B. R. Welch, D. M. Madan, J. W. Anderson, Archie Glenn, J. W. Campbell, J. C. Campbell, James M. Ramsey, L. D. Bumpus, W. C. Robb, J. A. Gilmer, A. B. McKay, A. E. Lawrence, W. M. Frew, W. S. Emery, J. P. McCoy, J. C. Weakley, Milton Hines, D. C. Johnston, W. J. McKay, C. L. Fithian, J. M. Coulter, B. F. Junkin, A. T. Black, Isaac Hilkirk, J. S. Yard, W. J. Harshaw, J. M. Wingard, George Atkinson, Isaac N. White, D. W. Styers and George S. Westlake. Since the organization of the post there have been elected the following officers: 1883—W. J. Maxwell, commander; J. W. Campbell, senior vice-commander; Isaac N. White, junior vice-commander; 1884—J. W. Campbell, commander; Isaac N. White, senior vice-commander; W. S. Emery, junior vice-commander; 1885—Isaac N. White, commander; M. B. Hofius, senior vice-commander; S. A. Emery, junior vice-commander; 1886—M. B. Hofius, commander; S. A. Emery, senior vice-commander; R. C. Craig, junior vice-commander; 1887—W. J. Harshaw, commander; A. B. McKay, senior vice-commander; J. G. Perry, junior vice-commander; 1888—R. C. Craig, commander; J. W. Yeaman, senior vice-commander, and J. C. Weakley, junior vice-commander. The recording officers for the corresponding years have been, in order named: J. A. Bolander, W. P. C. Emery, J. G. Perry, W. J. Harshaw, Isaac N. White and B. R. Welch. The post is now in fine condition, with seventy-one members in good standing. Francis Marion Craig, in honor of whom the post was named, was born in North Liberty, Mercer County, Penn., July 31, 1839, the son of David C. and Mary Craig. At the age of five years he was removed to the State of Iowa, where, with his parents, he remained until 1848, at which time he returned to Mercer County, and located at Pine Grove (now Grove City) in 1850. In this place he was reared, and after receiving a good common school education, he entered Westminster College, in which institution he remained two years. After leaving school he entered the printing office of the Westminster Herald (now United Presbyterian), in which he learned the trade of type-setting, which he followed in the same office until 1861. Then, at the outbreaking of the war, he enlisted July 22, 1861, for three years' service in Company A, Sixty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, commanded by Col. Sam. W. Black. Mr. Craig served with this regiment as private through the Peninsula campaign. Just previous to the battle of Fredericksburg he was elected second lieutenant by his company, and was killed in the ensuing fight, before the commission of his promotion reached him. He was buried in the city suburbs, where his bones now rest. During life Mr. Craig was a staunch Republican, and was a member of the United Presbyterian Church. At the time of his death he was unmarried, being in his twenty-fourth year.

The Pine Grove W. C. T. U. was organized on the 12th of December, 1879, at the residence of Mrs. R. G. Black, with nineteen members. Mrs. Phoebe Black, Mrs. Rev. David Patton, Mrs. A. B. McKay, Mrs. Opre, Mrs. Venemon, Mrs. Gulic and Miss Maggie Kelly, and other ladies assisted in the organization. The president's chair has been filled in succession by Miss Narcissa White, Mrs. Phoebe Black, Mrs. Rev. David Patton and Mrs. Watson. Mrs. Ada Martin and Mrs. T. J. Atwell have served as secretaries from the organization to the present. There is a present membership of some fifty, who meet twice per month for prayer and business purposes.

Grove City has had a very rapid growth. In 1880 the village had a population of 485, which has so increased in the past eight years that the borough now claims over 1,000 inhabitants. In fact Grove City is one of the live, enterprising modern towns of Mercer County.

Fredonia, one of the growing places of Mercer County, is pleasantly situated in a rich agricultural region, on the west side of Otter Creek, some six or seven miles west of north of Mercer. It lies partly within both Fairview and Delaware Townships, the larger portion, however, having been located in the former. The first improvement within the present borough limits was made in 1834 by Levi Arnold. It embraced the clearing of ten acres of land near the site of the grist-mill built by Mr. Arnold and subsequently owned by B. R. Mitchell. A little more than half a century ago the site of the village was marked with all the evidences of primitive wildness, no cabin or rude shanty of any kind affording a home for civilized man. The land was composed of two distinct "donation tracts," which fact accounts readily for the tardy development of the region.

Arnold had some progressive spirit, and moved ahead until he became the holder of large possessions. An evil day finally overtook him, and he was compelled to let his property go. In 1837-38 Mr. Arnold erected a grist and saw-mill, for many years known as "Arnold's Mills," which may be regarded as the real beginning of the place.

In 1837 B. R. Mitchell built, on Arnold's land, a small, round-log cabin, not far from a refreshing spring. The site was in the southeast part of the borough. In this rude dwelling lived Mr. Mitchell's family, and in it, too, his daughter Caroline first looked forth upon this fair world, the first child born in Fredonia. She subsequently married Mr. Studds, and became an honored resident of Fairview Township. Mr. Mitchell, a native of New England, thus became one of the benefactors of Fredonia, and specially serviceable in its milling interests.

The Arnold property was purchased by James Sheriff, of Mercer. He subsequently sold to Jesse Bundle, an Eastern man, who erected a tannery and a log house and made improvements in the way of clearing. His business not proving successful he became discouraged, and removed West "to grow up with the country." Two other men, Thomas White and William Thompson, were neighbors of Bundle, engaged in an effort to clear their lands and establish homes. White soon abandoned the struggle and left, but Thompson remained until the time of his death.

Aaron Arnold was the first man to erect a respectable dwelling-house in the new village. It would hardly pass muster now, but served the purpose quite well then. It was a board dwelling, and stood upon lands subsequently owned by William Simmons.

The real origin of Fredonia is traced to William Simmons, who, in March, 1866, took possession of the house vacated by Jesse Bundle, and at once commenced the erection of a frame store building, the first of the kind in the village. In it he did a thriving business, being urged on by the prospects of the completion of the Shenango & Allegheny Railroad at an early date. Nor was he disappointed. On land purchased by him he laid out the village, which some of his friends were disposed to call, in honor of his name, Simmonsville. This honor he generously refused, and suggested the name which it now bears, Fredonia. Lots were now sold freely, and evidences of growth were manifest everywhere.

In 1867 William Thompson built the first regular frame dwelling. The same year Mr. S. Royal built a blacksmith shop.

In 1870 a post-office was established, and Mr. Simmons became the first postmaster, his commission dating August 8. Mr. H. McKay began the same year to deal in grain and coal. In the latter business he was succeeded by Harsh & Sutliff.

Dr. Cornelius Byles, in 1874, rented an office and became the first physician of the place. Two years later he built an office, and likewise erected the first hardware store. In November of this year (1876) Dr. Davenny came from Oil City and located in the village.

In 1871 the planing-mill of Slater, Hoover & White was established, George I. Slater erecting the building and operating it for a time alone, and then accepting the other gentlemen as partners.

In 1873 several improvements of value were made. S. M. Loveland, from Otter Creek Township, established a large harness shop. J. Bear built a tannery, which was operated by steam with eminent success.

In 1875 Roof, Pleiffe & Co. built, on Main Street, a large carriage manufactory, and John Noll built another, 22x50, two stories high, on Water Street. At present a stock company operates the factory. Its purpose is to manufacture vehicles on an extensive scale.

A large frame, steam flouring mill is now in process of construction, and when completed will embrace the best and most improved machinery. It will be owned and operated by George Gaiser, whose long and successful experience as a miller is a guarantee of prosperity in his new enterprise.

Churches.—Fredonia has two churches, Methodist and Presbyterian. The Methodist Church erected its edifice in 1872, it being a modest structure, 30x40. Preaching had been done for some years previous, the name of Rev. J. H. Merchant appearing as early as 1870. The first sermon in the new house was preached by Rev. Albert H. Kenney. The congregation has had a steady and healthy growth. The following is the list of pastors: J. H. Merchant, 1870; D. A. Crowell, 1871; A. H. Kenney, 1872-73; F. Fair, 1874-76; J. Abbott, 1877; J. Crum, 1878-79; John Perry, 1880-81; W. H. Mossman, 1882; R. M. Bear, 1883-85; G. J. Squier, 1886—present incumbent.

The Presbyterian Church was organized in 1875 by Rev. James McLean, and a house of worship, a frame structure, about 40x50, erected at a cost of $3,000. The congregation is mainly a colony from the Cool Spring Presbyterian Church, and embraced in its list of original members James Walker and wife and children, A. D. Walker and Miss Callie Walker, Thomas McCleery and wife, Dr. C. Byles and wife, Misses Jennie, Lizzie and Julia Byles, William Moore and wife, James Byers and wife, Elias Orr and wife, Robert, Samuel and John Orr, and Misses Sade, Mary and Maggie Orr, Samuel White and wife, Samuel Baker and wife and Charles Baker and wife. The following is the list of pastors: Revs. James McLean, Thomas Hickling, J. M. Stitt, A. B. Lowes, S. L. Boston and J. E. Irvine, the present incumbent. The congregation enrolls 175 members, and has a Sunday-school of 120 pupils.

Schools.—For a time the schools of the place consisted of an edifice which belonged to District No. 5, Fairview Township. It proving too small, a two-story structure with four rooms was erected to accommodate the people. For several years a select school or normal academy has been conducted in it with great acceptance.

Societies.—Eulalia Lodge No. 818, I. O. O. F., was organized December 30, 1872, with twenty members. Its first officers were: S. M. Loveland, N. G.; S. Baker, V. G.; R. A. Harsh, secretary; John Foster, assistant secretary, and George Dunkle, treasurer.

Fredonia Grange No. 643 was established in 1872, with upward of twenty members. Among its leading spirits were S. M. Loveland, who was the first Master, William McKay and James Marsteller. Like its sister organizations throughout the country, it has had its day.

Fredonia W. C. T. U. was organized November 25, 1881, at the Presbyterian Church, by Miss Narcissa E. White, with the following charter members: Mrs. J. M. Stitt, Miss Sadia Pearson, Julia Byles, Mary Pearson, Mrs. Mary Walker, Jennie Harsh, Mrs. W. Moore, Eva Moore, Etta Walker, Mary E. Stubbs, and M. A. Braden. The officers in succession from the first were: Presidents, Mrs. J. M. Stitt, Miss Mary Pearson, Mrs. Mary Walker, Mrs. Eliza Ball; recording secretaries, Miss Sadie Pearson, Mrs. Mary Stubbs, Miss Jennie Harsh, Mrs. F. G. Byles and Mrs. N. A. Simmons. The Union is in good condition, and determined to persevere in its noble purpose.

Fredonia was incorporated as a borough in August, 1876, and then commenced its official life. The census of 1880 gave it a population of 323, which it is claimed, has increased to about 500 during the past eight years. Located in the center of a fine farming district, there is no reason why the borough should not remain one of the flourishing little towns of the county.

IN the following sketches of townships we present some material not given in the other general chapters of the work. It will be necessary, therefore, to refer to other portions for details not always to be found in these sketches, the purpose being to avoid needless repetition of statements. Not the least valuable portion of this book will be found in the biographical chapters, which contain the bone and marrow of local history. In the future people will read these sketches with increasing interest, because they speak specifically of those whose toil and hardships aided mightily in developing the forest wilderness, and making it blossom like the rose. For the convenience of our readers we have placed the townships in alphabetical order, which will save unnecessary trouble in finding them.

COOL SPRING TOWNSHIP.

This township formed one of the six original townships that composed Mercer County at its formation in 1800. From it have since been taken Jackson, Lake and Fairview Townships. Its name was taken from the fact that within its borders were a number of constantly flowing springs, whose cool and crystal waters furnished abundant drink both to man and beast. The early settlers, appreciating their value, named the township in commemoration of them. The surface of the township is comparatively unbroken. There is a pleasing alternation of hills and valleys, but the former are not steep, nor are the latter abrupt. The rich bottom-lands scattered here and there form fine farming ground. There are two streams traversing the township. Otter Creek, which rises in Otter Creek Township, flows south across Fairview, through the heart of Cool Spring, and unites with Mill Creek at Mercer, to form the Big Neshannock, and Cool Spring, which arises in Fairview, flows south along the eastern boundary of Cool Spring Township, and unites with Mill Creek.

Pioneers.—Undoubtedly the first settler of the township was Benjamin Stokely. He is also believed by many to have been the first white resident of the entire county, though the latter statement is in dispute. His first entrance into the county was as a surveyor of land warrants. He left Pittsburgh in company with others May 1, 1793, and proceeded some distance north, but was forced to turn back in a short time, owing to the hostilities of the Indians. A return was made in October of the same year, and the party arrived near the present site of Mercer. A second time the surveyors retraced their steps to Pittsburgh, only to resume operations in May, 1796. On the 7th day of October, 1796, in company with his family, Mr. Stokely set out on his third journey to Mercer County. This time he effected a settlement, and reached his new home, in the southeastern part of the township, on the 14th of the same month. At this time there were other families living in the vicinity, but these all left upon the approach of winter, and Stokely and family were forced to pass the long, dreary months of winter without any other companions than wild beasts and Indians. Fortunately, however, the latter were not hostile. An extended biography of Mr. Stokely will be found on another page, from the pen of William S. Garvin.

Another man, who divided with Mr. Stokely the honor of being one of the first settlers of Cool Spring Township, was Joseph Alexander. The latter, at the age of nineteen, removed from his early home, in Chartiers Valley, in Washington County, in 1798, and settled on the tract of land subsequently owned and occupied by his son, Joseph Alexander, Jr. Here he felled timber, constructed a small log dwelling a short distance west of the location of the present homestead, by the side of a clear, bubbling spring, and began active clearings. He remained alone at this work until 1807, when he took to wife Miss Grace, daughter of John Wilson, an early settler of East Lackawannock Township. From this wedlock sprang eight children, seven boys and one girl.

The difficulty attending the securing of sufficient ground grain in those early days is curiously illustrated in the case of Mr. Alexander. It is related that the nearest mill was located in Washington County, not far from his old home. To this he was compelled to return with his grist. He secured his grain in sacks, threw them over his horse's back and set off, mounted on his faithful animal, for the distant mill. The distance was considerable, and as there were no inns on the way Mr. Alexander was forced to sleep at night as best he could on the ground, while his beast grazed near by. To prevent the latter's escape he tied a small bell around its neck, by the sound of which he was enabled to detect the horse's whereabouts.

The brother of the preceding, William, made a settlement near that of Joseph. The exact date of his entrance into the township is unknown, but it was as early as, if not earlier, than 1798. The farm on which he located was subsequently owned by Thomas Alexander. Accompanying him came Henry Beckwith and father, Silas (an old man), both of whom occupied the farm immediately north of Joseph Alexander. On the east settled Aaron Hackney, afterward proprietor of the Hackney House, at Mercer, and brother John.

About the year 1798 came Robert and Joseph McDonald and Zachariah Johnston. The first two were brothers. The latter, Mr. Johnston, removed from Ligonier Valley, Chester County, and located on the farm afterward owned by Capt. John Johnston. Shortly after his arrival he was followed by his four brothers, by name Samuel, John, William and James. They had come from Ireland, and secured lands from John Hoge, a land agent owning large tracts in the vicinity.

Hugh McKean, who shares with the foregoing the honor of having been one of the earliest settlers of the township, reached his new home, in Cool Spring Township, in the year 1798. He at once began a clearing, and after it had progressed sufficiently, began to plant apple trees, wisely foreseeing the advantages of an orchard. It is related that he placed one for each day in the year. The old log cabin used by Mr. McKean was standing as late as 1873. It was situated on the old homestead, then in the possession of J. W. Page.

Among the other early pioneers of the township may be mentioned Rev. Samuel Tait, the apostle of Presbyterianism, whose sketch is given elsewhere; John Bowman, who arrived sometime near 1800, and settled on a farm near the present site of Cool Spring Station, a man of wonderful physical strength and vigor, who, in his one hundred and fourth year, carried a bushel of corn on his back to the mill, distant one-half mile; William McMillan, whose property, a tract of 510 acres, subsequently owned by John McEwen, was secured from John Hoge April 6, 1805, and whose house was a double hewed-log one, 20x24 feet; and John and Thomas McEwen (then spelled McCune), who settled in the neighborhood about 1805-06. McMillan's house was the first tavern in the township. It was enlarged by him for hostelry purposes, and, being situated on the great thoroughfare between Pittsburgh and Erie, was given a liberal and appreciative patronage. Connected with the inn was an immense barn, over seventy feet in length, which was considered, at the time of its erection, a marvel of architectural accomplishment. It may be said of the tavern that no traveler was ever turned hungry from its door.

There have occurred two remarkable natural phenomena since the township's settlement, and, curiously enough, both taking place within a year. The first was a severe frost, happening on the night of August 19, 1800, which killed every vestige of corn and left the potato crop a complete wreck. The severity of this was so great that it has been claimed to have been by far worse than any similar occurrence before or since. Although it took place in the summer, no winter frost ever equalled it. The second event, also occurring in the night, was a terrible tornado, whose devastating advent took place June 4, 1801. The force of this storm was so great that fences and barns were literally shivered into kindling. A cow, belonging to Benjamin Stokely, was rolled thirty yards and hurled with considerable force on a rail pile, where she was found the next day. Houses were unroofed, trees felled, and a trail of ruin and desolation left behind.

The early mills played an important part in the development of young settlements. Families in search of new homes almost invariably selected a neighborhood having good and convenient grist-mills. These were indispensable, and were about the first mechanical contrivances put in operation. The first mill in Cool Spring Township was erected in 1811. It stood on the farm of Levi Arnold, and subsequently of Joseph Bentley. The popular name of this establishment was the "old mill," and by this title it is remembered to-day. Its business was continued for a number of years, until improved methods and competition rendered its further operation unprofitable. On the same ground was a powder mill. This was a disastrous investment for Arnold, inasmuch as it exploded, and killed the son of the proprietor.

There was another grist-mill erected in 1837, on the margin of a small stream which coursed through the property then owned by J. B. Page, and later by Joseph Holmes. This did quite a business for a time, but, like its predecessor, was forced to succumb to the inevitable advances of improvement, and has long since fallen into disuse. Up to a late date its frame was still standing, a silent memento of departed usefulness.

A saw-mill was constructed as early as 1825 by John McEwen, on the west side of the latter's farm. It began a promising career of usefulness, but the business was in a few years rendered unprofitable, and the mill was discontinued.

One of the most exciting events in the early history of Mercer County was the losing or abduction of a little girl, Mary Ann Gamble, several miles northwest of Mercer. It occurred near the Mercer and Greenville road, on the 20th of June 1834. The following card describes the LOST CHILD.

Left its way, going to school, on the 20th of June last, a female child about five years old; fair complexion, fresh colored, and auburn hair. Had on a blue calico bonnet, pink calico frock (faded nearly white) with short sleeves, a cotton apron striped with blue, and a small reticule. Any information concerning it, directed to the editor of this paper [Western Press], will be thankfully rewarded for their trouble.

July 18, 1834.

GEORGE BAGNALL.

The girl was the daughter of Charles Gamble, and if living would be the aunt of Hugh Gamble, at present clerk of the board of county commissioners. She was living at the time with George Bagnall. No trace of her was found, though search was made by the people of the county for weeks. Judge Bredin adjourned court, and joined with others in the effort to recover the lost child. The Mercer Academy was dismissed, and its teachers and students joined in the quest. Thousands of people from all portions of the county cheerfully gave their services to sweep in all directions, but to no purpose.

It is supposed that the child was stolen by wandering gipsies and carried off. Various reports as to her having been seen in Virginia, or Frederick, Md., were circulated, but none of them ever received credence. Her fate, like that of Charley Ross, is involved in insoluble mystery.

DEER CREEK TOWNSHIP.

This township was originally a portion of old Sandy Creek. On the 18th of December, 1850, a number of petitions praying for a division of that organization into four separate and distinct parts, each to be a township, the purpose of the division being to facilitate the collection of taxes, and to render the polls easier of access to voters, was presented in court. Agreeable to the prayer, the Court appointed a board of commissioners, consisting of Francis Beatty, Joseph Kerr and James A. Leech, to view the territory proposed to be quartered, and to lay out a system of boundary lines. On the 7th of April, 1851, a statement of their report was returned, and on the 23d of June, same year, the Court confirmed it. This statement established four townships, named, respectively, Sandy Creek, Deer Creek, New Vernon and Mineral, afterward Perry.

Deer Creek, the northeastern quarter of the old division, has a comparatively unbroken surface. In places it is really flat. The soil is quite fertile, and is well adapted to agriculture. It is a curious fact that the chief wealth of the township, up to a few years ago, consisted in its forests, from which were extracted much valuable timber. There are not many underlying mineral deposits. Of course, throughout the whole county are scattered coal veins having more or less value, according to quality and thickness. But Deer Creek Township has never been classed among the distinctively coal townships of the county. Its resources have been chiefly of the agricultural sort. These have proved a source of much prosperity, which the inhabitants enjoy in as marked degree, perhaps, as any of their neighbors. In point of drainage, the township is but fairly supplied with a suitable system of water courses. The only stream of any importance within its limits is Big Sandy Creek, which rises in Sandy Creek Township, flows southeast in an almost undeviating course, through the northeast corner of Sandy Creek, the southwest corner of Deer Creek, and down through New Vernon and Sandy Lake, until it leaves the county. There are several small tributaries to this on the northeastern side, which pierce into the territory along which it flows, furnishing a moderately efficient means of conducting off all surplus rain-fall.

The early settlement of the township is connected so intimately with that of the old sub-division of Sandy Creek, that no attempt will be made to divorce the two. In the pages devoted to that township, will be found the story of Deer Creek's early development from forests to homesteads.

The history of the industrial development of the township is brief. The most important industry has, of course, been the steam saw-mill business. In the early days a plain, upright saw, run by meagre water power, was the only outfit considered necessary to cope with the lumber problem. But the application of steam to all motor uses has long since rendered the water power obsolete, while the march of inventive skill has triumphed over the straight vertical saw, and in its place has erected the circular one. A thousand improvements, too, in the portability of sawing machinery have contributed greatly to the accomplishments of industrial enterprise.

The first steam mill built in the present township was erected in the autumn of 1864, by A. Dunham and Solomon Nunemaker. These gentlemen continued in the ownership two years, at the expiration of which time Nunemaker retired, and was succeeded by George Stallsmith, the business being continued under the firm name of Dunham & Stallsmith. In 1866 Elias Cozad purchased the entire plant. In 1868 Nunemaker and I. W. Stallsmith resolved to embark in the lumber business, and erected a lath and shingle mill a short distance west of the Cozad saw-mill. In the course of a few years this partnership was discontinued, the firm becoming Nunemaker, Boylan & Jones. The business was a profitable one, and met with flattering success. In 1867 John W. Thompson built a steam mill in the northern part of the township, on land belonging to John Turner. In 1872 Mr. Turner became the proprietor. The mill did a flourishing business, and was of much service in its way. In 1872, also, the Streight mill, owned by a A. J. and W. H. Streight, was erected. This did a general sawing business, and was a successful enterprise in every respect. The Applegate nail-keg mill was put up in 1873.

At the first election held after the separation from Sandy Creek, on the 5th of May, 1851, the following officers were chosen: Justices of the peace, Stephen Ross, Robert Thompson; constable, Perry Caldwell; judge of elections, R. F. Thompson; treasurer, Stephen Ross; clerk, R. Thompson; supervisors, John Turner, Jacob Free and H. W. Troy; assessor, Jared Ross; inspectors, Joel Smith, Aaron Boylan; auditors, Alva Scott, Russell Vaughn, R. Thompson; overseers, Jacob Burson, Samuel Clark; school directors, John Ross, Joel Smith, John Turner, J. W. Streight, H. W. Troy and C. Montgomery.

DELAWARE TOWNSHIP.

This township was one of eight formed in November, 1805. It has suffered diminution twice, by the taking away of Jefferson April 4, 1850, and of Hempfield May 24, 1856.

Its surface is unbroken and rolling. The land rises and falls in gentle undulations, while the valleys are filled with fertile soil. There are two streams flowing through its borders, one, the Otter Creek, an inconsiderable rivulet that rises in the township of Otter Creek, and flows in a southeasterly direction, emptying into the Mill Creek at Mercer, and Shenango River, which enters the township near its extreme northwestern point, flows in a marked hook-like course, first in a southeastern direction, and then, after a sharp turn at Big Bend, in a slightly northwestern course, departing at the southwestern corner. In addition to these are smaller streams, which serve to irrigate and drain the soil. The old Beaver & Erie Canal, completed in the year 1844, crossed the southwestern corner of the township, very much in line with the Shenango. The Pittsburgh, Shenango & Lake Erie Railroad, completed in 1869, crosses the township in a parallel direction some two or three miles to the northeast.

Early Settlers.—John Clark, a native of Lancaster County, Penn., came to Mercer County in the spring of 1800. He settled near what is now Big Bend, Delaware Township, and is the earliest settler we have any information about. He died in 1855.

James K. Marshall, with his wife, Rebecca (Sammons) Marshall, came from Washington County, Penn., to Delaware Township, Mercer County, in the fall of 1800, locating near the Big Swamp. Their first child, Margaret, was born there in 1801, and was doubtless the first birth in the township. James K. Marshall was a native of Ireland, whose parents immigrated to Washington County, Penn., when he was only a year old. He there grew up and married Rebecca Sammons, a native of that county. Her parents subsequently removed to Brooke County, Va., where both died, the mother living to the remarkable age of one hundred and eight years. Mr. Marshall went to Erie in the the War of 1812. In 1816 he sold his farm in Delaware Township to George Reznor, and with his family returned to Washington County, where both he and wife died. Their only descendants in Mercer County are Thomas J. and William B. Marshall, of Sharon, who are the sons of their daughter, Susan S., who married John H. Marshall, of Washington County, Penn.

John Ralston came about the same time as Marshall, and erected one of the first log cabins in the township. Adam Kamerer built the first hewed log house soon afterward, which was then regarded as quite a fine residence.

Samuel Caldwell, Sr., was a native of Ireland, whose parents immigrated to Pennsylvania in 1787, where he grew to manhood. In 1801 he came to Mercer County, and settled in what is now Sugar Grove Township. In 1802 he married Elizabeth Donaldson, and removed to Delaware Township, where the following children were born: John, William, Samuel, James K., Joseph, Stewart, Elizabeth and Anna A. Only three of these survive, and one, Mrs. Elizabeth Livingston, of Transfer, a resident of this county. In 1816 Samuel Caldwell, Sr., was appointed a justice of the peace, and died in 1830, his widow surviving him until 1870. Their son Samuel, who inherited the old homestead, was born thereon in 1809, and spent his whole life in Delaware Township. In 1834 he married Eliza Jane Livingston, a native of Washington County, Penn., who bore him five children, all of whom are living. The mother died in 1873, and her husband survived her ten years, dying in 1883, both in the faith of the United Presbyterian Church. He was a strong anti-slavery man, and a Republican in politics.

In 1809 Henry Hollenbank took up land and built his cabin in the forest of Delaware. He took sick and died soon after completing his settlement. Among the other early pioneers, mention might be given of John Hommer, who removed from Greenville, where his father and brothers settled in 1809, and purchased land and a hut owned by James Woods, the land having been subsequently occupied by his sons. In 1816 the Marshall tract of improved land was bought by George Reznor, a native of Union County, Penn. Samuel Williamson settled in 1820 near the present site of New Hamburg, and Thomas Dumars, the pioneer of the northern portion of the township, who entered and located upon land afterward owned by Peter Wasser. There were probably others who entered the township during the years mentioned.

It has always been a source of pleasure to the old to relate to attentive audiences the reminiscences of their early years. These in a county so uniform as Mercer, are nearly all alike. The aged pioneers, or sons of pioneers, have each the same story to relate concerning primitive customs, hardships, dangers and amusements. The region of Delaware Township, according to semi-authenticated legends, was at one time the possessor of a real Indian village. The wigwams, squaws and warriors were all there, and a liberal intermixture of war paint, tomahawks, captives, tortures and other concomitants of the noble red man will readily occur to the imagination, to give the whole story an air of reality and vividness. Flints, arrow-heads, stone pipes and other relics of the departed race have been found in great variety.

Another remarkable feature of the early times was the wonderful abundance of game. Bears and wolves were found in great numbers, and deer were so common as to excite little interest. The late Samuel Caldwell relates that on one occasion, while he was going a short distance through the woods, he saw twenty-five of these agile creatures assembled in a herd. He captured a half-grown fawn upon another occasion.

Early Mills.—The first grist-mill erected in the township was built in 1832 by John Donaldson, which was still standing a few years ago on the farm of Donaldson's descendants. It played an important part in the drama of pioneer life, and was of much practical utility to the early settlers. Some years later a man named Comstock erected a second mill, on the farm of Robert Fruit, and operated it until the business ceased to be profitable. A third was erected on the Shenango, by John F. Wheeler, in 1869. Samuel Williamson was the proprietor of the first saw-mill erected in the township. He built it in 1823, upon the bank of a little creek that flows through the village of New Hamburg. Its machinery consisted of a single upright saw, which did yeoman service in fashioning the rough timber into marketable lumber. In 1838 a second one was constructed, and the two proved amply sufficient to meet the demands of the residents of the township.

Besides these simple mechanical establishments there were at various times in operation several distilleries and a furnace, whose history is given elsewhere. The distilleries did a thriving business in early days, but the growth of the temperance sentiment in the county rendered their maintenance unprofitable.

Villages.—New Hamburg, on the left bank of the Shenango, west of the center of Delaware Township, is the metropolis of the township. It was laid out in 1838 by Peter Beil, on lands settled by Samuel Williamson as early as 1820. The growth of the place did not begin until 1840, when Peter Beil, George Kamerer and Eli George started the first store. The first tin-shop was started by Mr. George in 1838, on the first village lot sold. Daniel Hecker was the pioneer justice of the peace. The first shop and the first cabinet-shop were started in 1840, by Charles Cotterman and James Neihart, respectively. Not until 1842 did the first hotel make its appearance. New Hamburg has the usual line of stores and other business interests. For an inland village it has considerable business activity.

Delaware Grove, located in the southeast part of the township, and northeast of Big Bend, was at one time quite a prosperous village. The first store was opened in the place by James T. Black in 1834. In 1840 a post-office was established at this point, with Mr. Black as postmaster, who filled the position until 1847. This office existed up to February 5, 1886, when it was discontinued by the department. Several shops of different kinds were built and operated, and a large hotel erected. The abandonment of the canal in 1871, and the growth of newer villages along the railroad, sapped the business of Delaware Grove, and it is now only a reminiscence of its former prosperity.

Churches.—St. John's congregation was organized by Revs. Michael Kuchler and Philip Zeiser in 1837. The Lutheran and Reformed families living in that vicinity had previously worshiped at Good Hope Church, in West Salem Township, but in 1837 they erected a log building, 24x30, on the Mercer road, about one mile northeast of New Hamburg, which was dedicated the same year, under the name of St. John's. In 1846 the present two-storied frame edifice succeeded the old log structure. The cemetery was commenced at the time the congregation was organized. The pastors of St. John's have been usually those supplying Good Hope. Rev. Kuchler's successors have been Revs. Becker, T. H. Hengist, Krantz, Michael Kuchler, Jeremiah Fishburn, C. A. Fetzer and William Rehrig, the present pastor, who is also professor of German in Thiel College. The Reformed pastors of St. John's have been as follows: Revs. Philip Zeiser, Benjamin Boyer, H. F. Hartman, Frederick Pilgram and J. M. Shick, the last mentioned being the pastor now in charge.

As early as 1820 the Methodists built a house of worship on the farm of George Reznor, who deeded the site. The building was open to all religious denominations, but the Methodists seem to have had the control, Rev. Mr. Graham preaching the dedicatory sermon. The house was abandoned many years ago.

The Presbyterians built a church in New Hamburg in 1853, Casper Kamerer being the contractor. It was opened for services the year following as a free church. It was not fully completed until 1868. The property was finally sold to the Reformed Church. The organization is now known as the New Hamburg Reformed Church, and is in a prosperous condition.

The Methodist Episcopal is the second church in the same village. Its house of worship was erected in 1873, under the efforts of Rev. A. H. Kinney, its first pastor. The foregoing organizations supply the spiritual wants of the township.

EAST LACKAWANNOCK TOWNSHIP.

This township was formed from the eastern part of Lackawannock Township, as its name implies, August 17, 1849. Its name is of French and Indian derivation. The French word for lake, lac, was combined with the name of an Indian chief, Wannock, who resided by the banks of a small lake lying within the limits of the present township of East Lackawannock.

The surface of this township is perhaps more broken than that of any other in the county. The ground is rocky and rough, and alternates between steep hills and sharp, precipitous valleys. The hills are veined with abundant beds of coal. Bog-iron ore has also been found concealed in the grasp of earth, but the work of smelting it has never been carried on successfully. Besides these treasures, there is much good building stone to be found in the rocky hill-sides, and although this has not been opened for shipping purposes, yet it supplies a good local demand. There are no streams of any consequence within the borders of the township. Lackawannock Creek finds its head here, but it is an insignificant rivulet, that flows in a northerly direction, and discharges its waters, when it has any, into the Shenango at Big Bend. Numerous little tributaries to the Neshannock penetrate the eastern portion of the township, while on the west Little Neshannock, heading chiefly in Jefferson Township, and flowing in a direct southern course to the Neshannock, forms the western boundary.

One of the principal physical features of the township is Hell's Hollow, a narrow gulch-like ravine, about one mile and a half west of Mercer, on the road leading from that place to where the Middlesex and Sharon roads diverge. There is nothing particularly striking about this place of itself, but it is interesting chiefly for the singular tradition that attaches to it. This was, that in the early times an Indian was killed by his pale-face brother, and that ever since the shade of the former, troubled and restive, has been unable to find peace in its happy hunting grounds, but returns each night to the scene of its taking off, where, in storm and tempest, its deep groans and wailing lamentations sound loud above the echo of the howling winds.

Pioneers.—The early history of this township is so nearly identified with that of its parent, Lackawannock, that no successful attempt can be made to divorce the two. For a more particular history of the early settlement, therefore, the reader is referred to the latter. But there are a few names of early pioneers which belong distinctively to this place.

Thomas Gordon entered the township in 1800, and settled on land afterward owned and cultivated by William Edwards. Contemporary with him was Christian Miller, a German, whose vocabulary in English was exceedingly limited. The latter located on the farm on which his son, Money Miller, resided for a long series of years. Among the other early residents we find by a patent granted by the commonwealth to John Lynch October 18, 1786, that the latter conveyed his right of land now owned by Seth Hoagland to one William Smith, who in turn conveyed his title to Thomas and Bevan Pearson, January 12, 1807, the latter thus becoming the first real settler of the land mentioned in the warrant. On the 8th of July, 1816, the two Pearsons disposed of the tract to James Thompson and Silas Cossitt. The latter settled on donation lot 528, comprising 200 acres, in 1809. His residence, or hut, was situated near a saw-mill at present standing on the Hoagland place. It is related of him that he became impressed with the truth of an old legend belonging to the land, to the effect that during the French and Indian War several jars of gold had been buried on his property by the French to avoid capture by the British, and forthwith Cossitt began exhuming all the old stones and chunks of wood he could find, in hope of recovering the buried treasure. It is almost unnecessary to say that he did not find it.

Jacob Osborn, a native of Washington County, Penn., came to Mercer County and located near Mercer about the close of the last century. He was a soldier in the War of 1812, and served under Capt. Junkin, of Mercer. He was the father of three children, and died within the county.

George Wright and Alexander McCollough were also early settlers of this township. The former lived one mile west of Mercer, and was the father of five children.

James Thompson, a genuine "blue Yankee" from New England, who secured his farm from Pearson, settled upon it in 1816. At the same time Jacob White entered the township. During the few years following occurred the advent of John Wilson, William Lafferty, John Hutchinson, James Wilson, Malcom McComb and John Thompson. To each of these may be given the credit of being one of the very early settlers of what is now East Lackawannock Township.

FAIRVIEW TOWNSHIP.

This township was formed by a separation of Cool Spring September 21, 1850, the original township of Cool Spring at that time being divided as nearly as possible into four equal parts, named, respectively, Cool Spring, Jackson, Lake and Fairview, by the commissioners appointed by the court for that purpose, David Findley, J. P. Garrett and W. J. Hunter.

The name is suggestive of its derivation. A fair view is precisely what a traveler beholds as he passes through the township in the summer time, when the fields are carpeted with rich foliage, and the forests are alive with birds. But it is not known who was the first to apply it to its present use. There are no striking natural phenomena in the township. The surface is pretty well broken, and at places is quite rough. There, are two streams of consequence within the limits of Fairview. One of these, Otter Creek, rises in Otter Creek Township, flows in a southerly direction through the southwest corner of the township, and effects a junction with Mill Creek at Mercer. The other, Cool Spring Creek, heads in Fairview, flows almost due south, and empties its waters into Mill Creek.

Early Settlers.—In the summer of 1798 the first settler of the township, Thomas Coulson, removed from his home in Fayette County, penetrated the northern wilderness to what is now Fairview, and settled upon land subsequently owned by Henry Knapp. He erected a little cabin of unhewed logs, and prepared to encounter the perils and hardships of pioneer life. The name of Coulson is intimately associated with the early history of Fairview Township, so much so that no apology is made for relating an anecdote concerning him. Seventeen years after the birth of the present century, as the township became more alive with residents the inhabitants, being somewhat secure from their early dangers, began to turn their attention to matters of education. Coulson was the first to take active measures. With that quick, practical decision of character which characterized him, he left to others the pleasure of discussion, and pushed forward toward effective action. He erected a school-house of logs upon his own land, supplied it at his own expense with what few equipments it possessed, and, finding that no other teacher was available, himself commenced discharging the duties of pedagogue. The school was built originally for his own children, but with true generosity he threw its privileges open to his neighbors' children. Coulson continued this laudable work until the arrival of other masters in the art of instruction rendered his labors superfluous. It is said of his career as the "school-master," that he was remarkably successful in teaching the youth under his charge the mysteries of "rule of three," writing and grammar. Previous to this, however, in 1812, there had been no tavern in the vicinity. Coulson, perceiving the necessity of a good house of entertainment, opened his own home to strangers and embarked on the sea of landlordism. There are records still existing of his feeding soldiers who tarried at his house while on their way to the scene of conflict. An incident of this is yet related. It appears that among a party of soldiers who thus tarried at Coulson's tavern was a huge sergeant by the name of Dorm, six feet in height, possessed of almost herculean strength and endurance, and remarkably active and pugnacious. He was, moreover, of a quick, irascible temperament, and when under the influence of liquor was exceedingly irritable. For some reason the host was opposed to the continuance of the war. During the stay of the doughty sergeant the landlord chanced to express his convictions in opposition to the war, and by so doing aroused the hostility of Dorm. The latter approached Coulson, and in an insolent tone demanded an apology. This the latter refused to give. Thereupon the big sergeant struck the host a powerful blow, which the latter parried and prepared to return. Coulson was much his antagonist's inferior in point of physical strength, but this deficiency was more than compensated by his superior agility and endurance. The two now began to fight with zest. By an accident the sergeant missed his balance, and being considerably intoxicated, fell to the floor. Coulson, quick as a cat, pounced upon him and began belaboring him with good, lusty blows. Thus they struggled for a long time, until at length Coulson's superior endurance gave him the victory, and the boasting Dorm was compelled to acknowledge that he had at last found an equal.

Probably the second settler of the township was Joseph Alexander, who came from Allegheny County in 1800, and settled upon land afterward owned by his son Samuel. Coulson and Alexander were then the only residents of the region. Alexander was known by the name of "Packer Joe," on account of his having, for many years previous to his location in Mercer County, been engaged in packing goods over the mountains to Pittsburgh. The journey from Allegheny County to his new home in the Northwest was accomplished on horseback, and was tedious and painful beyond description. Four years after Alexander's entrance the population was increased by the arrival of Joseph Campbell and family, who settled upon land afterward occupied by Joseph Campbell, Jr. For a long period of years after this the township was sparsely settled. There were other families that followed Alexander and Campbell, but their names have not been ascertained. It is known, though, that in 1812 there were probably as many as twenty households in the region now designated as Fairview Township.

Early Mills.—The first mill of any sort in the township was a saw-mill erected in 1820, on the banks of Cool Spring Creek, by Fergus Smith. It was a meager affair, and its outfit consisted of a single upright saw. But, nevertheless, it played an important part in the development of the township. Ten years later the second mill, also a saw-mill, was built by Silas Coulson, on land subsequently owned by William Craig. In 1835 a grist-mill was erected by Marmaduke Rambo. It was located on the William Stubbs farm. The little stream known as Morrison's Run furnished the motor-power, and coarse granite blocks served as mill-stones. In 1838 the fine grist-mill now standing near Fredonia was erected by Levi Arnold. In 1845 George Slater built a saw-mill on the land afterward owned by Isaac Slater. Other mills followed in due time, notably McDowell's saw-mill, built in 1854, on the banks of Otter Creek, by George McDowell; Clark's steam mill, built in the fall of 1869, by Thomas and Joseph Clark, and the Mosteller steam mill, erected nearly the same time. There have been other minor mills, and also temporary structures, but these will not be noticed.

Taverns.—Places of public entertainment are always places of interest. The old inns, which in the early times served as modest forerunners of the pretentious hotels of the present day, were ever the object of veneration and awe to the rural inhabitant. The first one opened in Fairview was that of Thomas Coulson, of which mention has been made. The second, dating from the year 1825, was a licensed house, opened by the Pittsburgh and Erie Stage Company for the accommodation of their hands and patrons. The third was started one year later, in the northern part of the township, by Silas Coulson. In 1851 William Gamble erected a log house on the line of the turnpike, which he converted into an inn, and as such conducted it for several years. In 1855 he built the frame house afterward known as the Byers Hotel. In 1852 George Cubbison commenced the erection of a large tavern in the village of Fairview, which he intended to run in connection with the general store of which he was proprietor. He tried the plan for a time, but becoming dissatisfied he sold it to R. C. Clark, by whom it was converted into other uses.

Churches.—After the extended sketch of Mr. Tait has been read and also what is said in Chapter XII, little additional needs to be given concerning Cool Spring Presbyterian Church. It was organized by him in 1800, and embraced a large part of the people living in its region. He became the first pastor in November of the year referred to, doing similar labor for the Salem Church. This relationship continued until 1813, when the people of Cool Spring decided to worship at Mercer, virtually disorganizing the congregation. In 1827 re-organization occurred, and on the 24th of June, 1829, Rev. Ira Condit was secured to devote one-third of his time to Cool Spring. This he did until his death, October 24, 1836.

He was succeeded for a short time by Rev. David Waggoner. Rev. James G. Wilson became the next pastor, his installation occurring in 1842. He divided his time equally with Salem, continuing in this capacity until 1850. In 1852 Rev. John W. McCune became the settled pastor, and remained many years. The congregation is in possession of its third edifice, and is still laboring manfully for the faith it has so long professed.

The Fairview Baptist Church was organized in September, 1850, with eight members, viz.: Henry and Jane Fulton, J. and C. McCartney, Mahitabel Donaldson, E. Carpenter, E. Furman and A. Lewis. Henry Fulton was selected as the first deacon and clerk. Elder W. W. DeVan was secured as first pastor, serving until 1854. He was succeeded by Elders Stedman, Clouse, Parker, King, Ward, Thomas, Davis and others. The house of worship, 30x40, was erected in 1851.

Oak Grove Wesleyan Methodist Church, in Fairview Township, was organized July 30, 1862. Their house of worship, known as Oak Grove Chapel, was built the same year, and stands on land purchased of William Bland. This congregation sprang from the Methodist Episcopal Church, the separation occurring on account of radical differences on the slavery question.

FINDLEY TOWNSHIP.

This township was formed August 17, 1849, by a division of the old township of Springfield, the northern portion of which constituted the new organization. The name Findley was given it in honor of Judge John Findley, who had been one of its early settlers and a man of great prominence. Fuller account of him will be found elsewhere. The soil of Findley Township is extremely rich and fertile. There are successfully grown in it many kinds of fruit, such as apples, pears, peaches, etc., and the staple cereals, such as wheat, corn and oats. The surface is well broken, and in the hills are found rich deposits of coal and minerals. The grazing lands found in the valleys are not surpassed anywhere in the county. In short, both agriculturally and in point of mining resources, the township stands fully abreast of its competitors. Its drainage, likewise, is superior. The two principal streams within its borders are Otter and Mill Creeks, both of which enter from the north, and, uniting near Mercer, form the Big Neshannock, which pursues a southerly course through the western extremity of the township, leaving it a short distance from Hope Mills. In addition to these are two smaller streams, one of which, a tributary to Mill Creek, finds its source in the eastern portion of Findley, and flows in a western direction to its junction with the larger water course; and the other, a tributary to the Big Neshannock, heads in the southeastern portion of the township, and flows in a southwesterly course to where it discharges its waters into the Neshannock near Nelson Station. There are also several minor rivulets, that drain the portion lying west of the Neshannock. These streams, all of which have considerable velocity, owing to the hilly country through which they flow, furnish abundant water-power for saw and grist-mills, which is utilized in a manner that reflects credit upon the enterprise of the inhabitants.

Pioneers.—Among the first settlers of the northern portion of the township, mention will first be made of Christian Troxel, who entered upon possession of land, afterward owned by W. N. Pardoe and Robert McKee, about the year 1799, as nearly as can be now ascertained. He selected the tract upon which he located on account of the superior quality of timber which it contained, and also because of its nearness to the excellent drainage of Mill Creek.

In 1800 Henry Hosack entered the township, having removed from near Gettysburg, Penn. He brought with him his entire family, consisting of fourteen members, and located on the farm subsequently owned by Samuel Hosack. The Hosacks became a very influential family. One of Henry's sons, Thomas, became especially noted. His name is found on nearly all of the early court records, where evidence exists to show that he was one of the leading spirits of his day.

In the region lying near Mercer borough, undoubtedly the first settler was John Findley, whose residence in the township began in 1799, at which time he removed from his old home in Westmoreland County to his new one in Mercer County. The old family dwelling, which is yet standing on the homestead, was built by him in the same year. In 1800 he brought to it his wife, a daughter of Joseph Junkin. From this time on his career in the county was one of special prominence.

Through the influence of Mr. Findley, Joseph Junkin, his father-in-law, was persuaded to try his fortunes in the new settlement. This he did in 1803, at which time he purchased lands, among them being what was afterward termed the Hope farm, on which he placed his family. In 1805 his two oldest sons, John and Joseph, arrived in the county and built a cabin near by. In a short time they had completed the construction of a dam, above which they erected a saw and grist-mill, and later a fulling and carding mill. It is said that the grist-mill contained the first pair of French burr-stones used in the county, which did such excellent work that the establishment speedily acquired an extensive notoriety. A more extended account of the Junkins will be found in the Garvin sketch of that family.

In 1804 Edwin Hughes arrived in the vicinity of Mercer, and located on a tract of land situated one mile east of the borough. But little is known concerning him. About the same time, or perhaps earlier, James Jeffers, a hunter of long experience, entered the region. There are a number of incidents related concerning his hostility to the Indian race, which had been aroused on account of the cruelty with which some of his relatives had been treated by the savages. Whether these are true or not cannot now be determined. They belong, however, to the folk-lore of the county, and as such deserve recital. It is said that on one occasion, while roaming through the forest, he suddenly met two Indians. They instinctively knew him to be a foe, and both at once dodged behind the cover of friendly trees. Jeffers perceived that the contest of one against two would be an unequal one, if carried on squarely; so he resorted to artifice to overcome the odds. Taking off his cap he placed it over the muzzle of his rifle, and exposed it, apparently incautiously, to the view of his antagonists. This had the desired effect. Thinking it was his head which they saw, one of them instantly shot and sent a ball through the empty cap. Jeffers dropped the cap to the ground, giving a death-like groan as he did so. The two Indians at once sprang from cover, and were rushing forward to secure the scalp of their supposed victim, when the latter stepped forth, cocked his rifle and prepared to shoot. He was at first at a loss to know which of the two had the loaded rifle, but perceiving one of them lift his weapon to his shoulder, he surmised that he was the dangerous foe, and accordingly shot him. The remaining savage sprang forward with a huge knife and engaged in a hand to hand conflict, but the superior cunning of the white man caused victory to perch on his side. As the savage was about to make a final thrust, Jeffers deflected the course of the knife, and it sheathed itself in the breast of the Indian himself, instantly killing him.

In 1807 John Barnes entered the township, and located on a farm near Pardoe Station. He had previously settled in Jackson Township, where he and his brother Thomas had secured a farm numbering 100 acres of rich land. Barnes was an Irishman. His sympathy with that race induced those of his fellow-countrymen who entered the township to settle near him. Thus the settlement known as Irishtown originated.

In the southeastern portion of the township few settlements were made prior to 1830. Among the earliest pioneers of the region, brief mention may be made of James Montgomery, who secured 200 acres in this locality in 1834, and at once began their improvement; Hugh Rainey, yet living, who occupies a portion of the Montgomery place, which he bought in 1838, and Jacob and Christian Snyder, whose entrance into the township probably dates back to 1832.

Villages.—Findley Township has several small villages. Hope Mills is a station on the W. N. Y. & P. R. R., near the boundary line between Findley and Springfield. The settlement was made by the Junkin's family, whose sketch is given elsewhere. The village has grown up in consequence of the location of old-time mills at that point. They have finally disappeared by fire. In the creek near the mill three persons have been drowned. One of them was a lady school-teacher.

Pardoe, a station on the P. S. & L. E. Railroad, is a sprightly village of several hundred inhabitants. Its growth has been dependent upon the activity of the adjoining coal mines, which have given occupation to the people of the community. It was laid out in 1869 by the Mercer Mining and Manufacturing Company. Lots for school and church purposes were donated at the inception. Three churches, a Presbyterian, a Methodist and a Catholic, have been since established, the organizations dating back some ten years. Bernard Heidrich started the first store. The property finally fell into the hands of C. M. Derickson, of Mercer.

Irishtown is a small village southeast of Pardoe, near the line separating Findley and Wolf Creek Townships. It was named Irishtown because the first settlers were Irish, the suggestion being made by John Galbreath. These settlers came to this region in 1803. Some of the near neighbors then were John Todd, John Patterson, Thomas Graham, John Richie, John Burnside, James Alexander, Matthew Alexander, John Hoge, James Bell, Thomas Paxton, Sr., Thomas Paxton, Jr., Joseph Scott, Hugh Evans, James Evans, James Long, James Craig, Peter Wilson, William Montgomery, James Montgomery, Samuel McChesney, Robert Allen, John Montgomery, John Allen, Thomas Barnes, John Barnes and others.

A list of the early officers of each township is given in Chapter XXVIII. It will be found to contain the names of a number of the leading pioneer spirits of Findley Township.

FRENCH CREEK TOWNSHIP.

French Creek Township was formed in 1805, the first mention of it on the court records being under date of August, of that year, when the survey was returned and approved. It was originally much larger than at present, its territory having been very much diminished November 19, 1849, by the formation of Mill Creek Township. The surface of the township is very much broken. Precipitous hills rise abruptly up in many places, while the intervening valleys thus formed are sharply outlined, and give an air of ruggedness to the contour of the land. In point of drainage the principal stream in the township is the rapidly-flowing French Creek, which enters from the northwest, flows in a southeastern course across the extreme northeastern corner of the township, and finally passes into Venango County. There are two or three tributaries to this, that serve to drain the portion of the township farther removed from the main stream. In regard to mineral wealth the township is not distinguished for the possession of valuable coal deposits. A superior grade of building stone is found along the banks of French Creek, but its market is purely local, and no attempts have been made to enter into shipping connections with outside trade.

Among the physical features of the township might be included the mound-evidences of the existence of a distinctly civilized and enlightened pre-historic race of men. On the Heydrick farm is a beautiful hill, whose triangular summit is covered with an imposing pile of curious relics of primeval workmanship, which have been collected through a long series of patient search in the region near by. Arrow-heads, darts, pipes, skinning-knives, hatchets and well-preserved remains of antique pottery have, in many instances, been preserved by the inhabitants of the township. In addition to these more-subtly wrought implements of civilized life, there are found in great abundance the grosser and rougher weapons of the later Indians. Their rude arrow-heads, consisting of flint irregularly chipped off into pointed darts, and the various other relics of Indian workmanship, have been discovered in various places in the county, but nowhere as numerously as in French Creek. Particularly about the mouth of Deer Creek, where it is supposed the savages assembled in force to hunt, are the weapons of the chase found in great numbers. There are a number of traditions connected with these which make the region an interesting one to the student of archæology.

First Settlers.—The first white man to set foot in the region which afterward became French Creek Township was, according to a supposition which appears to be reasonably well founded, Joncaire, in 1727. He was a French officer, sent out by his government to occupy the disputed territory, which became so dread a witness of the fierce struggle called the French and Indian War. The chain of forts, which the court of Versailles had placed at short intervals in the country which was to be held, was constructed along the line of the leading streams. Le Boeuf, now Waterford, was one to which the Frenchman proceeded. From thence he passed to Fort Du Quesne, following the course of the streams of French Creek and Allegheny River. In December, 1753, George Washington passed through the township, on his way to Le Boeuf. The expedition was made partly on horseback, and partly by canoes. In his celebrated journal Washington mentions the territory lying northeast of Venango as being exceedingly fertile, and was, no doubt, charmed with its picturesqueness. In returning canoes alone were used, and the journal mentions the fact that the rapidity of the stream, and the stones that arose above the level of the water, gave his party much annoyance, frequently compelling them for considerable distances to carry their boats overland.

Coming down to actual settlers, the first settler in the township, so far as can now be ascertained, was Robert Robb, who in 1802 entered and located on donation lot 1,028. He had originally come from Allegheny County. The brother-in-law of Robb, John Smith, followed with his family, consisting of his wife, son Robert and brother William, in 1807. It is related of these two pioneers that they were too poor to own oxen, and consequently were compelled for the most part to carry their earthly possessions on their own backs, when emigrating from Allegheny County. In 1803 a daughter was born to Robert Robb and his wife, Polly. She afterward became Mrs. Jennie Wallace, and was the first child born in the township. She was still living up to a few years ago at Franklin, Venango County.

In 1803 came Hugh Moore, who had been attracted from his old home in Bedford County by the richness of the new county's soil. He settled on land subsequently owned by W. Heydrick. He is said to have owned the first wagon in the township. About the same time came his neighbor, John Daily, who made clearings near by. John Pearson, who settled on donation lot 1,029, which had been granted to his father for services rendered in the Revolutionary War, also arrived at this time and began the settlement of his claim.

In the southern portion of the township Thomas Jones was probably the pioneer. He came from Allegheny County, and it is said that he was paddled up the river as far as Venango by a man named Robert Bowles. At Venango he was started on his journey in company with two children of Bowles, and was compelled to prosecute it on foot. He settled on the farm afterward owned by his son Amos, in 1804. Bowles dying soon after, the two children whom he had entrusted to Jones' care were adopted by him, and one of these, a girl, afterward became Mrs. Jones. In the same year Jerry Henry settled on the land afterward owned by Jonas Blatt, and located two miles south of Milledgeville. In addition to these, later settlements were made as recent as 1850. As those who made them were scarcely pioneers, no further mention will be made of them.

There was no township in the county so prolific in game as French Creek, eighty years ago. The long stretch of woodland, relieved here and there by streams of running water, afforded ample room for deer. Foxes, also, were abundant, as were likewise, in less degree, bears, wolves and panthers. There were also a number of beavers at one time in the township, for near a pond located on the farm of C. W. Heydrick is the remnant of a vast beaver dam. It is estimated that the original dam was eight feet high and thirty long. The banks of the pond were penetrated in many places by the intelligent animals, thus affording a safe retreat when pursued.

There are records of several old buildings which were among the first constructions of architecture. One of these was a hewed-log tavern erected by Hugh Moore in 1810, said to be the first tavern in the township. It was two stories high, was possessed of a finished attic and large chimney, and had several thicknesses of mud plaster applied to its interior. About a mile from the site of this ancient land-mark was located what is said, with probable truth, to have been the first pottery in this part of Mercer County. It was built in 1815, by Joseph Wallace and John Smith. Its dimensions were limited, being twenty-four feet long by eighteen wide. There was a log kiln-house twenty feet square connected with it. The business of manufacturing various kinds of jugs, jars, etc., was carried on until 1824, when it was abandoned. The first saw-mill was constructed in 1828, by C. Heydrick, and stood near the mouth of Deer Creek. The building was forty-five feet long and seventeen wide, and the machinery consisted of a single old-fashioned upright saw, which performed its duties faithfully for a long period of years. In 1833 another saw-mill, situated a little distance west of the present village of Milledgeville, was erected by John Chatley. It was conducted with varying success until 1874. About the same time another one was erected in the southern part of the village, by William Cooper. All traces of it, however, have vanished. In 1837 a grist-mill was erected by David McQuiston and George Dixon. It was located on a farm owned by William M. Burns. The original proprietors continued in possession of the property a few years only, and sold out to William Brown. The mill has now disappeared. The first tannery was built in 1838, by William Burns, it being located on his own farm. The business was continued about ten years, but not being successful, was allowed to perish.

The only village in the township is Milledgeville. It was laid out upon donation lot 1,063 in 1851, the land on which it stands being owned at the time by William R. Cooper, Andrew Williams and William Edeburn. The surveyor was John Farver. The first dwelling-house erected in it was owned by Arthur Scott. William McCabe built the first frame dwelling.

Churches.—As early as 1852 Elder John Phillips, since engaged extensively in the oil business, preached in Milledgeville, and planted the seeds of the present Christian congregation. The family of Samuel Chatley were the first members, and aided in planting the cause which they profess. This congregation aided largely in building the old union meeting-house, which was used also for school purposes. In 1875, however, they erected a plain but substantial structure of their own. Elder B. E. Baker, who since joined the Free Will Baptists, was pastor of the congregation at the time. The congregation is in good condition, and is under the pastoral care of the preacher in charge of the Sandy Lake congregation.

The Milledgeville Presbyterian Church was organized April 8, 1856. John Rice and William R. Cooper were elected elders, in which capacity they served until October 24, 1858. The first preaching was done by supplies furnished by presbytery, Revs. McCune, Semple, Shields, Eaton, Gleason, Alexander, Coulter, Wilson, McCollough and others doing that work. Rev. J. G. Condit continued as supply from 1860 to 1864, and was succeeded by Rev. John Rice in the same capacity. For about two years Rev. H. B. Lamb was pastor, and was succeeded in 1867 by Rev. David Patton, who remained but a year. The congregation has relied almost entirely upon supplies. In 1861 a building was erected, 35x42, which is still in use.

Deer Creek Methodist Episcopal Church, in French Creek Township, a mile and a half southwest of Milledgeville, was organized early in the forties. Preaching had been done in the neighborhood, in dwellings and school-houses, by Revs. Hiram Luce and A. G. Miller, thus laying the foundation for an organization. In 1842, with about sixteen members, a house 26x24 was built. Enlarged and improved, it served until 1869, when the present building was erected, G. W. Clure and J. S. Williams being the contractors. A Sunday-school has been maintained, with a few exceptions, through the entire year, since 1842. The congregation is in flourishing condition.

GREENE TOWNSHIP.

This township was erected in 1844, from territory previously included in West Salem. In 1856 the eastern part was cut off in the formation of Sugar Grove. The name was given in honor of Gen. Nathaniel Greene, who was born at Potowhommet, R. I., May 27, 1742. In 1775 he was elected brigadier-general of the militia of his State, and commanded a division at the battle of Trenton, in 1776. From that time until 1780 he served with distinction, in the battles of Brandywine and Germantown, and as quartermaster general. He defeated the British at Springfield, N. J., in 1780; was in turn defeated by them at Guilford Court House, S. C., in 1781, and in an encounter near Camden. In September, 1781, he won the hard-fought battle of Eutaw Springs, and freed the State from the enemy's presence. After participating in other lesser engagements, he returned to his native State. He died of sun-stroke in 1786. Gen. Greene is considered to have been one of the most capable military commanders during the Revolution.

The surface of the township is notably unbroken; with the exception of the country adjoining the Shenango, the entire township may be said to be uniformly level. In its mineral resources there is no special richness. The chief wealth of the township lies almost exclusively in its adaptability to agricultural purposes. In this respect it has few superiors among the townships of the county. Farming and grazing facilities it has in abundance, but beyond these there is little to mention. The principal drainage is supplied by the Shenango River, which enters the northern boundary at Jamestown, flows through the township in a slightly southeastern course, and departs near the eastern extremity of the southern border. Big Run finds its head in the south, and flows in a southerly direction through West Salem Township up to the junction with the Shenango, but its influence upon the drainage of Greene Township is limited. Some fine timber is yet to be found, which, however, is rapidly disappearing, and, unless checked, its destruction will soon be complete.

Early Settlers.—A tradition is current that a hunter named Smith settled in this township as early as 1797, and built a hut and made a small clearing in the forest. It is said he planted a crop of potatoes which never matured, because of the dense, overhanging shade surrounding his little improvement. Smith was probably a squatter, and disappeared at an early date.

The first permanent settlers came into this portion of the county between 1797 and 1800, but so many conflicting statements are made that it is impossible for the faithful historian to give the exact year each pioneer made his settlement. All of the following, however, were in the township prior to 1800, as their names appear among the recorded taxables of that year: John Moreland and sons, Isaac and William, James Campbell, Christopher North and son Thoroughgood, Philip, John and Jacob Sherbondy, and Henry McLaughlin. The Morelands were natives of Ireland, but came here from Westmoreland County, and located west of the Shenango River. The father died in 1823, aged eighty-four years, and his widow, Letitia, survived him until 1838, dying at the ripe old age of ninety-six. Isaac Moreland was married in 1800, to Lillias Mossman, of West Salem Township, who died in 1845, aged eighty. He followed her in 1851, having also reached his eightieth year. William Moreland died in 1850, and his widow in 1857, aged seventy-three and seventy-eight, respectively.

James Campbell, the man in whose honor Jamestown was named, located on the site of that borough, in the history of which fuller notice is given him. Christopher North and wife, natives of Ireland, came into Greene Township late in the eighteenth century. His son, Thoroughgood, had preceded him from Westmoreland County a short time. They located on adjoining tracts, and both spent the remainder of their lives as residents of the township. Christopher's grandson now lives on part of this land. The original Christopher reared one son and six daughters, many of whose descendants are still living in the county.

Philip, John and Jacob Sherbondy, natives of Lehigh County, Penn., came from Westmoreland County. Philip settled on the farm where his son David resides. He reared nine children, and died in 1838, his widow, Elizabeth, surviving him a few years. He was a soldier in the War of 1812. John settled near the West Salem line. Henry McLaughlin and family came from Fayette County, Penn. It is claimed his son Henry was born in this township in November, 1798, and was the first white child born in this part of the county.

Samuel Rodgers, a native of Ireland, and his wife Mary, and family, came to this township from Fayette County, Penn., about the same time as the foregoing pioneers. He settled on the farm in Greene Township where his son Robert H. lives. They came via the Monongahela River to Pittsburgh, thence by the Ohio to the mouth of Big Beaver, thence up that stream and the Shenango to their destination, making the whole distance by water.

The Hoover family were among the early settlers of the township. The paternal grandfather, Abner F. Hoover, came from Philadelphia, about 1800. He settled on what was known as the "King Claim," containing 400 acres, situated in the southwestern part of the township. He had twelve children. His death occurred in 1854.

Rev. John Betts, of Lancaster County, Penn., whose father, Andrew Betts, settled in Crawford County, near the State line, in 1800, located soon thereafter on the land in Greene Township where his sons, John K. and Calvin, now live. Rev. John died December 26, 1863. He was the father of twelve children. Many of his descendants still reside in Mercer and Crawford Counties. Andrew Betts, brother of the above, settled in 1807 on the farm where his son Thomas now lives, in Greene Township. He served in the War of 1812. He reared quite a large family, several of whom live in Mercer and Crawford Counties.

Many other pioneers took up lands in Greene Township late in the eighteenth and early in the present century. Among those we find the names of John, William and Benjamin Snodgrass, Adam Hill, Hugh McGill, a Revolutionary soldier, John and Mary Latta, Thomas Bole, John Mahan, James McCurdy, John Atchison, Robert McDowell, John Reichard, Hugh Kitheart, Robert Irwin and William Carr, and others equally worthy of mention. Like most of the early settlers the majority of these were Irish or of Irish ancestry, and nearly all have descendants in this section of the State.

A Protestant Methodist Church was organized at an early date in this township. For some years the congregation occupied a log school-house erected in 1832. In 1853 a new house was built upon lands donated by Noble McCormick and his wife. The congregation had disbanded once, but was subsequently reorganized to do more efficient service.

HEMPFIELD TOWNSHIP.

The township which heads this sketch was formed from parts of Salem, West Salem, Delaware and Pymatuning Townships, May 24, 1856, agreeable to a petition presented to the court by numerous citizens November 22, 1854. The viewers, whose report, when confirmed by the court, established the boundaries of the new township, were David Findley, John Carnes and James C. Brown. The name "Hempfield" was given out of respect to James Kammerer, through whose agency the formation of the township had been chiefly secured. He had formerly been a resident of Hempfield Township, in Westmoreland County, and hence suggested the title which is at present used to designate the township in question.

The surface of Hempfield is what would be termed level. Compared with that of French Creek it might even be called flat, although there are places in the township having considerable elevation above the adjoining plains. The soil is rich, and agriculture is fully as far advanced in this township as in any other in the county. In point of drainage there is not much to be said beyond the fact that the chief stream is the Little Shenango, which enters from the north and flows in a southwestern course until near the borough of Greenville, where it makes a turn to the southwest, and discharges its contents into the Big Shenango. In addition to this stream there are several small tributaries to it which serve to increase the drainage facilities. The natural resources of the township, considered from a miner's standpoint, are not particularly valuable. There are deposits of coal, but not in sufficient quantity to repay working.

Pioneers.—In the history of the early settlement of what is now Hempfield

Township, one name is found to deserve special recognition. That name is Andrew Christy, the first settler. Early in the fall of 1796, in company with Jacob Loutzenhiser, Joseph Keck, Daniel and Peter Klingensmith and others, he departed from his old home in Westmoreland County, and pushed northward on an exploring expedition. The object of the exploration was to fix upon suitable locations for new homes. While engaged in this the party passed through what subsequently became West Salem Township, Mercer County. Here the Klingensmiths settled. Christy and Loutzenhiser, however, went farther east, the former selecting a tract lying within the present boundaries of Hempfield, and the latter a tract near the site of Greenville, though he first settled on the site of Orangeville. The land which Christy occupied lies about two miles southeast of the present borough of Greenville. It is related that he secured his land by deadening a number of trees that stood upon it, after which, with many hardships and fatigues, he returned to Westmoreland County to pass the winter. In the following spring, accompanied by his father, John Christy, his brothers, John and Samuel, and two sisters, he returned to the site of the trees he had deadened, and at once began the work of clearing off a homestead. The difficulties and perils of this sort of life cannot be even surmised in these days of perfected civilization. Christy was a bachelor when he arrived in his new home. But despite the fact that his neighbors were few, he resolved to become a benedict, and he found a spouse in the person of Miss Susan Williamson. The marriage ceremony was performed in May, 1803, Rev. Samuel Tait officiating as clergyman, and was the first service of the kind held in the township. Happily, though, it was by no means the last. While Andrew settled east of Greenville, the other members of the family settled south of it, in the same township, on the Callen farm.

The father of Mrs. Christy, John Williamson, was a native of Carlisle, Cumberland County. In the fall of 1798 he purchased the land of Jacob Loutzenhiser, which lay east of the present boundary line, and began a clearing. His family, however, was yet in Cumberland County, and he returned to secure it. On the 11th of June, 1799, the Williamson family entered into possession of their new Shenango Valley home. The father, John, was of a practical turn of mind, and signalized his entrance by at once beginning the erection of a saw-mill. The mill-wright who assisted him, one James King, became impressed with the idea that stones could be so attached as to form a grist-mill annex. This idea was speedily carried out, and in a little time the first grain ever ground in this portion of the county was being reduced to meal. In 1800 Williamson erected a separate mill, this being exclusively for grist. These two mills met with wonderful success, and were among the most valuable pioneer enterprises established in the county, and served to render Williamson's name forever memorable in local annals. Ask a citizen of Greenville to point out the location of the old Williamson saw and grist-mills, and he will quickly take you a short distance east of the Pacific mills, above the dam, and satisfy your curiosity. Williamson was unable, it appears, to complete the payments for his land, and in 1806 the farm fell back into Loutzenhiser's possession. The former, though, at once secured another tract of John Eckles, and removed his family thereto. This second venture was successful. The farm was eventually paid for, and has been the family homestead ever since.

In addition to these two prominent pioneers, the following were very early residents of Hempfield: Hugh Donaldson, who settled in 1798 on a tract of land adjoining Williamson's on the east; James Stinson, who took up land about the same time east of Donaldson's; Thomas Bean, who settled as early as 1798; Robert Bole, also in 1798; Hugh Brown in 1799, and James Dumars, who settled south of the Williamson farm in 1800.

Alexander Dumars, a native of Ireland, came from Westmoreland County in 1800, and settled two miles east of Greenville. He became justice of the peace in 1810, and held the position until 1838. He was the father of seven children, all of whom left descendants. His wife died in 1811 and he in 1854. He was a Democrat, a Mason, and therefore a strong hater of anti-Masonry. Mr. Garvin relates the following incident concerning him, which shows the tenor of those times:

“Squire Dumars had a case before him. Allen Hill prosecuted Joseph Nesbit for damages done by his cows in his cornfield. The parties to the suit appeared. Nesbit claimed that it was Hill's fault, that he would not keep up a fence around his field, that he had himself worked to repair and put up his fence, and had also sent hands for that purpose, but that Hill would do nothing to preserve his own grain. The Squire said: ‘If that is the kind of a man Hill is, he ought to be loaded with powder and blown to hell.’ The wily Irishman, Nesbitt, immediately said: ‘If that is the judgment of your honor, please give us an execution, and let us have it carried out at once.’”

William McMillen entered the township in 1800. His wife, Nancy, died in 1816, leaving four children. He then married Margaret, daughter of William McClimans, a pioneer of West Salem, who bore him several children. Many of his descendants resided in the county. Timothy Dumars located in the township the same year, and in 1803 John Sims built a tannery on the Donaldson farm, which business he afterward abandoned as unprofitable. Jacob and Samuel Kamerer came in 1812. Sketches of both will be found in the biographical chapters.

Salem Presbyterian Church is one of the pioneer congregations of its sect in Mercer County. It was organized in the year 1800, and for a time was known as Upper Salem. It is located in Hempfield Township. The preaching which resulted in the organization is said to have occurred on the banks of the Shenango, near the site of Greenville, and was done by those veteran Presbyterian missionaries, Revs. Tait and Stockton. Subsequently the preaching was transferred to a tent which was pitched near the site of the present church. The first pastor was Rev. Samuel Tait, who officiated in connection with Cool Spring. He was ordained to such relation November 19, 1800. The first eldership embraced Robert Mann, James Stinson and Samuel Williamson. In June, 1801, Mr. Tait relinquished his charge of Upper Salem to give his time to the Mercer congregation, which was more conveniently located. In June, 1813, Mr. Tait having relinquished Cool Spring, again became pastor of Salem, and continued in such capacity until the year 1826, when he began to devote his whole time to Mercer. On the 13th of October, 1828, Rev. James Alexander was chosen pastor of Salem in conjunction with Greenville and Big Bend. In that capacity he labored until June 25, 1834. On the 12th of April, 1836, Rev. James G. Wilson assumed charge of Salem and Greenville, and performed pastoral functions until the time of his release in 1851. Between this date and that of 1857 Rev. James H. Callen and T. P. Johnson were in charge. In 1858 Rev. James Coulter, and in 1859 Rev. David Grier, were pastors. Rev. John W. McCune became Grier's successor, and on his death Rev. George W. Zahniser took charge of the church. The pastors of the Greenville Church have since ministered to this congregation.

The first edifice was a log structure, and stood a little below the site of the present church, which is the third in order of erection. It is said the early preachers were paid in various kinds of produce. Samuel Caldwell, Sr., was, for a number of years, treasurer of the congregation, and hence performed the duty of collecting the grain and sending it to the preacher in charge.

Here too is the old Salem Cemtery, that had its inception with the erection of the first church building. Many of the pioneers were buried in this ground, and its hallowed associations are a part of the sacred memories clustering around old Salem.

HICKORY TOWNSHIP.

Hickory Township, the second largest in the county, and one of the wealthiest in point of mineral resources in the northwestern portion of the State, was erected into a separate organization in 1833, from portions of Shenango and Pymatuning. The physical features of the township form an agreeable study. Nowhere in the county can a richer or a more picturesque expanse of upland and vale, of hills rising from surrounding plains, and of valleys nestled down among the elevations be seen. The pasturage afforded by the lands lying along the banks of the Shenango River is unsurpassed anywhere in the vicinity, and the soil, fertile and mellow, ranks the township among the most productive regions, agriculturally speaking, in Mercer County. Added to these are the valuable internal treasures of rich coal deposits, that give employment to hundreds of the township's population. In the matter of drainage, the whole story is summed up in the statement that the Shenango River enters the township at near the central point of its northern boundary, flows in a southwesterly course along the western extremity, and then departs in a southeastern direction to its junction with Beaver Creek, at New Castle. This stream, with its many small tributaries, furnishes ample drainage facilities.

Pioneers.—The attractiveness of the land lying along the banks of the Shenango early claimed the attention and won the admiration of the exploring parties, which from time to time passed through the fertile regions of the Shenango Valley. The excellent facilities of drainage, and the abundant water supply, which in time of extreme drought was a very necessary recommendation, quite fully characterized the territory lying within the present limits of Hickory Township as an excellent location for settlements. In 1796 or 1797 Thomas Canon settled on the farm afterward owned by John Welch. Here he began a clearing, and prepared to take up a residence. One year after he was joined in his pioneer undertakings by William Campbell, afterward a sturdy old veteran of the War of 1812. The same year this party of civilization-spreaders was re-enforced by the advent of James Smith, who, in company with eight others, whose names are not known, entered the region; also the Robb family, consisting of Andrew and Rebecca Robb, and their seven children, by name Andrew, William, Joseph, Margaret, Mary, Nancy and Rebecca, settled the farm subsequently owned and occupied by John Rainey.

Col. Henry Hoagland was a native of Holland. He first located in Virginia. He served in the Revolutionary War, and afterward settled in Washington County, Penn. In 1798 he came to Mercer County with his wife, Catherine, and family, and took up his residence on the west bank of the Shenango River, one mile north of the site of Sharon, where he resided until his death, October 12, 1818. He took a deep interest in the early militia, and was captain, major and colonel, successively, of a Mercer County regiment. He reared four sons and five daughters, and his descendants are still numerous in the county. He was one of the organizers of the pioneer Baptist Church in his neighborhood. His sons, John and Richard, died in Hickory Township, on the farms still occupied respectively by their children.

Daniel, Bashara and John Hull settled in Hickory Township in 1798 or 1799. Daniel and John reared families, and died on their homesteads. Bashara removed to Iowa, where he died. John married the daughter of Capt. John Elliott, a soldier of the Revolutionary War, who settled on the banks of the Shenango before the Hull family arrived. For some time after John Hull came to Hickory Township he kept "bachelor's hall." The pot in which he prepared his corn mush had a little piece broken out of the rim. On one occasion, when he returned home very hungry from the pursuit of game, he looked into his pot for his mush. Lifting off the lid, he found a rattlesnake coiled nicely upon the top of the mush which was expected to furnish his supper. A strange prejudice interfered against his eating that mush on that occasion.

Early in the century William Welch settled on land a part of which afterward became the site of Wheatland. A part of the old homestead was subsequently owned by his son John, who lived there for a long number of years. The same period witnessed the arrival of Archibald Rankin, who settled near the edge of Lackawannock Township. John Hammel and James Young were his neighbors, they having arrived about the same time. Rev. James Satterfield, a graduate of the old theological school of Rev Dr. McMillan, of Canonsburg, entered the township soon after, and while waiting until a house could be built upon his land, which lay near by, lived in a small building which had previously been used by William Welch. His house was completed in 1803, and stood on the brow of the terrace of the Shenango. Its location was exceptionally fine, and the early minister much enjoyed to sit in his door and gaze out over the waters as they flowed peacefully and silently by. The property was occupied many years later by his son James.

John and Mary Morford settled in Hickory Township in 1803 or 1804. He had been a soldier in the Revolutionary War. His son Richard married his own cousin, and reared a large family. He was married twice, and left numerous descendants.

Vance and Mary Stewart, with one child, James, came into Hickory Township in 1805. They were Irish, and crossed the mountains from Huntingdon County with a pack-horse. They located near what is now Hickory Corners. They had eleven children, all of whom became heads of families. Both died on the old homestead, aged fifty-five and sixty-seven respectively.

The year 1805 marks the advent of William Hunter, who, with his father, David, came from Huntingdon County and settled a short distance east of what afterward became the village of Neshannock. There were six children in the family. Robert Milliken, a native of Ireland, came from Huntingdon County, Penn., to this township in 1810, and in 1816 settled where his son James lives. His wife, Nancy, was a daughter of James Sample. James Sample, also a native of Ireland, came from Huntingdon County with his family about the same time as Milliken, and settled in Hickory Township. He was twice married, and left several children by his first wife, all of whom are dead. He died in 1822 on the farm where his grandson, James K. Sample, resides. Other settlers continued to come in, and it was not long until the clearings had grown and covered nearly all the township.

Churches.—St. Rose of Lima Catholic Church, located immediately north of Hickory Corners, had its inception in the settlement in that vicinity of a few German Catholic families, between 1845 and 1860, who were principally engaged in mining coal. Among the earliest of these were Martin Scholl, Nicholas and Peter Rommelfangen, Michael and Matthias Schumacher, Clemens Dach, Nicholas and John Kahl, Matthew Koch and Michael Knapp. Rev. Andrew Skopez is believed to have been the first priest who held services in the settlement, celebrating mass at the house of Martin Scholl prior to 1850. He was followed in succession by Revs. J. Reiser, J. J. Gallagher, Andrew Schweiger and Joseph Gobbels, resident pastors of the Greenville congregation, who occasionally visited Sharon and the German settlement at Hickory Corners, and held services in private houses. The Redemptorist Fathers, of Pittsburgh, also occasionally visited this settlement between 1850 and 1860. In 1859 Rev. F. J. Hartmann began his visits, and the following year commenced erecting the present frame church, which he completed in 1861. He, however, held services in it in 1860, and the church was dedicated under the name of St. Rose of Lima. A half acre of land was donated by Clemens Dach, as a site for church and cemetery, and Father Skopez afterward purchased of Mr. Dach an additional acre. Soon after the church was completed Father Hartmann took up his permanent residence in a part of the building, but subsequently erected a dwelling-house adjoining the same. He remained the pastor of St. Rose until August, 1870, and during this period built up a large and flourishing congregation, but the decline of the coal business in that locality finally necessitated the removal elsewhere of a large number of its members. Rev. Andrew Skopez became pastor in August, 1870, and ministered to St. Rose congregation until his death in the fall of 1887, being at the time one of the oldest priests in the diocese. St. Rose was then attended by Father Clarke, of Sharpsville, until September 1, 1888, when its first resident pastor, Father Hartmann, again took charge of the parish, which now embraces about forty families.

In 1869-70 a Catholic Church was built in Neshannock, and the first service held therein by Father Hartmann, of St. Rose Parish, in 1870. The mission was then placed under the charge of the pastor at Sharpsville, and so remains up to the present. The building was a frame, but not a very substantial structure. It was blown down early in 1887, and has not been rebuilt, and it is not very probable that it ever will be. The mission embraces only a few families, and services are held in private houses.

Villages.—Hickory Township has several villages in addition to the boroughs given.

Hermitage Post Office is a cross roads settlement on the Mercer and Sharon road, four miles from the latter borough. It contains a store, post-office and several dwellings, besides a school building. Its list of postmasters will be found in the chapter on Internal Affairs.

New Virginia is a mining village of considerable activity in the past. It has no post-office of its own, but receives its mail at "Five Points," half a mile distant. The village has the usual supply of dry goods and grocery facilities, an Odd Fellows lodge, which sprang from the Sharon Lodge, a Methodist Church and a goodly number of comfortable residences. The people are employed chiefly in mining interests.

Keel Ridge was once quite an active place, but the exhaustion of the coal in the region has had the effect to injure the growth of the community. At one time it was the scene of unusual activity, and gave every evidence of financial thrift. It has supported one store. The religious interests of the community were supplied by a Lutheran Church, which was established in 1854.

Neshannock, the original terminus of the Sharpsville railroad, was formerly of considerable importance, but like its sister villages, which have depended for their prosperity upon a business that was likely to be temporary, it has receded. It has supported the usual complement of dry goods and grocery stores, public schools, hotel and post-office, and has furnished communicants for four different religious organizations, Methodist, Catholic, United Brethren and Baptist, three of which were supplied with church edifices. The Baptists were accustomed to meet in the school building.

JACKSON TOWNSHIP.

The township whose name heads this sketch was erected from a part of what was originally old Cool Spring Township, September 21, 1850. It was the southeastern portion of the old division, and adjoins what is at present called Cool Spring Township. The name given to the new subdivision was applied in honor of Gen. Andrew Jackson, the seventh President of the United States, who was born in South Carolina March 15, 1767. In 1788 he began the practice of law at Nashville, Tenn. Eight years later he became that State's sole representative in Congress, and one year afterward entered the Senate. Was in turn judge of the Supreme Court of Tennessee, major general in the United States army, commander of the American forces at the decisive triumph of New Orleans, governor of Florida, unsuccessful candidate for the presidency in 1824, elected President in 1828, re-elected in 1832, and died June 8, 1845.

Jackson Township is one of the best agricultural districts in the county. Its surface is level, and its soil fertile. There are rich deposits of coal and minerals in the ground. Grains and fruits are grown with much success. Peaches, pears, plums and apples flourish in rich profusion, while in the cereal line no township in the county surpasses it in the quality of the wheat and corn which it produces. The sole drainage is afforded by Mill Creek, which enters the limits of the township near the northeastern corner, flows in a diagonal course through the center down to the southwestern corner, whence it departs to form a junction with Otter Creek at Mercer. Cool Spring Creek also flows through a very small portion of the township, and discharges its waters into Mill Creek near the point where the latter intersects the township line.

Pioneers.—The early history of this township is so nearly identified with that of the old original division, Cool Spring, that any attempt to form a separation of narratives will necessarily involve much repetition. The first settlement made here was unquestionably that of the Zahniser family, but their movements are more particularly traced in the pages devoted to Lake Township.

At the time of the arrival of the Zahnisers, or within a year or two, the neighbors, within a radius of five miles, were Peter Wilson, William Wilson, Charles McBride, Thomas McBride, John McMillan, William Parker, Alexander Turner, John McDonald, George Myers, James Rice, Joseph Alexander, Thomas McClain, Francis Huey, Andrew and Robert McClure, Thomas and Jabez Coulson, William McMillan, Thomas McMillan and Benjamin Stokely.

The two McBrides came into the county at the same time. Charles removed to the West about 1814. Thomas died about 1830. His son, Arch. McBride, now lives near Sandy Lake. John McMillan was Scotch-Irish. He was a worthy citizen. His cousin Thomas was a bachelor, and built a hotel in which his brother William accommodated some of the attendants at the first courts held in Mercer County. The farm is now owned by John McEwen. William McMillan was one of the commissioners who laid out the town of Mercer. He and Thomas were both Revolutionary soldiers. William drew a pension.

George Myers was a Hessian, and taken prisoner at Yorktown, never returning to Europe. He died in 1830, aged eighty years.

James Rice had a large family. His sons were Clement, James, Thomas, Patrick and John. All have sold out and removed from the county.

For an account of Joseph Alexander, see Cool Spring Township.

Thomas McClain had four children, John, Abijah, Anna and Julia. The last, married to Mr. Law, is still living in Venango County. Mr. McClain died about 1812, and his widow married Asa Arnold.

Francis Huey died about 1842, aged about seventy-five. His sons, John and David, are still living, unmarried, and occupy the homestead.

For an account of the McClures, Stokelys, Coulsons, etc., see Cool Spring and Lake Townships.

William Wilson settled in what is now Jackson Township in 1797, a portion of the farm being now occupied by a grandson, also named William Wilson. The original William Wilson had a number of children, of whom the following were the elder ones: John, Samuel, William, Betsey and Rebecca. Of these children, William was a soldier in the War of 1812. His wife was Ellen Dawson, by whom he had nine children, some of whom are still living.

Peter Wilson, a veteran of the Revolutionary War, arrived in what is now Jackson Township as early as 1797. He secured a homestead, or settler's "right," as it was popularly called, from a man named Spencer, and settled on the farm owned many years later by James Dougherty. Wilson was a native of Ireland, who had emigrated from the country that gave him birth as early as 1775, taking up his residence in what is now Allegheny County. He quickly espoused the cause of freedom, and after serving with credit in the hard campaigns of the closing years of that great struggle, returned to his Allegheny home. Becoming impressed with a desire to secure a better home in the Northwest, he, in company with his wife and two children, George and James, removed to Mercer County. The tract which he secured from Spencer comprised 200 acres of fine land, beautifully located and well adapted to the purposes of agriculture. But somehow it was not in all respects satisfactory to its owner, for we find that in 1799 he traded it to a man by the name of Littleford, and removed to Worth Township, where he died about 1835. Some of his descendants are still living in Worth and Jackson Townships. His brother William came at the same time, and lived until 1825. His direct descendants are gone. Littleford occupied it until 1812, when he, too, abandoned it and left the county. On the 1st of May, 1797, John Pew, accompanied by his wife and four children, arrived from Washington County and settled a short distance from the present town of Mercer. Seven years later they removed to the portion of Cool Spring Township which subsequently formed Jackson, and took residence on a 200-acre tract. The land on which this settlement was made is yet in the possession of the family, having been occupied by the son Samuel, who was so closely allied to all the public enterprises and popular movements of the township until he died, in the winter of 1887. As early as 1798 William Parker made a settlement on the place afterward occupied for many years by Col. Thomas Hosack. Alexander Turner, a native of Ireland, entered Mercer County in 1800, and took up his abode in Jackson Township, on the farm afterward owned by Frank Vernon, where he continued to reside for quite a period of time. Among the other early settlers the names of John Todd, Charles McBride, Henry Glancey, George Wharton and John Armstrong are found.

Indians.—In the early times Indians were very abundant. There were three principal villages in the county, the chief one of which, consisting, according to best accounts, of seventy lodges, was located at what is now Mercer. The other two were, one at Big Bend, and the other at "Pine Swamp," in this township. The forests in the vicinity of the places named abounded in all kinds of game, and afforded excellent opportunity for hunting. The creeks, too, were well stocked with fish, and attracted the angling savages in great number during the spring and summer months. Altogether, the county was then a favorite Indian haunt. As a result of this early occupation by the copper-colored race, many wild traditions remain concerning their peculiarities. That these are, in many instances, purely mythical no one will deny. But running through them all is a thread of truth, from which is gathered the fact that many of the noble qualities which have been ascribed to the savages were not at all characteristic of them. They were, in the main, a lazy, worthless set, and as such were nearly always regarded by the whites.

An instance illustrating this fact is given. The chief of the Indian village at Mercer was an old fellow named Petty. He had a son-in-law named Harthegig, who was a drunken sot that was disliked by his own race as heartily as he was detested by the whites. While the Pew family was living near Mercer, an acquaintance sprang up between its members and the Indian chief. As a result friendly relations were at once established between the entire village of red men and the whites. One morning as Samuel Pew, then a mere boy, was sitting by the fireside, "toasting his shins," as he expressed it, Harthegig and two companions entered the cabin door. No attention was paid to them until the former, who was pretty well under the influence of liquor, advanced to the boy, seized him by the hair, lifted his hunting knife in a menacing manner and threatened to scalp him. The household was alarmed by these actions, and a hunter named James Jeffers, who was present, and who bore an implacable resentment toward all the Indian race, on account of a loss he had sustained from its hands, leaped forward, grappled with the savage, disarmed him and kicked him out the door. Nothing further was heard of him that day. On the following, however, he was observed to pass the house, followed shortly afterward by Jeffers, fully armed, who inquired the direction he had taken. Upon being told, Jeffers plunged into the forest, and returned in a few hours with a seemingly pleased expression on his countenance. He never related what had happened, but Harthegig was never seen more, and a skeleton found in the woods several years afterward was identified as that of the savage, whom Jeffers had doubtless killed. It is a significant fact, though, that no one, not even the Indians themselves, took any offense at the act.

Early Mills.—The first mill established in the township was one erected on his own farm, in 1799, by Peter Wilson. It was an undershot grist-mill, and its apparatus was simplicity itself, consisting merely of two flinty boulders, smoothed down by being rubbed together, and a cheap sieve for a bolter. There was much trouble had with this imperfect machinery, as small pieces of stone were constantly scaling off and mixing with the meal. This mill passed into the possession of Littleford, upon his securing the Wilson farm. He conducted it for a series of twelve years, and finally abandoned it. William Parker claims the honor of establishing the second. This, too, was a grist-mill, and was located a short distance west of Jackson Centre. Its machinery was, at start, nearly as simple as that of Wilson's mill, a hand-sieve serving as bolter for a number of years. But in time a pair of French burrs was secured and placed in operation, and the result was eminently satisfactory. In 1817 Thomas Hosack erected one on his farm, and conducted it until his death. In addition to these were numerous saw-mills, some stationary, some itinerant, all of which, though, serving good purposes. An extended account of these is deemed unnecessary.

Jackson Centre.—The site whereon the village of Jackson Centre stands was owned by Eben Turner, who located there in 1835-36. When he erected his house a controversy arose as to the name of the prospective town. It was finally agreed to leave it to the judgment of the first man coming along the road. He called it "Shandaggan," a name which the place bore for a long time. When the post-office was established it was called Satterfield, in honor of Rev. James Satterfield. The first grocery store was kept by Elliott Davis, and the first general store by M. L. Zahniser and his father. The first blacksmith shop was operated by John Gill, and the first shoeshop by Samuel Turner. Jackson Centre was surveyed February 28, 1882, by S. B. Stephenson, Esq., of Mercer. The petition for incorporation, based upon the plat submitted by Mr. Stephenson, was signed by Johnson Graham, Thomas Clark, A. P. Jones, John Infield, W. J. Gill, C. R. Heasley, W. C. Turner, W. J. Graham and others. The petition was referred to the grand jury March 8, 1882, and the same day recommended to be granted. On the 5th of June, 1882, the court granted the decree, appointing Johnson Graham judge, and A. M. De France and L. L. Milner to be inspectors of the first election, held June 27. The village is a thriving place, and has a flouring-mill run by water power, the property of J. R. Dight; several dry goods stores, two hotels, kept by John Infield and John Gill, respectively, both of which have butcher shops connected with them; a stock breeders' association, one furniture store, one drug store and other business interests.

Churches.—Cumberland Presbyterian Church was organized about 1841. The first edifice was a frame structure 35x40. It answered the demands of the church until 1868, when, during the pastorate of Rev. J. M. Gallagher, something needed to be done to secure a more suitable place. It was first proposed to repair the old structure at this point. Dr. A. G. Egbert, now of Franklin, a native of Worth Township, offered to donate $3,000 toward the erection of a new building. His suggestion was accepted, and a brick structure, costing $8,000, took the place of the old one. Dr. E. K. Squires, of Pittsburgh, assisted at the dedication ceremonies, at which time considerable money was raised, but not enough to liquidate the indebtedness. Dr. Egbert finally suggested that he would make up the deficit, which was about $2,000. His contribution to the $8,000 structure was about $5,000. Among the preachers in charge of this congregation have been Revs. Jacob Murphy, Carle Moore, Jacob F. Waugh, J. A. Bowman, A. M. Blackford, J. M. Gallagher and J. M. Norris. In 1876 quite a colony went out and formed a congregation in Lake Township, whose sketch is found elsewhere [see Bethany Church]. The Jackson Centre congregation is represented as being in a healthy condition.

Cottage Methodist Episcopal Church was organized before 1856, by Rev. Dilon Pearson, in what was known as Cape-Horn School-house. The original members were George Jones and wife, John Webb and wife, Mrs. Doratha Pete, Mary Black, Rev. Robert Boyd and John Dight and wife. The following summer a small church edifice was constructed, costing about $300. It was subsequently sold to John Wilson for a dwelling, and on the same site, two miles west of Jackson Centre, on the Franklin and Mercer road, in 1870, a fine frame building was erected, costing $2,000. Rev. McGill was probably the first regular pastor. The present minister is Nathaniel Morris, and the membership is 100. A Sabbath-school is kept up, with William Pew as superintendent.

Societies.—Jackson Centre Lodge No. 171, I. O. O. F., was instituted on the 30th of June, 1871, and is still in existence. In the summer of 1876 a Grange organization was organized, but, like its associates, has long since ceased to exist.

JEFFERSON TOWNSHIP.

The formation of Jefferson into a separate organization was effected April 4, 1850, at which time the court confirmed the report of three viewers, J. F. Satterfield, John Forker and John Findley, appointed agreeable to a petition presented May 16, 1849, praying for a division of Delaware Township, in order to facilitate the collection of taxes and to render elections easier. The new subdivision was given its present name in honor of that illustrious patriot and memorable statesman, Thomas Jefferson, third President of the United States. He was born in Virginia in 1793; in 1769, after practicing law for a number of years, became a member of the Virginia House of Burgesses; in 1773 was appointed delegate to the first Continental Congress; in 1775 took his seat in the Congress, was appointed chairman of the committee that drew up the Declaration of Independence, and was largely instrumental in framing that document; in 1779 became governor of Virginia; in 1785 became Minister to France; on returning became Washington's Secretary of State; in 1797 became Vice-President; in 1800 was elected President, and re-elected in 1804; retired to private life in 1809, and died in 1826.

The surface of the township is generally rolling. Agriculturally speaking, some of the finest farm lands to be found in the county are visible in the valleys of Jefferson Township. The soil is very fertile and productive, and the crops, unless impaired by outside agencies, are nearly always abundant. The drainage is furnished principally by the Shenango River, which thrusts itself into the limits of the township by means of a sharp, long bend, which has been given the suggestive title, "Big Bend of the Shenango." In addition to this large water course are numerous smaller ones, chiefly tributary to the former, of which the most important is Lackawannock Creek. Altogether the surface is as well drained as that of any other township in the county.

Pioneers.—There is a dispute as to who was the first actual settler of the township. The facts presented in support of each contestant's claim seem to establish that an error is made on one side or the other. In the year 1798, according to the best authenticated accounts, Robert McDonald, Sr., settled upon the boundary line dividing Cool Spring and what is now Jefferson Township, he having entered the county an emigrant from Washington County, Penn. On the farm which he thus occupied he erected a log cabin. This, the first one in the vicinity, was located within the limits of the present township of Jefferson, and was, consequently, the first cabin in it. In this rude shelter his son Robert was born on October 29, 1800, according to records which cannot be questioned. The other claimant to the honor of having been the first settler of the township was one John Mitchell, who located at a date nearly as early, on what is now the Greenville and Mercer road, about four miles from the latter place. Here he also effected a clearing, built a cabin, and began the struggles of a pioneer life. It would be a waste of energy to speculate upon the probable priority of either of these. It is enough to know that both at an early date braved the perils of their new surroundings, and manfully began the work which was to be, in later years, the foundations of a vigorous civilization and a healthy prosperity.

Among the other early pioneers might be mentioned Robert Fruit, who, in the year 1811, was living a short distance northwest of Pearson's mill, upon donation lot 210, 4th district; his brother, Thomas, a new-comer from Northumberland County, who settled about the same time on a tract of adjoining land; William Bagnall, who occupied the farm on which he is at present living early in 1828, at which time very few settlements had yet been made, and William Boyd, also an early resident of the region in question.

It is singular that Jefferson Township should be behind its neighbors in point of settlement, but it is a significant fact that such is the case. As late as 1830 comparatively few settlements had been made.

Early Mills.—The most important industry that could be developed in a primitive community, next to the necessary efforts at clearing and securing sheltering homes, was the milling industry. Upon this so much depended that, next to his house, the early settler looked first to his mill, or to the mill at which he expected to trade. A mill in the vicinity, within reasonably easy access, was absolutely indispensable to him, and the erection of such a necessity was one of the foremost projects of his mind. The first mill located within the limits of the territory now under discussion was that belonging to a man named Pearson, which was built in 1816, upon the bank of Lackawannock Creek. It comprised both a grist and a saw-mill, and thus served a double purpose. The advantages which this enterprise bestowed induced Dr. Evans, an old physician living in the neighborhood, to build a rival, which he did, locating it further down the same stream. The Evans mill was exclusively a saw mill, and its apparatus consisted of a single upright saw, run by the motor power furnished by a large wooden water-wheel. A fulling and carding mill was established some time later. This is yet in operation, under the management of the Broadbents. A third saw-mill was erected several years later by James McFarland. It has long since become obsolete, as have also its two competitors. The Clay furnace, so famous in the industrial history of the county, is treated of elsewhere.

Villages.—In June, 1808, Joseph Morrison surveyed and laid out a town at the Big Bend, consisting of 245 lots and spacious streets. It was projected on an extensive plan, and was expected to become the seat of justice of the county. This prospective capital and metropolis, which "died a bornin," was christened Shenango. Its complete history will be found in the annals of unrealized expectations.

The chief village of the township is Charleston. This was laid off in the winter of 1838, by Henry Campbell. The first purchaser of the lots, which were sold for $25 each, was Charles Beatty, who was given the honor of naming the new town. He called it "Charleston." The postmasters of the place, which became a post-office in 1858, are given in the list of postmasters in Chapter V. The village sustains one store, kept by David Beil, and a harness-shop by Samuel Hunter, and is at present in a fairly healthy vitality for an inland country town.

Churches.—All Saints' Catholic Church, in Jefferson Township, about three miles from Mercer, to the left of the road leading to Greenville, was organized about 1838. At that time its principal members were John and Ellen Jennings, William Jennings, Richard Jennings, Patrick McCloskey (a pioneer of 1796), William Kane, William McKeever, John Griffin, Patrick Griffin, Thomas Connolly, Daniel O'Connor, John Donahoe and others, some of whom were among the first settlers of the county. The same year a small frame church edifice was erected on land donated by one of the Jennings family. It was used, likewise, for school purposes. James Hanavan, one of the pioneer teachers of the county, and a resident at present of Sharon, taught there as early as 1843. This building, having undergone suitable enlargements and improvements in 1855, answered the purposes of the congregation for thirty years more.

In 1885 the present structure was erected at a cost of $12,000. It is a commodious, ornamental and substantial brick structure, in harmony with the most improved notions of church architecture. It, with the extensive grounds surrounding, constitutes a valuable property. The congregation has grown to be a large and influential one in the community. It has been ministered to by Revs. Hugh Gallagher, John Reed, M. J. Mitchell, C. M. Sheehan, Father Creeden, Arthur McConnell, J. J. Gallagher, Patrick C. McGrath, William Pugh, Peter Brady, John Donnelly and J. H. McAdam, the last being the present pastor. All Saints is the pioneer Catholic congregation of the county, and is in quite a flourishing condition. The present pastor has accomplished a great deal since taking charge.

The Methodist Episcopal Church at Charleston was built in 1850, on land given to the society by Henry Campbell. William Glindwell was the contractor. The society had been organized in 1840, with only eight or ten members, under the leadership of William Miller. He was succeeded by James Murdock, John Henderson, John Pierce, James Anderson, Henry Jennings, John Henderson, Jr., B. Hughes and Jacob Zahniser. A hewed log house of humble pretensions was erected about the time of organization. The congregation is in good condition and has a comfortable house of worship.

The Big Bend Methodist Episcopal Church was erected in the autumn of 1867, Mr. Z. Hancock furnishing the site. The building, a plain one of modest pretensions, 35x50, is the first one, the early preaching having been done at school-houses and private dwellings. Rev. L. L. Lewis was the first preacher after the erection of the present house.

The Free Methodist Church was organized in 1881, at what is known as "Jefferson Hall," by Rev. Jeremiah Barnhart. The pastor of the congregation, numbering twenty-two, is William Rupe, and the trustees of the same are Henry Davis and Cornelius Shaffer.

LACKAWANNOCK TOWNSHIP.

This township, as it was originally known, was formed in 1805. It continued without alteration until 1846, when New Wilmington Township, as it was then called, was detached. In 1848 a petition was received in court asking that another division be made. Accordingly Maj. Thomas Graham and Gen. Thomas S. Cunningham were appointed viewers, with authority to divide the township and determine the boundary. They reported in favor of a division, and fixed the line of separation as the Little Neshannock Creek. This action was confirmed August 17, 1849, and the portion situated on the west side of the line of division has retained the original title.

The origin of the name "Lackawannock" is supposed to be two-fold. The French word, lac, means in English, lake, while the latter part, Wannock is believed to have been the title of an early Indian chief, who settled many years ago beside the bank of the lake situated in the northern part of East Lackawannock Township. Nothing definite has ever been found concerning this chieftain, and were it not for the fact that some theory is required to account for the name, his very existence would doubtless be considered mythical.

The township is rich in mineral and coal deposits. Underlying the surface are rich veins of coal. The soil above is especially fertile, and in places cannot be surpassed by that of any other section of the county. The surface is comparatively well broken, and hills rise up from adjacent valleys, forming marked contrasts. The drainage is not especially good, although amply sufficient. The principal stream is the Little Neshannock, which rises in the township of Jefferson, and flows in an almost direct southern course along the eastern border, whose boundary line it forms. The small branches that shoot out from the parent stream into the farm lands lying along the western bank form the chief network in the drainage system of Lackawannock Township.

Early Settlers.—As usual in nearly all of the localities of the county, the date at which the first settlers arrived is so involved in obscurity that rival claimants have waged contest for recognition as the real pioneer. The priority of each of these was established clearly in his own mind, and is now emphatically believed by his adherents. The two who thus lay claim to this honor in the township under treatment are James Young and Nathaniel Cozad. The best evidence at hand goes to demonstrate conclusively that each of these arrived in the region in the year 1798.

There is a tradition to the effect that even these were not the first settlers. Nearly two years previous a settler, whose name has never been ascertained, arrived from Washington County and began a clearing on what afterward became the Yarion place. Here he remained a short time, planted the first peach-seeds ever sown in the county, became discouraged, abandoned his cabin and left the vicinity. On his journey out from the township, the story relates that he sold the information he possessed about the territory, and also the fact of his settlement, to Cozad for $1. The latter made practical use of this, and was thus enabled to enter the region of his future home with some knowledge of its desirability. The Yarion place is located in the northeastern part of the township, and was surveyed for a man named Isaac Johnston, May 20, 1795, in pursuance of a warrant bearing date of April 21, 1794.

Of the two who arrived in 1798 more is known. They were both natives of New Jersey, and both came to Mercer from Washington County. Cozad, according to reports, was a man of wonderful resources. He possessed an indomitable will and an invincible determination. This, coupled with the fact that his physical strength was fully equal to his industry and energy, made him vastly superior to the average pioneer. An instance of this fact is given. He came to the county in great poverty. As his sole possessions, besides a few household articles of prime necessity, he brought with him nothing but an ax and a grubbing-hoe. With these he undertook to complete a clearing and effect the erection of a suitable home. Not one man in a score would have ventured upon such an arduous task without better preparation. But Cozad was not an ordinary man. He succeeded, after labors which can better be imagined than described, in completing both tasks, and did this, too, with no other assistance. It is related that Young at one time made a covert allusion to his poverty, and said, rather lightly, that he (Cozad) "need not expect to succeed with such utensils as those," pointing to the hoe and ax. But the following spring Young himself was forced to resort to his less wealthy neighbor for seed-grain, his own crops having failed. In common with his fellow-settlers, Cozad experienced much difficulty in getting supplies for his family. In 1799 he left on an overland journey to Pittsburgh, proposing to bring back with him some few necessities of life. Owing to rains and unexpected delays his return was not made within the time he had set for the completion of his trip. His family, who were awaiting him expectantly, soon exhausted the meager store of provisions which they possessed. Without means of replenishing the empty larder, they were in time forced by sheer hunger to dig up a patch of green potatoes, which had not attained a size larger than that of hazel-nuts, and upon which they subsisted. But even these did not hold out. At last, as an extreme resort, the agonized mother, followed by the half-famished children, set off for Young's house, several miles distant, resolving to throw herself upon his charity. While on the way she fainted several times from exhaustion. But fortunately she was enabled to reach her destination safely, and soon recovered.

James Gilkey was among the early settlers of Mercer County. About

1798-99 he settled near Wilmington. He was one of the pioneer surveyors of the county. He was the father of nine children, six of whom are living in Mercer and adjoining counties. It was he who first developed the celebrated Neshannock potato, also called the "Mercer" and the "Gilkey."

Archibald Rankin, a native of Ireland, settled in 1798-99 near Charleston, in Mercer County, where he died a few years after his settlement. His descendants are now residing in various portions of the county.

Matthew Dawson, a native of Washington County, settled in Lackawannock Township early in the present century. He was a soldier of 1812, and held a commission as captain. He was the father of a large family. He died in 1863.

Among the other early settlers might be mentioned the names of two brothers, Robert and James Hawthorne, who settled about the year 1800 on the land afterward owned by John Young. Their first place of abode, according to a story yet related, was the trunk of a hollow tree. David Hunter was also an early pioneer, arriving as early as 1805, at which time he began a clearing on the place afterward owned by his son William. William Gordon entered the township near the same time, and located on the farm afterward in the possession of his descendants. Many others came to the region during the first quarter of the present century, and although they may be fairly termed early settlers, their arrival and subsequent experiences were not sufficiently uncommon as to need further mention.

Two things were very usual sights to the early settlers—Indians and wild game. Both were tolerably abundant. Mercer County can never lay claim to being the theater of many Indian adventures, but she may reasonably feel distinguished on account of the game, especially deer, bear, wild turkey and smaller animals, that abounded in her primitive forests. Among the names of the savages who were prominent in Lackawannock Township may be mentioned Mohawk, Flynn and Kindoshawa.

Greenfield is the most important village in the township. The ground upon which it now stands was cleared in 1820 by Archelash Wilson, prominent in the early political history of the county. He erected a log cabin on his new farm, and thus became the veritable pioneer of the hamlet.

Unity Church of Greenfield. In the spring of 1832 a plat of ground was procured from William Jewell, sufficient for a church, burying ground and out-ground. A petition was prepared by the Presbyterian friends, and presented to the presbytery of Hartford when it convened in session at New Castle, June 26, 1832, by James Marquis. It contained fifty-four names, asking for a church organization. The petition was acted upon the next day, with the following result: "Resolved, that the prayers of the petitioners be granted, and that they be constituted a congregation to be denominated Unity." In the meantime a house of worship had been erected, and occasional services held. On August 27 the congregation assembled for organization. Rev. James Satterfield preached a sermon, and thirty-four persons were enrolled as members of the church, viz.: Joseph Porter, Nancy Coyle, John and Rachel Hawthorn, William and Esther Jewell, Hannah Shaffer, William, Margaret and Robert B. Young, Isabel, Robert, Martha, John and Jane Coyle, James and Mary Marquis, David and Elizabeth Jackson, Nathaniel and Jane Cozad, Margaret Graham, Rebecca Campbell, Isabella Porter, William, Agnes, Samuel and Miss Agnes Gordon, George and Margaret Blackstone, Davis and Mary Pollock and Esther Jewell. William Young, James Marquis and Matthias Zahniser were elected and ordained the first elders.

In the summer of 1837 a new house, 36x50, was erected on land secured from John Wilson, on the road leading from Mercer to West Middlesex, about midway between the two places. During 1838 Samuel Marquis, Francis Scott, David Jackson, Benjamin Vanatta and Robert McClelland were elected and ordained deacons. In June, 1853, the congregation decided to erect a new house, 41x56, on the south side of the road. It was dedicated December 18, 1853, the cost being $1,474.12. Rev. James Satterfield was the first pastor, and remained several years. Rev. Samuel A. McClain was pastor from 1838 to 1841.

LAKE TOWNSHIP.

This township, originally a portion of the old Cool Spring Township, was formed by the division of September 21, 1850, which separated the old organization into the new ones of Lake, Jackson, Fairview and Cool Spring. The alteration was accomplished with a view toward facilitating the collection of taxes, and also to secure more convenient elections. The petition for the formation of the new township was presented in court at April sessions, 1850. David Findley, W. J. Hunter and J. P. Garrett were elected as commissioners. Their work was accomplished so satisfactorily that the report which they presented was confirmed on the date given above, September 21, thus insuring to the inhabitants of the new subdivisions the advantages for which they petitioned.

Lake Township derives its name from the presence of a large body of water, known as Sandy Lake, which lies within its bounds. It is a singular fact that the names of both the parent township and the new one were each suggestive of water—Cool Spring, from whose cool recesses bubbled forth a bounteous supply of the clear, refreshing liquid, and Lake, in whose confines the aggregated volume of the spring's discharge might find a final lodgment.

The surface of this township is very greatly diversified. There is perhaps no part of the county where the ruggedness of the contour is so marked. Hills shoot abruptly up, and give way as abruptly to precipitous valleys. This of course is merely in miniature. But the contrasts are just as sharp as they would be were the hills mountains, and the valleys veritable ravines. There are portions, however, where the surface is comparatively rolling, while others yet manifest the characteristics of small table-lands. The soil is likewise variegated. In places it is barren and sterile, elsewhere there are streaks of rich loam, while in other portions of the township nothing but the ordinary soil is found. Taken all in all, Lake Township cannot be classed among the best agricultural townships in the county. Its wealth consists almost wholly in the rich measures of underlying coal and other deposits, the mining of which comprises by far its most important industry. The richness of these deposits is visibly manifested in the vicinity of Stoneboro, a borough which has sprung up almost like magic on account of the coal interests centered in it. Apart from the coal there are strata of good building stone. In the matter of drainage the township is notably deficient. With the exception of the lake, which acts as a sort of general reservoir for all water-fall in the vicinity of its shores, and an insignificant branch of Mill Creek, which traverses a portion of the south-eastern corner, there is really no system of natural drainage within the borders. This, however, does not act disadvantageously, as will be evidenced by the fact that there is no more marsh land in Lake than in many of its better drained competitors.

Pioneers.—The year 1796 and the fore part of the month of April, witnessed the arrival of the first settler. His name was Matthias Zahniser. He was of German birth, and removed to this country in 1751, locating in Lancaster County, Penn., the county that furnished Mercer County with so many of her earliest settlers. While living here he became acquainted with, and eventually married, Miss Mary Lint, by whom he had thirteen children, eleven boys and two girls. In 1789 he changed his residence from Lancaster to Allegheny County. Becoming favorably impressed with the accounts he had heard concerning the region known now as Mercer County, he resolved to penetrate still further toward the great Northwest, and accordingly started on his long and wearisome journey in search of a new home, accompanied by his wife and children. He arrived in what is now Lake Township at an auspicious time. The ground was covered with beautiful wild flowers, while the forest trees, just peeping forth in their new drapery of green foliage, resounded with the glad carolings of birds. On every hand the evidences of a renewed life inspired the most sanguine expectations. Reaching the spot which many years afterward became the farm of James Zahniser, he determined to locate. This he did, and began at once active preparations toward securing for himself and family a comfortable abode. It is related that on this journey the new-comers, packing their goods and making difficult way through the almost unknown wilderness, were met by Thomas McMillan at a place called Indian Springs. The party at once placed themselves under his guidance, and, by the aid of a small pocket compass which he carried, were enabled to reach their destination in safety. Had it not been for this timely assistance, they would in all probability have encountered more trouble than they did, owing to their unfamiliarity with the country through which they were traveling.

There were a number of settlers scattered throughout the territory into which the Zahnisers penetrated. But the winter of 1796 was an unusually severe one. Heavy snows fell, and an unprecedented frost early in the fall warned the inhabitants that their position in the new country was an exceedingly perilous one. Accordingly nearly everybody made preparations to leave, and at length did depart back to the more populous counties south of them. So far as is known but two families remained during that winter in what afterward became Cool Spring Township. These were the families of Benjamin Stokely and Matthias Zahniser. Strictly speaking, however, the latter's household did not remain intact. All but three returned to their former home. But these three, consisting of the father and his two sons, Michael and John, resolved to brave the winter's storms and cold. They had with them five head of cattle. These suffered terribly from hunger and cold, but by the strenuous efforts of their owners were kept alive. The food which was available for the cattle's consumption consisted of the leaves and tender branches of underbrush and small trees, which were uncovered from the snow. The men had succeeded during the summer in raising some potatoes, pumpkins and turnips. They had not, however, had opportunity to remove these from the ground before the advent of cold weather, and, as a result, their food comprised frozen potatoes and pumpkin mush. Even this scanty store was rendered unfit for use before the season was over, for a big thaw occurred, which softened the vegetables, after which they again froze solid, thus making them totally valueless for human diet. But by incredible suffering and perseverance the winter was endured. The return of spring brought back the remaining members of the family. Clearings were continued, a better house was erected, and preparations for a continuous sojourn made. By the coming of the second winter the pioneers were in such a situation that they could view its approach with much less apprehension. Their second year was passed under much more favorable circumstances. It was not long until their condition became comparatively comfortable.

During the spring of 1797 another pioneer arrived. This was Francis Drane, who settled upon what is latterly known as the Love farm, his tract consisting of 150 acres. Here he began a clearing, and in time succeeded in erecting a cabin. It is said that in the same year of his arrival he sowed an acre with wheat, claimed to have been the first wheat sown in the township.

The same year witnessed the coming of Daniel Harper, an old veteran of the Revolution. He located upon the tract of land many years subsequently known as the Williamson place. He was, it is related, a very peculiar man in many respects, being in particular a devout Baptist. The subject of religion was to him one of deep, immediate interest. Harper's house, which in later years was used as a sort of improvised tavern, was known far and wide as the Baptist headquarters, from the frequency with which the ministers of that denomination assembled in it. It appears, however, that even the devoutness of Harper did not operate to render him tenacious of his theological views, for he afterward became as firm a Presbyterian as he had been a Baptist. But even the subtleties of Calvinism did not suffice to chain his faith, for his last years were spent in the folds of the Methodist Church.

Robert McClure, a native of Ireland, came to Mercer County in 1797 or '98, locating on a tract of land in what is now Lake Township, where he resided until his death. He was a soldier in the War of 1812. His descendants are still occupying the old homestead.

In 1800 arrived William McCauley, who settled near the present site of Stoneboro, and Andrew McClure, from Washington County, Penn., and a brother of Robert. He took up 150 acres of land near what is now known as Coulson Station, and began clearing off the timber. Both he and Robert became prominent in the local affairs of the township. Among other early settlers might be mentioned Robert Hamilton, who settled on land afterward owned by V. B. Coulson in 1802; John and James Rice, two brothers, whose land was located not far from Hamilton's, and who arrived in the township about the year 1803, and Richard McClure, who settled on another part of Coulson's farm in 1814. There may have been others of considerable prominence—doubtless there were; but the insufficiency of preserved records renders any treatment of them impossible. One thing is especially noticeable in Lake Township's history—it is so blended with that of the parent organization, Cool Spring, that nearly every attempt to separate the two is met with confusion.

The early accounts of game are very numerous. From these it appears that many varieties existed in the region in great profusion. Deer and wild turkey are known to have been abundant. An occasional bear was seen in early days, and also upon one or two occasions a panther. Smaller animals, however, such as squirrels, foxes, raccoons, etc., were quite numerous. Nearly every pioneer was an ardent disciple of Nimrod, and indeed in more ways than one imitated that mighty hunter.

There was, so far as is known, but one mill within the bounds of Lake Township. That was a saw-mill erected in 1815 by Richard McClure. The machinery consisted, as nearly all of the primitive mills did, of a single upright saw, the motor power for which was supplied by a large water wheel. It was located on the bank of the Little Run, a short distance below Coulson Station.

Churches.—A Methodist Episcopal Church was built in 1868, a short distance west of Coulson Station, on the Western, New York & Pennsylvania Railroad. The structure erected for the accommodation of these zealous followers of John Wesley is a neat one. Rev. Milton was their first pastor. Since then the congregation has been under the care of the different preachers which the itinerant system of Methodism provides for its membership.

The Bethany congregation of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church was organized April 1, 1876, in Lake Township, by Rev. J. M. Gallagher, with seventy members. The present membership is about 140. The house of worship used is a frame structure that was erected in 1859 at a cost of $1,000. The first session consisted of John Kemm, David Zahniser, Daniel McClure, William McKay and F. M. Fleming. Since that time Thomas Kemm, John Zahniser and James S. Palmer have been chosen. The congregation is out of debt, and therefore enjoying peace and prosperity. It has regular preaching by its first and only pastor.

LIBERTY TOWNSHIP.

This township, forming the extreme southeastern corner of the county, was carved out of Wolf Creek, February 17, 1851. The surface of Liberty is considerably varied, at places being level, elsewhere rolling, and again broken. The scenery is particularly pleasing and picturesque. The township is not especially rich in mineral wealth, but is rather an agricultural center. The soil is fertile, and well adapted to the purposes of farming. Coal, however, is mined in several places, and is of a very fair quality, the chief impediment to the development of a large mining industry being the fact that the coal strata are somewhat thin. Gas is also found, the first gas and oil well in the county having been put down on the farm of James George. In the matter of drainage Liberty Township excels. The ample means supplied by Wolf Creek and its numerous small tributaries have long since rendered the drainage advantages of the township famous. In fact, in almost every respect, the territory lying in this corner of the county compares favorably with any other portion.

Pioneers.—Probably the first settler of what is now Liberty Township, though this is not an established fact, was William Gill. The date of his coming is set by some at the year 1797 and by others at 1798. He was an old Revolutionary veteran, and had suffered on many a battle-field in his devotion to the cause of liberty. It is related that upon one occasion he received a wound while in an engagement. This wound was so severe that he was unable to join his companions in their retreat, and was reluctantly abandoned by them to the British. Suffering as he did from the effects of his disability, he resolved at all hazards to avoid capture. The enemy's dragoons were scouring the forest in which he lay in every direction. He could hear their movements as they passed by. What should he do? He revolved the question in his mind for a long time, and was about to give up, when he accidentally espied a hollow log lying some distance off. He crawled slowly to it, every action causing sharp pain, and by an almost superhuman exertion succeeded in concealing himself within it. Scarcely had he done this when a scarleted trooper dashed forward and began a search for the "rebel." He had seen the latter moving. The feelings of Gill may be imagined as he breathlessly listened to the efforts of his enemy to discover his hiding place. The Briton carefully went over every spot of ground in the vicinity, passing and repassing the log where the object of his search anxiously lay. So near did he come that Gill afterward said that he could have touched the hem of the former's coat. At length he gave up in despair, and rode away. Gill lay within the log twenty-four hours, not daring to venture forth. At the expiration of that time he came out, and in time, by dint of great exertions, rejoined his company in safety.

Gill came to Liberty Township from Allegheny County. He settled upon the farm which was subsequently occupied by David Dale, near Courtney's mill. Here he began a clearing and erected a small cabin. By continued effort he at length succeeded in getting quite a respectable farm in condition for cultivation. An old resident relates that at an early day Gill possessed a yoke of stubborn oxen. One of these was in the habit of lying down in the furrow while plowing. To prevent this Gill adopted the plan of throwing a blanket over its head, thus smothering the animal until it was willing to arise in order to get fresh air. The sons of Mr. Gill one day took the yoke and started to plow. The refractory ox, as usual, threw itself down upon the ground. The boys endeavored to smother it into obedience, but were unable to do this. They, however, ran to a burning brush pile, secured two or three burning sticks, and with the flaming points of these speedily roused their obstinate beast, which thereafter gave them no further trouble.

In the Western Press of April 20, 1833, occurs the following: "Mr. Gill, of Wolf Creek Township, this county, a Revolutionary pensioner, dropped dead from his feet on Wednesday morning last [17th]. The house of Mr. Gill is a brick one, with a brick kitchen attached to it. While waking the corpse of Mr. Gill on the following night, a violent storm arose, which lifted the roof off the large house and threw it onto the kitchen, which gave way to the immense weight, thereby instantly killing four ladies, and wounding two or three others, who were unfortunately in that part of the dwelling at the time. Three of the ladies were daughters of Mr. Gill."

Elsewhere in the same issue is the following additional explanation: "The account above given of five persons killed is incorrect. The attending physician, Dr. Beckwith, furnishes the following: 'According to the custom of the West, a large number of persons had assembled to wake the dead, and were occupying various apartments in the house, while an adjoining kitchen was occupied by eight females and two males, at the time of the approach of a tremendous tornado, which broke in one end of the large house (which was made of brick), and passing through the upper story, carried away the roof and threw down the other end of the wall upon the kitchen, which was crushed to its basis, burying its inmates in the ruins, four of whom were crushed to death without a groan, viz.: Miss Jane Gill, daughter of the deceased, aged about forty-eight; Miss Eliza Jane Branden, aged sixteen, and Miss Lavina Ritchey, aged six, granddaughter of the deceased, and Miss Rebecca McElree, aged about twenty-eight. On these bodies were broken skulls, broken necks, and broken limbs, together with many shocking contusions. Among the wounded were Samuel Gill (son of the deceased) and his daughter, a daughter of Saml. Hugh Gill, Miss Margaret Anderson and Miss Nancy Tannehill, all of whom were injured to a considerable extent; but Samuel H. Gill and Miss Tannehill received the most serious injury.'

The year 1797 brought four additional settlers, in the persons of four brothers, Abraham, Simon, John and Michael Uber, who arrived from Westmoreland County, and located in the western portion of what is now Liberty Township. Here they made clearings, planted crops, and after a time set out orchards, of which some trees were standing as late as a few years ago. John built the saw-mill, in 1800, by which the lumber used in the construction of the old court-house at Mercer was sawed.

In 1798 William Dale, a native of Eastern Pennsylvania, arrived in the township. He was a blacksmith, and signalized his advent by securing a tract of land numbering two acres, which he cleared and upon which he erected a small shop. Here he did a general smithing business, and was, in all probability, the first blacksmith in the county. It is not at all likely that he did anything at his trade, though, for several years afterward. Among the other new-comers in the year mentioned above were William Craig, who settled upon the farm afterward known as the William Jack place; and Hugh Foster, an Irishman, who came to this country and located in Franklin County at an early day, removed from that locality to Westmoreland County, and at length, in 1798, to Liberty Township, where he settled on a farm situated just a short distance below the site of the present post-office in North Liberty, which afterward was occupied by Mrs. Robert Foster. He brought with him a wife and five children, two additional daughters being born after his arrival.

David Courtney and his brother Thomas, both of whom afterward became prominently identified with the business and political interests of the old Wolf Creek Township, were among the arrivals of 1802. The present Courtney mill, which they erected, is located on the original tract which they secured immediately upon their entrance into the county. The tract consisted of 600 acres of perhaps the finest land in the region, situated in a beautiful stretch of country, on the bank of Wolf Creek, whose water furnished the motor-power for the mill. David was the builder of this mill, which was erected in 1803. He had been a miller at his old home in Franklin County, and, upon viewing the superb facilities afforded by the swift-flowing stream, he became imbued with a desire to resume his former occupation. The mill was, like most of its fellows at that early day, a combination affair, uniting in one establishment the advantages of a saw and a grist-mill.

Of those who came into the township in a few years afterward, the most prominent were James George, John McKee and Daniel Stewart. Of these the former was a native of Ireland, who immigrated to America in 1796, and settled a short distance east of Pittsburgh, on a small stream called Turtle Creek, where he labored in a saw-mill, helping in the preparation of the timbers used in the construction of Allegheny County's first court-house. He saved a small amount of money by economy and frugality, and began to look about for a suitable investment. He was offered land on the present site of the city of Allegheny for the remarkable price of $8 an acre. This offer he refused, and determined to try his fortunes up in the northwestern county of Mercer. Accordingly, in 1804, he arrived in what is now Liberty Township, purchased the farm on which his son Hugh lived for so many years afterward, and began his career as a farmer. The warrant for the survey of this farm was dated April 8, 1805, while the deed bore date of July 15, 1807. It appears that the land had been originally settled by a squatter named Studebaker, but little is known concerning him.

Mr. George began the erection of a cabin when he first came, and soon afterward set out an orchard. The first dwelling was of round logs. By a process of evolution this gave way to a structure of hewed timber, and this, in turn, to the brick house now standing, which was constructed in 1828 out of 70,000 brick, made the year before by Alexander Blair. The neighbors were James McKee and Hugh Foster. An embryo village named Georgetown was pushed into life on a portion of George's farm, but, as it was located near an unhealthy swamp, the enterprise was abandoned. Mr. George was a very prominent man in local affairs. He was one of the early county commissioners, and was identified with every public movement. Being of a charitable disposition, his name will be remembered by many whom his bounty and liberality aided.

Of the remaining two, John McKee arrived in 1805, purchased 415 acres of land and located near the George farm. His father and three brothers, James, Hugh and George, came to the township with him. They were all more or less prominent. Daniel Stewart entered in the same year and settled a short distance south of the present village of North Liberty. Among other pioneers who came to Liberty during the first two decades of the present century, and who therefore deserve some sort of mention, are Jacob Snyder, who came from Westmoreland County in 1805, and three men named McMillan, Miller and Christy. There were, of course, many others, whose names, if not recorded on the printed page, will at least be perpetuated by works on the face of the country they helped to clear and develop.

Villages.—The principal village in the township is that of North Liberty. This was laid out in 1821–22 by James Foster. The building of the Mercer and Butler turnpike through the region, thus opening up a way for better communication between the settlers and the communities round about, was chiefly responsible for the establishing of the new town. The first house erected was put up by Robert Waddell. It is still standing, and is at present used for a post-office. Jacob Snyder, mentioned elsewhere, began the first blacksmith shop.

James Stewart, the first innkeeper, built his tavern in 1823. It was a nice little hostelry, and was visited by many guests.

The post-office, under the direction of the first postmaster, Robert Shaw, was established in 1840. The succeeding postmasters are given elsewhere.

The original school-house, erected in 1828, a plain, log structure, was superseded in 1840 by a frame building, octagonal, in shape. This in turn gave way in 1869 to the present two-story brick building, which amply accommodates the forty or fifty pupils in attendance at the temple of learning.

Amsterdam, the other hamlet of Liberty Township, is situated in the western part. A blacksmith shop was opened by Charles Wingard in 1874, and several houses cluster about it. The population has never, owing to the difficulty attending the taking of a correct and accurate census, been computed, but it is variously estimated at from ten to twenty-five.

North Liberty Presbyterian Church was organized June 1, 1880, by Dr. Robert Walker and Rev. Samuel Williams, with a membership of seventy-one. The first elders chosen by the congregation were Levi Dale, A. S. Barber and John Boyles. The present church building, a commodious and conveniently arranged frame structure, was erected in the summer of the same year at a cost of $3,500. It admirably serves the purpose for which it was intended. The only pastor the church has ever had is its present efficient minister, Rev. J. H. Wright. Under his charge the congregation has been blessed with a fair measure of temporal and spiritual prosperity, and has grown in membership until it numbers at present fifty within its folds. The present elders of the congregation consist of Levi Dale, A. S. Barber, John Boyles, Andrew Breckenridge and James Thorp.

MILL CREEK TOWNSHIP.

In May, 1849, a petition was entered for the formation of a new township out of the original one of French Creek, and presented in court the same month. A board of commissioners, consisting of John Moore, Abraham Pugh and John Findley, was appointed to view, fix boundaries and report upon the advisability of erecting the desired organization. A favorable report being rendered June 28, 1849, the division outlined therein was confirmed November 19, of the same year. The name Mill Creek was given the new township, from the name of the stream which flows in beautiful course across its territory. The shape of the township is nearly rectangular. Its area is a little less than eighteen square miles.

The surface in the southern part is undulating, and presents in the summer a beautiful picture. The land rises and falls in almost imperceptible terraces, which, when covered with green sod, resembles cultivated parks. In the northern part, however, a change is noticed, where abrupt bluffs and hills abound. Good building stone is found in the strata of the hillsides.

Agriculturally speaking the township is not a marked success. Portions of it have good soil, and rather fairly improved. But the greater part is not well adapted to the general uses of farming, although by no means unproductive. Abundant drainage is supplied by Mill Creek and the tributaries of the Big Sandy Creek. No surplus rain-fall is permitted to stand very long stagnant.

Pioneers.—The history of the early settlement of the township under discussion is very much shrouded in mystery. The parent organization, French Creek, was the real center of attraction, and but few settlements were made in the southern part, which afterward became Mill Creek. The first settler, though, is believed, in accordance with the best testimony, to have been Jacob Reed, a German, who in the autumn of 1796, attracted by the accounts he had heard of the fertility of the soil lying over in the great northwestern part of the commonwealth, left his home in Westmoreland County and prepared to establish a new one farther from the confines of population centers. He arrived at what is now Mill Creek Township, and finding a portion of land not under claim of land speculators, located upon it in conformity to the act of April 3, 1792, by which such unclaimed land was thrown open to settlement, and began the erection of a suitable cabin. After completing the construction of this, and effecting a small clearing, he returned to pass the winter in Westmoreland County. When he returned in the following spring he was accompanied by his two brothers, William and George, and a negro named Robert Morgan. The latter settled upon land near the site of the present borough of New Lebanon, while the brothers secured tracts lying just east of Jacob's place. During the summer Jacob was joined by his family, and thus became the first householder in the township. A few years ago there was an old beech tree standing opposite the house of his grandson, Charles, upon the bark of which, hacked deep into the fibers of the tough wood, were carved the initials "J. R., 1796." The growth of the tree had elevated these nearly ten feet above the ground.

About the only other settler of whom much is known was Adam Carnahan. This man's life reads like a record of misfortunes. It appears that some adverse destiny was his, and that a fatality shaped all his ends. He took possession of a tract in what was afterward Sandy Lake Township in the summer of 1797, having entered the region from Westmoreland County in the faint hope of bettering his condition in life. Upon this tract he built a humble cabin, made some needed improvements, and had just begun the work of clearing for himself a farm, with fair prospects ahead, when a stranger suddenly appeared upon the scene of action, and politely insisted that he (Carnahan) was an intruder upon another's property, and intimated that if he would take the trouble to accompany the said stranger to the other side of the tract in question he (Carnahan) would be abundantly satisfied of the correctness of his (the stranger's) assertions. Upon expressing his willingness to witness any such indubitable evidence, the stranger led off and Carnahan followed. After a short walk they arrived at a pile of upright poles, arranged in some sort of order, which the former declared was the remains of a cabin which he had himself erected the year previous. Now Carnahan, according to all accounts, was a mild mannered man, averse to creating disturbances, so, rather than raise any question of the stranger's veracity, he merely picked up his things and got out. This was misfortune number one. From his recent home he removed to a farm near Milledgeville, where he erected a second cabin, began the cultivation of crops, and, in short, undertook to retrieve his fallen fortunes. But for some unexplained reason he found it necessary to return to Westmoreland County. Being a confiding man, too, as well as mild mannered, he induced a neighboring family to occupy his cabin during his absence, hoping thereby to prevent any intrusion upon his rights. Here, though, was misfortune number two. For when he returned, after a few months' stay, the family to whom he had intrusted the keeping of his claim refused to yield possession, and, as they had nine points of law, Carnahan was again shut out into the cold, cold world. Stung by these repeated persecutions, and embittered by the reflection that he was nothing but a mere atom of destiny, he wandered off to Mill Creek Township, where in the year 1800 he at length found rest, and located upon a tract of land subsequently occupied by Thomas Burrows.

William R. Cooper, a native of Westmoreland County, came with his wife Mary to Mercer County, and located in what is now Mill Creek Township, in 1800. His family consisted of six children, all of whom have paid the death penalty. He himself died in 1809. Some of his descendants are still living in the county.

Among the other settlers who came in afterward was Francis Dunn, who began a clearing in 1816 upon the place where he lived many years. At the time he entered there were three miles of continuous woodland between the farm on which he settled and the place which afterward became the site of New Lebanon. At that time, when French Creek included both townships, there were but twenty-five votes cast in the entire division. Others followed Dunn in the years that marked the gradual development of that portion of the county. But their entrance was so comparatively recent that they will not be mentioned here.

Of the early industries of the township that of milling was by far the most lucrative and the most important. It was, moreover, absolutely necessary to the community's success, as the locality which had not a mill within easy access, no matter how flattering might be the other inducements held out, would not attract many new-comers. The first grist-mill in the region under treatment was one erected on the property of Samuel Glenn in the year 1816. It was at the time the sole enterprise of the kind within many miles about, and its patronage, therefore, was considerable. A second one was erected some years later at the little village called Kerrtown. Glenn also established the first saw-mill in the township. Two or three others were afterward built, the latest and best being the steam mill erected in October, 1874, near New Lebanon, by Caleb Thompson, which, with its improved machinery and large patronage, was an important addition to the township's industrial wealth. The first tannery was built in 1811 by James McCracken, and was conducted for a number of years, until its further continuance was rendered unprofitable, after which it was abandoned. One or two distilleries were also in operation at an early day, the first one being that belonging to Jacob Reed, which was built as early as 1800. It seems that the demand for whisky antedated even that for flour, as the distillery preceded the grist-mill several years.

The only village in the township, outside of the borough of New Lebanon, is that of Kerrtown, which was named in honor of Judge Kerr many years ago. The town has for a number of years been progressing backward. A few houses now mark its site.

A list of early township officers, given elsewhere, will be interesting, doubtless, to those who desire to understand who the men of early political and public notoriety were. A list of post-offices, which is also given elsewhere, will include the names of the postmasters who have at various times distributed the mail of the residents of the township.

NEW VERNON TOWNSHIP.

New Vernon Township was originally a part of Sandy Creek. But the latter was so large and unwieldy that great trouble was had in collecting taxes over such an extensive area, and also in establishing voting places at points accessible to persons living in all portions of the township. These difficulties, it was thought, would be greatly lessened by a separation from the parent organization and the formation of a new and smaller one. Accordingly on the 18th of December, 1850, a number of petitions were handed in to the Court praying for the appointment of a board of commissioners to view the territory in question, lay out boundaries for the establishment of three new townships, and report upon the general practicability of the scheme. In accordance with these prayers, the Court appointed Joseph Kerr, Francis Beatty and James A. Leech. The latter looked over the ground, decided that a division of the old township into four equal parts would be expedient, and reported accordingly, April 7, 1851. This report was confirmed June 23, and the four new townships were named, respectively, Deer Creek, New Vernon, Mineral (now Perry), and the fourth retaining the original title, Sandy Creek. Of these four New Vernon was the southeastern division. Its surface is well diversified. The portion adjacent to Big Sandy Creek is rather level, while in the southeastern part of the township many sharply-marked hills spring up, forming a bluff looking outline. The principal interest in the region is agriculture. The soil is fertile, and good crops are raised from it. The township is one of the best drained in the county. The Little Shenango and the Big Sandy both flow through it, and with their tributaries form a network of sluiceways which carry off all the surplus water. Indeed, considered from an agricultural point of view, New Vernon may fairly take front rank. The history of the settlement of this township is so intimately interwoven with the narrative of the parent organization, Sandy Creek, that the reader is referred to the pages devoted to that. The early settlers were later in arriving in the southeastern part of the old division than in some other portions of the county. But their arrival, even if late, was fraught with beneficent results, both to themselves and to those who came after them.

The Ten Milers.—This was the name of a colony which originally came from New Jersey and settled in Washington County, Penn., some time during the latter half of the last century, on what was known as Ten Mile Run. These people sold out in Washington County in 1797 or 1798, and removed to Mercer County, settling on the Big Sandy, not far from the present village of New Vernon. The name "Ten Milers," given to this settlement, was derived from the place left in Washington County. In the list of "Ten Milers" were Daniel Axtell, David Condit, Cyrus Riggs, John Holloway, Isaac Holloway, Ithiel Dodd, Stephen Riggs, Price Dilley and Ira Condit, the preacher. Lincoln Axtell, son of Daniel, built the first grist-mill in the neighborhood. These men were afterward elders in the Fairview Presbyterian Church at New Vernon.

Mills.—In glancing at the industrial interests of New Vernon Township, one is impressed with the fact that they are few in number and unimportant in extent. Not unimportant, either, for nothing can be wholly unimportant which is so intimately associated with the development of any community from primitive wilderness to modern improvements. Yet, compared with some of her sister townships, there is an evident discrepancy on the side of the one at present under consideration. The most prominent, and the only one that will be treated, was the saw-mill business. This, of course, in later years, as forests are depleted and torn down, has diminished. But a few years ago it comprised the most striking source of the township's wealth. The first steam mill was built in 1854, near the village of New Vernon, by George Axtell. It did a flourishing business. In 1868 a second one was erected in the southwestern part of the township by the firm of McClure & Boyd. In 1870 the third was located at a place about two miles south of New Vernon village. Gill's saw-mill and shingle-factory was built in 1868, by L. J. Gill. It, like the other enterprises named, did a rushing business for a number of years. All contributed largely to the increase of New Vernon's industrial resources.

New Vernon Village is the only one in the township. It was at one time called Middleton, but afterward New Vernon. It is quite an old town, and looks much older than it really is. The houses, which are in nearly every instance unpainted frames, appear to have been erected years ago. The village sustains two stores, kept by David McElwain and J. N. McCutcheon, and a blacksmith shop, operated by T. J. Osborn. There is a lodge of the K. and L. of H., in a flourishing condition.

At the first election held after the division of the old township of Sandy Creek the following officers were chosen: Justices of the peace, Archibald Montgomery and David Lynn; constable, Henry Hosack; judge of election, Huston Borland; inspector, John Tuttle; assessor, David Holloway; auditors, Daniel Holloway, R. Forbes and David Bliss; school directors, Lawrence Streight, David Lynn, David Condit, Henry Boyd, Hugh Lackey and Samuel Axtell; supervisors, Joseph Boyd, James Hosack and John Tuttle; clerk, Elk Holloway, and overseers, Hugh Henry and Ithamar Tuttle.

Churches.—Fairfield Presbyterian Church was organized near what is now the village of New Vernon, in September, 1799, and is, therefore, the oldest congregation of the denomination in Mercer County. Elisha McCurdy and Joseph Stockton superintended the organizing of the congregation. Daniel Axtell, David Condit and Ithiel Dodd, all "Ten-Milers," were the first elders. They came from Washington County, and brought their religious convictions with them. Rev. William Wylie was the first pastor, from 1802 to 1804. He also preached for Upper Sandy congregation. He was succeeded by Rev. Cyrus Riggs in October, 1807, the pastorate continuing until April, 1812. Rev. Ira Condit began at the last date, and continued as pastor until October, 1836. The next pastor was Rev. David Waggoner, remaining from July, 1838, to May, 1853, at which latter date Rev. J. M. Shields began his labors, and continued them until 1864. Rev. John Rice succeeded as a stated supply. Such is the early history of the pioneer Presbyterian congregation in the county. The present church edifice is seventy-one feet long, and proportionately wide. Near it is a grave-yard, which has received the bodies of many of the pioneers, as its marble slabs will plainly show.

The Methodist Episcopal Church was organized at an early day, probably prior to 1840, in the southern part of New Vernon Township. A great revival occurred in a school-house in the neighborhood in 1843, resulting in securing twenty-three members to the congregation. In 1849, at the suggestion of Rev. Robert Beatty, a meeting-house was erected, he assisting in the work. The first members of this congregation embraced James Boyd and wife, Thomas Boyd and wife, George Forbes and wife, Joseph Boyd, George Burrows and wife, and Mary Forbes. James Boyd was the first class-leader. The congregation has measurably declined, but the house is still used for funeral and other occasions.

Mount Hope Methodist Episcopal Church is at New Vernon. It is the product of a revival held in 1851 near New Lebanon. Many of the converts were from the region of New Vernon. In 1852 they organized the Mount Hope Church at the residence of George Marsteller. Revs. Elisha Wheeler and John Abbott were the preachers to conduct the movements. Elisha Moore was selected as the first leader. In 1854 a house of worship was erected on land deeded for the purpose by Joseph and Daniel Holloway. Robert Beatty was contractor. This congregation, starting with twenty members, has had a regular and healthful growth.

The United Presbyterian Church was organized in 1858, Rev James Burrows being first pastor. An effort was made in 1858 to erect a house of worship, but before the house was completed it was destroyed by the fire-fiend. A second effort in 1862 was more successful, the house being built on the first foundation, and completed in 1865, during the labors of Rev. J. A. Bailey, now of Sharon. The house is a comfortable one, being one of the best in the township.

OTTER CREEK TOWNSHIP.

A petition praying for the division of the old township of Salem, so as to facilitate the collection of taxes and render voting easier, was presented in court November 6, 1857. On the 18th this petition was granted, and James Williamson and Thomas Leech, Jr., were appointed as commissioners to view the said township and lay out boundaries for a separation. But about this time there appeared to be considerable opposition to the proposed change. The Court therefore directed that an election should be held to determine the will of the inhabitants. The question was upon the formation of the new township in accordance with the specifications set forth by the board of commissioners in their report. The majority voted for the division, and, accordingly, April 21, 1858, the Court confirmed the report and directed that the part south of the Little Shenango, which was fixed as the line of separation, should be known as the township of Otter Creek.

The surface of Otter Creek is generally rolling, but comparatively unbroken. Coal is found beneath the surface, and in places strata of building stone also. Agriculturally the township is one of the foremost in the county. Its soil is especially rich and fertile. Otter Creek heads in the southern portion, and a small branch leads into Little Shenango at the north. But outside of these diminutive streams little drainage is afforded. But this is evidently no inconvenience, as the farm lands seem never to be under a surplus of rain-fall.

Pioneers.—In treating of the early settlement of the township, one is constantly under surprise at the lateness of the arrival of pioneers. The territory lying farther to the northeast, and also to the southeast, seems to have attracted immigrants much earlier. But why this should have been is a mystery. The soil in the fertile regions, lying along the banks of Little Shenango, was evidently better than that lying in the other regions named. One explanation of this is, that in all probability the majority of the early comers followed the course of the Allegheny and French Creek in their entrance from the regions along the Ohio, and thus escaped noticing the land lying further west. It is certain that many came up by water, while many others came on horseback, but kept close to the river's bank. However that may be, it is admitted that the first settler of the township was James Williamson. He was a Revolutionary veteran, whose patriotism and love of liberty was such that it is said of him, that at the time of his entering the army to accept the commission of lieutenant he had just married a beautiful young lady, whom he was forced to leave, and from whom he was separated, by the cruel exigencies of the war, for over a year. He entered the Shenango Valley in 1797, located upon the farm owned a long time afterward by Josiah Kitch, and erected a small cabin. After thus establishing his right to the land, he returned to his family and remained three years. In 1800 he came a second time to his new possession, began a clearing, and was so successful that he was enabled, the same year, to harvest the first crop of wheat ever raised in the township. In the following year he concluded that the hardships of a pioneer life were sufficiently ameliorated to render his permanent residence possible, and he therefore brought his family out and located upon the farm, which he occupied until death. Williamson was without neighbors for a long time. He was eventually joined in his labors of clearing the forest by Thomas Jolly, who located upon the land known as the McKean farm. Robert McKean himself occupied the tract Jolly had cleared, and continued to do this from 1815 through many following years. Much of the land lying in the township was embraced in the donation tracts, and in only a few instances did the holders of the patents for these tracts make actual settlement. Their claims they considered as being very trifling, and frequently disposed of them at what would now be considered ridiculously small prices. Often, when settlements were attempted, the patentee would find some one already in possession of his land, holding it by a sort of squatter title, and the trouble and expense of conducting the litigation necessary to secure a dislodgement were, in many instances, deemed more than commensurate with the value of the land in question. For this reason, a confusion of titles arose, and vexatious complications rendered the occupancy of land in the region a matter of more caution than profit. The tract afterward owned by David Trime was granted by the commonwealth to one George Henry, a private in the Revolutionary army, being designated a "donation." Henry never settled, but threw his title away, and for a number of years no one knew who the owner was. In 1801 Frederick Horn determined to secure the land. After a long search he discovered the legal owner and made a purchase of his claim. On the 24th of December Horn settled and erected a cabin. He at once set about clearing off the timber, and in the course of a few years he found himself in the possession of a valuable property.

A great lapse of time occurs between the date of Horn's settlement and the date of the next recorded entrance. On November 6, 1832, George Needham located upon the tract afterward secured by Daniel Hance, and began the task of improving it. The tract, like Horn's, had formerly been a "donation lot," and had been originally granted by the commonwealth to private Joseph Palmer, who had never occupied it, but had merely sold it for a "song." Needham, however, succeeded in making it a very desirable possession. Jacob Snyder and his son, Joseph, settled on the farm afterward occupied by them in 1843. There were at the time of their entrance comparatively few pioneers in the region. Jacob Layman had entered in 1824, and taken up a claim near the Perry Township line. Andress Loveland came from Erie County, Penn., in the spring of 1828, and settled on a tract of 100 acres in Otter Creek Township, where he lived to the ripe age of ninety-four years. One or two others were also in the possession of land in various parts of the township. The largest land-owner in the township was Andrew Bush, an Ohioan, who came to the region from Jackson Township, Trumbull Co., Ohio, in 1845. He purchased nearly all of the large valley lying southeast of Pleasantville. The farm which he thus secured was an exceedingly valuable one, and would now be considered a veritable fortune. But titles were so easily purchased in those days that his expenditure in securing it was very small. There were other settlers whose names might be mentioned. Indeed, the period of settlement may be almost said to have extended down from 1800 to 1845, inasmuch as at the latter date there was considerable uncleared land lying in the township. But it is thought that the names given include nearly all of the distinctively first pioneers.

There have been mills erected several times during the development of the township's industrial resources. One, a saw-mill, located in the southern part of the township, was built about the year 1831 by two brothers named Carr. The motor power was supplied by water, which was secured by the erection of a large dam. Near this dam a young man named Reuben Wasser was drowned, in 1845, while in bathing. The mill has been abandoned for a long period of years. In 1845, in the northwestern corner of the township, on the bank of the Little Shenango, John Young and Adam Thompson built the first grist-mill ever operated in the township. The method of grinding was the one then in common use. It was by means of a pair of rough stones, turned by water-power. Nevertheless, notwithstanding the rude equipments, the mill enjoyed a considerable patronage, and was conducted for a number of years without cessation.

On another page will be given a list of the early township officials of Salem Township. By reference to it the reader will ascertain the names of some of the early political dignitaries, and also those who were esteemed by their fellow citizens worthy of public trust.

PERRY TOWNSHIP.

Perry Township was originally a portion of old Sandy Creek. On the 18th of December, 1850, owing to the fact that great inconvenience had been encountered in collecting taxes over so large a territory, and in securing an easily accessible place of voting, a large number of petitions were presented in court praying that the township be subdivided into four parts, each part to be a separate township. Joseph Kerr, James A. Leech and Francis Beatty were accordingly appointed commissioners to ascertain the practicability of the sought for alteration, and to lay out a system of boundaries. They reported favorably to the division April 7, 1851, accompanying their report with the present boundaries as the result of their labors. This report was confirmed on the 23d of June, and the new townships of Deer Creek, New Vernon and Mineral were thus ushered into existence, the fourth part still retaining the original name of Sandy Creek. The name "Mineral" was given to the southwestern portion on account of the rich deposits of bog-iron ore and coal found beneath its surface. At a subsequent time it was decided to change this title and adopt the present one of "Perry," in honor of the gallant commodore who so resolutely fought the British fleet on Lake Erie, and achieved the signal triumph which has since been known as "Perry's Victory."

At the first election held the following officers were chosen: Justices of the peace, Allen Morrison, Joseph Milner; auditors, Caleb Ball, A. McCleary and J. B. Donaldson; assessor, William Zahniser; school directors, T. M. Levitt, J. H. Robinson, S. B. Foster, Henry Fulton, William Zahniser and Alex. McCleary; treasurer, John Kelso; supervisors, John McClure and Philip Mann; clerk, Henry Fulton, and overseers, J. Feather and J. Limber.

The surface of the new township, as might be expected in an iron ore district, is diversified. At places one would suppose it to be perfectly level, while elsewhere the precipitous hills, alternated with sharp, clear-cut valleys resembling miniature ravines, would give a fair idea of a mountainous country. In an agricultural sense the soil can scarcely be ranked among the best, although fine crops are in many instances raised from it. The township is well drained. The Little Neshannock, which traverses the entire length of the township, in a northwestern course, is joined by numerous smaller tributaries that themselves branch out into the adjacent farm lands, thus comprising, with the parent stream, an extensive and efficient system of natural drainage.

The settlement of Perry, as well as the other new townships formed out of old Sandy Creek, is necessarily connected, with indissoluble bands, with that of the parent organization. The history of it, therefore, is given under the heading of Sandy Creek Township. In addition to the facts therein narrated mention will be made of one early pioneer, whose life was a succession of eccentric thoughts and equally as eccentric actions. Reference is made to Martin Carringer. He was an old Revolutionary veteran, whose entrance into the township dates back, according to the best authenticated accounts, to the year 1796. Some assert that Carringer arrived as early as 1795, and built a cabin. If this could be verified it would unquestionably establish him as the earliest settler in the county. But however the mere date may be he is fairly entitled to rank among the very earliest pioneers. He settled on donation lot No. 941, which had been granted to him from the commonwealth on account of his services in the Revolution. He was a German, as the name indicates, and was known, in later years, after settlements had been made about him, for his wonderful kindness. He was extremely generous, but his generosity was only extended to the poor and helpless. All worthy public enterprises received his hearty support, and all unworthy ones were as readily met with his vehement opposition. It is seldom in the history of any community that a character is found which deserves higher encomiums than those which even his neighbors and associates bestowed on Martin Carringer.

Industries.—The industrial interests next merit notice. There have been three of these which became of the highest importance; these three are the coal mining, the iron blasting and the steam saw-milling interests. The first coal used in the region, and exhumed from the ground of what is now Perry Township, was taken from the Goodrich farm by a gentleman called Curtis, living in Mercer, who, it is said, as early as 1825, made a small opening, from which he extracted enough to supply his own demand. Others followed his example, and, in a brief time, nearly every inhabitant had secured enough local fuel for his home uses. The coal thus taken from the ground became, in later years, a staple of trade, being sold at one time for the small sum of one cent per bushel. The later developments of the interest are too well known to need recital. Of the blasting industry it may be said that it was at one time by far the most important of any in the township. There were once two furnaces; the first one, called "Harry of the West," was built about 1838, by J. G. Butler, and was situated near the line dividing Perry and Otter Creek Townships. Blasting operations were begun in 1839. The old method of charcoal was in vogue, and with this the furnace was conducted with reasonable success until 1845. But owing to a lack of capital, and a general falling off in the iron trade, Butler at last became bankrupt, and his enterprise passed into the hands of William Powers, a resident of Crawford County. But Powers, it appears, was as unsuccessful as Butler had been. For, in 1850, the furnace entered the possession of the firm of Irwin & Co. By this firm the establishment was conducted for over five years. During this period extensive operations were at times carried on. But a singular fatality seemed connected with the concern, for at the expiration of the period the sheriff made an appearance upon the scene, and threw a damper upon the business, from which it never recovered; and the buildings, after standing idle for a series of years, at last decayed and fell to earth.

The second enterprise was started in 1847, on the same vein of ore, by Ward & Russell, a firm living at Niles, Ohio. The location of its furnace was a short distance south of its predecessor. While under the operation of this firm, who used it as an auxiliary to their Buckeye Rolling Mill, a severe accident occurred. This was the burning of the buildings with two workmen inside. Both perished in the flames, one being resolved to cinders before taken out. A second time the furnace was started, but the business did not meet expectations, and after a ten years' existence, the "Mineral Ridge" furnace was permitted to perish.

In connection with the mining enterprises of the township it will doubtless be interesting to state that the site of the famous lead mine, which excited such a curiosity in the minds of the early settlers, was alleged to be in this vicinity. The tradition claims that in primitive times the Indians, of whom there were a considerable number yet remaining in the region, frequently appeared before the white new-comers with masses of pure lead, which they endeavored to exchange for whisky. They asserted, and it was generally believed, that they secured this metal in a hidden mine near by, which the whites did not know how to find. These statements gradually aroused much curiosity on the part of the settlers, and many attempts were made to penetrate the secret of the hidden store. No one was ever successful in this quest, however, and the Indians were wont to make the contemptuous remark, in explanation of the failure: "White man no find it; white man always look up, Injun look down." Donation lot 915 is said to have been fixed upon as the particular locality. But donation lot 915 has never, up to the present moment, yielded up its secret.

The third industry, and by no means the least, is the steam saw-mill business. The first mill of any consequence was erected in 1860, the proprietors being Amos Rulman and Henry Osbell. The former's farm furnished the site. This mill did a flourishing business for a number of years. Twelve years later a similar mill was built in the township by Lyman Hunt. In the southern part of the township the English & Co. stave factory was built in 1874, upon land occupied by George Baggs. It conducted an extensive business.

Villages.—There are two considerable villages in the township. Clark's Station, in the eastern part, on the Lake Shore branch, was once denominated Clark's Mills. There had in early days been several mills in the vicinity, which gave the name. Giles Clark, from whom the place was named, erected one in 1838, and a later one, in 1852, under the firm name of Giles Clark & Son. There were two systems of machinery in use, one for grist, and the other for sawing purposes. A stave-mill was also located in the village. This was erected in August, 1872, by L. T. Hunt. This was an important factor in the maintenance of the town, inasmuch as it at one time gave employment to upward of twenty-five of the inhabitants. A post-office was opened January 16, 1871. In the list of postmasters, printed elsewhere, the different officials in charge at various times will be given.

Hadley, the second village, lies on the same railroad, and is located three miles northwest of Clark's Station. It, like the latter, is entered by the Little Neshannock, at this place a beautiful, clear, well-flowing stream. The territory on which the town is located was originally owned by Andrew Patterson, afterward by James Ward, and at the time of the town's christening by David Hadley. The post-office was established in 1868. A list of its incumbents is given elsewhere. The town was laid out in 1871, by Joseph McClure, under the direction of Mr. Hadley. The hotel was built in the summer of 1871, by B. C. Roberts. In 1874 the present station was erected at a cost of $7,000. A barrel factory was opened in 1868, by Edmund Bell, of Youngstown, Ohio. It gave employment at one time to ten men.

Churches.—Hadley Presbyterian Church was organized May 11, 1875, by Rev. B. M. Kerr, Rev. S. J. M. Eaton, D. D., and Rev. David Waggoner. The original members were J. W. Beatty, Mrs. J. W. Beatty, William Hadley, Mrs. William Hadley, R. B. Hadley, Mrs. R. B. Hadley, John Patterson, Mrs. John Patterson, D. C. Hadley, Mrs. D. C. Hadley, John Cleland, Mrs. John Cleland, Lizzie Cleland, Allen Morrison, Mrs. Allen Morrison, Maggie Morrison, Sadie Morrison, R. E. Roberts, Mrs. R. E. Roberts, Stephen Feathers, Wilson Beatty, Ann Mills, Mrs. Frank Mellon, P. C. Clark, Thomas Dilly, Mrs. Thomas Dilly, Sarah Dilly, Eva Dilly, Zenas McClure, Mrs. Zenas McClure, Maggie Vaughn, Daniel Adams, Mrs. Daniel Adams and David Hadley. The present structure, a convenient frame building, well adapted for religious purposes, was dedicated March 10, 1876. Its cost was $4,150. The congregation at present numbers 121 members. The annual expenses of the church are estimated at $700.

The Methodist Episcopal Church was organized in 1882, by Rev. J. B. Espy. Among the original members are found the names of David S. Goodrich, James D. Kelso, John Mizner, Joshua Gilger, John Cole, Richard Foalk and others. The house of worship was built in 1883, and dedicated March 26, 1884, by Rev. David Latshaw. Its cost was $3,000. The first pastor was Rev. J. H. Vance. Following him came Rev. J. M. Foster, Rev. W. S. Shepard and Rev. C. C. Hunt. The congregation at present numbers about fifty members, and is in a very fair condition, both spiritually and temporally.

PINE TOWNSHIP.

The old township of Wolf Creek was divided February 17, 1851, into three parts, the two lower portions being called Pine and Liberty, respectively, and the upper retaining the original name. Pine Township, therefore, lies between Wolf Creek and Liberty, and may be said to be in the extreme southeastern corner of the county. The honor of naming the new division fell chiefly to Mrs. Cunningham, who gave it its present title because of a small bunch of pine trees which crowned the hill just west of Grove City.

The surface of the township is considerably diversified. In places it is undulating in gentle rises and falls. Again it is quite broken, and marked in rough outline by hills which rise abruptly. There are yet other localities quite level. From an agricultural point of view, the township is considered as being one of the best in the county. Fruits, grains and vegetables of various kinds are raised in profusion, and the soil is very fertile, particularly along the banks of Wolf Creek, which flows in a nearly direct north and south course through the entire territory. Forests are also quite dense in places, and pine, hemlock and the deciduous trees flourish in great variety of size and shape. But it is chiefly in the mineral and coal measures that the wealth of the township consists. Probably no part of the county contains better coal lands. Salt is also found at the well located on J. C. Shaw's farm. Mingled with this is a large amount of bromine, the preparation of which into the marketable drug may in the near future add another to the list of the township's industries. In point of drainage Pine is unexcelled. Wolf Creek, as mentioned, flows the whole length of the township. From it shoot out numerous small tributaries, which wind in sinuous course through nearly every farm in the entire region, thus forming, with the parent stream, an unexcelled system for the carrying off of surplus rain-fall. Good building stone is quarried in places. It is of fair quality, and the outlook for a larger demand for it is very promising. Good brick clay is also found in abundance.

Pioneers.—The early settlement of the township is partly discussed under the head of "Wolf Creek Township." From all the confused testimony and untrustworthy records that could be seen, it appears that the first settler in the region now called Pine Township was a man named John Sutherland. But little is known of him. He entered the county sometime in the early spring of 1796, and secured a settler's claim of 400 acres adjacent to the farm afterward owned by James Hume. He appears to have been a man open to barter, for, in the summer of the same year, John Perry, a veteran of the Revolution from Lancaster County, entered the region and purchased half of Sutherland's tract. Perry was of German descent. He settled on the land, improved it, perfected a clearing, built a cabin and made the home habitable. In the winter he returned to his Lancaster County home, and in the following spring, accompanied by his wife and nine children, set out to take up his permanent residence in the new country. The following winter they passed in their new home, braving its severities with heroic fortitude, at a time, too, when nearly all of their fellow-workers in the county had returned to the populous settlements. Contemporary with Sutherland, and by some claimed to have preceded the latter in his entrance to the township, was Philip Hoon. He came in the spring of 1796, and, like Sutherland, squatted on a 400 acre tract. The two tracts adjoined. It is not known when Hoon was joined by his family, but it was certainly as late as 1797.

William Buchanan came from Washington County and settled in what is now Pine Township in 1797. His family consisted of two sets of children. By his first wife, Elizabeth, he had George and William, and by his second, Polly, he had Robert, Alexander and Hunter. He entered 400 acres of land. It is now divided into small tracts and occupied by his descendants. Mr. Buchanan had to go to Pittsburgh for his supplies. On one occasion he went for provisions. Returning, he came as far as the Connoquenessing, which, badly swollen by recent rains, he was unable to cross. He was compelled to tarry on the south side until the water had subsided. This delay caused him and his horse to eat up their stock of provisions. He returned to his cabin for more money with which to buy an extra stock. He was thus compelled to make a second trip; but such was pioneer life.

The year 1798 brought several prominent settlers. Among these were David and Matthew McDowell, who located on a 400 acre tract at what is called Cranberry Plain, where the latter was joined in the following year by his son, Robert. They were all from Westmoreland County. From Huntingdon County came James Glenn, accompanied by his wife and child. He secured a farm in the western part of the township and located upon it, at once beginning a clearing and preparing to make it his permanent home. John Miller, from Pittsburgh, entered the territory in the same year. Being pleased with the prospects he sent word over to his brother, James, then in Scotland, and the latter immigrated to this country, and proceeded direct to meet his brother. He purchased fifty acres of land from him, obtained a settler's claim on other tracts, and purchased 100 acres from another settler, whose name is not known. The Waldron and Gregg farms are part of the land which Miller thus acquired.

In September, 1798, Ephraim and Jacob Rose came from Centre County, Penn., via Phillipsburg, Brookville, etc., to what is now Pine Township, Mercer County. Their means of conveyance was a pack-horse, which carried a scanty supply of provisions, cooking utensils, an ax, grubbing hoe and rifle.

After selecting a 440 acre tract, they built their cabin on the southeast corner and commenced clearing. Their first crop was turnips. Some of the neighbors at that time were the McDowells, Glenns, Cunninghams, McKinleys, etc. The next year Jacob returned to bring the family out. The family then consisted of Andrew and his wife and the following children: Ephraim, Jacob, Andrew, James, Chapman, Benjamin, Betsey and Polly. Elizabeth, or Betsey, married David Mitchel, and Polly married James McKinley, and is the grandmother of Hon. William McKinley, member of Congress from Canton, Ohio. Mr. Rose built a larger house this year (1799), increased the capacity of his stables, and prepared to entertain strangers over night, though he did not keep a regular hotel. The Rose sons married in this order: Ephraim, Jacob and James. Jacob married Rebecca Clark about 1802-03, and reared quite a large family, of whom M. H. Rose, the fifth child, born September 14, 1813, is a resident of Cleveland, Ohio. James married Martha McKinley, daughter of David McKinley, April 3, 1806. James died in 1865 and his widow in 1872 aged eighty and eighty-seven respectively. The Rose family has furnished some prominent citizens for both the county and the State, records of some of whom will be found in the biographical department.

One of the early settlers of Pine Township, a contemporary of the Cunninghams, the Glenns, McDowells, etc., was Benjamin Wood. He was a cabinet maker, carpenter, and a farmer on a small scale. He was of English extraction, was born November 22, 1782, and his wife Catherine October 14, 1778. He died in 1852. They had the following children: Margaret, Samuel and John, born, respectively, December 22, 1804, November 6, 1808, and January 5, 1812. Mr. Wood settled on a small farm near the Rose place. His wife was the aunt of the late James G. Cunningham, who had learned his trade with his Uncle Benjamin. In politics the Woods were Democrats, in religion they were Presbyterians. The sons died at the ages of seventy-one and seventy, respectively.

Among the settlers who came into Pine (then Wolf Creek) Township in 1798 were the Whites, from Washington County. They were of Scotch descent; Seceders in religion, and anti-slavery in politics. The ancestor of this family was Alexander White, whose wife was Rachel Henderson. Their children were John, Elizabeth (married to Hugh Watt), Alexander, James, Samuel (soldier in the War of 1812), Hannah (married to George Buchanan), Hugh (the only one born in Mercer County). Alexander, the father of these, was a Revolutionary soldier. John White, the eldest of the family, occupied a tract of 200 acres. He married Margaret Query, of Butler County, by whom he had a large family: Rachel (married to Begges), John B., James, Jane (never married), Elizabeth (married to Samuel Koonce), Samuel G., George W., Hiram C. and Henderson. Hiram C. (born August 14, 1813), the only one living, is a resident of Mercer, and the father of J. G. White, Esq., and others. His family consists of James, Alexander, Margaret, Jane, John G., Ella, Charles, Mary, Edward, Louis and David H.

No record exists of any important settlements being made in the year 1799, although it is presumed that some must have been made. In the first years of the present century, however, there was another influx of settlers. Among them were William Daugherty, a Revolutionary veteran, who came from South Carolina and located on a 400-acre tract, upon which his grandson, John Daugherty, afterward resided, and Thomas Dunlap, who entered in 1826, from the adjoining county of Butler, and settled upon a farm in the northern part of the township. There were 200 acres in the original tract, and on a portion of this William Dunlap located, building a cabin and clearing off a small space of land. John McConnell entered in 1811, and settled upon a piece of land on which his son, William, afterward lived. As the name indicates, he was an Irishman. William McBride, another Irishman, came to the eastern part of the township in 1826. Besides these there were many others, whose names are not within reach. The work of settling, which was thus auspiciously begun, was continued for a long series of years. The township gradually took rank, under the careful watch of its early developers, among the foremost in the county, a position which it has ever since maintained.

Mills.—Among the most interesting landmarks of any community are its early mills, the remains of which, still standing on the primitive location, often recall memories of past usefulness to the speculative observer. Probably the first one erected in Pine Township was built in 1806, by James Graham. It was a grist-mill, and was located on Wolf Creek, the waters of which supplied the motor power for the operation of the unwieldy mill-stones that ground the grain. A saw-mill, probably the earliest concern of the kind, was erected near the same spot in 1812, by Robert Moore. The wright in charge was a man named James McCoy. The second saw-mill was built in 1842, also on the banks of Wolf Creek, by William Perry. It is now conducted by J. C. Shaw, and is located near the grist-mill which he operates. In another chapter will be found a list of the early township officials of Wolf Creek Township, which contains the names of a great many men distinguished in local, social and political circles. In the list of early inn-keepers the names of the township's entertainers will also be found.

Centre Presbyterian Church was organized in the year 1801, through the efforts of Rev. William Wood, who was installed its first pastor November 3, 1802, Rev. Dr. McMillan delivering the charge. The first members of the congregation were Andrew Rose, Ephraim Rose, Andrew Rose, Jr., David McKinley, James McKinley, Robert Glenn, James Glenn, William Glenn, James Gormley, William Brandon, George Hosack, Mrs. Elizabeth Whitaker, Mrs. James Gormley, and others whose names have not been found. The first house was erected near what is now known as the Cranberry School-house, on the Moore farm. It was built of pine logs, the crevices of which were filled with mud, and was 50x30 feet in dimensions. The floor was earthen, while above shone the clear sky, as no ceiling was built, and the thatched roof was filled with interstices. The pews consisted of split logs placed on blocks, and warmth was furnished to the shivering brethren by a tin-plate stove. This house was built during Rev. Wood's charge. This, however, came to a termination August 24, 1808. For a period of nearly ten years no regular services were held; but February 25, 1818, the second pastor of the congregation, Rev. John Munson, was installed. During the early part of his ministry services were held in the house of Robert Glenn, though the old log church had been removed to the site of the present church building, and located about one and a half miles west of Grove City. The latter building, a brick, costing $1,800, was erected in 1837-38, and was at the time considered one of the finest structures in all the country round. Rev. Munson continued as pastor of the Centre Church until June 28, 1859, at which time he was released, after a pastorate of forty-one years. His successor, Rev. W. W. McKinney, was installed in 1861, and remained until June, 1865. Following him came Rev. S. A. Hughes, installed in October, 1866, and released in 1871; Rev. David Patton, September 4, 1872, February 22, 1875, when removed by death, and Rev. W. J. McConkey, November 17, 1875, April 29, 1878. Since the latter date none but provisional services has been held. The present elders of this old congregation are James Glenn, Valentine Glenn, W. W. Breckenridge and John B. Bell. The trustees are Harrison Armstrong, John Glenn and Joseph Gregg. The superintendent of the Sunday-school is W. A. Coulter.

PYMATUNING TOWNSHIP.

This township, one of the original six, is the largest in the county, having an area of thirty-eight square miles. It is rectangular in shape, although the appearance presented is nearly that of a trapezoid. Its surface is level. The fertility of its soil is unsurpassed. Agriculture flourishes as in but few other townships in the county. The finest kind of grain and fruit are produced, and the grazing lands lying along the course of the Shenango are equal to any in the entire Northwest. There are considerable veins of coal extending underneath the surface, which add materially to the industrial wealth of the township. The principal source of the wealth of the inhabitants, however, is not industrial, but agricultural. The drainage is unexcelled. The principal stream, Shenango River, enters the borders in a direct eastern and western course at the eastern boundary, near the southern extremity, flows west for a short distance, is deflected from its course and passes through the borough of Clarksville, then follows a northwesterly direction for a short distance, and at length, near its junction with Pymatuning Creek, turns abruptly south, and in a tortuous course enters the township of Hickory east of Sharpville. Pymatuning Creek heads in Ohio, flows eastward, and near Orangeville changes its course to a sharp southeasterly direction, in which it unites its waters with the parent stream near Clarksville. Booth Run rises in West Salem, and joins the Pymatuning at Orangeville. These streams of water, with the smaller branches that flow in on either side, form a system of drainage that is abundantly able to successfully convey away all surplus rain-fall.

Pioneers.—The first settler of this township was doubtless Jacob Loutzenhiser, who came out from Westmoreland County, Penn., in the fall of 1796, with a party of land prospectors, embracing the Klingensmiths, Kecks and Andrew Christy. He selected a tract of land on the site of Orangeville, upon which he settled permanently in the spring of 1797. His cabin stood on the Pennsylvania side of the line, and in 1798 he erected, on Pymatuning Creek, a saw and grist-mill, one of the first, if not the first, in Mercer County. He sold this property to Adam Haun in 1802, and removed to the vicinity of Greenville, where he died in 1821.

In the spring of 1798 Nathan Fell and wife Ann located where their grandsons, Mahlon and Aaron Fell, now live. They too were from Westmoreland County, and spent the balance of their lives in Pymatuning Township. A full sketch of the family will be found in the biographical department.

David Hayes located near the site of Sharpville about the same period. He reared quite a large family, and was one of the pioneer school-teachers of the valley. Many of his descendants are residents of the county.

Robert McCord and Andrew Chestnut came from Westmoreland County, Penn., in 1798, and settled in Pymatuning Township. The former was of Irish parentage, and a man of very good education. He taught a school in the township in 1814-15-16, and was regarded as quite a successful teacher. He located about two miles east of the site of Transfer, where a daughter was born in 1800. She became the wife of Thomas Gill. When the War of 1812 commenced McCord's son Robert raised a company to fight the hereditary foe of his native land. A roster of this company will be found in a previous chapter. He was one of the leading pioneers of the valley throughout its early history. Andrew Chestnut was a relative of McCord, and also served in the War of 1812. He settled on the farm now occupied by his daughter, Mrs. F. J. Bean, and died in 1867 at the ripe old age of ninety years. A sketch of his family will be found elsewhere in this work.

Godfrey Carnes was a veteran of the Revolution, who came from Westmoreland County, Penn., in 1801, and settled upon the farm whereon his grandson, Godfrey G. Carnes, now lives. The title to his first tract was a patent given as a reward for his services in the Revolutionary War. In his trip to his new home he followed Indian trails most of the distance. He erected his cabin on what afterward became the Sharpsville and Orangeville road. In a few years this rude structure was succeeded by what the pioneers called a "double log house." This house was the polling place for most of the early elections in Pymatuning Township. Mr. Carnes was a leading Democrat, a very successful pioneer, and accumulated a large estate. He died in 1842.

Adam Haun was one of the first settlers. He purchased Jacob Loutzenhisser's mills in April, 1802, and that place was known for many years as "Haun's Mills." He is one of the township's best remembered pioneers.

Samuel Clark settled on the site of Clarksville in 1804, and laid out the town; after him it was named. He lived there until his death, October 29, 1860, at the age of ninety years, nine months and twelve days. His wife died October 7, 1863, aged ninety-one years, eleven months and twenty-three days. He was the founder of the Methodist Church in Clarksville, the first preaching being done at his house in 1819. A year later a congregation was organized and he became its leader. In possession of his son Abraham, who died recently at Clarksville in his eighty-ninth year, were the class registers for some ten years.

David McKnight came to the township in 1804, and settled three miles north of the site of Sharpsville. He was a native of Washington County, Penn., married Hannah Gill, and left a numerous progeny, as the reports of their family reunions show. In 1824 he was appointed a justice of the peace, which office he filled up to his death, November 16, 1839.

In 1808, Samuel Koonce located near Clarksville, entered upon possession of a large tract of land, and gradually effected a clearing, on which he began raising fair crops. In 1816, Thomas Gill settled upon a 200-acre farm lying about two miles and three-quarters north of Sharpsville. Two years afterward, William Campbell, an early settler of Hickory Township, removed to Pymatuning and took up his residence. These were all comparatively early settlers. Many others entered in later years, and were compelled to clear their farms and live in log cabins.

At the time treated of there were numerous Indians in the vicinity. They belonged to what was called the Corn-planter tribe, named from a chief by that title, and were, in all probability, a remnant of the nation of Senecas. Mr. Carnes found an encampment of them upon his land when he arrived. They were never troublesome, in a belligerent sense, though their presence in the vicinity often used to account for the absence of many of the settlers' valuables. It is related that they would come to Mr. Carnes and request the privilege of using his rifle a few moments. If granted, they would take the weapon, set off into the forest, be gone a day or two, and return, carrying with them a large deer in payment for the loan of the gun. A tradition exists to the effect that near the mouth of what is known as Big Run, they had concealed a valuable lead mine, from which they used to stealthily extract quantities of the metal, smelt it, and dispose of it to the settlers, who used it for bullets. This story has been related so often that at various times persons have been induced to make explorations in the vicinity alluded to, hoping to discover this hidden store. But, so far as is known, the ore-vein has never yet been found. It is certainly true that the savages were in the possession of a quantity of a superior quality of lead; but whether they secured it by digging, or thieving, must ever remain a question open to discussion.

In the chapter on Township Officials will be found the names of the early officers of Pymatuning, from 1802 down to 1831, inclusive. These will throw some light upon who were the prominent men of those early days. They will demonstrate whom the people entrusted with the discharge of public duties, and will also illustrate whom the early politicians were. A list of early inn-keepers is also given elsewhere.

Villages.—Orangeville, formerly known as Haun's Mills, is located on the Pymatuning Creek, the greater part lying in Ohio. That portion is incorporated, and contains the post-office, while a flouring-mill, hotel, etc., is on this side of the line. The first settler was Jacob Loutzenhiser, who erected a saw and grist-mill in 1798. The building was a hewed log structure, and the motive power was supplied by a huge under-shot wheel, twenty-five feet in diameter, operated by a race from Pymatuning Creek. On the 19th of April, 1802, Loutzenhiser sold the mills to Adam Haun, who carried them on many years. A mill has ever since existed at that point, a very good one being now operated by S. L. Hendrickson.

At an early day a woolen-mill was built by Mr. Hull, the father of George E. Hull, of Orangeville. It served an excellent purpose, but was burned down on the 3d of April, 1838.

On the 20th of March, 1838, a small craft, known as the "Orangeville Packet," left Orangeville, at the mouth of Booth Run, where it was built, destined for Galena, Ill. It contained the three families of St. Clair, Casper and Carnes, and was intended to go via the Pymatuning Creek and the Shenango, Big Beaver, Ohio and Mississippi Rivers to its destination. It sailed on its way grandly, distributing its crew at various points along the route, but is understood never to have returned. This is the only expedition of the kind that ever descended the Pymatuning.

Transfer is located on the Erie & Pittsburgh and the N. Y. P. & O. (Erie) Railroads, near the point where the latter line deflects to the west. It is a point of considerable business activity. It has two churches, the Presbyterian and the Baptist.

Churches.—The Presbyterian Church was erected in 1825, a small log house which served its purpose for a number of years, when its place was taken by a larger and more suitable structure, erected by the joint efforts of the different denominations. Some difficulty arising in the management, the Methodists transferred their interests to the Presbyterians, who subsequently became the exclusive owners. The congregation is in good condition.

Transfer Regular Baptist Church was organized in February, 1872, in the town hall, by Revs. Jacob Morris and J. W. Snyder. The first members, seventeen in number, were J. Frampton, Matilda Frampton, Miss H. J. Frampton, Miss Tillie Frampton, S. McClelland, Mrs. E. McClelland, L. Chittenden, M. J. Chittenden, William T. McClelland, D. A. Frampton, Delora Frampton, L. Bumpus, Miss M. E. McClelland, Miss N. A. McClelland, Mrs. E. Frampton, Miss C. R. McClelland and Miss A. Saveren. The building in which worship is held is a good, substantial frame structure, 36x50 feet in dimensions, erected in 1876 at a cost of $3,500, to which an addition 33x18 feet was made in 1887, thus securing a very convenient meeting place. The church has baptized on profession of faith, since its organization, seventy members, and has received by letter sixteen more. The membership, which is at present sixty-four, would be much larger were it not for the fact that the residents of the place are constantly removing to other localities. The first pastor was Rev. J. W. Snyder, who remained five years. Following him came Revs. William P. Keile, two years, and T. J. Bristow, D. Bull, A. Peckham and A. G. McLean, the latter acting as supplies. The secretaries of the congregation have been Leroy Chittenden and R. E. Woods. Considering the obstacles with which it has had to contend, this congregation is in a truly prosperous condition. Its annual expenses are $501, and the members are in good spiritual and material state of advancement.

SALEM TOWNSHIP.

This was one of the original six townships. It has been divided and subdivided, and at present represents about one-fourth of its original size. The surface is pretty well broken. Portions of it are undulating and well adapted to agricultural purposes, and others are rather rough. Farming is very successfully carried on within the limits, and constitutes an important source of the township's wealth. There is comparatively little coal land, occasional veins being found beneath the surface at various distances and in various thicknesses. This, however, has never been mined in sufficient quantity to give the township a reputation for producing the black diamonds. In the matter of drainage little need be said, for the drainage itself, though sufficient, is not especially prominent as a physical feature of the region. However, surplus rain-fall is generally carried off in a manner that is satisfactory to the farmers.

Pioneers.—In the spring of 1796 a party consisting of John Caughey, Robert Roberts and James Hubanks, intent upon securing homes in the new territory of the northwest, which had been thrown open to settlement just four years before by the act of 1792, arrived in what is now the township of Salem, from Westmoreland County. Roberts, in after time, became known as the celebrated Bishop Roberts, afterward conspicuous in Methodist Church history. The party which thus arrived had set out from Westmoreland County on foot, carrying all their provisions and equipage on their backs. Each of the party had a gun, with the exception of Roberts. When the company left Westmoreland County it was larger by two than when it arrived in Salem Township. A brother of Robert Roberts, Thomas by name, and William McLean started on the expedition. As they reached a point on the Allegheny, afterward known as Freeport, their hearts failed them and they turned back. Thomas endeavored to induce his younger brother Robert, then only eighteen years of age, to return to the settlements with him, but the lad spiritedly declined, stating that he was not afraid of a little hardship. In Elliot's Life of Roberts, we find that on the third day after the return of Roberts and McLean, the remainder of the party, who had been pushing resolutely forward, reached what was known as the old Venango path, which they followed to its intersection with French Creek. Here a short stop was made, and after a brief council they determined to follow the stream up to the mouth of the Cussawago (now Meadville). After they had arrived at the place they retraced their steps for a distance of eight miles, and then pushed off in a southwesterly direction until they arrived at the headwaters of the Little Shenango. Following the custom of all early pioneers, as soon as they reached a suitable spot for location, they halted and built their cabins. The point at which this was done was located about a mile north of the residence occupied for a number of years by John Leech, Sr. Here they at once began clearings, commencing their operations by girdling the trees. In the course of a few weeks two strangers appeared and asked the privilege of joining them in their labors. The names of these are not related, nor has inquiry found out. The "Life" referred to states that after a brief time the provisions of the party were exhausted. Wild game, of course, was abundant, deer being especially so, but fresh meat became a monotonous diet when depended upon altogether. So the whole party walked to Meadville and packed their goods home on their backs. They purchased seed potatoes and corn, paying $3 per bushel for the former and $2 for the latter. These trips were repeated at different intervals. Upon one occasion young Roberts started back from Meadville with some sugar in his arms. It was on Sunday. A rain which fell dissolved it, leaving the party to do without their sweets. Roberts believed that the accident was a direct punishment from God for their wickedness in traveling on His holy day.

In the following June Roberts and Hubanks returned to Westmoreland County, leaving Caughey to look after their interests, and, in accordance with the act of 1792, to occupy their tracts and keep them free from intruding squatters. Caughey, however, was not destined to long remain alone in the township, for in the same spring a party, consisting of Stephen Riley, William Lindsay, Lewis and Thomas Roberts, from Ligonier, and Rev. Jacob Gurwell, entered and began settlements. Some accounts say that John Caughey had returned to the populous regions, and came back to his new land in company with the party. At any rate, the new-comers entered the region of Salem Township and prepared to secure land claims. The two Roberts brothers and Gurwell shortly afterward returned to the place whence they had come, intending to replenish their store of provisions, which had run low. They promised to be back in a short time. Weeks and months ensued, but they came not. Riley also returned home, and Lindsay was left to meet starvation. He subsisted for an almost unendurable period on squirrels and other small game. But this proved so weakening that he was almost prostrated, when, upon looking out his cabin door, he beheld a party of whites approaching, which made his heart beat with joy. It comprised the Roberts family, including the father, three sons and one daughter, Elizabeth, the first woman ever in the territory. The new-comers brought abundant supplies, and also a few head of stock, with which to begin farming in earnest.

During the two following winters Robert, the future bishop, and his sister Elizabeth were left in the wilderness to guard the cabins, the remainder of the party having returned to Ligonier. It is related that during the long winter days, when there was nothing to do inside, Robert would take his rifle and depart on a hunting expedition into the surrounding forests, leaving his sister to pass the day alone. There was, fortunately, nothing to frighten her, as the few Indians who lived in the vicinity at the time were generally peaceful, and all had a high respect for the plucky woman. At night she used to take her station on the cabin roof, and by shouting at the top of her voice guide her brother in to his home. His answer to this signal was always a gunshot, which he fired to let her know he was coming. In the spring of 1798 Lindsay, Caughey and Robert Roberts settled permanently in the township, and became thereafter prominently identified with its history and development. Lindsay became Elizabeth's husband, while Caughey married her sister.

Among the other early settlers the following only will be noticed. William McLean and family came in 1798, purchasing his land from John Caughey. The spring of 1799 witnessed the arrival of Caleb Rhodes, with a family of wife and nine children, from Fayette County. He settled on a 400 acre tract afterward occupied by his grandsons, and located in the northern part of the township. In 1799 Thomas Limber, of Centre County, settled upon a 200 acre tract on which Minard Freeland afterward lived. In the year following he brought out his wife and children, the land having been donated to her on account of her father's services in the Revolution. He erected a hewed log cabin, which stood for nearly eighty years. In it the celebrated Dr. John Taylor, an Irishman, born in County Armagh, an astronomer, philosopher and master of arts, also author of Taylor's Almanacs, was killed by lightning on the night of August 10, 1838. Of the other pioneers, James Stevenson, a blacksmith; Henry Williamson, an early settler upon the Beatty places; William Stewart, on the Rhodes place; Samuel Watt and Andrew McLean were among the most prominent. They all did heroic service in the cause of civilization, and could they arise from their long sleep would behold sights of progress and enlightenment of which they never, in the wildest flights of their fancy, dreamed. George Williamson, brother of James, settled in Salem Township. His sons were: Samuel, who was the colonel of the first volunteer regiment in the county. He was twice a candidate for Congress, but the time had not then come for Mercer County to be honored with a live Congressman. James, another son, died early in Mercer. He was a merchant. Jacob, who, in company with David Crawford, started the second newspaper published in Mercer, in the interest of Gregg, who was a candidate for governor.

Mills.—The importance of early mills upon every community's growth is generally conceded. In the present township a great inconvenience was at first experienced in securing ground grain. But the grist-mill erected in 1805, by Bishop Roberts, on a small stream known as Big Run, obviated this difficulty and became a genuine public blessing. It enjoyed a large patronage. In the southeastern part of the township one was built in 1824 by John Long. In a short time he added a saw-mill attachment, and later still a carding-mill.

A saw-mill was built in the summer of 1828, on the Big Run, by James Caughey. This is claimed to be the first erected in the Roberts neighborhood. It, too, did good service, but in a few months became unmanageable and was abandoned. In 1834 James Stevenson replaced it, being assisted in the trouble of operating it by his partner, Lewis Lindsay. This one was a success, and received an extensive patronage. Two other mills were built in the neighborhood, one in 1846 by Adam Thompson and James Young, in the southwestern part of the township, and the other in 1850, in the same region, by George Fulke. These landmarks in the history of the township's industrial development, while not of themselves of extreme importance to a reader of to-day, yet illustrate as well as anything else the progress that has been achieved during the closing decades of our present century. They are, therefore, instructive.

SANDY CREEK TOWNSHIP.

The old township of Sandy Creek, with its gigantic area of fifty square miles, was erected in 1804. It extended from the line of Crawford County on the north to the old township of Cool Spring on the south, and was bounded on the east by French Creek Township and on the west by Salem. It existed in this shape until the year 1850. On December 18, of that year, a number of petitions, asking for a division of the old organization into four new ones, was presented in court. Francis Beatty, James A. Leech and Joseph Kerr were appointed commissioners. They reported a division, which, being confirmed June 23, 1851, resulted in the formation of the four townships of Sandy Creek, Deer Creek, New Vernon and Mineral (afterward Perry). The surface of the old township, as well as the new one, was broken. There are several valuable deposits of coal, and also considerable valuable strata of building stone. Agriculturally the soil is quite fertile, and well adapted to grazing, cereal raising or sheep growing. Excellent drainage is supplied by Big Sandy Creek, which, with the numerous tributaries that shoot off from the parent stream into the country adjacent, forming a veritable net-work, is well qualified to carry off all surplus water-fall.

The territory in question lay in the very heart of the old donation and warrant lands. Land speculators and traders were among the first to perceive the fertility and value of the soil of the new region, and as a result their efforts were instantly turned toward securing the inflow of a body of settlers, through a traffic with whom they anticipated immense profits. It must be remembered that in no region in the State, among the less historical portions, were the original land titles more confused and jumbled together. Two deeds, and even three, were often issued for the same piece of land within the same year. Squatters, too, were numerous, encroaching, wherever opportunity offered, upon the rights of legitimate settlers. That much litigation and a vast amount of trouble arose is not, therefore, astonishing. Such was the only logical outcome of the general looseness with which the land business was carried on. The first land-jobber to begin speculations in the region of which we speak was a Philadelphian named Fields, who took out warrants for a large body of land lying in Sandy Creek Township in 1790, or thereabouts. There were others that followed in his footsteps, though, and in a short time much of the land was claimed by outside owners. By an act dated April 3, 1792, all land not thus under warrant was placed under settlement. This caused many desirous of penetrating the great Northwest to cast their eyes toward the region, and to investigate as to its desirability for settlement.

Pioneers.—In 1796 two Irishmen, who had emigrated from their native country to Allegheny County, heard from a party of surveyors, who had been engaged in surveying the region afterward known as Mercer County, that beautiful lands awaited settlers in the locality where they had just been. Impressed by these recitals the two emigrants started forth, and after a long journey arrived at and settled upon land lying a short distance north of the present town of Sheakleyville. This was in the spring of 1796. They effected clearings and began preparations to remain. They were soon joined by others. Among these was Martin Carringer, a veteran of the Revolution, who had settled within the present limits of Perry Township. One John Smith also arrived. But the winter promised to be too severe in that exposed region, consequently nearly every settler in the whole region returned to the inland settlements. In the spring of 1797 the two Irishmen, reinforced by William Byers and John E. Larimer, returned, erected cabins, and began cultivating the land. During the summer Thomas Phillips, Ross Byers, David Chase, Andrew Dawson, John Chase, Hugh Richardson, Alexander McCracken and Joseph Nelson joined the party, or rather entered the neighborhood. Further away had entered John Custard, John Arbuckle and Richard Custard, all from the Susquehanna Valley. Each of these set out a patch of potatoes, and when the vegetables had attained their growth, buried them in the earth and returned to the populous regions a second time to pass the winter. • The following spring witnessed the return of most of the number. An anecdote is related of McCracken relative to his third spring's experience. A land-jobber named Irish, attempting to bluff the settlers away from their lands, raised claim to them upon warrants, and made ready to secure the lands as though they were vacant. The settlers were apprised of this. When the intruder appeared upon McCracken's tract, and began to lay out the boundary, McCracken also appeared with a gun loaded with buck-shot. This had the desired effect, and the land-grabber withdrew in such haste that he left behind him his Jacob's staff, which McCracken kept standing as a warning to all new-comers that he would not be intimidated. Mr. Minnis had left his family behind until he could make necessary preparations to receive them. When he had done this he sent for them. They had nearly reached their new homestead when the father, who had been a stout, vigorous man, was taken ill. His son, who had been with him all the time, at once set out to hasten the family's steps. When he returned with them he found nothing but a new-made mound, which contained his father's corpse. The son of the deceased, John, at once set about completing the labors which his father had not been permitted to finish. With heroic resolution he toiled day after day, barely being able to support the large family. His reward at length came, for in after years the name of Capt. John Minnis became known far and wide as the title of a man of worth, integrity and honesty.

The year 1800 witnessed a great influx of settlers. The first blacksmith in the territory, James Hazen, was numbered among these. His coming was a great convenience to the settlers, who had hitherto had little means for securing their smithing done by a master hand. Daniel Perkins was another of these immigrants. He located just north of Alexander McCracken, upon the land claimed by the land speculator, Field. It is claimed that covering the cabin, which he shortly afterward erected, was the first shingle roof ever built in Mercer County, and under it the first cellar. He was a native of Ireland, emigrated to this country, settling at Little York, Penn., and removed from that locality to his Mercer County home. He did not remain long, however, but sold his farm to William Church, father of Judge Gaylord Church, whose career reflected lustre upon the pages of Sandy Creek history.

In the region afterward known as Deer Creek Township, the new comers during the year mentioned were Aaron Boylan and David Caldwell, from Fayette County, Penn. They paddled their way up the Allegheny River and French Creek to the cabin of James Herrington, in Crawford County, by whose direction they found the vacant land on which they settled. They erected two cabins, each twelve feet square. Their provisions shortly afterward gave out, and as they were not near any settlement, they found themselves in a peculiar dilemma. They subsisted for a long time on corn bread made by cracking the rough corn between two stones and mixing the product with water, the dough being then baked to a crust. But even this gave out. They looked about in vain for means with which to ward off the severe attacks of hunger, but none were found. At length, after trying every expedient without success, the two pioneers resolved to return to the settlement from which they had just come, intending to bring back with them fresh supplies. This they accordingly did. When at last they succeeded in packing the food they had secured back to their new cabin home, they were met at its door by a man named Davis, who coolly informed them that he was the owner. An unwritten law of the border land declared that whenever the fire of a settler located upon land which he claimed by mere right of possession went out, the claim became forfeited, and the land was thus opened to settlement by the next new comer. On the strength of this, Davis argued his right to the land, averring that he had come along through the forest, spied a cabin, and finding no fire on the hearth-stone, had concluded that the abode was tenantless. Boylan, whose cabin had thus been wrested from him, knew the conformity of Davis' claim with the border law, and further knew that nothing short of artifice would dispossess him. He accordingly entered, and requested the privilege of warming himself by the fire. This was readily granted. In a short time Davis excused himself and started to a spring near by for a bucket of water. No sooner had he passed out of sight than Boylan arose, dashed the embers from the hearth and closed the door. When Davis came back and demanded admittance, Boylan pointed to the fireplace, which then contained no fire, and said that according to the very law which he (Davis) had quoted, his right to the cabin had ceased. Davis saw he had been outwitted, and after a few vain attempts to shake the original owner from his claim, departed and left Boylan again in the possession of his rightful property.

The year 1801 brought Ithiel Dodd, who settled near what afterward became the village of Middleton; Lincoln Axtell, a prominent man in early township annals, who located upon the farm afterward owned by J. K. Ross; Stephen Riggs, upon land afterward occupied by J. L. McCormick; Daniel Axtell, father of Lincoln, also a prominent citizen, and several others, whose names have not been found so frequently in public records.

In the years that followed during the first decade of the present century many important accessions were made to the ranks of Sandy Creek pioneers. Among these were Israel Tuttle, who came from Venango County in 1804 and settled in the southern part of what afterward became Deer Creek Township, upon the Livingston place, and the Montgomerys, John, Joseph, James and William, four brothers, who arrived in 1802 from Juniata County, and located upon a 400-acre tract situated near the present line between Mill Creek and New Vernon Townships. Of these James became the most distinguished. He was a member of the Legislature in 1813, a member of the constitutional convention in 1837, a captain in the war of 1812, a colonel of militia, and for many years a justice of the peace in Sandy Creek Township. He also filled several minor offices, and was prominent in local political circles. Besides the names mentioned, there were scores of others who arrived in time to assist materially in clearing the obstacles off the pathway of progress. John Sheakley and family located on the site of Sheakleyville in 1804. For a full sketch of this family the reader is referred to the biographical department of this work.

The original inhabitants of the territory of which we have been speaking was a remnant of the great race of Seneca Indians. Their wigwams were scattered at various intervals over the entire face of the country. It must not be inferred from this that they existed in large numbers. On the contrary, they were weak in strength, and generally peaceable. Only when under the influence of liquor did they become troublesome. But a rigid enforcement of the common proprieties on the part of the whites made the intercourse of the two races safe, and, in some instances, pleasant. An instance of this is related concerning an Indian warrior named Jake Shandy. He came one day to McCracken's cabin, carrying a large dead bear on his shoulder. The husband was not at home. The Indian threw his prize down in front of the fireplace, on the clean floor, and began preparations toward skinning it. Mrs. McCracken was not appalled by this impudence, but coolly walked up and gave Shandy a tremendous kick, telling him at the same time that he had better get out at once. The savage apparently relished this courage in the white squaw, for he obeyed, and took his bear outside the cabin. When he had completed skinning it, he returned with a choice portion of the flesh, which he presented to Mrs. McCracken as a conciliatory offering.

Abundant game was found in early days. Bear, deer and foxes were exceedingly common. Wild turkey swarmed, and smaller animals fairly flocked together in herds. Otters were also seen. Many anecdotes are told by the older citizens concerning the antics of their boyish days when they delighted to join in the chase, and roam through the forest in search of game.

J. H. Brown

It might be remarked that in view of the numerous signs which stare at one on every side as he passes through the country, each bearing the significant warning, "No trespassing on these grounds, under penalty of fine and imprisonment," the ways of the past in respect to hunting, at least, are by no means the ways of the present.

Industries.—No one will dispute the influence which the early mills exerted upon the communities in which they were located. They were essential to their development. The first establishment of this sort in Sandy Creek Township was the old saw-mill erected by William Byers on the bank of a little run within the present limits of Sheakleyville. When built, in 1802, it was considered quite a novelty. The concern passed into the hands of John Sheakley in 1804, and in 1822 was taken down. The first grist-mill, owned by a man named McCartney, was built in 1806 on this same run, about a half mile east of the town. The apparatus consisted of two hard stones, run by water-power. The mill met with considerable patronage, but lived only a short time. In 1807 Lincoln Axtell erected the mill located on the Ross place in New Vernon Township. A man named John Holloway was its purchaser when Axtell retired from the proprietorship. David Condit erected a saw-mill in the same region in 1811. A steam mill took its place. John Sheakley, Sr., built a grist-mill in Georgetown (now Sheakleyville) in 1815. In 1824 a saw-mill was erected by George Y. Streight, in the south-eastern part of Deer Creek Township. This was twice burned and as many times rebuilt, but finally succumbed to inanition. In 1830 a grist-mill was built a short distance above it. It had a large overshot wheel, twenty-four feet in diameter, which operated two sets of millstones—a marvel of mechanical ingenuity at the time. An old mill, presumably a saw-mill, was built in 1842 in Perry Township upon the Long farm. The only fulling-mill in the region was the one built in 1803 by Benoni Tuttle near the Axtell grist-mill. Tuttle sold it to John Robinson, who in turn disposed it to oblivion, the business becoming unprofitable.

Next to the mills, the distilleries of the early times were probably the most important branch of industrial enterprise. Of these there were several in Sandy Creek Township, each one of which turned out, in its day, a liberal supply of the genuine "bug-juice." The first one was built by Hugh Richardson in 1801, and stood on his own land. Several were afterward begun on the tract known as the "Narrow Vacancy," a name conferred to a strip of land which lay between the claims of the early land speculators, and which was, therefore, open to general settlement. Aaron Ross became the proprietor of one in 1809. It was located in Deer Creek Township. James Montgomery was the champion distiller in the present township of New Vernon, he having built one there in 1828. George Sheakley erected a similar institution in Sheakleyville in 1817. All these sold the fluid at what would be considered now as phenomenally low rates. Sheakley, for example, retailed the product of his still at from twenty to thirty cents per gallon.

There were one or two tanneries in the township at one time. In 1818 Joseph Culbertson built one in Georgetown, and in 1828 Daniel Axtell erected a similar concern in New Vernon Township. The business, however, was never profitable, and both the enterprises became defunct long ago.

SANDY LAKE TOWNSHIP.

The territory which is known under the above name was at first a part of Sandy Creek Township. A division was affected in 1805 when Sandy Lake was erected. The surface of the township thus erected is broken. There is a stretch of country lying just near the lake which is level and low. But at other points one can see a marked difference. Hills spring up, forming sharply marked valleys. Indeed, there is apparent to the traveler a wide diversity. The soil is a rich, sandy loam, which is particularly fertile, and on account of the ease with which it is worked, well adapted to the purposes of agriculture. There is considerable underground wealth, vast measures of coal underlying the township's surface in numerous places. This coal is of a good quality, and for ordinary uses is generally satisfactory. The drainage of the township is excellent. Big Sandy Creek flows through the entire territory, while Sandy Lake, lying inland, is a vast reservoir for the collection of surplus water-fall. These, with the smaller streams that pierce the territory through and through, are what makes the drainage system. Like most of the northeastern townships, Sandy Lake yet retains a large quantity of its early timber. At one time the forests of this region equaled those of any other portion of the State. Even now there are patches of forest land which will compare favorably with any others found in the county.

Ante-dating the whites in possession of the territory of which we speak, was a race of Indians, who, for a period of time which cannot be measured, trod their paths through the woodlands, and pursued their own occupations, whether of hunting, fishing or inter-tribal fighting, undisturbed by any save themselves. How long and in what numbers they lived this free and happy life no one can tell. The memorials of antiquity give no answer. Primeval chronicles, traced by the fingers of patient industry on the tablets of rough rock and hard flint, or fashioned out of the plastic clay, reveal naught but the skill by which they were constructed. Whether or not any premonitions of their coming extermination ever crossed the minds of these early residents, cannot be told. But by the time the first white settlers had pushed their way into the territory now comprising Sandy Lake and adjoining townships, the Indians had learned by the severe lesson of experience what their fate was to be. Their spirit had already been broken. The repeated defeats which they had sustained at the hands of the soldiers of Wayne and others sent against them had quelled their ferocity, and they were subdued into submissiveness. The Mercer County Indians were a remnant of the old Seneca nation, and went under the title of the Corn-planter tribe. The name Corn-planter was derived from a distinguished chief whose name was the same. Corn-planter, according to all accounts, was a peaceable chieftain who invariably counseled moderation among his followers. He was much different from the commonly understood savage leader. There was no element of vindictiveness in his nature, and little of the revengeful spirit. He was at all times friendly to the whites, calm in his demeanor, even when sustaining injury, and in nearly every respect the direct reverse of the generally accepted idea which clothes all Indian chieftains. The Indians had a village at the margin of what is known as the Pine Swamp. Various remains, such as spearheads, tomahawks, stone skinning-knives, shears and other paraphernalia of the chase have since been picked up in the region. The village was not a large one.

There were three methods by which the general settler could acquire land. One of these was by direct purchase, another by taking out what was called a settler's claim, the provisions of which were that a price of $20 per 100 acres should be paid to the commonwealth, or a two-years' residence on the claim desired to be taken out, with a clearing of at least two acres in every hundred; while the third method, probably not a de jure one, was that of simple squatter occupation. To the soldiers of the Revolution there were open donation lands. The second method was the one most used, although the third, that of squatters and intruders, was by no means left unemployed.

The long litigation, with its vexatious and costly delays necessary to secure an ejectment, often made the latter plan a safe and efficacious one.

Pioneers.—It is to the credit of Sandy Lake Township that its first settler, Patrick McCloskey, resorted to no dishonorable expedient to secure his land, but adopted the method of securing a settler's right. The date of his entrance is variously estimated at 1796, 1797 and 1798, but from the best evidence it appears to have been 1796 or 1797. He was an Irishman, as the name indicates, and one of the founders of All Saints Catholic Church in Jefferson Township. He settled upon the farm afterward known as the Tuttle place. After his arrival he faithfully began a clearing, in accordance with the provisions of the act which enabled him to secure his title, and in a brief time he had erected a cabin, and set out a very respectable orchard. McCloskey took an active part in the early official business of the township. In the course of a few years, as other arrivals became common, McCloskey decided to sell some of his land. He accordingly disposed of 150 acres to Jared Tuttle in 1812, the consideration being, it is said, $3.50 per acre.

The year 1800 witnessed the arrival of three or four others. Probably the first of these was William Egbert, an old Revolutionary veteran, who entered the township and took up land upon which his descendants still reside. He was of a practical turn of mind, and after the land he had located upon ceased to demand his unremitting attention, he signalized his practicality by opening the first blacksmith shop in the entire community. Contemporary with Egbert was Adam Hill, who secured the right to a tract of land located a short distance south of the borough of Sandy Lake. This he cleared and settled upon. After remaining in his possession many years it is now owned by the Mercer Iron and Coal Company. In the eastern part of the township Robert Fowler entered during the same year, and cleared a tract afterward owned by Hugh Baird. He, too, settled upon his land, and remained a number of years. The farm known in recent times as the Butcher place was settled in the year mentioned by Enos Sanford, a York State Yankee, who, with the ingenuity for which this race is distinguished, had no sooner become comfortably located upon his claim than he began the erection of a saw-mill, the first in the township. It was a water-power concern, as they all were in those days, and the sawing was done by a plain upright saw.

Alexander Brown, a native of Cumberland County, Penn., came to Mercer County about 1800, settling at the "falls" of Big Sandy Creek, in what is now Sandy Lake Township, where he built the second mill in the township. He soon removed to Mercer to educate his children, and being a surveyor assisted in the survey of a portion of the county. For a time he engaged in mercantile business with Bevan Pearson. He is said to have been one of the earliest men to engage in wool carding in this part of the State. He reared a large family, and has descendants still living in the county. His death occurred in 1839.

Three years now elapsed, during which time no trace of any important entrance has been discovered. But in 1804 the Giebner farm was entered upon and occupied by Charles A. Giebner, who, with his wife and seven children, came from Westmoreland County. Their journey was conducted on horseback, the children being placed in sacks, one in each end, which were then thrown across the horses' backs. The old fashioned pack saddles were then in vogue, and were used to their fullest capacity in conveying the goods and provisions of the family. In the same year came Allen Dunn, since prominent in church and political circles of the county. He located a short distance north of the borough of Sandy Lake, where he cleared a tract of land and prepared it for human habitation. Others entered in the years that followed, of whom some of the most prominent only will be noticed. One of the purchasers from McCloskey was Levi Higbee, who came to the township with his wife and son in February, 1817. His land comprised 250 acres, of which about six acres were in fair cultivation. A cabin was also standing on the place. Contemporary with Higbee were Jason Barker and Samuel Buckley, who secured pleasantly situated farms, and devoted the remaining years of their lives to cultivating them.

In 1823 a clearing was made by William North, on the farm purchased in 1828 by Francis Mears, an Englishman from Staffordshire. When the latter occupied the place he erected a cabin, and was forced to clear the land a second time, vast patches of underbrush having grown up since North had finished his labors.

One of the latest, but by no means one of the least important arrivals was that of Job Perrine, who entered the township in 1832, locating on the farm which he occupied for so many years. The Perrines had come to the county as early as 1800, and settled in Worth Township. In the year following Job's advent, his three brothers, William, Lewis and Harrison, followed in his course, and likewise occupied land in the immediate vicinity. In a year or two later W. H. Perrine followed, while in 1847 O. P. Perrine located at what was called Yankeetown.

Of the industrial history of the township little need be said. The community has nearly all been devoted to agricultural pursuits. The occasional attempts made in other directions have been rather spasmodic, and not regular and evenly carried out. Spasmodic efforts in an industrial sense seldom accomplish anything, as has been proven in the present instance. Mention has been made of the Sanford mill. This was the first enterprise of the kind ever attempted in the township. In 1830 it was succeeded by a second saw-mill, similar, indeed, to the first, but larger and better equipped. It was run by an overshot wheel over twenty-four feet in diameter. The wheel had the cob-gearing arrangement, which marked its improvement over the former one. The wollen mill, which is located near by, was erected in 1823 by Joel Sanford. About five years later it passed into the possession of T. C. Sanford, a brother of the previous proprietor, who enlarged it and continued its operation for a number of years. Thomas Butcher purchased the entire plant in 1872. Besides these, there are one or two additional saw and shingle-mills, and also other small manufacturing establishments, of comparatively recent date, which have little interest attaching to them.

The Old Rocky Spring Church of the Associate Presbyterian (or Seceder) denomination, is an object of local interest. It was located by the side of the public road from Sandy Lake to New Lebanon, a mile north of the former town, in a beautiful grove, near a large spring of excellent soft water. When the congregation was first organized is not recorded, or exactly known. The old "Session Book" records the minutes back to July 21, 1811. Then a meeting of session was held at which Rev. John Walker, father-in-law of Rev. George C. Vincent, D. D., of Latrobe, Penn., was moderator. Rev. Walker was the first pastor. He preached to this people till some time in 1813, when he resigned. At a communion held in the church, September 14, 1811, the session was composed of the following members: Moderator, Rev. J. Walker; ruling elders, John Hamilton, William Patterson, John Montgomery, William Braden, John Todd, John Barnes, Allen Dunn, Thomas McBride, James Braden, David Nelson and Joseph Work. The congregation then extended over a large portion of "the region round about" now occupied by other congregations of a like religious faith. Elder Allen Dunn was afterward sheriff of Mercer County, and filled other important local offices. His son, Francis Dunn, was for a long time an elder in the church and clerk of its session, and his grandson, Rev. William C. Dunn, son of Francis Dunn, has for many years been the successful pastor of the large United Presbyterian congregation of Scroggsfield, Ohio. At the communion held at Rocky Springs September, 14, 1811, twenty-two new members were added to the congregation, mostly heads of households. It was without a pastor from 1813 for thirteen years, or to 1826, though supplied with preaching part of the time. At the latter date Rev. I. Beggs, a man of much ability and "mighty in the scriptures" became pastor. How long he occupied this position is not recorded. Rev. Edward Small was installed pastor in 1839, who preached part of his time at Springfield and Mineral Ridge, Mercer County. He was distinguished for his zeal in the temperance and anti slavery controversies which then were occupying much attention. Rev. Small continued a faithful pastor for twenty-two years, or till April 3, 1861, when he resigned his charge, consisting then of the Rocky Spring and Springfield congregations.

At the consummation of the union between the Associate Presbyterian and Associate Reformed Presbyterian Churches, in Pittsburgh, May 26, 1858, forming the United Presbyterian Church, Rocky Spring congregation went unanimously into the new organization, what before was known as the Rocky Spring Associate, thus becoming the United Presbyterian Church of Sandy Lake. Rev. Small continued to live in Mercer, where he had his home during his long and useful ministry, till his death in January, 1888. His successor, Rev. John A. Bailey, now pastor of the United Presbyterian Church of Sharon, Penn., was installed pastor of Rocky Spring or Sandy Lake United Presbyterian Church in May, 1863. During that year quite a number withdrew from the church on account of its testimony against slavery. Rev. L. I. Crawford was installed pastor of the church at Sandy Lake, in connection with Utica and North Sandy, July 1, 1870. Under his ministry it numbered near 100 members. He resigned his pastorate August 12, 1879. Rev. J. C. Heron was called to the pastorate in 1884, and continues to preach half time to his old congregation, that since 1869 has had its place of worship in the village of Sandy Lake. In the summer of 1871 the old frame (40x50 feet) church, near the big spring and the old Rocky Spring graveyard, was sold and taken down. All the old members living at the time of organization are dead, but their influence for good is still widely felt in the community.

The present session consists of the following members: Moderator, Rev. J. C. Heron; ruling elders, Archibald McBride, Harvey Vogan, William Beggs and Samuel George. The present membership of the congregation, after a life of more than seventy-seven years, during which the congregations of New Vernon, Utica and North Sandy were organized within its old borders, is between fifty and sixty. A weekly prayer meeting and Sabbath-school are maintained, and the congregation enjoys the preaching of the gospel each alternate Sunday.

In another chapter will be found a list of the officers of the township, from its organization down to 1831. It will include many names familiar to the people to-day, by reason of the fact that the descendants of the early office holders have in many instances themselves succeeded to the emoluments and honors of public service.

SHENANGO TOWNSHIP.

The territory comprised under the above title was erected into a township in 1805. It has been subsequently diminished but once, by the formation out of it on the north of Hickory Township, in 1833. The surface is rolling. Undulations of dark green grass land, like veritable billows of emerald, greet the eye as it glances over the territory in question, and extend away into the distance, fading from view with each successive wave, until all is dim and blurred. The soil is particularly fertile. Indeed, of all the townships in the county, Shenango, by reason of her rich soil and beautiful, placid landscape, is entitled to precedence. There is scarcely a square foot of it which is not finely adapted to agricultural uses. In full proportion to the extreme fertility of the upper layers of soil are the valuable treasures of coal which lie below. Here, as above, nature seems to have poured out her favors with a lavish hand. The coal measures are very numerous, and the coal which is taken therefrom is of a superior quality that renders it popular with both the domestic and outside trade. The drainage is unsurpassed, the historic Shenango flowing through the whole township, and with its tributaries furnishing ample means for the speedy transferral of surplus water-fall. The name "Shenango" was derived from the river, which, in turn, received its title from the Indians. The word means "Black Water," and the reference is explained by the statement that in early times, when the Indians were yet in the possession of all the territory now known as Mercer County, the forest trees on the margin of the stream shed their foliage in such abundance as to give the water a muddy tinge upon the decaying of the leaves.

Pioneers.—The first settlers were Samuel Byers and Andrew Wylie. In the spring of 1796 they left their old home at Morgantown, Va., to depart upon an expedition of exploration and discovery, so to speak, in the region lying in what was then generally known as "the northwest." Their purpose was two-fold. They were desirous of becoming familiar with the territory in question, being both of a roving disposition, and they also were in search of land upon which to establish newer and better homes. They took with them an ample equipment of agricultural and hunting implements, together with such other necessities as were absolutely indispensable to them while on their journey. They passed by way of the Monongahela, in a canoe. Before reaching Pittsburgh, however, they met with the misfortune of having their boat capsized, losing thereby, according to one account, everything but an ax. But they were of too determined a disposition to be deterred by an occurrence so slight, and leaving the settled regions far in their rear, they pushed forward toward the land upon which they were destined to eventually take up an abode. They followed the course of the Shenango River, and when they had arrived at a point distant about one mile from the present town of Pulaski, Byers determined to halt. He accordingly did so, erected a cabin, staked out a claim, blazed a few trees with the ax which had escaped from the accident on the Monongahela. After thus securing his property from seizure, he resolved to return for his family. He was seconded in this by Wylie, who had also taken up a claim in the manner described. During the same year he returned again to his Shenango Valley home, accompanied by his wife and six children. The following is a graphic and accurate account of their return as given by one of the family: "The entire journey was made by land; Mrs. Byers rode on horseback, with a feather-bed for a saddle, and with one child before and another behind her. Two of the next oldest children were carried upon another horse, with various household goods, while the father and two older sons walked, and drove several cows, a sow and seven pigs. Their progress was necessarily slow. Several young men from Virginia accompanied the family, among whom was Andrew Wylie, who had come out the spring before, and who subsequently settled in Shenango Township. On rising the next morning after their arrival, a large bear was observed in the top of a tree which shaded the cabin, which had evidently climbed thither for the purpose of reconnoitering, but whose philosophic meditations were brought to a melancholy end by a rifle ball, and the flesh of the monster furnished food for the family. Their cabin would be thought a curiosity at the present day, as it was built of round logs, after the usual manner of the times, and had a door of shaved clapboards, split from white oak logs and hung on wooden hinges. Provisions were raised during the first summer to sustain them through the winter, and, with some additions to their store, from the game which abounded, they were supplied until the harvest of 1797. Once or twice in 1796 Byers returned to Virginia, and brought back a supply of groceries and other articles of which they stood in need, and in 1798 six sheep were driven out, and from that date clothing was mainly manufactured at home. Bells were attached to them during the day, and they were watched by the younger boys while the older members of the family were clearing land, and at night they were enclosed in a log pen ten feet high, to protect them from the wolves, which prowled near the rude dwellings." Great difficulty was had with bears, which were then exceedingly numerous. Byers had a fine breed of hogs, and these animals were in constant danger of destruction by the carnivorous bruins. It became necessary to keep a constant guard over them. Upon one occasion, a large sow and her six shoats escaped and wandered too far from the pen. They were set upon by bears, and on the following day, the remains of four of the venturesome porkers were found partly eaten in the adjacent woodland. Byers, however, managed to overcome these difficulties of a pioneer life. He was assisted by several hunters who entered the region soon afterward, and began the work of extermination. In a few years the larger game had all disappeared, and only the smaller sort remained.

The Canons were early settlers. Thomas Canon came into the township as early as 1796 or 1797, locating near the present site of West Middlesex. A sketch of this family is given in the biographical department.

Two years after the Byers party had taken up their residence in the township they were joined by two other new comers. The first of these was William Bell, who came from the region round about Pittsburgh. He settled at length upon the tract afterward occupied by his son Samuel. The land he thus secured claim to had been previously issued in a warrant to Philemon Hunt, dated 18th of March, 1794. But Hunt never laid claim to the territory, and Bell became the legal owner by default of any one else arriving to dispute his title. The other new comer was William Clingan, who located on a 400-acre tract afterward occupied by the descendants of Dr. John Mitcheltree—the first practicing physician in the township, who subsequently became the possessor of Clingan's right. Upon this land Clingan built himself a cabin. It is said that he was too poor to afford a team, hence it was out of the question for him to build his dwelling out of large logs, such as were commonly used. He therefore cut a pile of small poles, which he carried on his back to the site of his proposed cabin, and constructed a fairly comfortable sheltering place.

In the list of early settlers mention should be made of Richard Van Fleet, a farmer and weaver, who settled in Shenango Township in 1798. He was born in New Jersey October 21, 1769, and was married August 1, 1801, to Sally Hogue, resulting in the birth of these children: Phebe, William, Eleanor, John, Hannah, Richard H., Sarah, Alexander, Jesse G., Rebecca, David and Eliza. Of these six are yet living, the youngest being about sixty-four. Van Fleet was one of the founders of Hopewell Church at New Bedford, organized in 1799.

George Walker, a native of Ireland, settled in 1798 on the farm where his grandchildren now live. He married Kate Walker, also a native of Ireland, who bore him ten children, all of whom are dead, the last survivor, Samuel, dying on the old homestead in the spring of 1888. Mr. Walker died about 1858, aged 92 years. James Dick, an Irishman, came from the Ligonier Valley in 1799, and settled in the southeast corner of the township.

James, John and Thomas Mitcheltree, natives of Ireland, located in the west part of Shenango Township early in the present century. All married and left descendants except John, who was a pioneer physician and merchant of the township, and died in 1852. The three brothers died in Shenango Township. Rev. Henry Fraser came with his family to Sharon in 1807, and in 1809 settled in Shenango Township, where his son Joel lives. He died in 1853.

Besides those named there were numerous other arrivals, who may justly lay claim to a place among the township's pioneers. Among these were Charles Caldwell, who came in 1803 from Huntingdon County; Robert Stewart, whose entrance dated in 1809; Matthew Porter, one of the first blacksmiths in the county; Nathan Wyatt, whose land lay near the borough of West Middlesex; John Anderson, John Clark, David Clark, William Edeburn, prominent in political circles afterward, and James Clark. James Gilkey was also an early settler, and his name is frequently mentioned on the county court records as an officer of Shenango Township.

There remains little to be said as to the industrial interests of the township. The chief occupation, as mentioned before, is agriculture. There are now no manufacturing establishments worthy of mention. The first grist-mill was erected on the bank of a little stream called Deer Creek, in the year 1804, by Daniel Ault, who came into the valley in 1800, and had been quite famous as a modern Nimrod previous to his embarking in the milling business. His apparatus consisted of two small rough stones, which were placed in motion by motor power, furnished by an undershot wheel. The first saw-mill was erected in 1818 by James Mayers, who was the first man to introduce domestic manufactured lumber into the community. Both these primitive enterprises served a valuable purpose in their time, and prepared the way in no small degree for the advancement both in industrial and educational circles which has since taken place.

In a list given elsewhere will be found the names of all the early officers of Shenango Township from its formation down to the year 1831. Among these will doubtless be recognized many prominent and worthy ones. The list gives some idea of who were considered of enough standing in the community to be intrusted with the discharge of public duties and invested with public emoluments and honors.

Churches.—Beulah Presbyterian Church was organized in the fall of 1839 in the dwelling house then owned and occupied by James White, by Rev. John Neil and under the auspices of the Associate Reformed Presbytery, and went into the United Presbyterian Church at the time of the union of the Associate and Associate Reformed Presbyterians in 1858. There were five original members: Mr. and Mrs. Carnahan, John Byers and wife and Mrs. McGuffey. The latter only survives and is the mother of the publishers of McGuffey's series of school books. The first elders were Messrs. Carnahan and Byers. A tent was erected in 1840, which served the purpose of a meeting house until 1841, when a building 64x42 feet was constructed, and which was supplanted by the present building in 1883, at a cost of $2,500. In 1860 some trouble arose from the desire of a part of the members to remove to West Middlesex, which ended in a division of the congregation. The portion concluding to worship in the old building applied to the Reformed Presbyterian synod for spiritual assistance from ministers of their denomination, and in 1862 were admitted into that body with which they have since remained. The following have been elders since the term of Elders Carnahan and Byers: James Oliver, David Allen, William Mitcheltree, James Crawford, John Donnelly, David Anderson, Hugh Bond, James Baird, S. T. Mitcheltree, William Long, A. McNair and George Allen, the last three being the present officials. Rev. Thomas Mehard, a brother of Rev. Dr. Mehard, of New Wilmington, was pastor, 1841-45; Rev. R. W. Oliver, 1846-53; Rev. John Armstrong, 1856, who went with the division of West Middlesex in 1860. From 1862 to 1879 the congregation was supplied by Revs. Robert McMillen, John Alford and others. In 1879 Rev. G. W. Brownell was called and is still pastor.

The United Brethren Church was organized in 1863, one-half mile east of the borough by Rev. S. Casterline. There were about sixty original members, among whom were J. Eaton, J. Cantior, J. A. Stewart, J. Hutchison, George Fry, A. C. Wise, Thomas Stewart, William Stewart, Anne Gettes, James McFarland and John McFarland. The house of worship, a frame structure 35x40 feet in dimensions, situated at the summit of a fine elevation on the Middlesex and Mercer road, was erected in 1865, at a cost of $1,500, and is a very convenient and commodious edifice. There is connected with the church property a burying ground. The congregation, while at one time quite large, has been reduced in membership by death, removals and disaffection until at the present time it numbers but twelve members. The successive pastors have been: Rev. S. Casterline, three years; Revs. H. F. Day, D. Traver, S. M. Smith, J. Excell, A. Williams and S. Casterline, one year each, in the order named; O. D. Cone, two years; R. Smith, D. Landan and J. W. Clark, one each; O. J. Gage, two years; H. Bedow and J. Andrews, one each; A. C. Wise, two years, and G. C. Dilley, W. Robinson and W. R. Allen, one each. The church is at present without a regular pastor.

SPRINGFIELD TOWNSHIP.

This township was formed in 1805. It has been diminished but once, by the erection out of it of Findley Township, which took place August 17, 1849. It forms one of the southern tier of townships which lie adjacent to the Lawrence County line. It is bounded on the north by Findley, on the east by Pine and Liberty, and on the west by Wilmington and East Lackawannock Townships. In the eastern portion the surface is what is described by the word billowy, the land rising and falling in gentle undulations, which give a decided picturesque quality to the scenery. Along the Neshannock, however, the reverse is true. Sharply formed hills abruptly rise up in small barriers, leaving interstices that resemble miniature ravines. The landscape at these points has a rugged, wild appearance, softened here and there by occasional stretches of fertile bottom lands, through which wind in wiry course one or two small streams. In the intermediate territory, where the two characteristics become blended, there is a pleasant perspective of rich agricultural land, well cultivated and apparently well adapted to farming purposes. The drainage of the township is very ample. Neshannock Creek and two or three tributaries of Wolf Creek furnish the outlets for surface water. The health of the inhabitants is particularly good. The climate appears to be equal to any in the northwestern part of the State.

Pioneers.—It is believed that Benjamin Uber located in the township in 1796. If so, he was undoubtedly the first settler. It is known to a certainty that Robert Gilmer entered the northeastern part of the territory embraced in Springfield Township in April, 1797, and located upon a 500-acre tract of land, a portion of which, after many years of arduous struggles, he succeeded in clearing and preparing for cultivation. He erected a cabin and began his career as a pioneer with resolute fortitude.

The Denniston settlement was made in the southwest part of Springfield Township, at the closing of the last and the opening of the present century. There were five brothers, Andrew, James, William, George and Johnson, of one family; and three brothers, Andrew, Alexander and William, and four sisters of another. These sisters were married as follows: One to Thomas McCoy; one to James Denniston, a cousin; one to Andrew Ramsey, and the other to James Collins.

Andrew, the oldest in the first family mentioned, was one of the early commissioners of the county, and his son Andrew was a commissioner afterward when the railroad bonds were recalled.

Edward Denniston, of Liberty, descended from Alexander of the second family.

George, in a chopping frolic in 1816, cut his leg so severely that amputation was necessary. He was the father of James Denniston, who recently lived west of town, and the grandfather of Major Joseph F. and Lieut. William H. Denniston, the first of whom has been treasurer both of Allegheny County and of Pittsburgh, and the other manager of a bank in Pittsburgh. The Dennistons came from Washington County. In traveling through the glades of Butler County, the wolves were so threatening in the night (for they camped out) that they sought safety in building a number of fires round their encampment. Even then Alexander succeeded in killing one that came near enough to show the reflection of his eyes. This wolf is said to have measured eight feet from the tip of his nose to the end of his tail.

A step-daughter of Michael Brown, who settled south of the Dennistons, named Nancy Quillen, who afterward married George Denniston, was looking for the cows in a snow-storm when she found that the snow had so filled up her tracks that she could not find her way back. She called for her father, but could get no response. Presently a large Indian came to her, who told her that he knew her father and that he would take her home. He fulfilled his promise, gallantly removing the snow from the logs she had to cross. When home was reached, the young girl filled a basket with turnips, and presented it to him. A day or so afterward he presented her father with a venison saddle; and the result was that as long as that Indian stayed about, reciprocal favors were passing between him and the family of Mr. Brown.

James and Betty Orr, natives of Ireland, migrated to Westmoreland County in 1795, and in 1797 came to Mercer County, settling the farm now owned by their great-grandson, William Orr, in Springfield Township, where both died. They left two children, William and Jane; the former served in the War of 1812, and left a numerous family.

Among the others who arrived during the years immediately following, were Daniel Rice, Arthur McCann, Robert and Thomas Simpson, each of whom entered the vicinity some time near 1800, and took up settlers' claims, and James Rice, who came in 1802, and located on a tract of land situated just a short distance southeast of the village of Leesburg, on which William Rice afterward resided. It is claimed that on this place Rice erected the first hewed log house ever built in the township. It was an important edifice in popular estimation at the time, and was visited by several curious observers, who came to admire this new evidence of architectural skill.

One of the most important families that entered the region of Springfield Township during pioneer times was the Black family, which deserves mention. The account which follows corresponds with data in the Garvin collection: "The first member of the Black family who came to the neighborhood was Adam Black, who was born in Adams County, Penn., 31st of January, 1763, and, after removing, in 1803, to Washington County, where he lived one year, he came to Springfield Township, Mercer County, in 1804, and settled with his family upon a 200-acre tract of donation land, afterward purchasing a second tract of the same size, just north of where London Post-office now stands, and a third tract, also 200 acres, where the village of Blacktown, or Balm Post-office is now located. Adam Black died in 1816. Polly Allegan, his wife, was born in Adams County in 1769, and died in Mercer County in 1841. They were married in 1787, and raised a family of nine children, eight of them coming with their parents to Mercer County, the youngest, Peggy, being born in the county in 1805. The oldest child, Betsy, married John Chambers, of Mercer County, in 1805. The Chambers were early settlers. The second child, Henry, served as a captain under Gen. Harrison, and was also one of Harrison's presidential electors from his district in Pennsylvania. Joseph Black was also in Harrison's army, and Alexander Black was out twice to Erie as a volunteer. Adam Black belonged to the Mercer Blues, and held the office of justice of the peace for one term, while his brother, Alexander, had the office two terms. Robert Black was a captain of infantry, and afterward a member of the Legislature. He died at Harrisburg, Penn., while acting in the latter capacity. Maria Black, born in 1802, was married to Major Harris, now deceased, who was a member of the Legislature from Butler County, and whose father was the founder of the town of Harrisville in that county. Adam Black owned at one time 700 or 800 acres in the neighborhood of the place where he settled. The farm lately owned by David Gilson is the old homestead."

Among the other prominent pioneers was Abraham Uber, who purchased a farm at a very early day of Andrew Denniston, the consideration being a rifle and a cow. The tract where Uber settled had been previously secured by Denniston, but had not been materially cleared. It was located not a great distance from London village. Charles Painter was another early incomer, he arriving in the year 1806. There were several who came in later than this. In 1810 David Leyde, from Washington County, entered and settled upon a farm which had been partially cleared by some itinerant squatter. A log cabin was standing on the place. This Leyde at once occupied. John Carr was another late arrival, coming about 1813. There were unquestionably many others who entered the township in ample time to go through the experiences, the hardships, perils and pleasures of pioneer life. They doubtless enjoyed the freedom and want of affectation which characterized their mode of living, and they were probably actuated, as were their associates who entered earlier, by the same fortitude and courageous persistence that stamped themselves on the characters of nearly all pioneers.

Villages.—There are three important villages in the township. The first, Leesburg, is a pleasant little hamlet situated in the southwestern part. The first house in it was built in 1828 by James Palmer. The same man, assisted by his brother John, opened the first store in the place, a general country one, which contained for sale nearly every article that could be thought of. The original hotel was kept by David Bower, and had a whiskey attachment in the form of a bar. There was a blacksmith shop opened at an early day by Joseph Harbaugh, who was the pioneer of that craft in the village. At one time a blasting furnace was conducted near the town. It stood at the falls. Ore was very scarce, however, and after producing a few pigs of iron, it succumbed to the stagnation of trade.

London, a post-office once called New London, is situated in the extreme eastern part of the township. It is situated on land formerly owned by Adam Black. The first residence was erected in 1830 by Peter Uber. His brother Simon was the first blacksmith in the village. Alexander Riddle has the honor of establishing the first mercantile enterprise in the village.

The London Creamery occupies a building which was erected in 1885 by W. A. Coulter, W. C. Davis and G. C. McCracken. It is 20x35, and is said to have been the first of the kind in Northwestern Pennsylvania. Its capacity is 1,200 pounds per day. The business, confined wholly to the making of butter, is operated about nine months each year.

The London post-office was named by David Gilson, who was the first postmaster. The village was named after the post-office. For dates see list of postmasters in chapter on Internal Affairs.

The London W. C. T. U. was organized August 26, 1887, by Miss Sarah Pew, of Mercer, with twenty-seven members. It now has forty. It meets in the school-house the first Saturday of every month. Its corps of officers embraces the following ladies: President, Mrs. A. M. Carlon; vice-presidents, Miss D. Christy, Mrs. L. J. Black and Miss Mina McCoy; recording secretary, Miss L. Hindman; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Mattie E. McCoy. The Union is said to be in good working condition.

The third village, Balm Post-office, or Blacktown as it is more familiarly known, was first populated by Henry Black, who erected a log dwelling and prepared to greet all new-comers. His brother Alexander shortly afterward followed. In 1845 James S. Black opened a small grocery. He was succeeded in this enterprise by William Gilmore, Black & Stewart, Black & Painter, and Alfred Painter, who is now the sole owner. In 1848 Christian Snyder opened the first hotel. Others have since acted as hosts, among them Adam Ketler, Henry Van Horn and James Stevenson. The school system dates its origin back to 1847, when the first educational institution was opened, the building being a small frame. In a list given elsewhere will be found the names of the officers of Springfield Township who held public trust up to 1831. Many familiar ones will be found among the number. The list illustrates who were in the early days sufficiently well versed in the dubious ways of politics to obtain preferment, and who, of those not distinctive politicians, were thought worthy of public honor by their fellow citizens. A list of postmasters is also given, as is a list of early tavern keepers.

Churches.—The history of Nazareth Methodist Episcopal Church would be incomplete without mention of James Burns, one of the pioneer Methodists of Northwestern Pennsylvania. He was born in Florence Court, near Inniskillin, Ireland, in 1778. His father was a native of Scotland, and his mother of England. About 1794 or '95 he immigrated to America, and settled in Carlisle, Cumberland Co., Penn. The faith in which he had been reared was the Episcopal, but in Carlisle he connected himself with the Methodist Episcopal Church, in whose membership he ever after lived. After remaining a few years at Carlisle he removed to Brownsville, Fayette Co., Penn. In 1810 he was married to Mary Morrow, near Bentleyville, Washington County, at which place he purchased a farm. Remaining upon it but two years, he removed in the spring of 1812 to Slippery Rock Township, Mercer County, now Plain Grove Township, Lawrence County, and settled on the farm on which he died in 1864. There being no Methodist preaching in reach, Mr.

Burns supported and attended the Presbyterian Church at Plain Grove until 1818, when he withdrew from that congregation and, in connection with James McKean, William M. Stephenson and others, formed a class in Mercer. Occasional visits were made to his home, however, by itinerant preachers, and each time service and preaching were held. These services were in reality the inception of the present Nazareth Church, although no permanent organization was effected until 1823. Previous to this, however, Mr. Burns was visited by James Watts, Shadrach Rwalk, D. D. Davidson, Samuel Adams, Philip Green, R. C. Hatton, James McMahan, Ezra Booth and others, in their passing to and from their appointments in the Shenango Circuit, as this region was then termed. In an old record appear the following names, constituting the members of Burns' class, which place the date of organization about the fall of 1822: Charles Elliot, P. E., and Henry Knapp, circuit preacher, of Mercer Circuit; James Burns, Mary Burns, Michael Brown, Jane Brown, Sarah Gardner, James Palmer, leader; Isabella Palmer, Anne Nelson, Edward Hanna, Sarah Daniels and John Green. In the following year the Burns class was made a regular appointment, and met in the Burns house until 1840, when, as a more central location, meetings were held in a school-house, near the present location of the Nazareth Church. The class, though, being quite large, was divided several times for prayer meeting and class meeting purposes, one of which divisions met in the house of Henry Guist, of Leesburg. The appointment belonged until 1831 to the Butler Circuit of the Erie District of the Pittsburg Conference, but the Meadville District being formed in that year, and embracing the territory in which this appointment lay, it became a part of the Centreville Circuit. The class having grown quite large, and inconvenience being experienced in holding revival meetings, it was decided to erect a house of worship, which should be as near as possible to the center of membership. The site now occupied was at length selected, Mr. Washington P. Sedwick donating an acre of ground, and the work of building commenced. The location was in a dense tract of timber, through which no roads but blazed paths passed. In the spring of 1840 the members worked steadily, hewing logs and preparing everything for the purpose, and in March the "raising" occurred, and the first Methodist Church building for miles about was erected. It was not dedicated until December, 1843, when services were held by Revs. William Carroll and I. Mershon, who gave the new church the title "Nazareth." The first quarterly meeting held in the new structure took place 10th of September, 1848, and was presided over by B. O. Plympton, P. E. of the Meadville District. In 1859, the congregation having grown too large for its accomodation, a new building was erected, the present one standing just in front of where the old log one stood. The south wing of the class at this time withdrew, and built the Mount Pleasant Church, in Plain Grove, Lawrence County, about three miles south of the Nazareth Church.

The Nazareth Church possesses an interesting history. In early times, when services were held in the Burns house, itinerant revivalists were accustomed to hold prolonged exercises, two of whom, Revs. Thomas Thompson and John Somerville, in June, 1832, continued a meeting for two days. On the 8th of May, 1834, took place a debate which was famous at its occurrence for the depth of theological learning it displayed. The disputants were Rev. John Munson, of Presbyterian belief, and Rev. Alfred Brunson, presiding elder of the Meadville district of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and the question at issue was: "Is the Doctrine of Predestination, Election and Reprobation, as held in the Confession of Faith in the Presbyterian Church, Scriptural or not?" The discussion was held in the Plain Grove Church, and upward of 2,000 people assembled to hear it. As usual, each claimed the victory, and departed considerably firmer in his belief than before. Following is a list of the preachers who have ministered to the congregation since the organization of the class in 1823: 1824, Revs. Charles Thorn and Job Wilson; 1825, Rev. Job Wilson; 1826, Rev. John Chandler; 1827, Revs. J. W. Hill, L. D. Proser; 1828, Revs. J. P. Kent, J. Babcock; 1829, Revs. J. Somerville, A. McCamon, William Leeper; 1830, Revs. Isaac Winans, William Butt, John J. Steadman, supplied; 1831, Revs. Thomas Thompson, J. Somerville; 1832, Revs. John Scott, John Robinson; 1833, Revs. D. Richey, S. H. Ingraham; 1834, Revs. William Carroll, J. W. Davis, supplied; 1835, Revs. J. W. Davis, Ahab Keller; 1836, Revs. R. Peck, W. B. Lloyd; 1837, Revs. Charles C. Best, H. Hitchcock; 1838, Revs. J. A. Hallack, Isaac Schofield; 1839, Revs. Rufus Parker, D. W. Vorse; 1840, Revs. Rufus Parker, J. P. Blenn; 1841, Rev. J. P. Blenn; 1842, Revs. Joseph Leslie, E. B. Lane; 1843-44, Rev. I. Mershon; 1845, Revs. George F. Reeser, J. Wigglesworth; 1846, Revs. A. Himebaugh, William M. Bear; 1847-48, Rev. Thomas Benn; 1849, Revs. George Stocking, D. B. Himebaugh, supplied; 1850, Revs. R. Norton, W. P. Bignell, supplied; 1851, Revs. J. W. Wilson, J. McComb, supplied; 1852, Revs. J. W. Wilson, J. S. Lytle; 1853, Rev. J. S. Lytle; 1854, Rev. I. Schofield; 1855, Revs. I. Schofield, F. Vernon; 1856, Rev. T. G. McCreary; 1857, Revs. J. T. Boyle, S. K. Paden; 1858, Rev. R. B. Boyd; 1859, Rev. W. R. Johnston; 1860, Rev. S. A. Milroy; 1861-62, Rev. John Abbott; 1863-64, Rev. B. Marsteller; 1865-66-67, Rev. R. Beatty; 1868, Rev. J. M. Groves; 1869-70, Rev. E. Bennett; 1871-72, Rev. Nathaniel Morris; 1873-74, Rev. J. L. Stratton; 1875-76-77, Rev. J. M. Crouch; 1878-79, Rev. J. M. Foster; 1880-81, Rev. N. Morris; 1882, Rev. W. S. Shepard; 1883, Rev. S. E. Winger; 1884-85, Rev. John Eckels; 1886-87, Rev. R. M. Bear. The following are a few of the class leaders: 1823, James Palmer; 1826, Daniel Williams; 1828, N. D. Hall; 1829, William Albin; 1834, W. P. Sedwick; 1836, J. Ray; and since, H. Guist, Alexander Leslie, W. H. Morrow, James Guist, Jacob Winger. The present stewards, who have been in office for many years, are Mark Campbell and Jacob Baker.

The Presbyterian Church of Leesburg was the first church organized at the village, that event taking place in 1853, with thirteen members, all of whom are dead. The first elders were Robert Stevenson and William Rice. Rev. David Waggoner served the congregation as a supply for three or four years. In fact, the organization had no ministers except supplies until 1864, when its first pastor, Rev. S. A. Hughes, was called, and he divided his time between this and a church at Rich Hill, Lawrence County. He resigned his pastorate of the Leesburg congregation in 1866, and was followed by Rev. A. W. Boyd in 1867, and he by Rev. Cooper in 1869. In 1877 the present pastor, Rev. R. M. Davis, was called, ordained and installed. Rev. A. W. Boyd is the only one of the pastors, who has served this church, who is dead. The following have been ruling elders since the terms of Rice and Stevenson: J. M. Orr, Osben Grandy, Samuel Drake, B. F. Gordon, W. A. Munnell and G. S. Elliott. Of these Grandy and Elliott are dead, as also Rice and Stevenson. The present membership is 225, and the church is in a prosperous condition.

The United Presbyterian congregation was organized in Leesburg in 1859, the session being composed of John Van Eman, Enoch Clark, Thomas Palmer and George Huttenbaugh. There were forty-two original members, some of whom afterward left the congregation. Robert Egleson, H. B. Munnell and Michael Huttenbaugh were elected members of the session. During this term some left the bounds of the church and others died. A. S. Black, John Egle-son and D. M. Edeburn composed the next session, and Enoch Clark, A. S. Black, John Egleson and G. W. Palmer constitute the present session. The congregation had no regular pastor before 1874, the pulpit being occupied by supplies. J. L. Robertson became pastor in 1874, and in 1877 Rev. J. C. Bigham, the present pastor, was installed, and administers to the spiritual wants of the 100 members composing this congregation.

SUGAR GROVE TOWNSHIP.

On the 11th of March, 1856, petitions were handed in at court from citizens of Salem and Greene Townships, praying that a new township be erected out of parts of the two mentioned, the reason for the desired change being to secure more convenient places of voting, and to facilitate the collection of taxes. Agreeable to the prayer, John Cairns, James F. Brown and David Findley were appointed commissioners to fix the boundaries. They reported a series of bounds, and accompanied these with a statement to the effect that the plan was a feasible one. Therefore, on the 22d of November, 1856, the court confirmed their report, and directed elections to be held in the new subdivision for township officers. The name "Sugar Grove" was derived from the presence of a small clump of maple trees standing near Kennard. Sugar Grove Township forms one of the extreme northern tier of townships, which jut out to the Crawford County line. It is bounded on the east by Salem and a portion of Otter Creek, on the south by Hempfield, and on the west by Greene and a portion of West Salem. Its area is nearly twelve square miles. Its surface, like all its neighbor townships, is somewhat diversified. There are portions of it where the soil is quite low and even marsh-like. Then again the land becomes elevated and even hilly. The soil itself is quite fertile. Agriculture is the chief occupation of its inhabitants. The drainage is good. The system comprises, as the two principal streams, the Little Shenango, which crosses the township from east to west, and a tributary called Crooked Creek. In addition to these are numerous small branches, each of which traverses and drains a considerable portion of territory.

Pioneers.—The early settlement of Sugar Grove is necessarily interwoven with that of the townships from which it was formed. The reader is therefore directed for more minute particulars to the pages relating to them. William Lindsey, however, was the first settler in what is now Sugar Grove Township. In 1796 he took up a tract of 200 acres on the Little Shenango, and erected a 10x12 log cabin thereon. All the territory now embraced in Sugar Grove, Salem, Otter Creek and Hempfield was originally Salem Township, and the descendants of pioneers, in telling of the early settlers of this portion of Mercer County, usually speak of them as first settling in Salem. Lindsey sold his improvement to James Walker in the fall of 1797, who immediately took possession, and spent the remaining years of his life on that tract, dying February 20, 1834. Marvin Loomis, of Greenville, is the son-in-law of Walker. A daughter, Martha, was born to Mr. Walker April 27, 1798. She is believed to have been the first white child born in that part of the county.

To return to Lindsey; he married Agnes, a sister of Bishop Roberts, and after selling out to Walker he settled another tract farther up the Little Shenango. He was a brother-in-law of John McGranahan, the famous hunter of that region, who was accustomed to take a sled load of skins to Pittsburgh to sell them. One of Lindsey's sons, Lewis, born May 1, 1808, is still living near Leech's Corners. Lewis bought the old Bishop Roberts farm of 400 acres. It is now owned by his son-in-law, Henry D. Johnson.

in 1798 from Westmoreland County. He was a local Methodist preacher. His children were Cornelius, Catherine, Margaret, James T., John W., Abigail, Jane, Elizabeth and Hannah. Of these John W., Abigail, Jane and Hannah are still living.

One of the pioneers of Mercer County was John McGranahan, of Sugar Grove Township. He was born in Cumberland County, Penn., November 12, 1778, the son of John and Nellie (Smith) McGranahan. While a mere lad he removed from Cumberland to Westmoreland County, where he remained until 1798, when he came to the settlement in Sugar Grove. On the 12th of May, 1801, he was married to Nancy, sister of Bishop R. R. Roberts. These children were born to them: Eleanor, Sarah, Elizabeth R., David, George G., Jane L., Lewis N., Nancy A., Jesse M., Mary M., Sophia and Margaret. He was a successful farmer and a famous hunter. He was a captain in the War of 1812, and served in the defense of Erie. He held many township offices during his time; was always a Democrat and a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. He died September 2, 1868, full of years, and leaving a large number of descendants to carry on his work. His father, John McGranahan, settled further north, in Crawford County. He was a packer for the American army during the Revolution. He died in 1830. David McGranahan, the oldest living child (born November 24, 1808), resides near the old Roberts place. He married Abigail Riley, daughter of John Riley, who came also from Westmoreland County in 1798 and settled in the same region.

Jacob Hannell, also a Westmoreland County man, began clearing a tract of land in the eastern part of the township about 1798. Thomas Arnold entered in the same year, located in the southwestern part of the township, and after clearing a tract of land, erected a cabin and took up his residence. Along near the Salem line, where the Roberts family settled, Lewis Roberts came over into what is now a portion of Sugar Grove Township. His cabin was erected near what is now Kennard Station, and about it he cleared what afterward became an excellent farm. A bear story is related concerning this man, which is here given. He had been in the township for several years, when, one day, upon coming from Hannell's mill toward his home, a little dog, which followed him, spied a young bear endeavoring to creep away unnoticed among the bushes, and, running after it, chased it up a tree. Roberts, thinking that he might capture the animal, which was quite small, climbed the tree, when his horror can be easily imagined at seeing the parent brute appear and prepare to go up after him. But in this dilemma, when he was meditating upon the expediency of jumping to the ground, at the risk of breaking his neck, the little dog proved his friend, for as the bear approached the tree he attacked her upon the flanks, and obliged her to turn her attention in that direction. Several times she reared upon her hind feet and commenced climbing, and as often the cur bit her furiously, and compelled her to turn back. Meanwhile, his master had followed the cub to the end of one of the limbs, and, shaking it with all his strength, threw him to the ground, when both of the beasts left, and he was able to come down in safety.

The tract lying directly east of Arnold's was settled first at an early date, probably 1799, by one Jonathan Lodge, who had just built a cabin and was preparing to begin a clearing when winter set in, and he was forced to turn back to the settlements. In the following spring, when he returned to resume the labors he had left off the autumn before, he found a man named William Mortimer firmly intrenched in the cabin, and with a clearing well under way. When he requested Mortimer to relinquish his claim and yield possession, the latter refused to comply, alleging that, according to border law, the land had been vacated, and was, consequently, open to settlement at the time he (Mortimer) had arrived. No efforts Lodge could make had any effect upon the intruder, and at last the former had to give up in despair and seek a home in some other locality. This species of squatter sovereignty was very common in those days, when that truth of the old adage, "possession is nine points in law," was illustrated on every hand. The year 1800 witnessed the arrival of Thomas Jolly, who located just east of James Walker.

In 1802 Jolly was bought out, claim, cabin and improvements, by John Leech, of Somerset County, who removed to his new home with his family and took possession on the 4th of May, 1802. Leech was a prominent man in his time, being a justice of the peace, a State representative and a State senator, and a full biography of him will be found elsewhere. Of the others who settled about this time, a few only can be mentioned. Leech's eastern neighbor was a man named Gibbons, who came in shortly afterward. John Gildon and William Mahan arrived about 1805. North of Gildon settled Abram Smith, and east of him John Atchison. William McCurdy immigrated from Ireland about 1812, and located in Sugar Grove Township. He married Mary Listen, by whom he reared six children. He died in 1874, aged eighty-two, leaving many descendants to perpetuate his memory.

Industries.—The industrial history of the township is brief. The first enterprise of an industrial nature was a saw-mill, built in 1808 by Jacob Hannell, to which millstones were afterward attached and a grist-mill started. The location of this establishment was alongside of a little run near Kennard. Hannell was succeeded in the ownership by Philip Berrier. The business was a profitable one, as no competitor was within easy access. A fire, in which two of Hannell's sons perished, destroyed a portion of the structure. The second mill was established by Jacob Leech, near the hamlet of Leech's Corners. It was a saw-mill. In later years the movable steam mill superseded the old stationary water-power ones, and many of the latter are now in operation in the northern part of the county. In this connection might be mentioned the cheese factory, which was opened at Leech's Corners in 1873, by Breckenridge & Harper, in a small frame building, 40x50 feet in size. It served a good purpose, turning out at one time as many as eight cheeses per day.

Villages.—There are two villages in Sugar Grove, Leech's Corners and Kennard Station. The former was established as a post-office during the administration of Andrew Jackson. It was discontinued and then re-established. John Leech opened the first store in 1841.

Kennard is a station on the Erie Railroad. The first store in it was opened in 1854 by Pennock & McCardney. In the list of post-offices given elsewhere will be found the names of the various occupants of the two offices.

In the list of innkeepers, given on another page, will also be found the name of Cornelius Riley, who opened a tavern in the township many years ago. He was killed while on his way from home to Greenville.

Salem Methodist Church is one of the oldest, if not the oldest, Methodist congregation in Mercer County. It grew out of the Roberts settlement, made in 1796, 1797 and 1798, nearly all of whose members were Methodists. The original house of worship, built of logs, 25x40, stood near or on the site of the present house at Leech's Corners. Just when it was erected is not known with certainty. It must have been as early, however, as 1807, that being the date fixed by the most reliable authority. The house continued to be used until about 1823, when its place was taken by a frame structure, about 35x45, with gallery. This second building continued to be used until about the opening of the late war, when the third and present frame, 45x60, was built. So far as could be ascertained the original membership of this congregation embraced the following: Robert R. Roberts and wife, John Caughey and wife Hattie, William McLean and wife, William Lindsey and wife Agnes, John McGranahan and wife, William McGranahan and wife, Smith McGranahan and wife, John Riley and wife, Thomas Roberts and wife, John Leech and wife, John McFetridge and wife, Thomas McClelland and wife, James Stevenson and wife, Lewis Roberts and wife, John Rogers and wife, William Steward, Nancy Wilson, Thomas Dumars and wife, James Dumars and wife, Jacob Gurwell and wife, Thomas Jolly and wife, James Walker and wife, Morris Dunlavy and wife, William Gurwell and wife, John Waters and wife, Probson Gibbons and wife. It will be seen that this nucleus of Methodism in the northern part of the county furnished the names of men and women who achieved not only a creditable local reputation, but a world-wide fame. Families are numerous who rejoice in the fact that their ancestors were connected with the old Salem (place of peace) settlement.

The names of the early preachers cannot be given. Roberts, McClelland, Gurwell and others supplied the pulpit of the home congregation. For a long time R. R. Roberts (afterward better known as Bishop Roberts) was the leader of the class at Salem. The watchful care which this duty imposed prepared him gradually for the more extensive labors he was subsequently called upon to perform. For many years Salem belonged to the Shenango Circuit. Shenango finally lost its identity, and about 1834 Salem took its place in the Meadville District. The preachers since then have been: T. Stowe, A. G. Sturgess, 1834; E. B. Hill, R. Peck, 1835; A. Keller, C. C. Best, 1836; A. Keller, 1837; S. W. Ingraham, L. Burton, 1838; L. Rodgers, S. P. Hempstead, 1839; L. Rodgers, H. N. Stearns, 1840; J. Leslie, H. S. Winans, 1841; H. S. Winans, R. Parker, 1842; H. Luce, J. W. Davis, 1843; W. Patterson, H. D. Cole, 1844; J. Deming, W. Patterson, 1845; J. Crum, A. Callender, 1846-47; D. H. Jack, G. Stocking, 1848; J. McLean, H. M. Chamberlin, 1849; J. McLean, T. Benn, 1850; J. Leslie, B. F. Langdon, 1851; J. B. Orwig, J. Leslie, 1852; I. C. T. McClelland, J. W. Wilson, 1853; D. King, J. W. Wilson, 1854; W. French, R. Gray, 1855; W. French, S. L. Wilkinson, 1856; J. Abbott, A. Hight, 1857; J. Abbott, J. C. Sullivan, 1858; I. Scofield, A. H. Bowers, 1859; A. H. Bowers, 1860; J. W. Hill, 1861-62; W. H. Mossman, 1863-64; G. H. Brown, 1865-67; J. W. Blaisdell, 1868; S. L. Wilkinson, 1869; J. Abbott, 1870-71; J. A. Humes, 1872-74; J. L. Mecklin, 1875-76; A. R. Rich, 1877-79; J. F. Perry, 1880; J. M. Foster, 1881-83; S. E. Winger, 1884-86; F. R. Peters, 1887, present incumbent.

WEST SALEM TOWNSHIP.

This subdivision was formed in 1805, and contained, as first constituted, a large portion of Hempfield Township and all of Greene. It extends from Sugar Grove and Hempfield on the east, to the State line dividing Ohio and Pennsylvania on the west. On the north it adjoins Greene and Sugar Grove, while the southern boundary is Pymatuning. West Salem is one of the largest and richest agricultural townships in the county, and it has always been politically Democratic. The surface is quite diversified. Most of it is high and rolling, a small portion quite hilly and broken, and an occasional stretch of low, wet country intervenes. An abundance of fine timber covered the land when the pioneers began the clearing process, since which it has yielded to the woodsman's ax, and very little of the original forest remains to attest its former glory.

Extensive coal measures underlie a considerable portion of the township. The first coal used in Mercer County was taken from a ledge on the farm now owned by Peter Simpkins. It was discovered late in the eighteenth or early in the present century by prospectors from Trumbull County, Ohio, who were seeking it for blacksmithing uses. This farm has ever since annually yielded a large amount of good coal. Many coal banks have been operated in West Salem during the past fifty years, and thousands of tons have been mined and sold. At one time the principal operations of the Greenville Coal Company were confined to the strata lying a short distance west of that borough. The coal measures west of Greenville are still worked to a considerable extent, and a very fine grade of coal for domestic purposes turned out.

There are also considerable quantities of superior building stone quarried from the hill west of Greenville. Here we find the quarries of Charles Frey, Plimpton Leech and Amy & Brown, all of which turn out a splendid class of building and paving material. These features, combined with the rich agricultural interests, make West Salem second to none in the county.

Pioneers.—The early settlement of this township was contemporaneous with other portions of the county. It is claimed that John Walker, of the land firm of Lodge, Probst & Walker, was the first settler, and that he built his cabin on the farm afterward owned by Jacob Loutzenhiser, and subsequently by Jacob Hommer, in the spring of 1796. At least he was found living on that place by the first party of land prospectors from Westmoreland County, who visited the Shenango Valley the following autumn. Walker was a bachelor, and is said to have died in the township.

Thomas Brown and family located northwest of Walker in the fall of 1796. During the succeeding winter their small stock of provisions began to give out, and Brown concluded to go through the trackless forest to Pittsburgh, and obtain a new supply. The trip consumed more time than he anticipated, and his wife often related to subsequent settlers how closely the family approached starvation ere the return of her husband. The brave woman gathered the mosses from the forest trees and dug up the roots of wild herbs, which she cooked and fed to her children to preserve their lives. Their son Solomon is said to have been the first male child born in the township. Brown and wife died in West Salem, and none of their descendants are living in this vicinity.

In the fall of 1796 a company of Westmoreland County citizens visited the valley on a land-prospecting tour. These were the Klingensmiths, Kecks, Loutzenhisers, Christys, and perhaps others, several of whom selected lands in this township. Daniel Klingensmith, a German by birth, was the father of the family of that name, and in the spring of 1797 settled permanently on the site of the Greenville Rolling Mills, where both he and wife spent the balance of their lives. His wife was a sister of Jacob Hommer, Sr., and was also a native of Germany. His family consisted of three sons and three daughters, Peter, Daniel, John, Mary, who married Jacob Loutzenhiser; Catharine became the wife of Joseph Keck, and Magdalena married Abraham Keck. His son Peter settled on the William Bortz farm, where a daughter, Susan, was born October 17, 1799, the first female born in the township. She became the wife of William McLaughlin. Peter finally sold his farm and removed into Pymatuning Township, where he passed the remaining years of his life, being drowned in the Big Run in 1842. His brother Daniel died young, and John settled and died on the Howe farm.

The Kecks included five brothers and one sister, viz.: Peter, Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, Daniel and Catharine, all of whom settled in West Salem in the spring of 1797. Peter located on the Martin Benninghoff farm, near Greenville, where the remainder of his life was spent. Of his children only one, a daughter, is a resident of the county. Abraham occupied the Levi Bortz place, a little farther south, on the Clarksville road. His wife was Magdalena, daughter of Daniel Klingensmith, Sr., who was the mother of a large number of children, all of whom are dead except two daughters living near Sheakleyville. Abraham and his wife both died on the old homestead. Jacob settled on the Cossitt farm, four miles south of Greenville, where he died. His widow, Betsy, a daughter of Jacob Loutzenhiser, married again. One son, Isaac, lives in Greenville, a daughter in Salem Township, another daughter in Ohio, and a son in California. Joseph married Catharine, daughter of Daniel Klingensmith, and located on the site of Shenango. He was doubtless the most widely known of the family, as he began operating a distillery at his farm in 1801, and carried on a grist-mill in Greenville several years, and also owned the land and laid out the original portion of the town east of the river. He reared nine children, of whom three are still living: Mrs. Esther Bean, of Wellsville, Ohio; Abraham, of Hancock County, Ohio, and Henry, of Greenville. The parents spent their lives in the vicinity of Greenville, the mother dying in 1847, and the father in 1854. Daniel settled west of his brother Jacob, on the farm now owned by Peter Seiple, where his wife died. He subsequently removed to the place not far from his former home, where two of his daughters still live. He died there. One son lives at Leech's Corners, and one in the West. Catharine married Frederick Everhart, a pioneer of West Salem, and died in that township. Everhart was engaged for many years in the pottery business, and was succeeded by his son Paul.

William Fell and his son, George W., selected land in the southern part of what is now West Salem Township in 1796. The next spring they returned, built a cabin and made a permanent settlement. The family came out in 1798. They came from Bucks County, Penn., of which they were natives. He died in 1841, but his wife about twenty years previous. Two granddaughters, Mary and Hannah, still reside upon the old homestead.

In the spring of 1797 Jacob Campbell, of Chestnut Hill, near Philadelphia, came to Mercer County, and selected a tract of land in the southwest corner of West Salem. He made a small improvement by clearing a patch of ground and erecting a cabin, and then returned for his family, whom he brought to his new home the same year. His family consisted of his wife Barbara, two daughters, Catharine and Rachel, and a six-year-old son, Andrew. The daughters afterward married John and George Fell, respectively. The parents died on the old homestead. Andrew removed to Greenville at quite an early date and assisted in erecting many of its first buildings. He bought the old log mill in 1829, and a few years afterward replaced it by a frame structure. Campbell was in the milling business several years, and also owned a part of the present town site.

William and Molly Woods were natives of Ireland, but came to West Salem from Westmoreland County; he in 1797 to take up land and build a cabin, and she the following year. They brought with them four children. William was the first to be born in the new county, the date of his birth being January, 1800. The descendants of this pioneer family are still residing on the land settled by their ancestor.

The Mossmans were one of the most numerous and prominent families of the township throughout its early history. The ancestors of the branch that settled in Mercer County were John and Elizabeth (Herdman) Mossman, natives of Ireland, and the parents of four sons and three daughters, viz.: James,

Francis, John, William H., Eleanor, Nancy and Lillias. The mother died in Ireland, and on reaching maturity the three eldest children, James, Francis and Eleanor, emigrated to Maryland, where the last mentioned married a Mr. Harris and remained. James and Francis removed to Fayette County, Penn. About 1790 John, William H., Nancy and Lillias, accompanied by their father, also emigrated to Maryland, whence William H., Nancy, Lillias and father removed to Fayette County, and joined James and Francis, while John stayed in Maryland and lived there, and in Adams County, Penn., until 1807, when he followed the family to Mercer County. In the autumn of 1797 Francis and William H., with John and Thomas Gillis, visited the Shenango Valley and selected a body of land in what is now West Salem Township, lying along the Ohio line. They then returned to Fayette County, and the following year, accompanied by several more to whom they had spoken of the new country, again came out and made some improvements on their lands. In 1799 they removed their families, and became permanent residents of the township. The Mossmans included James, Francis, William H., Nancy, Lillias and their father, John. James, however, settled across the line in Ohio. The father died in 1802, and was the first interment in what is now Rock Ridge Cemetery, then a part of Francis Mossman's farm. This was the second death in the settlement, John McLaughlin having died the year previous.

The eldest son, James, reared five children: John, Joseph, Robert, Francis and Eleanor, who married James Bailey, a pioneer of West Salem. Francis, the second eldest, married, in Ireland, Sarah Brown, sister of Hugh Brown, who settled at the same period, near Greenville. She reared the following children: John, Elizabeth (who married George McCord), Mary (who became the wife of Thomas Gillis), Hugh, Jane (who married Isaiah Brainerd), James, Francis and William, all of whom became heads of families. John, the third son, married Jane McGowan, and reared four children: John, James, Elizabeth and Mary. William H., the fourth son, married Sarah Gillis, of Maryland, who bore him eight children: Robert G., John, Thomas, Elizabeth (who married John McCrumb), William, Lovina, James and Allen, all of whom are dead except James, a resident of Kansas. Of the two daughters who came to this county, Nancy married John Richardson, and Lillias became the wife of Isaac Moreland, a pioneer of Greene Township.

James, Francis, John and William H. Mossman all served in the War of 1812, and the three youngest spent their lives in West Salem and were laid to rest in Rock Ridge Cemetery. They were among the largest land owners and wealthiest citizens in this part of the county during pioneer days, but the beautiful farms they settled and improved have, since the deaths of the old stock, passed into the hands of strangers, while nothing remains of Mossman-town, once a flourishing little hamlet, but the decaying ruins of an old tannery.

With the Mossmans came Thomas and John Gillis, Richard Melvin, Miles Cherry and James Bailey. The Gillis family settled west of what was known as the Big Hollow, on the Greenville and Vernon road, while the others settled on the east side of the ravine. Cherry died in 1820, and his wife, Nancy, in 1823. Both are interred in Rock Ridge. Some of the Gillis family are yet residing in the township, but none of the Cherrys or Baileys remain in this part of the county.

Richard and Agnes Melvin were natives of Ireland. They migrated first to Wilmington, Del., and thence to the Red Stone settlement, from which Mr. Melvin came to West Salem Township in the spring of 1798, and built a cabin, and the following year became a permanent resident. His family at the time consisted of his wife and one son, James R. The old homestead is now occupied by his grandson, Lester. Mr. Garvin relates the following anecdotes concerning this family:

"Richard Melvin was one of the pioneer settlers in West Salem Township, along the State line. An incident of some interest occurred soon after his arrival. With considerable difficulty he had transported to the wilderness a little pig, which he hoped to turn into a good fat porker in due time. Accordingly, he built a small pen for it close to the cabin. One rainy, dark night he heard it squeal; alarmed for its safety, he sprang to the door. The blackness of a rainy and moonless night prevented his seeing what was the matter. He then seized a burning brand from the fire, and running out he heard the squealing pig going away. He followed, waving his brand, when the squealing ceased, and he suddenly found himself confronted by a bear, standing on the other side of a fallen tree, and the pig on his own side. He again waved his brand, and rushed toward bruin, who ran off without further ceremony, although he was loth to leave his tempting supper.

"James Melvin, a brother of Richard, was another of the first settlers in the neighborhood of his brother. He wanted to provide for wool in the future, and became the purchaser of a single sheep, which he attempted to protect by a pen of rails from the prowling wolf. His efforts, however, were unsuccessful, a wolf one night getting into the pen and killing his sheep. Whether the wolf gorged himself so as to be unable to jump out, or the pen was so constructed that it was easier to get into than out of the difficulty, is not known; but poor wolf could not get out, and paid with his life for the meal of mutton he enjoyed the previous night."

William McClimans, a native of Scotland, immigrated with his parents to Virginia before the Revolutionary War. He served in that war, and afterward settled in Bedford County, Penn., where he married Mary Ritchy, a lady of Irish parentage. In 1798 or 1799 he removed with his wife and children to Mercer County, and settled in the northeast part of this township. They reared two children, John F. and Margaret, who married William McMillen, a pioneer of Hempfield. Mr. McClimans died on the old homestead, north of the site of Thiel College, in 1825, and his widow in 1854. Numerous descendants of this pioneer couple are living in Mercer County.

John Ferguson, an Irishman, came with his sons John and James (Mrs. Ferguson having died prior to the family's leaving Westmoreland County) in the spring of 1798, and settled in the northeast corner of the township. He died in 1842. A daughter, by second marriage, is at present living in Sharpsville, an aged and respected citizen.

Richard Tunison, a native of New Jersey, came from Westmoreland County about 1798 or 1799, and located on a farm northwest of Greenville. This farm he occupied until his death, leaving a numerous progeny in the township.

Joseph Morford, a native of New Jersey, settled in West Salem Township, where his grandson, Dr. R. D. Morford, now lives, in 1798 or 1799. He was married twice, the first marriage yielding no children. His second wife, Elizabeth, was the daughter of Abraham Fell, by whom he reared seven children. He was a justice of the peace for many years, and became comfortably wealthy. He died in 1861 in his eighty-seventh year. His wife departed in 1868 in her eighty-third year.

Frederick Everhart, of Westmoreland County, came to Mercer County toward the close of the last century, soon after the Kecks, and married Catharine Keck, sister of Joseph, Peter, Abraham, Jacob and Daniel Keck, all of whom settled in the Shenango Valley in 1797. Everhart at a very early day started a pottery in West Salem Township, and carried it on to the time of his death.

He was a soldier in the War of 1812. His son Paul, born in this county in 1804, learned his trade from his father, and carried it on in Greenville until old age compelled him to abandon hard labor.

Richard and Andrew Brown settled in West Salem Township in 1800. They were of Irish extraction, and came from Eastern Pennsylvania. Both lived as neighbors in the region of Maysville, where they died, leaving several children each.

In the spring of 1800 Peter and John Loutzenhiser, accompanied by their father, Joseph, all natives of Germany, came from Westmoreland to Mercer County, whither their brother Jacob had preceded them a few years. Peter was a bachelor, and settled the lands now owned by James McElhaney and John Loutzenhiser, Jr., where he soon afterward died. John brought out his family and located near the southwest corner of West Salem, but after Peter's death he came into possession of the latter's property and removed to it. Both he and his father died on that place. Full sketches of the Loutzenhisers will be found in the biographical department.

Joseph and William McClurg, natives of Ireland, were among the earliest settlers of the township. They lived northwest of Greenville. William died in 1858 in his eighty-second year, and Joseph in 1864, aged ninety.

John McLaughlin and Nancy, his wife, both of Irish lineage, came to this township in April, 1800. On the 9th of August, 1801, John died, it being the first death in the township so far as any records show. His widow the next year married Peter Losse, of Ohio. The eldest son, Patrick, is well remembered in the township.

In 1801 John Speir, a Scotchman, came with his wife and three children from Beaver County, and located in West Salem, within sight of what is now Greenville. He died in 1813, leaving a family of eight children, the last survivor of whom, James, died in July, 1888.

Adam and Catharine Miller emigrated from Maryland to this township in the fall of 1802, locating on the land now owned by Joseph Calvert and W. H. Johnston. Miller served in the War of 1812, and both he and wife died in this township, though they had lived in other parts of the county. They reared several children and have many descendants. One of their daughters, Mrs. Catherine Hunter, is still a resident of the township, where she was born in 1807, and another, Mrs. Boies, lives in Greenville.

Henry Lininger and his wife Catharine, natives of Virginia, came from east of the mountains about 1802, and settled on part of the farm now owned by his son Jacob. Two of the sons, David and Jacob, are residents of the township.

Edward Johnston came with his wife, Nancy, from Mifflin County, and in 1803 settled in the northwest part of West Salem Township. Johnston was a pioneer pedagogue, and taught the first school in that neighborhood, the log school-house standing on his own farm. He was a soldier in the War of 1812.

Jacob Artman, a native of Westmoreland County, came to West Salem Township and married Hannah Fry in 1809. In the natural order of events he must have been a resident of the township for some time previous. Short courtships and hasty marriages were not so popular then as now. They reared a family of seven children. After their marriage they went back to Westmoreland County (in 1813) where they resided five years, returning then (1818) to their first home. Both died near where their children still reside.

Jacob Hommer (now written Homer) a German and an old Revolutionary soldier, came from Maryland with three sons and four daughters in 1809, and settled near the limits of what is now Greenville, in West Salem Township. Both died on the old homestead and are buried in a graveyard on their own farm. Their descendants are very numerous.

Alexander and Margaret Hunter, natives of Ireland, came from Cumberland and Fayette Counties, and settled a 400-acre tract in West Salem Township in April, 1812. Their descendants still occupy it. They had nine children. Hunter was a surveyor.

John and Mary Smail, natives of Germany, came from Westmoreland County to West Salem Township in 1812 or '13. They reared eleven children, viz.: Jacob, John, Samuel, George, Susan, Elizabeth, Polly, Sarah, Katie, Christina and Rachel. The parents died in West Salem, where their descendants are quite numerous.

Villages.—Maysville is a little village near the center of the township, and contains a store and cheese factory, owned by E. O. Brown, and also a blacksmith shop. The West Salem Baptist Church is a part of the village, and a good brick school-house furnishes full educational advantages for the youth of the vicinity. The first grist-mill in the township was built, in 1829, at this point by John Gravatt. The water-power was furnished by Big Run, which flows through Maysville. In 1846 Thomas McMahan erected a saw-mill on the run, and two years afterward he built a steam grist-mill near the village. He operated this about twenty years and then sold it to Philip Schuster, who ran it until it was burned down. In 1873 John Mussell built a cheese-factory at Maysville, which was burned, and in 1875 Morford & Clark rebuilt it. This, too, was finally burned, and the present one was then erected by J. W. Woods. A post-office was established at Maysville February 16, 1852, with George E. Hasenplug as postmaster. It was discontinued November 25, 1872. A complete list of postmasters will be found in a previous chapter.

Mossmantown was at one time quite a flourishing hamlet, located near the northwest corner of the township. A post-office, called West Salem, was established at this point August 11, 1851, James W. Mossman, postmaster. The office existed until November 4 1875, and nothing remains of this once busy little place to attest its former glory but the ruin of an old tannery.

Shenango is located at the intersection of the N. Y. P. & O., P. S. & L. E. and Erie & Pittsburgh Railroads, about two miles south of Greenville, on a farm purchased, in 1866, of Rev. H. F. Hartman, pastor of the German Reformed Church at Good Hope. The town was laid out by William Brigden in the year 1868, was first named "Atlantic City," but shortly afterward changed to Shenango.

The village contains, according to the census of 1880, 160 inhabitants. The men are nearly all employed on the railroads and in the shops, erected in 1882, and are, without exception, sober, industrious and thrifty.

A Union Sabbath School was organized at Shenango on the first Sunday in April, 1877, and for several years held its sessions in passenger cars of the S. & A. Railroad. The pioneer in this Sunday-school movement was Mrs. Ed. Richardson, wife of the master mechanic of the S. & A. Railroad, to whose efforts the Sunday-school owes its organization.

Churches.—Good Hope Church is the pioneer religious organization of West Salem, and one of the oldest in Mercer County. It had its beginning in 1805, when Rev. Michael Steck held services and preached to the families of Lutheran and Reformed faith living in this portion of the county. In 1806 he held confirmation services. He was succeeded by Rev. Stough, and in 1808 Rev. Andrew Simon commenced his visits to the settlement. Revs. Peter Kuebert and William Solson were next in the order of time. In January, 1815, Rev. Henry Huet, a pioneer Lutheran minister, began visiting this congregation, and the following November made an arrangement to serve them every four weeks. He continued as pastor of Good Hope until 1827.

During his pastorate, in 1816, a site for a church was donated by Peter Klingensmith, and a log building, 26x30, erected the same year. Its first seats were rough boards laid on blocks of trees sawed the required length. It underwent various repairs, and supplied the needs of the congregation for more than half a century. It contained a small gallery at one end for the children to occupy during services. On the 2d of May, 1869, the corner stone of the present frame structure was laid; and the house, 35x50, costing about $3,000, was dedicated the following autumn.

Rev. Philip Zeiser, a minister of the Reformed Church, came in 1827, and in 1828 Rev. Michael Kuchler succeeded Rev. Huet as pastor of the Lutherans. These ministers preached alternately to the congregation until the spring of 1840, when Rev. Henry Becker succeeded Mr. Kuchler and served till April, 1847. Rev. Zeiser served till the spring of 1848, and his successors have been as follows: Revs. Benjamin Boyer, a veteran of 1812, H. F. Hartman, Frederick Pilgram and J. M. Shick, the present pastor. The consecutive successors of Rev. Becker have been Revs. T. H. Hengist, Michael Kuchler, Jeremiah Fishburn, C. A. Fetzer and William Rehrig, professor of German at Thiel College.

On the 16th of September, 1828, the church authorities received a deed from Peter Klingensmith and Jacob Keck for something over four acres of ground adjoining the original lot, for church and cemetery purposes, the consideration being $10. A subscription paper was circulated by Rev. Kuchler for the purpose of raising funds to clear off the timber and fence the land. From this old document, written in German and dated April 19, 1828, we copy the following names of pioneers, most of whom belonged to the congregation: Jacob Hum, Jacob Keck, Daniel Keck, Frederick Everhart, Jacob Artman, John Loutzenhiser, Abraham Frey, Philip Ziegler, Joseph Keck, David Loutzenhiser, Joseph Hommer, Samuel Kamerer, George A. Blank, Jacob Kamerer, Peter Harnit, Conrad Bittenbanner, Adam Barnhart, Peter Klingensmith, John Frey and Andrew Campbell, each of whom subscribed $1. The following gave fifty cents each: Samuel Loutzenhiser, Solomon Klingensmith, Joseph Morford, John Keck, John Loutzenhiser, Jr., Jacob Frey, Solomon Lininger, Jacob Hommer, Jacob Klingensmith, Abraham Klingensmith, Casper Willyard, Paul Everhart, Aaron Blank, Andrew Lininger, John A. Bean, Jacob Layman and Peter Keck. The following gave twenty-five cents each: Jacob Keck, Jr., George Keck, Jacob Klingensmith and Peter Willyard. The foregoing embraces the great majority of the families who belonged to Good Hope, though Henry Lininger and wife, Adam Kamerer and wife and Henry Bortz and wife were also pioneer members of the congregation. Though hoary with years, Good Hope is still vigorous and prosperous.

West Salem Baptist Church may be said to have had its inception in 1807, when Rev. Thomas Jones, of the Sharon charge, organized a Baptist society in this township. It was connected with Sharon until a separate organization was effected, nearly twenty years afterward. During this period the principal place of worship was a small log building on the site of the Baptist cemetery, where the first burial occurred in 1803. Revs. Joshua Wood, Samuel McMilen, Sidney Rigdon and George McCleery were the consecutive successors of Mr. Jones. This church was regularly organized September 16, 1826, at the house of John Loutzenhiser, Joseph Nelson acting as moderator, and Elders Henry Frazer and Jesse Brown conducting the exercises. The following members signed the covenant on the day referred to: Richard Morford, Patrick McLaughlin, John Gravatt, George Burns, Margaret Loutzenhiser, Margaret Canon, Lucinda Calvin, Elizabeth Burns, Elizabeth McLaughlin, Mary Brown, Sarah Speir, Rebecca Bodwell, Alanah Brown, Jane Watts, Edward Kirby, fifteen in all. Within a few years there were added by letter or baptism, upon profession of faith, Mary Gould, Sarah Carson, Susan Gravatt, Mary Gravatt, Martha Simpkins (died August 25, 1829), Eliza Wakefield, Sarah Runyan, Sarah Stern, George Brockway, Azariah Dunham, John Loutzenhiser, Peaceable Brown, John Morford, Margaret Gravatt, Rachel Burns, Sarah Ann Loutzenhiser, William Westby, Jane Westby and others.

The early meetings were held at private houses, viz.: those of John Loutzenhiser, Patrick McLaughlin, Alanah Brown, George Brockway, Richard Morford and others. This continued to be the case until 1840, the time of the erection of the first church edifice. It was a small frame building, unpainted, and is now used as a wagon-shed by Rev. Nimrod Burwell. The second house, a comfortable frame structure, 41x51, was erected in 1856, on a lot bought from Richard Morford. The cost of the structure was $1,400. In the list of preachers we find the names of Elders Frazer, Churchill, Woodworth, J. H. Hazen, Sanford, Jacob Morris, William Leet, William H. McKinney, J. W. Snyder, D. W. Swigart, Allen Peckham and T. B. Marlin, the present pastor. The membership has had many experiences to test it, and at present numbers over seventy.

The Evangelical Association Church, worshiping in a house near the home of Jesse Shoemaker, was organized about 1836, by Rev. John Seibert, an evangelist of his denomination in this region, at a private house. There were about a dozen members, consisting of Solomon Shoemaker and wife, Jacob Hazenplug and wife, Joseph Foulk and wife, George Shoemaker and sister Mary, Adam Barnhart, Daniel Keck and wife, Michael Frey and wife, and several others. For many years, in fact up to 1854, the preaching was all done at private houses. At the date referred to the present house, a frame, 30x38, was erected; Rev. Jacob Weikel was pastor at the time. The site was donated by George Shoemaker and Reuben Bortz. It is impossible to give the complete list of preachers, as no records could be found from which to obtain them. In the list, however, are Revs. Bucks, Miller, Staver, Goetz, Nievel, Hollinger, Weikel and Day. The present membership is about thirty, who are principally residents of the vicinity.

The United Brethren have had an organization in West Salem for many years. A church building was erected before the war on the farm of David Stull, which was finally burned down during that exciting period. A new structure was then built northeast of the old site, which was widely known as the "Swamp Church," because of its location. The building was removed a few years ago to its present site near Rock Ridge Cemetery, where a small congregation worship, with Rev. Foulk in charge. This was at one time quite a flourishing church, but its glory has apparently departed.

Grace Church, of the Evangelical Association of North America, located at Shenango, was built in the summer of 1883, and was dedicated November 11th, of the same year. The first members were William J. Weikel and his wife, Mary Ann. The first pastor was Rev. T. B. Zellers, who served about one and one-half years, and was succeeded by the Rev. I. H. Voght, near the close of whose pastorate an organization was effected. The next pastor was the Rev. G. W. Brown, who served the full term of three years, and was succeeded by the Rev. A. B. Day, who assumed charge in May, 1888. The present membership is twenty-eight, and the society is in a flourishing condition.

WILMINGTON TOWNSHIP.

The above named township was erected in February, 1846, the territory comprising it being taken from Lackawannock and Neshannock Townships, the latter of which was subsequently detached from Mercer in the formation of Lawrence County. The new township was greatly diminished by that formation, and now it is probably the smallest subdivision in the county. It forms one of the extreme southern tier of townships that face on the Lawrence County line. It is bounded on the north by the two Lackawannocks, on the east by Springfield, and on the west by Shenango. Its surface is rolling, and the soil is very fertile, perhaps equal to any in the county. The drainage system is a fairly satisfactory one. The main stream in the township is the Little Neshannock, which heads in Jefferson Township and flows in a directly southern course through the region in question. An important tributary of this, called the West Branch, rises in Hickory Township, flows southeast through a portion of Shenango and the southwestern corner of Lackawannock, and at length joins the parent stream near where it departs into Lawrence County, thus traversing a large portion of Wilmington.

Much of the land which subsequently became Wilmington Township lay in the third district of donation lands. These latter were tracts which were granted to the survivors of the Revolution and their descendants, by the commonwealth, as a reward for their services and sacrifices. Few, indeed, of these veterans, ever realized much from the gifts so received. In the majority of instances, the claims were either sold at prices fabulously incommensurate with the value of the land, or passed into the control of some of the many land-speculating firms who seized upon any opportunity of securing territory, with which to carry on their business, with the most astonishing avidity. Many a humble pioneer, whose scanty means had been expended in the purchase of a land title from some of these corporations, found, when only too late, that the money he had parted with brought him in return no legal claim to his home. There frequently came up to his cabin other victims, who had also purchased the same land.

The early settlement of Wilmington is connected very intimately with that of Lackawannock. The reader is therefore requested to refer to the pages devoted to that township. So far as is now definitely known, the first settlers were a company of young men, who arrived early in the spring of 1798, and began to take up claims. The names of these were John McCrumb, John Waugh, John Hughson, William Hughey, Robert Wier, James Hazlet and John Blair. Each of these began settlements, and after clearing off a small portion of ground, erected a cabin and prepared to meet the necessities of a pioneer life with as much fortitude and perseverance as they could command. They were in a peculiar position. Near them were no fellow-workers with whom they could join company and share confidence. They knew not when they would be joined by others, and they had to encounter not only the direct perils of their life, but were forced day by day to meet the little vexations and indirect annoyances which such a border existence always calls forth. That they did this in cheerfulness and with patience, is evidence of the obligations which the present generation really owes to them.

Samuel Blackstone settled in Wilmington Township in 1798. His son James was born in that township November 2, 1798, and in 1822 married Nancy Waugh, locating in East Lackawannock Township, where his descendants still reside.

Hugh Means, another early settler, whose name is frequently met with while tracing the history of Mercer County, arrived with his family in 1800, and located on the old homestead. There were a large number of boys in the family, and these have since become the founders of a regular community of Means.' Five years later James Young, a Revolutionary veteran, came to the township, and settled upon the farm subsequently occupied by his son John. Among the other settlers might be mentioned Joshua Cook, Christopher Irwin, Benjamin Junkin and Isaac Donaldson. All these were prominently identified with the best interests of the region they helped to settle. Their names are found on the court records in many instances, and even when not thus recorded, it is safe to say that they left an imperishable impress upon the history of the township's development.

There was but one early mill in the vicinity, and that was the one built in the year 1804 by Hugh Means. It was a small, clumsy, inefficient concern compared with our modern giants of industry, but it served a good purpose, and saved the early residents many a weary journey through the forests and over hills to farther removed places of grist-grinding. It had but one run of stone. This was operated by power furnished by a small water-wheel, which the creek near which it was located revolved in a slow and creaky manner. In this old establishment the first township election was held.
