¹ In consequence of the insurrection of the popish earls of Huntly, Crawford and Erroll, and the order of King James VI. (7 April 1589) for an armed muster of the lieges, Glasgow was called upon to supply a contingent of men for the royal service. The number of men originally demanded of the town was 60, but as that number could not be raised without "grit hurt" to the community, it was finally arranged to provide 40 hagbutters with their commanders, and a tax of £500 was appointed to be raised for their equipment. On their return and in respect of the services of the two commanders, William Stewart and Thomas Pettigrew, it was ordained that they should be "gratfeit according to the provest and bailies' discretoun," the reward ultimately taking the form of "thrie burges fynes of thair awin findying out, besydis thair ordinar wage and daylie allowance sett down to thame."

¹ So written, but evidently intended for April.

² The riotous episode in Old Glasgow history to which these entries relate has been referred to by most of the city historians. The details of the quarrel are too complicated in character to attempt an explanation within the compass of a footnote, but the story is fully told in the preface to Glas. Charters and Documents, pp. 230 et seq. See also the Histories by MacGeorge, Macgregor, etc.
