TEXAS AND TEXANS

CHARLES H. MOORE. The great American lumber industry, in all its ramifications, overs more to the New England states for its active personnel than to any other section of the country. It was in the old pine tree state of Maine that Charles H. Moore of Galveston had his origin. Among lumber manufacturers of the south, few have been longer or more prominently connected with the industry than Charles H. Moore. He was one of the first to establish a factory for lumber products in south Texas, after the war. Forty years of his career were devoted to the varied enterprises of line transparent to the state of the still connected officially with four large freeport, Cumberland country, Maine, August 10, 1842, a son of Ira and Martha (Doe) Moore. His father was also born in Maine, as was likewise the mother, and was a farmer and school teacher. His death occurred in 1865, while the mother passed away in 1869.

It was in the country and village schools of York county, Maine, that Charles H. Moore received his first training for life. For a short time he followed in the footsteps of his father and taught school, but his ambition was for a more active career in the industrial and commercial life which absorbed the energies of Americans during the latter half of the nineteenth century. From the extreme northeast he went clear across the continent, and in 1862 located in California, where he became an employe of his uncles, B. and J. S. Doe, manufacturers of sash, doors and blinds. This was his real introduction to lumber manufacturing. When ready to engage in business for himself, he chose as a location the southern belt of the great American forest areas, and thus located at Galveston in March, 1867. There, under the name of C. H. Moore & Company, he established a factory for the making of interior woodwork, and, as already stated, was one of the first manufacturers of lumber materials to go into business at Galveston after the resumption of normal conditions fol-lowing the war. The first factory was a small one, but its proprietor possessed the ability and enterprise sufficient to develop the undertaking on a large scale, and for a number of years his firm was an important factor in local manufacturing circles. Now for more than forty years Mr. Moore has retained a large share in the lumber industry of the south, and credit is due to him for a share in the pioneer development of lumbering, especially in Texas and Louisiana,

The firm of C. H. Moore & Company continued actively until 1876. Mr. Moore then engaged in the general lumber business in the firm of W. F. Stewart & Company, and, selling out his interests with that firm in 1880, he joined A. J. Perkins of Lake Charles, Louisiana, A. J. Perkins & Company continued until the death of Mr. Perkins in 1893. The firm then became Moore & Goodman, and that name is still prominent among lumber circles of Texas. Mr. Moore retired from active participation in the firm in 1907, and his sons, Kilburn and Bartllett D., have since taken his place, in association with Mr. Goodman.

The activity of Mr. Moore in business affairs is indi-eated further by his connection with the following concerns: Vice president of the Lock-Moore Company, president of the Eake-Moore Company, president of the Tease Bank & Trust Company, vice president of the Tease Bank & Trust Company, vice president of the American Indemnity Company, vice president of the American Indemnity Company, direct of the First National Bank of Galveston, director of the Doc Estates Company of San Francisco, and a member of the firm of Guyton & Moore, fuel oil dealers. In politics Mr. Moore is a Democrat, and is affiliated with the Lumbermen's organization, the Hoo Hoos, and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks at Galveston.

In 1871, he married Miss Ida Kilburn, daughter of Wells Kilburn of Napa, California. Their two children are Kilburn and Bartlett D. Moore. The Moore home in Galveston is at 2722 Avenue H.

Join McElvy. A Confederate veteran, whose home is now in Rosenberg. Mr. McElvy returned from a long and arduous service in the war to take up the active life of farmer, a vocation which he followed with much success for more than thirty years, and is now enjoying the fruits of his well spent life, during which he has obtained a fair share of the world's goods and provided well for his family.

John McElyy was born in the state of Arkansas July 27, 1847. His parents were George R. and Martha (Webb) McElry, the former a native of Georgia and the latter of Tennessee, their marriage occurring in Arkansas. The ancestry is Scotch-Irish and on the father's side were a number of doctors and lawyers of prominence in their profession and in polities. The father himself was a lawyer, also a skillful surveyor and an active planter and stock raiser. He belonged to one of the first families in Georgia. Grandfather John McElvy was a Baptist minister. A man of superior education and culture, George R. McElvy duel in Texas in 1890. His brother, R. L. McElvy, was a member of webb was one of the pioneer planters of Texas and owned a number of slaves before the war, Mr. John McElvy was one of four children. His sister Fannie lived in Dallas and the other two children, Lawson and Harmon, are both deceased.

As a boy John McElvy spent his years on a farm and had limited educational advantages, chiefly owing to the fact that his father died when he was about fifteen or sixteen years old. The family moved to Texas in 1845, settling on the Angelina River, near the old John Durst Bridge on the San Antonio Road, the noted thoroughfare over which all the early commerce between Mexico and the United States passed. The father entered land in that vicinity of east Texas and lived there until his death. In 1861, on the outbreak of the war, John McElvy was seventeen years old and enlisted cruited locally to capture the Federal fort at Brownsville. After the evacuation of that post Mr. McElvy returned home and then on February 8, 1852, enlisted in Company P of the Eighth Texas Infantry, a regiment commanded by Colonel Overton Young. Their first destination was at Little Rock, Arkansas, but after a short time they began active participation in that long and desultory warfare which characterized the fighting west of the Mississippi River. There were almost constant expeditions and counter expeditions, skirmishes and battles all over Arkansas and Louisiana, and that condition of affairs continued until near the end of the war. Mr. McElvy was a member of what was known as the Walker Greyhounds, in Walker's Division. Among the more prominent battles in which he took part were the bloody engagement of Mansfield, that of Pleasant the bloody engagement of Mansheld, that of Fredsant Hill and Jenkins Ferry. His company was finally dis-banded at Hempstead, in Waller county, and he had gone through from the beginning to the end without wound or capture, although exposure brought on a long spell of pneumonia.

After the war Mr. McElvy was a substantial farmer for thirty years in Milam county. Then on November 25, 1894, he moved to Fort Bend county, and since then has lived more or less retired in Rosenberg. He owns a fine farm in the county, has property in Rosenberg and investments in other enterprises.

In 1862 Mr. McElvy was married to Miss Eliza Henderson, a native of Texas, whose death occurred a few months after their marriage. Later he married Ann Schafer, whose maiden name was Ann Vernon, and Ann Senarer, whose matten name was Ann Vernon, and who was born in Manchester, England, and came to Texas in 1845. Of the six children born to their union Fannie, Laura, William and Harry are now deceased. Thomas J. McElvy lives in Wallis, Texas, and Richard H. in Wharton, Texas. Mr. McElvy is an intelligent and well informed man and has been interested in educational progress, having served for a number of years as school trustee of Milam county. He is a loyal old Confederate and a member of Clem Bassett Camp of the Confederate veterans at Richmond. Mrs. McElvy is a member of the Christian church.

TAYLOR RAY. Leaving home at the age of thirteen, beginning his career in the far west as a grocery clerk, finally at the age of seventeen arriving in Texas, Taylor Ray has been a resident of this state nearly thirty years altogether and is one of the oldest men in the express service. At Rosenberg, where he has been a citizen for nearly twenty years, he is one of the most popular and prominent men and had the distinction of being selected as first mayor under the commission form of government in that little south Texas city.

ment in that little south least stay.

Taylor Ray was born in Wabash, Indiana, December 8, 1863, the son of Jefferson and Faraba (Cox) Ray, both of Indiana. The family is of Irish descent and Grandfather Ray was born on the Isle of Erin and located at Indiana among the pioneers. Jefferson Ray, the father, was also a man who was identified with early enterprise in the Wabash Valley and owned one of the first sawmills in his part of Indiana. After operating that mill for some years he became employed in the general carpenter and contracting business, which he followed both in Indiana and later in Missouri, to which state he took his family in 1870. He was a man of exceptional thrift and industry and lived a very useful and unselfish life. For many years he served on the school board in Indiana and was always interested in education. Although born in the north, his sympathies were with the South, and when the war broke out between the states he enlisted as a Confederate soldier and fought for the southern cause, seeing constant service from the beginning to the end of that struggle, with the exception of furlough time. His death occurred in Carthage, Missouri, and his wife is also now deceased. There were fourteen children in the family and the only two now dead are Annie and Bertha. Among those living the following are mentioned: Joseph, of Chicago; Warren, of Wichita, Kansas; Barton, of Olathe, Kansas; Alton, of St. Paul, Minnesota, and Charles and Orson, of Seattle, Washington; Eliza and Maude, of Webb City, Missouri; Lena, of Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Grace, of Oronogo, Missouri.

As a boy Taylor Ray attended common schools in Carthage, Missouri, and later while at regular work and in order to make up for the deficiencies in his early training he was a student in night school in Kansas City and in Sherman, Texas. When he left home at the age of thirteen he made his first pause in his wanderings in the state of Colorado, where he was employed for a time as clerk in a grocery store at Leadville. After that he was messenger boy in Denver for a while and during the following four years wandered about from one place to another, visiting many western states and getting such work as he could find. When seventeen he landed in Sherman, Texas, where he was given a job in a grocery store and later promoted to shipping clerk. With the firm of Cullers & Henry he remained for two years. After that he began work for the old Texas Express Company, an organization long since defunct. He continued as driver for that concern for one year. That was the beginning of his long service in the express business. After leaving the Texas company he worked for the Pacific and the Wells, Fargo & Company Express, much of the time as clerk on trains and his labor took him from San Antonio on the south as far north as Chicago and west to Denver and southeast to New Orleans, and he was in many other points all over this vast territory. He also travelled over nearly all the railroad lines in the South, including the Southern Pacific, the Iron Mountain, the Missouri, Kansas & Texas and the International and Great Northern. In September, 1894, he was assigned to a permanent posi-tion at Rosenberg as agent for the Wells-Fargo Company, a place in which his fidelity to the company's interest has kept him ever since. Aside from being a successful man of business Mr. Ray is doubly rich in the hosts of loyal friends who give him their esteem. He is a man big in body and character, genial and kindly, and is always ready to do his part. From 1901 to 1910 he served on the board of aldermen of Rosenberg and from 1900 to 1910 was secretary-treasurer of the school board, being president of the board during the last two years. He served as city secretary and clerk and as already stated was the first mayor of Rosenberg under the commission charter.

On March 25, 1891, he married Miss Mattie Newton of Des Moines, Iowa, daughter of Henry Newton. Of the six children born to their marriage two are deceased, George and Arthur, and the others are: Edith, Nita, Walter and Robert, all of whom are at home and in school. Mrs. Ray is a woman of superior culture and refinement and takes a prominent part in all social matters. She is an earnest worker in the Baptist church, in which her husband is also active, having been a deacon for the past ten years. Mrs. Ray organized the first Philathia Class in the city and has been president of the Ladies' Aid Society for twelve years and also a teacher in the Sunday school. She has membership in several social clubs, is worthy matron of the local chapter of the Eastern Star and one of the women of Rosenberg who are depended upon to take the lead in many matters for improving social and civic conditions. Mr. Ray is fraternally identified with Rosenberg Lodge, No. 881, A. F. & A. M., of which he is past master, and is also past master of the Masonic Lodge at Richmond. He has for a number of terms served as clerk and treasurer of his camp of the Woodmen of the World. He and his family reside in one of the attractive homes of Rosenberg and he owns considerable other real estate.

H. A. MEYER. In the direction of home-seeking population and disposition of capital for permanent investment, various agencies have played a large part and brought about a tremendous development of Texas' material resources in recent years, but no one factor has been more important than the real estate operator, whose specialty has consisted in promoting the sale and colonization of the vast tract of land, hitherto either left waste or imperfectly employed for grazing. The lower Brazos and Colorado Valleys have been a notable field for this work in recent years and one of the men who may properly claim a good share of the credit for results obtained is Mr. H. A. Meyer, who is head of the Meyer-Forster Land & Loan Company of Rosenberg, Mr. Meyer is also prominent as the present mayor of his home city.

Only a few men are privileged to achieve such sucess as Mr. Meyer has attained to so early in life. Not yet much beyond thirty-five he has gained a fortune and true friends and is regarded as a prominent and reliable citizen by all who know him and one of great value to the community in which he lives. Coming of hardy German parentage he has been honest and industrious and these qualities have won for him the enviable position he occupies.

H. A. Meyer was born in Austin county, Texas, August 27, 1875, and is a son of Benjamin and Louise (Shultz) Meyer. His father was born in Minden, Westphalia, Meyer. His father was born in Minden, Westphalia, Germany, and came alone to Austin county, Texas, at the age of fourteen years. The mother and her parents were born in Austin County, Texas, but her grand-parents were all natives of Germany. They were part of Austin's colony. Only one of the old line, John Stern of Austin county, is now living. Landing in Texas without money, Beaman's forty-five dollars per year and his board. In spite of this meager compensation his untiring industry and frugality figally workload. tion his untiring industry and frugality finally produced sufficient capital for him to buy a farm, to which he added until he was one of the large and prosperous land owners in Austin county. He was well known as a raiser of fine blooded driving horses. In that vicinity he lived and labored until four years ago, when he moved into Rosenberg, where he and his good wife live a life of ease and comfort. He is the owner of considerable land over the county of Fort Bend and his position is an exceedingly creditable one, especially in view of his having come to this state a young foreigner without money and having begun entirely on the labor of his hands. Although he had but few educational chances he has lived a very successful and useful life. In the mother's family her father and all her uncles were soldiers of the Confederate army. The present mayor of Rosenberg is one of ten living children, being the oldest in the line, and the others being mentioned as follows: L. H., who is postmaster of Rosenberg; O. C., auditor of the Bond Lumber Company at Eagle Pass; Mrs. F. A. Shawe and Mrs. Clara Kiekee, both of Rosenberg; Mrs. Laura Nippling of Granada, and Mrs. Henrietta Havla of Cost, Texas; Norma, Selma and Louise at home in Rosenberg and Emma and Benjamin, both deceased.

H. A. Meyer as a boy attended the country schools in Austin county, after which he took a literary course in the Lutheran College at Benham, and finally completed his preparation for his business career in Toby's Business College of Waco. He continued at home working on the farm until he was twenty-three years of age and then moved to Fort Bend county, where he was en-gaged in farming for one year. In the fall of 1897 he bought a farm of his own and has since been one of the big land owners of the county and also possesses much valuable city property. In 1899, with a partner named Brown, he opened a general store in Rosenberg. A year later he sold out his interests and was appointed postmaster, a position in which he did capable service for seven years. In the meantime he had been engaged in the insurance and real estate business and in 1904 became associated with Mr. A. E. Pleak, a relationship which was maintained until 1910. In that year Mr. Pleak sold out to Mr. Forster, thus making the present firm of Meyer-Forster Land & Lean Company, This company specializes on land for colonization and has peopled a number of large tracts with industrious and his peopled a number of large tracts with industrious and hirity homescekers. The company also loan a large amount of money on real estate. They have been one of the most successful firms in this line in south Texas. Up to March 24, 1913, their books indicate transactions covering Fort Bend and adjoining counties to an aggregate volume of fifteen million dollars' worth of land. In February, 1012, the partners organized the Meyer-Forster Realty Company of Ganado, Jackson county. This first study of Texas soil and products and his judgment has come to be accepted as thoroughly reliable and has been a big factor in promoting the success of his business organization. His company was the agent for the dissorganization. His company was the agent for the dissorganization and has represented several other large interests in the state.

In September, 1898, Mr. Meyer married Miss Emma Windell of Texas, a daughter of Caprain C. W. F. Windell of Caldwell, Texas, and a veteran of the Confederate war. The one child born to Mr. and Mrs. Meyer died in infancy. While Mr. Meyer has never aspired to office he has been selected out of the body of Rosenberg citzens to the office of mayor and is giving a very efficient administration. Fraternally he is affiliated with the local lodge of Independent Order of Odd Fellows, is a Royal Arch Mason, also a member of the Eastern Star and belongs to the Woodmen of the World. Mrs. Meyer has membership in the Order of Eastern Star and is a member of the Methodist church of Rosenberg.

JUDGE H. T. COMPION. A veteran of the war between the states, in which he saw a long and arduous service until his wounds compelled him to retire from the front, Judge Compton has been a resident of Texas for sixty years and since the war has been closely identified with public affairs in Wharton county.

He was born in Montgomery county, Tennessee, December 23, 1841, one of a family of five children born to W. T. S. and Sarah (Newell) Compton. His father was from Maryland and his mother from Alabama. The father was a merchant and a slave holder before the war and settled in Texas in 1853, coming from Tennessee and stopping awhile in Louisiana. In 1849 he had joined the California forty-niners and had at first a successful experience as a gold seeker, but later lost all he gained while on the gold coast. He returned to an ne gamea wance on the gold coast. He returned to Tennessee, after about four years in California, and soon afterward moved to South Texas, locating in Matagorda county. There he was engaged in farming and in other pursuits and his death occurred in Columbus, Texas, at the age of sixty-five. The Newell family on the maternal side were ironworkers in Tennessee and also polaries in the state. Unlike Countries is the state. also planters in that state. Judge Compton's mother died in 1853 soon after the family came to Matagorda county. The father was a man of more than ordinary educational equipment and both he and his wife were devout members of the Episcopal church. Of their children only one besides the judge is now living, J. P. Compton of La Porte, Texas. Those deceased are Edward, Nannie and Albert. Judge Compton has two half-sisters living in Wharton county—Mrs. A. R. Hudgins and Mrs. S. G. Perviance; also a half-sister, Mrs. H. B. Otto of La Porte.

As a boy Judge Compton attended private schools in Texas and was not yet twenty years old when the war broke out and threw its shadow across every peaceful pursuit. In April, 1861, in the first weeks of the war he enlisted at Richmond, Texas, in Tom Mitchell's Company F of the Twenty-Fourth Texas Cavalry. This regiment was afterward dismounted in Arkansas and thereafter served as an infantry regiment. At Arkansas Post he was captured and sent a prisoner to Camp Butler, Illinois. After three months he was exchanged and then joined Johnston's army in Tennessee. He left the Federal prison ill and therefore did not join his command until the eve of the battle of Chattanooga. Afterward he participated in the battles of Chickamauga. Missionary Ridge, Ringgold, New Hope Church, Peach Tree Creek and the many other fights leading up to Atlanta. At Peach Tree Creek he was severely wounded by a bullet which shattered his left arm and passed through his left hip. Gangrene set in and for days his life was despaired of. This severe wound totally incapacitated him for further military service.

At the close of the war Judge Compton located in Wharton county, where he took charge of his uncle's, John D. Newell's, plantation. After two years in that work he was elected tax assessor of Wharton county and filled that office with fidelity and efficiency for ten years. Following that office he was chosen magistrate of precinet No. 1 and has presided over this precinct court.

In 1887 Judge Compton was married to Miss Emma Hooker of Evas and a daughter of George Hooker, one of the old settlers of this state. Mrs. Compton is living and also her five children, namely: Pearle, Margie, Carrie, Harry and Newell. All have homes in Wharton and were cleuated in the local schools. Mr. and Mrs. Compton are active members of the Methodist church south, The judge is a charter member of Buchel Camp, No. 228, U. C. V., at Wharton and is now adjutant of the eamp. He takes a deep interest in all Confederate matters and has often been a delegate to reunions and other gatherings of the boys in gray.

CHARLES T. PAUL was born on the 2d of March, 1880, at Paul's Store in Shelby county, Texas, the youngest of the six children, four sons and two daughters, of W. A. and Delilah Paul. On the paternal side the ancestry is French, while on the maternal side he is descended from Irish stock. W. A. Paul was a second cousin of Alexander H. Stephens, vice president of the Confederacy. The grandparents on both sides were planters and slave holders, and the family is well represented in Georgia and Arkansas, also elsewhere throughout the South. W. A. Paul has followed farming and stock-raising, flour milling and ginning, and for more than forty years was a resident of Shelby county, Texas. From that vicinity he enlisted in the Confederate army as a member of Company H, Eleventh Texas Infantry, and was wounded in battle at Opelousas, Louisiana. He went through the war, and after its close settled down to farming in Shelby county. For the accommodation of his neighbors in the community about his home he conducted a grist mill, a cotton gin and a blacksmith shop, and, as these activities indicate, he was a man of varied affairs and an important factor in the community where he lived. Finally selling out his business there in 1900, he came to San Angelo, Texas, and took up ranching, a line which he still follows and in which he is well known. The wife and mother passed away in 1892, and was laid to rest in the country cemetery near Paul's

In the public schools of Shelby county (harles T. Paul obtained his early training and after his graduation from the high school at Timpson in 1901, entered the University of Texas, where he pursued his studies for three years in the academic and law departments. During his university career he was president of the Sophonore class, was president of Atheacum Literary Society, and was a charter member of Delta Tau Delta fraternity in the University. His first business venture was in real estate in San Augelo, where he opened his office in 1904. Since then he has added an abstract and general rental business under the firm name of the Paul Abstract and Title Company. In a period of only a few years real estate has advanced from one hundred to one hundred and fifty per cent in price and the trend is still steadily upward. From April, 1909, to April, 1911, Mr. Panl served as mayor of San Angelo, and was earnestly solicited to make the race for a second term, but his accumulating interests in business led him to decline the offer. For three years he was one of the directors of the San Augelo Bank & Trust Company, one of the largest financial concerns of west Pexas, with a capital stock of a quarter of a million dollars.

Mr. Paul has always been a stanch Democrat, and fraternally is well known in Masourry, having taken the thirty-second degree of the Scottish Rite. He also has membership affiliations with the Independent Order Odd Fellows and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. His church is the Presbyterian.

On the 28th of March, 1911, Mr. Paul married Miss Minnie Elizabeth Hunter, of San Angelo, a daughter of Mrs. M. E. Hunter. After the death of Mr. Huuter in 1995 the family came from Memphis, Tennessee, and Mrs. Hunter, who was born in Canada, is still living. Mr. and Mrs. Paul bave one child, Minnie Lila Paul, born on the 12th of February, 1913, at 335 West H avenue, San Angelo, Texas.

Mr. Paul stands foremost among those who thoroughly believe in and advocates to all comers the resources of western Texas, both in climate and soil. He is thoroughly familiar with the resources of the country as a stock region and recommends it as a good place for any ambitious man with the grit and industry to take his part of pioneer responsibilities and hardships, before enjoying all the success and prosperity which he well might anticipate.

ROBERT MERIVETHER BROWN. At Wharton for the past quarter of a century one of the ablest lawyers and foremost citizens has been Robert Merivether Brown. Judge Brown has served as special district judge, has represented his county in the state legislature, is commander of his local camp of Confederate Veterans and is regarded as one of the ablest lawyers of south Texas. He is local attorney for the Santa Fe Railroad and represents other large interests in this part of the state.

Robert Meriwether Brown was born in Amherst county, Virginia, December 24, 1845, and was one of six children born to Robert M. and Sarah (Whitehead) Brown, both of whom were natives of Virginia, and of old and prominent families of that state, Grandfather Benjamin Brown came from England and both he and his son Robert practiced law in Virginia. The maternal grandfather, John Whitehead, was prominent as a banker at Lynchburg. Grandfather Benjamin Brown married a Miss Lewis, who was a first cousin of Colonel Meriwether Lewis, whose name is first in American history as the first of the two noted explorers and pathfinders who left on the annals of history the name of the Lewis and Clark expedition. The grandmother on the maternal side was Anna Mahoney, who was a noted Irish beauty in her time. Both grandfathers were planters and slave holders and men of more than ordinary ability and influence. Judge Brown's father was at one time commonwealth attorney in Virginia and for years served as an elder in the Presbyterian church. He was a forceful and able man and did much to impress his personality on his community. Of the six children of Robert M. Brown and wife, Thomas L. and Alfred L. are now deceased. The living, besides Judge Brown, are: are now deceased. The living, besides Judge Brown, after, Mrs. Collin Stokes, a widow, living at Covington, Virginia, A. D. Brown of Amburst county, Virginia, and Benjamin W., a surgeon in the United States Marine Hospital and Health Service, who spent two years in China and now has charge of the United States Station at Yokohama, Japan, Judge Brown comes of a long-lived family. Wie father lived to he aighteen and lived family. His father lived to be eighty-two and his mother died at the age of ninety-one years, she passing away in January, 1914. William P. Gorsuch, a son of his sister by a former marriage, is now professor of oratory in the University of Chicago.

Chas. T. Paul

Robert Meriwether Brown when a boy attended school at Higginhotham Academy until be was fifteen years old. Then, like many other Virginia boys, his youth was interrupted by the outbreak of the great war between the states and he was at once thrown into the most serious responsibilities of existence. At the age of sixteen he volunteered in Company E of the Second Virginia Cavalry, under General Mumpford and also served under Fitzhugh Lee and under Judge J. E. B. Stuart, and fought all through the war in the army of Northern Virginia. Altogether his army record comprises twenty-one engagements and among these he fought at Cold Harbor, the Wilderness, Seven Pines and at Yellow Tavern. At Yellow Tavern a bullet struck him in the head and for three months he lay critically ill in a hospital. How near he came to being a sacrifice to the cause of the south is indicated by the deep scar which still plows his forchead.

At the close of the war Mr. Brown returned home, still a young man, though a veteran soldier, and took up the study of law. He afterward practiced in his native state from 1867 to 1885. In the latter year he moved to Texas, locating in Jackson county, where he moved to Texas, locating in Jackson county, where he moved to Service in Wharton and in the past quarter of a century has enjoyed a position second to none in the local bar. While Judge Brown is in no sense a politician, he represented his county in the state legislature during the twenty-minth and thirtieth assemblies and altogether has served three terms as special district judge, his appointment having been made by the local bar. For four years he served as eity attorney for Wharton.

On February 16, 1888, Judge Brown married Miss Ninu Warren of Brook Haven, Mississippi, a daughter of Jesse Warren, circuit clerk of Lincoln county, Mississippi. Mrs. Brown died in 1897. Their two children were Nellie and Alfred P., both of wham died in infancy. Judge Brown is one of the best known Masson in south Texas. He is past master of Wbarton Lodge, No. 621, A. F. & A. M., past king of Wharton Chapter, R. A. M.; belongs to Ruthven Commandery, K. T., at Houston, and is past district deputy master of the Grand Lodge of Texas. He also affiliates and the formal coding of Texas. Among this fellow veterans be has a popular place and at the present time is serving as commander of Buchel Camp, No. 228, of United Confederate Veterans at Wharton, Religiously he inclines to the CLEM DYER MYERS. Representing the younger generation of business enterprise in Fort Bend county, Mr. Myers is proprietor of a first class mercantile establishment in Richmond and besides his business carer has also been prominent in the public life of this county, having served two terms as county clerk. He belongs to a family whose members have been intimately associated with the development of Texas since pioneer times.

He was born in Richmond, January S, 1879, and is a son of the renerable August Myers, who for many years was in business at Richmond and is now living in bonorable retirement at Richmond. August Myers was born in Germany and came alone to America when eight years of age. At the age of fourteen he located in Fort Bend county, which has ever since been his home. It was given to him to accomplish a generous success in life and yet it is said that he never failed in business and that from first to last his word was as good as his bond. He came to Texas about 1842, when Texas was still a Republic, and has lived bere throughout the statehood period. It has been his privilege to know Texas under three flags. His first work in Port Bend county was as manager of a stock ranch and he subsequently got into the general mercantile business, which he continued until 1905, at which date he retired. At one time he was given official honor as treasurer of Fort Bend county. When the Civil war came on he enlisted in the cause of the south and served as a brave and efficient Confederate soldier.

The maiden name of the mother of C. D. Myers was Florence Dyer, a daughter of Judge C. C. Dyer, ber father being a native of Tennessee, and her mother a native of North Carolina. Judge Dyer was a son of a planter and slave owner, and also a lawyer, who came to Texas and settled in Fort Bend county about 1826, only four or five years after the first Austin colony was planted in this state. His daughter Julia, a sister of Florence, is said to have been the first white female born in Fort Bend county, among the American settlers. Judge C. C. Dyer had the distinction of serving as one were four children in the family of August Myers and wife, one daughter, Mrs. J. E. Winston, being deceased, and the others being Leon A. and J. V.

Mr. Myers in 1964-5 was associated with his father in business and then took a place as bookkeeper for J. T. Dyer for one year. This was followed by his election to the office of county clerk of Fort Bend county, in which he served for two terms or four years. After the expiration of his official term he bought a grocery business and has continued that enterprise ever since, building up and extending the trade throughout this section of the county, having one of the largest stocks in Richmond.

On September 14, 1899, Mr. Myers married Miss Mattie McElwee, daughter of D. C. and Mattie (Foster) McElwee. Her grandfather, Ran Foster, was one of the very earliest pioneers of Texas. The four children born to their marriage are named Florence, Dorothy, Clem D. and Randolph Foster. Mr. and Mrs. Myers are members of the Episcopal church. Besides his business Mr. Myers owns a nice bome in Richmond and has other property interests.

JUDGE WILLIAM I. MCFARLANE. One of the ablest men in the public life of Fort Bend county, Judge McFarlane is now administering the fiscal affairs of this county in the office of county judge. A native of Fort Bend county and having been identified with this section practically all his life, Judge McFarlane is known to the entire citirenship, and by his fine record as a citizen and business man has commended himself for promotion to the larger offices.

William I. McFarlane was born in Richmond April 10, 1869, a son of Isaac McFarlane. Isaac McFarlane was a native of Edinburgh, Scotland, and was eight years of age when brought to America by his father. The paternal grandfather first located in the West Indies, where he secured some valuable estates and later went on with his family to Boston, where they remained a short time and from there to Richmond, Texas. The grandfather was a physician during his career in Scotland and his death occurred soon after locating at Isaac McFarlane continued to make his Richmond. home in this town after the death of his father, and when the Civil war broke out he cast his fortunes with the South and went to the front as a member of Terry's famous Texas Rangers. As a member of that splendid body of eavalrymen he participated in many of the hardest fought engagements of the war and made a fine record as a soldier, having never been sick or incapacitated and never absent a day from active service. He fought at Bowling Green, at Charlevoix, at Murfreesboro, at Perryville, at Chickamauga, at Misrieso-boro, at Perryville, at Chickamauga, at Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain, at the battle around Atlanta and in practically every engagement in the Mississippi Valley from the beginning to the end of

After his gallant service as a soldier Isaac McFarlane returned to Richmond and established a general mercantile business, which he continued up to 1894. He then became a cotton buyer and continued in that work until 1899, at which time ill health forced him to retire. Two years later occurred his death, and he was esteemed as one of the finest citizens and most upright business man of Fort Bend county. The maiden name of his wife was Sarah Higham, who was born in Louisville, Kentucky, and she and her mother had come to Texas just before the war and located at Richmond. Mrs. McFarlane is still living and makes her home in Houston. Of her nine children, three died in infancy and the others, except the judge, are named as follows: Lenn R. of Houston, S. E. of San Antonio, Mrs. Stewart Clark of Stanton, Illinois, Mrs. L. C. Perkins of Houston, Mrs. R. E. L.

Wessendorf of Richmond. Judge McFarlane received his early education at St. Mary's institute in San Antonio and at St. Mary's at Galveston, completing his higher education at Baylor University in Waco. With the completion of this liberal education he engaged in business with his father until 1896, at which time began his career as a public official with his election to the office of tax-assessor. He remained in the office for two terms, and his health failing towards the end he retired from routine business for a time and spent much of his time on the outside, looking after the various business interests which were entrusted to his management. In 1906 occurred his election to the office of tax-collector, and he held that post for four years. Prior to that time he had management under Captain Bassett as tax collector for four years. In 1912 came his preferment to the highest and most important distinctions in county official honor with his election as county judge, there being no opposition after his nomination was announced. He is also at the present time president of the Jay Bord Democratic Association, the most important organization in the county, and has been at the head of this civic and political organization for five years.

In 1891 Judge McFarlane married Miss Fannie Booth, of Mississippi, daughter of Robert Booth. Mrs. McFarlane's father died in Mississippi and her mother resides at her home in Richmond. Their one child is Clarence I. McFarlane, who at the present time is a student in the University of Texas at Austin, Judge McFarlane is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias Lodge and the Masonic Lodge, and is one of the popular members of the society and all classes of citizenship in this county.

Judge McFarlane is a man of striking appearance, has a magnetic personality, and on the performance of the past has a large promise of future usefulness in the public and business affairs of his home state. He controls one of the fine farms in the county, situated just east of Richmond, and among his other valuable property interests is a handsome new residence in Richmond, where he and his family reside.

EMIL LOCKE is familiarly known to the people of San Antonio and vicinity as one of the large land dealers and developers in this part of the state, and also as the general manager and originator of the Alamo Heroes Association, a movement that was organized in 1913 for the purpose of building a magnificent $2,000,000 monument to the heroes of the Alamo in San Antonio on the Alamo battlefield. The Locke family is one of the oldest connected with the Prince Solms-Braunfels colony, famous in the German history of Texas. The parents of Emil Locke were Otto and Johanna (Schulze) Locke. The father was born in New Braunfels in 1859, and there he has passed his days. He is the son of Joseph and Maria (Claussen) Locke. They were members of the famous Solms-Braunfels colony who arrived at and settled the town of New Braunfels in 1845, and they passed their remaining days in that community, both having lived to a fine old age.

Otto Locke, who still lives in the house in which he was born, is one of the wealthy land owners of the region and has extensive property interests in New Braunfels and Comal county. The maternal grandfather of Emil Locke was Karl Schulze, also a New Braunfels colonist, who arrived here from Germany in 1846 and who has spent all his life in this place. it is said, established the first brick yard in New Braunfels, and was one of the prominent and prosperous men of the colony.

Emil Locke was born in New Braunfels, Texas, February 18, 1882, and received his early education in the public schools of his locality. He was still young in years when he engaged in business enterprises on his own account. He was in business for some time in the City of Mexico, also in Karnes county, Texas. In 1907 he came to San Antonio, which city has since represented his home and the city of his principal activities. One of the greatest pieces of work with which he has been identified is that of an irrigation project that will reclaim more than fifty thousand acres of semi-arid land located within a few hours ride of the eity of San Antonio. The plans call for two dams, one across the Cibolo creek, three miles distant from the town of Bracken, and the other over the Dry Comal at a point two and a half miles from the town of Corbyn. The project at this time is being held in abeyance temporarily on account of numerous land suits against the Medina Valley Irrigation Company, but that the project will eventually be carried out is the determina-tion of Mr. Locke and his associates.

Another of the activities with which he has identified himself is the Alamo Heroes Monument Association, the same having been organized by him in 1913 for the same having over organized by finit in 1913 for the purpose of bulding a monument to the heroes of the Alamo. Mr. Locke, the organizer of the project, planned all the details of the extensive state-wide scheme for financing the project, and at the present time is actively engaged in the management of the enterprise. The monument is to be an immense affair, some eight hundred feet high, and will be erected on the Alamo Plaza in San Antonio, at a cost of $2,000,000. Mr. Locke has proven himself a true son of Texas, and one who is concerned in developing the natural resources of the state, as well as in perpetuating the memory of In 1903 he was married to Miss Ora May Layton, who was born in Hallettsville, Texas.

RIGHT REV. N. A. GALLAGHER. For more than thirty years bishop of Galveston, a diocese which during the first eight or nine years comprehended the vast area of the state of Texas, the Right Rev. Bishop Gallagher is not only eminent as a churchman and administrator of a great religious organization; he has been for years an energizing force working for civic and social betterment through all the populous region over which his episcopal supervision extends. To the observer and student of men, Bishop Gallagher appears as one in whom are combined in excellent proportion the qualities most needed for his complex office. He is the broad minded man of action, a forceful executive, a scholarly judge of the world and its affairs. His life for forty-five years has been devoted to his church and humanity, and from parish priest to bishop his record has been one of unremitting work and service. Not alone the members of his church, but citizens of all classes speak with affection of the good bishop who for so many years has had his home at St. Mary's Cathedral and has lent his influence and energy to sustaining the city in its crises and promoting its welfare in its years of prosperity.

Nicholas Aloysius Gallagher was born in Temperanceville, Belmont county, Ohio, February 19, 1846. His parents were John and Mary Ann (Brinton) Gallagher. The grandfather was Edward Gallagher of County Westmeath, Ireland, who was identified with the revolutionary party of 1798, and had to seek refuge in America. He lived in Chester county, Pennsylvania, where his son, John Gallagher, was born, grew up to the career of farmer, and afterwards moved to Ohio, locating first in that portion of Guernsey county, which afterward became Noble county, and finally in Belmont county, but in 1856 returned to Noble county, where his death oceurred in 1866. Mary Ann Brinton was a native of Pennsylvania, and died in Noble county at the age of eighty-six years. Both were industrious farming people, were good Catholics and active both in the word and practice of their religion.

+ N.A. Li alla gher Blp. of Galveston

During the first ten years of his life, Bishop Gallagher lived in Belmont county, and attended the public schools of Temperanceville. When the father returned to Noble county he was placed under the care of Rev. Father Jacquet, who lived on property given to the church by Sacquet, who lives on property given to the children by Edward Gallagher. Under that tutor he studied English, grammar, Latin and Greek, and the ordinary school branches until 1862. Then, at the age of sixteen, he began his active preparation for the priesthood, entering the state of the West of Carinavaria where he Mount St. Mary's of the West at Cincinnati, where he pursued the regular seminary course, including studies in Latin and Greek, higher mathematics, philosophy, and theology and English literature. He completed his course at the Seminary in 1868. Already he had received the tonsure and the minor orders from Archbishop Purcell. In 1868, when the diocese of Columbus, Ohio, was formed from the archdiocese of Condmous, onto, was tormed from the archdiocese of Cincinnati, with Right Rev. Sylvester Horton Rosecrans as first bishop, Father Gal-lagher was the first priest to be ordained by the new lagher was the first priest to be treatment of the Holy Cross bishop, the ceremony taking place in the Holy Cross bishop, the ceremony taking place in the Holy Cross bishop, the ceremony taking place in the Holy Cross bishop, the ceremony taking place in the Holy Cross bishop, the ceremony taking place in the Holy Cross bishop, the ceremony taking place in the Holy Cross bishop, the ceremony taking place in the Holy Cross bishop, the ceremony taking place in the Holy Cross bishop, the ceremony taking place in the Holy Cross bishop, the ceremony taking place in the Holy Cross bishop, the ceremony taking place in the Holy Cross bishop place in t number of years he served as a priest of the Columbus diocese. From 1868 to 1871 he was assistant to St. Patrick's church in Columbus, and in the latter year was appointed president of the St. Aloysius Seminary of Columbus, an institution which had been established by Bishop Rosecrans for the education of the priests of the diocese. In 1876 he returned to St. Patrick's church as pastor. The death of Bishop Rosecrans in October, 1878, was followed by the appointment of Father Gal-lagher by Archbishop Purcell as administrator of the vacant diocese, that appointment being confirmed from Rome. He discharged the duties of this office with rare prudence, energy and ability. On the appointment in August, 1880, of the Rt. Rev. John Waterson as bishop of Columbus, Father Gallagher returned to the pastorate of St. Patrick's church, but at the same time was given the appointment of vicar general of the diocese by the new bishop.

The predecessor of Bishop Gallagher at Galveston was Rev. C. M. DuBois, who after many years of devoted service in his post as Bishop of Galveston, resigned in 1881. On October 19, 1881, Father Gallagher was appointed Titular Bishop of Canopus, and Administrator of the Diocese of Galveston. The brief for this appointment was dated January 10, 1882, and he was consecrated in office April 30, 1882, by Bishop Edward Flitzgerald of Little Rock, Arkansas, in the St. Mary's Cathedral at Galveston. Bishop Fitzgerald had previously been a pastor of St. Patrick's church in Columbus. The diocese of Galveston as constituted at the time Bishop Gallagher took charge was a vast and unwieldly territory, extend-ing almost a thousand miles north and several hundred miles west of the Cathedral city. With the increase of population, the duties of the episcopal office became increasingly onerous, and at Bishop Gallagher's request in 1890, the diocese was divided and two-thirds of the original territory was constituted as the diocese of Dallas, where the bishop of that diocese has since

On December 16, 1892, the title as well as the office of Bishop of Galveston was bestowed on him. For thirtytwo years Bishop Gallagher has remained at the head of the churches of this diocese, his spiritual supervision extending over a territory forty-three thousand square miles in extent. In the original diocese, when he came to Galveston in 1882, the Catholic population was about thirty-five thousand. In 1900, nine years after the separation of the Dallas diocese, there were about thirty thousand communicants in the Galveston area, and at the present time it is estimated that the Galveston diocese has a Catholic population of about sixty-five thousand.

RICHARD J. OWEN. For more than twenty years a resident of El Paso, Mr. Owen is one of the foremost representatives of the profession of civil engineering in the southwest. His services have been retained on many large projects, and capitalists and promoters of large constructive enterprise throughout this part of the country have come to regard him as one of the best authorities on all matters pertaining to general engineering.

Richard J. Owen, who has won his various promotions on his individual merit and by actual achievements, was born in Shelbyville, Kentucky, January 13, 1865, a son of David and Matilda Owen. His early education was in the public schools of Kentucky, and after tion was in the public sensors of Kentucky, and after leaving high school he took four years work in the Kentucky Military Institute at Frankfort, where he was graduated in 1882. From 1882 to 1886 he was assistant professor of mathematics in the Kentucky Military Institute. His proficiency in mathematical and physical sciences had manifested itself early in his school career and it was along the lines of achievements marked out by this faculty that his career has progressed. From Frankfort, after his career as teacher, he spent two years as a practical civil engineer, and then came to Texas. Between his earlier school days and his college education, he earned money to advance himself by employment in a store in Kentucky. While in college he was a member of the Signa Alpha Epsilom Fraternity Chi Chapter and also an active member of the Philomathean college literary and debating society. Early in the year 1888 Mr. Owen came to Texas and for two years was teacher of mathematics of Belle Plaine College, in Callahan county. In 1890 he located in El Paso and has practiced his profession there ever since. The only exception to this continued residence in El Paso was four years, during which he was superintendent for the Pullman Company at Mexico City. Dur ing his many years residence in El Paso he has travelled extensively and his services have been called for on numerous projects at a distance, including a number of large irrigations, railroads and other undertakings both in the southwest United States and in Mexico. One of the largest enterprises with which he has been associated was located in Mexico, and was a project for the irrigation of a tract of land consisting of one hundred thousand acres or more. He is now engaged in the survey of the disputed river boundary between Texas and New Mexico, being upon the Texas side in the dispute.

Mr. Owen on January 20, 1902, at El Paso married Miss Lita M. Eaton, a daughter of Col. E. W. Eaton, of Socorro, New Mexico. He and his wife attend the Methodist church, which is their preference among the various denominations. In polities Mr. Owen is a Demo-erat, interested as a voter in good government, but not active in party affairs. For recreation he is fond of bunting, and the more aesthetic accomplishment in music and theatres and the books of his home library. His private reading aside from that in his own profession is directed usually along historical lines, and he has a well selected library to supply him with opportunities for indulging his taste in general literature. Mr. Owen is a loyal citizen of west Texas, a thorough believer in its opportunities and resources, and is one of the local citizens whose judgment is based upon long and thorough experience and whose opinions concerning the country in any respect would be thoroughly reliable. Mr. Owen is a member of the Society of American Engineers. At two different times he served in the Kentucky State Guards, once with the rank of captain, and once as major.

Brown Brothers. An important acquisition to the financial interests of the state of Texas generally, and of the city of Austin particularly, is exemplified in the enterprise of Brown Brothers, a firm which has been in successful operation here since 1883. The firm has at its command immense sums of money which it is pre-pared to loan to borrowers, simply to carn interest for the corporations which it represents, these latter heing: The Scottish American Mortgage Company, Limited, of Edinburgh, Scotland; and the American Mort-gage Company, Limited, of Edinburgh. The concern invests annually a half to one million of dollars in farm loans and has at present over three millions of dollars in mortgages on farms and city real estate.

At the time that this firm was organized, state laws regarding land titles were not well defined, and the firm of Brown Brothers has done more than any other firm in Texas towards getting the passage of proper legislation put through the Legislature in the protection of these titles. This is one of the two distinct services rendered by the company to the state, the other being the bringing here from Scotland and England of immense sums of money for the development of wild Lone Star land. R. L. Brown, the former directing head of the firm, died in November, 1910, and since that time R. L. Slaughter has been the executive director of the concern.

R. L. Brown practiced law in Glasgow, Scotland, be-fore coming to the United States, having been educated in private schools and later graduating from Oxendean House, Berwickshire, Scotland. He was married in his native land to a daughter of Colonel Lamb, of the British Army, and his widow is still living in Austin. They had no children.

J. Gordon Brown was born in Scotland, where he was educated in Willfield House, Berwickshire, and on coming to the United States located in Galveston, Texas, where he was for some years engaged in the cotton business before he and his brother, R. L. Brown, organized the firm of Brown Brothers, of which he is still a member. Mr. Brown is unmarried.

R. L. Slaughter was born in Travis county, Texas, in 1872, and is a son of Capt. A. B. and Anna (Eanes) Slaughter, natives of Virginia, the latter of whom still survives and is a resident of Travis county, Texas, During the war between the South and the North, the father served as a captain in the army, and saw active fighting throughout that struggle. R. L. Slaughter received his early educational training in the public schools of Travis county, Texas, following which he took his academic course in Southwestern University, Georgetown, from which institution he was graduated in 1894. His law studies were pursued in the University of Texas, and his degree was secured in 1907. He has since been connected with the firm of Brown Brothers, and is widely known in business, realty and financial circles throughout the state. He was married at Columbus, Ohio, in December, 1912, to Miss Helen Roling, daughter of Charles F. Roling, a civil service official. They are consistent members of the Methodist Episcopal church, South.

THOMAS DUDLEY WOOTEN, M. D. The late Thomas Dudley Wooten has a remarkably useful and commendable career in his profession, and those years that were passed in devotion to his work in Austin added much to his already wide prominence as a physician and surgeon of unusual skill and accomplishments. His history is one of unusual interest and there attaches to it much of importance because of the position in the medical profession to which his sons have attained in the years they have thus far devoted to their chosen work, concerning whom some brief mention will appear in later paragraphs Thomas Dudley Wooten, M. D., was born in Barren county, Kentucky, March 6, 1829, of Virginia parents, who moved from that state in the early days of Kentucky's settlement in the southern part. Joseph Wooten, his father, acquired extensive land interests in Kentucky after his removal there and established a large plantation which made him a wealthy and prominent man in this section of the state. His son, Thomas Dudley, was the youngest but one of a family that included several sons, and when he died, Thomas Dudley Wooten, then fifteen years of age, found himself virtually the master of the farm and the slaves. The boy grappled successfully with the task he saw before him and he was successful in the work, discharging the duties of proprietor of several years, and in the meantime gaining such education as his spare time permitted him to acquire in the country schools, and devoting his evenings to diligent study.

Nearing his majority, young Wooten began the study of medicine, and after a year's reading in the office of Dr. George Rogers in the town of Glasgow, he entered the medical department of the University of Louisville, in the fall of 1851. At that time that institution was second to none in the Union in the efficiency of its medical faculty, numbering among its professors such men as the elders Flint, Gross, Yandell, Drake, Caldwell, Silliman and Miller. Before completing his medical course he was married to Miss Henriette C. Goodall, a daughter of Dr. Turner Goodall, a successful practitioner of Tompkinsville, Monroe county, Kentucky.

In the spring of 1853 he was graduated and entered straightway into active practice at Tompkinsville, Kentucky, but removing in 1856 to Springfield, in south-eastern Missouri, where for the first year he was en-gaged in building and improving a home and establishing a farm near the young and growing city. accomplished, he at once resumed his professional life and he was soon established in a lucrative and constantly growing practice. Although then, as afterwards, he pursued the practice of his chosen science in all its branches, and set up no claims as a specialist, from the first his marked success and skill in surgery, gynecology and treatment of diseases of the eye, rendered his reputation in those special directions a matter of special com-

When the war began Dr. Wooten had laid the foundations of a comfortable fortune and a successful career, which were swept away by the progress of the four years of war. In June, 1861, the Doctor enlisted as a private in the regiment of Col. Richard Campbell. Upon the organization of the Confederate forces in southwestern Missouri a little later, he was made surgeon of Foster's Regiment, known as the Second Regiment, Seventh Division, Missouri State Troops, in command of General McBride. After the battle of Oak Hills, Wilson's Creek, August 10, 1861, he was appointed chief surgeon of McBride's Division. Following the battle of Pea Ridge he was appointed Surgeon General of all the Missonri forces, vice Dr. Snodgrass, resigned. When the Missouri army was turned over to the Confederacy, and, together with the Arkansas troops, formed into the First Army Corps of the West, he was chosen by the medical staff of the army for the post of Medical Director of the Corps, with staff rank as Major, General Sterling Price commanding.

Upon the transfer of this command to the east of Mississippi river, and after the battle of Farmington, General Price was placed in command of the District of Tennessee, embracing the states of Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana, and part of Alabama, and Dr. Wooten was made Medical Director of the district. At that time the field and hospital service being consolidated and there being some 15,000 wounded and sick in the hospital, and continual engagements in the field, the labor of the chief medical officer was immense, and required exercise of the greatest vigilance, firmenses and skill, all of which qualities were displayed abundantly and satisfactorily by Pt. Wooten. When General Price was again ordered to the west and placed in command of the district of Arkansas, Pt. Wooten retained his position on his staff and served as medical director of that district to the end of the war, being for a time on the staff of General Magruder, during the last raid of General Price into Missouri.

Dr. Wooten's rapid rise and sustained success in the army was somewhat remarkable. Only thirty years old at the outbreak of hostilities, with but four years of residence in Missouri, with no previous military experience, no practical prestige or professional affiliations, he enlisted as a private, and after a few months, in competition with some of the most eminent and influential medical men of St. Louis and the west, he arose to the highest medical rank in the service of the start to the highest medical rank in the service of the start and his place in the close his position on the staff and his place in the confidence and affection of Missouri's devoted old warrior and chileftain.

At the end of the war, completely rained in fortune, he settled in Faris, Texas though any thy friends to heavy some built up a very some built up a very large practice. Still maintaining his early apritude and skill in the direction above referred to, and reinforced by a four year' experience in the active and stirring emergencies of the field and hospital, his success in all the more difficult tasks of surgery and general practice fully sustained in-evil life the reputation won in military circles. During the energy are the parts he remained in Paris, besides a large local practice, he drew patients from a large part of norther and eastern Texas, and from Arkansas, Louisiana and Indian Territory.

Indian retriory.

In January, 1876, Dr. Wooten came to Austin, and here he spent his remaining years of activity, maintaining the same reputation for skill that has made his career a part of the history of the Medical Profession of the state, requiring no detailed mention.

When the University of Texas was finally inaugurated in 1881, Dr. Wooten was appointed by Governor Roberts one of the first regents of that institution, to which position he was reappointed by Governor Ireland. He was from the first a most active and earnest friend of the university, and always labored for its successful and efficient establishment with a zeal and fibelity that never faltered. Being the only member of the regency who was resident at the state capitol, the greater part of the incessant vigilance and labor required to properly administer the affairs of the institution fell on his shoulders during the years of his incumbency on the Board of Regents.

In January, 1885, Dr. Ashbell Smith, President of the Board, having died in the previous autumn, Dr. Wooten was unanimously elected president of the Board of Regents of the University of Texas, and it may be safely said that to him, more than to any other one man, the University of Texas owes its present existence and prosperity. Dr. Wooten died on August 1, 1906, at Eureka Springs, Arkansas.

The sons of this well known Texas physician and surgeon, Dr. Joe S. and Dr. Goodall H. Wooten, still continue the work of their father under the name of T. D. Wooten's Sons. Another son, Dudley G. Wooten, is at present located in Seattle, Washington, where he is engaged in the practice of law. He is the author of two Histories of Texas, and was a contributor to southern literature to a great extent. He was a representative in Congress for two terms and likewise was in the Texas State Legislature from Dullas, Texas, for three terms. Mr. Wooten is a man of exceptional education and has the degrees of M. A. from Princeton University, Ph. D. from Johns Hopkins, and is a graduate in law from the law university of Virginia.

Dr. Joe Wooten was matried on April 21, 1897, to Miss Blossom Greenwood, a daughter of Col. T. B. Greenwoods, of Palestine, Texas. She was a student in the University of Texas and a graduate of that institution. They have two children,—Greenwood and Blossom G. Wooten.

Dr. Goodall Wooten married in 1899, Miss Ella Newsome of McKinney, Texas, becoming his wife. She is a daughter of W. B. Newsome, a banker and wealthy planter. Their children are Thomas Dudley, Jr., and Luey.

Both brothers are members of the Masonic fraternity. Dr. Joe has affiliations with Austin Lodge, No. 12, A. F. & A. M., the Knights Templar and Ben Hur Temple A. A. O. N. M. S. He is also a member of the Ancient Order of Red Men and of the Fraternal Order of Eagles, while his brother's Masonic relations are confined to the Austin Lodge, A. F. & A. M. He, too, is a member of the Order of Eagles.

JAMES W. McCLENDON. The name McClendon has associations with two different fields of service in Texas. The mother of the Austin lawyer above named was twenty-two years in the active missionary work, under the anspices of the Woman's Board of the Mcthodist Episcopal Church South, among the poor Mexican population chiefly along the Rio Grande border. Her personality and service are well known by all familiar with his hranch of philauthropic effort. In the profession of law her son is one of the ablest men at the state capitol, is still a young man and continued promisence and achievement may be expected of his career for many years to come.

Now a member of the firm Fiset, McClendon & Shellev, attorneys, in the Littlefield building, James W. McClendon was born at West Point, Georgia, November 1, 1873, a son of James W. and Annie E. (Thompson) McClendon. The McClendon are of Socteh stock, while the Thompson family was of mingled English and Welsh ancestry. James W. McClendon, Sr., was a merchant at West Point, Georgia, served as mayor of the city and lived there until his death in 1882. Owing to the condition of his health he was unable to take active service as a soldier during the Civil war, but at his own expense maintained a private commissary for the benefit of the Confederate government.

Mrs. Annie E. McClendon, whose unselfish devotion to welfare work in southern Texas has been mentioned, is a daughter of Dr. A. C. C. Thompson. He was a physician of high standing and education in Georgia, was a gifted linguist, speaking seven different languages and throughout the Civil war was surgeon with the Third Georgia regiment. His home was at Irwinton Georgia, on the direct line of Sherman's march to the sea. His daughter Annie, who was at home at the time, endured the hardships and discomforts of those who were forced to be an unwilling witness of Sherman's bummers and their devastating work through the center of the southern states. In 1889, some years after the death of her husband, Mrs. McClendon entered mission work under the Woman's Board of the Methodist Episcopal Climerh South. Until 1911 she was a missionary on the Mexican border, though for two years she was located at Guadalajarn, Mexico. At Laredo, Texas, and also at New Laredo, across the river in Mexico, a mission school was conducted under her management, and besides her work in instructing she devoted herself untiringly to looking after the social and economic welfare of the poorer classes of Mexicans in her vicinity. After twenty-two years in this active benevolence, she retired in 1911 on account of age and health, and now in her sixty-ninth year is on the retired list of the Woman's Board of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. While busy with her practical duties, she also found time to write and contribute to the publications of her church many articles descriptive of the social conditions in the districts where her lot was cast.

James W. McClendon, Jr., who was educated in the common schools of Georgia and lived there until he was sixteen years of age, came to Texas in 1889 and entered the University of Texas, from which he received his Bachelor's degree in 1895, and graduated from the law department with the degree of LL B., in 1897. Taking up practice at Austin, he was associated with the firm appropriate the because Fiser, Miller & McClendon, a relationship which continued until 1904, when another change occurred and Fiset & McClendon continued partnership until 1913. In the latter year George E. Shelley was admitted, making the firm as above stated, Fiser, McClendon contained partnership until 1913.

Clendon & Shelley.

While he has a large private practice, Mr. McClendon is also devoted to the broader interests of the legal profession, and served as president of the Travis County Bar Association, and served as president of the Travis County Bar Association, and a member of the Local Council for Texas of the American Bar Association. He is also prominent in Masonry, being affiliated with Hill City Lodge No. 456, A. F. & A. M., at Austin; Philip C. Tucker Chapter No. 1, Rose Croix, Fidelity Lodge of Protection No. 4, and Galveston Consistory No. 1, thirty-second degree, of the Soctish Rite. He belongs to the Texas Rho Chapter of the Sigma Alpha Epsilon College fraternity, His church is the Methodist Epsiscopal South.

On December 14, 1904, Mr. McClendon married Miss Annie Hale Watt, a daughter of W. T. Watt of Waeo, Texas. Her father was born in North Carolina, during the war between the states and saw service in the Confederate navy, and after the close of the war came to Texas and became a planter and merchant near Hearne, and is now president of the Provident National Bank of Waeo. Mr. McClendon and wife have two children: Mary Anne and Elizabeth. Their home is at 1600

James Graham McNary. Banker, lumber manufacturer, and director and stockholder in half a dozen of the largest and best known corporations of El Paso, Mr. McNary is a young man with a remarkable record of business achievements. Thirty-five years of age, he has used his brief active lifetime to exceptional purpose, and is now one of the most influential leaders in El Paso's commercial life.

James Graham McNary was born at Bloomington, Indiana, August 24, 1877. He was fifth in a family of seven children, four sons and three daughters, whose parents were William P. and Elizabeth (Graham) McNary, His father, who was born in Washington county, Pennsylvania, September 16, 1839, has been throughout the greater portion of his active career a minister of the United Preshverian church, being still actively identified with his work, although at the age of seventy-four, and now residing on a model farm in Loveland, Colorado. Rev. McNary was reared on a farm and graduated from Jefferson College), in Pennsylvania, in 1861. He had an unusually long and interesting record as a soldier of the Union. Enlisting in the Tenth Pennsylvania Reserve Corps in April, 1861, he arrived at Washington, April 22, 1861, and his regiment was one of the first three-year troops to report. This Pennsylvania Reserve Corps had been enlisted and drilled in anticipation of the second call for troops, and retained its first name throughout the war. It was a complete army in itself, fifteen thousand strong, composed of one regiment each of cavalry, artillery and sharpshooters or skirmishers, and twelve regiments of infantry. With his regiment, Mr. McNary was in the Seven Days' Battle in 1862, being in four of the engagements at Mechanicsville, Gaines Mills, Charles City, Cross Roads and Malvern Hill. He was also in the battle of South Mountain and Antietam. In November, 1862, he was transferred to the One Hundred and Twenty-third Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers and commissioned adjutant. In that regiment he was in the Battle of Fredericksburg under Burnside and in Chancellorsville under Hooker. The One Hundred and Twenty-third Regiment was a nine months' regiment, its time expiring in May, 1862, at which date he was mustered out. In Lee's invasion of Pennsylvania in the summer of 1863, an army of Pennsylvania militia was organized and mustered into the United States service for the defense of the state. Mr. McNary helped to recruit the Fifty-eighth Regiment and was commissioned Lieutenant Colonel. That regiment assisted in the capture of General John Morgan in his raid up the Ohio Valley. In the summer of 1864 he helped to recruit the One Hundred and Ninety-third Volunteers, was appointed adjutant, and served under the same colonel who had commanded the One Hundred and Twenty-third. This was a 100 days' regiment, and served only in guard duty in the border states of Maryland and Delaware.

In 1870, several years after the war, Rev. McNary moved out to Indiana, and has since been actively identified with his ministerial duties. His wife, Elizabeth Graham, was born in Allegheny County, Pennsyl in 1901 at the age of fifty-seven, a true gentlewoman, endowed with rare beauty of person and charm of manner, the influence of her sweet christian character extended far beyond the rich circle of home life over which she presided.

James Graham McNary received most of his education in Tarkio College at Tarkio, Missouri. His father was for thirteen years president of the Board of Directors of that institution, one of the strongest small colleges in the middle west. After his graduation from Tarkio College in 1898, Mr. McNary was a student in the University of Chicago and later went abroad, completing his education in the University of Leipzig, Germany, where he remained one year. Few men in the learned profession in Texas have received more liberal education than Mr. McNary, and at the beginning of his career he took up work as an educator. In 1899 he was teacher of modern languages in the New Mexico Normal University at Las Vegas, and spent five years in school work. His next line of endeavor was the newspaper business, he became manager and editor of the Las Vegas Daily Optic. In politics he is a Republican. During his four vears' connection with the Optic he took an active terest in politics. He served for three years as Public Printer of New Mexico, to which office he was appointed by Governor Miguel A. Otero.

Having sold his interest in this enterprise, Mr. Mc-Nary, in the fall of 1906, came to El Paso. He began as an employe of the Pirst National Bank, and after two years was elected Assistant Cashier of the Pirst National Bank, and two years later elected a Vice President, and has since been chosen First Vice President, and has since been chosen First Vice President and Chairman of the Executive Committee of this institution. In 1911 Mr. McNary was President of the worker for business and industrial developments in this city. He is a Director and Treasurer of the Southwestern Portland Cement Company at El Paso; a Director and Treasurer of the Southwestern Portland Cement Company at El Paso; a Director and Treasurer of the Southwestern Portland Cement Company at El Paso; a Director and Treasurer of the El Paso Grain & Milling Company;

James J. Mi. Hary

a Director of The James A. Dick Wholesale Grocery Company; a Director and Treasurer of the Paso del Norte Hotel Company, and the El Paso Hotel Company, having been one of the promoters of El Paso's million dollar hotel, which has so intimately concerned the prosperity of the City; he is a Director and Vice President of The First Mortgage Company and also of the American Trust & Savings Bank; a Director of the Rio Grande & El Paso Railway Company, and a direct of the W. M. Cady Lumber Company, and the McNary Lumber Company, at McNary, Louisiana, near Alex-andria. The town of McNary, whose two lumber mills have a daily capacity of 500,000 feet, was named after

Mr. McNary, aside from business, is very much interested in musical affairs, and is himself a trained and accomplished musician. During his first four years' residence in El Paso he was musical director of the El Paso Choral Society, with a membership of one hundred. He possesses an excellent baritone voice, and in the different places of his residence he has done much to direct and elevate musical activities. For three years he served as Treasurer, Director and Vice President of the Toltec Club; in 1913 he was elected President of the El Paso Social Club; he is also a member of the El Paso Country Club; is a Director of the Y. M. C. A., and a member of the Board of Trustees and Treasurer of the First Presbyterian Church.

At Las Vegas, New Mexico, October 8, 1902, Mr. McNary married Miss Ruth Raynolds, daughter of Joshua S. Raynolds, and a native of Central City, Colo-Her father is one of the pioneer bankers of the west, beginning his career with the Colorado National Bank of Denver, of which he was elected Cashier in 1871. He is now President of the First National Bank of Albuquerque, New Mexico, and the First National Bank of El Paso, Texas. Mr. McNary has had the ad-vantage of acquiring his experience in the banking business by close personal association with the foremost banker of the southwest.

Mr. and Mrs. McNary are the parents of five children, four of whom are now living: Graham Raynolds Mc-Nary was born in Las Vegas, February 4, 1904; Ruth Elizabeth was born July 4, 1905, at Las Vegas; one child was born October 21, 1906, and died at El Paso April 27, 1907; Marjorie May was born at El Paso May 5, 1910; Martha was born in El Paso, October 16, 1912. The McNary residence is 1617 Arizona Street.

From the age of twelve to twenty years, Mr. McNary spent his summers working on the farm of the late David Rankin, one of the greatest American farmers, and on the estate of that great farm king he earned his bread by the sweat of his brow and learned the value of a dollar.

Mrs. McNary takes an active interest in women's clubs and charity work, being a Director of the Y. W. C. A., the El Paso Women's Club, and an active member of the Board of Directors of the Charity Association. She is an accomplished musician, being a graduate of the New England Conservatory of Music, and a violinist and organist of unusual ability.

ROBERT LYNN BATTS, of the law firm of Gregory, Batts & Brooks, has, since locating in Austin in 1900, gained a reputation as one of the most forceful members of the local bar, and has few peers throughout the state. His clear, analytical mind affords him unusual facility in working out the details of a case, and his contemporaries are quick to acknowledge his special abilities and his high position among the lawyers of Texas. He is a native son of the Lone Star state, having been born at Bastrop, November 1, 1864, his parents being Andrew Jackson and Julia (Rice) Batts.

Andrew Jackson Batts was a native of Virginia, and a descendant of one of the very earliest Colonial families of the Old Dominion. In 1857 he sought the West and located at Bastrop, where he was residing at the time of the outbreak of the war between the states, throughout which he participated as a soldier in the Confederate army. With the fall of the Lost Cause he returned to Bastrop and here rounded out a useful and successful career, passing away in 1890. He was married in Texas to Miss Julia Rice, who was born in Alabama, and came to Texas as an infant with her parents in 1845, the family locating in Burnet county, where for years they followed agricultural pursuits.

Robert Lynn Batts was granted excellent educational facilities, and after completing the usual preparatory courses entered the University of Texas, from which institution he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Laws in 1886. At that time he entered upon the practice of his chosen calling at Bastrop, and continued there until 1892, when he became assistant attorney general, under Attorney General Charles A. Culberson, now United States Senator from Texas. Mr. Batts' high accomplishments won him a full professorship when he was but thirty years of age, as a member of the law faculty of the University of Texas, a position which he held for a number of years. He took up active practice in 1900, becoming a member of the firm of Gregory & Batts, with Thomas W. Gregory, and in 1907 Victor L. Brooks was admitted to the firm, the style of which then became as now, Gregory, Batts & Brooks. This is known at this time as one of the strongest legal combinations in the state, and has been connected with numerous important cases including the noted case of the State of Texas vs. Waters-Pierce Oil Company, in which the firm represented the state. Mr. Batts is the author of numerous articles relating to his profession, which give evidence of excellent literary ability and taste, a broad knowledge of his calling, and a vigorous style. Among his technical works may be mentioned "Annotated Civil Statutes of Texas" and "Corporation Laws of Texas." The offices of the concern are located in the Austin National Bank Building, while Mr. Batts' home is at No. 2400 Lampasas street. He enjoys membership in the Masons, in the Odd Fellows and in the Kappa Alpha fraternity. His political affiliation is with the democratic party.

In 1889 Mr. Batts was married to Miss Harriet Boak, who is the daughter of the late John C. Boak, of Austin; and to this union there have been born three children, namely: Robert E. Lee, Mary and Margaret.

WILLIAM F. RAMSEY. One of the eminent representatives of the bench and bar in Texas, Mr. Ramsey has been actively connected with his profession for more than thirty-five years, attained to the highest honors in the Texas judiciary as Judge of the Court of Criminal Appeal and as associate justice in the supreme court, being the only person in history of the state who occupied both these positions. Since retiring from the bench he has attended to a large private practice at Austin. Judge Ramsey represents a Scotch family, which emigrated from Scotland in 1800 and settled in North Carolina, and has subsequently furnished many names notable in business, the professions, and in public affairs.

William F. Ramsey is a native of Texas, born October 25, 1855, in Bell county. His parents were John J. and Nancy (Clark) Ramsey. His father, a native of Kentucky, came to Texas in 1853, settling first in Falls county, later moving to Gonzales county, and in 1861 enlisted for service in the Confederate army. His military record covers practically the entire conflict between the states, and at the close of the war he held the rank of second lieutenant. He then settled in Johnson county, where he acquired large interests as a farmer and merchant and where he lived until his death in 1904. His wife was a native of Tennessee, and she died in October, 1871.

Judge Ramsey spent most of his youth in Johnson county, attended the common schools of that locality, and received his college training in Trinity University at Tehuacana, Limestone county. From that old and splendid center of Texas education he was graduated Bachelor of Arts in 1876, and received his degree in law in 1877. Judge Ramsey began practice at Cleburne on the 4th of July, 1877. Cleburne remained his home and the center of his large and growing practice as a lawyer until January 1, 1908. At the latter date he moved to Austin, having accepted appointment as one of the justices of the court of criminal appeals, qualifying for the office on the first of January, and filling out an un-expired term. In November, 1908, he was elected for the regular term of four years, beginning January 1, 1909. However, on January 5, 1911, he resigned to accept a place as associate judge of the supreme court. On March 29, 1912, he resigned this high judicial place in order to make the campaign for the Democratic nomination for Governor of Texas. He was one of the contenders for this honor at the Democratic primaries in July, 1912, but in spite of his vigorous campaign did not succeed in wresting the honors from the incumbent of the office, Governor, Corquitt. On October 1, 1912, resumed private practice at Austin, and that city is now his permanent home. Judge Ramsey in 1884 was one of the presidents of electors on the Cleveland ticket.

He stands high in Masonry, having taken thirty-two indegrees in the Scottish Rite, and in the York rite is Pret Eminent Commander of the Knights Templar. He also belongs to the Hills Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Dallas. Other fraternal associations include membership in the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elis.

Until he moved to Austin to accept judicial office, Judge Ramsey was prominent in banking. In 1900 became president of the National Bank of Cloburne, was president of the First National Bank of Covington, and president of the Farmers and Traders Bank of Rio Vista. He resigned all these financial connections in 1908, on his removal to Austin.

On January 28, 1878, Judge Ramsey married Miss Emma Johnson a daughter of Rev. Felix Johnson, a Romery died April 1, 1885, leaving a son, William F. Ramsey, Jr., who is now a practicing attorney at Cheburne. On October 13, 1886, Judge Ramsey married Miss Rowens Hill, a daughter of Malcolm and Mary J. Hill, of LaGrange, Texas. There are three sons and three daughters by this marriage. Judge Ramsey and family reside at 106 27th street, Austin.

John L. Little was born in Covington county, Alabama, in 1872, but spent most of his life in Texus, Alabama, in 1872, but spent most of his life in Texus, Alabarents having locatical. Milam county in 1876. His father, James M. Litcheson county, Georgia, of Scotch ancestry, and nerty life was a lawyer and served for a time as destrict attorney of Covington county. Substitution of the life was a lawyer and served for a clima substitution of the constraint of the Presbyterian church, and remained a consecrated and active worker in the church until his death. He had also been a soldier in the Confederacy, going through the entire war as a member of an Alabama regiment. The mother of Judge Little was Martha A. Pendry Little, a native of Jefferson county, Georgia.

John L. Little, who was reared in Milam county from the age of four years, had the advantages of the local schools, and then entered the Southwestern University at Georgetown, from which he was graduated with the class of 1896. Taking up the study of law with Major John A. Green in San Antonio, he remained there until his admission to the bar in 1897, and then established his practice in that city. Judge Little was always actively interested in politics, and after four years as a lawyer at San Antonio was elected a member of the State Legislature and served one term. In the latter part of 1903 he moved to Kountze and began his practice on the first of the following year. The citizens of Hardin county manifested their confidence in his integrity and ability by electing him county judge, an office which he capably filled from 1910 until 1912. In the latter year Judge Little made the race for Congress from the Second Congressional district, being one of the five candidates for that honor before the primaries. While prominent in politics, a popular campaign orator, Judge Little was essentially a public-spirited citizen whose best work was the disinterested service of the community and State, rather than for the sake of personal advancement.

He also had a military record. During the Spanish-American war he was lieutenant of Company I of the First Texas Infantry, U. S. Volunteers. His regiment went to Mobile, Alabama, then to Mismi, Florida, where it was transferred to General Lee's corps, and after being stationed at Jacksonville and Savannah, was sent to Havana, Cuba. Judge Little was well known in Masonic cricles, having taken the thirty-second degree of Scottish Rite, and was a member of El Mina Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Galveston, and was also affiliated with the Modern Woodmen of America, the Maccabees and the Knights of Pythias.

Mrs. Little, who is now a resident of Beaumont, is of an old and prominent Texas family. She and Judge Little were married at San Antonio August 21, 1898. Before her marriage Mrs. Little was Miss Carrie Power, horn in Independence, Texas, and a grandulece of General Sam Houston and grandulagheir of Colonel Charles Power, once prominent as a citizen both of Galveston and Independence. Judge Little and wife had four children: Weldon Lowery Little, now deceased; Charles Power Little; Marjorie Power Little, and John Lowery Little.

JOHN CHARLES TOWNES, LL. D. Extraordinary as as has been the growth of the common school system of Austin, as well as its trade and commerce, the progress made in the establishment here of higher institutions of learning has been no less remarkable, so that it is now probably the greatest educational center of the state, and it is also one of the important commercial centers. The University of Texas, established on a broad base, both as to endowment and plans and scope of instruction, is recognized as one of the leading educational institutions in the country, made so by the high standing and ability of the educators in charge of its multiform departments. John Charles Townes, LL. became a member of the House of Representatives and of the Senate of Texas. During the war between the states he was a major of Texas troops and saw active service at Sabine Tass and other points in Texas and Louisiana, but during the progress of the struggle his health was undermined and he was forced to resign his commission and return to his home, where his death occurred August 30, 1864. The mother survived until 1893.

After thorough preparation Doctor Townes became a student at Baylor University, which he attended from 1867 to 1869, and from that institution received the degree of Doctor of Laws in 1898. He took up the study of law in 1869 and in 1873 was admitted to the bar at Austin, follwing which he was engaged in active practice in this city until 1877, the next eight years being passed at San Saba, Texas. In 1882 he became judge of the Thirty-third Judicial District of Texas, continuing to act in that capacity until 1885, when he resigned and removed to Georgetown, there continuing in practice until 1888, when he was appointed by Govenror Ross, judge of the Twenty-sixth Judicial District of Texas, but in August of the same year resigned the office and returned to Austin where he formed a law partnership with S. R. Fisher, under the firm style of Fisher & Townes. This association continued until 1896, when Doctor Townes was appointed professor of law at the University of Texas, and in 1902 was made the first dean of the law school of the University. After one year he resigned to devote his entire attention to his duties as professor of law, but in the fall of 1907 was again made dean of the law school and has held that position to the present time. In 1909 and 1910 he was president of the Association of American Law Schools. While he has borne a fair share of the labors of professional and public life, accomplishing not less for the public welfare than for his own advantage, he has at the same time preserved his love of letters and his indulgence in the amenities of a refined and gentle life. As an author, he is well known in the line of his calling, among his numerous contribu-tions to legal literature being "Townes," Texas Pleadings" (1901, second edition 1913); "Studies of American Elementary Law" (1903, second edition 1911); "General Principles of the Law of Torts" (1907);
"Civil Government in the United States and in Texas" (1908), and "Law Books and How to Use Them" (1909). His political allegiance is given to the demo-cratic party, while his religious connection is with the Baptist church, in which he is a deacon.

On December 28. 1871, Doctor Townes was married to Miss Kate Wildbah, daughter of Isaac and Ann D. Wildbahu, of Manor, Texas, who came to this state in 1854 from Alabana. Four children have been born to this union: Ernest W., who is engaged in the practice of law at Houston; Edgar E., a legal practitioner of Baeumont; John Charles, Jr., associated with the law firm of Baker, Botts, Parker & Garwood, at Houston; and Anne C., a teacher in Miss Whils's 'school at Austin, Doctor and Mrs. Townes reside in their pleasant home at No. 2800 Rio Grande street.

WILLIAM THOMAS CASWELL. One of the comparatively few whose genius for large undertaking and achievement determines the business destinies of the localities in which they live and labor is William Thomas Caswell, of Austin. Brought in early manhood in touch with the cotton business, he seized upon his opportunity, mastered the rudiments of the trade with a thoroughness that has characterized his every action in life, and upon this practical knowledge has builded his exceptional business career. One by one he has seen the possibilities as they have opened before him, and each possibility has first become a probability and then made a certainty, until now he is one of the largest cotton exporters in the United States. Incidentally, he has become interested in read estate and timber lands, and gives the lenefit of his broad knowledge, clear judgment and vast experience to various other lines of industry.

Mr. Caswell was born in Nashville, Tennessee, in 1877 and is a son of Daniel Haskell and Louise (Broadwell) Caswell. On his father's side he is descended from Scotch-Irish stock which emigrated to America before the days of the Revolutionary War and settled in Maine. but later moved to the South. His mother's family trace their ancestry back to the Mayflower and to John and Priscilla Alden of Massachusetts. Daniel Haskell Caswell in his early life was a millwright and built flour and lumber mills, but since 1880 has been actively engaged in the cotton seed oil mill business, being now the oldest oil mill man in active service. He was the owner of the Tuscaloosa, Alabama, Oil Mill, one of the first cotton seed oil mills ever erected, and in 1892 came to Texas and located at Austin, where he has since continued to carry on his affairs, and is actively engaged in business in spite of his eighty years. During his long and useful career it is estimated that he has erected fifty cotton seed oil mills. William Thomas Caswell received his early education in the public schools of his native city, where he graduated from the High School, and entered Vanderbilt University, graduating therefrom in civil engineering in 1899. At that time he joined his father at Austin, and was associated with him in business for a short time. He then embarked in the business of cotton buying and exporting, which he has developed until it is now recognized as one of the leading enterprises of this section. At this time he is handling over 100,000 bales of cotton annually, and is one of the few cotton men in the business to buy direct from the farmer and export direct to the foreign customer, firms in Europe and Japan handling the greater part of his output. He also handles more wagon cotton than any dealer in the United States, his business during some years running up as high as $20,000,000. Mr. Caswell, in addition to being the owner of a chain of cotton gins in the vicinity of Austin, is president of the Capitol Compress Company and of the San Marcos Compress Company, and vice president of the Elgin Compress Company. He has been largely interested in real estate, and in 1910 bought and developed what is now known as the Ridge Top Addition and the Ridge Top Annex Addition to the city of Austin, which have proved the most popular additions to the northern part of the city, now being rapidly developed and settled as residential sections. He is also the owner of the Hyde Park Heights Addition to the city of Houston, which he has most successfully developed and settled, and is the owner of 5,000 acres of timber land in Montgomery county, Texas, on which he has erected an extensive sawmill which is cutting some 15,000,000 feet of timber. He maintains offices at No. 410 Chicon street and 625 Littlefield Bldg., Austin, Tex. Mr. Caswell's success is one which is noteworthy even in a part of the country where a large measure of success is not uncommon and where forcible and capable captains of business abound. And it is all the more remarkable in that it has been practically self-gained. Active, alert, quick in his decisions and courageous in his undertakings, he has the entire confidence of his associates, who constantly look to him for leadership and counsel. Essentially a man of business, he has cared little for public life, except as a good citizen performing his civic duties, and his only fraternal connection is with the Chi Phi fraternity of the Vanderbilt University. But he is an active worker in all charitable movements of Austin and in the Y. M. C. A. work, of which institution he was president several years.

Mr. Caswell was married in 1904 to Miss Vivian Brenizer, daughter of Dr. Nelson O. Brenizer, a well-known practicing physician of Austin, and to this union there have been born two children: Anna Louise and Clar The pleasant family residence is located at No. 1502 West avenue.

JUDGE T. W. HUDSON. A resident of the Lone Star State since 1871, of Grayson county since 1888 and of Sherman since 1890, Judge T. W. Hudson has had a praiseworthy career and one that entitles him to specific mention in the pages of this comprehensive historical and biographical work. A straightforward account of the leading activities of the life of Judge Hudson is here presented, as closely in accordance with fact as is possible with the information at hand, and it is offered as a worthy addition to the recital of achievement presented in this publication.

T. W. Hudson, justice of the peace of Sherman, Texas, was born on December 24, 1836, in Georgia, and is a son of J. R. and Martha E. (Banks) Hudson, both natives of that State. The father was a farmer and a well-to-do slaveholder before the war. He migrated to Arkansas in 1849, taking up land in Columbia county, and there continued to farm in a small way up to the time of his death in 1883. The mother survived until They were the parents of eleven children, six sons and five daughters, and of that goodly family seven are living today. Judge Hudson is the third son of his parents.

T. W. Hudson had his early education in a little log schoolhouse in Arkausas, and when one considers the period and the progress of the educational system of the country at that time it is easy to arrive at the conclusion that the boy came through his school experience with the meagerest addition to his mental equipment. However, in later years, after the close of the Civil war, he repaired that lack to a great extent by attending school in Magnolia, Arkansas. Young Hudson volunteered for service in the Confederate army in May, 1861, and enlisted in Captain Reed's company. This company later disbanded and the young man returned home, but in April, 1862, he joined the company of Captain Henry Perry, Colonel Tom P. Dockery's regiment, and straightway moved to the front. He was in the battle at Farmington and on October 4th was wounded at Corinth, a ball passing through his left knee. His leg was amputated the next day, just above the knee, and before he was able to leave the hospital he was taken prisoner, sent to Iuka, Mississippi, and there held until January 3, 1863. Then, through the kinduess of a Miss Foster, of Florence, Alabama, he, with three other men who had each lost a leg, was taken in a mule wagon to Florence, Alabama. On March 25th following he went to Huntsville, thence to Mobile, and on April 13, 1863, started back overland to his Arkansas home. It was then that the young man, maimed and broken in health, decided that he must repair the lack he had experienced in his early schooling, and he began to attend school at Magnolia, Arkansas. As a result of this study he began teaching school in 1864 and he continued in that work until 1870. In 1871 he came to Texas, and he has ever since been identified with the State in one capacity or

The first location of Mr. Hudson in Texas was at Collinsville, and there he took up his teaching work again, continuing there for three years, until in 1873, when he was elected to the office of justice of the peace. That was his first civil office, and he served therein until 1885, when he went to Houston, and was elected there to the office of grand secretary of the Grand Lodge of Masons, an order to which he had long given allegiance as a member. He held that office for three years, then returned to Grayson county, and in November, 1890, was elected to the office of county clerk. He served faithfully for six years, during three successive terms, and in 1900 he was elected justice of the peace in Sherman, an office which he has continued to hold with all of credit to himself and to the city from then until now, or during a period of thirteen years. His service has been one of the most satisfactory order, and be has been returned to the office with pleasing regularity from year to year. Always a Democrat, he has done good work for the party in this county. Judge Hudson was a member of the county board at the time when the present Grayson county court house was completed and turned over to the public, in March, 1876, and he presided at the first court held in the new building. He also served as one of the first county officers after this building came into use.

Judge Hudson has been a member of the Masonic fraternity since 1858, and he has advanced well along in the various bodies. He is a devout Baptist and has long been a member of the church. On October 23, 1872, Judge Hudson was married in Collinsville, Texas, to Mrs. S. M. Westworth, who was a daughter of J. M. Doty, a pioneer farmer of Grayson county, who died here several years ago. Mrs. Hudson died November 28, 1913. The judge and his wife have four living children. Mrs. Hudson had a son by her first marriage, J. W. Westbrook, now about forty-five years of age and a resident of Oklahoma, where he is clerk of the county court at Ada, Oklahoma. The Hudson children are as follows: Nettie, the wife of R. E. Chambers, of Austin, Texas, cashier of the Citizens Bank of that city; Dan K. Hudson, a bookkeeper in the Merchants' and Planters' Bank of Sherman, and Homer D., of Austin, a bookkeeper in the banking and insurance department of the State.

The judge has his office on the corner of Houston and Crockett streets, while his residence is at No. 414

HON. ALFRED J. HARPER. The public career of Judge Harper began eighteen years ago when he was elected county judge of Limestone county, and his service has been continuous as county judge, as state senator and since 1911 as judge of the court of criminal appeals at Austin. His thorough qualifications as a lawyer, his broad experience in state and local affairs, and his disinterested and competent administration of every trust and duty of a public nature with which he has been honored, have been characteristic and influential in all his service, whether as a legislator or on the bench, and his dignity and industry have served to maintain the high standard of the Texas court of criminal appeals.

Alfred J. Harper was born in Scott county, Mississippi, May 17, 1864, a son of Robert E. and Fannie (Hodges) Harper, both of whom are natives of Alabama. His father, who was a merchant and planter in Mississippi, Tather, who was a merchant and planter in Mississippi, was a member of the Sixth Mississippi Infantry in the Confederate army during the war between the states, under the command of General Robert E. Lowery, while the regiment was commanded by Col. A. Y. Harper, an uncle of Judge Harper, and another uncle, James C. Harper, was a captain in the same regiment.

The education of Judge Harper was acquired in the schools of Mississippi, and his last teacher was J. R. Preston, now superintendent of public instruction in Mississippi, Coming to Texas in 1881, at the age of seventeen, in Limestone county, Judge Harper was employed for a time in the printing office of L. L. Foster, who was afterwards railroad commissioner of the state of Texas and later president of the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Bryan, Mr. Harper studied law in Limestone county at the office of Gibson & Doyle, was admitted to the bar in the spring of 1891, and has ever since been actively engaged in the work of his profession either as a lawyer or judge.

Judge Harper served as county judge of Limestone county for six years, from 1896 to 1902. The district comprising Limestone county sent him to the state senate for eight years, from 1903 to 1911, and he finally resigned from the senate to accept his present position as judge of the court of criminal appeals. His service in the state senate had some noteworthy features. He was chairman of judiciary committee No. 2; was author of "The Medical Practice Act;" was author of the Texas law compelling all railroads to fumigate their trains, the first law of its kind ever adopted in the United States, and one that since its passage by the Texas legislature has been adopted by many other states; was also joint author of the law authorizing the creation of drainage and levee districts for the reclaimation of bottom lands of Texas.

J. H Hudson

Judge Harper affiliates with the Masonic fraternity. being Past Master of Groesbeck Lodge No. 107, A. F. & A. M.; is a Royal Arch Masou and a Knights Templar; is Past Chancellor of Travid Lodge No. 20, Knights of Pythias; a member of the Knights of Honor, and belongs to the University Club of Austin and the Austin Press Club. Judge Harper married December 23, 1901, Miss Margaret L. Ingram, daughter of S. C. and Shelly (Mosely) Ingram, of Limestone county. Their four children are as follows: Alfred J. Harper, Jr., James O. Harper, Margaret Harper and Lloyd M. Harper. Judge Harper and family reside at 2830 Rio Grande Street in

W. W. COLLIER. For more than twenty years a prominent banker of southwest Texas, Mr. Collier must properly be included in that group of aggressive and forceful characters who have been chiefly instrumental in the development of this section of the state during the past half century. Mr. Collier is in every sense of the word a pioneer. He was during the early years of his life a member of the State Rangers force, and in that capacity offered himself for the protection and safeguarding of the frontiers of the Texas of that time. As a ranger he was all over west Texas from the rear grounds into the far northwest, and all rangers acquired a reputation for fearlessness and efficiency, qualities for which the ranger service has been noted since its establishment.
Mr. W. W. Collier was born at Rusk, in Cherokee

Anna (Lewis) Collier. The father, a native of Alabama, came to Texas in 1847 and became one of the early settlers in Smith county. Subsequently he moved into Cherokee county, and in 1867 to Waco, the city which remained his home during the remainder of his life. His death occurred in 1877. During the war between the states he had served in the Confederate army under General Magruder in the Traus-Mississippi Department. Two of his brothers were killed while serving as Confederate soldiers. His wife also had one brother who lost his life while fighting for the cause of the south.

Anna Lewis Collier was born at Rome, Georgia, Mr. W. W. Collier spent most of the years of his youth at Waco, and completed his education by graduation from the Robinson high school, a well known institution of its time and located five miles south of Waco. When he was eighteen years of age, in 1883, Mr. Collier rode to Austin on horseback and enlisted for service in the Texas State Rangers. He became a member of Company D, which was then commanded by Captain L. P. Sieker. The first assignment to duty was on the detach work at the crossing of the Nueces River in Uvalde county, and from that time forward for a period of four years and four months, he was in active and constant service as a ranger. His duties often required him to undertake long journeys alone, while at other times he was on duty in co-operation with his company. No finer body of state soldiery has even existed than the Texas State Rangers, and probably the only organization of a similar kind which can be compared with the Ranger force is that of the mounted police of western Canada. As Ranger Mr. Collier's service extended all along what was then the frontier of Texas from Laredo west to El Paso, and north and east into Hamilton county. The period of the eighties is remembered by old-timers and by students of Texas history as one of the worst in the history of the frontier. That was the great era of the range cattle business, when the cowboy and his followers were supreme, Vol. IV-2 during which time also the first great railway pushed by lines into the far west, and brought with them many attendant scenes of disorder and outlawry.

On leaving the ranger service Mr. Collier located at Uvalde, the county seat of Uvalde county, and soon afterwards was elected to the office of County Treasurer, Few men have been honored more consecutively in public office than Mr. Collier. By successive elections he held the position of county treasurer for twenty years, and at his retirement was one of the oldest and most highly esteemed public officials that Uvalde county had ever had. In the meantime, in 1890, he organized the first bank of Uvalde county, known for some time as the First National Bank of Uvalde. The business of this bank was subsequently liquidated and Mr. Collier then established a private bank, under the name of Collier & Company. This institution was later merged into the Uvalde National Bank of which Mr. Collier served as tradie National Bank of which Ar. Collier served as president. He continued in the banking business in Uvalde until 1907, at which date he moved his home to San Antonio, where he has been since a resident, and also active in banking and general financial affairs of this southwest Texas metropolis. He is now active vice president of the State Bank & Trust Company of San Antonio, one of the strongest and most influential financial institutions of southwest Texas.

Fraternally Mr. Collier is affiliated with the Masons, being a Kuights Templar and Shriner, and past master of his lodge at Uvalde. He is also a past deputy grand master of Texas. Mr. Collier married Miss Mattie Hale, who was born in Milan, Tennessee. Their five children are George Pierce, W. W., Jr., Shelley Hale, John Howell and Eleanor Collier.

ELISHA MARSHALL PEASE. While his administration through two terms as governor of Texas during the dec-ade of the fifties has placed the name of Elisha M. Pease prominently in Texas history, his career was one of much greater service and variety of experience than the brief space usually assigned to a governor's official term in the ordinary school books on Texas history could adequately describe. For one thing, it is not generally known that Governor Pease was in Texas and an active participant in the events leading up to the revolution and the organization of the government of the Republic in 1835-36. His service as provisional governor of Texas after the Civil war was much misunderstood during the existing turmoil of the state at that time. A brief sketch of his life and character, it is hardly necessary to state, has a very appropriate place in this publication. Elisha Marshall Pease was born at Enfield, Connecticut, January 3, 1812, a son of Lorrain Thompson and Sarah (Marshall) Pease. After his education in the public schools of Enfield and an academy at Westfield, Massachusetts, he began his career at the age of fourteen as clerk in a country store, and his early training in accounts and his habits of promptuess and punctuality in business were decided factors in his later success,

His business duties sent him south to New Orleans in 1834. New Orleans was then a center of intelligence for all affairs concerning the Texas country, and Mr. Pease, having heard many glowing accounts of the province west of the Sabine, determined to investigate their truth and venture into what was then Mexican territory. His point of landing was at Velasco, and thence he proceeded to the frontier settlement on the Colorado, locating at Mina, now the town of Bastrop. Colonel D. C. Barrett, subsequently prominent in the affairs of the Republic, was practicing law at Mina, and received Mr. Pease into his office as a student. While prosecuting his studies, he quickly gained an acquaintance and established himself in the confidence of the people in and about Mina, and soon afterward his clerical qualifications caused him to be appointed secretary of the Committee of Safety for the jurisdiction of Mina. That was his first active relation with public

of his long and eventful life.

The Texas revolution actually began in 1835, and Elisha M. Pease was present at the first skirmish between the Texan patriots and the Mexican authorities at Gonzales, which preceded the siege and capture of San Antonio and all the notable events which followed in its train. Soon afterwards Mr. Pease was made secretary of the council of the Provisional government, and held that position until the inception of the government ad interim in March, 1836. While Mr. Pease was not a member of the convention which declared the independence of Texas and formulated the first constitution for the republic, his abilities were so pronounced and his aid and skill in both the detailed and the comprehensive working out of the plans of government were so invaluable that he was called in to assist in a very material way in framing the ordinances for the new government, and did much more towards drawing up and perfecting that instrument than many of those who actually sat in the convention as delegates.

During the summer of 1836, after independence had been won, Governor Pease served successively as chief clerk of the navy and treasury departments, and for some time acted as secretary of the treasury after the death of Secretary Hardeman. In November, 1836, came his appointment as clerk of the judiciary committee of the House of Representatives, and in that capacity he drafted the laws creating and defining the duties of the various county officers. At the close of the first session of Congress, in December, 1836, President Houston offered him the portfolio of postmaster general, a high honor which he felt obliged to decline, since it was his desire to continue the study of law and enter active practice. His law studies were accordingly resumed in the office of Col. John J. Wharton at Brazoria, and in April, 1837, Mr. Pease was admitted to the bar of the Republic at the old town of Washington on the Brazos. An appointment as comptroller of public accounts gave him official duties which he resigned in the following December and returned to Brazoria, where he took up the active practice of law in co-partnership with Col. John Wharton, In 1838 John W. Harris became associated with them, and after the death of Col. Wharton the firm of Harris & Pease continued for many years and as advocate and counselors probably no firm at the time ranked higher and had a better record of success than this.

While a successful career as a lawyer was adding to his fame, Governor Pease was seldom without some official vocation. He served as district attorney for a term and after the annexation of Texas to the Union in 1846 was elected a member of the first legislature from Brazoria county. In the following session, which had a great burden of duties. Mr. Pease had a prominent part and was author of the law regulating proceedings in District courts and of many other notable measures of the session. Re-elected to the house for the second legislature he became chairman of the judiciary committee, and originated the probate laws of Texas in which he was thected in 1850, and served during the regular session, but was absent from the state when Governor Bell convened an extra session, and at that time he residened and terminated his legislative service.

In 1853 the people of Texas elected Elisha M. Pease as their governor, and he was re-elected in 1855. These two administrations are characterized in the history of the early state as one of great prosperity, governmental economy, the promotion of much wise legislation whose fruits are still bearing in the state. The revolutionary debt was finally cancelled, a school fund of two million dollars was created, and alternate sections of lands granted to railroads under old charters were set apart for the benefit of public schools; the lunatic asylum, orphan asylum, institutions for the deaf and dumb and blind were established and ample grants of land made for their support, A notable provision of his term as governor was the setting aside of one hundred thousand dollars to provide for the state university. All these measures and reforms were recommended by Governor Pease and were carried out largely through his active influence and leadership. While so much was done to lay the foundations of the later educational and charitable institutions and in other progressive ways, the cost of the government administration was remarkable for its economy. The expenses of the various state departments aggregated less than the amount of revenue derived from taxation, and at the end of Governor Pease's second administration Texas was free from debt. Perhaps no governor of the time showed a more watchful interest in behalf of the people of the state and more closely safeguarded the future welfare than Governor Pease. An illustration of this is seen in his rejection of the attempted deposit of the spurious Pacific railroad bonds, which would have constituted an onerous burden upon the people for many years to come. In other ways he saved the state large sums of money.

Governor Pease always acted with the Democratic party until the policy of secession drove him out of its ranks in 1861. In his opinion, nothing in the situation of affairs justified the secession movement, and it was viewed by him as opening a sure path to disaster and humiliation. Though opposing secession and occupying much the same high ground as Sam Houston, Governor Pease continued a resident of Texas throughout the war, but was not active in public affairs. After its close but was not acree in public analis. After his close the subsequently was affiliated for the greater part with the Republican party. In 1867 came his appointment as provisional governor of the state by the military authorities, an office which he held until 1869. His resignation at the latter date was the result of the difference of opinion between him and the commander of the district in regard to the re-organization of the state government. A few years later, in 1872, Governor Pease represented Texas in the convention at Cincinnati which nominated Horace Greeley for president. In 1874 the office of collector of the port of Galveston was offered him by Secretary Bristow under the Grant administration, but was declined; however, in 1879, he accepted the same position when it was tendered him by President Haves, and his official administration as collector of the Galveston port was his last public service. He was one of the organizers of the First National Bank of Austin, and took an active part in its management as vice president until his death.

G. W. Pease died at Lampasas on August 26, 1883. There survives him one daughter, Julia M. Pease, who lives in the old homestead in Austin,

Governor Pease had intellectual talents of a high order. Much of his success, especially in the law, was due to his ready perception of the basic principles and the gist of any proposition. An ability to act in accordance with the promptings of his sound judgment was also an important element in his public life. While defferential to the opinions of others, and in affairs of state often submitting his course of action to a conneil of advisers, Governor Pease was noted for his independence and his course of action was usually his own, and not the product of the judgment of others. As a lawyer, these qualities naturally made him a safe counselor. His conclusions were the result of a deep and patient search for truth, sustained by a calm, impartial and discriminating mind, and his views, once formulated, were maintained with honesty and candor to the end. It is said that few lawyers of his time were more expert in determining the merit of a case upon proper statement of the facts, and he would never advise fruitless or doubtful litigation, but made it a rule to instruct his clients to accept a bad compromise rather than a successful suit without practical advantage.

His briefs were clear, fair and logical, and revealed a patient research which placed to his advantage every legal resource. However, it was noteworthy that he would never seek nor accept any undue or unfair advantage over his opponent. Chief Justice Wheeler once said that the statement of the facts in his briefs were always so lucid and just that he could rely upon them without reference to the record.

He was honest and steadfast in his political convictions. In private and social life Governor Pease was congenial, generous and kind-hearted, and his home was the seat of a flowing and generous hospitality.

Governor Pease was married in 1850 to Miss L. C., Niles of Windsor, Connecticut. After his death she maintained at her home near Austin the hospitality which during his lifetime had welcomed friends to a generous board. In conclusion, it can he said that Governor Pease in all the relations of his long life made the Golden Rule his motto. He was a model husband, father and friend, and above all an honest man and a true patriot. The record of his public services form some of the brightest pages of Texas history, and it is not one to be soon forgotten and in succeeding generations is likely to receive even truer and better appreciation than it has in the past.

SIMON J. CLARK, M. D. Among the younger members of the medical fraternity who are rapidly winning their way upward to positions of eminence in their chosen calling, few have gained the distinction already attained by Dr. Simon J. Clark, already recognized as one of the leading eye, ear, nose and throat specialists in the state. He was born July 21, 1882, at Titusville, Pemsylvania, and is a son of William and Mary (Nesbit) Clark, both of whom are now residents of Nocona, Texas, to which point they came from the East in 1890. William Clark, who is now engaged in the real estate business and is known as one of his adopted community's substantial citizens, is a veteran of the Civil War, through which he served as a member of the Second Regiment, New York Volunteer Infantry.

Although born in the East, Doctor Clark is by nurture and training a son of the Southwest, for he was but three years of age when he was brought to Texas by his parents and here he grew to sturdy and self-reliant manhood. His early education was secured in the graded and high schools of Nocona, Texas, following which he prepared for his medical career, for which he had shown a natural inclination from boyhood. After his gradua-tion from the medical department of the University of Texas, in 1907, he spent two and one-half years in the Rexis, in 400, he spent two and one-hair years in the Manhattan Eye, Ear, Nose and Throat Hospital, at New York City, and for one year thereafter was associated with Doctors Wood and Alport, of Chicago, the former being acknowledged as one of the greatest eye specialists to be found in the world. Doctor Clark estables lished himself in practice at Austin in 1912, and this city has since been the field of his labors and the scene of his many successes, and he has rapidly advanced towards the leaders in his special line. Indeed, it is claimed that at this time he controls the largest professional business of any eye, ear, nose and throat specialist in the city, although Doetor Clark is a very modest and unassuming man and prefers to let his accomplishments speak for However, his many friends are confident in themselves. their assertions that if past achievements may be taken as a criterion of future performances his name will be known not alone locally, but nationally. He continues to be a constant and assidnous student, attending lectures. subscribing to the best literature of the profession, and being an active and interested member of the Austin Medical Society, the Texas State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. He maintains offices at No. 402 Scarborough Building.

Doctor Clark is unmarried. He is popular in social circles of the city, belonging to the Austin Rotary Club, and is also a valued member of the Masons, Austin Lodge No. 12. His religious connection is with the Presbyterian church, in the work of which has taken an active interest. His home is located at No. 205 East Ninth street. Although Doctor Clark's practic has been of such a nature as to preclude the idea of his entering actively into public matters, he has ever shown a commendable public spirit and has assisted in movements which have made for the betterment of the community, thus showing himself one of Austin's helpful citizens.

Dee Davis was born October 23, 1885, in McLennan county, Texas, a son of Henry and Fannie E. Davis, now of Sterling City, where his father, who has heen a successful ranchman, is now engaged in the loan business. He came from Missouri to Texas, settling in McLennan county, and there are several families of the Davis name in Missouri, where Grandfather Davis was a slaveholder before the war, and the result of that conflict impoverished him as it did so many other southern planters.

He gave bond and took charge of the office on November 18, 1912. Since he took charge, as one of the duties of his office, of the county jail, only three prisoners have been confined in that structure, two Mexicans and one white man. BENJAMIN F. BELLOWS. Thirty-seven years a residence for Texas, Mr. Bellows has enjoyed prosperity as a business man in this state, and is one of the men who has helped develop the southwest county. As a young man he lived in the northeastern states and is a veteran of the Civil war,

Benjamin F. Bellows was born at Granville, New York, June 20, 1844, a son of Levi D. and Hannah M. Bellows. He resided in New York state most of his years up to 1876, in which year he came to Texas. His early education was in the schools of his native state, finishing in the high school at Troy, and on leaving school he took up the carpenter and builders trade. That was his regular occupation until he left New York. During the sixties he went to Massachusetts to take up some work there, and while in that state enlisted in the army and spent two years as a soldier of the Union. After the war he returned to New York and in 1876 came to the southwest and located in Bandera county, which continued to be his home for about twenty years. During that time he was engaged principally in the sheep business, and is one of the pioneer sheep men of the county which was then, as well as now, to a considerable extent, noted for its great sheep herds. In Bandera county Mr. Bellows built a little town of Medina. He was a pioneer in enterprise in this locality, and erected the first cotton gin in Bandera county, and brought in the first steam engine operated within the limits of that county. Finally ill health and overwork compelled him to sell out all his holdings there, after which he spent a time in travel for recuperation, and finally located at Sonora in Sutton county. Here he has since been engaged in the lumber business, carrying a complete line of building material, and having an extensive retail business throughout this section of the state. Mr. Bellows in line with his early occupation, also follows contracting and building. It is said that he has erected more than one-half of all the buildings in Sonora and vicinity.

Mr. Bellows was married at Wolurn, Massachusetts, October, 1867, to Aliss Elizabeth M. Foule, daughet of October, 1867, to Aliss Elizabeth M. Foule, daughet of Aliss Brown and the daughet of the Aliss Brown and the second and the s

EDWIN E. SAWVER. A resident of Sonora, Mr. Sawyer's interests are so extensive in banking and general financial circles that he is actually identified with some four or five towns and cities of western Texas. He has had an unusually successful career. At the age of fourteen years he began for himself in farm labor, a few years later obtained a position in a shoe factory, and at the age of twenty-two came to Texas and engaged in the cattle business, which was the foundation for his present large and generous prosperity.

Edwin E. Sawyer is a naive of the state of Maine, and all his neople have been New Englanders. He was born at Stillwater, May 10, 1855, a son of Enos and Prances Sawyer, both of whom were born in Maine. He received a good common school education in the public schools of his native state and then started in the meat and poultry business in his native state, at Stillwater, but this venture resulted in his financial ruin and prompted him to come to Texas, where he arrived in January, 1877. He first located in Panders county, where he lived for about ten years, and was actively connected with the stock and ranching industry. He next transferred his operations to Kerr county, where he continued as a rancher for about eight years, and then in 1896 came to Sutton county and bought the Fort Terrett Ranch. After more than thirty years of enterprise as a rancher and stock farmer, he sold out his interests in that business in 1909. He is still the own, however, of a large amount of real estate property, in different sections of the state.

In banking affairs, Mr. Sawyer has been narticularly prominent for some years. In 1911 he bought an interest in the First National Bank of Del Rio, and has been tils president since that time. He is also a stock holder and director in the First National Bank of Sonora, is one of the organizers and stock holders of the Commercial National Bank of El Paso; was one of the original promoters and is now a stock holder in the Citizens Bank and Trust Commany of San Antonio; and also owns a large share of the stock in the Del Rio Bank and Trust Company

Mr. Sawver has been twice married. He was married at Fort Terrett to Miss Gertrude Brown, who died in 1907 at the are of twenty-seven. At Maxfield, Maine, in September, 1912, Mr. Sawver married Miss Mac Clough, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. H. Clough of Newport, Vermont. Mr. Sawyer affiliates with the Knights of Pythias and the Elks, and has no regular membership in church, but gives his support to all denominations alike. In politice, the result of the support o

CLIFORD E. HEFFLER. Among the active and progressive business men of the city of E Paso, Clifford E. Heffler holds a prominent place. Starting out to earn his own living when he was only a hoy he has steadily forged to the front, gathering experience and profiting by this experience as he went along. He has lived in many parts of the world and as a member of the United States hospital corps he had the inestimable benefit of service in foreign countries and of contact with men of many kinds. All of which gave him a broad view of the world and his popularity in EI Paso is due rather to his geniality and splendid character than to his business success.

Clifford E. Heffler was born in Boston, Massachusetts, on the 8th of June, 1872. His father is Captain Edward Heffler, who has been in the service of the Canadian government for thirty years. He has been in the revenue service and is a well known resident of Halifax, Nova Scotia, where he and his wife, Annie Heffler, have lived for many years. Clifford E. Heffler received his educa-tion in the public schools of Boston, Massachusetts, for a time being a student at one of the city high schools. He had to leave school at the age of fourteen and he entered the employ of the Maverick Drug Company, of Boston. He rose steadily in the estimation of his employees and made a remarkable success for a young boy, for he was at one time manager of one of their branch stores. He remained in the employ of this drug company for about six years and although the future held out bright prospects for him, he determined to go into the hospital service. He enlisted when he was about twenty-one years of age, in the Massachusetts Hospital Corps and served through the Spanish American war, being detailed for duty in the Philippines. When he was mustered out of the volunteer service, the interest and fascination of the service had taken so strong a hold that he enlisted in the regular hospital corps of the United States army, and served about two and a half years. Part of this time he was stationed in the "land of dopy dreams," and upon leaving the islands he went to China where he served until he was discharged on account of disability, his long service in the tropical countries having been too much for his constitution. He then went to Fort Huchucha and remained for about six months in the attempt to regain his health,

He returned to Boston, as yet far from well and started on the road as a traveling salesman. thus engaged for about a year when his health again began to fail and he came west again, this time settling in El Paso. Here he accepted a position with the electric light company and worked for this concern for a year at the end of which time he went into business for himself. He established an electric supply business and carries a full line of electric supplies and fixtures, and he has a large and growing patronage. He is also engaged in the contracting and manufacturing of electric fixtures and does a general wholesale and retail business, his trade extending all through western Texas, New Mexico and Arizona. He has also erected and sold many houses in the city and always has several for sale. Although his years in the army almost ruined his health, Mr. Heffler considers them the most valuable perhaps that he has spent, for it was then that he learned self reliance and dependence on his own judgment. One of his most striking characteristics is his confidence in himself, not that he is aggressively so, but no matter how large the task if in his judgment it is possible of accomplishment be does not hesitate about starting out to accomplish. He has had many obstacles to overcome since locating in El Paso and this quality is what has carried him through. This spirit which he carries into his business relations makes him a valuable man in public matters and since he is always interested in every movement for the public good, he holds a prominent place in the life of the city.

Mr. Heffler is a communicant of the Protestant Episcopal church, and in political affiliations he is independent. He takes no active part although be is keenly interested in local politics. He is a member of the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons and also belongs to the Sons of Jove and to the Loyal Order of Moose. He is a member of the Canadian Club of El Paso and is one of the present officers.

Clifford Heffler was married at Halifax, Nova Scotia, in 1899, to Nellie McLennan, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward McLennan, of Halifax. Mr. and Mrs. Heffler have three children, as follows: Clifford E., Jr., Norma

L. and Gerald.

Mr. Heffler says that he came to El Paso a sick man and that he has not only fully recovered his health but has also established a prosperous and lucrative business and that in his opinion El Paso and western Texais destined for continued prosperity in the years to come.

Dr. Newt Long. Among the successful physicians of Sweetwater, Texas, Dr. Newt Long takes a high rank. He is one of those men who is never content with what he has accomplished but feels that he must do yet more. Progressive and up-to-date, the doctor never lets an opportunity for further study and research along the lines of his profession slip by, and as a result he is able to offer to the people of Sweetwater medical service of the highest order. His wide personal popularity proves that he is a man as well as a physician, and he is one of the citizens whom Sweetwater is proud to claim.

Dr. Long is of Scotch-Irish descent, coming from some of the old Southern families, his ancestors having been large slave-owners before the war. He was born on the 28th of February, 1869, at Marquez, Texas, the son of William C. Long and Elizabeth Long. His father was a native of Alabama who settled in Marquez in the early days of Texas, about 1847. He entered the Confederate service with the outherask of the Civil war, and was wounded in one of the engagements. He continued his business, which was that of a merchant, in Marquez after the close of the war and there made his home until 1896 when he removed to Santa Anna. He retired from active business after a throat and did the civil was the continued with the continued with the confederate from active for the was an early settler of the state. Mrs. Long died in 1966, on the 9th of March. Nine children were born to William Long and his wife, four boys and five girls and the doctor was the youngest of these.

Dr. Long received his early education in the grammat and high schools of Texas. Then having determined to become a physician he entered the medical department of the University of Texas, from which he was graduated in 1896 with the degree of M. D. He has since studied further, taking a degree from the Post-Graduate Medical College in Chicago on April 15, 1905, and being graduated from a course in the Chicago Polyrelinic on March 15, 1907. After his graduation from the state university Dr. Long began to practice his profession in Santa Anna, Texas. He opened his office on February 1, 1897, and practiced in this city until October 10, 1910. He then removed to Sweetware where he has resided ever since. He has built up a flourishing practice in this city, being both a physician and surgeon, and his services are in constant demand.

In politics Dr. Long is and has always been a member of the Democratic party. He is active in fractoral affairs, being a member of the Ancient Free and Accepted Massons, and belonging to the Commandery. He is a member of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks, and is Exalted Ruler of the local lodge. He also belongs to the Knights of Pythias and to the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He is a member of the Commercial Club and is deeply interested in all civic questions. In his religious affiliations the doctor is a member of the Christian church and he is an elder in this congregation.

his religious ambitations the doctor is a member of the Christian church and he is an eldeir in this congregation. On September 13, 1893, Dr. Long was united in marriage to Miss Ida Spencer, of Marquez, Texas. Her father was an ex-Confederate soldier and had been through the entire war. Dr. and Mrs. Long have become the parents of three daughters, Gladys, Leah and Adriene. They are all in school and their ages are fourteen, twelve and ten respectively.

J. D. CARROLL. One of the pioneer citizens and business men of Quanah is J. D. Carroll. Mr. Carroll was at one time a young man dependent upon the labor of his hands and his native intelligence to give him his living and his start in the world. Many months of his earlier career were spent in work at fifty cents a day, the had a long training both in farm work and in clerking in a store. Through this varied experience he has eome up until for a number of years he has been recognized as one of the most influential and most pre-perous business men of Quanah.

J. D. Carroll was horn in the State of Georgia, in Henry county, in December, 1852, the first of two children born to Ellert and Elizabeth (Harrison) Carroll, both natives of Georgia. The father, sho was a planter, enlisted and served in the Mexican war of 1846, and thus was one of the early residents of Texas, baving remained a short time in the State about the time of the war. He returned to Georgia, where he died at a comparatively early age in 1856. The mother was educated and married in Georgia, and died in Corsicana, Texas, May 5,

As a boy J. D. Carroll attended schools in Georgia, and his first regular employment was on a farm. He worked in a store in Mississippi for eighteen months, and then came to Texas, and after spending a while in different portions of the State, located in Freestone county in 1872. Freestone county at that time was sparsely settled, and be arrived in time to take part in its pioneer period. He worked on a farm for one year, and then was employed in a store. In 1889 Mr. Carroll moved out to Quanah, about three years after the railroad was built through the town, and was thus one of the first business men to locate in the little village. He established the first stock of hardware in Quanah, and from that original enterprise has developed a large and very important husiness, with a trade throughout this section of Texas. In 1893 the business was incorporated under the name of Stittler & Carroll Implement Company. The firm owns the buildings in which the business is conducted and eight clerks are employed in attending to the trade, Mr. Carroll is also a director in hardware companies in Hardeman and Foard counties, and one of the directors in the Texas Hardware and Implement Association. As a citizen Mr. Carroll has served as a member of the city council of Quanah and is a loyal Democrat. He is a member of the Masonic order. On December 24, 1878, in Navarro county, he married Miss Bettie Burelson, a daughter of Edward and Julia Burelson, old residents of Texas, and now deceased. The five children of Mr. and Mrs. Carroll are: Mrs. Belle O'Dell, born in Freestone county, now a resident of New Mexico, and the mother of two children; Homer Carroll, born in Corsicana, Texas, and secretary of the Carroll Company; Jennie B. Carroll, born at Quanah; J. D. Carroll, Jr., born at Quanah; Dorris Carroll, born at Quanab.

ROBERT A. WHITLOCK. Among the most popular business men in the city of El Paso, Texas, is to be found Resert A. Whitlock, the well known lumberman. He has resided in El Paso for ten years or so and during this time has succeeded not only in building up a fine business but also in making myriads of friends. He is vice president and manager of one of the largest lumber concerns in this section of the country, and it is due in no small measure to his practical business ability and unlimited energy that the business has attained its present size.

Robert A. Whitlock was born in Alleghany City, Pennsylvania, on the 28th of May, 1872. He did not grow up in the Keystone state, however, for when he was only two years of age his parents moved to Indiana. Here he spent his childhood and he well remembers the date, the 23rd of October, 1883, when his father and mother left Indiana for their new home in Nevada, Missouri. Here he received his education attending the grammar and high schools, and after finishing the courses herein offered he was ready to go forth and play his part in the world. It was in the spring of 1894 that he left home to go to St. Louis where he had accepted a position of a clerical nature in the office of the Bogwell Timber Company.

After remaining in St. Louis for about three years he came south to Alexandria, Louisiana, where he engaged in the lumber business with the Tioga Lumber Company. He remained with this firm for about two years, and then accepted a position with the Central Lumber Company at Lincecum, Louisiana. He was with this company for a year and then in 1901 came to Texas.

Upon first coming to the state he settled in Pine Ridge where he held the position of secretary and treasurer of the Pine Ridge Lumber Company. After three years spent in this section of eastern Texas, he removed to El Paso and in company with C. S. Woodworth, organized the El Paso Lumber Company. He is now vice president and manager of this concern, and the business which started in a modest way has grown to large proportions, and still continues to grow. The firm handles lumber of all kinds and also deals in building materials. Mr. Whitlock has given all of his life as a business man to the lumber trade and no one is better equipped than he to manage a large business such as the El Paso Lumber Company. Much of the success which the firm has met with has been due to the judgment and expert knowledge of the young manager.

In his religious beliefs Mr. Whitlock is a member of the Baptist church. He is a member of the Knights of Pythias, and belongs to the Texas grand lodge of this order. He is also a member of the Hoo Hoo, a lumber men's society, and his popularity and the high esteem in which he is held by his business associates is clearly shown by his record as a member of this society. He was appointed for western district of Texas a vicegerent snark just ninety days after becoming a Hoo Hoo, which in itself is a record unequaled in the history of the order, and he has held this office for five consecutive years, a most unusual honor, and one seldom attained by a man. Mr. Whitlock is an active member of the chamber of commerce. In politics he is a member of the Republican party, but takes no active part, other than easting his vote at election time. When he resided in eastern Texas he was connected with the school board at one time, but his business cares have been too heavy to permit of many other interests since coming to El Paso.

Mr. Whitlock owns a fine automobile and is very fond of this form of travel or sport. He thinks that this section of Texas is one of the finest spots in the world. and says that a man who is honest and ambitious and willing to work will make no mistake in settling in this valley for the climate and opportunities are here.

At Lineecum, Louisiana, on the 28th of May, 1902, Mr. Whitlock was married to Miss Anna Janney Wood-worth, a daughter of C. S. Woodworth of that place.

Mr. and Mrs. Woodworth now make their home in El Paso. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Whitlock, namely, Fred Janney and Jessie Jane.

WAYMAN F. WELLS. (A sketch published in 1893.) In portraying the lives of the pioneers of Texas, the heroes of San Jacinto and the first settlers of Bastrop and Travis counties, no name is more worthy of mention than that of the subject of this sketch. In looking over the now thickly populated and finely cultivated country it is difficult for one to imagine what great changes have taken place during the active lifetime of as early a resident as Mr. Wells.

In 1826 Mr. Wells, then a lad of eleven years, accompanied his father's family from their home in Alabama to this new and wild country, at that time belonging to Mexico. There were then but few small civilized settlements in what is now the great State of Texas, one of which was situated in what is now Fayette county. With this last settlement the Wells family cast their lot during the first year. The next year, however, they pushed their way forward to the frontier, until they came to what is now Bastrop county, which locality was then principally inhabited by Indians and wild animals, the Wells family being among the first settlers, the mother and sisters of Mr. Wells being the first white women that had ever ventured as far north on Texas soil. Amidst these surroundings the youth of Mr. Wells was passed, his time being occupied in assisting his father, in opening up the frontier farm and in caring for the stock. The farm was situated on what has since been known as Wells' Pyramid, fifteen miles from where the city of Bastrop now stands. For some years Mr. Wells' life was spent much like that of other boys of his age, but in those days boys matured to man's estate early. and, being the oldest son, many of the cares of the farm and stock devolved on him, thus materially strengthening his independence and natural firmness of character.

This sort of life continued without interruption until the year 1835, when the oppression and tyranny of the Mexican government became so strongly felt that the settlers resolved to bear their burdens no longer, and war was declared. Mr. Wells was among the first to join the army, which was composed of as brave men as could be found on the globe. On account of his familiarity with the country Mr. Wells was selected by his commander as a spy, and through his efforts the army was enabled to secure much important information of the movements and number of the enemy. He participated in the celebrated battles and defeats at San Antonio and Goliad, and followed the fortunes of the Texas army until its reorganization under General Sam Houston, when it was resolved to make a last resistance. Accordingly, on April 21, 1836, the battle of San Jacinto was fought, when a little army of 783 brave men, poorly equipped, scantily clothed and half starved, marched up, and in less than half an hour (eighteen minutes says Houston in his report), crushed to atoms an army of 1,500 men, splendidly accountered, well fed and ably generaled by Santa Anna. This is little short of marvelous, but these men were each a Hercules; their war cry was, "Remember the Alamo," and ten thousand men could not have daunted their courage. They were fighting for their lives and those of their loved ones, as well as avenging the death of those who had been murdered by the Mexicans. This little army was made up of such men as Mr. Wells, and they followed their leader, General Houston, with no thought other than victory. It is such men that gained for Texas her independence and made her a Republic. It is such men as these that have made Texas the greatest State in the Union which constitutes the grandest nation on the face of the earth, and the posterity of these men will look back over the history of Texas with pride in the knowledge that their forefathers were the ones who so nobly fought and bled that they might lay the foundation of a commonwealth of peaceful and happy homes, which their posterity now enjoy. Too much cannot be said in honor of the veterans of San Jacinto. They will live in the memory of their posterity as well as in that of the newer comers, who are enabled to enjoy the fruits of their courage and valor.

Besides serving in the Texas and Mexican wars, Mr. Wells subsequently took an active part in all the Indian wars, and his extensive knowledge of the frontier aided the settlers materially in keeping the savages at bay.

The early record of his life having been omitted, it The early record of his file having been omitted, it is now inserted. Mr. Wells was born in Lincoln county, Tennessee, May 11, 1815, and was the oldest son of Martin and Sally (Boyd) Wells, both natives of the same state and county. When he was two years of age his parents removed to Marengo county, Alabama, where his father followed agricultural pursuits until the latter emigrated to Texas in 1826. As previously stated, Waymau lived at home with his father until the outbreak of the Texas and Mexican war, which he entered at the age of nineteen. After the war Wayman returned home, where, during the same year, 1836, his father died, leaving the care of the family and farm to him. The family consisted of five sons and three daughters, two daughters being then married,

He efficiently continued the management of the homestead until 1855, at which time he removed to Travis county. He there first purchased eighteen hundred acres on Walnut creek, to which he afterwards added one hundred and sixty acres more, and subsequently bought one hundred and seventy-five acres of timber land. He was here extensively engaged in farming and stock-raising until his death. Besides his large landed estates and extensive stock business Mr. Wells owned numerous slaves, of which latter property he was deprived through the result of the late war. Not being discouraged by the loss of his property, however, he pushed on, and being a shrewd trader he continued to increase the value of his property, and at the time of his death was considered one of the wealthy men of his section of Texas.

March 4, 1848, Mr. Wells was married to Miss Mary E. Bacon, native of Tennessee, born in Washington county, October 30, 1817. Her parents, Thomas and Julia Ann (Harderman) Bacon, were both natives of the same county as herself, where they were married, and whence they emigrated, in 1835, to Texas. They first settled in San Augustine county, but in 1839 removed to Wells prairie, Bastrop county, and afterward to Travis county, where Mr. Bacon died in 1851, and Mrs. Bacon in 1859.

Were but simple justice to be done the memory of the subject of this review, it would be most consonant that more particular attention be directed to those noble characteristics which were a dominating power in his life and which animated his every action during the long years which were a power for good to the extent of their duration. He maintained a lively interest in all that tended to conserve the welfare and advancement of the community in which he lived and he contributed liberally to public institutions of all denominations and his benevolence was as unstinted as it was unostentatious. He was particularly concerned in the providing of educational facilities for the youth of the State, and contributed largely to the building of the Southwestern University of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, at Georgetown, and the Baptist high school at Walnut Creek. All public enterprises found in him a ready He was one of the board of trustees of the State Insane Asylum, under Governor Lubbock, and simultaneously served as County Commissioner. He had ever a responsive recognition of the sufferings of the fatherless and the widow and was never known to refuse the extending of a helping hand. A man cast in the finer mold, one who dignified humanity and made the world hetter for his having lived, there was in his death a consistent consummation which can but rob the grave of its victory and death of its sting.

Mr. and Mrs. Wells had nine children, six of whom lived to be grown and five of whom still survive: Amanda, wife of George LaRue; Sally Boyd died aged seventeen; Julia Ann died aged four; David L. and Martin Thomas died in infancy; Peter C., of Elgin, Bastrop county, married Katie Walling and they have five children; George Henry married Annie Anderson and resides in El Paso, Texas; J. M., and Wayman Thomas.

Mrs. Wells, a lady of strong force of character, was well fitted by nature and experience to be a helpmate for a man making a frontier home. She dispensed hospitality with a cheerful hand to friends and strangers alike, in true Texas style, and in a way known only to the true Texas frontier families. She has survived her husband, and now, at the age of seventy-six, retains in a remarkable degree the vigor of her youth. She is a devoted member of the Baptist church and interested in all good works.

After a long, active and useful life in Texas, Mr. Wells was called to his last home, February 25, 1878, but before his death, he espoused the cause of Christ and died with a full conviction that he would be saved and meet his loved ones in that place which knows no parting. He was deeply mourned by a loving family and a large circle of friends. His wife lost a loving and tender husband, his children an indulgent father, and the community a generous charitable citizen. He was identified fraternally with the A. F. & A. M., under whose auspices his funeral services were conducted.

Since this memoir was written, Mrs. Wells has been called to the home beyond, dying on the 19th of May,

G. F. LARUE. Much has been said concerning the remarkable transformation in the live stock industry of Texas, concerning the changes which have caused the disappearance of the old Texas long-horn and the substitution of modern high-grade cattle, and at the same time the subdivision of the open range into fenced fields and pastures, and a development of the modern stock farm. For the permanent economic wealth and welfare of Texas no change has been more important than that, and in a history of a development which has been so significant wherever possible mention should be made of and credit given to the individuals whose work was responsible for this transformation. There were many instances of Texas cattle men who were successful as range stock men, and who steadily resisted the progress which brought about the division of the range into stock farms. At the same time there were others, of a more progressive nature, who advanced with the time, who accepted the changing conditions of agricultural economy, and who became leaders in the new movement. One of those prominently identified as a leader in modern live stock farming, and who was abreast of if not often in advance of the times was the late G. F. LaRue, who was for thirty years actively engaged in the leading Texas industry, and whose stock interests were large and important in Travis county.

A son of David and Rebecca (Fauss) LaRue, G. L. LaRue was born October 9, 1839, in Adams county, Pennsylvania, the son of a farmer and stockman of that state. Educated in the public schools of his native state and with a training in a business college, he partly earned his way while attending school by clerking in a store. Early in life he went west, was in Nebraska for a time, and from there in 1861 moved to Texas, and at the heginning of the war joined Allen's Brigade. He was captured with his command at Arkansas Post and taken back to Pennsylvania, being released in 1862. Thenceforward he remained in the north during the war, and during a portion of the period of hostilities was engaged as a clerk in the war department at Washington.

His early experience in Texas led him in 1867 to return to the state, and the first three years were spent in the revenue service at Cameron in Milam county. March 3, 1869, Mr. LaRue married Miss Amanda Wells, a daughter of Wayman F. Wells, one of the veterans of the battle of San Jacinto, a noteworthy Texas patriot, of whom a sketch will be found in preceding paragraphs. After his marriage Mr. LaRue and his wife located on the Wells' farm in Travis county. It was there that his career as a stockman reached its greatest prosperity and influence, and before he died in 1897 Mr. LaRue was credited with having one of the finest farms for registered stock in this section of the state. He gave his attention not only to cattle, but to sheep and fancy poultry. While he shipped stock to the regular markets, the greatest benefit that came from his enterprise was in supplying stock for other farms all over the state, and it would be impossible to estimate the great value which bis leadership in improving and maintaining the finest grades of live stock had upon that industry in this state. He believed that high-grade stock was just as profitable to Texas as to older parts of the country, and his own success in that line did much to stimulate other stockmen to follow his example. The character which he exemplified in his business was carried into all his relations, and he was a man of fine personality, the soul of honor, and highly esteemed for his integrity and abil-ity. In his home and community he was a public spirited citizen and a loving husband and father. After his death Mrs. LaRue moved to Austin in 1901, and still resides in that city. She is a woman of culture and refinement, and for a number of years has been one of the regular patrons and readers in the State University library, and has kept herself fully informed on the many subjects of interest in the world of art, science and Distory. The children of Mr. and Mrs. LaRue are: Inge, wife of Robert Walling of Austin; Myrthe, who lives with her mother Etta, outin; Pay, wife of It. Hearing a farmer and real estate man of Austin; Norton, who is interested in the oil fields of California; Miss George, a trained nurse and a graduate of the medical department of the University of Texas; Ruth, graduate from the University of Texas in 1910, and is the wife of I. S. Kibbe, easiler of the First State Bank of Fowlerton, Texas.

James R. Middlerrock, M. D. After five years of active practice at Alpine, Dr. Middlerbook has been accorded the position of the leading practitioner of medicine in that town and vicinity. He has wor this distinction by ability of unusual order, and is one of the skillful representatives of the modern class of medical men, who are fortified by thorough training and who bring to their practice the experience and knowledge of all the generations of doctors who has preceded them.

Dr. Middlebrook not only has an excellent practice in his profession, but enjoys a place of special esteem as a citizen of Alpine, and has a most happy family life. James Middlebrook was born in McLennan county, Texas, August 29, 1879, and all his career with the exception of the years spent in the study of medicine have been passed in Texas. His father was John W. Middlebrook who was a Virginian by birth, but came to Texas when a young man and followed farming in McLennan county for many years. The maiden hame of his wife was Sallie O'Donnell, who was born in Missouri, and was fantried in Arkansas. Dr. Middlebrook, the oldest in a family of five children, had his early education in the public schools, and then went to St. Louis, where he was a student for a time in the Marion Sims medical college, the completed his preparation for the profession in the Memphis Medical Hospital College, where he was graduated M. D. in 1903. Equipped with his degree in medicine, Dr. Middlebrook first located at Stratford, Texas, but affer two years moved to Fort Worth, where he was engaged in practice for three years, and from that city came out to Alpine and established his office and began acquiring patronage among the inhabitants of this locality.

On April 16, 1901, Dr. Middlebrook was married at Leroy, 'texas, to Miss Laura Waters, whose family is one of the oldest in Texas, and its members bore an honorable share in making Texas during its pioneer period. Her tather, Samuel E. Waters, who now resides in Hutchinson county, Texas, was born in Alabama, and came to Texas atter the war. He went through the war as a Confederate soldier, sevring with the Seventeenth Louisiana Infantry, and his record of engagements include many of the notable battles of the war. At the present time, as for a number of years past, he is engaged in ranching and has also had an active part in politics, having filled various public offices. He is a member of the Masonic Order. His wife, whose maiden name was Jennie Matthews, was born in Texas, and her father lived in this state under four different governments and flags, first during the Republic, then as a state, then as a confederate state and finally as the modern Texas. There were seven children in the Waters family, and Miss. Middlebrook was the fourth.

Dr. Middlebrook prefers the Baptist church among the various religious denominations, but gives his support to all without discrimination. Praternally he is affiliated with the Masons, the Pretorians, the Woodmen of the World and the Knights of Pythias, while his wife is a member of the Eastern Star Chapter. Dr. Middlebrook is examining physician for the Woodmen of the World, and is local surgeon for the G. H. & S. A. Railroad. In polities he is a Democrat, though never active in party affairs. For recreations he enjoys hunting and reading, and is one of the well informed men who see a great future for western Texas, not only as a mining and stock raising region, but as a country which in the course of a few years will be settled up by prosperous farmers.

JULIAN CLARENCE FEILD. The precincts assigned for this review of the career of an active and eminent member of the profession of civil engineers are wholly inadequate to give even a cursory notice of the many brilliant works which he has planned and executed. It must suffice to make allusion to those incidents of a useful life which will afford the best clue to the character of the man and to his admirable achievements. Julian Clarence Feild was born in the city of Denison, Texas, his present field of activity, September 9, 1881, and is a son of Dr. J. C. and Susan Elizabeth (McClain) Feild. The father was born at Pulaski, Giles county, Tennessee, of French-Scotch ancestry, July 5, 1841, received a good education, graduating from Tulane University, and began the practice of medicine at Little Rock, Arkansas. the outbreak of the Civil war he cast his fortunes with the Confederacy, serving for a time as surgeon and subsequently rising to the rank of colonel in the command of General Benjamin McCulloch. He served valiantly throughout the war, and was wounded slightly on several occasions, his engagements including the battles of Oak Ridge and House of Seven Gables,

After the restoration of peace Dr. Feild took a post-graduate course in medicine at Philadelphia, and in 1865 went to Fort Smith, Arkansas, where he remained in practice for five years. In 1870 he removed to the Old Boggy depot, in Indian Territory, but in 1872 came to Denison as one of this city's earliest physicians, here continuing in practice until the time of his death, January 31, 1906. Dr. Feild was justly accounted one of Denison's most helpful and progressive men. At all times he did all in his power to promote the interests of his adopted community and saw his labor bear fruit in the various walks of life. A successful physician and surgeon, he also demonstrated his ability in financial matters as one of the founders of the National Bank of

Johan Geild

Denison, was prominent in Masonie circles, and met with the appreciation of his fellow citizens in public matters, his record during his two terms in the State Legislature and in other odices of the county and State heing an active and honorable one. Dr. Feild married Susan Elizabeth McClain, who was born September 23, 1855, at Oscoola, Missouri, of Scotch-English descent, and of their children two are living: Mrs. W. J. Mathis, the wife of Judge W. J. Mathis, of Sherman, Texas, and

Julian Clarence. Julian C. Feild received his early education in the public schools of Denison, subsequently attended Harshaw's Academy, of this city, and then became a student in the University of Texas, at Austin. In 1902 he was graduated from Cumberland University, Lebanon, Ten-nessee, with the degree of Bachelor of Science, and his first work at his profession was that of railroad location and construction, in which he continued to be engaged from 1902 until 1907, thus gaining excellent practical experience. In the latter year he resigned his position to return to Denison, and here he has rapidly risen to a high place among the civil and consulting engineers of Northern Texas. At this time he maintains offices at Suite 5-8, Feild Building. A list of Mr. Feild's achieve-ments and incumbencies shows that he has been city engineer of Denison for more than five years; he is consulting engineer for the Southwestern Surety Insurance Company; engineer of the Red River Bridge Company of Denison: engineer of Milam and Robertson counties, Texas, and consulting engineer of the Oklahoma, Texas & Gulf Highway Association. It is probably in the line of good roads that Mr. Feild has been brought most prominently before the public, however. One of the first road builders in this part of the State, he has been connected with work that will run into millions of dollars spent in improving roads in the northern part of Texas, this being the third system of its kind in the State. He is also engineer of Road District No. 1, and is just com-pleting about $300,000 worth of improvements radiating from Denison. That he has not devoted his entire attention to the building of highways is shown by his active participation in all movements making for the welfare of Denison in any way. He has seen the city grow amazingly since his residence here and in no small degree bas contributed to this wonderful development. In his profession Mr. Feild is known as a man who combines prudence with boldness, who is able to differentiate between the valuable and the impracticable and visionary, and whose untiring energy keeps him constantly active among the helpful men of his vocation. He seldom takes vacations, and when he does is generally found in one or another of the large cities, combining business with pleasure by studying the methods and ideas of other communities. Devoted to his profession, he has found little time for politics, yet is known as an earnest and enthusiastic supporter of the best principles of the Democratic party. He is a member of the Chamber of Commerce and chairman of the good roads committee. In fraternal life he has been more active. While at Cumberland University he became a member of the Beta Theta Pi fraternity, and he now holds membership in the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and has risen to a high place in Masonry, being eminent commander of the Knights Templar of that order. With his family he attends the Episcopal church, and for some time has served in the capacity of vestryman.

On June 10, 1962, Mr. Feild was married at Lebanon, Tennessee, to Miss Mary Lea Sanders, daughter of John C. and Katy B. (Lea) Sanders, the latter the daughter of the Hon. Benjamin J. Lea, who was chief justice of the Supreme Court of Tennessee. Mr. Sanders is a prominent practicing attorney of Lebanon, and also prominent in business life as president of the Cedar City Mils. One child has been born to Mr. and Mrs. Felid! Katherine Elizabeth, born February 24, 1908. The Feild home, one of the modern residences of Denison, is located at No. 1123 West Gaudy street.

R. F. Pool is the president of the Sherman Overall Factory, one of the prominent industries of Sherman and its vicinity. Although born in Alahama, his natal day being the 14th of May, 1862, Mr. Pool has been a resident of Texas since boyhood, and here he has gained his success and at the same time added to the material prosperity of his community. His father, Gabriel Pool, was an Alabama farmer who came to Texas in 1870, was an Alabama farmer who cause to Texas in 1870, locating in Milan country, where he resumed his vocation of farming and continued it to the end of his days, dying in 1905. His widow survived him until 1909. They became the parents of twelve children. When Mrs. Pool passed away she was in her ninety-second year, and in the seventy-fifth year of her marriage she could count the births of one hundred and sixty-six children in her family, including her own children, her grandchildren, her great-grandchildren and her great-great-grandchildren and her great-great-grand-children—a circumstance most unique and seldom encountered in genealogical and biographical research. Of that number one hundred and thirty-eight were living when she passed away, and during her seventy-five years of married life there were only twenty-cight deaths in the entire family, only nine of that number being adults. She was Alpha Brussell in her maidenhood, and she came of a family that is noted for its good health and longevity.

R. F. Pool, the youngest of the twelve children of his parents, received a limited education in the public schools of Texas, and his first business enterprise of an independent nature was as a general merchant at Cameron, Texas, where he launched a small business in 1831. From there he went to Amarilla, and in 1911 came to Sherman, here buying the Sherman overall business, in which he has since continued successfully. The firm is engaged in the manufacture of overalls and as wholesale dealers in the men's furnishing goods, and the trade of the establishment extends throughout Texas, Oklahoma, Missouri, Arkansas and Louisiana. About sixty people are given employment, and it adds very materially to the business enterprise and industrial activity of the city.

Mr. Pool has been a life-long Democrat, active in the interests of the party, and is fraternally identified with the Knights of Pythias. With his family he is a member of the Baptist church.

In 1886, in Milano, Texas, Mr. Pool was married to Miss Minta Fraim, a daughter of John R. Fraim, a merchant of that place for many years. Mr. and Mrs. Pool have four living children: C. L., aged twenty-six, is secretary and treasurer of the business of which his father is the president, the Sherman Overall Factory; Roy F., aged twenty, is a student in the College of Mines at Rolla, Missouri; Miss Lorine, aged sixteen years, is in school, as is also John, now thirteen years of age. Though a resident of the city for only a short time

Though a resident of the city for only a short time R. F. Pool is highly impressed with the many advantages of Sherman, and regards it as a growing city and one that will play an important part in the history of the state in the years to come. He and his family have an excellent social and business standing in the community, and they already enjoy the friendship of an ever widening circle in and about the city.

ROLAND JONES. One of the important business concerns of Nacogadenes is the Nacogadenes Compress Company, an establishment which represents the chief business activity of Roland Jones, president and manger of the company. Mr. Jones has lived in Nacogadenes since 1890. His first experience in the cotton business began with Mayer & Schmidt as classer and shipper, and he subsequently became a buyer on his own account. For six years he held the position of public weigher. From that he turned to compress work, leasing the

The business was reorganized and the first officers of the company were: Herman Loeb, president; Roland Jones, vice-president and manager, and John Schmidt, secretary and treasurer. Later Mr. Loeb sold out his interest to Mr. Jones, and the latter then became president and manager with E. A. Blount as vice-president, while Mr. Schmidt continued as secretary and treasurer. This company does the compress work for a large proportion of the cotton raised in the vicinity of Nacogdoches.

Roland Jones was born in Caddo parish, Louisiana, on December 27, 1862. His family is one that for more than seventy years has been prominent in western Louisiana and eastern Texas. His father was Roland Jones, Sr., a North Carolina man, a graduate of the Cambridge Law School and who came to Shreveport in 1840, and was one of the original stock company which established the town of Shreveport. He was a successful lawyer and business man, and died at Shreveport in 1869 at the age of sixty years. He was elected and served a term in Congress; was an ardent southerner, but physically unable to go into the army, and did his part during the war in connection with the legal depart-ment of the Confederacy at Shreveport. During most of his years, he was identified with public affairs in Louisiana, served as district judge for a long time, and there was seldom a year in which he was not performing some official duty in his home city. Judge Jones was a member of the Episcopal church and fraternally is a Mason. In Wilkes county, North Carolina, near Salisbury, he married Miss Anne Neville Stokes. Her father was Governor Montford Stokes of North Carolina, and her mother's maiden name was Rachel Moutgomery. Mrs. Roland Jones died in 1894 at the age of seventyeight. The children are given brief record as follows: Montfort Stokes Jones was a prominent jurist of Louisiana, was widely known as a journalist, had much part in state politics, and died at Shreveport in 1904; Mrs. Kate B. Pickett, the wife of James B. Pickett, died in Shreveport; Mary died in Denver, Colorado; Mrs. Conway Moncure, lives in Shreveport; Mrs. Charles K. Randall s also a resident of Shreveport, and the youngest is Roland Jones, Jr.

Reland Jones, Jr., grew up at Shreveport, where most of his education was supplied by Thather Academy. His early training was for the profession of civil engineer, and in that profession he worked several years on the New Orleans, Pacific & Mississippi Valley Railroad, going out as an ax-man, and was eventually promoted to the position of superintendent of track on the Mississippi Valley Road. Soon afterwards he began his career in the cotton business, and that has absorbed practically all his attention and energy for the past twenty-six years. Mr. Jones has a very successful record as a business. He is interested in affairs outside of his private business, and home community, and is one of the life members of the Texas State Historical Association.

Roland Jones was married in Nacogdoches, February P. 1, 1892; to Miss Esme Matthews, a daughter of Henry P. Matthews and Lela (Hill) Matthews. Her father, a nature of Texas, was the son of a pioneer Texan, and Mrs. Matthews was a daughter of Judge Hill, one of the ablest men in public affairs in the state, during his time. Mr. and Mrs. Jones have three childran: Geneview, wife of A. B. Patterson of Nacogdoches; Roland, Jr., and Ashford.

CAPAIN JOHN M. MAYS. For more than a quarter of a century Captain John M. Mays has been connected with the commercial interests of Henderson, and during this time he has not alone attained material success and prestige but has also risen to a high place in the esteem and confidence of the people of his community through his constant and sustained public spirited citicanship.

If the light of the oldest in this part of the oldest in this part of this county, and the straightforward and honorable principles by which it has been conducted have brought it a deservedly high reputation in the marts of trade and commerce Captain Mays came to marts of trade and commerce Captain Mays came to from Abbeville, South Carolina, having been brown in that section of the Palmetto commonwealth March 10, 1840, a son of Meade and Mary E. (Porter) Mays, and a member of an old slave-holding family of South Carolina.

Meade Mays was born in South Carolina, and died there a young man of thirty years. He married Mary E. Porter, a daughter of John Porter, a Methodist minister and of an old family of South Carolina, and there were two children born of this union, John M., of this review, and Anna L., who was the write of John M. Trasker had three children; John M. Trasker of Greenwood, had the children; J. M. Trasker of Greenwood, Louisiana; Mrs. Alice Edgar, of Bethany, Louisiana; Mrs. Mice Edgar, of Bethany, Lonisiana; and Mrs. J. C. Miller, of Fonce, Oklahoma. Mrs. Mary L. (Porter) Mays married for her second husband W. (Porter)

M. Griffin, and she died at Kilgore, Texas, in 1907.
The early home of John M. Mays was a rural one and his education came chiefly from the Cokesbury school of South Carolina, an institution of some note at that time, under the supervision of the Methodist church. When the bitter war between the North and the South was being contested Mr. Mays left the military school at Columbia, where he was completing his education, and in 1863 took the place of his stepfather in the regiment, subsequently enlisting in Company B, Second Kentucky Cavalry, which was recruiting and rendezvousing in the vicinity of Atlanta, Georgia. This proved to be a part of General John Morgan's command, and Captain Mays was with that daring commander until the latter was killed at Greenville, Tennessee. Among the engagements of this command with which Captain Mays was connected were the battles of Wytheville, Virginia, and Saltville, Virginia, and on the great Kentucky raid he took part in the fight at Cynthiana, Lexington and Mount Sterling. Later he was transferred with others to General Johnston's army at Atlanta, and was engaged in scout duty on the Savannah river when word was received of the close of hostilities.

In 1866 Captain Mays left his home in South Carolina, and with his mother and stepfather made his way to the Lone Star state. They settled in Harrison county, and there he was early employed in freighting goods as a teamster from Shreveport to Elysian Fields, but later became a teacher and had a school for a few months near the dividing line between Harrison and Panola counties. Still later he became a farmer in that locality, and contented himself with tilling the soil for a few years or until the opportunity presented itself to become a clerk at Bethany, Louisiana, where he received his introduction to the general mercantile business. Following this experience he came back into Texas and accepted a position as clerk at Deletry, and after some more preparation felt himself capable mercantile business of the state of the property of t his future success.

Captain Mays came to Henderson in 1887, and here continued the mercantile business as junior partner of the firm of Trammell & Mays. This concern has been succeeded by several others, but Captain Mays has always been the partner to remain in the business. It was first succeeded by Mays & Miller, next by Mays & Harderian and finally by Mays & Harris, which association still continues. The Captain is a man of rare business ability, keen discernment and excellent judgment, and his thorough knowledge of the needs and demands of his community allows him to place before the trade the highest class of articles to be secured. Aside from his commercial interests he has various other business holdings, and at this time is a director of the First National Bank of Henderson and a stockholder in the oil mill here, of which he was one of the promoters.

Captain Mays was first married at Lawrence, South Carolina, in 1867, to Miss Alice Starnes, a daughter of Robt C. Starnes. She died near Bethany, Louisiana, in 1869, leaving one son, Robert M., who married Alice Beaty, and is engaged in business at Shreveport, Beaty, and is engaged in business as Sentence, Louisiana. Captain Mays married his present wife at Henderson, Texas, in February, 1877, she having been a Misse Georgie N. Trammell, a daughter of Thomas J. Trammell, a Georgian and an early settler of Texas. To Trammell, a Georgian and an early settler of Texas. this union there have been children born as follows: Foster W., a resident of Henderson; John M., Jr., a merchant of Greenwood, Louisiana; Anna L., the wife of W. F. Chamberlain, of Henderson; Miller, of Greenwood, Louisiana, and Ralph L., Georgie, Alice, Thomas and Helen, who reside with their parents.

In his sphere as a citizen Captain Mays has been unreservedly a man of commercial affairs. He has difference of a man of commercial attains. He has essayed politics only at times along with other delegates bent on nominating local or state candidates, and has had a seat in several Democratic conventions. He is a Master Mason in his fraternal connection, and his religious faith is that of the Methodist church. Veterans' reunions have found a place near Captain Mays' heart, and he has attended many during the era of popularity of those gatherings of the men and boys who were the "gray,"

VALENTINE L. Puig. In Laredo and vicinity a name that suggests large financial responsibility and civic influence is that of Valentine L. Puig. While he is now and for a number of years has been one of the big men in this part of the state, there are some who remember him twenty or twenty-five years since as a hard-working, earnest youth, with no capital save his untiring energy and with only a record of steady fighting against heavy odds from early boyhood. At the present time Mr. Puig and his brother, B. A. Puig, own fifty-five thousand acres of land in Webb county, lying about fifty miles northwest of Laredo, and they are extensively engaged in the cattle business. Theirs is one of the largest ranches now remaining undivided in southwest Texas.

Valentine L. Puig is a native of the city of New Orleans, and a son of Valentine Puig, still living and a resident of Laredo. The family in 1896 moved to Laredo in Duval county. Mr. Puig had little or no formal education, and started out to earn his own way when only nine years of age. Between the years 1886 and 1893 his life was one of struggle and continuous labor, chiefly as a clerk, and his wages ran between eight or ten dollars per month to as much as sixty dollars per month. His first position was as a messenger boy, and he was then employed at seventy-five cents a day for seven months in railway construction work. On leaving his previous employment and moving to Laredo in 1894, Mr. Puig found work with Mr. E. Cruz as a clerk at twentytwo and a half dollars a month. This employment lasted for eight months, and he was next with the Stoneburg people in their dry goods store for eight dollars a week, and at the end of a year they gave him twelve dollars a week. This employment continued for two years until Mr. Puig married, and by 1897 he had accumulated a small capital of fifteen hundred dollars, and with that as a nucleus his success has been one of rapid increase. It is noteworthy that as success has come to him he has been eminently liberal in helping others less fortunate, and even in the days when he was a struggling clerk he took care of his father and mother, and still supports them in comfort at Laredo.

In 1908 Mr. Puig was elected a member of the board of county commissioners of Webb county, and has served in that capacity with efficiency and general sat-isfaction ever since. The handsome new seventy-five thousand dollar county court house was built during the administration of the board of which Mr. Puig is a member. A fact that should be noted in this connection is that before the court house was completed thirty thousand dollars were needed to bring it to completion, and it was feared that long delays might possibly ensue if the money were raised by a bond issue. Under the circumstances, the commissioners wisely borrowed thirty thousand dollars on their individual notes, and thus allowed the work to go on without interruption and Webb county has its present fine county building largely due to the generous efforts of the board of commis-

Valentine L. Puig has a wife and four children: John, Valentine, Joe and Bruna. Mrs. Puig, formerly Miss Bruna Ortiz, is a daughter of the late Juan Ortiz, a prominent Laredo citizen. Juan Ortiz was the son of Reyes and Maria Antonia Ortiz. In 1872 Juan Ortiz built the substantial and interesting residence on Zara-gosa street in which the Puig family now live.

EDMUND DUGGAN. One of the best known men in public affairs in Tom Green county was the late Edmund Duggan. He was a pioneer, having located in the county more than thirty years ago, and remained closely identified with its business and official life until his death.

Edmund Duggan was born in Travis county, Texas, September 19, 1840, four years after the establishment of the Texas Republic, and five years before Texas became a State of the Union. The family were, as this date indicates, among the early settlers of Texas. His parents were Thomas H. and Elizabeth Duggan, who came from Mississippi. The father had been a merchant in his home State, and after moving to Texas about 1839 settled in Travis county, but afterwards moved to Guadalupe county, where he served as clerk for several terms, did farming as his regular vocation, and also was sent to the Legislature several times. His death occurred in 1865, and his widow survived him many years until 1902. There were six children in the family, and the late Edmund Duggan was the oldest.

As a boy he had private instructions, and later studied in a school of collegiate grade. His first business was that of general merchandising at Prairie Lee. In 1867 he sold out his business and moved to Guadalupe, where he was engaged in farming and stock raising for several years. In 1877, having sold his ranch, he took a place at Austin as bookkeeper in the State treasurer's department. He worked at the State capitol until 1881, when he resigned and moved to Tom Green county. For a number of years he was well known as a sheep raiser. and did a good business in that line. In 1888 he was elected to the office of county and district clerk of Tom Green county. Others had held similar places for a longer time, but it is doubtful if any county official in the State enjoyed more completely the confidence and esteem of its citizens than the late Edmund Duggan during the twenty years in which he filled the place of clerk of county and district. He finally was obliged to give up the position on account of ill health and several years later, on April 22, 1911, he died at his home in San Angelo. His funeral was conducted by Rev. A. B. Perry, and was largely attended by hosts of friends who had learned to esteem Edmund Duggan, not only for his social nature but for his high character and influence as a man and citizen. His remains were laid to rest in the Fairmount cemetery near San Angelo. His body rests beside those of his only two sons, who had died before him. During the war Mr. Duggan volunteered for service in the Confederate army as a member of Company D of the Fourth Texas regiment, becoming lieutenant of the company, John B. Hood being the first colonel of that regiment, and in the latter part of the war Mr. Duggan served as a member of General Ford's staff in Texas. He went through the war and was promoted from lieutenant to captain of his company. politics he was always a good Democrat, and fraternally belonged to the Masonic order and the Ancient Order of United Workmen. At different times he filled all the chairs in the Masonic Lodge, and went through the York Rite, Commandery degrees. His funeral service was conducted under the auspices of the Blue Lodge. He was also a member of the San Angelo Club. On November 21, 1867, at Seguin, Texas, Mr. Duggan married Miss Julia Coor-Pender of Seguin, a daughter of Dr. Lewis Coor-Pender and Mrs. M. M. Coor-Pender. Her father was a physician of Mississippi, having lived and practiced at Clinton for many years, and during his early life had served in the War of 1812 as lieutenant of his company. He died in 1845 at the old home in Mississippi, and the mother passed away in 1877 in Texas. Mr. and Mrs. Duggan had but two children, the two sons already mentioned, Thomas Jefferson and Edmund, Jr. The first named died May 29, 1899, at the age of thirty-one, and Edmund died August 24, 1907, at the age of thirty-two. Mrs. Duggan survives her husband and children and has an attractive home at San Angelo, where she enjoys the friendship and solace of many kind friends, who have known her and her bushand for a great many years.

SHIPTON PARKE. President of the First State Bank of Fort Stockton, of which he was one of the organizers, Shipton Parke easily ranks as one of the largest stockmen and ranchers in Pecos county, and as the possessor and manager of large industrial and financial resources is a man whose leadership and activities are very closely identified with the solid prosperity of his home community.

Shipton Parke is a Kentuckian by birth, born in Madison county of that State, March 10, 1848, a son of Hezekiah and Elizabeth (Cruve) Parke. The parents were native Kentuckians, and came to Texas in 1853 when the son, Shipton, was twelve years of age. The father was a farmer, and contractor and builder, a prominent member in his Masonic Lodge, devoted to the cause of the Baptist church, and had an influential place in political affairs. His death occurred in 1884 at the age of about seventy years. His wife was also a devout member of the Baptist church, and she died in 1871, when about fifty years of age, and they are laid side by side in the Masonic graveyard in Gonzalez, Texas. Of their ten children, Shipton was the fifth.

Shipton Parke was reared to manhood in Texas, had his early education in private schools up to the time he was seventeen and then was introduced to practical affairs by work on his father's farm. Leaving home be took up the battle of life on his own responsibility and earned his first money by varied occupations of freighting, ranching and any other honest toil that came in his way. During these years he several times accompanied large herds of cattle over the trail to Kansas, and has known all the interesting phases of the cattle industry since the days of the free range down to the present modern stock farm. For three years he was in the employ of the Houston boys in the Pauhandle, and then in 1883 came out to Pecos county and was employed by the well known rancher J. D. Houston for about eight years. At the end of that time he was far enough along to begin operations for himself, and since then the career of Shipton Parke is a matter of common knowledge to all the stockmen of the state. His largest ranch is thirty miles east of Stockton and contains about fifty thousand acres of land. His headquarters are equipped with all the modern improvements for raising and handling cattle and other live stock. Mr. Parke was one of the organizers of the First State Bank of Fort Stockton, and has since been its president. He was also one of the organizers of the First National Bank in this city, and also has a large share of its stock,

In Fort Stockton, on February 26, 1896, he married Miss Emma Lea Shelton, a daughter of Gabriel Shelton, who was formerly a resident of Illinois. The marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Parke was celebrated in the old gov-ernment guardhouse at Fort Stockton. Their four children, two sons and two daughters, are Iva, deceased; Gladys, Shipton V. and Chester. Mr. Parke and wife are members of the Presbyterian church, and he is affiliated with the Fort Stockton Commercial Club. His polities is Democratic, and on public questions, as well as in business affairs, he has always been noted for his ready and effective utterance of his opinions and convictions, and such has been his success that his judgment is relied upon implicitly by all who seek it or are sufficiently within his friendship to be accorded the privilege of his advice and counsel. Mr. Parke served as county commissioner of Pecos county for one term. He is fond of all kinds of social amusements and outdoor sports, particularly baseball.

RALPH B. SLIGHT. Now postmaster and proprietor of a drug business in Alpine, Mr. Slight began his career in Texas about thirty years ago as a cowboy, riding the old cattle trails, both north and south, and having an experience in the cattle business which took him all over the state, into several of the western territories, and into Old Mexico. By industry and good management, and an honesty for which all his old and new friends would vouch, he prospered as a business man and has Ralph B. Slight is a native of England, where he was born on November 25, 1868. His parents were William C. and Charlotte Ann (Gadsby) Slight, both natives of England, where they were married. The family moved to Texas and located at San Antonio in 1888. The father had settled there in 1884, and was engaged in the plumbing business until his death, in 1904, at the age of sixty-two. He also took much interest in local affairs and politics at San Antonio. The mother passed away in England at the age of forty-two, and her body rests in her native land, while that of her husband is interred at San Antonio,

The early education of the Alpine postmaster was attained in the English schools, although he did not attend after he was fourteen years of age. The first position in which he began earning his own way was as clerk in a drug store, and at the beginning his wages were only 75e per week. A short time later he got a better place, in a lawyer's office, as office boy, and fol-lowed that work until he came to the United States, at the age of eighteen. After living in San Antonio only a few months, he came out to Brewster county, which has been his real home ever since, although his activities have taken him pretty much over the entire southwestern country. He worked on a ranch for several years, and then became connected with some of the large cattle concerns in capacities which took him over the trails through cattle country. He was for about twelve years engaged in that work, and during that time did considerable business in the buying and dealing in cattle on erable business in the buying and dealing in caute on his own account. In 1898 he took a place in a mer-cantile establishment at Alpine, and two years later lought his present business, where he carries a full line of drugs and druggists' sundries and enjoys a large trade in this community. Mr. Slight was first married at Alpine in 1898, to Miss Lottie Williams, who died in 1903, leaving two children, a son and daughter, named Gladys and Bernal. At San Antonio, on October 12, 1910, Mr. Slight married for his present wife Miss Mary Sanford, daughter of William Sanford, now of Alpine. They are the parents of one child, Ralph B. Jr. Mr. Slight and family are regular members of the Methodist church at Alpine. Fraternally, he is affiliated with Masonry, having been master of the Blue Lodge three times and for two years district deputy grand master. He is also a member of the Woodmen of the World. For a number of years he has done much practical polities as a Republican, and in January, 1913, was appointed to the office of Postmaster at Alpine, taking charge of the office at the same time the parcel post system was inaugurated. Mr. Slight is fond of outdoor sports and athletics and at one time was manager of the Alpine Baseball Team.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN SHEPHÉRD. While the career of Mr. Shepherd for the past six years has identified him with the old Panhandle town of Memphis, where he is proprietor of the Memphis Democrat and the present postmaster, his work as a newspaper man has taken him to various localities, both in Texas and Oklahoma, and he has a large acquaintance among Southwestern people and numbers among his friends many prominent men in business and public affairs.

Benjamin Franklin Shepherd was born December 11. 1879, at Tupelo, Mississippi, a son of Jeremiah George and Nancy Caroline Shepherd. His father, who fought on the side of the South during the Civil war and lost a leg at the battle of Atlanta, Georgia, was engaged from early manhood until 1885 in the practice of medicine, and in the latter year was elected district clerk of Hunt county, Texas, and held that office fourteen years. His death occurred March 5, 1906, at Clarendon, where his widow still lives.

Benjamin F. Shepherd was reared chiefly at Green-ville, graduated from a select school, and later, in 1898, took a business college course. His early experiences were such as happen to the average boy who lives at home with his parents and attends the local schools and is subjected to the usual influences of a small community. Through the influence of some friends, he was directed. after leaving school, into the printer's trade, and was employed in that line with more or less regularity until September 27, 1904. At that date, with his father, mother, two sister and two brothers, he moved to Clarendon, and was employed as a printer on the Banner-Stockman until October 1, 1905. Mr. Shepherd then moved to Memphis and became foreman for the Hall county Herald, but about a year and a half later, on March 2, 1907, went to Hollis, Oklahoma, to take the position of editor and manager on the Post-Herald of that city. On September 15th of the same year he returned to Memphis, which has since been his permanent From his work as foreman on the Hall county Herald he graduated on December 15, 1908, into a half interest in the Memphis Democrat, a weekly paper, which was established July 8, 1908, Mr. Shepherd was which was established July 8, 1908. its editor and business manager until October 13, 1913, when he bought the interest of his partner, and is now sole owner and proprietor.

After the election of Woodrow Wilson as president, Mr. Shepherd began an active campaign for the office of postmaster at Memphis, and secured an almost solid endorsement of the business men and citizens who were patrons of the office. Then, at his personal urging, the congressman from the district ordered a postoffice primary, and seven candidates for the office were voted upon. Out of four hundred and twenty-four votes cast, Mr. Shepherd received two hundred and four, only nine votes less than a majority of the total. This primary was held January 3, 1914, and his appointment was confirmed by the United States Senate February 11, 1914, and he took office March 4th of the same year. Since devoting his attention to the Memphis postoffice, he has turned over the management of his paper to an editor

Mr. Shepherd served three years as a member of the Texas Volunteer Guards at Greenville. Politically, his stanch Democracy has always been in evidence, and Texas has no more enthusiastic supporter of Woodrow Wilson and his broad and beneficent policies, his statesmanship and progressive political economy, than Mr. Shepherd. Since the age of fourteen he has been a con-Sistent method to the sign of fourteen he has been a consistent member of the Christian church, and for three years was church clerk, and deacon five years. Fraternally, he joined the Pretorian Lodge in 1906, the Odd Fellows in 1907, the Maccabes in 1906, and the Masonic Lodge in 1910. On July 2, 1905, at Clarendon, Texas, Mr. Shepherd married Miss Barbara A. Pirtle. Their four children are all sous, as follows: Praetoria Ben Shepherd, born June 2, 1906; Ronnie James, born December 22, 1907; Donald Ellis, born January 25, 1910, and Eugene Claude, born October 11, 1911, and died October 10, 1912.

Andrew Stephens Loweer, One of the most pic-seage figures among the citizens of Colorado county is Andrew Stephens Lowrey, an ex-ranger, for many years identified with practical business affairs, and now lying retired at his home in Colorado. He was one of those brave and hardy men who risked their lives almost daily during the seventies in safeguarding the wild and dangerous frontier along the Rio Grande. Many of the adventures and exploits can be recalled by Mr. Lowrey, and his conversation is exceedingly interesting when directed to his experiences as a ranger. While talking of those days, his eye kindles with a light which indicates the fire and enthusiasm needed for a good soldier, and he was one of the best of his time.

Mr. Lowrey was born in Georgia, March 27, 1849, a son of Andrew P. and Margaret C. (Beaty) Lowrey, both natives of Georgia. The maternal grandfather, Robert Beaty, was a planter and slaveholder in that state. Two of the great-grandfathers were natives of Ireland. A special characteristic of the Lowrey family is its genius for mechanical accomplishment. Mr. Lowrey's father was a farmer all his life, but combined with that vocation great skill as a mechanic and millwright. In character his father was stern, of decided convictions, and lived a life of great usefulness both to his family and to the public community. For many years he served as justice of the peace, later was tax assessor of his county, and finally a member of the Georgia legislature. The parents moved to Texas in 1868, settling in Colorado county, where they purchased land upon which they lived the balance of their days. Mr. Lowrey has six brothers, all of whom are mechanics. Four of these brothers went through the war in the Confederate army, and all returned safely. These old soldiers are: R. H. Lowrey, of Lubbock, Texas; John A., a resident of Columbus, who was in the Virginia army under Lee and took part in nearly all the bloody battles of that state, serving at the Wilderness and at Gettysburg and many others: the whethers and at dettysming and many others. J. R. Lowrey of Tuscaloosa, Alabama, and James C. Lowrey, of Weimar, Texas. The other living children are: George, of Eagle Lake, Texas; Frances Barto, of Graham, Texas; and Mrs. Margaret Thomas of Eagle Lake. The children, Sallie, Nancy, Martha, William, David and Eason, are all deceased.

As a boy Mr. Lowrey had very few advantages to acquire an education. Early in his childhood five months of rural schooling were given him and when he was sixteen years old he had the privilege of attending school four months longer. All the rest of his mental equipment, and he is by no means an unintelligent nor poorly informed man, was received from private reading, and close observation of men and affairs. He was nineteen years of age when the family located in Colorado county, and for the first few years he did farm labor. Always of a venturesome spirit, loving a life in the open range as a cowboy. In 1875 he joined the Texas rangers under the famous Captain McNalley, who had gained the rank of captain by service in the Confederate army, and was one of the bravest men that ever lived. The territory patrolled by this command of rangers comprised the two hundred miles of wild region along the Rio Grande River. Those familiar with the history of South Texas forty years ago will recall that a wide belt of country existed as a zone for the operations of outlaws, Mexican and Indian bandits, and all the riff-raff of the frontier. A complete account of all the outrages, thieving, murdering that went on in that zone during the seventies will probably never be compiled. It was in that region that Mr. Lowrey gained his experience as a ranger. At one time he was a member of a company of thirty men who went across the river into old Mexico after a band of cattle thieves. For two days they subsisted there, holding off an attacking army of three hundred men. In the end the Mexican raiders were brought to terms and the cattle recovered. These rangers were trained to endure long, hard rides, and quick and accurate shooting was of course a prerequisite of membership in the organization. Often Mr. Lowrey and his companions had no food except game killed on the plains. Many a batch of bread was mixed up on a saddle blanket and cooked on a stick before a fire. Mr. Lowrey was a ranger when the famous desperado King Fisher was captured. They took him alive at Cuero, Texas, although the noted outlaw had vowed he would never be taken alive. After leaving the ranger service Mr. Lowrey returned to Colorado county and took up farming. He next bought a blacksmith shop at Weimar, and lived and prospered there seventeen years. Selling out his shop, be took up carpenter work for three years until as a result of a fall he was badly crippled in the ankle and foot. He then bought a shop at Altair and followed the blacksmith's trade there thirteen years. On selling out that enterprise he was about four years proprietor of a boarding house at Eagle Lake. For the past four years his home has been in Columbus, and he is now

In 1879 Mr. Lowrey was united in marriage with Miss Ora Walker, of Colorado county, a daughter of R. S. Walker, a native of North Carolina, and a pioneer Texan. The children born to Mr. and Mrs. Lowrey were: Wallace Walker Lowrey, of Houston, and Charles Barnett Lowrey, living at home. After the death of his First wife Mr. Lowrey was married in 1898 to Miss Virginia Little. She was born in Georgia, a daughter of J. R. Little. She died at childbirth, and the child also died. The present Mrs. Lowrey before her mar-riage, which occurred February 5, 1900, was Miss Lulu Strahan. She was born in Colorado county, a daughter of J. R. and Cornelia Elizabeth (Walker) Strahan. Her father, also a native of Colorado county, is now living in Eagle Lake, and grandfather, Howard William Strahan, came from Scotland, was a pioneer physician and early planter in Texas. J. R. Strahan served as a Confederate soldier all through the war as a member of Company D of the Texas Mounted Infantry. Before the war he had a plantation and worked it with his slaves. He has lived a long and useful life, is a Democrat in politics, served as constable in Colorado county for many years, and is one of the best known local citizens. Mrs. Lowrey's mother died January 21; 1913. She came to Texas when but three years of age. The mother of Elizabeth Walker died soon after the family moved to Texas, a victim of cholera, and left five little children for her husband to look after. Mr. Walker did not break up his home, but took the children out to the fields with him while he planted and tended the crops, and then came home at mealtime and cooked and prepared food for them. Later he married Miss Polly Cone, who proved a kind and good mother to the children and reared them well. Mrs. Lowrey comes from a military family. Her younger brother Whit was a member of her father's company during the war. The other brothers were also soldiers, James and Edward, and died at Sabine Pass. Both Mr. and Mrs. Lowrey are members of the Campbellite church and are living lives consistent with their faith. They also belong to the Independent Puritans. For many years Mr. Lowrey has been affiliated with the Masonic order.

ROBERT HENRY NORRIS. In the death of Robert Henry Norris on March 17, 1911, Childress lost a business men and citizen who had been a very efficient factor in making his home city one of the best commercial centers of North Texas. He was in business there as a banker and merchant from the pioneer days until permanence and prosperity became a surety, and none were more zealous, more public spirited, more practical in promoting that and than the late Mr. Noris.

If Pranklin parish, Louisiana, he was born July 22, 1866, and was less than forty-five years of age when he died. His parents were Tolbert Wallace and Thekla (Patten Dobbs) Noris. Tolbert Wallace Noris was a (Patten Dobbs) Norns, Tolliert Wallace Norns was a son of Thomas Lane Norris, who was born in 1800 and came to Mississippi from the Carolinas, locating in Franklin parish, Louisiana, some time between 1830 and 1840, and died there in 1852. He was a prominent planter. Tolliert was the second in a family of ten children. He first married Alias Laurena House, and three children were born, two of whom died in infancy, while Lizzie grew to maturity and married Dr. J. A. Holloway, a prominent physician of Round Rock, Texas. Tolbert W. Norris for his second wife was married in Franklin Parish, March 8, 1860, to Thekla Patten Dobbs. She became the mother of twelve children, most of whom lived to maturity, and the late Robert H. Norris was fourth among them. The father died April 30, 1890, and the mother is still living in Childress. Robert Henry Norris received his early education in the parish schools of his native locality, until he was twelve years of age, and assisted in the work of the home plantation until he was eighteen. At that time he went to Georgetown, Texas, spent one year on a farm, was then employed in a drug store at Round Rock, after which a brief employment in a bank gave him his first experience in that business, but the work proved too confining, and he left it for the hardware business in Round Rock. Two years later he took charge of a store at Elgin, Texas, from there moved to Belton, was in the hardware business there for two years, and then, on September 1, 1891, arrived at Childress, which was to be the scene of his most successful efforts and influence as a business man and citizen. In partnership with Dr. Holloway, who, as previously mentioned, married his half-sister, he bought the business of the Swift Hardware Company. It was from an humble beginning, with a limited education and with no assistance from auyone, that Robert H. Norris grew to be one of the leading men of North Texas. After four years in a partnership he bought Dr. Holloway's interest, and the business was thereafter conducted as the Norris Hardware Company. He built up an establishment which was the pride of the community, and considered the largest store of its kind in all this section of the State. He was also one of the organizers of the City National Bank of Childress, was vice president of that substantial institution, and was president of the First State Bank of Kirkland. He organized the Norris Implement Company, which is also a big concern, and had many other relations with the commerce of his locality.

The late Mr. Norris was affiliated with the Knights of Pythias and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, was a Democrat, served his community as a school trustee, and his support was always offered to any movement toward the public good. From early childhood he was a church worker, and when only nineteen years of age was made a deacon in his church and at the time of his death was an elder of the Southern Presbyterian Church and superintendent of the Sunday school. He was president of the board of directors of the Young Men's Christian Association at Childress. His religion was of the kind that finds its way into all the business and social affairs of the world, just as it was exemplified in church and Sunday school. The result was that no man ever had cause to doubt his sincerity and absolute integrity.

On July 3, 1901, in Childress, he married Miss Nannie Edgerton, a native of North Carolina, and a daughter of T. M. and N. D. Edgerton, of North Carolina, a family which settled in the Texas Panhandle in the early days, her father having become one of the well-known stockmen of his section. Her father enlisted from North Carolina in the Civil war, and went throughout the conficient in the Confederate army. Both her parents are now deceased, her mother having passed away in June, 1999, in Childress, at the age of sixty-eight, and her father died there at the age of sixty-eight, and her father died there at the age of seventy in 1899. Mrs. Norris, who was fifth in a family of eight children, was reared in Texas, attended the Childress high school, and it was after graduation from that school that she became acquainted with Mr. Norris. She is a member of the Baptist church. The four children of Mr. Norris and wife were: Nannie N. T. Norris, born at Childress, April 28, 1902, and now attending school; Rohert H., Jr., born at Childress, June 1, 1904, and in school; Tohert Norris, born June 12, 1906, in Childress, January 9, 1909. The late Mr. Norris built and owns the large building in which his hardware business was conducted, and the Norris home in Childress, which is one of the most attractive and comfortable residences of the city, in which his widew and children now live.

ast Monis

His church, the lodges of the Elks and Knights of Pythias, all paid his memory high tributes, showing that no ordinary man had been taken from their brotherhood. It will serve to supplement, at the risk of some repetition, the above general review of his career to quote some sentences from some editorials in the two local papers, written by men who were closely familiar with his activities in the community:

"Starting his business in Childress in a small way some years ago, Mr. Norris' unusual qualities gradually attracted to him the hest trade of the country, and for many years his name and goods were household words for hundreds of miles around on every side. His strict habits, honesty and high business ideals caused his business to grow year by year, until the firm became one of the best known in all Northwest Texas. Of recent years the retail trade of the firm had been somewhat circumscribed by the advent of more railroads into the country, but in lieu thereof they have built up a large wholesale trade with surrounding towns, and the business still remains one of the largest in the country. "Ever since coming to Childress Mr. Norris has taken a leading part in the social and religious life of the city and was ever ready to give his labor and money to any worthy cause that had for its purpose the advancement of the city in any laudable direction. He was a natural leader of men, and his influence was felt in all the affairs of Childress. Not many of the permanent improvements of the city were ever accomplished in which he did not perform a leading part, both with means and safe counsel, and it has often been most truthfully said of him that he was one man of means that was always willing to use it for public benefit as well as personal use. He will be missed in the business and social life of our town and county, but above all he will be missed in the religious life, especially in that of his own church. He was always at his post of duty, letting nothing interfere with the performance of his obligations to his God. He assisted in the organization of the Presbyterian Sunday school, and was the only superintendent it ever had up to the time of his death, Another editorial reads in part as follows: "R. H. was beloved and highly respected by all, no matter what their manner of life might have been. He was looked upon as one of the highest type of a business man. He was prompt and truthful in his business dealings, and it doubtful if there was ever a man who had a larger acquaintance among the farmers and ranchmen of the State than he, and each one of these men had the most implicit confidence in the integrity of Mr. Norris.

Not only was he attentive to business, prompt in all its demands, but he found time to work for the churches and the schools of the town and county. He was a member of the First Presbyterian Church of this city, and had been superintendent of the Sunday school since its organization. He was liberal with his money for the cause of the church, and there never was a subscription list presented to him calling for money with which to build a church but what his name was placed upon the list, and the amount was among the largest given. He was a member of the Knights of Pythias Lodge of this city, being made a knight on December 30, 1891. In the early years of the order in this city he was one of the hardest working members of the lodge. He rarely missed a meeting, it is said, and took delight in assisting in the work, When the Elis were organized in Childress he went in as a charter member, and has been a friend of the lodge ever since.

"In the work of building up the schools Mr. Norris had few equals among our people. He has been a member of the board of trustees many times, and held that position at the time of his death. He was a strong advocate of the building of the first brick school building of the city, and when the question of voting taxes for this purpose came up, he not only advocated the tax, but got out and worked for it. The same way in building up the town. He was ready and anxions to give of his money and time to any enterprise that was for the betterment and upbuilding of the place. He was a man of strong views, and did not hesitate to express them, but gave to others the same contresies that he asked and did not fall out with a man because he did differ with him.

"He will be missed not only among his business associates, by his customers, but by the people of the town and county, irrespective of their calling or vocation. He was the leader among the people and they will miss that leadership and it will be a long time, we are afraid,

CAPT. EDGAR SCHRAMM. To the struggle for more liberal government in central Europe, which had its culmination in 1848 in the suppression of the patriots and in the self-expatriation of many of their leaders, the United States owes some of its best citizenship. Capt. Edgar Schramm, one of San Antonio's most distinguished citizens, was still a child in Prussia when the revolt against the Bavarian government was suppressed, and five years later was brought to America by his parents. Here his career has been one crowded with interesting experiences and notable achievements, and as nearly Texas ranger, soddier, merchant, publisher and diplomat he has attained unqualified distinction in the land of his adoption. He was born in Prussia, in 1841, and is a son of Ernest von Schramm and Apolonia (von Wyschetzki) von Schramm

The paternal grandfather of Captain Schramm served with the Prussian army throughout the Napoleonic wars as a military surgeon, and achieved eminence both as an officer and in his profession. Ernest von Schramm was born in the heautiful and historic eity of Danzig, Prussia, on the Baltic sea, in 1808, soon after the edict of Napoleon declaring Danzig a republic. He received excellent educational advantages in the Universities of Bonn and Berlin, and in 1853 came to the United States with his family and located at New Bruanfels, Texas, having cast his fortunes with the colony founded by moved to Gnadloupse county, locating van later, not the San Geronimo river, about six miles from Seguin, and there spent the remainder of his life. His wife was the Countess Apolonia von Wyschetzki, who was born in Poland, a member of a distinguished family of the nobility and a beautiful woman of rare talcuts. She died in Prussia, to which country she had returned in

Capt. Edgar Schramm's interesting, varied and eventful career began during a time of great hardships to the early settlers of Texas, arising from lack of money making crops, high prices for the bare necessities of life, depredations by the hostile Indians and numerous other adverse conditions. One of his earliest occupa-

tions was driving ox-team freight wagons from Indianola, on the coast, to the interior of Texas, a journey fraught with great danger and numerous hardships. Prior to the outbreak of the war between the South and the North he had joined the volunteer Ranger service for protection against the Indians, and in that capacity patrolled the frontier from Red river to the Rio Grande. When hostilities were declared between the states, in April, 1861, he entered the Texas State troops, becoming a member of the First Texas Regiment of Mounted Volunteers, which had been organized mainly for protection against the Indians. He remained with this organization for nearly a year, and then joined the regular Confederate army, receiving a licutenant's com-mission in Company F. Thirty-second Texas Cavalry, Gen. X. P. DeBray's Brigade, Wharton's Cavalry Corps. This company, of which the dashing young licutenant later became captain, was recruited at New Braunfels, and was noted for the men in its ranks who could lay claim to nobility, and many of whom had seen active service in the Prussian army. Captain Schramm commanded his company throughout the campaign against Banks, in Louisiana, and among others participated in the sanguinary engagements at Mansfield, Pleasant Hill and Yellow Bayou, On the close of his military service Captain Schramm eugaged in the mercantile business at New Braunfels, and subsequently went to Galveston, where he was the proprietor of a wholesale grocery enterprise until 1870, in which year he transferred his operations and activities to San Antonio. He disposed of his mercantile interests in 1888, when he established the first Democratic German newspaper in San Antonio, the Texas Staats-Zeitung. Under his direction and editorship this became one of the important influences in Texas politics, and contributed materially to the success of a number of Democrats who rose to high position. At this time Cap-tain Schramm became himself a prominent figure in San Antonio politics, and was nominated and made the race for mayor against Bryan Callaghan, but was defeated by a small majority. In 1893, during President Cleveland's second administration, Captain Schramm's abilities and talents were recognized by his appointment to the post of consul-general to the Republic of Uruguay, South America, a position he held until 1897, Captain Schramm is now living a somewhat retired life, having disposed of his interests in the Staats-Zeitung to his son-in-law, Albert Hohrath, the present publisher and editor. How-ever, he still retains the vice presidency of the Equitable Life Insurance Company, of San Antonio, and daily attends to his property interests in this city. A man of strong and dominating personality, he has made his influence forcibly felt in the various fields of endeavor in which he has been engaged. He has borne a useful and honorable part in the conduct of public affairs, has adorned social life by his genial spirit, and set before the community an example of enterprise in business, integrity in office and moderation in the conduct of life.

Captain Schramm was married to Miss Antonia von Benner, daughter of Adolph von Benner, who came to New Braunfels, Texas, as chief of commissary with the founder, Prince Solms Braunfels. Seven children have been born to Captain and Mrs. Schramm; Gilbert Ernest, a talented singer, graduate of the Cincinnati Conservatory of Music, later a professor of voice culture in that noted institution, and now the leader of his profession in Texas; Milton, who is connected with the Southwestern Telephone Company of San Antonio; Harold, who is secretary of the Equitable Life Insurance Company of secretary of this city, Darwin, who is connected with the Southwest-ern Telephone Company; Texas, attorney-at-law in San Antonic; Hertha, who married Albert Hohrath, pub-lisher and editor of the Texas Staats-Zeitung, and Miss Tonny, at home with her father.

JAMES EVERETT MCASHAN. Besides his well-known position as a Texas banker, being vice-president and cashier of the South Texas Commercial National Bank of Houston, Mr. McAshan was president of the Houston Clearing House in 1911-13, was vice president twice for Texas of the American Bankers Association, is president of the M. P. Oil Company, president of the Rice Land Lumber Company, a director of the Houston Hotel Association and of the Houston Printing Company, and is trustee and vice president of the William M. Rice Institute for Advancement of Literature, Science and Art.

Mr. McAshan, who is remotely descended from Scot-tish covenanters and French Huguenots, was born in Fayette county, Texas, October 20, 1857. His father, Samuel Maurice McAshan, was an early settler in Texas, arriving in 1844, before the annexation to the United States and while Texas was a republic. His wife, Martha Rebecca Eanes, came to the state about the same time. They were both natives of Virginia, but did not meet until after they came to Texas. Both were consistent members of the Methodist church, and their elegant home in Houston during the early days was often offered for the entertainment of the bishops and other prominent dignitaries of the church while at Houston. were among the best known citizens and social factors in Houston of the past generation, and personally com-bined the finest integrity of character with agreeable manners, and the fine culture of educated people.

James Everett McAshan received his education largely in private schools in Houston and elsewhere, and has been practically all of his active career of more than forty years identified with banking. He began as a clerk in 1872, and has been continuously at the same line of business ever since. He was for a number of years with the private banking house of T. W. House, then went with the South Texas National Bank at its organization in 1890, and later with the succeeding organization, known as the South Texas Commercial National Bank, in which he holds the office of vice president, cashier and director. His standing among Texas bank-ers is well indicated by his election as president of the Texas Bankers Association for 1902-03.

Mr. McAshan is a Democrat in his political views, and for a short time served as a member of the board of liquidation of the city of Houston. Although a practical husiness man, he is in many respects a student, has a wide and interesting range of knowledge such as would hardly be expected of a successful banker. To many he is known as an orator and after-dinner speaker, has done much work as a writer and lecturer on religious and secular subjects, and particularly as a lecturer and as an often-consulted authority on banking. Mr. Me-Ashan belongs to the Z. Z. Club, the Houston Country Club, the Texas Historical Society, the National Geographical Society, and the American Forestry Association. Since 1876 he has been a steward and one of the active working members of the First Methodist Church of Houston.

Mr. McAshan was married October 20, 1880, at Huntsville, Texas, to Miss Lizzie Smith. Mrs. McAshan herville. Texus, to Miss Lizzie Smith. Mrs. McAshan ner-self has an interesting family history, and belongs to one of the best known households of the South. Her parents were Dr. Hildreth H. and Mary Brent Hoke Smith, formerly from North Carolina. Mrs. McAshan is a sister of the Georgian statesman, Senator Hoke Smith, and another of her brothers is Burton Smith, one of the ablest lawyers of the South. Her father, Dr. Smith, a graduate of Bowdoin College of Maine, was a great scholar and one of the ablest educators of his time. His name properly has a permanent place in the history of the city of Houston, as the founder of the public of the city of Houston, as the founder of the public schools in that city. Mrs. McAshan's maternal uncle, Robert F. Hoke, was the youngest general in the Con-federate army. Mrs. McAshan in 1878 graduated from the Packer Collegiate Institute of Brooklyn, New York. To their marriage were born the following children: Samuel Maurice, who married Aline Harris; Mary Brent, the wife of Dr. J. P. Gibbs; Hoke Smith McAshan; Hil-dreth Nabors, who married Alline Rhode; James Everett,

Sincerey KM Van Zandk

Jr., who married Laurie Ward: Robert Burton, and Virginia, who died in 1894.

ROBERT EMMETT SWINNEY. One of the old residents of Chambers county, and representing both on his father's and mother's side two of the pioneer families in southern Texas, Robert Emmett Swinney is an old cattleman and merchant, and at the present time is honored with two important public offices, that of postmaster at Anahuac, and as county treasurer of Chambers Robert Emmett Swinney was born at Wallisville, the old county seat of Chambers county, in 1857. His parents were Newton and Julia (Wallis) Swinney, both now deceased. His father, who was born and reared at Atlanta, Georgia, came with his widowed mother and her family to Texas about 1834 or 1835. Their settlement was at Moss' Bluff in Liberty county, just north of what is now the Chambers county line. Grandmother Swinney brought a number of slaves to Georgia, and her farming and other business affairs were managed by her older son, John Swinney. From that time, still within the period of Mexican rule, until the present, the Swinney family has had large and substantial interests in business and affairs in this part of the state. Newton Swinney lived a long period of years at Wallisville. Julia Wallis, the mother of the Anahuac post-master, was a daughter of E. H. R. Wallis, a native of Louisiana, and among the very earliest American pioneers of Texas. He settled in Liberty county during the early twenties, and his name has long had a secure place in the geography and commercial history of the state as founder of the town of Wallisville, which became the county seat of Chambers county when that county was formed out of Liberty county.

It was at Wallisville that Robert Emmett Swinney was reared, and most of his education was obtained at Rockport. His early interests were identified with stock raising and farming, and later he engaged in business at Anahuac, in which old community his home has been more or less continuously since about 1888. In 1894 he was first appointed postmaster at Anahuac, and has given efficient and satisfactory service to the public ever since. About ten years previous to his first appointment he had also served a short time as postmaster. In 1907 Mr. Swinney was appointed county treasurer of Chambers county, and was regularly elected in 1908, again in 1910, and by reelection in 1912 still holds that official honor.

Mr. Swinney married Miss Mattie J. Perrin, who was born and reared at Montgomery, Alabama. They are the parents of one daughter, May, wife of G. F. Mitchell, a merchant of Anahuac.

CHARLES C. HIGHSMITH. This well-known Houston lawyer, who has practiced in that city since 1904, and who came from Bastrop, is the son of an old settler of Bastrop county, and a venerable lawyer, who was a member of the Texas bar for the extraordinary period of fifty nine years. Mr. Highsmith, aside from his work as a lawyer, has interested himself in one of the most important social and benevolent movements of this boys, and belongs to the national organization of workers in that field, and as a member of the Texas legislature was joint author of what is known as the Delinquent Boys' Bill, one of the most important social statutes now written in the laws of Texas.

Charles C. Highsmith was born at Bastrop, Texas, in 1867, a son of Captain William Andrew and Lelia (Dabney) Highsmith. His father, who was born in Missouri, came to Texas in 1853, being one of the early settlers at Bastrop. He married in that locality, and in a few years became very prominent in local affairs. During the Civil War he was a member of Green's Brigade. Following the war he took up the practice of law at Bastrop, and at the time of his death in December, 1912, vol. IV-8 was one of the oldest residents and lawyers in that section of the state, having lived at Bastrop for nearly sixty years. Among other honors he served as the first sixty years. Among other honors he served as the hist county clerk of Bastrop county, after the Civil War. He was retired from active practice during his later years. The mother, who came of a Virginia family, is

The early education of Charles C. Highsmith was a product of local schools, and he subsequently was a student in the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, and took his law course in the University of Texas, where he graduated LL. B. in 1887. His experience as a lawyer covers a full quarter of a century, and at its beginning he was associated with Wash Jones in Bastrop. For four years he was county attorney of Bastrop county. Since 1904 he has had a larger field for his professional efforts in the city of Houston. Mr. Highsmith has his offices in the Prince Theatre Building, He represented Harris county in the thirty-first and thirty-second legislature, from 1908 to 1912, and while in the house was chairman of the Judiciary Districts Committee, member of Judiciary Committee No. 1, Criminal Jurisprudence Committee, Cities and Towns Committee, and various others. As already stated, he assisted in the preparation of and introduced and secured the passage of the "Juvenile Training School Bill," more popularly known as the Delinquent Boys' Act. Mr. Highsmith has taken the York degrees in Masonry, being a member of the Lodge, Chapter and Commandery, and also belongs to Ben Hur Temple, Mystic Shrine. His other affiliations are with the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and others. In 1899 occurred his marriage to Miss Nora V. Olive, daughter of Ira W. Olive of Lexington, Nebraska. They have no children, and their home is at 2504 Hamilton street.

KHLEBER M. VAN ZANDT. The close of the great struggle between the North and the South found many of the best citizens of the Southwest in decidedly straitened circumstances. Men who had fought valiantly throughout the four years of the terrible warfare returned to their homes to find that the hardest battles were still before them, the cruel, grinding battles that must be won before they could place themselves in the positions which they had left to go forth and fight for the "Lost Cause." Many were broken in health and fortune, but few in spirit, and among the leading men in every activity in Texas today are found those who were compelled to start life anew during the dark period that followed the close of actual hostilities. At the cessation of the war there came to Fort Worth from Marshall, Texas, a young lawyer, Khleber M. Van Zandt, who had deported himself so gallantly during his military service as to win the rank of major. Today the humble lawyer is the directing head of one of the largest financial institutions of Texas, is prominently identified with the commercial and industrial enterprises of wide scope, and is firmly established as a man whose influence is felt in every walk of life. His career is an excellent illustration of what was accomplished by those who retained their courage in spite of all misfortunes and disappointmentswho were large enough to rise above the discouragements that had been theirs.

Khleber M. Van Zandt, president of the Fort Worth National Bank, was born in Franklin county, Tennessee, November 7, 1836, and is a son of Isaac and Frances Cooke (Lipscomb) Van Zandt. Before he was three years of age he was brought by his parents to Marshall, Texas, and his early education was secured in private schools at that place, this being supplemented by attendance at Franklin College, Nashville, Tennessee, On his graduation from that institution, he returned to Marshall, where he began the study of law in the office of J. M. Clough, and after his admission to the bar, in 1858, formed a partnership with Mr. Clough, under the firm style of Clough & Van Zandt. This association proved of mutual benefit, and the firm was rapidly gaining recognition as one of the leading law firms of its section when war was declared, and the partners immediately gave up their private interests that they might offer themselves to the cause of the South. Mr. Clough was made lieutenant-colonel of the Seventh Texas Infantry, while Mr. Van Zandt was elected captain of Company D in that regiment and the former law partners fought side by side until the battle of Fort Donelson, Tennessee, February 15, 1862, when Mr. Clough met a soldier's death. On the surrender of the fort to General Grant Captain Van Zandt was captured with the Confederate troops. On the following day when the chief aide of the Union general visited the camp the captain applied for the privilege of having Colonel Clough's body carried to Clarksville, Tennessee, to be buried where it could be later disinterred and removed to his Texas home. This request was very graciously granted by the Federal commander, to the gratification of Colonel Clough's regiment. On his release Captain Van Zandt rejoined his regiment, with which he continued to serve bravely to the close of the war, subsequently being promoted to the rank of major for meritorious service.

After Appomattox had closed the events of the war, Major Van Zandt, impoverished in health and pocket, returned to his home in Marshall, but soon decided that the associations were such that it would be advisable to move farther west, and, pulling up stakes and packing his belongings into an ox-wagon, he started on a journey which culminated in his arrival, three weeks later, at Fort Worth, to which city he had been advised to make his way by a former college chum whom he had met on the way. Opening a small general mer-chandise establishment, he followed that line of business, and soon found himself on the way to recuperating his lost fortunes. In 1874 he embarked upon his career as a financier, becoming a partner in the private bank of Tidball, Van Zandt & Company, which, ten years later, became the Fort Worth National Bank, now one of the oldest and most substantial institutions in the State. For nearly thirty years he has continued to direct its policies, and at this time it is capitalized at $500,000, with surplus and undivided profits of $875,000. A list of its officers, all well known in banking circles of the Southwest, follows: K. M. Van Zandt, president; N. Harding, R. L. Ellison, vice-presidents; Elmo Sledd, cashier, and R. E. Harding, E. B. Van Zandt and W. M. Massie, assistant cashiers. While he has devoted the greater part of his time and attention to banking matters, Mr. Van Zandt has been interested also in various other enterprises, being president of the K. M. Van Zandt Land Company, and a director in the Fort Worth Life Insurance Company and numerous other extensive business concerns. He built and operated the first street railway in Fort Worth, which was sold some ten years ago to the North Texas Traction Company. Essentially a business man, he has not cared for the struggles of the political arena, but in 1873 was induced to make the campaign for legislative honors. He was subsequently elected, and for one term represented the counties of Dallas, Collin and Tarrant in the State Legislature, then returning to his activities in the fields of business and finance. Ever taking pride in the accomplishments of his adopted city, he has identified himself with all movements that have insured its progress and welfare, and his support has been withheld from no measure which has promised the advancement of morality,

Few men either in Fort Worth or in the State of Texas stand so high not only as a financier and business man, but as a citizen and leader in all important interests as Mr. Van Zandt. Mr. Van Zandt has the quiet manner of the man who accomplishes much and is always confident of his individual resources, and needs no hluster to effect his purposes. Every day he may be found in his office in the Fort Worth National Bank and his door is open to all who have legitimate calls upon his time and attention. He is named among a small group of men still surviving who did great things for Fort Worth in the early days, and his influence is as effective at the present time as it was thirty-five or forty years ago, when Fort Worth was a village waiting on its hills for the advent of the railroad.

HON. THOMAS H. BALL. Among successful law firms in south Texas, none enjoyed a better and more valuable practice than that of Andrews, Ball & Streetman, of Houston, with offices in the Union National Bank Building. The second member of this firm was Thomas H. Ball, who, has recently retired therefrom and who has been for twenty-five years a member of the Texas bar, has served eight years in Congress from his home district, and in many ways has been not only a successful lawyer, but an important factor in public affairs.

Thomas Henry Ball was born at Huntaville, Texas, January 14, 1859, and all his family relationship connect him with some of the best people in the south. His parents were Thomas Henry and M. O. (Spivey) Ball. The father, a minister of the Methodist Episeopal church south, was born in Virginia, came to Texas about 1855, located at Huntaville as president of the Andrew Female Methodist College, and died there in 1859. The mother was born in Alabama, and she and her husband were married in Texas.

Thomas H. Ball grew up at Hunisville, was educated in private schools, and later at Austin College, which at that time was still located in Huntsville. His early career was one of hard work as a farmer and as a merchant up to 1884. His public career began with his election to the office of mayor of Huntsville, a position he filled for three terms, serving from 1882 to 1888. In the meantime he had attended law courses at the University of Virginia, and was admitted to the bar in 1888. Mr. Ball practiced at Huntsville until 1902, and since then had his home in Houston.

For twelve years he served as chairman of the Democratic Executive Committee of Walker county, and has been a delegate to every state democratic convention since 1886, and was a delegate to the democratic national conventions in 1892 and 1896 and delegate at large in 1900, 1904, and 1912. In 1896 the first Texas district elected him to congress, and he sat in the House of Representatives from the first district up to 1900 and thereafter represented the eighth Texas district until 1905. He was a member of the Fifty-Sixth, Fifty-Seventh, Fifty-Eighth, and Fifty-Ninth Congresses, and among the most important committees on which he did service were those of rivers and harbors and on the revision of the laws. Mr. Ball is a director of the Union National Bank of Houston, a director of the W. T. Carter Lumber Company, of the Southern Drug Company, and is vice president of the Bankers Trust Company. Mr. Ball did a very important work as chairman of the state-wide Prohibition campaign committee during 1911. He is a steward in the Methodist church of Houston. His home is at 2004 Travis Street, and he has a wife and three children. In 1882 he married Minnie Fisher Thomason, daughter of Dr. J. A. Thomason of Huntsville, who was a physician and also a prominent planter in that part of the state. The two daughters and one son are: Minnie F. Ball, David Ball, and Rebecca Ball.

JACOB A. HEREING. The recent appointment of Jacob A. Herring as United States Marshal for the Southern District of Texas has brought into the federal service one of the most capable business men and experienced managers of public affairs in the state. Mr. Herring has had a long and active carer, has been a banker, a farmer, superintendent of the State Penitentiary system, and those who are best acquainted with his work say that in every post of responsibility he has acquitted himself with credit and with an efficiency that makes a certainty to the value of his service in his present position.

Jacob A. Herring was born in Cass county, Texas, November 21, 1863, spent his early life there on a farm, and secured an education from the public schools. Until he was grown, he lived on the home place, and from the age of sixteen had actively contributed to the management and work of the old farm and to the support of his widowed mother. At the age of twenty he was married and began life for himself, and continued as a farmer in that section of the state until 1892.

Mr. Herring in that year became sergeant in the penitentiary department of Texas in Fort Bend county, and continued that line of work until March, 1899. That was followed by his removal to Madison county and the beginning of his extensive operations as a farmer and stock raiser near Midway. After some seven or eight years he was again called from his duties as a farmer and business man in January, 1907, when he was appointed superintendent of the state prison system by Gov. Thomas M. Campbell as successor to Searcy Baker. In the performance of those onerous responsibilities he spent four years, with residence at Huntsville, and then returned to Madisonville, and had his home and looked after his business interests there until, in 1913, he came to Houston, to his office as United States Marshal in the Federal building of that city.

It was during Mr. Herring's superintendency of the penitentiary system that Texas accomplished many reforms in the management of its convicts and undertook to abolish the lease system. In the four years of his superintendency fourteen thousand acres of land were bought and paid for to be used in connection with the convict labor of the institution, approximately two hundred eighty-five thousand dollars being paid for that land. Thirty-one and a half miles of railroad were built from Rusk to Palestine, thirteen miles from Brazoria through to the Clements plantation, owned by the state, and also seven and a half miles of railroad from Anchor to Ramsay Farm, which plantation also belongs to the state. Besides those improvements, many new buildings were erected and sufficient live stock was bought to stock up all the plantations. When Mr. Herring left his office as superintendent, the books of that institution showed fifty one thousand dollars balance cash and altogether seventy thousand dollars in cash assets, and the only debts outside of current bills were the one hundred thousand dollars due the state school fund for money used in building the Rusk-Palestine railroad.

During his residence at Madisonville and vicinity Captain Herring has acquired a large importance in business affairs. He was president of the First National Bank of Madisonville, having assisted in the organization and incorporation of that bank, with a capital stock of fifty thousand dollars. He was president of the Cotton Oil Mill and Fertilizer Company, in the same town, and president of the company that organized and installed the waterworks. He was a member of the firm of Turner, Herring & Barton, at Midway, engaged in general merchandise trade, and is still senior member of the firm of J. A. Herring & Company, extensively engaged in stock farming in Madison county. Of his large agricultural interests, he has twenty-five hundred acres under cultivation, and almost all of that land has been improved by his own work and supervision.

Captain Herring's first political service was in Cass county, where he was deputy sheriff for several years. Subsequently, during the Hogg and Culbertson administrations, he was sergeant of the Harlem plantation four years, and this experience led to his further promotion in managing the prison system of Texas. Captain Herring's politics might be described as progressive, prohi-Tom-Ball Democratic, and he was one of the original Wilson men in the state. He has attended all the state conventions since the time of Governor Ross. Fraternally, he is prominent in Masonry, and also belongs to both orders of Woodmen. His Lodge and Chapter affiliations with Masonry are at Madisonville; he belongs to Trinity Commandery No. 29 at Huntsville, and the Elmina Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Galveston.

Captain Herring was married in Clay county, Texas, November 21, 1883, on his twentieth birthday, to Miss Blalock, daughter of Jesse R. Blalock. To their marriage have been born the following children: Ennis T., a farmer of Madison county, who married Margaret Hardin; Leslie, wife of J. A. Sowel of Madison county; Robert B., who lives at Midway and married Annie Gresham; Inez, who married John Price of Madisonville, and Jacob A. Jr., who is in school at Houston.

Captain Herring's father was Rev. Jacob Herring, and the maiden name of his mother was Rhoda J. Jackson. The father came to Texas in 1849, settling in Cass county, and was originally from Wayne county, North Carolina, where he was born in March, 1812. His early education was supplied by the common schools, and forty-two years of his life were spent as a Baptist minister, and it was in that calling that he did his chief work, and never had any military or public service rec-ord. He was a southern Democrat. His death occurred in 1880, and his wife passed away in 1910, at Huntsville, Texas. Their only child was Captain Jacob A. Herring. The Herring family is of colonial stock, and the name was spelled originally with one r, instead of two. Mr. Herring's great-great-grandfather was per-haps the first to leave old England and settle in the Colonies, and secured a patent for land from King George III in Wayne county, North Carolina. Both the great-grandfather and grandfather bore the name of Jacob.

A. A. Fielder. It is practically thirty years since A. A. Fielder engaged in the lumber business in Sherman, and he is still active and prosperous in that field of en-Prior to that time he had been variously identified with business activities, but it remained for him to make the success of his life in the field to which he has so long devoted himself. Mr. Fielder is a native Mississipian, born in luka county in 1850, and he is a son of A. R. A. and Louise (Dean) Fielder.

A. R. Fielder was a slave-holding planter of Mississippi and Alabama. He served in the Confederate army through the Civil war in the command of General Breckenridge, and was present at the battle of Shiloh as a participant. He continued in service until near the close of the war, when he was discharged and sent to his home on account of failing health. He was at that time a resident of Alabama, and in 1866 he left that state and moved to Texas, locating in Smith county, and identifying himself with farming and stock raising up to the time of his death in 1887, and enjoying a generous degree of success in the work. His widow survived him until 1908. They were the parents of ten children, nine of whom are now living, and A. A. Fielder of this review is the eldest of the number.

A. A. Fielder had his early education, which was extremely limited because of the Civil war and resultant conditions, in the district schools of his community, but though his actual attendance at school was very slight, he is by no means an uneducated man, for he has applied himself to study along general lines and is well informed on many topics, with a good, sound knowledge of fundamentals as an aid to continued self-improvement.

The first business activities of the young man was teaming and freighting from Jefferson, Marshall and Shreveport before the day of the railroad. In 1870 he accepted a position as a clerk in a dry goods store at Tyler, Texas, and in 1875 he went on the road as a traveling salesman for a St. Louis wholesale grocery house. In 1880 he engaged in the retail grocery business in Sherman, and in 1884 he changed his line, embarking in the lumber business, which enterprise has since held his undivided business attention.

Mr. Fielder has been a lifelong Democrat, and as a member of the Sherman school board he has done excellent work for the advancement of the school system. In 1896 he was induced to accept the candidacy for the office of mayor, and he was elected to the office by a flattering majority, the people retaining him at the head of the affairs of the city for the next ten years, or during five consecutive terms of office.

Mr. Fielder is a member of the Masonic fraternity, the Woodmen of the World, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and the United Friends of Work. He was Grand Marshal for the state in the Odd Fellows order, and has held numerous offices in the other fraternal societies mentioned here. He and his family are members of the First Baptist church of Sherman.

In 1879 Mr. Fielder was married in Sherman to Miss Bell Light, a daughter of Col. D. W. Light, who was long a prominent stockman in Grayson and Denton counties, this state. He was an officer in the Southern army during the war and died in about 1907. One child of Mr. and Mrs, Fielder, D. R. Fielder, is living, and he is associated with his father in the lumber business. He is a capable and progressive young business man of about thirty years, and had an excellent standing in business and other circles of Sherman.

A resident of Sherman since the year 1876, Mr. Fielder is especially well prepared to express an opinion as to the growth and prosperity of the city, for he has seen it emerge from a small village to a fine little city of about 20,000 inhabitants. He has seen the city grow in population, in wealth, in prominence and in power in this section of the state, and he believes that it is not yet at the zenith of its progress.

ARTHUR B. HAMM. The vice president and manager of the National Live Stock & Commission Company of Texas, at Fort Worth, Mr. Hamm is a stock man from the ground up, began his career without education, and from boyhood has had a skillful and accurate knowledge of all the practical details of stock raising, which his energy and enterprise has since enabled him to make use of in his promotion to one of the most important posts in the live stock business of the southwest. Probably no successful man in the stock industry in Texas has more completely won his success strictly on merit than Mr. Hamm.

The National Live Stock Commission Company, as may be stated for the information of readers not identified or familiar with the live stock business, is one of the largest concerns of its kind in America. Its various branches are located in Chicago, Kansas City, St. Louis, Omaha, St. Joseph, and Fort Worth. The general officers are Charles Kelly, president; A. B. Hamm, vice president, and Fort Worth manager; A. F. Crowvice president, and roll with manager, it is they vice president; Edgar E. Overstreet, vice president; Walter H. Abernathy, secretary and treasurer; and George Beggs, loan agent. The offices at Fort Worth are at the stock yards and in the Live Stock Exchange Building. Arthur B. Hamm is a native of Mississippi, born at Baldwin, March 18, 1869. The parents were Captain J. T. and Eva Hamm, and they came to Texas in 1873, locating in Van Zandt county, settling on a ranch. Thus from the age of four years, Arthur B. Hamm was reared in the atmosphere and environment of the stock business, and has never known other occupation and cer-tainly his success is largely due to the concentration of his energies upon one end. His early education would agree with one of the most important definitions of education, that it is a preparation for life, and he prepared for his career in the old-style fashion, when boys learned to do by doing, but so far as book learning was concerned Mr. Hamm had a minimum of that sort of training.

When only a boy he was in the saddle riding the range, and learned all the practical methods of tending and raising cattle and hogs. He was only a young man when he came to Fort Worth and established himself in business with the firm of Thomas, Hamm & Dupee, in the buying and selling of cattle, hogs and sheep. A year later he was given charge of the sales department of the Cassiday-Southwestern Commission Company, spending the next two years in selling hogs and sheep for that concern. He then associated himself in the same business with Mr. W. D. Davis, under the firm name of Davis & Haum, and they were among the well known commission traders in Fort Worth for five years. At the end of that time they joined forces with the National Live Stock Commission Company, and he has since been vice president and manager of the Fort Worth branch, The National Live Stock Company 1913, handled more than 5,000 cars of live stock.

Mr. Hamm has the reputation of being probably the finest judge of hogs and sheep in the business. From his long and thorough experience he has been able to do much more than merely buy and sell, and has also used his influence in promoting the live stock industry in various ways. As an illustration of this it may be remarked that Mr. Hamm has always advocated and endeavored to persuade Texas ranchers to raise maize and kaffir corn as feed for their hogs. The value of this advice has only recently been emphasized in prac-tical fashion to Texas farmers. In November, 1912, the National Live Stock Commission Company bought a National Live Stock Commission Company bodges and shipped them to George L. Simms, at Panhandle, Texas. These animals were fed milo-maize exclusively. When put in the feedlot they averaged eighty-five pounds in weight, and when shipped to Forth Worth and sold to Armour & Company on February 5, 1913, they averaged two hundred and forty-five pounds apiece and topped the market. Moreover, Armour & Company pronounced the meat of most excellent quality.

Mr. Hamm was married to Miss Bettie Gilchrist, daughter of H. A. Gilchrist of Wills Point. They are the parents of three sons, Angus, Joe and Jack.

Dr. Henry F. Stevens. A resident of Denison since 1905, Dr. Stevens is established here as a veterinary surgeon, and has shown such capacity for his work as to give him an almost constant practice in the city and in the country for thirty miles around.

Henry F. Stevens was born November 7, 1876, in the State of Iowa, a son of V. F. Stevens and Mrs. Almira Stevens. The father was born in Ohio, but the mother was a native of Iowa. V. F. Stevens followed the trade of blacksmith, and during the Civil war went out from Iowa in Company F of the Thirteenth Iowa regiment of Infantry, and was away fighting for the flag of the Union four years, or until the close of the great war. He was in active fighting in many of the most fiercely contested battles and campaigns, and at Gettysburg his clothes were pierced with seven bullet holes. His death occurred in May, 1909, while his widow is still living and makes her home with her son, Dr. Stevens, at Denison. There were seven children and Henry was the third in line.

His early education was acquired in the public schools of Nebraska, the family having moved to that State when he was about five years of age. From an early age his inclinations for handling live stock opened the way for a professional career, and he finally entered the University Veterinary College of Kansas City, Missouri. He took a full course, and was graduated in 1905. He quit with ample experience and a diploma and at once came south and located at Denison. Since beginning practice in that city in December, 1905, he has increased his facilities, and has made himself a fixture and affords a very competent service to all stock owners in the vicinity. He has a barn at 217-219 West Chestnut street, equipped with all the operating facilities, and he has spared no expense in getting the best material for supplementing his professional skill.

Dr. Stevens affiliates with the Woodmen of the World and the Royal Highlanders, and is an active member of the Chamber of Commerce. In politics he is a Republican of the progressive brand. At Denison in June, 1910, occurred his marriage to Miss Phyllis S. Heath, a Gaughter of Miton Heath, who is sales manager for W. D. Collins, manufacturer of bank fixtures. Dr. Stevens and wife have two children: Earl, born April 6, 1911, and Irene, born June 24, 1912. Their home is at 40s West Day street.

Makellus E. Kleerko. It has been well said that in the American state the great and good lawer must always be prominent, for he is one of the forces that move and control society. Public confidence has usually been reposed in the legal profession, and no political preferment, no mere place, can add to the power or increase the honor which belongs to the pure and educated lawyer. A great and true lawyer in every sense of the phrase was the late Marcellus E. Kleberg, of Galveston. To conspicuous ability and services in his profession he added the distinction of a fine and disinterested public spirit, and a remarkable talent as an orator. Through a career of forty years in the law he directed an effective influence in behalf of the city in which he had his residence for a long period of years, and among those to whom most honor is due in supporting Galveston during its era of "sturm und drang," the name of Marcellus E. Kleberg must always be prominent.

Marcellus Eugene Kleberg was born in Meyersville, DeWitt county, Texas, February 7, 1849. The Kleberg family was among the earliest of the German colonists in Texas. Their arrival is set some ten years before the great immigration of the early forties. The parents of the late Mr. Kleberg were Robert Justus and Rosa (von Roeder) Kleberg. R. J. Kleberg was born in 1803 in the town of Hertselle, Westphalia, Kingdom of Prussia. He graduated from the Gymnasium of Holzminden and received his degree of Bachelor of Laws from the University at Goettingen. Being a man of democratic ideas, and not an admirer of monarchical government, he emigrated to America in 1834. In the fall of that year he married Rosa von Roeder, and they with some of her brothers and sisters came to America. At New Orleans they chartered a boat and sailed for Brazoria, Texas. Caught in a storm, they were shipwrecked on Galveston Island. Here Kleberg left his people, and with a few men went exploring the land. After reaching the mainland of Texas they went on foot to San Felipe, where they met Captain Moseley Baker, who informed them that their advance party had settled at Cat Springs, which was not fourteen miles distant. Kleberg on his arrival at Cat Springs found that two of his brothers-in-law had died. After a few days he returned to Galveston, and encountering a stormy voyage up the bayou, landed with his company at Harrisburg. The city of Houston had not yet been established and Harrisburg was one of the most prominent centers in that section of Texas, and soon afterwards became for a brief while the capital of the province. After living a few months at Galveston, the Kleberg party went to Cat Springs to start their little settlement. Not being able to move all of their furniture at once, a great many valuable articles were left in Harrisburg. These about a year later were burned when Santa Anna and his Mexican army arrived at Harrisburg.

As soon as the news of the fall of the Alamo reached the settlement at Cat Springs, Kleberg's patriotism was stirred, and he went to join the Texas forces. He became a member of Captain Moseley Baker's company. It was a hard and trying moment in his life, for he had to leave a young wife and child to suffer the perils of the vengcance-seeking Mexicans. From that time on he was engaged in Houston's campaign, and fought in the culminating battle of San Jacinto. He was also in Rusk's command, following the Mexican army as it retreated beyond the Rio Grande. When the family parted at San Felipe, Mrs. Kleberg mounted her pony, and taking her infant in her arms, started on her journey of safety, thus participating in what is known in Texas history as "Runaway Scrape."

When the war was over the family returned to their settlement at Cat Springs. In 1848, with his family, Mr. Kleberg moved to Mcycrsville, DeWitt county. Some years later the Civil War began. At that time he was too old to go into military service, but he showed his loyalty to his state by organizing a militai company. He died a soldier, a hero, a patriot, at his home near Yorktown, Texas, Octoher 23, 1888. He held many offices of honor, and was a noble husband and father. His wife, Baroness Rosa von Roeder, one of Texas' noblest women, died in July, 1907, in her ninety-fourth year. Both are buried in the family burial ground near York-

Marcellus Engene Kleberg received his early education from a private tutor. There were no public schools available during his youth. When he was twelve years of age the Civil War began. Thus it fell to him to help take care of the farm, as his older brothers went to war, and his father had offlielial duties to perform. During this period he herded the sheep, and while thus acting as shepherd, carried books with him and read and studied. Later he attended Concrete College, situated thirty miles from Meyersville. His college career had to be discontinued owing to financial misfortune which overfoad he had to be a support of the continued owing to financial misfortune which overfoad had to be a support of the continued of the continued owing to financial misfortune which overfoad had another than the continued of the continued of Returning to DeWitt county, he established himself as a lawyer. Soon afterwards he was unged to go to the legislature, and was elected to represent his county in the thirteenth legislature of Texas. When his term of office expired he moved to Bellville, Austin county, where he practiced law in partnership with Mr. B. T. Harris. On October 24, 1875, Mr. Kleberg married Miss Emilie

On October 24, 1875, Mr. Richerg married Miss Emilie Miller, a daughter of Mr. H. Miller, a well-known merchant of Austin county. After his marriage Mr. Kleberg located in Galveston, and in a short time became recognized as an able lawyer, and one of the influential citizens. He was a member of the law firm of Street & Kleberg, then of Hume & Kleberg, then Kleberg then Kleberg, then of Hume & Kleberg, then Kleberg, then Kleberg, then Kleberg, then Street & Kleberg, then Kleberg, then Street & Kleberg, then Street & Kleberg, then Kleberg then Kleberg then Great William of the Lawyer, he was almost continuously identified with some form of public service. He served as a trustee of the public schools of the city, and for eighteen years was president of the school board. He was president of the board at the time the great storm of 1990 demolished the school building, and it was through his efforts that the New York City public schools gave a large sum of money to help rebuild the local school houses of Galveston, and the example of New York was followed by other public schools through the United States.

Resigning his office with the schools, Mr. Kleberg accepted the appointment of city attorney of Galveston in January, 1904, and served the city most nobly in one of the most important and trying periods of its history. During his term of office, when the citizens were about to give up the idea of protecting Galveston from overflows, on account of the lack of funds, his profound knowledge of constitutional and municipal law eleared all objections to the bond that had been issued. He went to New York, and succeeded in selling a large quantity of the issue. Some years before he had been one of the chief supporters and advocates of the commission form of government. How the community estimated his civic service is well stated in summary form by the Galveston Tribme of December 31, 1909, which spoke of him as the "Pilot of the Municipal Ship of State. He is the strongest man in the city government. His value to the city cannot be overestimated." With his work as a public servorant accomplished, Mr. Kleberg resigned his position of city attorney in July, 1911, to devote his time to his large private practice.

The late Mr. Kleberg was one of the charter members of the State Bar Association of Texas, and was the first president of the Galveston County Bar Association, At the 1912 State Bar Convention, held in Galveston, in the summer of that year, he was elected as one of the delegates to the National Bar Association, which convened in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, Mr. Kleberg served as a regent of the University of Texas, during the governor-ship of Mr. Lanham.

That the late Mr. Kleberg was one of the most eloquent and forceful orators of Texas and the nation has been abundantly testified. His influence as a speaker was increased by his fluency in the German as well as the English language. One of his first great speeches was that on the "Review of the Bloody Battles of the Texas-Mexican War," a speech delivered in Galveston April 21, 1896. It was at the time, and has since been referred to as a masterpiece of oratory. He was not only noted for his formal addresses in commemoration of historic deeds and great events, but used his ability many times to move and mould public opinion in behalf of current needs of his state and city. When Galves-ton was in its crisis and sorely needed the help of the state, he made the appeal at Dallas which brought the Democratic Convention to Galveston. In his address on that occasion he displayed such eloquence that when the vote was taken on the question no one was found to oppose it. On March 2, 1902, Mr. Kleberg delivered an address to the students of the University of Texas, and that was regarded as a peculiarly effective example of oratory. His power in this direction was recognized much beyond the limits of his home state. The Union League Club of Chicago invited him to make the address on Washington's birthday of 1910. The cheering and applause at the close of his speech were said to have been more enthusiastic than had greeted any speaker in the history of the Chicago Auditorium. It was on that day he established himself as one of the orators of the nation.

Marcellus E. Kleberg died March 1, 1913, at the age of sixty-four, leaving a widow and six children, namely: Robert M. Kleberg, a printer; Marcellus Kleberg, county judge of Runnels county; Walter Kleberg, physician and surgeon and present city health officer of Galveston; and Misses Rosa, Emilie, and Alice Kleberg.

The late Mr. Kleberg was a patriotic citizen, a knightly gentleman, devoted to his family and friends. He was distinguished as a lawyer, a min of philosophical and high ideals which placed him at the head of his profession. His wonderful intellect and intelligence made him a benefactor to his city, above what he accomplished in its behalf through his professional capacity. He was a patriot, crator, and legislator of first rank, and his name and good deeds are fitly honored in any history of his home state.

WILLIAM JACKSON FLESHER. A member of the Canyon City bar since 1909, Mr. Flesher has been successful in practice, has been honored with official promotion, and is one of the enterprising and public spirited men of Randall county.

William Jackson Flesher was born at Reedy, Roane county, West Virginia, September 14, 1882. On his father's side his ancestors came from Germany, and his mother's ancestry was Irish. The father, Andrew L. Flesher, was a native of West Virginia, and his grand-father Join Plesher was an old West Virginia farmer, and when the Civil war came on, enlisted with Breeken-ridge's mounted troopers, and served from the West Virginia campaign, early in the war, until the surrender of Lee at Appomattox. His death occurred soon after the war, partly a result of the wounds and hardships which he had undergone as a soldier. Andrew L. Flesher, the father, who now resides at Rock Island, Texas, brought his family from West Virginia to Missouri in 1888, and in 1900 came to Texas. He is a contractor and builder, and in polities is a Democrat. The family are Methodists in religion. The maiden name of the mother is Henrietts Summerville, who was born in Jackson county, West Virginia, and has been the mother of seven children, three deceased, and the four now living being residents of Texas. William Jackson Flesher had his early schooling in Sullivan county, Missouri, and spent one year in the Kirksville Normal in that state. When eighteen years old the family came to Texas, and from 1902 to 1904 he was a student in the Texas State Normal School at Denton. His early career was spent on a farm and in the fall of 1900 he filled his first regular position as a teacher. He taught a country school in Colorado county for three years, resigning to enter the State Normal at Denton, and from there moved out to Mason county, Texas, where he was elected superintendent of schools. He filled that important office for three years. He had depended upon his own exertions to advance his education, and early in his career it was his ambition to become a lawyer. With the means acquired as a teacher he finally entered the law department of the University of Texas, and after studying two years was admitted to the bar in the fall of 1908. In June, 1909, he opened his office in Canyon City, and was soon recognized as one of the rising young attorneys of the Randall county bar. In November, 1910, he was elected to the office of county attorney, and by reelection in 1912, still holds that office. Mr. Flesher is also a stock holder and director of the First State Bank of Canyon.

In politics he is one of the workers for Democratic support. During the recent campaign, he was one of the active advocates of the amendment to the state constitution, providing for state-wide probibition, and while the campaign was unsuccessful great headway has been made, and with a view to securing the final climination of the liquor traffic from Texas Mr. Flesher determined to devote much time and labor to extending the work which was so well begun previous to the last election on that question. Praternally he is affiliated with the Masonic order, the Independent Order of Old Fellows and the Woodmen of the World, also belonging to the Eastern Star. He is a trustee and steward in the Metholist clurch and one of the teachers of the Sunday school.

On December 25, 1910, he married Miss May Ballard, how was born in Texas, a daughter of J. W. Ballard. Her father was one of the old settlers of Wise county, having come across the country with an ox team to that region. For the past twenty-two years he and his family have resided in Swisher county, Texas. To Mr. and Mrs. Flesher have been born one son and one daughter: William James, Jr., born September 21, 1911, and Henrietta May, born June 6, 1913.

WILLIAM C. BLANKS. Since 1907 a prominent member of the San Angelo bar, William C. Blanks has been a Texas lawyer for twenty years, and has made a very successful record in his profession.

William C. Blanks was born August 24, 1873, in Muysville, Arkansas, the oldest of the five children of R. A. and M. A. Blanks, both of whom were natives of Virginia. On the father's side the ancestry is Scotch-Irish, and French on the mother's. Before the Civil war both families were large planters and slave holders in Virginia, and the maternal grandfather was the owner of about two hundred slaves, so that the result of the war was especially disastrous to his property. In 1874 the parents moved out to Texas, locating at Gainesville, from there to Wills Point. At the latter place the father was engaged in the mercantile business, and lived there until his death in 1902. The mother passed away in 1910 at the old home in Sherman. Previous to his removal to Texas, the father went through the war as a Contectant soldier. He was wounded in the first battle at Manassas, but after a furlough reengagements until the final surrender. He was a basiness friend and associate of Stonewall Jackson.

Mr. William C. Blanks attained his education in the public schools of Texas, having been a resident of this state since he was one year of age. He subsequently was a student in the Battle Ground Academy in Franklin, Tennessee, and during 1892-93 was a student in the law firm of Judge Gordon Russell and W. B. Wynne at Hills Point, His entrance to the bar followed in 1893, when he was only twenty years of age, He began practice in Wills Point, his old home, and remained there until 1907, at which date he established his office in San Angelo.

Mr. Blanks has always been a stanch Democrat and has spoken and contributed in other ways to the success of his party and to good government in his community and state. He is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, and the San Angelo club, and belongs to the State Bar Association. His religious membership is in the Methodist church south, of which he is a steward. On June 12, 1875, Mr. Blanks married Miss Julia Gilchrist, daughter of A. J. Gilchrist of Wills Point. Her father was for a number of years a merchant at Wills Point, baying come to Texas from Missouri many years ago. Her mother, Mrs. Kate Gilchrist, is now living at the old home, but her father died about 1887. The four children of Mr. and Mrs. Blanks are two girls and two boys. Miss Ruth and Miss Mary are both in school, and the boys are William, aged ten and Olin, aged six, the former also being a school boy. Mr. Blanks has been well pleased with conditions in west Texas since he took up his residence here, and as it is the portion of the state which will have the greatest development within the next quarter of a century, it is his purpose to identify him-self closely with its progress and assist in every capacity to promote the substantial welfare of San Angelo and 'all other sections of the state.

JUDGE MILTON MAYS. Many years of experience in legal work has won for Judge Milton Mays of San Angelo, Texas, a wide reputation as a lawyer of wisdom and ability. Of late years the judge has devoted his attention to his duties as a member of the bench, and his success in a judicial capacity was no less than was expected from the record he made as an attorney. Judge Mays has also taken an active part in politics and in fact has entered actively into every phase of the life of the communities in which he has made his home.

Judge Milton Mays was born in Madison county, Tennessee, on the 7th of November, 1840, the son of John M. and Sarah (Fulbright) Mays. John M. Mays was a farmer of Madison county and a member of a well known Tennessee family. The Mays family were prosperous planters before the war, being land owners and slave holders. John M. Mays came to Texas in 1849 and located in Rusk county where be farmed and raised stock. Here he lived until his death in 1887 at the age of seventy-five years. He was justice of the peace for a number of years in Rusk county and was a prominent citizen. His wife died in 1880. There were twelve children in the family, six boys and six girls, an even division and a similar coincidence occurs in the fact that six of the children, three boys and three girls were born in Tennessee, while the other six were born in Texas.

Of these children Judge Mays was the fourth. Their ancestry was German and Scotch, and characteristics of both these strong races may be seen in the person of the judge. Milton Mays first attended a private school in Tennessee and then upon the removal of his family to Texas he continued his education in private schools in the latter state. He next entered the Cumberland Presbyterian College at Daingerfield, Texas, remaining there from 1857 to 1860.

When the storm cloud of 1860 broke, however, young Milton Mays would have no more of school. He enlisted in the Confederate army, being a member of Company F, of the 7th Texas Cavalry in Sibley's Brigade. He took part in a number of battles, among them being those of Valverde and Glorietta in New Mexico. He served all through the war and in addition to the larger battles he was in hundreds of skirmishes.

With the surrender of General Lee and the consequent close of the war Judge Mays again became a private citizen. He returned to Texas and taught school for a time, spending his spare moments in reading law. He later studied under Colonel William Stedman Henderson and in 1870 he was admitted to the bar. He first began to practice in Rusk county, Texas, and in 1872 he located in Brownwood, Texas. He remained here for ten years and then, in 1882, he came to San Angelo. He has been engaged in the active practice of his profession here ever since and has built up a large and lucrative practice. He has held the office of county judge for the past fourteen years, being one of the most widely respected of the judges of Tom Green county.

Judge Mays has always been a member of the Democratic party and has worked for the success of the party in every election. In 1896 he was one of the electors on the Democratic ticket. His sole fraternal allegiance is with the Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons.

Judge Mays was married in 1866 to Miss Mary Sanford, of Rusk county, Texas, and his second marriage took place in 1882, his wife being Miss Aline Standenberg, of Brownwood, Texas. The judge has two daughters, Mary and Hermione.

James E. Grimman. A long and steadily prospering business enerer has been that of James E. Grimhald prospering of Sonora, and along with success in merchandising he has been honored with official position and places of trust which indicate the confidence of the community in his ability and integrity.

James E. Grimland, who is a Texan both by birth and by preference, was born in Prairieville in Kanfman county, March 3, 1866. His parents, Yern and Inger (Holverson) Grimland, were both natives of Norway, whence they came to Texas as young people and were married in this state. The father has been a resident of the state since he was sixteen years of age. During his younger years he followed farming and is now retired. He has always taken an active part in public affairs, and has been honored with various public effices. He has always taken an active part in public offices, the second of the secon

James E. Grimland had his education in the public schools and fire leaving high school finished at a business college. Until he was twenty-one years of age he lived at home on the farm, and was thoroughly familiar with all its duties. He then went into a store as a clerk, and followed mercantile lines for twenty-five years in the employ of various firms and at different places. He has been a resident of Sonora in Sutton county for a number of years, and in April, 1911, he established there his present business. He has a first-class store and carries a good stock of men's furnishing goods, shoes, hats and other wares, and does an extensive retail business.

In Bosque county, Texas, on New Year's Eve of 1899, Mr. Grimland married Miss Lucy Wallace, daughter of S. J. Wallace of Bosque county. Their family of seven children, five sons and two daughters, are named: Fred C., Lneile, Winona, Roy, Wade, Jaek and Lawrence. The son Fred is a graduate of Byrne's Commercial College at Tyler, and Lucile is a teacher in the Sonora Public Schools. All the family are active members of the Methodist church. Fraternally Mr. Grimland is a Blue Lodge and Chapter Mason, being secretary of his lodge, and is also one of the local commanders of the Knight of the Maccahees. He has membership in the Sonora Business Men's Club.

Politically he is considered one of the most active men in the Sutton Democracy. As a citizen and as a business man the people have shown their confidence in him by electing him five successive times to the office of county treasurer, and he is now serving his fift term. On two elections he had no opponent for the office. Among the avocations of life Mr. Grimland gets a great deal of pleasure out of music, and is proficient with nearly every instrument.

HON. ASHER RICHARDSON SMITH, of Laredo, Texas, is one of the prominent young lawyers of his district and gives promise of making a name for himself in the Southwest.

Mr. Smith was born at Atlantic City, New Jersey, in 1887, while his parents were temporary residents of that place, but he was reared their bone sweet of that place, but he was reared their bone sweet of the third that the sweet of the swe

Having decided to enter the legal profession, Mr. Smith took up the study of law in the Law Department of the University of Texas, from which he graduated in the class of 1911. He then came to Laredo and identified himself with the practice of law here, under the firm name of Atlee & Smith, heing favored with the conduct of important litigation in the various courts of Southwest Texas. Mr. Atlee having retired from the practice, he is now practicing by himself.

In the general election of 1912 Mr. Smith was honored by election on the Democratic ticket as a member of the lower house of the Texas Legislature to represent the district of which Webb county is a portion.

JUAN V. BENATIPES. Among the members of the Webb county bar probably no lawyer is better known than Juan V. Benavides, who has practiced his profession in Laredo since 1877 and who is the present county attorney. In infancy he was adopted by the late Santos Benavides, who died at Laredo in 1891. His foster-father treated him like a son, sending him to some of the best schools in the country, particularly those of San Antonio and Spring Hill College, Mobile, Alabama. After completing the course at the last-named institution, he entered the law department of Washington and Lee University, at Lexington. GEORGE RICHAINSON. Among Texas sheep men and wool growers of the present time there is none whose extended business and success have excelled the record of George Richardson, the well-known wool commission man and sheep raiser at San Angelo. His sheep ranch, located in Tom Green, Sterling and Irion counties, has for a number of years borne a high reputation among the sheep men throughout West Texas. Mr. Richardson has jealously guarded the substantial reputation of his flocks, and as a result there are few men in the country who have upheld the standard of the sheep business more uniformly through a course of many years.

George Richardson, like many other successful men, started out on a small scale in West Texas as a sheep grower about thirty-five years ago. He comes from a sheep country, and his father before him was an expert in the industry in Scotland, where George was reared and trained to his future life work. He was born in Dumfrieshire, Scotland, in 1857. His father, D. B. Richardson, was a sheep raiser and farmer, and one of the most successful in his line in all Scotland. He continued in that industry until his death in 1911. The mother is still living in Scotland.

George Richardson attained his education in the schools of his native land, and his first regular work on his father's farm began at the age of fifteeu and he continued until he was thoroughly familiar with all the de-partments of sheep raising. In 1879 he emigrated from Scotland, and after one year in Uvalde county, Texas, moved out to Eden, in Concho county, where he was among the early settlers, and where he had a sheep ranch for some years until 1887, at which time he transferred his headquarters to San Angelo. In San Angelo, besides being a large producer of wool, he has for many years been engaged in the wool commission business. In West Texas when he made his start he had a flock of about four hundred sheep. Since then he has directed his energies not only to increasing his sheep numerically, but has laid special emphasis on grading up and bringing the flocks to the highest standard. He has continued this work with great care and efficiency for more than thirty-five years. The stock to which he has given special attenfive years. The stock to which he has given special atten-tion is the Delaine Merinos, and his ranch is famous all over West Texas for this breed. He now runs ten thousand head of sheep, and his wool clip will average ten pounds to the head. During the years in which Mr. Rich-ardson has been a factor in wool production in West Texas prices have had a great range, from five cents per pound to twenty-five cents per pound. During the Cleveland administration, when wool was placed on the free list, and in consequence of the tariff tinkering of that time, wool prices fell to the lowest known minimum of five cents per pound.

Mr. Richardson, hesides his large interest as a wool raiser, is a director in the Concho Valley Loan and Trust Company of San Angelo, and is vice-president and one of the large stoekholders in the First National Bank of San Angelo. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, and has membership in the Presbyterian church. On November 25, 1890, he married Miss Carrie B. Seudder, of Tennessee, Mr. and Mrs. Richardson have three children, two sons and one daughter. D. B. Richardson, the oldest, is now connected with the South Bend Woolen Mills in South Bend, Indiana; Robert S. Richardson is attending the West Texas Military Academy in San Antonio; the daughter, Miss Janet H. Richardson, is in school in San Angelo.

The Richardson sheep ranch is located thirty-five miles northwest of San Angelo, and its fifty thousand acres spread over portions of Tom Green, Sterling and Irion counties. It is watered by Rocky Creek, and by twentytwo driven wells, each one equipped with windmill and large water tank. This large acreage is divided into twenty-seven inclosures, and the ranch is equipped with three separate residences, with a shearing shed and all the improvements and facilities for the sheep industry. As a wool grower Mr. Richardson, almost as a matter of course, is a Republican in politics, and thoroughly be-lieves in the protective tariff. He has served as chairman of the Republican party in his home county for eighteen years, and is a vigorous advocate of Republican principles. He is vice-president of the State Sheep, Goat and Wool-Growers' Association of Texas. Mr. Richardson is a Scotchman and of an old Scotch family, while his wife is of German descent. There were eleven children in the elder Richardson's family, and two of the brothers, James and John, are now both employed on the Richardson ranch in West Texas. Mr. Richardson also has a brother in China engaged in the banking and shipping business. All the other children of the Richardson family still live in Scotland.

Mr. Richardson believes that the Concho country is the best wool-growing section in the State of Texas, and in the entire Southwest. Its advantages in this regard are increased by the fact that, while essentially a grazing country, it is well watered from subterranean sources, and by drilling from eighteen to one hundred feet below the surface an unfailing supply of pure water can always be obtained. In climate also the country is ideal, and it is a fine place for men of energy to adopt as their home.

Joseph Netzer. It is a notable fact in connection with the history of immigration to the United States that many of those from Germany become prominent in business and financial circles. Joseph Netzer, a hardware merchant and plumber of Laredo, was born in Frankfort-on-the-Main, Germany, was educated in his native land and there learned the trade of plumber. As a journeyman he followed this occupation in various cities of Europe, principally those of Germany, Austria, Servia and Russia. In 1879 he came to America, and during the next two years worked at his trade in New Jersey and at Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. In 1881 he enlisted in the United States regular army at Baltimore, Maryland, and went from the bottom to the top, holding all the different offices therein, and during his term of enlistment was in active service on the western frontier. He participated in the campaigns against the Indian tribes, particularly the Apaches, of New Mexico and Arizona, and his company formed part of the force that captured the notorious chief Geronimo and his band. While in the regular army he was in the Eighth cavalry and Nineteenth infantry. Mr. Netzer located at Laredo in 1889 and embarked in the plumbing and hardware business on a small scale, but his energetic habits and fine business ability bore fruit, and at the present time he has one of the largest and most important establishments of this character on the Mexican border. In connection with his occupation he has given a great deal of attention to the subject of sanitary engineering, in which he is recognized as an authority. Naturally, his knowledge on this important subject has caused him to be consulted on matters pertaining to public sanitation, sewerage, etc., with the result that few plumbers in the Southwest are more widely or favorably known. He is honorary president of and state lecturer on sanitation for the Texas State Plumbers' Association, and an exmember of the United States Sanitary Committee. Public spirited and progressive, he has been an ardent worker in every cause for the advancement of Laredo since he became a resident of the city, and he holds the important position of president of the executive committee of the Laredo Board of Trade for the year of 1913.

In fraternal circles Mr. Netzer is a prominent and popular figure. He is a past great sachem of the Impropular lighte. He is a pass great sathem of the In-proved Order of Red Men, in which order he has served as great representative of Texas in the Great Council of the United States, also a member of the council of the Grand Lodge of Texas; a member of Minnehala Council No. 1, Degree of Pocahontas; grand vice protector of the Texas Grand Lodge, Knights and Ladies of Honor; a past noble grand of Laredo Lodge, Indeed pendent Order of Odd Fellows; a member of Laredo Rebekah Lodge; first president of the Southwest Texas Odd Fellows and Rebekah Association; secretary and treasurer of Laredo Lodge No. 301, Loyal Americans of the Republic; a member of Laredo Lodge No. 1018, Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and of Laredo Lodge No. 1019, Loval Order of Moose. He is also a T. P. A. After becoming a citizen of Laredo, Mr. Netzer joined the Texas National Guard and his knowledge of military subjects gained while serving in the army of the United States led to his being commissioned captain of Company K. Third infantry.

Mr. Netzer was united in marriage in Laredo to Miss Annie E. Wright, a native of England, and their seven children are J. C., F. S., May, Ruth, Leo, Paul and Nellie.

EDGAR L. HICKS. A man of distinctive energy and forceful individuality Edgar L. Hicks, of Brownsville, holds a position of note among its leading citizens, being widely and favorably known not only as the treasurer of Cameron county, but for his connection as an agent with many of the larger and more important insurance companies of the United States and England. The lineal descendant of a well-known New England family, he was born, in 1882, in Brownsville, Texas, which has always been his home.

His father, the late Benjamin Oliver Hicks, was born in Rhode Island, and was there bred and educated. Coming to Texas during the progress of the Civil War, he bought large tracts of land in Cameron county, and for many years was one of the substantial and repre-sentative business men of Brownsville, where he resided until his death, in 1887. He married Annette Powers Impy, who was born in Louisiana. She survived him, passing away in 1902, her death occurring in Brownsville. Having acquired a practical education in the schools of Brownsville, Edgar L. Hicks began when young to take a lively interest in public affairs, and was soon brought to the forefront as a man of ability and integrity. In 1906 he was appointed county treasurer of Cameron county to fill a vacancy, and in the November election of that year was elected to the office. Performing the many duties devolving upon him in that capacity efficiently and satisfactorily, Mr. Hicks was re-elected to the same position in 1908, 1910, and 1912, a record showing conclusive proofs of his popularity as a man and as a public official.

Mr. Hicks was engaged in the general fire insurance business in Brownsville, and is thoroughly familiar with its details, and is recognized as a local authority on all matters connected with it, and its many ramifications under the Texas laws. In partnership with his brother, Alphonse P. Hicks, he conducted business under the firm name of the Hicks Insurance Agency, from 1904 until December, 1913, the brothers being local agents for the following named companies: Home Insurance Company, New York; North British and Mercantile Insurance Company; Springfield Fire and Marine; New York Underpany; Springard Fite and Marine; New York Consumers of the Hartford Fire Insurance Company; The Royal Insurance Company of Liverpool, England; Fidelity-Phenix, New York; Westchester Fire Insurance, New York; Palatine Insurance Company, Limited, London; Continental Fire Insurance Company, New York: Firemen's Fund Insurance Company, of San Francisco; Niagara Fire Insurance Company, New York; and the Providence-Washington Insurance Company, Providence, Rhode Island.

Mr. Hicks married, in 1907, Miss Goldve Irwin, of Columbus, Ohio. Mr. Hicks is a member of the Chamber of Commerce; of the Country Club; and of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

ROBERT MARION PRATHER, M. D. As a physician and surgeon, Dr. Prather has for five years been one of the leaders of his profession in Bee county, and has acquired a large practice and general recognition for his ability and standing, both as a physician and a citizen. In 1913 he completed a private hospital located on North St. Mary street in Beeville, a fifteen room structure. which is modern in all its appointments, and affords the best hospital facilities in this part of the state. plan of the hospital received the indorsement of several of the leading physicians and surgeons of San Antonio, and the entire equipment and organization of the hospital are on a high plane of efficiency. Both as proprietor of this institution, and in his private practice, Dr. Prather has acquired all the marks of worthy success. Dr. A. B. Wright, a prominent surgeon formerly of Cincinnati, is associated with Dr. Prather in the operation of the hospital.

A native of Manchester, Ohio, where he was born in 1871. Dr. Rohert Marion Prather was reared and received his early education at Cincinnati, Ohio. He has been a resident of Texas since 1898, moving to Beeville from Vernon, Wilbarger county, Texas. He later took post graduate work in medicine in the medical department of the University of Fort Worth, where he was graduated in 1908, and in the same year located perma-

Dr. Prather is one of the live and progressive members of his profession and hy study and observation is constantly keeping pace with the improvement and new knowledge of medicine and surgery. He is a member of the State Medical Association and is ex-president of the Bee County Medical Society. Besides his private practice he is serving as local surgeon for the S. A. & A. P. Ry. Co. and is examining physician for several life insurance companies.

R. W. Fenner. As a surveyor and engineer, Robert W. Fenner has a record of active service and accomplishments extending over forty years, all of which has been passed in southwest Texas, and most of it in Bee county. He was county surveyor of Bee county during the early days, and himself and son have continuously held that office now for more than thirty years. Mr. Fenner represents one of the families which located in southwest Texas during the early fifties, and for sixty years the name has been identified with public spirited citizenship, and worthy activity and honorable position in private life,

Robert W. Fenner was born in Ouachita Parish, Louisiana, in 1848, a son of Sherrod and Louise (Phiol) Fenner. Both families were early established in the state of Louisiana, and that was particularly true of the maternal branch of the family, as the Phiols were of French stock, and had lived in Louisiana since the Spanish reign. In 1852, the Fenner family moved from Louisiana to Texas, locating first in Guadaloupe county, and subsequently in 1857 removing to Victoria county, where Robert W. spent his early youth, and grew to manhood. Some of his early schooling was obtained in the old common schools, such as were maintained in this vicinity during the early days, but he was chiefly educated in the old Bastrop Military College, one of the excellent schools of its time, and in its halls he prepared for his preparation of surveyor and civil engineer. He has followed this professional career throughout his life with the exception of a few years, during which he was engaged in teaching school. In 1879 Mr. Fenner located at Beeville in Bee county, where he has since resided. At that date, 1879, the county was very sparsely settled, and Beeville itself was a mere village on the prairie. In 1880, the year following his settlement here. Mr. Fenner was elected to the office of County Surveyor, and each successive election was chosen for that office, until he had given 30 successive years of efficient and faithful service to the office. On his retiring, he was succeeded by service to the once. On his retiring, he was succeeded by his son John S. Fenner, who is also an engineer and surveyor. Thus father and son together have given more than thirty-five years of continuous service in one county office, a record which is probably equaled in only a few instances in the annals of public office in this state.

The father and son, under the firm name of Fenner & Fenner, have offices at Beeville, and conduct a general business in surveying and engineering. Their services have been called to numerous commissions throughout southwestern Texas, and through their long standing and known capabilities have always enjoyed a very prosperous patronage.

Mr. Robert W. Fenner married Miss Kate Fenner, who stood in the relation of cousin to him, and who is also a native of Louisiana, where the family have been estab-lished for so many years. Mr. and Mrs. Fenner are the parents of nine children, six sons and three daughters, whose names are as follows: Henry, John S., Roy, Rolla, Goodrich, Power, Mrs. Mabel Whaley, Miss Ella Fenner, and Miss Anna Fenner.

VICTOR E. STAMPFLI. The substantial position the subject of this sketch holds in the business life of Wichita Falls, Texas, is the result of his own enterprising efforts. The fact that he made his start without any efforts. capital whatever and today ranks with the representative business men of his city entitles him to specific mention

Victor E. Stampfli was born in the canton of Solodorn, Switzerland, September 28, 1874, son of George and Mary (Kauffman) Stampfli, both natives of Switzerland, but he has no memory of any other home than an American one, he having been brought to America when a babe in arms. George Stampfli was born in 1849. In November, 1874, with his wife and three little ones, he emigrated to America and made settlement at St. Louis, Missouri. He lived in the vicinity of St. Louis until 1887, when he came to Texas and took up his residence at Gainesville, subsequently removing from there to Wichita Falls. He died at Florence, Colorado, October 6, 1905. His wife had died in Kansas, August 10, 1880. They were the parents of eleven children, of whom Victor E. was the third born.

in the schools of Kansas, near Kansas City, Missouri, Victor E. Stampfli received his education up to the time he was thirteen years of age. Then he came to Texas. Here he entered upon an apprenticeship to the trade of baker and confectioner with Evans & Cole of Dallas, and remained with them for three years, at first receiving no pay. From the time he completed his apprenticeship until 1894 he worked as a journeyman baker, and as soon as he had accumulated a little capital he started in business for himself. That was at Ardmore, Oklahoma, and his original capital was $150. There he was getting a nice little business established when the big fire swept it all away and left him penniless. Undaunted, he went to work again at his trade and made various shifts in order to get another start. At Cripple Creek, Colorado, he worked at his trade two years, and while there had several losses through gold mining operations. Returning to Texas, with a small capital, he took up his residence at Wichita Falls. That was in 1898. April 25th of that year he formed a partnership with I. H. Robinson for the purchase and erection of a modern two-story building at 713 Indiana street, which was erected at a cost of $40,000. Now they also have several other modern buildings. Immediately on coming to Wichita Falls he opened up a bakery and confectionery business, and he has kept pace with the times. Wichita Falls then had a population of only about 2,000; its inhabitants now number 12,000. Mr. Stampfli began in a small way and did all his own work, even to the driving of his delivery wagon, a one-horse, canvas top wagon; today his bakery is far ahead of the average up-to-date bakery in cities of many times the size of Wichita Falls. A made-to-order auto delivery truck has taken the place of his horses and wagons, and in a modern way handles the modern product of this thoroughly equipped establishment.

At Wichita Falls, December 27, 1900, Victor E. Stamp-fli and Miss May Hales were united in marriage, and to them have been given two children, both born in this city: Victor Carroll, June 6, 1902, and Roseline May, October 25, 1904. Mrs. Stampfli is a native of Texas and a daughter of Robert A. Hales, an ex-Confederate soldier and an early settler of Texas.

Mr. Stampfli's energies have not been confined strictly to bis own business. He has always taken an active part in politics and civic affairs, affiliating with the Democrats. He served five years as fire chief of Wichita Falls, and ten years as a member of the fire department of this city. He is a member of both the Retail Merchants' Association and the Wichita Falls Chamber of Commerce. He has membership in the fraternal orders of Knights and Ladies of Honor, Elks and Masons, in the last named having advanced to the Knights Templar rank and thirty-second degree. Religiously he and his wife are Baptists.

JUDGE THOMAS M. Cox. In the election in 1910 and again in 1912 to the office of county judge of Bee county of Thomas M. Cox, the citizens of this community gave preferment to one of the ablest lawyers and most public spirited citizen, a man who has shown a high degree of efficiency in administering the fiscal and public works of the county. During his administration the beautiful new court house at Beeville, costing $77,000, was completed in 1912, and a number of other valuable public improvements have been wisely made, especially in good roads. Judge Cox represents one of the oldest and most prominent families of this part of Texas. He himself is a native son, and has given additional honors to a name which for many years has been well known and esteemed.

Thomas M. Cox was born at Rockport, Texas, in 1872, His parents were Rev. A. F. and Amelia V. (Atlee) Cox. The late Rev. A. F. Cox was one of the early Methodist missionaries into Southwestern Texas, and his name has a permanent place in the history of Methodism in this state. A native of Tennessee, he early entered the ministry, and devoted his entire active life to its work and needs. His death occurred at Beeville in 1897, and he had come to Texas during the early fifties. As a pioneer preacher, he became known throughout the south and southwest portions of the state. One of his early charges was Goliad. In addition to his minister work, he also taught school, and also founded and published the first newspaper, the Goliad Messenger. He thus came into close touch with the various sides of life, and the people in this section and his services were always unselfish and directed to the best welfare of the community. During the later years of his life, he retired from the ministry, and spent his last days at Beeville, in the home of his son Judge Cox. He was a man of the highest character, and well fitted on all points for the arduous and self-sacrificing labors of a pioneer minister. He knew and could sympathize with the people in their endurance of the hardships and obstacles during that early period, before railroads and other improvements of civilization had come into Texas, and having won the confidence of his people, was always more than a spiritual leader, and was in every sense a guide and adviser to his friends in all the trials and experiences of life.

The mother of Judge Cox, who was born at Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, in 1828, and is now living at the home of Judge Cox in Beeville, is as remarkable a pioneer woman as her late husband was a pioneer minister. She was reared at Athens, Tennessee, where she married her husband, and then accompanied him on his journey into the new missionary fields of Texas. Coming from the refinement and comfort of the older state, she not only accepted cheerfully the primitive conditions which then existed in her new home, but she also devoted herself with the kindliness of her character to the best interests of the women and children who were included within the bounds of her husband's parish. Her many friends, including both those who knew her in the earlier days and those of the youngest generation, pay her a high regard, which is due to the noble pioneer woman of this state.

Judge Cox, as a boy, was reared in several places due to the itinerary character of his father's ministry, and attended public schools in the towns which were the scenes of his father's pastorage. Subsequently, he entered Poronas Institute at San Marcos, Texas, in which he was graduated in 1888. Judge Cox earned his own way through college, and has always depended upon his own resources and ability for promotion to the higher grades of responsibility and success. His law studies were pursued in San Antonio in the office of Lane and Mayfield, prominent attorneys of that city, and in 1896 he was admitted to the bar. Since that time he has enjoyed a large and successful practice in the various courts, and his offices have been in Beeville. For eight years he served as County Attorney for Bee county. the year 1910 came his first election to the office of County Judge, and in 1912 he was re-elected. Judge Cox is associated in the practice of law with his brother, Robert L. Cox, under the firm name of Cox and Cox, and the firm, besides their large general law practice, have departments in abstract and real estate, and in these lines of business have built up a large patronage. Judge Cox is a member of the Methodist Church, and fraternally is affiliated with the Masonic Order, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World, the Maccabees and the Loyal Order of Moose,

Patrick Burke. A remarkable career was that of the late Patrick Burke, at whose death on the twenty-third of August, 1912, at his home near Beeville in Bee county, there passed away the last link connecting the modern era of southwestern Texas with that distant date when the Irish colonies were first planted on the shores of the Gulf of Mexico. The history of the planting of the Irish colony in old Refugio and San Patricia counties possesses a romantic interest which is hardly excelled by any of the noted colony enterprises during the early years of the nineteenth century.

It was a peculiar place which the late Patrick Burke occupied in this old colony on Aransas Bay. He had the distinction of being the first child born among the band of Irish colonists who landed on the shores of Texas in 1834. It was with difficulty that his own life was maintained, as a child in the arms of his mother, he must have been a witness to many of those remarkable scenes during the Mexican Invasion and the Texas Revolution of 1836, and during the many subsequent tiring periods which characterized the history of this portion of Texas during the Civil War. In all the best sense of the word, he was a pioneer, a man who knew the old times, and old activities of southwestern Texas, and who contributed in no small degree to the industry and upbuilding of this section of the state. He was the father of a fine family, and these children, who in turn have become honored men and women, and through their own lives pay another high tribute to the character and career of this notable old pioneer.

Patrick Burke was born in Refugio county, Texas, in 1834. The name of his father was not remembered, but his mother's maiden name was Anna Keough. The colony with which his mother and father had en barked their fortunes came across the ocean on a small sailing vessel, and buffeted by adverse winds, the boat was three months in making the journey from the old country, across the ocean and the Gulf of Mexico to its destination on the low lying shores of Texas. Cholera broke out on board during this long voyage, and more than decimated the passengers. Among those who died of this plague was the father of Patrick Burke. Both parents were natives of County Tipperary, Ireland. The landing place of the colony was at Copano, sixteen miles beyond the present town of Refugio. Copano in the early days was a noted place of embarkation, and shipping, but is hardly known to modern Texas geography. At that time it was a mere natural harbor on the wild shores of Aransas Bay, and the surrounding country had here and there a few Mexican habitations, but the chief population was Indians and wild beasts. An hour after the colonists landed on Texas shore, and before the mother had gone a mile toward the point selected by the colony for its settlement, Patrick Burke was born-under circumstances which alone would have given him a place of peculiar interest in the history of this Irish colony. The illness of his mother was such that she was unable to nurse the infant, and as there were no cows from which a milk supply could be obtained, the future of the baby looked dark, until an Indian squaw appeared with a young baby of her own, and was persuaded to serve as wet-nurse to the little Irishman.

Most of the readers of this work are familiar with the conditions which existed in Texas during the infancy and childhood of the late Patrick Burke. He was a child between one and two years of age when the hostilities between the Texan colonists and Mexico broke into its final fury, and which resulted in the final independence of the Texans and the Declaration of the Republic, in 1836. All of the old territory granted to the Irish colonists was particularly subject to the raids of the Mexican army, principally on the regular routes traveled by the corsairs as they came across the Rio Grande into the central points of the Texas settlement. The Indians were likewise a constant menace, and during the revolution the humble cot of the Irish colonists were practically destroyed and little remains of the industry and home life of those early settlers. For a number of years following, Indian raids stopped progress, and the people in that vicinity eked a bare existence from the fruits of the soil. It was not until after the Civil war that the settled peace came upon this side of the country. It was in such scenes that the early character of Patrick Burke was formed, and from his early boyhood he had to con-tend against the hardships and dangers of frontier life. His childhood days were spent in the old town of San Patricio, where the colonists had gathered in 1834 and had set up a local government of their own. The grant of land assigned to Mr. Burke's mother was located on the Paeste, at a point which is not the geographical center of the county. On that land was built what is known as the original town of Beeville, embracing the business center of the city, and this tract now valued at many thousand dollars was a gift from Mrs. Burke, the mother of Patrick, to the new county at its formation at the winning of independence.

With the return of comparative peace, after the days of the revolution, and the passing of Indian hostilities, Patrick Burke and his mother occupied the land which had been assigned to her, and became identified with the regular industry of this region, the cattle business. With the exception of the years spent in the Civil War, Patrick Burke remained a resident of the country, and closely associated with the future and progress up to the time of his death. His passage was the removal of a landmark in more than a figurative sense, for he had been a personality of influence and a successful man of affairs, and now that he has gone, the memory of the old times has become dependent upon written records, rather than upon the personal records of one who had lived through it all.

Patrick Burke, during the war, entered the Confedrate Service in Company F of Colonel Burchel's regiment, and made a fine record as a faithful soldier. During the war all of his cattle were given away, and lost, but on returning he gradually acquired the nucleus of a new herd, and in time became one of the most prosperous cattlemen on the shores of the county. He became the owner of the largest part of his mother's headright grant, and accumulated a substantial fortune. His later days were spent in peace and happiness, and in an optimistic old age, and he retained his kindly personality and generous attitude throughout life, up to his seventy-eighth year, at which time his life closed.

He enjoyed a wide circle of friends and acquaintances, and there was nothing that gave them greater pleasure than to hear him relate the stories of his own life, and the experiences of other settlers who were contemporaries of his. Mr. Burke during his many years spent in southwestern Texas had had his share of adventures with the Indians, in the hunting of wild horses, in long and arduous trips with cattle, and in coping with the many difficulties that beset pioneer existence.

The late Patrick Burke was a man of noble and generous impulses and bore the enviable reputation of having been always honest, true and loyal to his friends and his community, and especially devoted to his family.

His wife, whose death occurred in 1896, had formerly been Miss Nancy Jane Ryan who was born in what is now Bee county. Their children in number, four sons and four daughters, were all born and reared at the Burke home, two miles below Beeville, and their names are as follows: Edward L., Joseph F., John J., Peter J., Mrs. P. S. Clare, Mrs. Mollie Thurston, Mrs. J. E. Wilson, and Mrs. S. H. Smith.

Mr. Joseph F. Burke, the son of the late Patrick Burke, is Cashier of the Beeville Bank and Trust Company, and one of the most prominent business men in this county. The company with which he is so prominently connected was established September 8, 1906, and is a flourishing institution. Mr. Burke married Miss Nannie Amelia Teal, who is a native of McMullen county, Texas.
Their two children are Beryl Jane and Joseph Francis.

James F. Ray. On the 20th of August, 1907, at his home, in Pettus, Texas, passed away one of the prominent stockmen who had given all of his active career to the management of large business affairs in Southwest Texas and was known among his associations as one of the most esteemed cattle raisers and citizens in this part of the state. The late James F. Ray, both through his own career and through his family relations, represented some of the oldest and most substantial characters and elements of citizenship in Southwest Texas. His father had been prominent in this state, and Mrs. Ray, his widow, is also representative of one of the old and thoroughly esteemed families of the state.

James F. Ray was born in what is now Karnes (then Goliad) county, Texas, on the 4th of October, 1851, and was nearly sixty years of age at the time of his death. His parents were James and Julia (Berry) Ray. The grandfather was born in 1801, both grandparents having died within a short time of each other in the year 1843. Of their family of three sons and four daughters, Elijah was the second son. In 1835 James Ray moved his family from Alabama to Choctaw county, Mississippi, where he was engaged in farming for a number of years. The cldest of his sons, Hezekiah, after reaching early manhood, moved to Texas, where he died about the year 1859

The late Elijah Ray, the father of the See county stockman mentioned in the first paragraph, was one of the early settlers of southwest Texas. At the age of twenty-one, in 1847, he came on a prospecting trip, landing at Galveston, thence going to Houston, a little town, which was then built in the pine and magnolia woods, with only a frame hotel and a few business shops scattered along the main street and chiefly important as a headquarters for Government supply shipments. At Houston he bought a horse and saddle and started off across the country, stopping first at Kingsland, near the present site of Yorktown, and then continuing through the Cibola valley to Sutherland Springs, and thence to San Antonio. After this varied tour of inspection, through the most important settled portions of the state, he returned to his home, in Mississippi. There, in 1849, he married Mary Wallace Davis, and in the year 1850 the young couple came to Texas for the purpose of finding a permanent home in the Lone Star state. Accompanying them was Mrs. Ray's widowed mother and other members of the Davis family, comprising four daughters and two sons. Mrs. Davis, the mother, brought a number of slaves with her into Texas, and while aboard the steamer crossing the Gulf some of them contracted cholera, and died a few days after reaching Port Lavaca. The journey, with its fatigue and excitement, was also too strenuous for Mrs. Davis, and she passed away after an illness of ten days and after having been in Texas but a short time.

After his settlement here, in 1850, Elijah Ray had about the experiences which were typical of life in that time of the fifties and the subsequent decades. Though he began comparatively a poor man, he lived to attain rank as one of the most successful stockmen in his part of the state, and his energy and fine character as a busi ness man were the substantial elements in his successful career. On his arrival in Texas he had only about $300 in money, and used the greater part of this for expenses while in Port Lavaca. There he bought a yoke of oxen and a wagon, and journeyed across the country to his future home, in old Goliad county. However, he stopped in Victoria county, where he spent one year in farming, and the following year he became the first American settler on Escondigo Creek, and what is now Karnes county, but was then a part of Goliad county. In that isolated spot, which he had selected for his home and headquarters, he built a house of logs, covered with pecan boards, the logs of the structure having been hewn out of the native timber by a valued negro servaut, named John Ray, one of the slaves owned by his mother-in-law, Mrs. Davis. In the fall of 1851, with money realized from the sale of negro slaves, Mr. Ray bought his first cattle and thus secured a nucleus of about seventy-five or one hundred head with which to establish himself in business. Two years later he sold his improvements on the Escondigo and bought three hundred acres of land on the Ecleto, near Helena. During his residence there occurred the death of his wife, on January 30, 1854. There were three children born to them, the first dying in infancy, the second being James F. Ray and the youngest being Martha, who, as the wife of B. B. Atkins, died in 1886. In 1856 Elijah Ray married Miss Mary Cox of Goliad county. By this union there were five children: George A., Emma H., Fannie F., who died in 1892, and Mary and Jennie.

During the decades of the fifties, sixties and the early seventies Elijah Ray was actively identified either with the cattle or sheep business. In 1864 he bought the estate of Steve Best, on Hoard Creek, in Goliad, including three hundred and twenty acres of land and a very good residence. To this comfortable home he removed his family and it was there he spent the remainder of his life. He continued as a stockman, not only looking after and managing his own herds, but also having charge of the brands of several other cattlemen. In 1873, owing to a succession of droughts, Mr. Ray sold practically all of his cattle to W. A. Pettus for $10,000 in cash. A part of this capital was used in purchasing sheep and for several years he diverted all his attention to the sheep industry. Then in 1880 having sold out his sheep he again resumed cattle raising and continued in that industry until his death, being one of the most successful. He made a specialty of the crossing of three breeds, namely, the Durham, the Davon and the Brahma. He later accumulated an estate of about 20,000 acres of land, besides larger hords of cattle, horses and mules, and was one of the most prosperous men in his section of the state.

In June 1902 occurred his marriage to Miss Maggio Smith of Beeville. Mrs. Ray survived her husband, who passed away at his old home in Goliad county on the 22nd day of February, in the eightieth year of his life. He had retained his activity and business energy up to almost his last years and was one of the enterprising citizens upon whom time set lightly and who continued good business men and public-spirited citizens until the end of their lives.

James F. Ray, who survived his father for only about a year, spent all his life in the vicinity of the old homestead in Karnes county, where he was born. During the early seventies he had established his ranch head quarters at what is known as the town of Pettus, in the northwest part of Bee county. Like his father before him, he had a successful career as a stockman and rancher and became the owner of a large estate of land and in affairs where his co-operation was required he was always known as one of the most publicspirited men in the county. He had served as a director of the Commercial National Bank of Beeville for a number of years. By nature he was a quiet and unassuming, though a good business man, he never sought honors or conspicuous place in public affairs. He was a man who possessed many friends, with the ability to draw many to him, and his life was deeply regretted not only by his immediate family and associates, but by hundreds of residents who had known him as a stockman and a citizen. He had always been especially kind and generous to his family and his character and deeds will always prove an inspiration to his children.

The late James F. Ray is survived by his wife, Mrs. Rachel (Smith) Ray, and five children, whose names are as follows: Nortene is the wrife of W. E. McKinney and the mother of two children named Wallace Edwin and James Ray; Maggie M., who is the wrife of J. J. McKinney and is the mother of four children, whose names are Claude, Freeman, Margarte E., Jesse Edwin and Almeda; James Wilbur, who married Miso C. Hornton a daughter of Joe Thornton, county sheriff of Bee county, and they are the parents of one son, James P. Ray, and a daughter, Elane; Imogene, who is the wife of C. E. Hall and has one daughter, Eda Winnan, and Miss Fannie Wallace Ray, who is the youngest of the family. Mrs. James F. Ray, whose maiden name was Rachel Smith, is a native daughter of Bee, county, and belongs to one of the old families in this section of the state. She is a daughter of the late Judge Thomas Jackson Smith, who became a resident of Bee county in 1860 and whose death occurred in Beeville on the 27th of May, 1874. Judge Smith was born in Warren county, Georgia, July 27, 1815, and became a pioneer settler of southwest Texas, having moved to this state in 1853, and first located in Guadalupe county; in 1860 he removed to the northern part of Bee county, and six years later located permanently at Beeville, the county seat. Judge Smith was a prominent man in business and public affairs. For several years and at the time of his death he was serving as district and county clerk. He also showed great interest in the public schools and gave valuable assistance in systematizing and promoting their efficiency. It was his distinction to have taught the first public school in his neighborhood at Beeville, Bee county. Mrs. Ray's mother, the wife of Judge Smith, was before her marriage Lugana Roberts, who was born in Blount county, Alabama, in 1821, and died in August, 1901, at Beeville, Judge Smith removed his family from his ranch in the northern part of Bee county in 1866 to a town residence of his life.

Mrs. James F. Ray was reared and educated in Beeville and was married to the late Mr. Ray on the 18th day of December, 1878. After their marriage she took up her home on the Ray Ranch at Pettus, and that was the home of the family and herself until after her husband's death, since which date she has returned to Beeville. Mrs. Ray is an energetic business woman, and has shown great capability in the management of the large estate left to her by her father and husband. She has charge of large land and related interests in Bee county, and succeeded her husband as a director in the Commercial and National Bank of Beeville.

VERNOR E. WARE. Though comparatively new in the business in El Paso, becoming established as late as in 1910, the firm of V. E. Ware, contractors and builders, have carried on a highly successful enterprise and well known to the building interests of the city. Many of the finer buildings erected here in the past two years were handled by this enterprising firm, and a bright future is everywhere predicted for the principals. Vernor E. Ware entered the firm with little or no actual experience in the building and contracting business, but he has demonstrated a splendid capacity for the work, and as manager of the business interests of the firm is quite as efficient as if he had been brought up in the business. Prior to his present business enterprise he was engaged in the fuel business in El Paso, and previous to that time had for a number of years been prominent in railroad circles, attaining positions of no little prominence in the executive offices of various roads. His accomplishments, considered by and large, are certainly worthy of a man of more mature years, but are wholly merited on his part by reason of the ardor and enthusiasm he has brought to bear in his work, wherever it was found to lie.

Vernor E. Ware was born in Pendleton county, Kentucky, on October 10, 1883, and is the son of Solomon G. and Ida F. (Petty) Ware, both native born Kentuckians, and of English ancestry, their less remote ancestors having been Virginians. The father is now a resident of Covington, Kentucky, where he is engaged in the oil business and is one of the successful men of the city. is at present filling the office of city auditor. The mother also makes her home in Covington. They became the parents of six sons and one daughter, and of the number Vernor E. Ware is the third born.

The schools of Covington furnished the early training of Vernor Ware, and he finished with the carriculum of the high school of that city when he was sixteen years old, soon after which he entered upon the duties of a clerkship with the Queen & Crescent Railway. He began his duties on a salary of $50 a month, and from that position worked his way by successive promotions to assistant chief rate clerk, when he resigned his position and came to El Paso in the Fall of 1902. For four years thereafter he was associated with the El Paso & Sonthwestern Railroad as assistant chief clerk in the general freight office, and then withdrew from railroad service to engage in the fuel business on his own responsibility. He carried on a thriving business under the name of Ware & Company for four years, then disposed of his interests in that line and entered into a partnership with William G. Jolly, under the firm name of Jolly & general contractors and builders. They have carried on a busy trade in their line of enterprise, taking a leading place from the first among the older established con-tracting firms of the city, and their reputation for dependable work is not the least of their assets.

Mr. Ware is a Democrat in his political tendencies, and has done good work for the party in the years since he reached his majority. His fraternal relations are with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Masons, in which he is a member of the Shrine at El Paso. He has membership in the Country Club, and is affiliated with the Baptist church.

On August 4, 1900, Mr. Ware was married to Miss Mary Spanton, the daughter of T. W. Spanton, a resident of Spring Lake, Kentneky, of which place Mrs. Ware is a native. They were married in Covington, Kentucky, the old home of Mr. Ware. Two sons have been born to them-Vernor E. Jr., born on September 2, 1906, at El Paso, and Alfred Spanton, born on August 17, 1909. The family home is at 1509 Cotton Avenue.

Dr. ALEXANDER MADISON DENMAN. Dr. Alexander Madison Denman, who died at Lufkin, Texas, on October 1, 1908, was a distinguished physician and surgeon of East Texas, and his days were cut short in the midst of a busy and active career in the practice of his profession. He was born in Angelina county, on July 30, 1858, and was a graduate of Roanoke College, Virginia. He later was graduated in medicine from Tulane University, at New Orleans, in 1883, and in that year began the practice of his profession at Lufkin. Previous to this, in the early part of 1882, he had removed from his country home, some five miles north, to the newly established town of Lufkin, and there established a drug store, being one of the first business men in the new town. In Lufkin he enjoyed a continued success in his profession. He established the Denman Hospital and became widely known as a learned and skillful surgeon. Very progressive, he kept well to the forefront in the march of progress along the line of his profession, and he took four post-graduate courses, three of them in New York City and one in New Orleans, He was a man of the most generous and philanthropic impulses and was one who always did much for the poor and helpless. He was esteemed by all, and greatly beloved by many who with excellent reason knew something of the great heart of the man. He served as mayor of Lufkin in 1903-04, and proved himself one of the most capable mayors the city ever had. During his administration the city water works were built and the city was kept in the pink of sanitary condition.

Dr. Denman was a son of Colouel W. L. and Algie

(Swaggerty) Denman. The father was born in Georgia and came to Angelina county in 1863, locating north of where Lufkin was later established. He was a large land owner and a prosperous and successful man all his days. A lawyer of prominence, he served in the Texas Legislature, and as a man of affairs was widely known in State politics and in business circles as well. Throughout the Civil war he served with distinction in the Confederate army.

Dr. Denman met his death as the result of an unfortunate accident, a switch engine striking an automobile in which he was riding. His death followed shortly after. His widow, prior to her marriage, was Mary Caroline Walker, born in Angelina county, five miles from where the town of Lufkin later reared its head. There she met and married her husband when he was only twenty years old. She is a daughter of Thomas and Emily Z. (Briscoe) Walker, both now deceased. The father was born in North Carolina and the mother in Georgia. born in North Carolina and the mother in Georgia. Thomas Walker was one of the earliest settlers of the State, coming to Angelina before county lines were drawn, and as early as 1840. He made his first settlement on the Neches River. He was a citizen of prominence in his district, and served as sheriff of Angelina county for seventeen years. Seven children were born to Dr. and Mrs. Denman, all of whom are yet living, and are here named as follows: Dr. Peyton R. Denman, a noted surgeon of Houston, Texas; Archie Lovell, Olive Lillian; Kester Walker, concerning whom further mention is made in the following paragraphs; Dr. Linwood H.; Mary Nell, and Byford Harvey.

Kester Walker Denman was born in Lufkin in 1889, and he was there reared and had his preliminary educa-tion in the schools of that district. He was graduated from Washington and Lee University at Lexington, Virgina, with the degree of B. A. in 1909, and he later studied law in the law department of the University of Texas, finishing his studies there in 1912, when he was awarded the degree of Bachelor of Laws. He began his practice immediately at Lufkin, and already he has made an excellent showing in his profession, taking his place among the foremost men of the community. He is now city attorney for Lutkin, as well as the legal representative in local circles for the Cotton Belt Railway, and he has in many ways demonstrated his fitness and capacity for the profession of his choice. Dr. A. M. Denman, together with Judge E. J. Mantooth, organized the first telephone system in Lufkin, in which the family now owns a half interest.

That Mr. Denman has shown an unusual capacity for his profession is not a cause for wonderment when it is understood that he is a direct descendant of the line that produced Thomas Denman, Lord Chief Justice of England, born in 1779 and who died in 1854. The Denman family is distinctively of English origin, and was established on American shores in the beginning of the eighteenth century, members of the family settling in New York and Georgia. The branch from which this particular family springs located in Georgia, near Cartersville, and members are yet resident there. Colonel M. L. Denman is a large property holder of Angelina county and he was instrumental in getting the Houston, East & West Texas Railroad through East Texas, while A. M. Denman did much for the cause of prohibition in Angelina county and throughout East Texas.

Mr. Denman is a member of the Sigma Nu and Phi Delta Phi fraternities, the former academic in its nature and the latter a law fraternity. He is also a member of the Elks.

On March 25, 1913, Mr. Denman was married to Miss Cleo Lydia Mantooth, a daughter of Judge Edwin J. Mantooth, mentioned above as the associate of Dr. A. M. Denman in a creditable piece of public utility work in Lufkin, and concerning whom extended mention is made on other pages of this work, as befitting one of his prominence.

CAPTAIN JAMES J. HALL. Among the veterans of the Confederacy in south Texas probably none is better known and more highly esteemed than Captain James J. Hall, who for the past three years has been commander of the Dick Dowling Camp, U. C. V. at Houston. The Dick Dowling Camp is one of the strongest and most effective organizations of Confederate veterans in Texas and its membership includes many notable figures in the life and affairs of this state, not least among them being the present commander, who has spent almost a lifetime in Texas, who has been successfully identified with business affairs and who is now living retired in the city of Houston.

James J. Hall was born in Christian county, Kentucky, October 11, 1840, and is a son of C. G. and Elizabeth (Jones) Hall. His father was a native of Kentucky and his mother of Tennessee. During his residence in Kentucky the father was a farmer and tobacco raiser and in December, 1849, he brought his family to Texas. The trip was made by river to New Orleans at which point they embarked upon the steamer Palmetto. This boat was wrecked at Pascavallo and all the possessions they brought were lost and they barely escaped with their lives. From the point at which they escaped from the waters of the Gulf they made their way overland in wagon to the old town of Indianola and subsequently to Victoria, where they began life in the new country without money. The father finally established a hotel business in Victoria and was known as the proprietor of the Hall House for fifteen years. He was then elected county judge of Victoria county, an office be filled with credit for a number of years. During his residence he had bought lands and was both a farmer and stock raiser during the days of free range. He was known as a cattleman and substantial citizen up to the time of his death, which occurred in 1884. Throughout a large community he was popularly known as "Uncle Charley." He was a member of the Baptist church. His wife died in Victoria in 1872. Captain Hall is now the only survivor of the three children. C. A. Hall was for a number of years editor of a paper at Sulphur Springs and Mrs. Maria E. Ripley was the only daughter.

During his boyhood James J. Hall attended school at Victoria and had just arrived at manhood when the war between the states broke out. In October, 1861, he enlisted at Victoria in Company C of the Fourth Texas Cavalry, under Captain J. A. Hampton, in Green's famous brigade. These troops were first sent into New Mexico and he participated in the Val Verde and later in the engagements at Fort Craig and Glorietta. The army was then moved to El Paso and Captain Hall and his comrades were sent to San Autonio, where the regiment was disbanded until they could be equipped with fresh horses. The next period of eventful service took Captain Hall to the eventful exploit which will always remain glorious in Texas history. That was the capture of Galvestou from the Federals, and the capture of the "Harriet Lane," the Federal gunboat in Galveston Bay the bell tower of which is now a trophy in Sam Houston's Park in the city of Houston. Subsequently he accompanied the troops into Louisiana, where he took part in several skirmishes leading up to the battles of Mansfield and Pleasant Hill. Next came the battle of Blair's Landing, where General Green was killed, and then the battle of Berwick's Bay, where Mr. Hall and his comrades crossed the bayou on sugar kettles. Tippedoe Mills was an engagement soon after and he was among the troops which attempted the capture of Fort but, owing to the failure of reinforcements from Vicksburg, this attack did not succeed. At Cox's plantation the tables were turned on the Federal army, which, a thousand strong, was badly defeated and nearly all killed or made prisoners although the Confederate force numbered only about eight hundred. Captain Hall was also in the battle of Vermillion Bayou and then came the bloody battle of Yellow Bayou, which was practically the last of the war.

On returning to Milam Captain Hall was discharged and then returned to his home in Victoria. There, in 1865, he married Miss Elizabeth Dunlap, who was born in Ohio, and was a daughter of J. M. and Lavina (Lockwood) Dunlap. Her parents came to Texas at an early date and her father was a cattleman of Bee county. The two sons of Captain Hall and wife are both living in Houston, namely, W. W. Hall, who is secretary of the Big Tree Lumber Company, and J. L. Hall, who is a contractor and builder.

In the fall of 1866 Mr. Hall was elected sheriff of Victoria county and filled the office for four years. After that failing health obliged him to spend three years in recuperation in Colorado. On returning to Texas he located at Linden, in Cass county where he spent fourteen years and was a well known contractor of that vicinity. Then for a short time he lived near the mouth of the Brazos and from there came to Houston, which has since been his home. He is now serving his third year as Commander of Dick Dowling Camp, No. 197 U. C. V., of Houston, and he is also brigadier general of the First Texas District, U. C. V. This latter position he has also held for three years. For a long time he has been prominent in the state and national reunions of the Confederate veterans, and the cause of the survivors of the great war is very dear to his heart. He is a member of the Methodist church, South, and enjoys the esteem and respect paid to all the old soldiers of the Confederacy.

W. C. Kelly. Now a retired resident of Houston and one of the prominent members of Dick Dowling Camp of Confederate Veterans Mr. Kelly is a Texan who saw a long and arduous service during the Civil war and gave the hest years of his young manhood to the cause of the south. For nearly a generation after the war he was connected with the railroad service in this state and finally retired after a career of much usefulness and prosperity and thoroughly esteemed among a large circle of friends and acquaintances. W. C. Kelly was born in Russell county, Alabama, October 17, 1843. His parents were John W. and Caroline (Martin) Kelly. His father, a native of Pennsylvania, came South at the age of eleven years and was married in the state of Georgia. During his boyhood he had been bound out as an apprentice to a saddler, but became dissatisfied with his employer and occupation and ran away. Embarking on a boat at Pittsburg he came down the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers to New Orleans and finally reached Appalachicola, Florida. Here he became connected with one of the boats which plied on the Chattahooche River and was a riverman for thirtyseven years. He then retired and made his home at Columbus, Georgia, but died during a visit to Hempstead, Texas when he was sixty-eight years of age. His career as pilot and subsequently as captain of the river boat had been fraught with many varied experiences including sharp encounters with the Indians, who at that time inhabited the extreme southeastern part of this country. He was a man of superior attainment and took an active part in all measures for development and improvement. He was too old to enlist during the Civil strife, but his sympathies were all with the South. The mother's peo-ple, the Martins, were among the oldest of Georgia families and were slave owners and planters. The mother died at Leadbetter, Texas. Mr. W. C. Kelly is the only survivor of three children. His sisters, both now deceased, were Mary Virginia McMannus and Carrie Elizabeth Walker. During his youth in Georgia he attended the common schools, which at that time and place were of a very primitive character. Subsequently he attended Duff's Commercial College in Pittsburg. In Pittsburg lived his uncle, George A. Kelly, whose death occurred in that city in 1902 and who for many years had been among the most wealthy and prominent men of the city. He had served on nearly all the important Civic boards in-cluding the Western Penitentiary of Pennsylvania, the Western Insane Hospital, the Smallpox and Ship Channel committee, the Commercial Club and he had for many years been connected with the United States Marine service. Mr. W. C. Kelly's father during the stirring days of '49 had joined a caravan of three hundred persons who went overland to California, but he was not successful in the gold fields and soon returned. Up to the time of the war W. C. Kelly was occupied in the position known as second or "Mud" clerk on a boat plying along the Chattahooche River. On April 9, 1861, he enlisted in the Tuskegee light infantry, Third Alabama Regiment, under Captain "Gube", Swanson. Sent to Norfolk, Virginia, he was placed in General Hughes' division and remained in the infantry service. At Malvern Hill on July 1, 1862, he was wounded and was sent home for ninety days. At home he obtained a transfer and in November, 1862, he joined Forrest's famous cavalry and served under that notable cavalryman throughout the war. His first fight of importance was at Drury's Bluff, where the cavalry supported the land batteries in repelling the Union gunhoats which were attempting to come up the James River. He was then sent to Richmond and attached to the army under Joseph E. Johnston, remaining in Johnston's command until that general was wounded at Seven Pines, after which Lee assumed the supreme command. Besides the engagement at Seven Pines Mr.

Kelly also took part in the terrific engagement which marked the Seven Days' battles.

Joining Forrest's cavalry at Pulaski, Tennessee, Mr. Kelly went to Murfreesboro and from that time was on the move all the time. Every one who is at all familiar with the history of the Civil war is aware that the Forrest cavalry was one of the chief factors in the Confederate army, and its brilliant and aggressive fighting has never been excelled in the history of any Forrest about this time was given a separate command and transferred to north Mississippi and west Tennessee, and most of his campaigns were made through this region. At the end of the long struggle the Forrest command was surrendered to General Canby on the Tom Bigbee River in Alabama May, 1865, and was disbanded.

On returning home to Tuskegee, Alabama, Mr. Kelly became connected with the hotel business. There, on April 6, 1866, he married Miss Addy Moore, a daughter of Ed Moore, who was a merchant, a native of Virginia, while her mother was a native of Alabama. There were mine children born to Mr. and Mrs. Kelly and the eight now living are: George E. of Giddings, Texas; Mrs. J. J. Doyle; Mrs. H. L. Beard; Mrs. O. C. Jersig; Ernest; Mrs. C. E. Wolf of Austhi; Charles of Los Angeles, California, and Felix of Sherman, Texas The four whose residence is not noted are residents of Houston. The deceased child was James Norman Kelly, who died in Houston at the age of thirty-one. mother of these children died at Austin in 1905.

After 1866 Mr. Kelly went to West Point, Georgia, where he was appointed United States inspector of distilleries for the second district of Alabama. In this public service he continued up to 1868, at which date he came to Texas. His first location was in San Saba county and in 1869 he came to Hockley, in Harris county. During the seven years of his residence at Hockley he was acting as agent for the Houston & Texas Central Railroad. In the same capacity he was then sent to Leadbetter, where he was stationed for seventeen years. For five years after that he was agent at Waxahachie and then for three years was agent at Manor, and the last two years of the thirty-four years of continuous rural service was spent as claim agent for the Houston & Texas Central Railroad at Austin. In 1907 Mr. Kelly moved to Houston, where he has since lived retired.

He is adjutant of Dick Dowling Camp, No. 197, U. C. V., and a member of the Baptist church. He is a fine type of the Southern gentleman and possesses the intelligence and courteous manners which are always associated with the true man of the South. His military record is one of which he is justly proud and he enjoys the thorough esteem of his many associates among his old comrades. Mr. Kelly bears a striking resemblance to General Robert E. Lee, whom he knew personally and was also a friend of General Forrest.

R. O. REED. At the end of a career of more than half a century spent in Texas, Mr. Reed reviews with satisfaction and pleasure a lifetime of accomplishment and experience such as are the lot of few men and such as can never happen again in the story of mankind. He has always been a loyal and true citizen, was a brave and capable soldier in the times when the south most needed such men, and has been true in all the varied relationship of a long and prosperous career.

Mr. R. O. Reed was born in North Carolina, September 5, 1838, and was a son of J. V. and Mary (Jaycocks) Reed, both parents being natives of North Carolina, and married in that state. The family by descent is of mingled Scotch and English ancestry. The father was a planter and owned a considerable number of slaves, and died in 1849, while the mother passed away in 1857. father was a man of considerable means and a gentleman of the old southern school, and for a number of years served in his district as a magistrate. On the maternal side the grandfather was a soldier of the Revolutionary There were nine children in the family, and of these Mr. R. O. Reed and his brothers, J. V. and D. W., are the only survivors. Two died in infancy, but the others all reached maturity.

Mr. R. O. Reed went to school at Hertford, N. C., until he was about twenty years of age, and had then advanced so far as to enable him to teach school. In 1860, at the age of twenty-two, he moved to Texas, in Bell county, and began his career as a stock raiser. Bell county at that time was in the outermost fringe of the settled county, and his early years there were spent in almost pioneer conditions. In May, 1862, Mr. Reed enlisted in Company I of the Seventeenth Texas Infantry, under Captain J. F. Smith, who is yet living at Galveston. He made an excellent record as a faithful soldier, and remained in the war until its close. He was first stationed at Little Rock, Arkansas, and took part in a number of the skirmishes and minor campaigns over that state, during which he saw some of the hardest and most disagreeable of his military experience. The first engagement of importance in which he participated was Milligan's Bend, in Louisiana. Subsequently he fought in the crucial battles of Mansfield and Pleasant Hill, after which his regiment was sent to Saline, Arkansas. He was confined in the hospital by sickness, so that he was prevented from taking part in the Battle of Saline. Soon afterwards occurred his transfer to the engineer corps and for eight months he assisted in the construction of pontoon bridges, fortifications and other military work in Louisiana and Arkansas during the Trans-Mississippi campaign. When the struggle was ended and the southern armies set out for home he was discharged at Milligan, Texas, and thence returned to Bell county.

In 1867 Mr. Reed moved to McLennan county, which continued to be his home until IS9I. During most of this time he was actively engaged as a carpenter and builder. In 1891 he transferred his business enterprise to Velasco and was in the hardware business at that old town until the great storm on Galveston Bay in 1900. He then returned to the central part of the state and was a resident of Waco until 1903, since which time he has lived retired in the city of Houston.

Mr. Reed in 1862 married Mrs. Nannie D. Reed. Four children were born to their marriage, two of whom died in infancy, and the living are: Nettie Bolton Reed, now the wife of N. J. Kavanaugh of Houston, and Lola Richard, now Mrs. W. M. Stewart of Houston. Mrs. Reed passed away in 1905. Mr. Reed is a member of the Baptist church and is one of the popular comrades of Dick Dowling Camp of the United Confederate Veterans at Houston. His residence is at 410 Fargo Avenue,

RICHARD EDWARD BROOKS. Houston as the commercial metropolis of south Texas has been fortunate in the possession of a fine body of citizenship, including men of ability and integrity to direct the large enterprises which have been centered in this city and in this class there is probably none better known or as an individual carrying more important responsibility to the financial and larger interests of this section of the state than Judge Brooks, president of the Producers Oil Company. Judge Brooks is first of all a lawyer, and for many years was prominent in the profession. He has had much experience in public affairs, and for a number of years has been one of the leading factors in the oil development of southeastern

Judge Brooks represents one of the most historic families of Texas. His mother, Elizabeth (Burleson) Brooks, who is now living in her seventy-seventh year, was an infant during the period of hostilities which freed Texas from the domination of Mexico, and during the invasion of Texas by Santa Anna she was carried by her mother to a place of safety. She was the youngest daughter of James Burleson, whose name will always Vol. IV-4 have a distinguished place in Texas annals. James Burleson came to Texas in 1831, settling in Bastrop county, and taking an active part in the pioneer life of the province and the subsequent Republic of Texas. The most noted member of the family and the brother of Mrs. Brooks was General Edward Burleson, who during the siege of San Autonio in 1835 succeeded Stephen F. Austin as commander in chief of the Texas troops. The father of Judge Brooks was Charles Wesley Brooks, who was born in Alabama and came to Texas in 1854 from that state. He brought to Texas the negro slaves of Judge Dick Townes, and after establishing a farm for Judge Townes in Bastrop county, and after the arrival of the Townes family in that locality, he engaged in farming for himself, and was one of the prosperous and successful men of his community up to his death in 1869. Richard Edward Brooks was born in Bastrop county

August 2, 1864. His family being among the more prosperous people of Texas, he was liberally educated, com-pleting his schooling at the Southwestern University in Georgetown, and then read law in the office of Judge John C. Townes. Admitted to the bar in 1885, he at once began practice at Georgetown, at first in partnership with Judge Robert John and subsequently with Judge Cochran, In 1895 Governor Culberson appointed him to serve out the unexpired term as judge of the Twenty-Sixth Judicial District, comprising the counties of Travis and Williamson. He was subsequently elected twice to this office and continued as district judge until 1901, in which year he resigned. He then moved to Houston, where he turned his attention to the oil business in connection with the Hogg-Swayne Syndicate. He later was one of the organizers of the Texas Fuel Company, and this later became the Texas Company, one of the greatest oil companies in the country. Judge Brooks was treasurer of the Texas Company until January I, 1913, at which time he resigned in order to take the office of president with the Producers Oil Company of Judge Brooks was president of the Southern Trust Company at Houston until his resignation on January 1, 1913, but is still a member of the board of directors of the trust company. He is a director of the Bankers Trust Company of Houston, a director of the Union National Bank of Houston, president of the Roywood Canal & Milling Company, director of the Houston Land Corporation, vice president of the Texas Wagon Company and vice president of the J. W. Carter Music Company. These last and important associations and his striking individual ability makes Judge Brooks one of the foremost men in financial and business life of Fraternally, Judge Brooks is a Knights Templar Mason and a member of the Mystic Shrine, and also is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias. He belongs to the Houston Country Club. On November 28, 1889, he married Miss Frances Booty, daughter of the late J. H. Booty of Georgetown, Texas, one of the prominent merchants of that city. They are the parents of three children— Richard Emory, Clarence Booty and Frances Edwina Brooks. The Brooks residence in Houston is at 2616 Travis Street.

JOHN S. REID. A merchant of Pecan Gap, in Delta county, and the leading factor in local commercial affairs, Mr. Reid has been a resident of Texas since 1878. He was one of the successful teachers in this portion of the State for a number of years, endeavored to take up farming, but found his abilities not adapted to that vocation, and established himself in mercantile business and has found a generous success.

John S. Reid was born in Norfolk, Virginia, July 13, 1845, was educated in a military academy and in the Christiansburg Academy, and was well trained and equipped for the occupation of teacher, which he followed for many years. He was hardly sixteen years of age when the Civil war broke out, and as his family and friends were all partisans of the South, he himself was eager to enlist as soon as opportunity offered. He went into Company D of Richardson's Battalion of Light Artillery and went through the war in the Army of Northern Virginia. His baptism of fire occurred at Sewell's Point in Norfolk, on the memorable day when the battle between the Merrimac and the Monitor was fought in Hampton roads, and his battery of artillery defended Captain Buchanan's command when it sought shelter at Sewell's Point after the disabling of the Merrimac and the wounding of Captain Buchanan. This introduction to actual warfare was so terrible and so abrupt that young Reid was at once stricken with homesickness and wanted nothing so much as to be once more a student in school in the presence of his father. But he was quickly admonished that since he had gotten himself into the predicament he must make the best of it, and his father appealed to his son to become a good soldier and remain steadfast to the end of the contest. Following that duel of the two naval corps off Portsmouth, Mr. Reid's command took part in the historic engagements of Seven Pines, Fredericksburg, Chancellorsville, Winchester, Gettysburg, Spottsylvania, Cold Harbor and in the defense of the crater at Petersburg, after the Federals had exploded their mine in the attempt to capture the fort. Mr. Reid was wounded at the crater, receiving injuries in the shoulder and in the leg and as he fell a piece of shell struck him on the head. Nevertheless, after a ninety-day furlough among relatives in Richmond he returned to his command and continued with the army to Appointtox. His battery was captured at Petersburg, with the exception of a small squad, including himself, who cut their way out, so that he was thus enabled to witness the closing drama of the war.

Though the interesting incidents of his early life have caused their recital to be given in these first paragraphs, the story must now be interrupted in order to consider the family of Mr. Reid. His father was George Reid, and his grandfather was also George Reid, both of whom were natives of Scotland. The grandfather settled at Norfolk, Virginia, about 1798. His death occurred in 1894 at the age of ninety-right years. The maiden name of his wife was Elizabeth Taylor, of Parfar, Scotland. She also attained an advanced age, dring at the age of cighty-seven. Of their children, Charles died in Norfolk in January, 1901, when within a few months of the age of one had red years having brother excessed one of the venerable citizens of Norfolk; Crawford married John Haskell of Baltimore, Maryland; William died in Norfolk in 1857, leaving a family, Robert passed away, also leaving a family, and Andrew died in Baltimore, where he had been a successful importer, and where he had reared his family.

George Reid, Jr., was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, during a visit of his parents to their native city in 1811. He received his education after the fashion of the old school Presbyterian faith and doctrine, and when he arrived at his majority he was excellently equipped in mind and moral and business character. He was brought up in his father's merchandising activities, and later succeeded to the wholesale grocery business, which had been conducted by his father, and for a number of years this business was carried on under the name of Charles and George Reid. At the opening of the Civil war he gave up the business and moved to Richmond. His principal activities during the war times were in block are running. He capable lines of the Pederal fleet and in transporting and handling goods and wares which could thus escape the vigilance of the blockade. After the return of peace he engaged in the grain business in Norfolk until his death in 1889. As to the issues which divided the country previous to and at the time of the war, his attitude favored the preservation of the Union at all costs, but when his State east its lot with the South, he used his means and his influence liberally in promoting the southern cause, and sent two of his sons into the Confederate army. In the latter years of the war, while General Ben Butler had his headquarters in Norfolk, Mr. Reid was summoned into the General's presence and asked concerning some alleged utterance of treasonable remarks. He at once admitted the substance of the charge, and was then given a pass by the general in order that he might leave the city for his personal safety. During the yellow fever epidemic of 1857 George Reid was designated from among the ranks of business men in Norfolk to take a prominent part in relief work, and did so throughout the period of the scourge. His nobility of character, his active sympathy, and his ready devotion to the welfare of humanity were vital characteristics, actuating him every day of his life, and he lived a life of righteousness and well doing which reflected the highest principles and virtues of his Presbyterian ancestry.

George Reid married Robina Spence, a daughter of John Spence of Edinburgh, Scotland. She had come to America on a visit and while here met and married Mr. Reid. Her mother was a Wallace, a descendant of Sir William Wallace, one of the most noted characters in Scotch history. Robina Spence was born in 1816 and her death occurred before the war. Her brother William Lanker, being president of the Marynand Prant Character, being president of the Marynand Prant, her brother John lived in London, England, and a sister was the wife of a London merchant. The following children comprise the family of George and Robina Reid; John S., of Pecan Gap, Texas; Maggie, widow of J. T. S. Reid of Norfolk, Virginin; Richard, who died at Baltimore, leaving a family, and who had served as a soldier of Mosely's Cavalry during the war; and Charles, who is a professional accountant, but who has all his life been a rambler over the face of the earth.

Now returning to the career of Mr. John S. Reid, after the Civil war, he took up work as clerk for J. C. B. Bridges & Co. of Baltimore, a sugar and coffee house. After three years he returned to Norfolk and engaged in the brokerage business as a member of the firm of Smith and Reid. Then in 1872 he started westward for new experiences which eventually brought him to Texas. His first stop was in Corinth, Mississippi, where he was induced to take a place as teacher in the public schools. Six years were spent in that way, and while there he was married. Then in 1878 he came to Texas. For a time in the community of Ben Franklin he taught school, was also a teacher in Giles Academy, and finally abandoned the activities of the school room in 1892. He then turned his attention to farming, but it is noteworthy that he proved so incompetent that after three years he had lived up to all his means except his land, and was then obliged to seek some other more remunerative occupation. He then opened a grocery store at Pecan Gap and entered a business more nearly to his liking and abilities. From a stock of groceries he expanded his enterprise to include a general merchandise stock, and later took in his son as partner, until now the firm of John S. Reid & Son is easily the largest mercantile house of Pecan Gap. In October, 1877, Mr. Reid married Miss Nancy Carter, adaughter of John Carter, the maiden mame of her mother being Lumley. In the Carter family were the following children: Thomas; Nancy; Mary, who married Kirhy Mask; James; and John. Mr. and Mrs. Reid are the parents of the following children: Grace, who married B. W. Yeager, of Spiro, Oklahoma, and they are the parents of five children; Maggie, the wife of G. O. Shettles, of Pecan Gap, and they have two children; Lutie, wife of O. L. Scott, a merchant of Pecan Gap, and they have a family of two children; George, a partner of his father, and who married Miss Cornelia Morgan; Bessie, married L. H. West, a member of the Reid Moreantile Company and they are the parents of two children; W. W. S., the junior member of the Reid firm, who married Miss Mattie H. Yeager, and they have two children; and Andrew J., who is associated in business with his father and who married Miss Mollie Mae Sandlin. They have one child, John S., Jr. Mr. Reid brought up his family in the Presbyterian church, is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and politically and in civic affairs is liberal and broadminded, and usually supports the Democratic party.

SINCLAIR TALIAFERRO. A member of the Texas bar since 1875, Mr. Taliaferro has during nearly forty years filled in his career with many activities and achievements as an able lawyer. He is now head of the firm of Taliaferro & Taliaferro, attorneys, in the First National Bank Building at Houston.

Sinclair Taliaferro was born in Gloucester county, Virginia, December 23, 1852. In Virginia and Georgia and elsewhere in the south, few names are better known and accompanied with more distinction than that of Taliaferro. The Taliaferros originally settled in the old colony of Virginia about 1662, and from that state its members have spread into various parts of the union.

The parents of the Houston lawyer were Thomas Booth and Mary Munford (Sinclair) Taliaferro. The father was a Virginia planter, and subsequently engaged in merchandising in that state.

Sinclair Taliaferro was educated in an old log school house in Gloucester county. The old home was in close proximity to the scenes of many hard-fought battles of the Civil war, and normal existence in such times was an impossibility. He was eighteen years of age when he came to Texas in 1870, locating first in Grimes county, where he remained until 1874. In the latter year, coming to Houston, he took up the reading of law in the office of Captain Joseph C. Hutcheson, one of the eminent members of the Houston bar. He continued his studies with energy and success, and in April, 1875, was admitted to the bar and at once began active practice. In point of years in continuous practice in one community Mr. Taliaferro now ranks as third oldest of Houston attorneys. He served as city attorney of Houston from 1883 to 1885. In February, 1895, Mr. Taliaferro was appointed by President Grover Cleveland as United States attorney for the eastern district of Texas, and he held that office until February, 1899. Mr. Taliaferro has never been a seeker for political honors and emoluments, but at the same time is interested in political affairs, and has been a worker in every Democratic campaign since

Though not a politician, Mr. Taliaferro is not ignorant of politics. Political economy, particularly that branch of political economy which deals with the administration of municipalities and states, has been his pet study for years. He will be remembered in Houston as one of the first agitators for the commission form of government. He was visiting a great department store in Nashville one summer, and the administrative features of the institution appealed to him. He saw how, on the commission plan, the same system could be applied to city government, and how under such a regime a remarkable increase in efficiency could not but result. In a letter written to the Houston Post Mr. Taliaferro outlined his views of the commission form of government, and the publication of that letter started a pressure for a change that eventually gave Houston the present city charter and the present opportunity for civic greatness. To the city of Houston there is no more important enterprise, nor one fraught with greater benefit to the city than the Houston ship channel. A number of local citizens have taken an active part in the improvement and development of the channel from Houston into Galveston Bay, and one of the leaders for many years has been Mr. Taliaferro. Since 1883 he has given much time and attention to the work, and few, in any, men will deserve so much credit for the final successful outcome of the enterprise as Mr.

Taliaferro. It is now a certainty that the large oceangoing vessels will have easy access to and from Houston by the ship canal by June, 1915, and to no one will the sight of an ocean-going vessel in the Houston Harbor be more gratifying than to Mr. Taliaferro.

In 1882 Mr. Taliaferro married Miss Rosalie Heath Palmer, who was born in Houston, daughter of Judge Edward A. Palmer of Houston, her father having located in Texas in 1844. The two children of Mr. and Mrs. Tahaferro are Thomas Sinclair Taliaferro, who is a partner with his father in the practice of law, and Bettie Milby, wife of William A. Sherman, vice president of the South Texas Cotton Oil Company of Houston. The Taliaferro home is at 1218 Walker Street.

JAMES V. MEEK. Among those who have lent honor to the legal profession in the State of Texas, a place must be accorded to James V. Meek, whose identity with Houston dates back to 1895, and who maintains offices in the Prince Theatre Building.

Mr. Meek was born at Warsaw, Alabama, November 29, 1863, son of James T. and Mary C. (Weston) Meek. James T. Meek was educated with the practice of law in view, and was a graduate of a law school, but he never identified himself with the profession. Instead, he engaged in merchandising in Alabama, and was thus occu-pied when the Civil war broke out. A Southern man and with the interests of the Southern cause at heart, he was among the first to enlist his services in the conflict, and he remained in the field until the surrender. He organized the Alabama Rifles, from which he was subsequently transferred to the Thirty-sixth Alabama Regiment as captain of Company A. At the time of Lee and John-ston's surrender he was with his command, fighting in the vicinity of Mobile. His death occurred in 1866. The mother of James V. Meek was a daughter of Elizabeth (Geiger) Weston, a descendant of the Geigers of Revolutionary fame. She died in September, 1912,

James V. Meek was reared and educated in his native state to the age of nineteen years, his advanced studies having been pursued at Howard College, Marion. In 1882 he came to Texas and took.up his residence at Richmond, Fort Bend county, where, while otherwise occupied, he had in view the profession of law. In 1884 and 1885 he was a student in the law department of the University of Texas, and following which he was admitted to the bar by the district judge of Fort Bend county, and at once began practice at Richmond. At Richmond he was justice of the peace, and later county attorney, and he continued his residence there until November, 1889, when he moved to Paris, Texas. At the latter place he represented the Santa Fe Railroad Company as counsel. In May, 1890, he moved to Carson county, and in August, that same year, to Claudia, Armstrong county, where he remained two years, during which time he served as county judge having been elected to the office in November, three months after his settlement there. In the bet, three months after his sectionent cheef. In the latter part of 1892 Judge Meek formed a partnership with Temple Houston, youngest son of General Sam Houston, under the firm name of Houston & Meek, and they moved to Fort Worth, where they were associated in a law practice for about three years. At the end of that time Judge Meek moved to Hartley county, where, however, he remained only a short time, and from whence he came, in 1895, to Houston. This city has since been his home, and during the nearly twenty years of his practice here has had several law partners, men of standing in the profession and sterling worth as citizens. He has practiced successively under the firm names of Meek & Taylor, Baldwin & Meek, Meek & Sam and Meek & Highsmith, and since February, 1912, he has conducted practice under his own name. While Mr. Meek has never been an office seeker, he filled the office thrust upon him in a manner that reflected credit upon himself. Throughout his practice he has maintained high standards and has lent a dignity to his chosen profession. Among the fraternal organizations which claim him as a worthy member are the F. and A. M., K. of P., B. P. O. E., Eagles and Turn Verein.

fn November, 1889, Mr. Meek married Miss Rosalie Carlton, daughter of James E. and Melissa (Taylor) Carlton of Columbus, Texas, and they have four children: Weston, Hennie, Rosalie and Mildred. He and his family reside at 37-04 Garrott street, West Moreland, Houston.

ANTHUR P. YARDROUM. In Arthur P. Yarbrough the Byers Herald has found a publisher and owner who makes the most of the possibilities offered by such a plant, and since he bought the establishment early in 1913 it has made considerable progress of a pleasing order. The policy of the paper is one that is designed to boost Texas in general and Byers in particular, and the spirit of the publication is one that is altogether praiseworthy and at the same time productive of excellent results. Mr. Yarbrough has been a resident of Texas only since 1895, but in the years of his identification with the state has become thoroughly imbued with the spirit of the great southwestern commonwealth, and he has as great a pride in the state and in his particular community as has any native born Texas.

Born in Talapoosa county, Alabama, on December 7, 1873, Arthur P. Yarbrough is the son of Thomas J. and Mary A. Yarbrough, and to them were born eleven children, of which number Mr. Yarbrough of this brief review is the oldest.

Mr. Yarbrough gained his early education in the public schools of Alabama, and remained at home on the home farm until he was twenty-one years of age. Arrived at his majority, he felt himself privileged to try his wings in the business of life, and his first move was to attend the Agricultural College at Albertville, in East Alabama, for a year. In order to do that the young man found it necessary to occupy himself at any employment he might find, for he worked his own way through, and after finishing his studies here he taught school for two terms in his native state and then came to Texas. He first settled in Rice, Navarro county, where he continued for about a year, during which time he was occupied in ginning, and he then went to Hunt county and remained until 1909. During the years passed there he attended college at the East Texas Normal College, and taught school for some time, after which he went to Dallas and was employed in a clerical capacity with the Texas Pacific Railroad in their general offices. In 1910 he came to Byers and engaged in real estate and insurance activities, but soon gave up the work to become the publisher of the Byers Herald, which paper he bought outright, and has since been editor, proprietor and publisher. The paper circulates in Texas and Oklahoma, with a scattered circulation in certain other states, and is making excel-lent progress under Mr. Yarbrough's management.

No more active worker for the best interests of the town is to be found than Mr. Yarbrough. He is a membrane that the state of the best interests of the town is to be found than Mr. Yarbrough. He is a membrane that the state of the teaching of scientific farming in the schools, and while in Alabama he was the first to organize the Farmers' Cooperative Educational Association in that state. As a teacher he recognized the need for adequate instruction in the business of farming among the youth of the land, and did much to create a feeling in favor of the furtherane of that branch of education.

On September 27, 1898, Mr. Yarbrough was married in Commerce, Texas, to Miss Nellie Brown, the daughter of John R. Brown of Hunt county, Texas. To them have been born six children, of whom four died in infancy. The surviving children are Lloyd V. and Juanita. Mr. Yarbrough has no church adilliations, but is liberal-

Mr. Yarbrough has no church affiliations, but is liberalminded and generous in his attitude toward all of them. He is a Democrat, but takes little active part in the political matters of the community beyond the demands of good citizenship, and is a stout believer in the future of Texas. He is willing at all times to respond to inquiries directed at him in regard to his adopted state, He enjoys the confidence and genuine regard of the representative people of the community, and, with his wife, has a boat of riends in the county.

WILLIAM A. WILSON. As a builder of homes has William A. Wilson of times been designated, and no other title applied to him, however high sounding it might be, could imply so much of genuine character or so aptly depict the true nature of the man than does that term. For more than twenty years he has been devoting himself to the real estate business in Houston, and in those years hundreds of homes have been built and sold to families on easy terms, thus enabling home-hungry people to become real owners, who might otherwise never have claimed that privilege, dear to the heart of so many. Other phases of activity have characterized his operations in the realty market, but this one has been the most potent force tor good of all his enterprises, and is especially deserving of mention.

A native son of Onondago county, New York, William A. Wilson was born in 1864, the son of William A. and Eliza H. (Arnts) Wilson. The father, now deceased, was a lifelong farmer of Onondago county, and the mother still makes her home in the community where she reared her family. Mr. Wilson as a boy at home enjoyed such educational privileges as the country schools provided and lived the life of the average country boy, in his teens becoming connected with the wholesale meat business in Syracuse, where he continued for some years. He came to Texas first in 1892, being then twenty-eight years of age, and, settling in Houston, he immediately identified himself with real estate matters. He operated independently for thirteen years, and in 1905 the business which he had fostered in that time was incorporated under the name of the William A. Wilson Company, with a capital stock of $100,000. In 1907 so well had the business progressed that the capitalization was increased to $200,000, in 1910 to $600,000, and in 1912 to $800,000 -facts and figures that will show conclusively something of the progress and standing of the firm in Houston today. The company carries on a large and exceedingly profitable business, consisting chiefly in the building and selling of modern bomes in attractive subdivisions of the City of Houston, these subdivisions being controlled by the company under proper building restrictions.

An example of this phase of their enterprise may be seen in the Woodland Heights subdivision, opened by them in the autumn of 1907, and they have reduced it from a state of natural wildness to a charming suburban park, dotted by comfortable and artistic homes, which now aggregate something more than two hundred, the place classing as a most desirable residence subdivision. In addition, they have built and sold hundreds of houses in every quarter of the city, from the time when Mr. Wilson first began his real estate operation in Houston. At the present time the company is developing another subdivision of Houston, known as Eastwood, which will be done on the same lines as was Woodland Heights, and will present fully as many attractions to home seekers in the suburbs.

This mammeth company's affairs are directed by a body of the most capable and far-seeing business men in the city, and the personnel of the firm will indicate that fact beyond dispute. Joseph B. Bowles is president of the company, William A. Wilson is vice president and general manager, and these, together with James A. Baker, Edwin B. Parker, Rufus Cage, Baker W. Arnstrong and Guy M. Bryan, constitute the board of directors and other members of the firm.

The William A. Wilson Company has but recently carried to completion a new office building, designed especially for their own usage. The building is two stories in height, thirty-seven feet front by one hundred and twenty feet in depth, and is located at 910 Frankin arenue. The purchase price of the building was 860,000, and the improvements they felt called upon to make in order to bring the building upon to a snitable standard of completeness for their use have advanced those figures very appreciably. The new building, however, enables the company to maintain all their various departments of activity under one roof, and is a distinct that the company to maintain all their various destructed in the company to maintain all their various destructed in the company to maintain all their various destructed in the company to maintain all their various destructed in the company to maintain all their various destructed in the company to maintain all their various destructed in the company to t advantage over previous arrangements.

Other interests and enterprises aside from the real estate business have elaimed the attention of Mr. Wilson, and he is now serving on the directorate of the Lumberman's National Bauk of Houston, of which he has long been a stockholder. He has been president of the board of directors of the Young Men's Christian Association of Houston since 1900, and is now chairman of the Texas State Executive Committee of the Y. M. C. A. His fraternal affiliations are with the Masonic order, in which he has membership in Holland Lodge, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons. He is a member of Central Christian christian control of the Accepted Masons of the Masonic order, in which has membership in Holland Lodge, Ancient Free and Accepted Masons. He is a member of Central Christian Director of the Masonic order, he has manifested the finest spirit of civic loyalty in all the years of his identification with Houston, and few there are in the city who have more civic honors to their credit than has this builder of homes.

In April, 1892, Mr. Wilson was married to Miss Mary I. Kinney, the daughter of Rev. Dennison Kinney of Syracuse, New York, who was a Wesleyan Methodist minister of that city, and a man of the highest type of Christian citizenship. Six children have been born into the Wilson home, named as follows: Helen Irene, Florence May, Mary Louise, William A., Jr., Edgar Houston and George Dennison Wilson. The residence of the family is maintained at No. 205 Bayland avenue, Woodland Heights, and is one of the handsome home places of that suburb,

JAMES ROONEY. The career of James Roomey briefly told in the following paragraphs is a story of a man who started out as a boy in subordinate capacity, becoming a clerk and general utility man until he had acquainted himself with every detail of the business, and since then his progress has been such that the Rooney Mercantile Company of which he is the head is the largest establishment of the kind in Pecos county. It is in fact a regular city department store, and offers the people of Fort Stockton and vicinity a larger stock of goods and better selection than can be found anywhere outside of the largest cities of the state. Another noteworthy fact the largest cities of the state. Another noteworthy fact had been such as the state of the largest cities of the state. Another noteworthy fact had been such as the state of the state of the largest cities of the state. Another noteworthy fact had been such as the state of the state of the state of the state. Another noteworth fact had been such as the state of the state of the state of the state. Another noteworth has been hardly a less important factor in his success than his ability as a merchant. He possesses completely the confidence and esteem of every citizen of any consequence in Pecos county, and is a man whose prosperity has never been accompanied by envy on the part of his competitors.

James Rooney is one of the oldest native sons of Pecos county, where he was born September 27, 1873, about seven years before the first line of railroad was constructed through this portion of Texas, and several years before the Indians had finally ceased their hostilities in west Texas. His father, Francis Rooney, was a pio-neer whose name deserves to be long remembered in Pecos county. Francis Rooney was an Irishman by birth, and when a young man came to Texas in 1868, went out to the extreme west frontier, and became identified with cattle raising and farming in Pecos county. Throughout his career there he was active politically and at one time served as county commissioner. He was a loyal member of the Catholic church and popular both as a business man and citizen. He was a member of the first commissioners court of Pecos county, and during his administration the first jail and courthouse were built in the county. He was an Indian fighter. Residence in this section of Texas during the sixties and seventies necessitated service as a militimam, and more than once he joined the state rangers in pursuit and battle with the raiding savages. His death occurred in 1890 when he was sixty-three years of age, and he was buried in Pecos county. He married Miss Jennie McCarthy, who was also a native of Ireland, but they were married in Texas. She makes her home in Port Stockton with her son James, and is a venerable old lady, and a devout member of the Catholic church. Of the eight children in the Rooney family, six are now living, all married and all having their homes at Fort Stockton or vicinity, as follows: John Rooney, in the drug business; Frank Rooney, who is county and district clerk; william Rooney, cashier of the First State Bank of Fort Stockton; Mrs. Joseph Richardson; Mrs. H. H. Butz: and James.

James Rooney has been a resident of Pecos county all his life, and his early education was attained in the local schools, after which he entered St. Mary's College at San Antonio. Returning from school to Fort Stockton, he began his career as a school teacher, an occupation he followed for two years, and at the age of twenty took a place as clerk with Mr. H. Koehler, and remained a salesman in his store for about one year until the proprietor's death. He then went to Alpine and worked for C. H. Larkin in a similar capacity for another year. Returning to Fort Stockton he and H. H. Butz formed a partnership and bought the old Koehler store, conducting it under the firm name of Rooney & Butz until 1904. In that year Mr. Rooney bought out his partner, and continued the establishment alone until 1910. In that year was organized and incorporated the Rooney that year was organized and incorporated to Mercantile company, easily the largest concern of the kind in this part of the state. The Rooney Mercantile Company occupies with its stock of goods a floor space and warehouses, including many thousand square feet, employs a large number of clerks, and other workers and does an extensive retail and wholesale business. Everything to be found in a first class city department store is included in the stock, and the policy of the concern which has brought it so much success is the concern which has brought it so much success is the giving of an adequate service in return for every purpose. Mr. Rooney besides being the head of the Rooney Mercantile Company is also vice president of the Fort Stockton State Bank.

He was married in Fort Stockton to Effic McDonald, of Pecos county. Their three sons and three daughters are: Phillip M., Annie B., Jennie L., Donald W., Dorotby, and James, Jr. Mr. Rooney is a broadminded and liberal Catholic in religion and gives his support generously to all religions and phinathropic enterprises. He is affiliated with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Woodmen of the World, the Masons from Blue Lodge to Chapter, and is president of the Fort Steckton Commercial Club. A worker for Democratic success, Mr. Rooney has the distinction of heing the first etrice chosen to the office of the city of Fort sective of the city. Thomas W. House. The latest important distinction to accorded a member of the House family of Texas was the appointment of President Woodrow Wilson of Thomas W. House as postmaster at Houston. This occurred more than seventy-five years after the name first became identified with the Texas Republic. Throughout this time the larger commercial affairs of Houston have enjoyed the stimulating activities of several generations of this family.

The present Houston postmaster, Thomas W. House, was born in Houston in 1846. It was his father, Thomas W. House, Sr., who first gave distinction to the name in this state. The Senior House was born in England, came to the United States about 1830 and after some years spent in New York City, arrived at Houston in 1837. Houston was at that time hardly a year old and the first husiness activities were struggling to get established along the sluggish waters of the Bayou, the chief prestige of the locality resulting from its position as eapital of the Republic. Mr. House was one of the first merchants of the little capital city and his name was continuously identified with the general merchandise trade there until 1880. He was one of the men who after the capital was removed to Austin, upheld and fortified the position of Houston as the chief com-mercial center for all of South Texas. His name might be found in connection with a great many of the business and semi-public enterprises of his time. During the early days of the Republic he served in the Texas army under General Burleson and was engaged in the campaigns of those days against the Mexicans and the Indians. Some years later, when quite an old man, in the war between the states, the Confederate government employed him, under the general direction of General Magruder to carry cotton to Havana and West Indies, and bring in supplies for the Confederacy. He was thus engaged in one of the most hazardous and at the same time invaluable services to the Confederacy. The wife of Thomas W. House, Sr., was Mary (Shearn) House and of House W. House, Sr., was narry (Suearn) House and the death occurred in 1870. Among their children is E. M. House of Austin, Texas, and New York City, prominent in public affairs and an intimate friend of President Wilson. Thomas W. House, Jr., received his education in the schools of Houston. During the war he was sent abroad and spent four years in completing his education in England. On returning from England in 1867 he entered his father's general mercantile business and was closely identified with that old and solid establishment known under the name and title, "T. W. House," for thirty years. He continued and developed the business founded by his father and added to the many business attainments already associated with the name.

In 1897 Mr. House sold out the mercantile business and for the following seven or eight years was engaged as a private banker. During the last fifteen or twenty years the sugar industry in southern Texas has ex-perienced a great revival and perhaps to no one individual has this been due more than to the efforts of Mr. T. W. House. He owns a large sugar plantation and sugar mill in Fort Bend county and his operations in that line are well known to all who keep in touch with sugar growing and manufacture in South Texas.

Mr. House's appointment as postmaster of the city of Houston came on August 27, 1913, and he has since been at his office in the Federal Building, and no choice could have met with more general approval from the local citizens than that of Colonel House. For six years, from 1880 to 1886 he was a member of the Houston City Council, during the administration of Mayor William R. Baker.

In 1869 Mr. House married Miss Ruth Nicholson, a daughter of James Nicholson of Bastrop, Texas. Her father was of English birth and came to Texas about 1840, being one of the pioneers. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. House, as follows: Mary, wife of J. C. Lamkin, an attorney at San Antonio; Ellen, who married W. L. Howze of Houston; Edith House; Thomas W., Jr., in the real estate business in Houston; James H. B., also in the real estate business in Houston; youngest son is a graduate of Princeton University and his diploma was the first to be signed by Woodrow Wilson, then president of Princeton and now President of the United States. The House residence is at 1010 Louisiana street.

WILLIAM GRASTON LOVE. One of the more successful attorneys of Houston is William Graston Love, a native product of Texas and a resident of Houston since 1891, where he carries on a general law practice and is one of the leading men of the city and county. As mayor of Houston Heights for two terms he demonstrated the high order of his citizenship, and in his position as president of the Houston Heights school board he did excellent work for the educational advancement of the community. His career thus far has been characterized by the utmost usefulness and his future promises much in the way of advancement and success.

Born in Dallas county, Texas, on January 17, 1869,
William Graston Love is the son of William E. and William Graston Love is the son of William E. and Hulda (Graston) Love, natives of South Carolina and Tennessee, respectively. During the Civil war William E. Love was a member of General Longstreet's staff and served with him throughout the war. In 1869 he brought his family to Dallas county, where he engaged in farming and stock raising until 1877, in which year he moved to Salado, Texas, and engaged in farming and merchandising. His success was of a fair order and he continued in husiness until his death, which occurred

William Graston Love received his education in the common schools and the Salado College, later attending the law department of the University of Texas, from which he was graduated in 1889 with the degree of LL. B. In the same year the young attorney was admitted to the bar of Texas and he soon after began his legal career in practice at Luling, Caldwell county, where he remained until 1891. In that year he came to Houston, where greater opportunities were afforded for advancement in the profession, and he has since continued in the general practice of law.

Mr. Love, who makes his home in Houston Heights, has served twice as mayor of that community, his service covering the years between 1896 and 1900, and since 1898 he has been president of the Houston Heights school board, as has already been mentioned. In 1907 he was appointed district attorney to fill an unexpired term for the criminal district comprising Harris and Galveston counties and in 1908 was elected to fill the office for a two years' term. Upon the expiration of that term he retired and has since devoted himself exclusively to his private practice.

Mr. Love is a member of the Knights of Pythias and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, but has no other fraternal affiliations. He was married in 1901 to Miss Lillie Webb, the daughter of the late Dr. W. T. Webb of Mobile, Alabama, and to them has been born one son, William Hamilton Love. The family residence is at the corner of Avondale avenue and Hopkins street, Houston.

WILEY C. MUNN. Now one of the merchant princes of Houston, proprietor, president and general manager of the W. C. Munn Company, Incorporated, whose immense general department store is located in a prominent district in this city, Wiley C. Muun has had a typical American success, emerging from a farmer boy to a place among the foremost merchants of the state of Texas. Along with success in his private business he has given of his energies and co-operation without stint to those larger activities which are at the foundation of a greater and better Houston.

Wiley C. Munn was born near Jefferson, in Marion county, Texas, November 9, 1861, a son of John H. and Frances Ann Judson (Cooper) Munn. The parents were both natives of Alabama and came to Texas in 1838, locating near Jefferson, where the father was a pioneer planter. They subsequently moved into Fayette county and in 1875 to Salado, in Bell county, but the last years of the father's life was spent in Colorado The mother is still living and resides county, Texas.

with her son. Mr. Munn received a fair amount of schooling when a boy and spent one year in the Salado school. After that training he started out in business for himself and his first venture was in selling the Singer sewing machine. After two and a half years as a salesman he had accumulated one hundred head of eattle and sufficient money so that he was able to take one term of instruction in the Baylor University at Waco and one year of study at Weimar, after which he returned to Waco and completed his business education in Hill's Business College. For six months thereafter he was bookkeeper for the firm of Simons & McCarthy at Taylor.

Having in the meantime married and returned to Weimer, Mr. Munn there engaged in mercantile business on the first of January in 1885 in partnership with his father-in-law, Daniel W. Jackson. In January, 1886, he bought out the interest of Mr. Jackson and then conducted the business alone for a number of years. At first it was a very small store and a very small stock and the enterprise was conducted not notably different from many others that might have been found in this section of Texas. Mr. Munn from the first, however, applied himself to the great field of merchandising, and though his business was located in a small town, he built it up to be the largest concern of its kind in that community, and then sold out seeking larger quarters in Houston in 1906. Since that time the growth of the business has been phenomenal. In 1906 was organized the Mistrot-Munn Company, a mercantile organization which was very familiar to Houston and all the people of South Texas until recently. Mr. Munn owned the controlling interest and was general manager of the store and on August 20, 1912, he bought out the stock of Mr. G. A. Mistrot and on January 1, 1913, reorganized the company under the name of the W. C. Munn Company, Incorporated. With this reorganization the capital stock of the concern was raised from two hundred thousand to five hundred thousand dollars, of which Mr. Munn holds more than one-half, and he is president and general manager of the business. With the reorganization came the building of a mammoth department store, concerning which a somewhat extended description is here presented and which is now in course of construction, the same to be ready for occupancy on February 1, 1914. To give a detailed description of the new building were, of course, im-possible in the limited space at our disposal here, but some of the more salient features may be presented consistently. The building now under construction, is located at the corner of Travis street and Capitol avenue, and when completed will undoubtedly be one of the splendid architectural embellishments of Houston. The main building will have a frontage of 150 feet each on Capitol avenue and Travis street, and will comprise six stories and a basement. It will be absolutely fire proof, in so far as architectural and engineering skill can so render, and will be thoroughly modern in every detail, as well as laying claim to a certain dignified beauty that is seldom found in structures of this order. The furniture and fixtures of the store alone will represent a cash outlay of $100,000. The front of the building is to be done in terra cotta for the first two stories and the remaining stories in buff pressed brick. Reinforced concrete will enter into the construction material used and inferior stand pipes and other fire protective appliances will be installed. Five large elevators, driven by electricity, will ply between the basement and the top floor, and many other, in fact, every labor-saving device known to the builders' art will be installed in this splendid structure. The show windows are a conspicuous feature of this building. There will be slightly more than 350 lineal feet of window space fronting the two streets, while the entrance to the Main street department, which will go into construction later, will have more than 100 lineal feet, including the vestibule and store front cases. It is planned by the moving spirit of this mammoth concern that this shall be a great department store and mail order house. Catalog and mail order that are to be given the dignity of an entire department, at least one floor of the entire building being occupied by this phase of the business. All Texas had the adjoining states of the south will be reached and the adjoining states of the south will be reached and Mr. Munn is also laying plans to place representatives in the Latin-American Republies of Mexico, Cuba and South and Central American, whose business will be given important consideration. Spanish catalogs and stocks especially supplied to meet the demands of these countries, will be carried and close attention and study will be accorded those countries with a view to developed the view to developed the peter of the descriptions. In short, it is expected that this budding enterprise will establish trule relations between Houston and the districts above mentioned such as have never before existed.

Outside of his regular business affairs Mr. Munn is interested in a number of local enterprises, being president of the Houston Turning Basin Investment Company, president of the Port Houston Land & Townsite Company and in 1912 was elected president of the Houston Chamber of Commerce, being one of the leading members of that organization, and active in the work it promulgates for the good of the city and its allied commercial and industrial interests. He is also a member of the No-Tsu-Oh Carnival Association of Houston Fraternally he is affilliated with the Masonic Order, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, the Modern Order of Pretorians and the Benevolent Protective Order of Elss. He and his family worship in the First Baptist Church of Houston Church

On November 5, 1884, at Weimar, Texas, Mr. Munn married Miss Georgia A. Jackson, a daughter of Daniel W. Jackson of Weimar, Texas. Her death occurred on July 27, 1910, and her five ebildren are named as follows: Eunice, the wife of Charles A. Bryan of Houston, Nellie, who married N. H. Keith; Kathleen D., Wilm G. and Dorothy A. The family home is at 2901 Main street in Houston.

BRYAN BREWSTER GILMER. Under a popular form of government, like that of the United States, where the democratic idea of equality is as fully developed as the present imperfect condition of mankind will permit, we expect as its legitimate result the triumph of individual worth and energy over all the competition that wealth and class may array against them. Here the avenues of wealth and distinction are fully opened to all, which fact enhances rather than detracts from the merits of those whose energy and integrity have triumphed over all obstacles intervening between an humble position and the attainment of those laudable ends. Obscurity and labor, at no time dishonorable, never assume more attractive features than when the former appears as the nurse of those virtues which the latter, by years of honest and persevering effort, transplants to a higher and richer soil; hence, the biography of those men of sterling worth whose active enterprise has won for them the dis-tinction and influence in society in which they move must be replete with facts which should encourage others in the arena of life. Such a man is Bryan Brewster Gilmer, president of the Southern Drug Company, Houston, Texas, a man who, while yet young in years, has fought bis way from a somewhat humble beginning to marked prestige in the business and social world of the city of his residence and who by the exercise of those talents and qualities which were cultivated from his youth, has reached an honorable position in the public mind and earned the respect and esteem of his fellow citizens.

Mr. Gilmer was born in Butler, Alabama, November 3, 1870. He is a son of Abram Bessent Gilmer and Amelia (Brewster) Gilmer. The father was born in Dallas county, Alabama, and there sreent his life as a planter and physician, and was a well known and influential man in that section of the state. During the war between the states he served in General Wheeler's cavalry in the Confederate army. His death occurred in 1892. His mother was born in Lauderdale county, Mississippi, and she is still living, making her home in Houston. Grandfather Gilmer was a native of South Carolina. Elmira (Powell) Gilmer, the paternal grandmother, was born in Alabama before it was a state. Her death occurred in January, 1907, when over ninety years of age. Bryan B. Gilmer was educated in the high school at Butler, his native state, and in the year 1891 he came to Texas, locating at Eagle Lake, Colorado county, where he attended the high school, subsequently completing his education at the university at Lebanon, Ohio, from which he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Science. He then returned to Eagle Lake, Texas, and was engaged in the retail drug business there several years, during which time he mastered the ins and outs of that line of endeavor and got a good start in the business world. Seeking a larger field for the exercise of his talents, he came to Houston, taking a position with the Houston Drug Company, with which be remained for several years, giving his employers eminent satisfaction. Later he became secretary and treasurer of the Standard Milling Company of Houston. In the early fall of 1906 he organized the Southern Drug Company of 1214-1218 Franklin avenue, Houston. Under his able management and indomitable energy it has forged to the front until today it ranks among the largest and most successful wholesale drug houses in the Southwest, and does an annual business of very large proportions, its trade extending over a very extensive territory. Prompt, honest and courteous service has been the aim of the management, and a mammoth and carefully selected stock of all kinds of drugs and drug sundries is carried.

In 1911 Mr. Gilmer was president of the Houston Bankers, Jobbers and Manufacturers' Association, and in 1912 he was vice president of the National Wholesale Druggists' Association. For several years he was a director of the Houston Chamber of Commerce, and is president of the same for 1913. He is a member of the Houston Board of School Trustees. In all these positions of trust he has given eminent satisfaction to all concerned, discharging his duties ably and conscientiously, Fraternally, Mr. Gilmer belongs to the Scottish Rite Masons, having attained the thirty-second degree in the same; also belongs to El Mina Temple, Ancient Arabic Order of Nobles of the Mystic Shrine. He is also a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. He is vice president of the Houston Club, of which he has been an active member for some time; also a member of the Houston Country Club, of which he was one of the organizers. He is a charter member of the Thalian Club of Houston. He is a member and a director in 1912 of the No-Tsu-Oh Association of Houston.

Mr. Gilmer's attractive residence is located at 3402 Garrott avenue, Houston, and is presided over with grace and hospitality by a lady of culture and many commendable characteristics, known in her maidenhood as Miss Edna Daffan, whom Mr. Gilmer married on June 7, 1905. She is a daughter of the late Col. L. A. Daffan. This union has been graced by the birth of two children, namely: Lawrence A. Daffan Gilmer and Edna Daffan

Mr. Gilmer is a gentleman of pleasing address, genial, obliging and unassuming, a splendid type of the successful, self-made young business man of the twentieth century.

JAMES S. KENDALL. The leading lawyer in Munday, Texas, and one of the most successful attorneys in Knox county, is James S. Kendall, He has only been located in Munday for a short time but he has a good practice and has made a wide circle of friends. Kendall, although not a native of Texas, has been bred in the state and is an enthusiastic champion of this section of the Union. He is a lawyer of wide experience, and is well known for his careful preparation and the conscientious work which he gives to his cases outside of the court room as well as for the able manner in which he handles cases before the bar.

James S. Kendall was born in Independence county, Arkansas, on the 21st of August, 1876. He lived in Arkansas until he was ten years of age when his parents moved to Texas. His father, Samuel G. Kendall, was born in the state of Arkansas and came to Texas in 1887. He followed farming both before and after coming to Texas and was also interested in real estate investments. When the Civil war broke out Mr. Kendall enlisted in the Confederate army, as a member of the Tenth Arkansas Infantry. He saw much active service and among the important engagements in which he participated was the Battle of Shiloh. Mr. Kendall was very active politically, being a member of the Demoeratic party. In religious matters he was a member of the Baptist church. He died in 1898 at the age of sixty-seven. He married Miss Sarah H. Wyatt, after moving to Arkansas. She was born in Tennessee and like her husband was a devout member of the Baptist church. She died in 1907 at the age of sixty-six, and is buried by the side of her husband in Decatur, Texas.

Of the eight children born to Samuel and Sarah Kendall, James S. Kendall was the fifth. He went to school in Arkansas first and later attended the public schools of Texas. He completed the high school course at Decatur and then left school to accept a position in a dry goods store. He was seventeen years of age at this time and his salary at the start was forty-five dollars a month, a good beginning for a young boy. After about eighteen months of this work he went into an abstract office where he worked until 1897. It was during this period of his life that he took up the study of law and in 1897 he was admitted to the bar.

He immediately began the practice of law in Decatur, continuing his abstract business at the same time. In 1901 he left his home town and went to Robert Lee, Texas, where he was engaged in the practice of law for three years. His next move took him to Tahoka where he only practiced his profession for a year before going to Vernon, Texas. After a year in this place he came to Knox county and located in Benjamin, the county seat. For six years he was here engaged in the practice of law and in the real estate business. Then in November, 1912, he came to Munday and established himself in practice here. He has been elected city attorney of Munday and has a growing practice.

In politics Mr. Kendall is a member of the Democratic party and takes a very active interest in both local and national politics. He is a member of the Methodist church and in the fraternal world is a member of the Knights of Pythias and of the Red Men. He is also an active member of the Commercial Club of Munday.

Mr. Kendall was married in Knox county, on the 27th of June, 1909, to Miss Flora Smith, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Smith, who were formerly of Mississippi. Mr. and Mrs. Kendall have had two children born to them, as follows: Walter Gaynor and Edna Arlene.

HON, CLARK C. WREN. The first judge to be appointed to preside over the newly created Harris County court at law, Mr. Clark C. Wren, has been once elected by popular vote to that office, and it is largely through his capable judicial administration that the court has so well fulfilled the high expectations entertained for it, and in that position he has strengthened his position as one of the brilliant lawyers of the state. Judge Wren is still a young man, thirty-six years of age, and was admitted to the bar when only nineteen.

Born at Galveston, Texas, May 25, 1877, Clark C. Wren is a son of Powhatan S. and Mattie (Campbell)

JSKendall

Wren. Through his mother he is a great great-grandson of General Elijah Clark, who won distinction in the Revolutionary war. Judge Wren's father was born in Virginia, was captain in a Virginia regiment during the war between the states, came to Texas about 1867, and located in Galveston, where he acquired prominence in politics. He served as city clerk during 1878-80, and resigned to take the position of county clerk of Galveston county. Then for a number of years he was deputy internal revenue collector for that district. In August, 1903, P. S. Wren moved to Arizona territory, which has since been his home. He is now a member of the first state legislature of Arizona.

Clark C. Wren grew up at Galveston, attended the public schools, and when fourteen years of age became a regular wage earner and has since paid his own way in the world. As a boy he took up the study of law at home, and in 1896, at the age of nineteen, was admitted to the bar. For the active prosecution of his work as a lawyer he moved out to San Angelo, and remained there until the outbreak of the Spanish-American war. His record in that war was made with the Third Texas Volunteer Infantry, and he served as sergeant of Company E. Soon after his discharge from military service in 1899 Mr. Wren was diverted from the law into a profession for which he had long manifested decided talent, being for about five years in theatrical work and traveling as an actor throughout the United States. Though the duties of his work were arduous, he found time to take up and complete a course with the Sprague Correspondence School of Law, In 1904 Mr, Wren located permanently in Houston and took up the practice of law.

He soon gained recognition as one of the able young attorneys, and at the same time was drawn somewhat into the field of politics. In 1908 he made an unsuccessful campaign for the office of state senator against P. C. Hume, Jr. In 1910, after the legislature had created the Harris County Court at law, he was appointed judge of the court. This honor came without any solicitation on his part, and in 1912 the citizens of the county elected him for continued service in that office without any opposition. Judge Wren affiliates with the Woodmen of the World and the Improved Order of Red Men.

Marcus O. Whileht, M. D. A physician and surgeon of El Paso since 1896, Dr. Wright is one of the oldest established men in medical practice in the city, only three other physicians having been here longer than he has. In his chosen vocation he has been unusually successful, has built up a large practice, and through his faithful service as a physician has done much for the community with which he has been identified for upwards of twenty years.

Marcus O. Wright was horn in Morgan county, Alsbama, December 23, 1859. He was the only son of William A. and Martha (Perguson) Wright his father being a native of Georgia and his mother of the Cholina, His father was a slave owner and the control Cholina, His father was a slave owner and control of the Cholina and when the Civil war came on he entered than confederate service, was taken prisoner during one of the eampaigns in which he was engaged, was sent to Fort Delaware, and died in that Federal prison in 1864, when forty-five years of age. The mother died at the old home place in Morgan county, Alabama, in 1898, at the age of seventy-two.

Dr. Wright attained his early education in the schools of his native county, and spent his years of hoyhood and youth on the plantation, assisting in its operation for a number of years. At the age of twenty-two he entered Tulane University, in the Medical Department, and was Eduar D. Park. Coming to El Paso several years ago as an employe of the Wells, Fargo & Company Express, Mr. Park has since engaged in business for himself and is one of the young and very enterprising business builders of the city. He was born in Pulaski, Tennessee, April 24, 1887, the oldest in a family of eleven children born to William J. and Lulu (Belew) Park, both natives of Tennessee. The father was of English and Scotch ancestry, and his grandfuther had served as a soldier in the Revolutionary war. The father was a planter, and resides. The mother constains at Winters, where he now resides. The mother the different generations it has furnished soldiers to the Revolution, to the War of 1812 and to the Civil war.

Edgar D. Park was reared in Texas from the age of six years, and such education as he obtained was in the country schools. Most of his training was through experience, and he has succeeded none, the worse apparently for lack of what are popularly regarded as the best advantages of books and schools. Up to the time he was eighteen he lived on a farm, and his first position after leaving home was as a clerk in a grocery store in his home county. He then went with the Wells-Fargo Company Express for two years, and was sent by that company to El Paso in 1909. Since that time he has broad-ened out into larger fields of independent enterprise. In 1910 he established the Park Brothers Realty Company, and that is now one of the leading firms of the kind in El Paso. He has established the Texas Fibre Machine Manufacturing Company and the Mexican Indian Drawn Work Company, both being practical and successful enterprises.

Mr. Park is an independent in politics. He was married in El Paso, October 29, 1911, to Miss Jo Wilson, who was born in Morrisonville, Illinois, a deughter of Joseph Wilson. Mr. Park has his offices at 400 North Oregon street. His chief diversions, aside from business, are hunting and fishing.

Harris Kripp. One of the prominent figures in the mercantile circles of El Paso is Harris Krupp, a gentleman of exceptional business discernment and managerial ability who very worthly represents the progressive spirit that characterizes the business activity of this thriving city of the southwest. He represents that type of the wellbred, foreign-born American citizen whose vigor, ambition and well-directed activities have added so much to the growth and prosperity of our nation. Mr. Krupp came to America a youth in his middle teens and for his progress in life he has relied on his own resources of an active mind, clear and ready judgment, a forceful purpose and fine principles of business and a forceful purpose and the principles of business and personal honor. He settled permanently in El Paso, Texas, twenty years ago and in that score of years he has shared the business growth and prosperity of this city, contributing the while his best energies and abilities to that end, and today he is one of the substantial men

Harris Krupp was born December 15, 1862, in Poland, of which country both of his parents were natives. Abraham Krupp, the father, deceased in 1911, spent his business career as a merchant in his native land and was fairly successful. Mary Krupp, the mother, is yet living and continues to reside in Poland.

Harris is the sixth of the seven children of these parents. He grew up to his sixteenth year in his native land and there received his education. On July 1, 1878, at New York City, he first stepped on the shore of America, the land famed for opportunity, and after a three months' visit with an elder brother in that eity he set about to try out his own fortunes. Securing employment in a photographers' shop as a salesman for photo enlargements, he followed that line of business successfully for nine years, during which time he saved considerable money. He then came west, first settling in Illinois and then later in Kansas, but the spring of 1888 found him in El Paso, Texas. He remained but a short time, however, and from there went to Arizona, where continued his home some four years. In 1892 he returned to El Paso. With a small capital of $150 he opened up a small clothing store, the beginning of his present business at 107 San Antonio street, and of what is today one of the largest gents' furnishing establishments in the city of El Paso, with annual sales averaging $40,000. No magic wand has brought about this result, but it has come through an advantageous location and through years of untiring effort and wise and careful business management on the part of Mr. Krupp. He carries no outside interests but continues to give his whole attention to this very successful business. In political views he leans toward the Republican party but he exercises his voting rights in accord with his own progressive belief that power of effi-ciency and not party affiliations should determine the man for the office. He is prominently affiliated with the Masonic fraternity as a Noble of the Mystic Shrine and as a thirty-second degree Scottish Rite Mason and he is also a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. Mr. Krupp is of the Jewish faith and is a member and a trustee of Mount Sinai Temple in El Paso.

The marriage of Mr. Krupp was solemnized at San Antonio, Texas, September 19, 1897, and united him to Amouno, rexas, september 19, 1891, and united aim do Miss Hulda Zlabovski, who was born in Russia and came to America at the age of eight years with her parents, Mr. and Mrs. Abraham Zlabovski. Mr. and Mrs. Krupp have five children: Paul, born June 11, 1885; Ida, born June 11, 1885; Ida, born June 12, 1801; and Leon, born June 23, 1801; Ephraim, born January 23, 1805; and Leon, born June 24, 1805.

JOSEPH HILL McCRACKEN, M. D. A career of useful activity largely devoted to the service of his fellowmen has been that of Dr. McCracken of Mineral Wells, where he located more than twenty years ago. Dr. McCracken is now one of the oldest physicians in point of years of practice in his part of the state, and one of the hest examples of that ideal type of the country doctor, whose services are marked by faithful character and a certain high ability and skill which give a physician his chief value to the community.

Joseph Hill McCracken was born in the little village of Springtown, Parker county, Texas, October 1, 1867. His parents were William M. and Elizabeth Jane (Doak) McCracken. The doctor is of Scotch-Irish stock, and his father, who was a native of Tennessee, went with his parents in his early years to Washington county, Arkansas. The Doak family also moved to that same Arkansas. The Doda than all all section, and there the two young people formed an acquaintance which ripened into a happy marriage. In 1858 they moved to Texas, and located at Springtown in Parker county, then on the extreme western Tronlier. In the years during the Civil war decade and for some time afterward, all of Parker county was exposed to the constantly recurring outrages of Indians and outlaws, and the residents had to be constantly vigilant. to protect both their own lives and their property from the raiding bands which crossed the country every few months. At one time the McCracken ranch was raided, and a large herd of fine horses and two hundred and fifty cattle were carried away. The only animals left to perform the farm labor were a few old steers, and one fine brood mare was kept concealed from the Indians by tying her behind the bank of a creek. One night, in trying to get down to the water for drink, she became entangled in the rope, and was drowned. The doctor's father hauled lumber from eastern Texas in an ox wagon in order to build his first house in that part of Parker county. The father was a fine type of the old west Texas pioneer. During the early days he served as a guard under Captain Walker Baylor and did much to protect the early settlers from incursions of Indians and outlaws. During the Civil war be was a true friend to all the families whose husbands and fathers had gone away to fight the cause of the South. He supplied many a home with provisions, and his many kindly acts caused his memory to endure gratefully long after his death.

Dr. McCracken had many obstacles to contend with in his advancement toward a professional career. The country schools provided him with only limited education, and much of the time while school was in session, tion, and much of the time while school was in seasons, his services were needed on the home farm. His brother John W. McCracken was the founder and builder of College Hill Institute, and for two terms the doctor attended that school. With that schooling he applied for the position of master of a country school, and was given the promise of the same upon condition that he could produce a second grade certificate. This certifi-cate was given him by the examiners, the trustees failed to live up to their promise, and then young McCracken went on with his studies. He had already determined upon a career in medicine, and in the meantime took up the study of anatomy and physiology under Doctors O. G. Peterson and John W. Liles. Ahout that time, 1887, occurred one of the greatest droughts in west Texas, and as a result his father was unable to assist him to proceed with his studies in college. In such a situation he determined to get a country school. A school was promised him on the understanding that he should furnish under examination a firstgrade certificate. The examination was given and was one of the most rigid ever held in Texas up to that time. Curiously enough the doctor failed of a first-grade certificate because of his marks on physiology, which at that time was a new branch recently introduced into the curriculum. However, the trustees finally employed Mr. McCracken at a salary of forty dollars a month for a three-months' term. When that was concluded, since the results of the previous droughts were still felt in the community, Dr. McCracken determined not to go away to medical school, but to take six weeks' study in the Normal School at Decatur. For a time he rode back and forth under the hot summer sun in search of a school and as a result was taken ill and lost four weeks from his studies, and when he entered the normal it closed three days later. Turning in his examination papers he told the professor that if he was not given a mark of one hundred on physiology it would be an act of injustice to him since he knew more on that branch than the entire faculty of instruction. His average of studies was ninety-two and a fraction, and thus he obtained a normal certificate. After six months of teaching, the doctor took his savings and entered the University of Tennessee to attend his first lectures. On returning from the first year of medical college, his cash capital amounted to only fifteen dollars. It was a case of necessity with him that he should at once get into practical work, and so he applied to Dr. John Embry, member of the board of medical examiners at Decatur, who appropriated ten dollars from the total fifteen and after getting a promise of five dollars more gave the doctor a temporary license to practice.

Dr. McCracken with his license then located at Willow Point in Wise country. No other doctoring the Wise country of the doctoring the Wise work of the Wise Country of and justly awarded.

After a brief period of practice in Wise county, Dr. McCracken moved on February 20, 1892, to Mineral Wells, and on the ninth of May in the same year lost all his accumulations by fire. Nothing was left except his little family and seventy dollars and a few cents in eash, with a debt of seventy-five dollars against him. All the previous years of hardships had prepared the doctor for such reverses, and having always been a man of honor, ready to serve his friends and neighbors when in misfortune, he now found that the bread cast upon the waters had returned to him in the form of practical helpfulness in his own misfortune. Dr. McCracken has always been fortunate in his friends, and the ties of fellowship strongly knit in the early days still bind, In his professional career he has always been liberal, has worked conscientiously, and has served both the poor and rich without respect to his fees. It has been his motto from early life to meet all obligations and make every promise good.

In 1895 Dr. McCracken took a post-graduate course in New Orleans, another in New York in 1901, and then attended the New Orleans school again. On the reorganization of the State Medical Society, Dr. McCracken was one of the first councilors in the organization of that body, and organized the Thirteenth District into that body, and organized the Thirteenth District into medical societies. For three years he served on the board of councilors, was the first president of the Palo Pinto County Medical Society, and was recently elected president of the Northwest District Medical Association. He is vice president of the State Medical Association. He is vice president of the State Medical Councilors to fill out the unexpired term. At the end of that term he was elected delegate to the American Medical Association. For six years Dr. McCracken was health officer of Palo Pinto county, resigning to accept the post of city health officer, in which capacity he still

In the public life of Mineral Wells and community Dr. McCracken has long been an active factor. Fraternally his membership is with the Knights of Pythias, and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, he is a deacon in the Presbyterian church, belongs to the Commercial Club of Mineral Wells, and to the Ex-Presidents' Medical Association of Texas. The doctor is a director in the First State Bank & Trust Company of Mineral Wells. His political support has always been given to the dominant party in Texas,

Dr. McCraeken's first marriage occurred in Wise county, May 17, 1859, when Miss Nottie Greenfield became his wife. Her parents were Captain J. W. and Matilda (Bogy) Greenfield, who came from Pine Bluff, Arkansas, and located at Willow Point in Wise county, Texas. Her father before the war was a planter and slave owner. Mrs. McCraeken died in November, 1892, and was followed by her only child seven weeks later. On October 15, 1895, the doctor was married to Miss Marie Sue Willson, a daughter of Thomas Jefferson and Maggie L. (Loving) Wilson. Her father was a native of Tennessee, and her mother was born in Texas, During the war Thomas J. Willson was a soldier on the Confederate side. Two sons and two daughters have been born to the second marriage of Dr. McCraeken. Margaret is thirteen years of age; Joseph Hill, Jr., aged eleven; Tom Willson, aged nime, and Mary Sue, aged four. The three older children are now in school.

CYRUS COFFIN BALLINGER is one of the representative business men of El Paso, who may also be termed one of its pioneers, having first become identified with this city some thirty years ago and having been a continuous resident of it during the last score of years. He is of French descent and was born January 19, 1859, near Greensborough, Guilford county, North Carolina. Yancey Ballinger, his father, deceased at Greensborough in 1891, when sixty-six years of age, also was a North Carolinian by birth and came of Quaker parentage. The latter was quite successful as a business man, was a stock dealer and large land owner, and at his death left a very comfortable estate to his children. Besides the heritage of a large plantation, which he still owns, Cyrus C, received from his father that practical business training that is an asset of even more value as capital than is money. During the Civil war Yancey Ballinger was a Union sympathizer, but he did not participate in the conflict, for while he was not a member of the Friends church he had been reared in its faith and still held to its belief regarding war. Naomi Coffin, who became his wife, was born in the same state and county as her husband and grew to womanhood on a farm less than a mile distant from that on which he was reared. She died in 1888, at the age of sixty-three years. Seven children were the issue of this union.

Cyrus C., the fourth in birth in this family, grew up at the paternal homestead and spent his youth assisting his father in his farm work and stock business. To the age of nineteen he was educated at Guilford College, in his native North Carolina county, which institution was under the auspices of the Friends denomination. He began life on his own account at the age of twenty when he and an older brother engaged in the business of distilling turpentine. They operated in Moore county, North Carolina, and were quite successful, but in 1884 Cyrus C. determined to pursue his fortunes in the newer state of Texas and at that time removed to El Paso, which then boasted a population of about five thousand people. For the first twenty-five months in the west he was in the employ of Coffin & Seaton, which firm was engaged in the grain business at El Paso; then he pushed farther west to New Mexico, where for six years he was engaged in the stock business, raising cattle and horses. He returned to El Paso from there in 1893 and opened the El Paso Livery and Sales Stables, which establishment he continued to own and operate for five years. On disposing of that property he engaged in the transfer business and was thus identified until 1911, when he once more entered the livery business and established the Palace Stables at 307 South Santa Fe street, of which he is the sole proprietor and which is the largest livery and sales barn in El Paso. Mr Ballinger has most legitimate claims to success; for his assets in making his way in life have been largely those of his own resources, the employment of an alert and shrewd business acumen and a large capacity for hard work. Politically he is a Republican and his religious belief is expressed by membership in the Presbyterian church.

The marriage of Mr. Ballinger took place in El Paso, Texas, February 26, 1899, and united him to Miss Phoene Wercklre, a native of Indiana and a daughter of John Frederick Wercklre. Mrs. Ballinger died Nov. 28, 1913. The family residence is at 1115 West Kansas street and their family circle includes four sons, Paul, Joseph, Philip and John, all of whom were born in El NUMA G. BUCHOZ. A prominent and long established real estate man of El Paso, Mr. Buchoz has been identified with this city in a successful and public spirited manner for many years, and is numbered among the citizens who have been instrumental in helping promote many projects for the upbuilding and progress of the community.

Mr. Buchoz, though born at Ann Arbor, Michigan, November 11, 1875, represents one of the oldest American families of the southwest. His mother, Marguerite R. Buchoz was born in Messilla, New Mexico, and his father, Alfred J. Buchoz, born in New York City, came to Texas as a post trader at Fort Davis in the very early days of western Texas, a number of years before any railroads or other evidence of civilization except a few military posts and a few range cattlemen had appeared in this western country. Alfred J. Buchoz was married while making his headquarters at Fort Davis, and after the marriage he returned east and located in Michigan. His death occurred at Las Cruces New Mexico, in 1895 when sixty years of age. The mother is still living in El Paso, being seventy-five years of age.

Mr. Numa G. Buchoz, who was the sixth in a family of eight children, was reared in the southwest, and attained most of his education at the A. & M. College at Messilla Park, New Mexico. He graduated from col lege in a general course in 1894, and as soon as he left sechool his active career began. He became deputy dis-trict clerk at Las Cruces, New Mexico, and held that office for two years. Subsequently he engaged in mercantile lines being employed with a store for a year, at the end of which time he came to El Paso to take charge of the Union Clothing Company's business. He was connected with that firm for a total period of seven years, and developed the store to be one of the largest and most popular in this city. On leaving this business he entered the customs service, as special deputy collector, and was identified with this branch of the Federal service for five years. At the end of that time he engaged in the real estate business with Mr. Schuster and Mr. Kinne. Their association has been productive of a large and prosperous business, and their firm is now regarded as in the front ranks of real estate companies in Western Texas. Their speciality is the handling of Mexican and Valley lands.

Mr. Buchoz in politics is a Republican, and is affiliated with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. He was married at El Paso, July 23, 1901, to Miss Alice Maple, who was born in Warrensburg, Missouri. Her father is now deceased, and her mother's name is Levina P. Maple. Mr. Buchoz has a large acquaintance over the western part of Texas and is a strong advocate of all movements for the development and improvement of this region.

As superintendent of the firm of J. O. Wyler. Baumgarten & Wyler, manufacturers of brass specialties, machine and boiler shop work, their plant at Virginia and Sixth Streets, Mr. Wyler is a fine type of the industrial worker and organizer, and has a record of business building in El Paso which is highly creditable.

John O. Wyler was born in Switzerland, May 23, 1867, a son of Otto and Carolina (Bosshart) Wyler, both natives of that country where they were married. The mother belonged to a very prominent old Swiss family, her grandfather having been a trusted officer under Emperor Napoleon, accompanied that great commander on his expedition to Moscow, and was sent back to France on an important mission. It was to this fact that he probably owed his life being spared from the terrific hardships of that campaign. Otto Wyler and wife came to America in 1880, locating first in Kansas City, where the father engaged in the boiler manufacturing business. His death occurred in Kansas City in 1898 when he was fifty-four years of age. The mother, who was born in 1844, was reared, educated and married in her native land, is still a hale and hearty woman, and makes her home with her son in El Paso. There were seven children in the family, four of them now deceased and the others are Mrs. Emma Gamble, a resident of Los Angeles, California, and Otto J. Wyler of Grants Park, Oregon.

Mr. Wyler, who was the oldest of the children, spent part of his youth in Switzerland, where he attended the schools, and after coming to America continued his eduscation at Palmers Academy in Kansas City, where he was graduated in 1882. In 1883 he went to work in the boiler shops of the Union Pacific Railway, and completed his apprenticeship in that trade in 1887. After working as a journeyman at various places he came to Texas in 1891, but in the following year returned to his old home in Kansas City. There he was employed by the Kansas Smelting & Refining Company for seven years, at the end of which time he returned to El Paso Texas and took charge of the Boiler Shop of the El Paso Foundry & Machine Company. He remained the Foreman of that shop for eleven years, and during this time the business of this department increased from twenty men to 150 men. Then in 1911 be decided to go into business for himself, and in that year he and Mr. J. F. Baumgarten invested their capital in the Union Iron & Brass Works, an enterprise which at that time was just about to become defunct. With the new energy and management of these two capable partners the company has been rapidly expanded, so that the staff of employes has been increased from five to twenty-five and they now have their business and themselves as well in a very prosperous condition.

Mr. Wyler is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, the Knights of Maccabees, and the Modern Woodmen of America. His politics is Independent. He is unmarried and makes his home with his mother in an attractive residence of their own. For his recreations he spends some time as opportunity permits in fishing and other outdoor diversions. He is one of El Paso's loyal citizens and sees a great future in store for this metropolis of the west.

IRA J. BUSH, M. D. Within the limits assigned for this sketch of the life of an active and eminent member of the medical profession, it will be impossible to give even a cursory notice of his many notable achievements or of the military episode of his life which would alone entitle him to a place among those who are making our present-day history. It must suffice to make allusion to those incidents of a long life and active eareer, which will afford an insight into the salient points of his rise from obscurity to a position of prominence among the professional men of the Southwest. Ira J. Bush, M. D., was born July 21, 1865, in Lawrence county, Mississippi, and is a son of Thomas D. and Emily (Price) Bush, the latter a member of the family which gave to the Confederacy that great soldier, Gen. Sterling Price. Thomas D. Bush was born in Mississippi, where he was reared and educated, and at the outbreak of the Civil war enlisted in the Confederate army, under Gen. Jackson. During a charge at Kenesaw Mountain, Mr. Bush, then a lad of a little over sixteen years, was severely wounded, and subsequently went to Port Hudson, where he was present during the siege and at the surrender. On the close of hostilities, he studied for the ministry and became a Baptist preacher, continuing as such for upwards of thirty years in Mississippi and then removing to Louisiana, dying in that State, at Lake Charles. His widow, who was born at Monticello, Mississippi, still survives, making her home at Louisiana and being sixty syears of age. They were the parente of ten children, of whom Dr. Bush was the eldest.

Ira J. Bush attended the public schools of his native State, following which he became a student in the University of Mississippi, and after leaving that institution attended Louisville (Kentucky) Medical College, where he received his degree with the class of 1890. At that time he entered into practice in Louisiana, but two years later came to Texas and settled at Pecos, where he remained until 1899. That year saw his advent in El Paso, which has since been the scene of his endeavors. These years, although comparatively few, have been long enough to place him in the lead among his professional brethren, and to manifest the beneficent influence which knowledge, guided by high motives, exerts upon the welfare of the community. He has been identified with every important movement which has interested the medical fraternity or concerned the public health, and in the meantime has built up a large professional business. As a close and careful student, alive to every advancement made in his profession, he values his membership in the El Paso County Medical Society, the Texas State Medical Society and the American Medical Association, and this membership is equally valued by his confreres, who have recognized in him a man who is representative of the best ethics of the science. At the outbreak of the recent Mexican Revolution, Dr. Bush's reputation having at tracted attention outside of the field of his practice, he was proffered and accepted the position of chief surgeon of the army of General Madero, who subsequently became president of the Mexican Republic and later met death at the hands of the troops under General Huerta. On the close of the revolution, Dr. Bush returned to El Paso, and has since devoted himself to the care of his large and ever-increasing private practice. He has long been a writer whose contributions have been eagerly sought by leading publications, and his articles have not been confined to medical subjects, for big game hunting, fishing, camping and out-of-door life, on all of which he is a recognized authority, have furnished him with themes for a number of interesting manuscripts. At the present time he is preparing an authoritative article relating to the Mexican Revolution. He has also been interested in investments in mines and lands in Texas and Arizona, and at the present time is president of a company owning an undeveloped gold, silver and copper mine in Mexico, for which he has been offered, and has refused, $300,000, by an Eastern capitalist. Dr. Bush has been too busy to enter the political arena, but has supported Democratic principles and candidates, and has has not been unmindful of the duties of citizenship. His fraternal connections are with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Knights of Pythias.

On December 20, 1908, Dr. Bush was married at El Paso, Texas, to Miss Bertha Henderson, who was born at Atlanta, Georgia, daughter of John and Jane Henderson, the former of whom is deceased, and the latter a resident of El Paso. Dr. and Mrs. Bush have no children.

JOHN VALENTINE. Now residing at his home in Fort Stockton at the age of eighty years, John Valentine is one of the venerable pioneers of Texas. His experience in this state begins with his service in the United States army before the Civil war, he was a Confederate soldier, and for years drove stage on the great stage route between San Antonio and El Paso. He is well known to all the old-timers, who were familiar with west Texas before the railroad era, and in his present home town he is one of the popular and esteemed citizens.

John Valentine was born in Germany, February 14, 1833, had his education in the public schools of that country, and then learned the baker's trade. At the age of sixteen he left home and came to the United States settling in New York City, which remained his home for about seven years and during that time he worked at his trade. He then enlisted in 1857 in the army, and during the first three years of his service was in New Mexico, after which in 1859 he came to Texas. When the Civil war broke out he enlisted in the Confederate army, went through the war as a soldier of the South, and was a participant in many campaigns and engagements and saw much hard service. He was wounded only once, and after the war be became a member of the San Antonio police force for about one year. He then took work as a stage driver on the mail route between San Antonio and El Paso, and drove the old mail coaches over the long trail of seven hundred miles day after day. After about a year he was made a station keeper for the stage line, being located at Leonholes, for about three years, after which he came to Fort Stockton as one of the early settlers about this old military post and settlement. Since then he has followed various lines of occupation, and for more than thirty years has been janitor of the courthouse at Fort Stockton. In 1911 he retired from business and is now living quietly at his home.

Mr. Valentine was married in Austin, Texas, June 6,

Mr. Valentine was married in Austin, Texas, June 6, 1574 to Maggie Wilcox, daughter of 0. W. Wilcox of Austin. Mrs. Valentine is one of the worthy Texas women and is the mother of a large family of sons and daughters, who do her credit for their careful training. The twelve children, five sons and seven daughters, are so follows: John W. and Thomas J., both deceased; Mary, wife of John Griffith: Edwin P., who is married; Maggie, wife of Thomas Pope; Lizzie, Alma, Maud, Ozwin W., all at home; Mrytle, wife of Peter Paul; and Sylvanus B. and Jewell Z., both at home. Mr. Valentine is a Catholic in religion and his wife belongs to the Christian church. He is a Democrat, but has taken no active part in political affairs.

HENRY CHANDLER CRIE. The publisher of the Lynn County News has been a Texan about as long as he remember, knows the country and its people and the fundamental activities of the state through long and active experience, and in the newspaper field has built up a successful business and is a factor of no small influence in his home county.

Henry Chandler Crie was born at St. Louis, Missouri, December 15, 1868, a son of Edward H. and Carrie Isabell (Griswold) Crie. His father was born in Portland, Maine, and his mother in Connecticut. After his marriage at Portland, the father came to Texas in 1877, and was followed by his wife and son in 1879. He first located at Fort Worth, where he was employed as a bookkeeper up to 1884, in which year he moved to Johnson county, and had his home there until five years ago, when, after his wife's death, he moved to Tahoka, and now lives retired with his son Henry. From 1884 to 1900 he was engaged in the sheep business in Johnson county, and then was made postmaster at Godley, an office he held until his removal to Taboka. During his earlier career, and while living in the state of Maine, he enlisted in the Seventeenth Regiment of Volunteer Infantry from that state, going out as a private, and at the end of four years service was mustered out as captain of Company 1. He went into the army when seventeen years of age, and is one of the honored veterans of the great struggle between the north and south. Of his three children, one died in infancy.

Henry C. Crie got his early education in the common schools, being eleven years of age when he came to Texas. He was with his father in the wool business until thirty-three years of age, and on leaving the farm spent two years working at the carpenter's trade, at Floydada, and then moved to Tahoka, his present home. Here he bought the local printing plant, and at once established the Lynn County News, the first issue of which came from the press June 2, 1965. It is a well edited local newspaper, supplying a medium for business advertising and news and comment on all matters of local concern, and its influence is for the upholding of everything connected with the progress and improvement of the community.

Mr. Crie adilitates with the Masonic Order, with Taboka Lodge No. 595, Knights of Pythias, with Taboka Lodge No. 653, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and also with the Rebekabs, with Camp No. 1306 of the Woodmen of the World. On June 12, 1890, Mr. Crie married Miss Mattie Julia Adair. The marriage ceremony was held in Bethany Church in Johnson county. Her five children are: Julia Lineonb, born March 9, 1891; James Griswold, born October 9, 1893; Elizabeth Harding, born May 20, 1896; Isabelle Sidney, born December 16, 1898; and Richard H., born March 22, 1901. Mrs. Crie is a daughter of flev, R. H. and Elizabeth (Harding) Adair. Her father, who came to Texas from Louisiana, was long a well known Methodist minister in Johnson

Samuel J. Brown. Among the merchants of Amarillo is one who has succeeded against heavy odds, but by years of hard work and the application of honest business methods Samel J. Brown has attained success. Although he is now one of the city officials of Amarillo, and has served as secretary and treasurer for many years, yet it is as a merchant that he made his success, and it is in the mercantile line that most of his life as a business man has been spent. Mr. Brown is one of the most popular men connected with the city government, for the lesson which he learned as a merchant, that honest dealing is the only way to handle any business, has given the people of the city the greatest confidence in him and in his ability.

Samuel J. Brown is descended from the early Scotchlrish settlers of the mountains of Virginia, that hardy race that settled in the ridges of the Alleghanies and along the Piedmont slope and during the Revolution formed the backbone of the fighting forces of the colonies. His father, Enoch I. Brown, was born in Virginia, and became a tailor by trade. He died in Virginia in 1865, at the age of fifty. He was a Whig previous to the war and after its close feat such that the previous to the war and after its close feat such that the previous to the war and after its close feat such that the contribution Smith, who was also a native of Virginia and a descendant of a long line of Virginia ancestors. Among her ancestors were the Calverts, a noted family in the early days of Virginia. Mrs. Brown died in the early fifties, leaving six children.

Samuel Brown was born in Rappahannock county, Virginia, on the 21st of July, 1848. He received his education in the schools of Virginia, attending until he was thirteen years of age. Then the Civil war effectually prevented any more schooling for a time, for schoolmasters had to take up the musket, and in many cases their pupils went with them to the front. Mr. Brown was among the youths who took up arms, and he was only thirteen years of age when he entered the service. He was inside the line scouting, etc., for two years in Mosby's territory, and was in the regular service under Mosby's command. After the war, at the age of seventeen, Samuel Brown went to work, for his father's death left him an orphan. He first went into farming on a small scale in his native state, but after five years under the discouraging conditions which prevailed after the war he gave up agriculture and removed to Missouri, where he settled in Mexico. There he began as a clerk in a mercantile establishment, working for the small sum of twenty-five dollars a month and his living

He spent two years in Mexico, but not finding any opportunity for advancement he, together with a friend, Jack Marshall, determined to try their fortunes else-where. In 1872 they set out on horseback for Texas. They made the entire journey in this way, and with the exception of the usual hardships to be encountered in such a wild country as Arkansas and Texas was at that time, they reached Grandbury, Texas, where they separated, with no adventures to recount. From Grandbury he went to Jefferson, Texas, to join an old comrade and schoolmate, J. C. Millan, and here took a steamboat bound for New Orleans. From that point he went up the Mississippi to St. Louis and thence to Mexico. Again becoming a clerk, this time in the employ of Callaway Harrison & Company, he followed that line of work until the fall of 1873, and then the attractions of Texas once more looming large before his eyes he determined to return to the state.

He located in Bell county, at Howard, and engaged in elerking for Pendleton & Embree. His homesickness for Missouri did not come over him again, and since that time he has considered Texas the finest state in the Union. After eight years spent in the employ of this firm he went into partnership with a younger brother, and borrowing enough money to buy stock they established a general mercantile business. They continued in this occupation until 1891, with a fair amount of success, and in that year Mr. Brown sold his interests and in June of that year came to Amarillo, Texas, where he again engaged in mercantile pursuits. He thus continued, with ever increasing success, until 1904, when his election as secretary and treasurer of the city forced him to give up his business in order to carry on the work of his fofice. He has filled this position with much success since that time, and to the entire satisfaction of the people.

Mr. Brown has always taken an active share in policies and civic affairs wherever he has been. He is a member of the Democratic party, and an active party worker. He has served on the school board of Amarillo and also as an alderman of the city. In fraternal affairs, too, he has taken a lively interest, and is a member of the Masons, belonging to the Chapter, the Commander in the Commandery and the Council, and is a past eminent commander in the Commandery and is also treasurer. For twenty years or more he has been a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

Mr. Brown married Miss Pauline A. Moore in Bell county, Texas, in 1878. She is a native of this commonwealth, born in Bell county, a daughter of the Hou. J. W. Moore, who was a very prominent member of the Bench of Bell county. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Brown. J. Kirby, the eldest, married Miss Orvill Berkley, a native of Texas, and they live in Amarillo. The other children are Daisy, Edna, May and Henry, all of whom were born in Texas.

Lynne P. Atmar. Among business men of east Texas few have accomplished more in so few years than Lynne P. Atmar of Groveton. Mr. Atmar, who is thirty-five years old, is president of the First National Bank, is an executive officer with several of the larger business and transportation corporations in his part of the state, and has a position in the business community which would be considered a handsome reward for almost a lifetime of patient and consecutive endeavor.

Lynne P. Atmar was born at Pennington, Texas, December 26, 1878. The first eighteen years of his life were spent in his native village, and while there attended the high school and coming to Groveton began his business career as a drug clerk for John R. Collins, During the three and a half years spent in the Collins store, he learned pharmacy and became a skilled prescription clerk. He gave up the drug business in 1901

to take the position of bookeeper with the Farmers & Merchants Bank, a private institution owned by Judge George W. Riddle of Dallas, Mr. Atmar soon proved his ability to Judge Riddle, was closely associated with that well known financier, and rapidly advanced from the position of a minor clerk to an executive official. The Farmers and Merchants Bank was nationalized as the First National Bank of Groveton on July 17, 1902, with a capital stock of twenty-five thousand dollars. The first officers were: Judge Riddle, president; A. B. Ives, vice president; L. R. Fife, eashier, and L. P. Atmar, assistant cashier. In September, 1903, Mr. Atmar was made cashier, and in 1906 became active vice president and cashier on the retirement of Mr. Ives. Mr. Atmar in 1908 was elected president, and the other officers were Hayne Nelms, vice president, and R. R. Robb, cashier. In 1908, after paying an annual dividend of ten per cent on the capital stock from the date of the charter, the surplus earnings were used to increase the capital to sixty-five thousand dollars. Since 1908, under the continued efficient management of Mr. Atmar, the bank has paid a twelve per cent dividend on the increased eapital. In 1901 the deposits aggregated thirteen thousand dollars; at the present time, twelve years later, the average deposits are three hundred and fifteen thousand dollars, while the bank has a surplus account of thirty-five thousand dollars and an undivided profit account of ten thousand dollars.

Besides his connection with the First National Bank of Groveton, Mr. Atmar helped Judge Riddle in promoting the Newton County Bank. He is vice president and treasurer of the Groveton, Lufkin and Northern Railway Company; he is treasurer of the Groveton Light and Ice Company, and president of the Groveton Telephone Company. He is also interested in agriculture, and has been the means of bringing under cultivation seven hundred acres of land adjacent to Groveton, and devotes his farm to the usual crops of this section. He has also erected several business houses in Groveton, and is closely identified with all the affairs of that community. He is a member of the finance committee for the handling of county bonds for the erection of a new courthouse and also of the road district bonds for district No. 1 in Groveton precinct. Mr. Atmar is unmarried, and fraternally is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and is a Baptist in church relations.

The father of the Groveton banker was the late Dr. Richard M. Atmar, who died at Groveton in 1898 at the age of sixty years. Dr. Atmar was a South Carolina man, grew up in that state, and in Mississippi, and came to his majority at Crockett, Texas. His literary education was liberal and he graduated in medicine from Tulane University. Throughout the war between the states he was in the Confederate service, was wounded in the battle of Valverde, New Mexico, and subsequently served with the surgical corps. He was in Col. D. A. Nunn's regiment, and throughout the war was in the Trans-Mississippi Department. All his active career was given to medicine, and his practice in Trinity county covers a period of thirty-five years. A Democrat, he was not active politically, had no ambition for political position or public honor, and did his duty to the world through his practice as a physician. He was a member of the Baptist church and a Master Mason. Dr. Atmar was married in Houston county, Texas, to Miss Laura Nelms, oldest daughter of Col. Thomas H. Nelms. Mrs. Atmar died March 22, 1895. The children were: Robert Nelms Atmar, of Westville, Texas, who is in charge of the West Lumber Company office at that place; Jessie, who married John R. Collins, and died at Groveton; Richard L., a dentist at Huntsville, Texas; Lynne P.; Dr. T. R. Atmar of Crockett; Miss Ninon, eashier of the Citizens Bank & Trust Company at Palacios, Texas; Mary, wife of W. C. Best, of Palacios; J. W., assistant cashier of the First National Bank of Groveton, and Mrs. Laura Ellis of

BRYANT ALLEN PLATT. For a period of over thirty years Mr. Platt has been closely identified with those activities which constitute the business and civic life of a community, and which in the aggregate have made Texas one of the most progressive sections of the great Lone Star State. Mr. Platt may well be termed one of the builders of his present home town of Groveton, since he was there when it was nothing more than a country, or rather a sawmill settlement, and has given his influence and energy to every subsequent phase of its improvement. He has been identified with the commercial life of the town since November 1, 1889, when he gave up sawmilling, which had been his vocation for seven up sawmining, which had been his createst years, and started selling goods. Mr. Platt came to Trinity county, on October 3, 1882, as a young married man, and following the trade of sawyer. He had been at Beaumont, where he was foreman of the Centennial mill. He began his lumber career there with that mill, and went up from a common laborer, at a dollar and a quarter a day to a foremanship which paid him one hundred and forty-one dollars per month.

When he came to Groveton he became sawyer of the mill of the Trinity County Lumber Company. In that capacity he sawed all the flooring which went into the present State Capitol at Austin. The contract embraced about a million feet of "riff-sawed" lumber, and other special dimension stuff, used in the construction of the state house.

When Mr. Platt came to Groveton the settlement comprised the mill shed, commissary, two boarding houses and a saloon. The townsite was simply "on the map, and pine trees were occupying what is now the main street of the little city. Some years later when he went into business for himself, there were several good stores, and he now has the distinction of being the oldest merchant in point of continuous service, and the only one left of his competitors twenty five years ago. He began doing business on the lot which his present store occupies, and his stock of goods was displayed in a twostory frame house. That was subsequently destroyed by and its wooden successor shared the same fate. In 1902 he erected a permanent brick building, one hundred and ten by thirty feet, and has continued with more than ordinary success as a general merchant.

His work has not been confined entirely to the prosecution of his private business affairs, and he has been equally a factor in promoting the town as a moral and prosperous center of population. He contributed to the building of all the churches to be found in Groveton, the school house, and has erected a number of residences. His own home is one of the best in Trinity county, and be owns a number of business places. Much of his surplus profits have gone into wild lands of Trinity county, and from year to year he has been opening up new farms. Several families now prospering have gratitude to Mr. Platt for his encouragement in furnishing wire and other goods and stock at a time when these families needed just that amount of material capital in order to realize and to make effective their ambitious endeavors. Mr. Platt is vice president of the First Na-tional Bank of Groveton. For many years he has been one of the moral forces, as well as a business leader. A prohibitionist, he led the forces against whiskey, and brought about local option throughout Trinity county. As a boy he was brought up under Methodist influence, and still gives his support to that church. He has membership in none of the fraternal orders, and in politics is a Democrat.

Bryant Allen Platt was born in Miller county, Georgia, April 17, 1859. His father was Francis Marion Platt, whose original home was at Colquitt, Georgia, and who died in Groveton, Texas, in 1901, at the age of sixty-six years. Grandfather Platt married Piddie Mosely, and their eleven children were: Anthony; Mary, who married James Mock, and died in Georgia; Lucy, who married Richard Mock, and died in Georgia; Mrs. Toliver, of Georgia; James, who was killed while in the Confederate army; Nancy, who married a Mr. Bush of Georgia; Frances M.; Gvillty, who married Charles Jaines of Appalachicola, Florida; W. W., of Blakely,

Georgia, and one that died unmarried.

Francis Marion Platt was born in Dooley county, Georgia, where all his active career was spent in merchandise. During the war between the states he was a Confederate soldier, and saw service from the beginning of the struggle to the end. He was of Scotch and Irish stock, the grandson of a native Irishman. Francis Marion Platt married Amelia B. Sheffield, a daughter of Bryant Allen Sheffield. She died in 1874 in Georgia, leaving two children: Bryant Allen, and Siddie S., wife of Dr. W. J. Stevenson of Groveton. Francis Marion Platt for his second wife married Caledonia Sheffield, whose children are Frank and Caledonia, the latter the wife of I. Friedman of Groveton. Mr. Platt for his third wife married Fredonia Singleton. The children by that union were: Hoyt, who died in Shrevcport, Louisiana, with a family; Beatrice, who married Sam Stein of Blakeley, Georgia; Mittie, who married Harry Stein of Colquitt, Georgia; and Sherry L., of Groveton, Texas.

Mr. B. A. Allen grew up in Georgia, and received a common school education, chiefly from the old "blne back" spelling book. When he was eighteen years old he left home and came to Texas to find employment and to make a practical beginning of a career which had subsequently led him to the positions of success. He first stopped at Crockett, where he spent two years as a clerk in a store, and then went to Beaumont, and became a day laborer in the Centennial mill. From that point his career has already been traced. Mr. Platt was married April 23, 1882, in Beaumont to Miss Felicia Miguesse, daughter of Louis Miguesse, a Frenchman. That family originated in New Iberia Parish, in Louis-iana, where her father was a sugar planter and slave owner. Mrs. Platte died in 1884, leaving one son, John Arthur, born April 17, 1884. He was given a liberal education in the Peacock School for Boys, took the law course in the University of Texas, having won first honors at the Peacock Military School, and has been in the active practice of law since 1904. He married in October, 1913, Miss Mand Dudley, a daughter of J. E. Q. Dudley. On June 25, 1885, Mr. B. A. Platt married Miss Maggie Jones, a daughter of David Jones, who came from Great Britain and was a native of Wales. The children of the second marriage are: May, wife of E. C. Chinn of Groveton; Hazel, a teacher in the Groveton high school, and a graduate of the Southwestern University at Georgetown, Texas.

HON. ARTHUR B. DUNCAN. In 1884, when northwest Texas was still the paradise of range cattlemen, with no railroad to bring in the small farmer and settler, Arthur B. Duncan was one of the pioneers in that section of the state, and with his family was the first settler in Floyd county. He has been there now for thirty years, since the spring of 1884, and there is perhaps no citizen more widely known and honored in that vicinity. His place in the popular regard is probably best evidenced in his position of county judge, with which he has been honored as often as he would accept.

Arthur B. Duncan is a native Texan, born in Hopkins county, August 12, 1862, the son of Dr. William B. and Elizabeth (Vaden) Duncan. The father, born in 1800, was a Virginian by birth, born in the town of Culpepper, was a virginian by birth, both in the town of chiepeper, the county seat of Culpepper county. He was a graduate from the Medical Department of the University of Pennsylvania at Philadelphia with the class of 1830, and was one of the old-time physicians. After graduating in medicine he came to Arkansas, where he practiced for fifteen years. In 1845 he moved to Texas, locating in Hopkins county, where he again took up and continued for many years the practice of medicine, and rendered many timely services in that capacity to the early settlers in that vicinity. He was one of the first regular physicians in Hopkins county, and remained there in practice for a number of years. After being retired for some years, in 1869, he removed to Grayson county. where he died in 1874 at the age of seventy-four years. The mother, who was born in Tennessee, came with her parents to Texas in 1849, her family locating in Hopkins county, where she was reared and educated and married. After the death of her husband in 1874, she went out to Hale county, where she was living at the time of her death in 1892, at the age of fifty-nine.

Judge Duncan, who was the fifth of nine children, during his early life attended the country schools of Hopkins and Grayson counties. On leaving his school hooks he took up practical work as a farmer and stock raiser in Grayson and Montague counties, work which be followed until 1884. In that year he moved to Floyd county, which was then, as already stated, a portion of the vast cattle range which extended from Fort Worth to El Paso. In 1900 he was first induced to praetermit his close attention to business and accept public service. He was nominated for judge of Floyd county and elected. At the end of the first term he was again nominated and elected, and served nine successive terms, until 1906, at which time he felt an obligation to retire. Then in 1912 he was again prevailed upon to take the place upon the Democratic ticket, and was elected county judge and is now filling that important office in Floyd county. After he left office in 1906 he became identified with the real estate and abstract business, in which he still continues. He owns the only complete abstract of land titles in the county.

Judge Duncan has always taken a lively interest in the welfare of Floyd county. He was president of the school board of Floydada from 1908 to 1912, at which time he resigned that position on account of his re-election as county judge. He was also vice president of the First National Bank of Floydada, but sold his interest, believing that he could not consistently continue as an officer and stockholder of the bank while judge of the county court. Judge Duncan is a Royal Arch and Knights Templar Mason, well known in the circles of the eraft, and has filled various official places in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. His religious membership is in the Church of Christ. In December, 1882, he was married to Miss Sarah K. Day in Montague ecounty. Her parents were Mathew and Sarah Day, both of whom were old settlers in Grayson county, Texas, and her mother is still living at the home of Judge Duncan. The ten children of the Judge and Mrs. Duncan are as follows: Silas E. Duncan, born in Montague county, Texas, is married, a resident of Floydada, and has three children; Mrs. Maude E. Hollum, born in Floyd county, is a resident of Jourdanton, Atascosa county, and the mother of three children; Mrs. Emma L. Watkins, born in Floyd county, has four chil dren and resides at Jourdanton, Texas; Mrs. Edith E. Pitts, born in Floyd county, lives in El Paso, and has two children; Mrs. Hope E. Hammond, born in Floyd county, is a resident at Floydada, and has one child. Mrs. Ruby E. Brown, born in Floyd county and now living at Floydada; Miss Mattie E. Duncan, born in Floydada, and attending the local high school; Arthur B. Duncan, Jr., is a Floydada native and attending the schools; Carroll V. Duncan and Mark W. Duncan, the two youngest of the family were born in Floydada and are both now in school.

Judge Duncan is what is known as a self-made man. He started out and for some years found the road somewhat rough and beset with obstacles. He had no one to thank for his early successes but himself, and has always evinced those qualities which produce success and esteem in this world. He has the faculty of making friends, and has a great number of loyal associates and followers. Through all the years of his residence in Floyd county and West Texas his conviction has been increasing that the permanent prosperity of the country rests upon solid ground. With the introduction of irrigation with appropriate diversifications in farming methods, and with the coming of the silo and the raising of high grade stock, all of which is a matter of only a few years, Floyd county and surrounding territory will become the garden spot of the southwest. Movements which must necessarily follow the above, and to which Judge Duncan has given his vigorous support, both in private and officially, are the promotion of good roads, better schools, establishment of social centers in rnral communities, the extension of rural free delivery routes, and every other enterprise which means greater wealth or comfort and the better welfare of the country.

ANDREW M. CAMPBELL. Now rated as one of the ablest attorneys of Trinity county, Mr. Campbell was thirty years ago a raw country youth, had little education, some experience as a cowboy in the west, and his chief qualifications were a certain fearlessness and a capacity for hard work both physical and intellectual. He has had a varied career, served as sheriff, as district attorney, and in his private profession has represented many important interests. He is now one of the leading men in his section of the state. Andrew M. Campbell was born in Colorado county, in the town of Columbus, Texas, September 5, 1859. His father was William L. Campbell, and his grandfather Andrew M. Campbell. The latter was born in Tennessee, was educated in college, and later gave his own children the advantages of a liberal education. He was a prominent man in Colorado county before the war, served as county judge, an office he held for many years previous to the war, and after the war moved to Galveston, where he was in the commission business as head of the firm of Campbell & Clough. Judge Campbell was a large planter, and owned a plantation in Horseshoe Bend of the Colorado River, adjoining the town of Columbus. After his removal to Galveston he made himself an influence in local affairs, and died during the seventies at the age of seventy-four. He was married in his native state to Miss Neely who died in Columbus, Texas. Her children were William L.; John D., who died at Columbus; Mrs. Cynthia Wright, who died in Colorado county; Debbie, who married Eb Matthews and died in Galveston; Robert M., who died in Newton county while county and district clerk; Mary J., who married George E. Clothier, a Presbyterian minister, and who spent her life in Galveston,

William L. Campbell, the father, was born in Tennessee, October 22, 1840, was liberally educated in the classics, graduated from Baylor University, and was admitted to the bar, but never practiced law. In 1866, he left Colorado county, and moved to Grimes county, where he taught school and for several years was county superintendent of schools. He owned a large farm, near Anderson, and died in that town February 13, 1912. He was a Methodist, but not prominent in church affairs. In politics, however, he was one of the men of his county, though of a reserved nature, and disposition which kept him in the rank and file until his services as a leader were actually needed and he then became in every sense a leader. He was a forceful speaker, and had great tactical ability in manipulating political forces and party affairs. Grimes county was for many years Republican, and he was one of the men who succeeded in converting the negro majority influence into a Demoeratic plurality. Upon the issues of the war, both he and his father had opposed secession. His father owned one of the largest slave plantations in Colorado county, and the war caused the loss of more than one hundred and fifty black laborers and household workers. During the war, William L. Campbell was captain and enrolling officer at Columbus, and his command did its most important service in looking up deserters. His brother John was a soldier in the Confederate ranks. William L, Campbell was a member of the Odd Fellows Order. He married Sarah J. Kelley, a daughter of William Kelley, who was of Irish stock, and a prominent farmer of Grimes country, when his daughter and Mr. Campbell were married, Mrs. Campbell died January 17, 1886, Her children were: Andrew M., Cynthia Lula, who married J. H. Service and died in Grimes country, Mary J., who married L. H. Barten, of Ablene, Texas; William L., of Ablene, Yanrison, of Abliene, Texas; William L., of Abuscata; Sallie, wife of R. S. five miles east of Anderson. As the oldest child in the family, his early education was considerably neglected, and his advantages were less liberal than those afforded to the younger members of the household. However, when he realized the deficiencies of his early training, he more than made up by individual application for those handicaps, and has long since put himself in the class of cultured and well-read men of large attainments. While still in his teens he went into west Texas, and his experience as a cowboy for the firm of Barry & Trant in Jones county from 1878 to 1879 tended to wear off the corners of a country youth. Returning to Grimes, Grant county, at the age of twenty he was appointed deputy sheriff, and it was while in that office that he applied himself with vigor to the study of both books appared minister with vigor to the study of noth moons, and men. He served four years as deputy sheriff, under Sheriff J. L. Scott, and was then elected justice of the peace for precious No. I of that county. In that connection he had the honor of being the first Democrat deceded after the Civil war. In the meantime he read elected after the Civil war. In the meantime he read law at Anderson, and was admitted to the bar in 1886. From that time forward his promotion to larger responsibilities was rapid. He was elected and served as county attorney for four years, and in 1900 was elected district attorney of the twelfth judicial district, comprising the counties of Grimes, Madisou, Leon, Walker and Trinity. His services as district attorney lasted for two terms, and he left office in 1904. Altogether he had served as prosecutor for a dozen years, and his service was at a time when crime and lawlessness were at a high tide in that district, and to his energetic work must be ascribed a large share of the credit for the restoration of law and order

As a Democrat Mr. Campbell has done considerable work in the interest of state candidates, and was a supporter of O. B. Colquitt for the governorship. Practurally he is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of the Maccahees, and is a member of the Methodist church,

In Grinos county, on November 15, 1886, Mr. Campbell married Miss Carrie Mclatyre. Jesse Mclatyre, her father, came to Texas from North Carolina, was a Confederate soldier, and later a large farmer and merchant at Roan's Prairie in Grimes county. Mr. Mclatyre married Caroline Lindley, and their children were: Mattle, who married S. H. Garvin, and lives in Navasota; William S, of Roan's Prairie; J. R., of Madisonville, Texas; Mrs. Campbell; Ada, who married George T. Morse of Houston; Florence, who married Hammond Norwood of Houston; Florence, who married are Moreson. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Campbell are: Rogers Mills, who died in infancy; Grace, a graduate of Ursuline Convent at Galveston; Jessie, Leone and Pauline.

ISAAC N. PARKER. A prominent merchant at Trinity, where he has resided since 1889, Isaac N. Parker is one of the few active Texans who can claim the honor of being a native son of the old Texas Republic. He has had a long and active career, was a soldier in the Confederate army four years, has been a farmer and merchant, and as a result of hard work has accumulated the means of prosperity and competence.

Isaac N. Parker was born within three miles of Huntsville, April 10, 1841, and reared in Walker county. His education was finished when he was sixteen years old at Austin College, and when he left school he applied himself to the occupations of the farm, and also had his full share of useful enjoyment in hunting, fishing and frolicing. When the war broke out he was twenty years old. He enlisted in Company D of the Fifth Infantry in Hood's Texas Brigade, under Capt. Mike Powell, who was afterward promoted to colonel. His regiment was sent on to Richmond, Virginia, and his first fight was with a part of Lee's army at Yorktown in the Peninsular campaign. He was in the Seven Day Battle, the second battle of Manassas, Antietam, Gettysburg, Chickamauga, was wounded at Chickamauga and at Gettysburg, and all told his service comprised twentyseven battles. While on a scout in east Tennessee at Morristown, he was captured, spent thirty days in the jail at Knoxville, and was then sent to Camp Chase in Ohio, where he remained ten months and ten days as a prisoner, and was then paroled. While on parole General Lee sur-rendered. From the time he left his old home in Texas in 1861 until September, 1865, he did not return, and no man saw longer service in the southern army.

After the war, when he got back to Texas, there was nothing open in the way of a vocation except farming, and he took up that work in real earnest. He followed it for ten years, and then engaged in merchandising at Dodge, Texas. His beginning was on a small scale, and from Dodge he went to Riverside, where he spent five years, and in 1899 came to Trinity. In Trinity he huilt a store, and has since been a merchant with a growing trade in that center. His career as a merchant has been continuous since 1876. Mr. Parker has never allowed his name to be placed on a ticket as a candidate for public office, though he is a loyal Democrat, and one of the strongest advocates and workers for prohibition in the county. He belongs to the Methodist church, and affiliates with the Masonic Order.

Mr. Parker is a son of Jesse Parker, who came to Texas in 1833 from Louisiana, lived for a time on the Sabine River in east Texas, and subsequently settled on the farm where his son Isaac was born in Walker county, in 1836. He lived there until his death in 1849. He was probably born in Georgia, and he was twice married. His first children were: Sarah, who married James Schrier and who lived in Atascosa county, and died there; Matthew spent his career in Matagorda, Texas; Wiley died in Walker county; Elizabeth, married Phil Coe, and died in Gonzales county. The second wife of Jesse Parker, and the mother of Issac N., was Elizabeth Barker, who died in Huntsville, at the age of eighty-six. Her children were: Jesse, who died during the war as a Confederate soldier; Eliza, who married Richard Plummer, and died in Walker county in 1866; Mary Ann, whose first husband was Andy Cox, and her second was Richard Berry, and he died in Huntsville; Rebecca, who married Marion Brown of Dodge, Texas; Naney, who married Daniel B. McMillan, and lives at Riverside, Texas; Isaac N., and David, who died at Huntsville, leaving a family.

Mr. Isaac N. Parker was married in Walker county,
December 24, 1867, to Miss Mary C. Ashley, a daughter of Edmund Ashley, who came from Alabama just before the war. Mrs. Parker died in Trinity, leaving the folthe war. Ars. Parker ded in Trimity, nearly the lowing children: Edmund C., of Roseburg, Texas, who married Lillian Lane; Frank P., a merchant of Trimity, who married; Robert I., who died in young manhood; Roberta, who died at the age of fourteen in 1889; and Jesse P., who died when a young man. In October, 1905. Mr. Parker married for his second wife Miss Lucinda C. Palmer, a daughter of William Palmer. Be-fore her marriage Mrs. Parker was for sixteen years employed in the Parker store of Trinity.

WILLIAM H. BRADLEY. One of the leaders in business enterprise at Trinity is William H. Bradley, who since locating in that center of population and industry in October, 1911, has been identified with the real estate, hotel and banking business. His home has been in Trinity county since January, 1886.

Mr. Bradley came from Troy, Alabama, where he was born October 15, 1876. He was thus ten years of age when the family located in Texas. His father, Andrew J. Bradley, a farmer of Pennington, Trinity county, was born in 1851, in Pike county, Alabama, and who married Sophronia Wilson, a farmer. The children of Andrew J. Bradley and wife are: William H.; Laura, wife of John W. Lewis of Batson, Texas; and Emma, wife of John W. Lewis of Batson, 1928s; and Emma, who married Osear Jordan of Batson. The Bradleys came originally from Ireland, settling in Abbeville district of South Carolina, and from that locality Grandfather Henry M. Bradley moved to Alabama. Grandfather Bradley married Mary Cowart, and Andrew J. was one of seven children, all of whom came out to Texas, and located in Trinity and Houston counties.

William H. Bradley was brought up on a small farm in Trinity county, and had only a common school education as his preparation for a business career. Leaving home at the age of sixteen he began the study of law at Groveton with the firm of Bean & Nelms, continuing his reading for several years. Other affairs have attracted him rather than the law, and has never formally entered the profession. In 1900 he was appointed postmaster of Groveton by President McKinley as the successor of A. M. Stevenson. His service as postmaster continued for twelve years, and he resigned to engage in business. On coming to Trinity Mr. Bradley opened and conducted as proprietor for two years the Gibson Hotel, and then turned all his attention to the real estate business. 1912 he became an officer of the Southwest Company, heing secretary and treasurer of this well known real estate concern, the other members of which are Hayne Nelms of Groveton and J. D. Freeman of Trinity. It is the purpose of this company to promote immigration, and the settlement of the "cut-over" lands and other lands in this vicinity. They own or control several hundred thousand acres in various counties of east Texas. Mr. Bradley is one of the directors of the First National Bank of Groveton.

Politically he has always been a Republican, is county chairman of his party in Trinity county, has attended a number of state conventions, and in 1904 was a delegate to the Chicago National Convention which nominated gate to the Cheago National convention which nonlinated Roosevelt. Fraternally he is a Royal Arch Mason and a member of the Methodist church. Mr. Bradley was mar-ried in Trinity county, July 23, 1901, to Miss Lulu Magee, a daughter of Abe Magee, an old pioneer settler of this county. Mr. and Mrs. Bradley have no children.

ROBERT ELMER MINTON. As a lawyer Mr. Minton is one of the ablest in southeast Texas, and associated with R. O. Kenley in the firm of Kenley & Minton, representing some of the largest financial and industrial interests in Trinity county and vicinity. Mr. Minton took the har examination at Austin in 1906, and at once located for practice at Groveton. From the beginning their practice has been of an important character. The first case in which he was an attorney was for the prosecution of a claim for some heirs. The firm have represented the Southern Pine Lumber Company, the Trinity County Lumber Company, the Thompson Brothers Lumber Company, The Groveton, Lufkin & Northern Railroad Company, the Texas Southeastern Railroad Company, and the Beaumont & Great Northern Railroad Company.

Robert Elmer Minton was born in Sabine county,

Texas, October 8, 1878, a son of William Henry Minton, and a grandson of William Minton. William Minton came from Troy, South Carolina, the family having owned the land on which that town was built. William Minton when about forty years of age married a Miss Wolam, a sister of "Uncly" Johnny Wolam, the famous pioneer Methodist preacher who came to Texas in 1836 as a missionary, and spent his life in east Texas, was at one time chaplain of the Huntsville prison, and died at Crockett in 1891. William Minton and wife had the following children: James, a Confederate soldier, who died at Corsicana, about 1885, leaving no children; William Henry; John P., of Nacogdoches; Francis M., of Alto; Thomas, of Sabine county; Martha B., who married Frank Errington, and lives in Sabine county; and Beauregard of Sabine county.

William Henry Minton, who has been a farmer all his life, came to Texas from Shelby county Tennessee in 1859. He was born in Tennessee in November, 1849, and has thus lived in Texas since he was ten years of age. The family first settled near San Augustine where Grandfather William Minton was a shoemaker. The Grandfather died in 1878, having been born about the beginning of the century. William Minton is a Democrat, has seldom left the quiet activities of the farm for public affairs but held the office of county commissioner and is a deacon in the Baptist church. He was married in Sabine county in 1875 to Miss Cena Maddox. Her parents were John J. and Rebecca (Reeves) Maddox. Her father was a farmer and came to Texas from Alabama and had given service with the rank of Captain in the Confederate army. William H. Minton and wife had the following children: John William, a lawyer in Sabine county, who married Florence Dean; Robert E.; Sallie, wife of Austin Mason, of San Augustine county; Roscoe Henry, of Sabine county, who married Miss Corrie Arnold; J. M., of Houston; Protis. of Houston; and Vivian, who married a Mr. Buttler.

Robert E. Minton spent his boyhood near Geneva,

Texas, on the farm, and after the local schools was a student in the Geneva high school. One summer was spent in Baylor University, and a year in the law department of Texas University. His self-supporting career began as a school teacher in the country of Sabine county, where he worked three years in the school room, and for two years was at Pennington and two years in the city schools of Groveton. His ambition was definitely centered upon the law, and in 1905 he left the school room, and prepared himself for the examinations which he successfully passed in the following year. As already noted his career in the law has been one of exceptional success. One of the most noted cases in which he and his partner have been identified was the suit brought by the Consolidated Louisiana & Texas Lumber Company, against the Southern Pine Lumber Company. This was a case in the federal court jurisdic-tion, and involved a claim of nine hundred thousand dollars damages, for the removal of timber by the Southern Pine Lumber Company from a league of land, which the plaintiff claimed to own. The case went to the federal court, Mr. Minton being one of the active attorneys throughout, and at the end a judgment of fifteen thousand dollars was handed down in lieu of the nine hundred thousand dollars which had been claimed. The award is still pending on appeal before the circuit court of New Orleans. Various other suits involving title and important values in civil cases have absorbed much of Mr. Minton's time and ability in the district courts. He practices before the supreme court, having been admitted to that court at the same time as to the lower courts. Mr. Minton is one of the stockholders of the Guaranty State Bank, and represents it as attorney. He has general supervision of the sale and settlement of the "cut-over" land of the Southern Pine Lumber Company. These lands are being advertised and settlers from northern and eastern states are rapidly taking possession and converting the original site of this pine forest into productive fields. Mr. Minton is a Democrat, but has avoided all practical polities. He is affiliated with the Knights of the Maccabees, and an active worker in church and Sunday school. He is a deacon of the Groveton Baptist church, superintendent of the Sunday schools, and of the men's bible class, and inter-denominational class for the study of the bible, has been a delegate to Baptist associations, and was clerk of the Sabine County Association at one time.

Mr. Minton was married at Groveton in February, 1905, to Miss Lucy Kenley, a daughter of George Whitehead Kenley. Mr. and Mrs. Minton have three children:

Robert E., Rachael and Marjorie.

George Whitehead Kenley, father of Mrs. Minton, was born at San Augustine, Texas, September 28, 1841. father, Thomas H. Keuley, founded the family in Trinity county from San Augustine county. He was born in Kentucky about 1813, and died near Old Sumter, in Trinity county, in 1871. A man of ordinary education, he spent his life as a farmer, was honored with the office of sheriff of Trinity county, and held that position at the time of his death. He was an early settler of Texas and went out from San Augustine county as a soldier for the Mexican war, being with General Taylor's army. He was a Democrat, a Methodist, and a Master Mason. By his marriage to Elizabeth Potts of Kentucky, he had the following children: Rachael, who first married a Mr. Hallmark, and later Mr. Morgan, and had children by both unions; George Whitehead; Mary J., who married Daniel Murphy, and lived in Cherokee county; Philip D., of Coleman county; Thomas H., of Henderson county; Lucinda, who married Coleman Ashworth, and spent her life in Trinity and Montgomery counties.

George Whitehead Kenley grew up with only a limited education, and his career was spent as a farmer. He came to Trinity county about 1849, settling near Old Sumpter, where he married and later lived on East Prairie and Nogales Prairie. During the war he entered the Confederate army, saw a great deal of service but was never wounded or captured. Later he was affiliated with the United Confederate Veterans. As a Democrat in polities be succeeded his father to the office of sheriff of Trinity county. He was very successful as a farmer, and did a great deal for his children, whom he educated and prepared for successful careers as teachers and workers in the world. He was married on March 4, 1869, to Paralee Chandler. Her father, Carroll T. Chandler, came to Texas from Perry county, Alabama, first settling in Cherokee county, where he was a farmer. He died while a Confederate soldier in the fall of 1861. His wife, whose maiden name was Amanda Welch of Perry county, Alabama, subsequently married a Mr. Duncan, who soon died, and she passed away May 19, 1913, when almost eighty-two years of age. Her children were: Mrs. Ken-ley, born January 29, 1852; Sarah J., who first married Dennis Young, and second Jo Lester, and died in Angelina county, Texas, in 1910; Richard, who was a farmer of Trinity county, and died during the nineties, leaving children: Joseph, who died in Trinity county in 1902, and left six children; Thena, who married Charles Warner, and died in Trinity county with four children.

The children of George Whitehead Kenley and wife were: Carrol H.; Samuel F., of Mertzon, Texas, who married Donna Womack; Richard Oscar, of Los Angeles, a former partner in law with Mr. Minton, and who married Leona Womack; Fannie, who married Dr. Newton McLendon of Groveton; Minnie, who married C. D. Poe of Groveton; Jonie, wife of John Clark of Houston county; Lucy, who married R. E. Minton; David Crockett, chief engineer of the Diball Lumber Company; Polk, a teacher at Buna, in Jasper county. The father of these children. George Whitchead Kenley, died November 6, 1905. He was a member of the Christian church, a Mason, and a man of useful life and influence in his community. He moved to Groveton in 1903, and in that town educated his younger children.

THOMAS JEFFERSON NORTH. Although a resident of the state of Texas for a few years only, Judge Thomas Jefferson North has won a name and triends for himself. He is one of the most successful attorneys in Seymonr, Texas, and since he has been elected county judge he has proved as successful on the bench as he was the bar. Judge North is one of the younger members of the legal fraternity in this section and he is looked upon by the more experienced lawyers as a man with a brilliant future before him, for he not only has natural ability and a fine education, but he is also painstaking and industrious.

Judge North was born in Bell county, Kentucky, on the 21st of June, 1877. He went to school in his native state and after completing the course offered by the public schools he taught school in order to earn the funds to continue his education. He received his collegiate course at the University of Kentucky in Lexington, Kentucky, and after leaving college he located in Stanford, Kentucky, where he began the practice of law. After a year in this locality he came to Texas, arriving in the latter state in August, 1905. He first located in Fannin county. After practicing his profession here for a few months he came to Seymour and established an office here. This was in 1906 and in July of the same year, so favorably were the people of this county impressed with his personality and his work, he was nominated and elected county attorney. After serving for six years in this office he was elected county judge. This took place in the fall of 1912 and he is at present filling this office.

In polities Judge North is a member of the Democratic party and takes an active interest in the affairs of his party, being one of the leaders in this section. He is a member of the Christian church and is active in church work, being at present an elder and a teacher in the Sunday school. In the fraternal world Judge North is a member of the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Rebeccas.

On the 23d of December, 1909, Judge North was married to Miss Nancy Naomi Stevenson, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Stevenson, of Lexington, Kentucky.

Judge North has become as true a lover of Texas as any of her native sons. He takes an active part in every movement which tends to the betterment of conditions in Seymour and to the improvement of the state in general. He says that it seems to him that the climatic conditions, the thrifty class of people who form the majority of the citizens, and the varied business opportunities will make Texas one of the best states in the Union. In his opinion Texas has greater opportunities and more resources than any other section of the United States.

STEPHEN J. TREADWELL. After a long service as tax collector of Angelina county Mr. Treadwell is now busied with his varied property interests at Lafkin, and to some extent is a farmer in this vicinity. Mr. Treadwell comes of an old family of east Texas, and three generations of the name have been actively identified with the professional and commercial and military activities of

in the hope of the decimal was born at Retrieve in Angelina courty, Toxas, October 6, 1861, and grew up at the village of Huntington, being educated largely in the country schools. His father, Richard LeRoy Treadwell, died while on duty at Tyler, in 1862, as one of Captain Anderson's company of Confederate soldiers. At that time he was twenty-six years of age. Born in Cherokee county, Alabama, he came to Texas in 1856, with father, Stephen Treadwell, who settled near Huntington in Angelina county. Grandfather Stephen Treadwell was born in Georgia in 1810, got a fair education, and after the war taught school for some time near Huntington. His death occurred there in 1892. He was a Democrat, and quite active in local affairs. From 1872 to 1876 he served in the office of county clerk. His church was the Baptist, and he was a close observer of church rules and took pains to criticise the brethren who violated their pledge to the church. He used no stimulants or marcotics, and prided himself on these virtues. Stephen Treadwell first married Miss Faith Jordan, who died in Alabama. Her children were: Richard Lefkoy; Martha, who married Frank Neyland, in the contract of the contr

Richard LoRoy Treadwell spent his brief life as a framer in Angelina county, where he married Sarah E. Morgan, a daughter of Jack Morgan, who came from Cherokee county, Alabama, though a Georgian by birth, and located in Texas in 1855. His death occurred in Red River county of this state in 1873. Mrs. Sarah Treadwell was born in Cherokee county, Alabama, in 1842. Richard and Sarah Treadwell had only two children, the dder being Stephen J. and the younger

Mary, wife of I. D. Clark, of Burke.

Stephen J. Treadwell finished a five-year period of teaching at Burke in Angelina county, and then took up merchandising in that village, a vocation which he followed for ten years and thus laid the basis for his material prosperity.

While living at Burke the citizens honored him with election to the office of justice of the peace and county commissioner, and he served the county in that capacity for about two years. In 1900 came his election as tax collector. Up to that time the duties of tax collector had been performed as a joint office, and Mr. Treadwell was the first to be elected to the distinctive office of tax collector. His service was in the highest degree receivable, and efficient, and no letter proof of this is expected to the distinctive of the second of the

His political affiliations have always been with the dominant party, and he has occasionally attended judicial, congressional or state conventions on the delegations from Angelina county. He was a Hogg partisan in the historic convention of 1892, when the convention was disrupted and two Democratic candidates were placed before the people for the office of governor.

In Lufkin, September 6, 1885, was solemnized the marriage of Stephen J. Tractwell and Miss Mollie Robb, a daughter of E. L. Robb, and a sister of Judge E. B. Robb, who has rendered much and valuable public service to Angelian country. EUGENE W, COPLEY. A successful business man, formerly one of the leading lumber dealers of Dallas. Mr. Copley in recent years has become best known as a practical scientist, a noted collector of wild animals, a taxidermist, and as proprietor of the popular Jungle-land, an institution which is probably known to every etizen of Dallas and has a reputation throughout the territory of which Dallas is the metropolis. Mr. Copley has been a lover and devoted student of the animal kingdom since he was a boy and after attaining to reasonable degree of success in business, permitted himself the happy privilege of giving all his attention to the scientific bent of his nature.

Born in 1878 in Missouri, Mr. Copley's parents, John M. and Corie M. (Billington) Copley, came to Texas in 1880, locating at Denton, in Denton country, where the father was a lawyer for many years. Reared in Denton county, Engene W. Copley attended the public schools and manifested strong inclinations for the life outdoors. It was his disposition to find his most stimulating lessons in the life of the field and woods rather than in the dry hooks of the schoolroom. These tastes led him to take up the study under Professor William T. Hornaday, then a resident of Oklahoma City, but now distinguished as one of the greatest naturalists of America and director of the Broax Park Zoological Gardens of New York City, Professor Hornaday was also one of the originators of the National Musseum at Washington, D. C.

In 1903 Mr. Copley moved from Denton to Dallas, and in 1906 founded the Groves-Copley Lumber Company, of which he was vice-president and manager. The yards of this establishment were at Tenth and Laneaster Streets in Oak Cliff. In March, 1909, Mr. Copley retired from the business, after a successful career in which he had developed the company to large proportions and during which time he had ereted a number of fine residences in Dallas and Oak Cliff.

In the meantime he had been busy, so far as business allowed, in gathering a splendid collection of birds, fish and reptiles and all manner of wild animals, as the nucleus for his musenm. Beginning with his studies under Professor Hornaday he had become an expert taxidermist and on retiring from business he founded a museum at Dallas for the benefit of the public. This museum was first located in Oak Cliff, but subsequently has been moved to Elm Street in Dallas. The Copley collection is without doubt the largest of its kind in the south, and comprises not only live wild animals, but also large numbers of mounted specimens, including hundreds of wild animals, birds, fish and reptiles, Mr. Copley maintains four traveling shows, which travel throughout the south and comprise mostly the trained wild animals which he has gathered together. These traveling collections are used principally for educational purposes, being useful to the schools in demonstrating their natural history work.

Mr. Copley was married in 1902 to Miss Maud Evelyn Connor, a daughter of John A. Connor of Dallas. Their two children are Evelyn Eugenia and Helen. The Copley residence is at 3061/2 N. Akard Street.

JOHN SHERWOOD FANNIN. Though established in the practice of law in Dallas but a comparatively brief time, it has been the good fortune of John Sherwool Fannin to secure more than ordinary prominence and position in his profession, and his name is well established in professional circles in the Dallas County Bar, as well as in adjoining counties and North Texas, as the result of his activities thus far. He has conducted practice in Dallas since 1909, both independently and with partners, and is now a member of the firm of Fannin & Young.

blood, located in the Wilson Building, this city.

Born in Chaffield, Navarro county, Texas, on April 2, 1876, Mr. Fannin is a son of D. H. and Victoria (Alams) Fannin, of Alabama. He received his celucation in the public schools, his high school course being followed by attendance at the Southern University at Huntington, Temnessee, and also later at the Terrell University. Terrell, Texas. Mr. Fannin also taught school four school yelrs in Alabama, beginning at the early age of sixteen, and continuing until the age of twenty, when he returned to Texas, and in 1899 he located at Dallas, establishing thinself in the offices of Coke & Coke, attorneys of this city, and under their guidance resumed his study of law, supplementing his work there with eighteen months' attendance at the Dallas Law School. Mr. Fannin did not actively engage in the practice of law until on March 30, 1909, when he was admitted to the bar, and about November 1, 1911, he established the firm of Fannin, Underwood & Youngblood, but about August, 1912, Mr. Underwood withdrew and the firm became Fannin & Youngblood and has conducted one of the most successful partnerships known to the city. Mr. Fannin has handled some of the big cases in this county, as well as some in adjoining counties, since he became established in the profession, and in 1912 was leading counsel for the defense in the noted murder trial of the State vs. Bob Davis. This case attracted wide attention in the state because of prominence of the principals and was especially interesting to Dallas people. In February, 1908, Mr. Fannin was married to Miss Belle Brunson, În February. the daughter of H. D. Brunson, of Alabama, and they have one child, a boy born January 9, 1909.

It may be said here that the Fannins are a noted Texas family, and men of the same name have held many city and state political positions. D. H. Fannin, the father of the Dallas lawyer, fought in all the principal battles of the Civil War, such as Getrysburg, Nashville, Lookout Mountain, Missionary Ridge and was a member of Hood's

Texas Brigade.

J. H. PICKRELL. In the development and upbuilding of an important financial and fiduciary institution which was the first of its kind in the state of Texas, Mr. Pickrell has been the dominating force and he has witnessed the upbuilding of a substantial and constantly expanding business on the part of the corporation of which he is vice-president and general manager and which was organized in the face of strong opposition on the part of those identified with institutions with which it might possibly come into competition, as well as by others who were skeptical concerning the demand for or legitimacy of its functions. It has been a source of great satisfaction to Mr. Pickrell to prove to such opponents, through means of practical and unequivocal demonstration, that the Dallas Title & Guarantee Company has fully justified his determined confidence and faith and become a greatly valued acquisition to the financial and general business enterprise of northern Texas, as well as one of the important concerns of the thriving commercial and industrial city in which its headquarters are maintained. He is one of the most progressive and public-spirited citizens of Dallas, is a representative member of the bar of this section of the state, and has gained impregnable vantage-ground in popular confidence and esteem. In every respect is he specially entitled to specific recognition in this History of Texas and Texans.

J. H. Pickrell, vice-president and manager of the Dallas Title & Guarantee Company, which has well appointed offices at 1101 Main street, claims the fine old state of South Carolina as the place of his nativity and is a scion of staunch southern stock. He was born in Pickens county, South Carolina, in 1866, and is a son of William R, and Ella (McMaster) Pickrell, both of whom were likewise natives of that commonwealth and representatives of families that were there founded in an early day. In 1869 William R, Pickrell came with his family to Texas and numbered himself among the pioneers of Wise county, where he engaged in farming and stock growing and contributed his due quota to civic and industrial development and progress.

The public schools of Decatur, judicial center of Wisconnty, Texas, afforded J. H. Pickrell his early educational advantages, and he is thoroughly and insistently a Texan in spirit and breeding, as he was a child of but three years at the time of the family immigration to the Lone Star state. That he made good use of his scholarite opportunities is shown by the fact that when but eighteen years of age he gave effective service as temporary principal of the Decatur high school, in which he himself had been graduated a short time previously. In pursuance of higher academic studies he entered Mansfield College, at Mansfield, Tarrant country, where he was a student during the regime of Professor John Collier as executive head of the institution. In furtherance of his educational work he finally was matriculated in the normal university, at Lebanon, Ohio, in which he was graduated as a member of the class of 1887 and was graduated as a member of the class of 1887 and ence and Civil Engineer. Having in the meanwhile determined to enter the legal profession, he availed himself of the advantages of the law department of the University of Texas, at Austin, as well as of effective private preceptorship, and in 1890 he proved himself eligible for and was admitted to the Texas bar, at Decatur, the capital of his home county. In 1893 Mr. Pickrell established his residence in the city of Dallas, where he became identified with the representative law firm of Leake, Henry & Reeves. Early in his professional career he began to give special attention to real-estate law, and in this field of practice he gained wide experience and definite precedence. His activities along this line led to his promotion of a business enterprise for which he discerned a definite necessity, and in 1902 he effected the organization and incorporation of the North Texas Land Title Company, of which he became vice-president and general man ager. Through careful, discriminating and legitimate means he made this corporation a medium for important functions, in the identification, verifying and guaranteeing of land titles throughout the various counties in the northern part of the state, and since the consolidation of the business with that of the Dallas Title & Guarantee Company, in August, 1906, the functions of the concern have been still further vitalized and expanded, the while he has continued to serve with marked ability as vicepresident and general manager of the consolidated institution, which is one of the largest and most important of its kind in Texas, even as it was the first of the kind to be organized in the state. There has been an unqualified popular approval of its functions and management and the enterprise has become one of farreaching and benignant influence in connection with industrial and business activities that form the basis of generic progress and prosperity in this section of the great state of Texas, the success which has attended its operations having most effectually silenced the objections and skepticism which attended its projection and organization. Mr. Pickrell is also a member of the directorate of the Dallas Trust & Savings Bank, and other of the staunch institutions of the metropolis of northern Texas, and he is the owner of valuable realty in his home city and county, the while he has at all times stood foremost in the ranks of loyal and liberal citizens whose public spirit has been shown in definite action. He has largely withdrawn from the practice of his profession, owing to the exigent demands placed upon him by his other important interests. His political allegiance is given to the Democratic party, but he has manifested naught of predilection for the honors or emoluments of public office. Mr. Pickrell has not identified himself with clubs or fraternal organizations, but he gained to himself a host of friends and is a popular factor in the business and social life of Dallas, his attractive home being at the corner of St. John's drive and Lexington avenue, in the beautiful Highland Park district of Dallas.

How, WILLIAM B. LEWIS. It is not a light function to describe justly or adequately the life of a man who has had an active and eminently busy career, and who has attained to a position of high relative distinction in the community in which his interests are located. Yet biography finds its most complete justification in the tracing and recording of such a life history, for if history teaches by example, the lessons inculcated by biography must be still more impressive. We see exhibited in the varieties of human character, under different circumstances, something to instruct us in our duty, and to encourage our efforts, under every emergency. There is perhaps no concurrence of events which produce this effect more certainly, than the steps by which distinction has been acquired through the unaided efforts of youth control of the county, and superintendent of public schools of Pilainiven, Yeass.

Judge Lewis was born in Limestone county, Texas, March 20, 1876, and is a son of Henry H. and Mary J. (George) Lewis. The paternal grandfather, Benjamin Lewis, was the founder of the family in America, coming from Ireland during the early part of the nineteenth century and settling in Virginia, where he became a successful planter. Subsequently, he moved to Alabama and in 1854 came to Texas, where the remaining years of his life were spent. Henry H. Lewis was born in Alabama, and was still a youth when brought to Texas, Settling in Limestone county, he was reared on his father's ranch, being thoroughly trained in all matters which are desirable for the successful stockraiser and farmer to know. At the outbreak of the war between the South and the North he enlisted in the Confederate army, and as a private participated in a num-ber of fiercely contested engagements, among them Lookout Mountain, but was never wounded. Near the close of the war, however, he was taken prisoner, and on being exchanged returned to Texas and re-enlisted under Gen. Kirby Smith. On his return to the pursuits of peace he again took up agricultural work, in which he was engaged successfully until his death, in 1885, in Taylor county. In political matters he was a demoerat, while his religious connection was with the Baptist church. His wife was born in Texas, the daughter of a pioneer Methodist minister of this State, and she still survives, being a resident of Abilene, Texas, and the mother of six children, of whom two are deceased, William B, being the second oldest living and the third in order of birth.

During the entire period of his school days, William B. Lewis worked faithfully at various employments in order to pay for his tuition, and when he entered Buffalo Gap College he was forced to ride horseback six-teen miles daily. While a student in this college, he took up the profession of teaching, in which he continued four years, in the meanwhile graduating with the de-gree of Bachelor of Arts, in 1897. He had prosecuted his law studies assiduously whenever the opportunity offered, and in 1899 was admitted to the bar, at once entering upon the practice of his profession at Abilene, where he continued to reside until 1909. In 1904 he was elected county attorney, a position in which he served efficiently until 1908, and in 1909, on coming to Plainview, at once interested himself in public and political matters, soon becoming known as an active worker in the ranks of the Democratic party. In the spring of 1912 he became his party's candidate for the county judgeship of Hale county, and was successful in the election which followed, being also chosen superintendent of schools. He still continues to hold these offices, and in the discharge of his official duties has shown himself fair, impartial and conscientious, winning alike the respect of the members of the bar and the confidence of the general public. Although the greater part of his time is demanded by the duties of his office, he has outside interests, being a director in the Na-tional Temperance Life Insurance Company of Dallas, and having large holdings in cattle in Hale county. He is a member of the County Judges and District and County Clerks Associations, holds membership in the Chamber of Commerce, and attends the Baptist church.

MB Lewis-

His fraternal connections are with the local lodges of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Woodmen of the World, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Pretorians and the Knights of the Maccabees.

On July 31, 1904, Judge Lewis was married in Jones county, Texas, to Miss Ola McLaughlin, who was born in Arkansas, daughter of E. B. McLaughlin, at present a resident of Dickens county. To this union there has been born one child: Juanita, born November 19, 1905, at Abilene, Taylor county.

ALEXANDER R. PHILLIPS. One of the ablest men in the fire insurance field of Texas is Mr. Alexander R. Phillips of Dallas, the special agent for the German American Insurance Company of New York. In 1897, when just out of school, and a boy of seventeen, he was given his opportunity. This opportunity consisted in subjecting himself to the demands and requirements that might be made of a general office boy in an insurance office. He did about everything an office boy would be asked to do, and at the same time was learning the insurance business. At the end of three years he had advanced to the place of special inspector and rate-clerk for the Hartford Fire Ins. Co. He then became special agent of the Springfield Fire & Marine Insurance Company of Massachusetts. He remained with that company four years, and then hecame special agent of the Insurance Company of North America. While with the latter concern, the disastrons conflagration at Houston occurred, and he was one of the adjusters that handled these losses, Mr. Phillips was with the Insurance Company of North America for eight years, and resigned in order to accept the special agency of the German-American Insurance Company of New York, His offices at Dallas are in the Insurance Building.

Alexander R. Phillips was born in Waco, Texas, February S. 1880, a son of George P. and Florence E. (Minney) Phillips. His father was one of the early settlers in North Texas, locating first at Sherman and then in Dallas and from there becoming a pioneer of the west Texas town of Abilene, where he erected the first frame building which adorned that town. He continued his residence in Abilene until 1893, then moved to Dallas,

Alexander R. Phillips, as a boy, was educated in the public schools of Dallas, and at the Dallas Academy, being graduated from the latter institution in 1897 and almost immediately entering upon his practical business eareer in the insurance field. He stands very high in all insurance circles, and in 1910 was selected as one of the special committee to formulate the general insurance schedules used throughout the state. The adoption of this new schedule of rates was an important event in fire insurance history in Texas, and the schedules then adopted are the ones now regularly used in all offices. We have the schedule of the Pesas Fire Markett and the schedules then adopted are the ones now regularly used in all offices. Fire the schedule of the Pesas Fire adopted in the property of the Southern Presbyterian Church being an elder in his home church. Mr. Phillips, on February 4, 1903, married Miss Anna Garlington, a daughter of M. D. Garlington of Dallas,

Harry E. Gordon. As president of the Texas State Society of Public Accountants Mr. Gordon both officially and through the prestige of his acknowledged ability occupies the leadership in this important department of commerce. Mr. Gordon is a thoroughly trained public accountant, and a year or so ago came from New York City to Dallas where he rapidly became acknowledged as one of the most capable and successful in his profession.

Harry E. Gordon is a native of the historic old town of Haverill, Massachusetts, where he was born on the twenty-first of July, 1880. His family belongs to the old New England ancestry. His parents were James W. of state of New Hampshire, and Sarah (Matthews) Gordon, of the state of Maine. James W. Gordon, the father, was for fifty-two years a carriage manufacturer in Massachusetts and when he retired from his long years of business he was a wealthy man, and moved from Massachusetts to New Hampshire to spend his declining years. This branch of the Gordon family is directly descended from the Scotch Clan of Gordons, probably the most noted in Scotch history, and from the viewpoint and judgment of many capable historians, it was the Gordons, who, with their money and their bravery and Mr. Gordon's method stabilished Scotland as a nation. Mr. Gordon's method when the stabilished Scotland as a nation of the Mr. Gordon's method when the stabilished Scotland as a nation of the Mr. Gordon's method when the stabilished Scotland as a nation of the American Revolution and she is a nicee of Major General Wilkes West, who was a major in the Revolutionary army.

Mr. Harty E. Gordon received his education, according to the standards of his New England rearing, and subsequently took up the practical work of accountancy. In 1910 he graduated from the New York University as an accountant, and in August of the same year located in Dallas where he established an office as a public accountant in connection with Peter & Company. On November 15, 1911, he organized the present firm of H. E. Gordon & Company, public accountants, with offices in the Wilson Building. Mr. Gordon was elected president of the Texas State Society of Public Accountants on the 22nd of May, 1912, and he is also auditor of the Advertising League of Dallas. He is a member of the college fraternity of Delta Sigma Phi of the New York University. Mr. Gordon was married at St. Louis, Missouri, September 26, 1912, to Miss Fannie Schnittker.

Romert W. Earon. As an exemplification of the high position to which a life of industry, perseverance and well-directed effort may bring an individual, the career of the late Robert W. Eaton is an interesting study. Early thrown upon his own resources by the death of his father, with but ordinary advantages of an educational nature and no financial assistance, he persistently worked his way to the front ranks of business mely and at the time of his death, September 26, 1910, was widely known in county politics. Mr. Eaton was born at Bowling Green, Kentucky, in 1855, and was a son of Wesley and Namy (Drake) Eaton, the latter being directly descended from Sir Francis Drake. Mr. Eaton's parents, natives of Kentucky, are both deceased. There were eight children in their family, as follows: Sarah, who is the wife of Theodore Dishman, still a resident of Kentucky; Catherine, deceased, who was the wife of Fonici Processed away; Robert W.; Belle, who is single and a resident of Kentucky; Pannie, who is the wife of John Jones, of Bowling Green, Kentucky; Rochester, who is a resident of Dallas, Texas; and Wesley, who is deceased.

Robert W. Eaton was reared upon the old Kentucky homestead place, and, his father being a farmer, he was brought up as a tiller of the soil. His educational advantages were somewhat limited, as the death of his father necessitated his going to work when still but a lad, but he was intelligent and ambitious, made the most of his opportunities, and managed to gain a good practical knowledge of the important things in life. mother managed to keep her little brood about her, and taught them habits of industry and honesty and endeavored to fit them for the positions they were to fill in life. Mr. Eaton remained in Kentucky until 1880, in which year he migrated to Texas, and settled on a farm in the vicinity of Dallas. He remained thereon for some eighteen years, meeting with signal success in his farming and stock-raising operations, and in 1898 came to Dallas, which was his home up to the time of his death. For years Mr. Eaton had been an active worker in the ranks of the Democratic party in Dallas county, and in 1898 he became his party's candidate for a position on the board of county commissioners, to which he was subsequently elected and served two terms. He then made the race for sheriff of Dallas county, but met with defeat, and again became the nominee for county commissioner. He was again returned a victor, and was serving in that capacity at the time of his death. Mr. Eaton's public record was one of conscientious service to his felfow-citizens. He had a high regard for the responsibilities of public office and it was ever his object to further those movements which made for progress, education, morality and good citizenship. In both pub-lic and private life he was highly esteemed, and his death removed from Dallas one of its most zealons and public-spirited citizens,

Mr. Eaton was married to Miss Mera Dishman, native of Mississippi and a daughter of Jerry and Bettie (Woodard) Dishman. Mr. Dishman was a carpenter by occupation, and came of a family of Kentuckians, while his wife's people were from Georgia. There were five children in the Dishman family: Mera, who became Mrs. Eaton; Ella, who is the wife of John Harris, of Robie, Texas; Cora, who is the wife of Frank Darnell, of Abilene, Texas; Jerry, a stockman of that city; and Bettie, who is the wife of Ben Harwood, of Abilene. Mr. and Mrs. Eaton were married in 1880, and became the parents of these children: May, who is the wife of Tom Marsh, of Dallas county, and has one child,— Thomas; Benjamin, who is single and resides at home with his mother; Robert, a well-known business man of Dallas, who has two children,-Wilkin and Robbie; and Beulah, who is the wife of Earl Lynn, of this city.

Mr. Eaton was brought up in the faith of the Methodist Episcopal church, and was a liberal supporter of its various religious and charitable movements. He was known as a generous, big-hearted man, and one who never refused aid to worthy enterprises. Fraternally, he was connected with the local lodges of the Woodmen of the World and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in both of which he was very popular. Since his demise, his widow has resided at No. 4204 Ross avenue, Dallas, in the vicinity of which location she is widely and favorably

STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS. As an institution for the preparatory training of young men and young women the Douglas Select School of Waco has a record during seventeen years, not only of progressive growth and prosperity, but of broadening and increasing efficiency and usefulness. Already many successful men, in the professions and in business and affairs, credit that school with having furnished them encouragement and a good start on their career.

The founder of the school, Stephen A. Douglas, was born in Downington, Meigs county, Ohio, November 27, 1866. His father, Henry M. Douglas, born in the same part of Ohio in 1839, retired from farming in 1900 and spent the closing years of his long life in Texas, where he died in 1913. The mother, whose maiden name was Sarah A. McCullough, was born at Boston, Massachusetts, July 7, 1844, and now resides in Waco.

Stephen A. Douglas was educated in the schools and attended the pioneer institution of higher learning in Ohio, the old Ohio College at Athens, graduating in 1889 as Bachelor of Pedagogy. After some experience in teaching in Ohio, he came to Texas in 1896, and in the following year established what is now the Douglas Select School at Waco. Beginning with nine pupils, and an equipment of one room with two tables and nine feet of blackboard, the institution has flourished, necessitating removal from time to time to larger and better quarters, and at the present time its average enrollment is one hundred and fifty pupils, though as many as two hundred and forty-four scholars have at one time enjoyed the instruction and influence of the school. It has a high rank among Texas preparatory institutions, and many of its graduates have made creditable records in colleges and universities. Professor Douglas is an excellent type of the modern educator, progressive in his methods, purposeful and determined in his attitude toward his calling, and is not only an instructor but possesses the rarer and more useful gift of imparting inspiration to his pupils.

Mr. Donglas is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of the Maccabees, is a Democrat in politics and a member of the Presbyterian church. He has succeeded well as a business man, and besides owning the property in which his school is conducted, on grounds 125x212 feet at 91 Washington street, he is a stockholder in the Southern Traction Com-

Mrs. Donglas, his wife, is a member of an old and prominent Southern family. On May 28, 1910, Mr. Douglas was married at Waco to Miss Mattie H. Hill, daughter of W. S. and Maggie T. (Davis) Hill. Mrs. Douglas was one of ten children, as follows: Hugh B., Louis L., Sam D., O. T., Fannie M., Read W., Altie L., Mattie H. and two who died in infancy. Her maternal uncle, Sam Davis, was a scout under Colonel Coleman of the Confederate army and when captured by the Union troops in 1863, Mr. Davis refused to divulge any information concerning the Southern army, and his last words before his execution were: "If I had a thousand lives to give I would give them all before I would betray a friend of my country." W. S. Hill, father of Mrs. Donglas, was born in Rutherford county, Tennessee, in 1842, and died April 20, 1910, at Waco, was a prominent man in his locality in his home state, and after the Civil War located on a farm in Coryell county, Texas. Mrs. Douglas was born in that county. By a former marriage Mr. Douglas has three children: Sarah C., Stephen A., Jr., and Dorothy Mae. Mr. Douglas and family reside at 904 Washington street, Waco.

THOMAS STALLWORTH HENDERSON, youngest of the seven children of Thomas S. and Harriet (Red) Henderson, was born near Washington, on the Brazos, on the 12th of January, 1859,

His parents were natives of South Carolina, and with their household and slaves, emigrated over land to Texas in 1848, settling in Washington county, where the father was a successful planter and influential citizen. The mother died in 1859, and some years after the war the father removed to Marshall, Texas, where he died in 1900. Of their children John N., lawyer and judge of the Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas, died at Dallas in 1907; Samuel R., lawyer, died at Bryan in 1908; Mrs. Lizzie Chandler lives at Anderson; Mrs. Alice Fowler at Lampasas; Mrs. Georgia Rodes at Navasota and Miss Ada and the subject of this sketch reside at Cameron, Texas.

He attended the country schools of his native county and afterwards Waco (now Baylor) University, where he graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Arts and the honor of his class in 1877.

In preparation for his chosen profession, the law, he entered St. Louis Law School, St. Louis, Mo., where he pursued his studies until licensed to practice in 1879. On the 19th of June, 1879, he located at Cameron, Texas, where he has since resided.

By industry and diligence he has established a reputation as an able and successful lawyer.

A broad minded and progressive citizen, Mr. Henderson has contributed much to the development and upson has contributed much to the development and about the building of his community. He is president of the Cameron Water, Power & Light Company; of the Ice & Cold Storage Company; of the Milam County Abstract Company; vice president of the Citizens National Bank; and member of the Board of Directors of the Texas Fidelity & Bonding Company, of Waco, and of the National Temperance Life Insurance Company, of Dallas, Texas. His office building recently completed is one of the handsomest law offices in the state and is for the exclusive use of the law firm of Henderson, Kidd, Gillis & Henderson, of which he is the senior member.

J. S. Ludenon

He inherits the family love of farm life and has extensive farming interests.

He is a democrat and is a loval and effective advocate of the principles of his party. He was County Attorney of Milam county, 1880-82; District Attorney of the 20th Judicial District, 1882-86; City Attorney and member of the Board of Aldermen of Cameron; and in 1893 represented his county in the 23d Legislature. He served as a member of the Board of Regents of the University of Texas, 1895-11, being chairman for six years.

He attends the Baptist Church, of which denomination his wife is an active member. His fraternal affiliations are with the Knights of Honor, the I. O. O. F., Woodmen of the World and the Praetorians. He is also an active member of the State Bar Association and the State Historical Association of Texas.

He was married at Marshall, Texas, in 1884, to Minnie Agnes Burns, daughter of John H. and Mary E. Burns, of Caddo Parish, La. Their union is blessed by six children, Thomas S., Jr., now a member of the above mentioned law firm; Eleanor, Mary Lake; John Burns; Harriet Ada, and Agnes Red.

JUDGE G. EVANS COWAN has been much in the public service in Franklin county. His life, in a business way, has followed the channel of lands, titles and surveys, and in the execution of his public duties he has come to be regarded as one of the real landmarks of the county. He has held the office of County Surveyor for something like 20 years at various times, and a perusal of the record would seem to indicate that he has been returned to office of county surveyor on every occasion when his public service in other quarters did not preclude the possibility of his serving in that capacity.

Born in Cass county, Texas, on Dec. 11, 1856, G. Evans Cowan is the son of William J. and Harriet (Evans) Cowan. The father came out of Kentucky into Arkansas as a young man and in Clark county he met and married Miss Evans. He was distinguished for having built the first house in Arkadelphia, Arkansas. Among their children Judge Cowan was the seventh son, and in keeping with a popular superstition regarding the destinies of seventh sons, Judge Cowan was ticketed with the nickname "Doc;" but the fates seem to have made an error in his case, for he never evinced aught of desire to embrace the medical profession for his own. Of the other children of William J, and Harriet Cowan, William and Albert lost their lives while serving in the Confederacy around about Richmond, Virginia. Thomas died in Arkansas during the rebellion; James died in infancy, and John met his death in 1880 at Scarcy, Arkansas. Two survive,—George W., a resident of Mineola, Texas, and G. Evans Cowan, of this review.

Judge Cowan was reared chiefly in Clark, Polk and Sebastian counties, Arkansas. The death of his parents in 1860 left him orphaned at a helpless age, and he continued to be among relatives in those Arkansas counties until he reached his sixteenth year. His education hardly might be designated by that name, so scantily had he been instructed, and when he assumed charge of his own affairs at the age of sixteen he was meanly enough fortified by knowledge. Taking affairs into his own hands at this juncture he took service with a farmer at a small wage including three months' board in the summer months, while he expected to attend school, and the very fact that he set about in this way to mend his lack augured well for his future. It was along these lines of procedure that he brought his training up to that point where he was qualified to instruct others. In 1876 he returned to Texas, working as a farm hand and attending school intermittently until he was twentythree years old, when he managed his affairs in such a way that it was possible for him to continue in school for the full space of a year. Then, after teaching one term himself he attended the college at Thorpe Springs and finished the normal course there. He then entered regularly into the work of teaching and continued for six years in that work in Wood and Franklin counties, during which time he occupied himself in spare hours with the study of surveying, and thus prepared himself for later work with the compass and chain. Before he finished his career as a teacher, Judge Cowan was elected County Surveyor of Franklin county in 1882, and although he has held that office much of the time since, he actually made the run for the place but that one time. Because of his familiarity with land lines and surveys in this section of Texas, his services have been invited by adjoining counties in settling disputes and establishing corners, and otherwise unraveling the tangles into which many tracts of land have been involved from time to time.

In November, 1908, he was elected county judge, and again was called to the office in 1910, and when he turned the office over to Judge Walker, his successor, he assumed the duties of surveyor, to which he had been chosen on the same ticket. While serving as county judge the question of the power of the county court to issue scrip to build a court house was litigated to a final determination. His court decided to build a new county building and made an order to that effect, proposing to issue warrants upon the county for the purpose. The court's order was met with a suit in the name of the people, enjoining them until the question could be submitted to the voters and their sanction obtained. The matter went to the supreme court of the state for decision and a verdict was rendered in accordance with the procedure of the court of Franklin county, thus settling the question in the state, since which time other counties have built and are building public buildings in the same manner.

The Franklin county court house and jail are of concrete and were erected complete, with furnishings, for warrants to the amount of $65,000, the warrants running twenty years and drawing five percent interest. The court house is two stories with basement, Grecian architecture and a massive white pile, pleasing to the eye and attractive from every point of view. Its construction stands as a monument to the court that built it and to the integrity of those who executed the contract under its eve.

Judge Cowan qualified for the practice of law while serving as county judge and was admitted upon examination before the district board of Texarkana, in January, 1913. His first case in court came to him from the Four-States Life Insurance Company, but his chief aim is to be able to appear in suits involving titles and to do probate work. His entry into the abstract field of Franklin county adds another competent factor to the record-searchers of Franklin county, and in this venture as an abstractor he is associated with Judge H. W. Hunt. Another point to the credit of Judge Cowan is his splendid aid in bringing into existence the building and loan association of Mount Vernon, a fiduciary concern which is doing much to enhance the general welfare of the town.

Judge Cowan was married in Franklin county, on January 4, 1881, to Miss Beatrice Wylie, a daughter of W. B. and Sarah A. Wylie, people of sterling Scotch lineage. Mrs. Cowan is the only daughter among the four children of her parents, the others being Dr. J. H. Wylie, of Winnsboro, Texas; H. A. Wylie, of Franklin county, and Alvin P., who died young. The judge and Mrs. Cowan have a family of six children. Della and Jessie are residents of Mount Vernon and Wichita Falls, respectively: Clinton is a farmer in Franklin county, and is married to Electra Shearer; Leslie is a resident of Mount Vernon; Wylie is a student at the Deaf and Dumb Institute of Austin and Raymond and Otis are the remaining members of the family.

Glancing back over the early life of Judge Cowan, one can not fail to be impressed with the fact that out of a neglected and untutored boyhood, he has made possible so magnificent a success of his life, and there may be discerned between the lines as well as in bold type, much that should prove inspiring to other youth who have reason to feel that fate has dealt unkindly with them, and spur them on to emulate the accomplishments of the Judge.

PROF. CHARLES M. MOORE, As secretary of the Board of Education of Dallas, Prof. Moore now occupies an important place in educational circles of north Texas and for a number of years as teacher and as executive has been prominent in the school work of this state. He has been identified with educational work for twenty years, and has had many honors and positions which indicate his usefulness and standing as one of the foremost schoolmen in this state.

Charles M. Moore was born near Troupe in Smith eounty, Texas, in 1872, a son of Andrew J. and Dorothy (Melton) Moore, his father being a farmer in Smith county. His early education was obtained in the public schools at Troupe, and at the age of fifteen he entered the Summer Hill Select School at Omen, in Smith county, where he was graduated with the highest honors of his class, and as salutatorian in 1893. He then attended the Sam Houston Normal College at Huntsville, and in 1895 he graduated, again with the highest honors, and the winner of the Peabody Scholarship Medal. During his school days he had engaged in teaching, and from 1896 to 1901 was connected with the public schools of Palestine, being principal of one of the ward schools of that city. During 1900-1901 he served as president of the East Texas Teachers' association.

Prof. Moore came to Dallas in 1901 to take the position of principal of the William B. Travis public school in this city. His work with that school for eight years stamped him as one of the ablest managers in the city and increased his reputation throughout educational cireles of this state. In March, 1909, he resigned to accept the secretaryship of the Dallas Board of Education, a post to which he had been elected in February preceding. Prof. Moore succeeds to the office which for twenty-five years was occupied by the late Captain Thomas G. Terry.

Professor Moore was married in 1902 to Miss Lulu Barrows of Tyler, Texas. They became the parents of two children: Charlotte, now deceased, and Charles M., Jr. Prof. Moore and family reside at 3100 Cole Avenue in Dallas.

WILLIAM HENRY RUSSELL, Prominent among the members of the Deaf Smith county bar stands William Henry Russell, who by his attainments and achievements has become more or less a familiar figure in the courts of Northwestern Texas. He also is not unknown to official life, having for three successive terms served as county judge, and both as jurist and legist has ever maintained the dignity and high standing of the legal profession. At present he is a resident of Hereford, where he is in the enjoyment of a large and representative practice, and where his widespread popularity indicates the universal esteem in which he is held. William Henry Russell is a Tennesseean, born at Dixon, October 18, 1878, a son of William and Louise Hortense (Wooten) Russell. His father, a native of Killarney, Ireland, emigrated to America as a lad, and grew up in the Province of Ontario, Canada. At the age of twenty years he came to the United States and located at Dixon, Tennessee, where he identified himelf with the lumber business and became a wealthy and prominent operator. In 1883 he made removal to Texas, locating in Lamar county, where he continued to be engaged in business as a lumberman, also having large interests in this line in Arkansas and the (then) Indian Territory. He died at Dixon, Texas, in February, 1892, at the age of fifty-six years. William Russell was married in Tennessee to Miss Louise Hortense Wooten, a native of the Big Bend State, and she still survives her husband and lives at Paris, Texas, aged sixty-four years. Five children were born to them, William Henry being the fourth in order

William Henry Russell was five years of age when he accompanied his parents to Texas, and here he secured his preliminary educational training in the public schools of Paris, Texas, and a private school conducted by the well-known educator, Prof. Goudy. After some prepara-tion, he entered the law department of the State University, at Austin, Texas, and was graduated therefrom in 1901, following which, for one year, he practiced at Austin. In 1902 he came to Hereford and opened offices, and two years later became the Democratic candidate for the office of county judge, to which he was subsequently elected three times. He was known as a fair and impartial judge, wise in his decisions and firm in upholding the best traditions of the judicial office. Since his last term, Mr. Russell has been engaged in private practice, and has been connected with a number of complicated cases, in which his legal ability has brought him prominently into public notice. He is a valued member of the national, state and county bar associations, and is known as one of the men who have been active in forwarding the hest interests of the profession in this part of the state. Fraternally, he is connected with the Masons, the Odd Fellows, the Elks and the Woodmen of the World, and has passed all the chairs in his lodges. With his family, Mr. Russell attends the Christian church.

On March 1, 1905, Mr. Russell was united in marriage at Hereford with Miss Nora Alice Daniel, daughter of Mack Daniel, known as an early settler of Cook county Texas. Her father is now deceased, but Mrs. Daniel still survives and makes her home at Hereford. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Russell: Artis Horace, born August 17, 1907; Jesse Miller, born March 15, 1909; and William Henry, Jr., born November 24, 1911, all at Hereford.

Mr. Russell is a self-made man, having relied upon his own resources since his college days when he paid for his own tuition by working in his spare time. success in this part of Texas has led him to encourage others to settle here, confident that men of ambition and energy can find numerous opportunities to win position and independence.

WILLIAM H. DANA, Public-spirited and influential, the originator of the "city beautiful" idea in Dallas, and a leading figure in preparing the city charter of Dallas in 1907, William H. Dana has accomplished a great work in the direction of affording enjoyment to the masses and developing their power to appreciate the beautiful; and through his efforts for civic reform and honest and efficient government has proved himself a citizen of wide usefulness. He was born, in 1863, at Rochester, New York, a son of John H. and Maria R. (Wiborn) Dana, both members of prominent New York families. His ancestors on the paternal side were among the founders of Rochester, New York, some of them having settled there ere the town was started. He belongs to the family which produced Charles A. Dana, founder and for thirty years editor of the New York Sun, and Richard Henry Dana, the noted poet and essayist, also James Dwight Dana, who was born at Utica, New York, February 12, 1813, and while yet a young man became an expert mineralogist and geologist. Graduating from Yale College, he was sent out, in 1838, as a scientific observer in the United States exploring expedition under Captain Wilkes, visiting the Antarctic and Pacific oceans, and making collections of mineralogical and geological specimens of great scientific value. He was for some time associate editor of the "American Journal of Science," and in 1846 became professor of natural history and geology in Yale. He gained a world-wide distinction as a scientist, and published several works, among them being "A Manual of Mineralogy" and a "Text Book of Geology."

Brought up in his native city, William H. Dana was there educated. Since 1885 he has been a resident of Dallas, and during the time has been active in promoting its best and highest interests,

By heritage and cultivation Mr. Dana is a true lover of the beautiful in both art and nature. He was, and is, the original "city beautifier" of Dallas. Mayhap as a result of having been reared in such a beautiful city as Rochester is, he has always taken a deep interest in forestry, floriculture and landscape beautification, and he has made persistent and commendable efforts to lave his ideas carried out in his adopted city, with results that are already apparent, and will become more so as the years go on. For many years Mr. Dana lived on Bryan street in East Dallas, in a charming home, which, with its surroundings, comprised a noted beauty spot, calling forth words of admiration from all passers by. Although an enthusiast and an idealist, Mr. Dana is eminently practical in carrying out his ideas and projects, He is a business man well versed in civics, and believes in getting a dollar's worth of work for every dollar expended from the public treasury. In January, 1906, he brought about and was chairman of the public meeting that resulted in a number of streets in East Dallas being paved, an improvement that was greatly needed, and which Mr. Dana had advocated, both in speeches and in letters to the local press, for several years. In 1911 the city employed George E. Kessler, an authority on city planning, to come to Dallas at a large salary and make suggestions for improving and beautifying the city. It is a singular and noteworthy fact, recalled by many of Mr. Dana's friends, that the Kessler recommendations, made in a voluminous report, followed almost identically the things that Mr. Dana had been urging upon Dallas for twenty years, without any hope or expectation of reward to himself,

Mr. Dana originated the idea of having the city place the freight yards and terminals in the Trinity River bottom, also of having a $2,000,000 terminal station for all railroads near the river branch, which is now in process of construction. He made valuable suggestions for the planting and care of shade trees in the city, a subject upon which he could well quality as an expert. Such things as the placing of flags and flag poles in the public parks and school grounds, the building of a the public parks and school grounds, the building of a public parks and nurseries for the children of public playgrounds and nurseries for the children in the public the value of wholesome outdoor life among beautiful surroundings, have long been actively urged by Mr. Dana. His contributions to the local press on aesthetic forestry indicate a deep study and wide knowledge of this fascinating subject,

In addition to the artistic and aesthetic side of civil life, Mr. Dana has also taken a very active and prominent part in shaping the present city government of Dallas, As a member of the charter commission which drew up the present city charter, adopted in 1907, and under which Dallas came under the commission form of government. Mr. Dana gave up a great deal of his time, thought and activities in the preparation of that excellent document. On the other hand, when, in 1913, the movement was started to amend the 1907 charter by the insertion of 34 new amendments, Mr. Dana entered heart and soul into the campaign opposition to these proposed changes, deeming them inimical to the people's rights and feeling certain that they had been inspired by certain special interests and public service corporations selfishly for their own welfare.

Mr. Dana is a member of Grace Methodist Episcopal Church, South. He was married in Sherman, Texas, to Miss Florine R. Roberson, who was born, reared and educated in that city, being a graduate of Kidd-Key James Stewart. A noteworthy record in the public service of Texas is that of James Stewart of Fox Davis. Jeff Davis county was organized in May, 1887. In the first election of county officers James Stewart was chosen county and district clerk. From that time to this the citizens of the county have elected and retained him in office. He has served as county and district clerk continuously longer than anyone who has ever been elected to the office in the State of Texas, and throughout the greater part of this time he has never had any opposition to speak of in his candidacy for the office. While this record is not unique, it is nevertheless one case among a small number, and it is a high tribute to the individual popularity and ability of any citizen to so long and continuously enjoy the confidence of the people.

James Stewari, who is one of the honored pioneers of this west Texas county is a native of Ireland, born June 12, 1845. He was educated in the national schools of Ireland, and later studied for a time in the Christian Brothers College at Londonderry. When he was eighteen years old he entered the Civil Service in Ireland, and continued in that work until he resigned in order to come to America at the age of twenty-one. After spending a few months in the east, he came to Texas in 1867, and this state bas been his home now for fortyseven years. During thirteen years of this time he followed railroading, was a stationary engineer, and in

Then in February 1880 he came out to Fort Davis, which at that time was a post situated in the midst of a great unfenced range occupied only by the herds of a few cattlemen then operating in this country. For about three years he was engaged in the operation of a small steam flour mill, and then entered the general merchandise business, which he conducted for two years. After this, as already stated, in May, 1887, he assisted in the organization of the country, and was many years also he owned the leading hotel at Fort Davis which was conducted under his proprietorship, although Mrs. Stewart was the active manager and though the state of the country which was conducted under his proprietorship.

At Fort Davis on April 27, 1885, Mr. Stewart mar-ried Miss Marie A. Fink. Mrs. Stewart through her own career and that of her father is very intimately associated with Old Fort Davis. Her father, Captain Theodore Fink, was an officer in the United States army, and was with the troops which first established Fort Davis on the western frontier of Texas before the Civil war. He subsequently returned to Michigan, and in that state organized the first Michigan regiment of Volunteers for service in the Civil war, but his death occurred in Detroit May 2, 1861, while the regiment was still in process of organization. Mr. and Mrs. Stewart are the parents of one son and one daughter, named James Kenneth and Grace Frances. Mr. Stewart was reared in the Catholic faith, and in politics is a Progressive Democrat and actively interested in local politics. He and his wife have a very attractive home at Fort Davis, and a source of great pleasure to Mr. Stewart is his beautiful garden, where he satisfies his love for flowers and plants, and spends much of his leisure time. He also possesses an excellent and well selected library, and is fond of books and all the good things of life. Besides his other interests he engages to a considerable extent in real estate business in Fort Davis.

MAM NEWELL. Among the old and honored families of Texas, few have been longer residents and none have borne the responsibilities of citizenship with greater usefulness than the Newell and Moore families, both of which are represented by Mr. Mat M. Newell, the present county clerk of Fort Bend County, and for many years a leading business man of Richmond.

Mr. Mat M. Newell was born in Richmond, his present home, Angust 11, 1869. His parents were John E. and Emma (Moore) Newell. By descent the family is the result of a mingling of English and Irish stock. Both parents were born in Texas, which fact indicates that the settlement here was during the pioneer epoch. The Moores were Alabama people, while the Newells came originally from North Carolina. John D. Newell, the paternal grandfather, served in the Texas-Mexican war. The parents had just two children, and besides the county clerk there is his brother, John D. Newell of Richmond.

Mr. Mat M. Newell engaged in the land and abstract business. The Fort Bend County Abstract Company was organized in 1897, of which he is secretary and general manager. This company has a complete abstract sketch of the county, and its office has been a medium for a large amount of real estate business, in the past fifteen years.

Mr. Newell has always been a loyal Democrat and one of the hard party fighters. In 1902 he was elected to the office of county clerk. He was again elected county clerk in 1910 and is now serving a second term. In 1901 Mr. Newell married Miss Florence Blackman, who was originally from Alabama. Their two children are Emma Cecelia and Mathew Moore, Jr. Mrs. Newell, who is one of the cultured women of Richmond, is active in local social circles.

Captain John G. Young. Now living retired in Sherman at the age of sixty-nine, Captain John G. Young, a son of one of the state's early Indian fighters and military leaders, has himself had a record of varied infinitely leaders, has single that a record of latter experience as a soldier, rancher and business man. He is now in the declining years of his life, and though he has suffered much from ill-bealth and impaired hearing, is still mentally alert and talks pleasingly and intelli gently of his early life in this state. Except for the time spent in the Confederate army during the war, John G. Young has lived his entire life in Texas, and was born in Red River county, February 20, 1845.

His parents were Colonel William Cocke and Sophie Thomas Gleaves. The Young family was established in Texas by two brothers, Abraham and Dan Young, the latter being the father of Colonel W. C. Young. The family was of Holland-Dutch and French stock. Abraham Young in his day was quite a wealthy man, owning something like a hundred slaves and half of an entire county in Central Tennessee. Dan Young, while possessed of independent means; was not so well-to-do as his brother. The ancestry of the Gleaves side of the family is also of interest. Sophie Thomas Gleaves was born in Davidson county, Middle Tennessee, about 1816, a daughter of Michael Gleaves, who was the first sheriff of Davidson county, the county seat of which is Nashville, the state capital. He was one of the first settlers of that county. Closely related were the various families. the Gleaves, Donaldson, Dean, Robinson, and Felix Me-Kay. General Donaldson, who became a general in the Confederate army and was killed in Tennessee, married a Branch, and Colonel W. C.'s mother was also a Branch. President Andrew Jackson's wife was Sarah Donaldson, a cousin to Sophie Thomas Gleaves. In the Branch relationship there should be mentioned that member who was at one time governor of North Carolina and later a member of the United States senate, a son of whom was John O'Brien Branch, who also sat in the United States senate, and as a brigadier general under General Lee was killed at the battle of Antietam. Governor Colquitt, the present governor of Texas, has relationship with the Young family through his family connection with the Branches. A half brother of Col. W. C. Young was James Murray, whose daughter is the wife of former Senator J. W. Bailey of Texas. The Gleaves family were of Scotch and English stock. A brother of Sophie Thomas Gleaves was John E. Gleaves, at one time clerk of the chancery court of Nashville. previous to the war, and who also held the same office during the period of hostilities and until his death.

Colonel William Cocke Young was born in Tennessee

May 12, 1812, and came to Texas in 1834, locating in Red River county and engaging in the practice of law. He was one of the prominent men in that section of the state, served as sheriff of his county two terms, and later as county attorney. Associated with Colonel Bousland, he gained some fame as an Indian fighter in pioneer days through the Red River district, and at the outbreak of the Mexican war raised a regiment of volunteers of which be was commissioned colonel, with Bousland as next in command in the capacity of lieutenant colonel. Following the Mexican war Colonel Young resumed his law practice and in 1851 moved to Shawneetown in Grayson county. In 1857 he was appointed United States marshal of his district, holding the office for three years and then resigning to take part in the war between the North and the South. He was one of many who were called into consultation with Jefferson Davis prior to the outbreak of hostilities, and on returning from his last visit with the president of the Confederacy raised the Eleventh Regiment of Texas Cavalry and went into active service. He led his regiment until failing health compelled him to resign and return home. During the unsettled conditions of society at the close of the war, Colonel Young met his death at the hands of a member of a nefarious society that existed in Northern Texas. One of his fellow citizens had been shot down, and the murder was traced to the work of this band of outlaws, and while Colonel Young was in search of the body of the victim he himself was killed while near his home. One of Colonel Young's sons succeeded in tracing the murderer to his regiment in the Confederate army, demanded and received his surrender, took him to the spot where his father had been so foully killed, and there some of the colonel's own negroes quickly strung up and summarily exacted the penalty of death from the assassin.

Colonel W. C. Young was three times married. His first marriage was to Sophie Thomas Gleaves. Their thidren were: James D.; Sallie, who married Thomas W. Randolph; Mary A., wife of Joseph Crain; Nancy B., wife of Marion Adams; John G., of Sherman, and Sophie, who married R. T. Benge. Colonel Young afterwards married a Miss Hutchinson, and their two children were Dan and Frank. This third wife was Mrs. Ann Black, and their two children were Simpson M. and Margaret, who married J. B. Davenport.

The boyhood of John G. Young was spent in different localities in North Texas, and in 1858 his father settled in Cooke county. All the education he ever had so far as formal attendance at school was concerned was limited to eleven months. His own mother died when he was only four years of age. He lived at home with his father until 1861, and then, at the age of sixteen, enlisted for service in the Confederate army. He spent the first winter as a soldier in Arkansas, was then sent to Corinth, Mississippi, but soon afterwards on account of youth and ill health received a discharge. A year later he returned to the service in the same company, and con-tinued until the last gun had been fired. He was in the thick of the fray at Chickamauga, Murfreesboro and Franklin, and was in the campaigns about Atlanta, Nashville, Bentonville, Knoxville, Dalton, Resaca, New Hope Church, Greensboro, and a number of other less important engagements. In 1863, when General Longstreet ordered an advance upon Knoxville, Mr. Young was part of Tom Harrison's Brigade. As they advanced they came upon a Federal command which was taken by surprise, and on the following day Mr. Young, with Jim White and Ben Biggerstaff, went out on an independent scout and captured a Federal soldier. Biggerstaff suggested that they make the captive run the gauntlet and not allow him to get back to his command alive, but Mr. Young, though only in his eighteenth year, while his companions were mature men, took a vigorous stand in opposition to such barbarity, and made such a convicing and emphatic argument that the captive was set free. In support of his contention, he brought in the Gahen rule regarding the treatment of soldiers of a hostile force, and though he really did not understand the full contents of the rule, he advanced his views so successfully as to save the life of the prisoner. It is a matter of note that both Biggerstaff and White were later captured and spent twelve morths in a Federal prison. Mr. and spent twelve morths in a Federal prison. Mr. tionally efficient and creditable record, and was finally discharged with his regiment in 1856. While returning to Texas he and his comrades encountered the party which had charge of the Confederat treasury, which was being moved in a lumber wagon to a place of safety. They offered their services as additional guard, but the offer was not accepted.

After his return to 'Yexas Mr, Young found that his step-nother had married a second husband after his father's death, and being without a home he thene-forward became entirely dependent upon his own enterprise. He traded a gold watch and chain for a horse and pony, traded that in turn for a mule, and used the proceeds of these trades in order to pay his board and attend school to supplement the lack of advantages of his earlier youth. During his carly business career Mr. Young engaged in driving cattle from Cooke county to market, later went into stock raising on his own account, and that was his chief business until a few years ago, when he retired and settled in Sherman, In 1871 Captain Young married Miss Georgie A. Manion, daughter of A. B. Manion, a Kentuckian who moved to Delaware Bend in Cooke county, Texas, and spent the rest of his life there. Mr. and Mrs. Young had six children, namely: Lally S., William C., Annie B., Sallie G., Midired L. and Sidney J. On July 15, 1887, the mother of these children died, and on October 9, 1889, Captain Young married Mrs. Betty Randolph. Her maiden name was Elizabeth Thompson, and she was born in Grayson county, Texas, September 7, 1847, a daughter of Judge J. G. Thompson, a prominent early daughter of Judge J. G. Thompson, a prominent early pioneer of North Texas.

Soon after the death of his first wife Captain Young, in order to keep his little family together and to educate the children, moved to Dexter, though he retained what he humorously speaks of as his "grazing lot" of five hundred acres, and another small piece of one hundred and eighty acres, all of which under his management was brought to a high state of cultivation. From Dexter he finally moved to Sherman, where he has a comfortable and happy home, with many kind neighbors and staunch friends on all sides. The chief reason for his removal to Sherman was to help his daughter educate her children, these grandehildren being: Jack Young Randolph, horn in 1896; Elizabeth, born in 1897, and William E., born in 1901.

Captain Young has had a busy and eventful career, though since the war his life has been more or less serene. He has lived worthily in whatever community he has called his home, and there are none in Sherman today who have a wider circle of friends than has he.

PRESTON CONLER. One of the pioneers of Texas before the Revolution, a soldier during the struggle between Texas and Mexico in 1835-36, one of the gallant army under Houston, who fought Santa Ana at San Jacinto and afterwards for many years prominent in public affairs in south central Texas, the late Preston Conlec in 1870 transferred his residence to Cooke county, and his family is now represented in Gainesville, where his widow and a daughter live.

Preston Conlee was born in the state of Tennessec in 1752. Little information is obtainable concerning his family and ancestry. His brother John, it should be mentioned, was a captain in the Confederate army, and the last time he was heard from he was living at Little Rock, Arkansas. Preston Conlee grew up in the state of Tennessee, received an education in the common schools of the times, and when a very young man left that state and moved out to Texas, which was then a province of Mexico. He located in old Bastrop county, and identified himself with the usual industry of the pioneers, farming and cattle raising. When the hostilities broke out hetween the province and the central government at Mexico, he joined the patriot army, and gave his assistance to the winning of independence, continuing with the army of Houston until the battle of San Jacinto, in April, 1836. After the war be became prominent in public affairs in Bastrop county, and held the position of sheriff for ten years. The duties of a sheriff in the early days of Texas required much more than today, the best qualities of fearless manhood, and a determination which might confront any and every danger. After a long and creditable service as sheriff, Mr. Conlee returned to his farm and was engaged in raising cattle and horses in Bastrop county for a number of years. His home in that county was long known as the "half-way house," being situated midway between Lagrange and Austin. It was known to all the old-timers who traveled the road to the state capital for its hospitality and almost daily travelers enjoyed its comforts and its board and bed. In 1870, in consequence of failing health, Mr. Conlecmoved his family to Gaiuesville, and thereafter lived retired until his death in 1872.

Preston Coulee was married in 1850, to Miss Martha E. Clanton, a native of Louisiana, and a daughter of John and Catherine (Hughes) Clauton. Her father was a brick mason, and was born in Mississippi. Mrs. Coulee is the only survivor of the seven children in her parents' household. The four children born to Preston Coulee and wife are mentioned as follows: Mattie, widow of Charles W. Dobbins of Ardmore, Oklahoma; sue, widow of Augustus McKemie; Angeline, wife of W. B. Johnson, a very prominent attorney, and former United States attorney under Rossevelt at Ardmore, Oklahoma; and attorney under Rossevelt at Ardmore, Oklahoma; and Preston, of Ardmore, Oklahoma.

HON, WARNER MARION PETICOLAS. A native product of the state of Texas, Hon, Warner Marion Peticolas has passed his life thus far within its borders, and though still a young man, has already gained distinctions in his professional career that has been withheld from many an older aspirant for honors. He is now local attorney for the EI Paso & Southwestern Railroad Company, having accepted that appointment after the expiration of his service as Chief Justice of the Court of Givil Appeals of the Eighth Judicial District, to which he was appointed in 1911 by Governor Colquitt.

Born in Victoria, Texas, on June 19, 1873. Mr. Peticolas is the son of Alfred Brown and Marion (Goodwin) Peticolas, natives of Virginia and Ohio, respectively. The father came to Texas in the days prior to the Civil war period, in which he served the full four years as the lieutenant of his company under General Slibley. He is still living and is a reddent of Victoria. He was a lawyer of prominence and is the author of Peticolas' Civil & Criminal Digest. Although he has never heen an aspirant for public office, he has always taken an active part in the Democratic politics of the state and nation, as well as in local affairs. The mother came to Texas from her Ohio home as a young girl and in Victoria she met and matriced her husband. She still lives and is the mother of three sons, as follows: Sherman Goodwin, living in Omaha, Nebraska; Warner Marion of this review; and Alfred Ralpha, a resident of Baltimore, Maryland.

Warner Marion Peticolas was educated in the public schools of Victoria, Texas, and of Itheca. New York, completing his training in the University of Texas, from which he was graduated in 1893 with the degree of LL.B. He began his professional activities in association with his father in his home town, continuing here for six years, or until 1899, when he moved to El Paso, and here took up independent practice. He was successful from the beginning and gained a high place at the bar of El Paso county. In 1911 he was appointed Chief Justice of the Court of Civil Appeals for the Eighth Judicial District, serving in that office until November 1, 1912, since which time his energies have been given to the legal department of the El Paso & Southwestern Railroad Company in El Paso.

Like his father, Mr. Peticolas is a Democrat, and he has always had an active part in the labors of the party, performing worthy service in its behalf, and receiving honors at its behest. He is a member of the County and State Law Associations, and fraternally is a member of the Knights of Pythias.

On November 1st, 1894, Mr. Peticolas was married to Miss Lola Givens Davis, the daughter of John A. Davis, a native son of Texas. The marriage took place in Galveston, the home of the Davis family and the birthplace of Mrs. Peticolas. To them have been born six children, as follows: Floyd Davis; Warrer Marion, Jr.; Ella Goodman; Alfred Brown; John Davis; and William. The home of the family is at 1407 Montana street.

John H. Glascow. To have a statewide reputation when the state in question is as large as the state of Texas, is no small thing for one man to accomplish. John H. Glascow, of Seymour, Texas, can easily lay claim to this honor, for he is widely known as one of the greatest criminal lawyers Texas has ever claimed. Endowed by nature with a legal mind, through years of study and close application, and through an ability to read men and grasp the significance of their actions, Mr. Glascow has risen to his present high position in the regard of his fellow lawyers and the petuly and the product of the state in generation of the state in the state of the state o

John H. Glasgow was born in Cape Girardeau county, Missouri, on the 17th of December, 1851. He attended the common schools of Missouri, and after completing the work of the public schools, he became a teacher, his aim being to earn enough money to enable him to go am being to earn enough money to enable him to go to college. He was eventually able to lay aside the money by which he paid his expenses in the Fruitland Normal Institute at Pleasant Hill, Missouri. After a four year course in this institution, he came to Texas. This was in 1874 when he was twenty-three years of age and he located in Young county, Texas. Here he taught the first public school in the county. The roof was a tarpaulin and the floor was of dirt and condi-tions were primitive indeed. During his years as a student he had been studying law more or less and during his one year as a teacher in Texas he continued his studies. In 1876 he was admitted to the bar and he has practiced law continuously since that time. He first opened an office in Graham county and until 1856 he remained in this county. It was while he was a resident of this county that he accepted his only public office, that of county judge, serving in this office for four years. In 1886 he came to Baylor county and established himself in practice here. He is now the oldest lawyer in Seymour, having practiced all over this county before a mile of railroad had been built.

Mr. Glasgow has made his reputation as a great lawyer in the practice of criminal law. He has defended as many men as any other lawyer in the state and his success has not been due to trickery but to a comprehensive knowledge of the law and to his eloquence and the force of his personality in the court room. Mr. Glasgow has been many times urged to accept office but has steadily refused. He has been tendered the district judgeship upon more than one occasion but has preferred the work of an attorney to the work of a judge. One of the finest things about the success of this man is that he is not the object of the bitter envy that so often assails men in high places. His methods are too fair and his personality too well liked to bring him anything but the friendship and respect of other men.

In his religious affiliations Mr. Glasgow is a member of the Methodist church. Politically he is a member of the Democratic party and takes a keen interest in national as well as state and local political questions. He has always been very active in fraternal circles, being a member of the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons and of the Knights of Pythias. He has been senior warden in the Masonic lodge in Seymour and is a member of the Blue Lodge in Seymour and of the Commandery and Knights Templar. He has also held offices in the Knights of Pythias. He was one of the men who organized the latter order in Seymour and on the twenty-fifth anniversary of his membership the members of the lodge presented him with a gold button as a token of their friendship and esteem. Mr. Glasgow is keenly interested in haseball, having been at one time a great ball player himself. He enjoys everything in the shape of art, but his especial passion is for poetry. He has a fine memory and poetical quotations add to both his public speeches and his conversation, for he has the gift of speaking poetry that few men have.

Mr. Glasgow was married at Columbus, Texas, in 1891 to Miss Manti Cummins, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Cummins, of Seymour, Mr. Cummins being one of the pioneers of Colorado county. Two children have been born to Mr, and Mrs. Glasgow, a son and a daughter, Jack, Jr., and Kitty Gale.

ELIAS P. LESTER. The thriving city of Cameron, the metropolis and judicial center of Milam county, is favored in having as its mayor a citizen of such marked progressiveness and loyalty as Mr. Lester, who is ally administering the affairs of the city government and who holds also the position of assistant cashier of the Cameron State Bank, one of the staunch and popular financial institutions of central Texas. Further interest attaches to the career of Mayor Lester by reason of the fact that he was born and reared in the county that is now his home and is a scion of one of the best known and most honored pioneer families of this favored section of the Lone Star State.

Elias P. Lester was born at Maysfield, Milam county, Texas, on the 30th of October, 1862, and is a son of Elias J. and Elizabeth (Nunn) Lester, both natives of Tennessee, where the former was born in 1823 and the latter in 1825, both having been children at the time of the removal of the respective families to Texas. Elias J. Lester came to Texas in 1834, at which time he was about eleven years of age, and his parents settled in Milam county. He became one of the representative pioneer farmers of this section of Texas and not only served as a gallant soldier in the revolution through which Texas was separated from Mexico and made an independent republic, but he also went forth as a representative of the same commonwealth as a soldier in the Civil war, in which he sacrificed his life in the cause of the Confederacy. His death occurred in 1863, and was the result of disease contracted when serving with his regiment. He was a man whose high principles and genial ways gained to him the respect and esteem of all who knew him, and his name merits an enduring place on the roster of the honored pioneers of the Lone Star State. His wife, who survived him by more than thirty years, was summoned to the life eternal in 1898, and thus passed away one of the revered pioneer women of Milam county. In the family were seven children—Sarah E, is the widow of Frank Jones, of Kerrville, Kerr county, Texas, where her husband was a successful farmer, and they have two children; Eliza E, is the widow of S. D. Beasley, who was a farmer and stock-grower of Callahan county, Texas, and they became the parents of seven children: William J., who is married and has two children, is a successful horti-eulturist at Durant, Oklahoma; Amanda J. is the wife of J. A. Mayes, a farmer at Gatesville, Coryell county, Texas, and they have five children; James E., who wedded Miss Ida Martin and has seven children, is a farmer and merchant of Jones Prairic, Milam county; Thomas died in intancy; and Elias P. is the immediate subject of this

Elias P. Lester was an infant at the time of his father's death and he was reared to adult age at the old family homestead at Maysfield, Milam county, where he attended the public schools until he had attained to the age of fifteen years. Thereafter he gave his attention to agricultural pursuits and stock-growing until he was twentyfour years of age, when he entered the employ of Edward D. Atkinson of Maysfield, in whose service he continued for seventeen years, in the capacity of bookkeeper. At the expiration of this period he removed to Cameron, the county seat, to assume the position of bookkeeper in the First National Bank. After one year he was advanced to the position of assistant cashier, and retained this encumbency five years, at the expiration of which he resigned the office to accept that of assistant cashier of the Cameron State Bank, with which he has been identified in this capacity since 1908. Mr. Lester has made an admirable record as an executive officer in connection with banking operations of appreciable scope and importance, and he has at all times been accorded the fullest measure of popular confidence and esteem. He is the owner of his attractive home property in Cameron, besides other city property, and has in his native county a well improved farm of 250 acres. He is also a stockholder in the State Bank of Burlington, Milam county, and one of its direc-

Adhering closely to the Democratic party, Mr. Loster has had no desire to enter the arean of so-called practical politics, though he is essentially liberal and progressive as a citizen. In 1913 he was elected to fill out an unexperience of the property of the service in this important office was that given in his re-election in 1914. Mr. Lester is a popular factor in the social life of his home city and the fact that he still permits his name to be enrolled on the list of eligible bachelors has in no sense militated against the good will thus manifested toward him by all who know him. He attends and supports the Presbyterian church in Cameron,

LOUIS ROBERT BARRAS. In 1909 Mr. Barras came to Texas from Portland, Oregon, and organized, with for Jones, the Fred A. Jones Building Company, with offices in Dallas and Houston, and this company achieved immediate and conspicuous success under the sole management of Mr. Barras.

Louis R. Barras was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, on September 28th, 1871, and is the son of Samuel T. and Isabella (Taylor) Barras, of Philadelphia also, and is directly descended from the old French Provened family of that name, whose proud boast is "Vivat Barrasia Proles, Antiquatate Nobilus, Virtute Nobillor" ("Live the descendants of Barras of the most ancient nobility, but in virtue excelling nobility"). Mr. Barras is the fifth generation in America.

Educated in Philadelphia, his first position was that of Assistant Engineer of Tests at the Pencoyd Iron Works, later becoming Chief Engineer of Tests. In 1892 he resigned to become an inspecting and consulting engineer with Messrs. Hildreth & Company, of New York; while with them be induced that company to enter the construction field and superintended for them several interesting projects, including one of the first high-speed interruban electric roads—that from Washington, D. C. to Alexandria, Virginia, and to Arlington; he also built two of the principal buildings for Smith College, North-ampton, Mass.

In 1900 and 1901 he was superintendent of the construction of certain Military Highways in Porto Rico, W. I., running from Arceibo to Utuado and from Manati to Morovis and Ciales. This work included not only the necessary grading and surfacing, but also some interesting bridge work and some of the largest concrete arches constructed up to that time.

Returning from Porto Rico in 1901, Mr. Barras became supernitendent for the George A. Fuller Company, of New York. This company was the pioneer in the introduction of the steel skyscraper, and is today the introduction of the steel skyscraper, and is today the largest building organization in the world. While with them he superintended the erection of Saks & Company's Store, the Spring-Broadway Building, the New Ansterdam Theatre, the Breslin Hotel, the New York Hippodrome.

Resigning from the Fuller Company, Mr. Barras undertook and carried through successfully some difficult work in the Mississpipi River below New Orleans, for the Foundation Company, of New York. This work involved the first use in this country of a floating pneumatic caisson for working men below water, and it excited considerable interest in scientific and engineering circles.

In 1896 Mr. Barras went to San Francisco, as General Superintendent for the Thompson-Starrett Company, of New York, and in two years handled the construction of some seventeen buildings, all designed to be fire and earthquare-proof, and costing from $200,000 to $1,000,000 each. From San Francisco he went to Portland, Oregon, as manager for the same company, and erected several of the most prominent buildings there.

In July, 1909, he came to Texas and since then has built The Kossonian Apartments (which are the largest and most expensive in Texas), the Bender Hotel, the Southwestern Telephone Main Building, the Sunset Hospital, the First Church of Christ Scientist, and the remodeling and building of addition to Messrs, Levy Brothers' Store, all in Houston. In Dallas he built the Country Club, Sumpter Building, Administration Building of the Southern Methodist University, the Municipal Building and several smaller structures in El Paso, the Paso del several smaller structures in El Paso, the Paso del several smaller structures in El Paso, the Paso del celeven-story steel office building, and minigham, Alambama, the twenty-story American Trust & Savings Bank Building.

Mr. Barras is a member of the Dallas Club, the Dallas Country Club, the Dallas Chamber of Commerce and the Dallas Automobile Club, A. A. A., and a non-resident member of the Southern Club and Country Club of Birmingham, Alabama.

In 1895 Mr. Barras married Madeleine Bliss Bennett Duncan, of Alabama, daughter of the Confederate Major Benjamin Duncan and Sue (Kidd) Duncan. Mrs. Barras is a direct descendant of Martha Jefferson, aunt of Thomas Jefferson. They have three children—Madeleine d'Orville, born in New York City, Louis Robert, 2d, born in Northampton, Massachusetts, and Martha Jefferson Virginia, born in Pelham, New York.

LAPAYETTE MURPHY. This name introduces one of the oldest families of Kaufman county, founded by a grand old pioneer, Captain DuBart Murphy, who was the father of the above named Larayette Murphy, and whose descendants are found nunerously both in Kaufman and other counties of the state and in the Southwest. The careers of both Captain Du Bart Murphy and Lafayette Murphy deserve more than ordinary mention among the noted Texans of the past.

Captain DuBart Murphy, who died in 1891, was for nearly half a century a resident of Texas. His was an eventful and adventurous career from his childhood. He came into the unexplored regions of the Southwest when seventeen years of age on a mission of humanity, and for twenty years before taking up his permanent home in Texas was a frequent traveler over the routes leading up and down the country to the west of the Mississippi. He was born at Genevieve, Missouri, May 26, 1806, a son of William Murphy and a grandson of William Murphy Grandfather Murphy was the youngest of three brothers who left Ireland and settled in the Virginia colony just before the outbreak of the Revolution. All were Baptist preachers, and the two older brothers, Joseph and Richard, remained loyal to the Crown, while William gave his support to the cause of independence and saw it succeed. William Murphy was a merchant and importer in Richmond when the war broke out, and, thinking that the affair would soon end, donated his coarser goods to the quartermaster for the use of the Colonial troops, and the nner goods he packed away in boxes and stored in a cellar to await the restoration of peace. When he finally reopened his stock, at the end of eight years of war, he found the boxes so rotten that they fell to pieces and his goods ruined with dampness and decay. During the war grandfather William Murphy was an officer in the Revolutionary army, and for four years served under Generals Nash, Knox and Putnam. After the war he moved to Tennessee, taking all his married children with him, and settling near Knoxville, where among his neighbors and associates were Captain Menafee and Governor Blount, the first governor of the state. After some years as a farmer there, he became restless and followed his pioneer desires to acquire a home beyond the Mississippi. All the country west of the Mississippi was then the territory of Louisiana, under the dominion of Spain and later of France. On horseback grandfather Murphy made a journey to the Spanish post of St. Louis, and arranged for a colony to be established in St. Genevieve county. He then returned home to arrange for the removal of his family, but, like Moses of old, he was not permitted to more than look towards the promised land, for he was cut off before the family started on its journey and his ashes still sleep in the Volunteer state. The event caused no change in the plans, and his widow, with the dauntless enterprise of pioneer women, became the practical leader of the family emigration. In 1798 with her married sons she headed the exodus for the Louisiana country. Their goods were loaded on to keel boats, floated down the Tennessee into the Ohio, and from the month of the Ohio up the Mississippi to Cape Girardeau. Five of the sons were then married, and each took a grant of land on the Missouri side of the river and chopped from the vast forest an abiding place and farm. The seven sons of grandmother Murphy were Josiah, David, Richard, DuBart (named in honor of the French merchant with whom his father did an import ing business prior to the Revolutionary war), Isaac, Jesse, and William. The last named was the father of Captain DuBart Murphy of Texas. Settling in the extreme southeastern corner of Missouri in what is now St. Francis county, the Murphys were so numerous as to give the community name Murphy Settlement. In a few years the Murphy settlement became a populous one, and strangers passing through began to feel safe in hailing every man as a Mr. Murphy, and it is claimed they setdom made a mistake. In that vicinity grandmother Murphy, who was a devout Christian, is said to have conducted the first Sunday school in the entire state of Missouri. She lived many years, witnessed the political events which transferred the Louisiana territory first to France and later to the United States, followed by the organization of Missouri territory and the admission of the territory as a state, and died in 1843 and is buried at Farmington in St. Francis county. Her maiden name was Rachel Henderson, and she was born in the Shenandoah Valley of Virginia. William Murphy, the father of Captain DuBart Murphy, was one of the family party which established pioneer homes in the Missouri settlement, and continued to live and reared his family in St.

Francis county.

The late Captain DuBart Murphy, who was the youngest of his father's children, grew up in Southeastern Missouri near the Mississippi river, had some recollection of the war of 1812, and saw the first steambart that passed along, a pioneer in the great river traffic that was subsequently developed along that highway. One of his first school teachers was Joshua Barton, a bruther of Judge David Barton, who, with Colonel Benton, was elected first United States senator from Missouri. When seventeen years of age, Captain Murphy was asked his uncle to make a trip to Jonesboro, I exas, to inquire into the death of his son Isaac, who was reported to have been killed by Indians. That was in the year 1923, and all the Arkansas country was practically unknown except to traders and trappers, and only a few themselves the country and host themselves in the example of the country and host themselves in the results. The country and host themselves in the results of the desired information. He made the journey on horse-back, found the settlement in which his count had lived about Jonesboro, learned the particulars of his death by the Indians, and returned as he came after the absence of two months.

From 1823 to 1828 Captain Murphy carried on mining and trading, edling beef to the lead niners in south eastern Missouri and driving horses south and selling them to the planters in the lower Mississippi Yalley, Subsequently he went to St. Louis and hired himself to the sheriff with a knife and wounded Captain Murphy board. Within a few months a negro highwayman killed the sheriff with a knife and wounded Captain Murphy himself. This event threw him out of employment, but agave him an acquaintance with Edward Bates, subsequently Lincoln's attorney general. In 1833 Captain Murphy went to New Orleans to buy goods for a merchant at Farmington who declined to make the trip himself peaces of the scourge of cholera in the Crescent

These are only a few of the many interesting events of this active career during the years before he came to Texas. In November, 1836, Captain Murphy married Miss Elizabeth Anthony, a daughter of Samuel Anthony of Madison county, Missouri. The children of that union are enumerated in a following paragraph.

Finally Mr. Murphy, becoming dissatisfied with his Missouri home, determined in 1841 to seek a new one. Having seen a statement in a newspaper published at Natchitoches that President Houston of Texas would hold a Treaty at the three forks of the Trinity, he de termined to be present at that negotiation, and set out alone, crossing the Red river at the mouth of Mill Creek. There he fell in with seven or eight others who were also going to the Treaty. The Treaty was held at Byrd's Fort near the present city of Dallas, and the only three white families in that locality were the Bryants, the Keenans and the Beemans. At this Treaty Mr. Murphy met General Houston for the third time. Some years previously, on taking a drove of horses through the Cherokee nation, he first saw the ex-governor of Tennessee, then living in exile, at Webber's Store. At another time he had become a traveling companion of the great Texas statesman at Fayetteville, Arkansas, and their routes lay Houston going to Natchitoches, where they separated, Houston going to Natchitoches and Murphy to Alexan-dria, Louisiana. To the end of his life Captain Murphy regarded Sam Houston as the greatest man be ever knew.

After the Treaty at the vicinity of Dallas, Captain Murphy and others visited other sections of the state along the Trinity, and the captain himself then returned home through Lamar county, where he rented a farm, and centinued his journey to Missouri to arrange to bring his family to Texas. They all arrived at their new home in Lamar county in the fall of 1842. After one year in Lamar, Captain Murphy moved to Hopkins county, settling near Hargrove's Mills, fifteen miles from Tarnt, which was then the county seat. In 1850 Captain Murphy moved to Kaufman county, first buying land near the mouth of East Pork, and a little later he moved to the vicinity of King Creek. While there he took an active and influential part in the second election for a county seat, and it was largely due to his activities that the vote decided in favor of Kingsboro. After about two years at Kingsboro Mr. Murphy moved to Old Trinidad, but became dissastisfied on account of the unhealthful locality, and in 1855 bought a farm and established his home in the Crandall community, which knew him intimately during the remainder of his life. There he entered into the spirit of home building and made an indelible impression upon his community. He was hopefully disposed, always bore a feeling of good will towards his fellows, entertained all with his ready wit and rich fund of stories and jokes, displayed an adaptability for business, and helped to fight some of the real battles and participated in many of the political skirnishes of the

During the war between the North and South, Captain Murphy was selected to raise a company in Kaufman county for Colonel Buford's regiment, and though past the military age succeeded in raising the full quota and was commissioned as the first captain. He served seven months, but saw none of the fighting, and his only acquaintance with the Yankees was with a few prisoners. When he resigned towards the end of 1862, Lieutenant Michaux became captain and the old captain returned to his farm. From the close of the war no event in his personal career occurred of special note. He lived quietly among his friends and neighbors until the death of his wife, after which he shared his time with his children until his own death in 1891.

By his marriage to Elizabeth Anthony, Captain Murphy had eleven children, named as follows: Ellen, who died tumarried; Amanda, who became the wife of Dr. Henley, and her two children died in infancy; Lafayette, a sketch of whose career follows; Samuel, who lives in Mills county, Texas; Henderson, a resident of Brownwood, Texas; Joseph, who died in Kaufman county; Williami, who died in the Confederate army; Mary, whose first husland was Henry Boykin and her second P. M. Lewis, and she died at Porney, Texas; Eliza, who married John A. Coleman of Kaufman; besides Barton and DuBart, both of whom died in infancy.

Lafayette Murphy, the oldest son of Captain DuBart Murphy, was born in St. Francis country, Missouri, December 14, 1839. He received a limited education in Kaufman county before the war, during which he had been crippled for life. He joined Captain Chisholm's Company A, Colonel Stone's Third Texas Cavalry, and saw some service in Missouri and Arkansas in Ross's Brigade, and, while in winter quarters, in 1861-62, lost his right leg in an accident and was sent back home maimed for life. Acquiring a fairly good elucation, he became a trader and farmer, death successfully in active, leaving an estate of more than seven hundred acres at his death in November, 1887. He was ever interested in all matters that he considered for the henefit of his community, and as a member of the Christian church was faithful to its teachings.

Lafayette Murphy was 'married within a mile of his home on December 18, 1866, to Miss Virginia V. Wade, whose birthplace is a few minutes walk of her present residence. Mrs. Murphy was a daughter of Vincent A. and Phoebe (Utley) Wade, who came from Gallaway county, Kentucky, to Texas in 1845. Her father died in 1847, the year in which Mis. Murphy was born. Mrs. Phoebe Wade, who died in 1883, had been left with a family of young children to support and for years braved and succeeded in rearing her children and giving them a good home and fair school training. After the dangers and hardships of her carlier career, she spent the evening of her life in the comforts of her children, and passed away in her seventy-sixth year. The children in the Wade family were: William L. who died in Panola county. Texas; B. W., who died in Kaufman county; Henry, who died before the family left Kentucky; Ann, who became Mrs. William Grubbs and later Mrs Otlando Anthony, and who also died in Kaufman county; John A., who died in Young county, Texas; Edward W., who spent his earlier He in Kaufman county; Jacob Sanders, who was left by IV.—A. Arizona; Baunister, who died in Kaufman county; and Virginia V., who is the sole survivor of the family.

The children of Lafayette and Virginia Marphy were as follows: Amanda, the wife of Dr. T. A. Miller of Corsienna. Texas; Modena, who died in Kaufman as Mrs. E. E. Thompson; Ed W., of G-ldfield, Nevada; William B., who conducts the family homestead; Joseph E., who was educated in the New York brauch of the Eastman Business College, who closed five years of business practice in New York with a cletskhip in the Fifth Avenue Trust Company, is now cashier of the Fifth Avenue Trust Company, is now cashier of the Fifth Avenue Trust Company, is now cashier of the Fifth Avenue Trust Company, is now cashier of the Fifth Avenue Trust Company, You will be shaded to the Fifth Avenue Trust Company, the New York Natheen and Mildred; Polly the youngest child of Mrs. Murphy, who children hamed Mary V., Donald, Kathleen and Mildred; Polly the youngest child of Mrs. Murphy, who died when five years of age. All the children except W. B. and Joseph E. were educated in the Add-Ran College at Thory Springs, Texas. The scholastic training of Joseph E. has been noted, while William B. received his education in Nashville, Pennessee.

Following the death of her husband, Mrs. Murphy assumed his place in the management of his affairs and carried on the business much as he had planned. She and her sons have added much to the productiveness of the farm by opening new land, building tenant houses and extending the domestic elements of farm hise to their wide domain. They have aligned themselves with the spirit of advancement and are amongst the most substantial and best esteemed people of Kaufman county. The Christian church has exercised its influence in the family in the rearing of the children, and Mrs. Murphy has been a faithful member of its circle since her mar-

WILEY MORROW, M. D., of Treuton, Texas, is a son of Drs, James, Sr., and Fannie Morrow, practicing physicians of Ellue Ridge, Collins county, Texas. He was born in Hunt county, Texas, October 27, 1877, where his father had gone as a youth of about eighteen years, in company with his parents from McMinn county. Temessee. He was born near McMinnville, in 185—was a son of Matthew Morrow, a modest Temessee farmer who settled near Pike, Hunt county, Texas, resumed farming, and died in that locality in 1888, at sixty-one years of age. The latter was a son of Captain Morrow, who obtained his title as a soldier after the Revolutionary War. Matthew Morrow married a Miss Baker, and they became the parents of ten children, among whom was James Harrison, the father of Dr. Wiley. Other children to grow up were: Annie, who is now decessed; Dr. John of Southerland Springs, Texas; Thomas of Pike, Texas; Dr. William of Snyder, Texas; George of Pike, Texas; Dr. William of Snyder, Texas; George of Pike, Texas; Andrew, Texas; George of Pike, Texas; and Cynthia, who married Hill Berry of that locality, who

James Harrison Morrow acquired his professional education in Tulane University, New Orleans, graduating in 1880. He began practice at Nobility, Fannin county, but for many years has been located in Collin county. His political alignment is of Republican persuasion, his father having espoused the Union cause during the Civil War and acted with the republican party afterward. As between the candidates for the presidency in 1912, Dr. Morrow followed the fortunes of Mr. Roosevelt. In 1876 Dr. James Harrison Morrow was married in Fannin county to Miss Fannin & Celustion, daughter of McCuistion, who came to Texas at the close of the Civil War. Some years after her marriage Mrs. Morrow decided to prepare for a professional career, and did so in the American College of Medicine, St. Louis, graduating from that school in 1892, and for the past twenty-one years has actively and efficiently practiced her profession. She is affiliated with the local and State medical societies, and is one of the professional women of Texas who are honoring medicine in its application to human ills. She and her husband have had two children: Dr. Wiley, and Dora, wife of Hall Melugin of Sabinal, Uvalde county, Texas.

Wiley Morrow was a student of Grayson College, Writewright, Texas, after the public schools, and chose medicine for a career in 1896, when he entered the American Medical College. When equipped as a physi-American Mettical Conege. When complete as a pres-cian, he began practice upon a certificate from the Dis-trict Board at Gainesville, Texas, in the community where he had grown up. He resumed the work of finish-ing his medical course in the Georgia College of Medicine and Surgery, Atlanta, and after graduating there, in 1901, resumed practice where he had left off. He located in Trenton in 1905, and in 1912 attended the Chicago Polyclinic for a course. He is a member of the state and national medical bodies, is Trenton's health officer, and local surgeon for the M., K. & T. Railway Company. In national politics, he is a progressive, and gives his support to Democratic candidates in Texas. Dr. Morrow is past chancellor of the Knights of Pythias, past noble grand of Oddfellowship, and a Master Mason.

On January 6, 1897, Dr. Morrow was married at Trenton, Texas, to Miss Katie Stapp, daughter of John C. and Susie (Dodd) Stapp. Mr. Stapp came from Ala: and Saste (Doud) Stapp. Mr. Stapp came from Ala: bama, and is the father of Katie, Hugh, Hubbard, Dud-ley and Clyde, wife of Stanley Simpson. Dr. and Mrs. Morrow have three children: Lucile, Marguerite and Bennie.

JOHN H. BEAVERS. A distinguished member of the JOHN H. BEAVERS. A distinguished memor of the Wood county har, John H. Beavers is a resident of Winnshoro, where he stands admittedly at the head of the bar and as one of the ablest and most successful attorneys in Northeast Texas. The following brief sketch and estimate of his career was written by one who has known him long, both in the law and in public life.

He was born in Franklin county, Texas, March 6, 1870, where he grew up to early manhood on a farm. His father, W. H. Beavers-"Major Beavers"—who died in Franklin county in 1886, was a native of the old Volunteer state, and at one time a member of the Tennessee legislature from McNairy county. While he did not enlist as a soldier, on account of advancing years, he nevertheless gave to the "Lost Cause" not only his moral support, but the services of three sons, one of whom died while wearing the gray. They were children of his first wife, who was Miss Cynthia Parker prior to her marriage, she dying in Tennessee. He later came to Texas and married the daughter of a Mr. Fitzgerald, her death occurring in November, 1911. The surviving children of this union are: Dr. W. L. Beavers of Hawkins, Texas; and John H. Beavers whose name introduces this sketch,

The early life of John H. Beavers was uneventful, but he was patient, industrious, studious, and modestly ambitious. Yet, while struggling with life's problems, he lost no opportunity to read law, and managed many trials of minor importance for his neighbors in the justices' courts, even before his admission to the bar. In this line of amateur practice, his success was without a parallel and served to stimulate his young ambi-He pursued his legal studies more ardently than ever and in due time was licensed to practice. He had been engaged in actual practice only a few years when he removed to Wood county and identified himself with the bar and fortunes of the thriving little city of Winnsboro. That was but little over a decade ago, and yet, in that comparatively brief period, he has won not only distinction as a lawyer, but commanding prominence as a useful citizen.

Mr. Beavers' wonderful success in the management of a noted murder case brought him prominently to notice as a criminal lawyer of exceptional ability. In the first trial of this case (known in Texas court history as the "celebrated Wallace case") the defendant got a death sentence. The brief filed by Mr. Beavers on appeal in the court of criminal appeals was declared by one of the able associate justices to have been one of the strongest and most exhaustive ever filed in that court, and yet he knew that it marked Mr. Beavers' first appearance in that august tribunal. The case was reversed. On a second trial in the district court, Wallace got a life sentence to the penitentiary. Again the case was appealed, with the same result—a reversal. Then a mistrial, and finally an acquittal. The theory upon which Mr. Beavers fought and ultimately won his famous cause, saving his client's life, involved some of the most intricate and vital features of the law of evidence that had up to that time ever perplexed the criminal courts of the state, and the opinion handed down in this case is now the settled law of the state on the questions involved.

The result of this famous trial, after two or three years of royal conflict in the courts, brought Mr. Beavers into immediate prominence. However, his career in this line of practice was at that time of short duration. The people saw the value of his services, and in 1906 he was elected district attorney over a very able opponent, by an overwhelming majority in the judicial district composed of the counties of Wood, Smith, Van Zandt and Upshur. He polled 2,144 of the 2,316 votes of Wood county. As a public prosecutor, he made a record of convictions with few parallels in the judicial annals of the state, exhibiting the same ability in the prosecution of men charged with crime that he had formerly displayed in their defense. During the last of his four years' service in this office, Mr. Beavers was urged by his host of friends to become a candidate for Congress on the Democratic ticket, and to vindicate their confidence and partiality, he consented to make the race. He made a spirited campaign before the people of the district, but was defeated by a rival candidate who held a commanding geographical advantage in the contest. The primary vote showed Mr. Beavers to have lost only one precinct in Upshur county and only two in Wood county, where he polled 1,250 votes to the other's 781. Although he lost the nomination, Mr. Beavers made a wide acquaintance and established himself among men of influence in the district. The following is a clipping from a comment made by some of his friends at the time he made the race for Congress. "We have known Hon. J. H. Beavers, and have heen closely identified with him since his boyhood days, and know him to be a man of the highest moral qualities, a profound, painstaking and qualified lawyer, and a man of exalted character and lofty ideals, possessing, in the highest degree, those qualifications and requisites so necessary to befit him for the place to which he aspires.'' Also it has been said of him by those who know him best that he embodies all of the higher traits of Southern citizenship.

His term of office as prosecutor having expired, he resumed the general practice of law. Since that time figured as leading counsel on one side or the other of nearly every important case tried in the district court of Wood county, both civil and criminal, besides often of wood county, both critical and channels, because appearing in leading cases in other counties. He has conquered the struggle of the past and is splendidly equipped to grapple fearlessly with the future. With not a spot or blemish on his public career or private. life, in the prime of life and in full possession of every faculty of mind and body, unimpaired by a single vice or weakness, it is but reasonable to foretell that the future of his life will be even more conspicuously successful than the past.

JUDGE D. R. PEARESON. For a number of years prominent in the official affairs of court and county, a former county judge, Mr. Peareson is one of the citizens whose

Peareson was born in Talladega, Alabama, and he married Minnie Rugeley.

The founder of the family in Texas was the paternal grandfather, Dr. E. A. Peareson, who brought his family to Texas when the late Philip E. was a boy of five or six years. Their first settlement was in Victoria county, whence they moved to Matagorda county, where Dr. Peareson died. Until the outbreak of the Civil war, Dr. Peareson was engaged in the practice of his profession, but then organized a company and went to the front as its head. Philip E. Peareson was a lieutenant under his father in that same organization, and came out of the war with the straps of cap-tain. He also was a member of General Granbury's staff. He was taken prisoner at Arkansas Post, but was subsequently exchanged, and then in the great battle of Franklin was again captured, and this time sent to Johnson's Island, the Federal Prison in Lake Erie, and was held in confinement there until the close of the war, and he suffered many hardships. On going out for service, he had been a member of Pat Cleburne's Division. Among other battles in which he was a participant was those of Missionary Ridge and Lookout Mountain. On returning to Matagorda county, after the war, Philip E. Peareson married, and then moved to Richmond, where his death occurred in 1895. The late Mr. Peareson was one of the big lawyers and prominent citizens of South At one time he was a candidate for congress against W. H. Crain, and subsequently made a gallant fight for the office of attorney general of Texas against Governor Hogg. He had made a splendid record as a soldier of the Confederacy, was a courageous and useful citizen, and had few equals among his contemporaries in the law. His father, Dr. Peareson, had died soon after returning home from the war. Minnie Rugeley, the mother of Judge Peareson, was a daughter of Alex Rugeley, who was a prominent planter and one of the pioneer set tlers of Texas. He had come to this state, Texas, shortly after the close of the Mexican war, becoming a settler in Matagorda county. During the war between the states he saw service in a home-guard company commanded by his brother, Captain E. S. Rugeley. Mrs. Minnie Peareson passed away in 1896.

Judge Peareson was one of the five children in the family. His brother, E. A. Peareson, now deceased, was a major in the Spanish-American war, in the First Texas Cavalry, whose commander was Col. Lather Hare, and he also was at one time tax collector of Fort Bend county, and was serving in the odiec of sherinf at the time of his death. The other children are Mrs. M. C. Andrus of Richmond; Thomas B. Peareson, the present county attorney, who at one time was a member of the legislature, and Mrs. P. G. Huston of Bay City, Texas,

Judge Peareson became a practicing lawyer in 1890, and in 1895 took up the large practice left in his hands by the death of the eminent father. His early education was attained at St. Mary's Preparatory School in San Antonio, and subsequently at the Agricultural & Mechanical College of Bryan. In the office of his father he continued his law studies until admission to the bar, and since the year 1895 has been in constant practice, with a large and growing patronage, not only that inherited from his father, but much that has been won through his own pronounced ability as a lawyer. In 1904 he was elected to the office of Contry Judge of Fort

Bend county, that position having been tendered him without any solicitation on his part. He remained incumbent of the office for two terms, a total of four years, the limit imposed under the rule of the Jay Bird Democratic Association. Previous to this time he had been elected county surveyor, but did not qualify for that office. He has also served as president of the school board for more than six years, and for four years was president of the Jay Bird Association. Much public improvement in his home town and county may be credited to the administration of Judge Peareson. The present school building in Richmond was erected while he was a member of the board, and the new courthouse and the new bridge at Rosenberg were practically completed during his administration acounty judge.

He showed himself an administrator with rare executive ability, and made his administration a high standard in the annals of county government.

On June 15, 1892, Judge Peareson married Miss Mary Sargent of Matagorda county, a daughter of Jno. F. Sargent. Their only child is Philip E., who is now in college at Lebanon, Tennesses. Judge Peareson and wife are members of the Episcopal church of Richmond, and he has served as warden for eighteen years. He is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, and Mrs. Peareson is an active member in the Daughters of the Copfederacy.

Judge Peareson is one of the best known and prominent men of his country; has been urged to run for the office of District Judge, but refused to make the campaign. He has gained material evidences of success, as well as the high esteem of his community, and occupies an enviable place in his home country.

GAYLE TARVER SNEDECOR. One of the ablest as well as one of the most energetic of the younger generation of Fort Bend county citizens, Mr. Snedecor is a former district clerk of the county, is one of the leaders in the Democratic party, and is soon to take up active practice as an attorney.

Gayle Tarver Suedecor was born in Fort Bend county, Texas, March 9, 1881, and is a son of Bolivar G, and Sallie (Tarver) Snedecor. His father was born in Greene county, Alabama, and his mother in Texas. The father eame to Texas in 1868, and now resides upon a splendid farm on the Colorado River in Fort Bend county. The Snedecors are an old and prominent southern family, who before the war owned slaves, and Bolivar Snedecor has long been a man of high standing in Fort Bend county, possessing an alert mind and keen intelligence.

Gayle T. Snedecor was largely self-taught, and that was due to the fact that when he was a boy, attending the common schools, the term lasted only about three months each year. In 1898 he began working as a lineman for the Bay City Telephone Company, helping to construct the first telephone line in Bay City, at a time when there was only the courthouse and a few old buildings on the site. Another early occupation was the driving of burgies and mule teams between Wharton and ployed on farms, in stores, and elsewine. That was followed by six mouths of hard study at home under the tutoring of an old schoolmaster.

Mr. Snedecor then took a position as bookkeeper on one of the state farms, near Arcola, having charge of the commissary department. That was followed by work in the general merchandise department of the Arcola Sugar Mills, where he remained for five years. He was then bookkeeper for the J. R. Fenn estate, at Duke, and later, in September, 1905, was employed by the Brazoria Irrigation Company of Riecton, for one year. About that time Mr. Snedecor first entered practical politics. A candidate for the office of district clerk of Fort Bend County, his election encountered no opposition. The duties of the office was a period of about eight months spent in West Texas in order to recuperate his health. After retiring from his official duties, Mr. Snedecor engaged in business for himself for about four years, and has since sold out, and at the present writing is preparing to take up the practice of law. Mr. Snedecor has always been active in Democratic politics, and is at present Democratic chairman of Precinct No. 1. He refused an offer upon the part of the people to run him for state senator.

Iu 1906 Mr. Snedecor was united in marriage with Miss Ruby Schmidt of Harris county, daughter of F. J. Schmidt, an old Confederate soldier and a member of Dick Dowling Camp of the Confederate Veterans at Houston. He was once the sole owner of the famous Schmidt Gardens of Galveston, long ago converted to other purposes. To Mr. and Mrs. Snedecor have been born two children, Winona and Juanita, both of whom are living. Mr. Snedecor is a charter member of the Rosenberg Masonie Lodge, and was made a Mason at Richmond, in Morton Lodge, No. 72, A. F. & A. M. He and his wife hold lifetime membership in the Sons and Daughters of the Confederacy. Such are the bare facts of biography in regard to the career of Gayle Tarver Snedecor. That outline does not reveal the actual personality, and, in order to create a proper estimate of the man as he is, this article will be supplemented with a quotation from a character sketch written by one who has had opportunities to appreciate Mr. Snedecor at close rauge. This pen sketch is as follows: "The world is all too full of middle-of-the-road, mediocre men; so it is refreshing to find a man who possesses that distinct individuality and strength of mind which mark him as one of that comparatively small band who blaze out the trail, and have been doing so since the world began. Gayle Tarver Snedecor is as clear-cut an individual as a lightning flash; yet he is one of the most unassuming of men. A reader and a deep, bold thinker, his position is always pronounced and definite. A splendid specimen of physical manhood, he has hair the color of the famous house of Hapsburg, but features finer than ever the most aristocratic scion of that great house possessed. To talk with him is a pleasure, as his mind is stored with an amazing knowledge of literature, economics, and political and civic facts, many of them not culled from books, but from direct experience. He quotes readily from the best in the world of books, and the man who hopes to argue with him in glittering generalities will soon find himself in deep water; for along with the decided poetic strain in his nature is a most exacting and hard-headed side. which moves him to take nothing for granted and demands proof."

JUDGE GORDON RUSSELL, United States Judge of the Eastern District of Texas since 1910, is one whose public service has been of a varied nature, but always in the line of his profession. He is a son of Georgia parents, but was born at Huntsville, Alabama, at the home of his maternal grandfather, Judge James H. Gordon.

Maj. H. A. Russell, the father of Judge Russell, was formerly of Dalton, Georgia, but is now a resident of Atlanta. For many years prior to his removal from Dalton he was engaged in mercantile pursuits in that place. The mother of the Judge was Mary E. Gordon. The Gordon family settled in Virginia in the early days of that colony, and from Virginia that portion of the Gordon family from which Judge Russell was descended moved to North Carolina, and they were there resident during the days of the American Revolution, taking part with the colonists and fighting in the American army at the battle of King's Mountain. From North Carolina two hrothers of the Gordon family moved to the state of Georgia. One of these brothers was Zachariah Gordon, the father of the Confederate General, John B. Gordon, and the other brother was Judge James H. Gordon, the grandfather of Judge Russell of this review. Through his father's family, the Judge is related to the Hardees of Georgia, his paternal grandmother, Caroline Russell, having formerly been Caroline Hardee, a sister of the Confederate general, William J. Hardee.

Gordon Russell was educated at the Sam Bailey Institute, Griffin, Georgia, and at the Crawford High School, in Dalton, Georgia, finishing with an A. B. degree at the University of Georgia. After his graduation, he read law, at the same time occupying himself with school teaching, and he was admitted to the bar in 1879, while still a minor, and soon thereafter he came to Texas, Settling in Canton, Van Zandt county, Texas, in 1880, Mr. Russell was elected county judge four years later. He relinquished the office voluntarily after one term of service and resumed the practice of his profession, and in 1888 he moved to Wills Point, Van Zandt county, where he continued in practice until 1895, when he removed to Tyler, Smith county. That place continued his home and the center of his professional activities until 1910, when he took up his residence in Sherman, upon election to his present office, and here he still resides.

In 1892 Judge Russell was elected District Attorney of the Seventh Judicial District of Texas, and was reelected to the office in 1894. While serving his second term as district attorney a vacancy was created in the office of Judge of the District Court by the resignation of Hon. Felix J. McCord, whereupon the governor of the state appointed District Attorney Gordon Russell to fill that vacancy. At the next general election, in 1896, he was elected to the office by the people, and in 1910 was re-elected to the office without opposition. While he was serving his second term as judge of the State District Court, he resigned that office to become a member of Congress, having been elected to that body in 1902.

The election of Judge Russell to Congress was preceded by a campaign between himself and Hon. R. C. DeGraffenried which attracted the attention of the entire state. The two rival candidates held a series of joint debates, which were attended by great audiences, and the discussions were characterized by intense vigor and earnestness. The people of the district were greatly wrought up by the campaign and personal feeling ran high. The result of the contest was the election of Judge Russell by a large majority. He was re-elected to congress in 1904, in 1906, and again in 1908.

In 1910 a vacancy was made in the office of United States District Judge for the Eastern District of Texas by the death of Judge David E. Bryant. Judge Russell was at that time serving the term in Congress to which he had been elected. He was not an applicant for the United States Judgeship, but had declared his intention of becoming a candidate for re-election to Congress, and had announced himself to his constituents in an address to that effect. Notwithstanding these facts, President Taft selected him as United States Judge and sent his nomination to the Senate of the United States. The nomination was unanimously confirmed by the Senate, and Judge Russell was commissioned by the President as United States Judge of the Eastern District of Texas on June 6, 1910.

Soon after receiving his commission Judge Russell resigned his seat in Congress and entered actively upon the discharge of the duties of his office of Judge of the United States Court. The oath of office was administered to him by Chief Justice Edward D. White, then Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the ceremony occurred at the Department of Justice in Washington, being witnessed by a number of his friends, among them being Postmaster General A. S. Burleson.

During his service in Congress, Judge Russell gave special attention to those questions which were of legal nature, and he was regarded by his fellow members as a reliable and accurate lawyer. He engaged in many of the debates in Congress when legal propositions were under consideration, and attracted attention by the clear. .

ness of his statements of the law. After delivering his speech on the Hepburn Rate Bill he was invited to make an address before the bar association at Buffalo, New York. He accepted the invitation, and made an address that was received with favor by the Bar and by the Press. It was, no doubt, due to the character of the arguments that he made in the House of Representatives that President Taft, though a Republican, determined to appoint him to the Judgeship he now holds. Judge Russell participated in some of the most important debates in Congress, notably in the discussions of the White Slave Law, the Hepbarn Bill, the Railroad Rate Bill, and the proposed Arbitration law.

Judge Russell has been twice married. His first wife was Miss Jennie Matthews, to whom he was married in 1884. Five children were born of that marriage, only two of them surviving. His second wife was Miss Annie Ford, whom he married in 1897 and by whom he has one child. His surviving children are Mrs. Albert M. Lindsay of El Paso, Texas; Mr. Henry Russell, an attorney at law of Sherman, Texas, and Miss Annie Laurie Russell, also of Sherman,

STEPHEN DECATUR O'BRIEN. A residence of more than fifty-four years and a life characterized by business activity and honor well entitle Stephen Decatur O'Brien of Liberty to more than passing mention as one of his community's representative men. He has not confined his energies to one line of business, but has made it his aim to attain the highest degree of perfection along several directions, has been alert and enterprising, and possesses a positive genius for devising and executing the right plan at the right time. Moreover, he has maintained a policy in harmony with the old and time-tried maxim concerning honesty and labor, and his business record might be summed up in the phrase "through struggles to success."

Mr. O'Brien was born in St. Mary's Parish (now Morgan City), Louisiana, April 27, 1853, and is a son of Charles Wallace and Felid (Salles) O'Brien. Mr. O'Brien's great-grandfather, Christopher O'Brien, served as a private in a Virginia company during the Revolutionary War, prior to the outbreak of which he had owned large landed estates, which, however, he lost during the struggle for American independence. · Among the children of the old patriot were a daughter, whose family became prominent in Virginia affairs, and a son, Christopher. The latter married a Miss Berwick, moved to Illinois, then to Louisiana, where Berwick's Bay (now Morgan City) was named after his wife's family, and finally passed away, after some years spent in agricultural pursuits. His brother George lived during the last years of his life at Beaumont, where he passed away, while another brother, Luke, came to Texas and died at Liberty. All reared families. The children born to Christopher O'Brien and his wife were as follows: Andrew; George; Charles Wallace; America, who married Captain Stevens and passed the greater part of her life in Louisiana, but died at Liberty, Texas; Cynthia, who came to this state and married Frank Hardin, a Tennesseean and one of the old surveyors of Liberty county, and died here; Katie, who married Mr. Bagley and died here, and Virginia, who married Mr. Collins and remained in Louisiana.

Charles Wallace O'Brien was born in Louisiana, and was given a very limited education in his youth. He passed his life as a farmer of the slaveholding class, and died in the Liberty community in 1879 at the age of sixty-five years. He was in sympathy and harmony with the Confederacy during the war between the South and the North and contributed his service to the cause by his activities as a civilian in his home place. He never held public position in his life, preferring to devote his whole time and attention to his own affairs, and was without membership in fraternal organizations of any kind, although he had a wide acquaintance and was popular with his fellow men. On an occasion in his youth Mr. O'Brien was insulted by a minister of the Gospel, and ever after that throughout his life he avoided the church. Mr. O'Brien was married in Louisiana to Miss Felid Salles, a French lady, who belonged to a pioneer family of that state, and they became parents of a family of ten children, as follows: Hor-tense, who became the wife of Ed Cullen and is now a resident of Austin, Texas; Permelia, who became the wife of John Ridley and passed away at Waco, Texas; Rowenna, who became Mrs. Dick Hardin and died in Leon county, this state; Stephen Decatur of this review; Charles W., who died in Leon county; Benjamin Michael, a merchant of Liberty and farmer and stock raiser of Liberty county, a sketch of whose career appears on another page of this volume; Frank, who passed away in childhood; Christy S., who died unmarried in Dallas county, Texas; Mary Juanita, who resides at San Antonio, and Florialla White, who is the wife of H. A. Speer of San Antonio.

Stephen Decatur O'Brien was not yet seven years of age when he came with his parents to Liberty county, in February, 1860, and here he grew to manhood, near Liberty, on the family homestead, making the most of his opportunities for an education, although his school advantages were not many. He remained with his fa-ther until he became of age, and, when he reached his majority, embarked in farming and stock raising on his own account in this community. In this he has been engaged to the present time, although he has also passed some twenty years as a merchant. He engaged in merchandising at Liberty in 1886, and was identified with the firm of B. M. O'Brien & Brother until 1906, when a dissolution occurred and S. D. O'Brien resumed more actively his farming and stock raising. His ranch and farm are in the Martin Survey, and be has been a factor in the development of other farms near Liberty. He is baving tilled some 275 acres, which gives employment to thirty-five families, and other outside labor is required from time to time. Tenant houses have risen on his land at the bands of Mr. O'Brien, besides his new residence in Liberty, which is of moderu type and adds conspicuously to the appearance of the town. This residence is a two-story structure of seven rooms, commodious and convenient, with open stairs and curtained openings, finished in mission, and it sets off handsomely the large, picketed yard. The O'Brien store also, where he did business for so many years, is an example of the work he has done in developing Liberty. He has served the town as an alderman, and has given efficient service on the board of education, and in a political way has allowed himself to serve his county and city in conventions as a Democratic delegate.

On February 21, 1900, Mr. O'Brien was married at Liberty to Miss Nonie Crain, a daughter of Capt. E. J. Crain, who came hither from Ibberville Parish, Lonisiana, Mr. Crain, who died in Liberty, was a school teacher by vocation, and for some time was also engaged in the sawmill business here. During the great struggle between the South and the North be served in the ranks of the Gray, in command of an infantry company, and subsequently passed his life as a private citizen. He and his wife were the parents of the following children: Mrs. O'Brien; Georgie, who is the wife of William Lanwehr of Houston, Texas: Cora, who married Shelby Stiles of Fort Worth; Leila, who married R. W. Leslie of Galveston, and Miss Corinne, principal of the school of Devers, Texas. Four children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. O'Brien, namely: Berwick Crain, Decatur, Charles D.

and Felide Corinne.

Walter Gresham. Galveston has been fortunate in the character of its citizens of light and leading. Otherwise, perhaps, the colossal material misfortunes which have at various times passed that way would have overwhelmed the spirit as it did the structure of the city. Praise is due to many, and the honors and rewards have often been parceled out to the deserving, but to none more than to Walter Gresham. Only occasionally does it happen that a citizen while alive and active in the cause to which he has devoted his years and efforts becomes the object of an affection and esteem which usually attach to the memory and not to the living presence. One need live in the city of Galveston but a short time in order to appreciate, as did the writer a few years ago, with what peculiar inflection of admiration and respect the name of Walter Gresham is spoken by associates and citizens of every class. His has been a career in which disinterested labor in behalf of a community and civic patriotism has dominated over all private interests and individual successes. He is a lawyer by profession, an able one, at that, but only comparatively few who know him think of his professional attainments; rather is he the booster of all the hig things which represent a practical realization of Galveston's ideals. Mr. Gresham has lived in Galveston since the close of the Civil war, in which he served with the efficiency of a good soldier, and he is as keenly and vigorously a man of the present and modern spirit as the youngest citizen.

A Virginian by birth, Walter Gresham was born in King and Queen county, July 22, 1841, a son of Edward and Isabella (Mann) Gresham. His father, who was educated for the law but never practiced, owned a large Virginia plantation and devoted his time to its operation. On that old plantation, and with the surroundings and atmosphere of the old-time Virginia societies, Walter Gresham grew up and received his early education in private schools. Still pursuing his studies when the war broke out, in 1861, he went into the Confederate service. While recuperating from illness and wounds received in his first campaign, he entered the University of Virginia and studied during the fall of 1861. In the following spring he returned to the army, and remained until the spring of 1863, when he returned to the University and completed his law course, graduating with the degree of L. B. in June, 1863. As the war was still in progress, there was neither opportunity nor inclination to take up active practice. He returned to his duties as a soldier, and continued with the Virginia army until the final surrender, in 1865. During the following months he accumulated a little capital, and then started for Texas, arriving at Galveston December 31, 1866. At the beginning of the following year he was established in an office and enrolled on the list of Galveston attorneys, where he remained for forty-five years.

The first large public enterprise connected with the welfare of Galveston and with which Walter Gresham was associated was the organization of Galveston citizens in 1875 for the purpose of constructing a new railroad outlet in order to place the city in reach of the great productive regions lying behind it. Before the war, one line of railroad had been constructed, from Galveston to Houston, but, as that road had the monopoly of transportation, its service was apparently conducted with a lack of fairness which discriminated severely against the prosper-ity of the port city. Mr. Gresham, therefore, was one of the active leaders in the organization of a syndicate of Galveston citizens who acquired the charter of the Gulf, Colorado and Santa Fe Railroad Company, which company undertook and carried out the construction of a railroad ten hundred and fifty miles in length. Gresham was one of the directors of the company. By 1876 this road was built from Galveston to Arcola, and finally was carried on to the northern limits of the state. In 1886, when the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fe was consolidated with the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe System, Mr. Gresham was second vice president of the necessity of a suitable harbor for ocean-going vessels. This brought about the deep-water movement, the history of which extends over a long period of years and cannot be entered into in detail at this point, except to say that Mr. Gresham was at all times vigorously fighting in behalf of this movement and has probably been the greatest individual factor in its successful culmination. In 1888 he was one of the organizers of the meeting of the states west of the Mississippi river for the purpose of building a deep-water harbor on the coast of Texas. At this meeting having been made chairman of a committee to urge the matter before Congress, he spent months in Washington, and finally had the satisfaction of seeing Congress pass the law, in September, 1890, authorizing the expenditure, under a continuing contract, of $6,200,000 for the construction of jetties-the first practical step in the creation of a permanent harbor at Galveston. Mr. Gresham drafted the resolution passed by Congress, December 17, 1889, which provided for the appointment of a board of engineers to examine the ports along the coast of Texas and to determine upon the one most worthy of improvement, the same to conform in dimensions to the harbor described by the convention composed of delegates from twenty-two states and territories which met at Denver, Colorado, in the fall of 1888. This board, after examining the various points on the Texas coast. unanimously reported in favor of the selection of Galveston as the point to be made a first-class harbor. In this way was obtained the thirty-foot channel and provisions made for the accommodation of the largest vessels at that time afloat on deep-sea waters.

In the meeting of the Trans-Mississippi Congress at Muskogee, in 1907, Mr. Gresham drew up the resolution to Congress requesting that deep-water improvements should be continued, and that resolution was acted upon by Congress May 27, 1908. The work carried out in pursuance of these resolutions and plans has resulted already in the making of the port of Galveston one of the largest deep-water harbors in the world, of sufficient area to accommodate all the navy and merchant shipping that could be gathered in Atlantic and Gulf waters. From the first work of the army engineers to the present, Mr. Gresham has represented the interests of Galveston and has directed the great enthusiasm of his nature to the success of the great enterprise.

In 1901-2 he was president of the Trans-Mississippi Congress, and was vice president for Texas of the National Rivers and Harbors Congress. He has performed most of his civic work in his capacity as a private citizen. However, he has an important record of official He was a member of the Twentieth, Twenty-first and Twenty-second legislatures of Texas, representing Galveston county for six years, from 1887 to 1892 inclusively. During the Twenty-second legislature he was a member of the committee, of which Chief Justice Brown was chairman, which drafted the railroad commission law of Texas. Two of the provisions of that law, which was the first practical measure providing for a railroad commission in all the states, owe their authorship to Mr. Gresham. The first was the provision conferring upon the railroad commission the power to fix The second feature is what is known as the "Long and Short Haul'' clause. Neither of these important provisions, now so familiar in legislation affecting transportation, was embraced in the original bill, as introduced in the legislature, and both were adopted as amendments after much discussion.

Mr. Gresham in 1892 was elected a member of the Fifty-third Congress, representing the Tenth congressional district, taking his seat on March 4, 1893. He served until March 4, 1895. He was a candidate for reelection, but lost the nomination under the two-thirds rule by a few votes. Later he was again a candidate for nomination, and carried his district in the convention, but, being a supporter of the gold Democracy, he refused the nomination because of the free-silver plank in the platform. It is noteworthy that during his term in Congress he was one of the few men who voted against free silver in all its phases.

After his congressional career, Mr. Gresham took up the deep-water work and his law practice, and was also associated in the construction of the Galveston, LaPorte and Houston Railroad, now a part of the Southern Pacific system.

Mr. Gresham was a member of the deep-water committee of fifteen members in 1900. After the storm of September of that year, he was one of a subcommittee of three, consisting of himself, R. Waverly Smith and Farrell D. Minor, appointed by the deep-water committee to devise measures and practical plans for relief and reconstruction of the city. It was this committee which originated and drafted the plan of commission government, which has since been known all over the world as the "Galveston idea." This idea introduced for the first time in American cities on a practical basis the simple form of municipal government comprehended under the commission plan. From the time of its origin in the minds of the subcommittee, a little more than a decade ago, the commission form of government, with various modifications, has spread to hundreds of cities throughout the United States. Walter Gresham not only performed a great service in helping to organize a new scheme of government for Galveston, but was a leader iu all the great work of rehabilitation which followed after the storm. Among other things, he drafted the bills by which the state of Texas donated to the city of Galveston the state taxes collected in Galveston county for a period of eighteen years, the proceeds from which were to be used in enabling the city to raise the grade of its general surface, a work which was successfuly carried out at a total cost of $2,000,000. The city, through its board of engineers, worked out the plans for grade raising, and then issued bonds to the amount of two million dollars to pay for the work. The cost from the state to the city through the donation of Texas has thus far more than enabled the city to pay the interest and sinking fund for these bonds. Mr. Gresham was also one of the vigorous proponents of the plan for the construction of a sea wall, and that undertaking was started and carried out under the auspices of the county of Galveston as a part of the protective system for the city and was completed at a cost of $1,500,000. The bonds issued by the county for this purpose, and bearing four per cent interest, were taken up chiefly among the citi-zeus of Galveston. Mr. Gresham and District Judge R. G. Street formulated the law under which the sea wall was built by the county. Mr. Gresham at the present time is a member of the executive committee of the Inter-Costal Canal Commission, is president of the Galveston & Western Railroad Company, president of the Senorita Valley Land & Colonization Company, and is one of the active members of the Galveston County Bar Association and the Texas State Bar Association.

On the 26th of October, 1868, Mr. Gresham was married to Miss Josephine C. Mann, a daughter of William and Esther Mann of Corpus Christi, her parents having been early settlers in that section of Texas. Mr. and Mrs. Gresham have a fine family of children. They are: Esther, who married W. B. Lockhart of Galveston; Josephine C., wife of W. T. Armstrong of Galveston: T. Dew Gresham, an attorney at Dallas; Frank S. Gresham, a civil engineer by profession and now engaged in the flour milling business at Guthrie, Oklahoma; Beulah Gresham, at home, and Philip, in the real estate business at Los Angeles, California. Three children are deceased. The Gresham homestead, in Galveston, is a beautiful and attractive residence at 1406 Broadway.

DREW S. DAVIS, M. D. For many years a successful physician of San Augustine county, and now president of the First National Bank of San Augustine, Dr. Davis represents a family which is alike one of the oldest and most distinguished in this section of Texas. Its annals are replete with military and pioneer achievements, and its various members, both men and women, have borne honorable and valuable relations to their respective communities in many different sections of the country.

Dr. Drew S. Davis was born in San Augustine, in 1868, a son of Ludwill Rector and Mary C. (Polk) Davis, both of whom are still living, at advanced age. Going back as far as possible in the family annals, this branch of the Davis family originated in England and Wales, and its original stock is the same from which the late Jefferson Davis descended. The great-grandfather of Dr. Davis was Warren Davis, who had an eventful career. He had fought in the Revolutionary war for the independence of the American colonies, and even before that time had been on the western frontier. During the French and Indian war he was captured by the Indians. For four years he remained a prisoner, and at the Treaty of Peace between the Indians and the government a parcel of land thirty-six square miles in extent was reserved by the chief and deeded to Warren Davis. This land was in southern Ohio, not far from the site where the city of Cincinnati afterwards grew up. Warren Davis later came, with his two sons, to Texas, about the time the Austin colony was planted in that state, but his own setlement was independent of Austin's followers. He located near what is now the town of San Augustine.

Dr. Davis' grandfather was Elias Kincholoe Davis, who was born in Kentucky, was likewise an early settler in eastern Texas, and helped capture the old stone fort at Nacogdoches from the Mexicans.

The venerable Ludwill Rector Davis, who was born near San Augustine in 1828, is now the oldest living resident of that historic community. As a boy of eight years, in 1836 he participated in the famous "runaway scrape" from the Mexicans while the army of Houston was slowly retiring before the advancing hosts of Santa Anna. In spite of his youth, he rendered considerable assistance in caring for the women and children when they crossed the Texas border into Louisiana. This old pioneer's home is five miles west of San Augustine, on the same farm where he was born. Along with the quiet industry and honorable relations which he has sustained to his community through many years, he has lived an otherwise eventful life. In 1852 he went west, to Califoruia, and spent seven years as a gold miner, with headquarters at Stockton. His return to his native country occurred a short time before the war broke out between the states, and at San Augustine he was one of the first to enlist, in April, 1861, for the Confederate service. As a soldier, he was with the troops under General Johnston and General Hood, and was in many campaigns through Tennessee, Mississippi and Georgia. After the Atlanta campaign, he was with the troops under General Hood, who returned to Tennessee, and was engaged in the battle of Franklin, where he received several wounds. He still carries a minie ball as a memento of that battle. He was carried off the field a prisoner, taken to Camp Chase, Ohio, later to Point Lookout, Maryland, where he was discharged some time after the war. On account of wounds and other delays, he did not reach home until July, 1865. During his mining experience in California he had acquired a start of capital, but it was practically all swept away during the war, and he had to begin life anew. He returned to the old place, west of San Augustine, and has been a planter and farmer throughout the rest of his career. He is one of the greatly revered oldtimers of San Augustine county

Mary C. Polk, the mother of Dr. Davis, was born four miles southwest of San Augustine, and was the daughter of the late Judge Alfred Polk, who settled in San Augustine county in 1836. This family springs from the same stock that produced President James K. Polk, its history going back to the earliest times in Scotland. Alfred Polk was born in Tennessee. For seventeen years during the early history of the county he was judge of San Angustine county. He married Nancie McKeever, whose history proves that she was a remarkable woman. She reared ten children of her own, two sets of orphan children, kept house faithfully for sixty years, and her husband's was the first death that occurred in her family, Judge Polk died in 1889. Six of the sons of Alfred and Nancie Polk served in the Confederate army, and one of them was killed in battle.

Dr. Davis was reared in San Augustine county, attended the local schools, and in 1893 graduated from the Sam Houston Normal Institute, at Huntsville. During portions of six years he taught school, and largely from the proceeds of that work prepared for a medical career. His professional education was received through two years in the medical department of the University of Texas, at Galveston, and by one year of study in Barnes Medical College, now the medical department of the University of Missouri, at St. Louis. In 1898 he graduated M. D. at St. Louis. However, by special license he had begun practice in 1895 at Ironosa, in San Augustine county and altogether was in practice there successfully for about fifteen years. In 1908 Dr. Davis moved his home and office to San Augustine, establishing the headquarters for a large professional service. In 1902 he had become a stockholder, and later a director, in the San Augustine National Bank. When this was merged into the First National Bank, he continued as director, and in 1912 was chosen president of the First National Bank. Dr. Davis is affiliated with Redland Lodge, No. 3, A. F. & A. M., and he and his family worship in the Presbyterian faith.

Dr. Davis married Miss Effic May Greer, a daughter of L. V. Greer. She is a grandniece of Dr. L. V. Greer and of Lieut, Gov. John A. Greer and a cousin of Senator George C. Greer. This is an old San Augustine family, whose members have spread to other states. Dr. Davis and wife have six children: Nellie Vance, Drew S. Jr., Kittle May, Annie B., William Thomas and Eugenia Angia.

H. E. HOOVER. It is a fact which would hardly seem probable, were it not proved by irrefutable evidence, that a majority of the men who today stand at the head of the various professions and in business and financial circles entered upon their careers with few resources other than those with which they were endowed by nature. There seems to be something in the mere fact of original poverty which brings out the latent talents and develops the character of an individual, supplying him with the ambition to do and the ability to perform, where, under different circumstances, the incentive being lacking, the possessor of these rare gifts might have passed his days in mediocrity, unknowing and unknown. Texas furnishes numerous examples of those who have fairly won the oft-abused but still honorable title of "self-made man," and among them H. E. Hoover, legal practitioner of Canadian, takes prominent rank. A brief review of his career will illustrate the steps by which he has gained his high standing not alone in his profession but in the world of business as well.

H. E. Hoover was born at Murfreesbore. Rutherford county, Tennessee. November 16, 1863, and is a son of H. N. and Amanda (Rankin) Hoover, natives of Tennessee. His father, a well-known farmer and merchast of Murfreesboro enlisted for service in the Confederate army during the war between the North and the South, and become captain of a company in the Twenty-first Tennessee Regiment. He was wounded first at the battle of Shiloh and in 1863 received a wound at Island No. 10 which proved mortal, his death occurring at Natchez. Mississippl. A man in the prime of 11fe, only twenty-four years of age, he was a martyr to the Lost Canse, but left behind him a record of which his family has no reason to feel ashamed. Mr. Hoover married Amanda Rankin, who was educated, reared and married in the Big Bend State, and she still survives him and makes her home with her son at Canadian, being seventy-three years of age. Two children were born to this union: Dr. Thomas R., who was a practicing physician at Canadian until his death in 1891; and H. E.

In his youth Mr. Hoover had to be content with such educational advantages as were to be secured in the log school house in the vicinity of his mother's plantation, on which he worked faithfully during the summer months, accepting whatever opportunities presented themselves to gain more learning or to earn extra money. He first came to the Panhandle of Texas April 5, 1886, and located at Higgins, Lipscomb county, on a section of land, but not long thereafter returned to Tennessee and entered the law department of Cumberland University, Lebanon. He was graduated from that institution in the spring of 1889, and almost immediately thereafter returned to Lipscomb county, where he was engaged in practice until 1891, that year marking his advent in Canadian. The foresight which made him confident of the future of Texas and the opportunity for achieving success here has since been amply justified, for he is today known as one of the ablest legists in this part of the State. While he is essentially a professional man, he has grasped business opportunities as he has seen them, and today holds directorships in the Santa Fe Railway System, the First National Bank of Canadian, the White House Lumber Company, the Canadian Water, Light and Power Company, the Texas Bonding and Casualty Company, the Lumbermen's Brick and Cement Company of Kansas City, Missouri, and several other large and important enterprises. As a lawyer, during nearly a quarter of a century he has been connected in one capacity or another with many of the leading cases brought before the Hemphill county courts, and his high attainments have made it possible for him to be successful in the solving of numerous legal complexities. him the law has a stanch and unwavering exponent; his devotion to his profession is evidenced in his placing his clients' interests before his own, while among his fellowpractitioners he is looked up to not alone on account of his deep learning, but because of his strict observance of the unwritten ethics of his high calling.

In 1884 Mr. Hoover was married to Miss L. V. Winset, of Bedford county, Tennessee, daughter of A. M. and Mrs. Winset, both now deceased. Five children have been born to this union: Daniel B., born in Bedford county, Tennessee, in 1885, a gradunte of Staunton Military Institute of Virginia and of the law department of the University of Texas, and now engaged in practice with his father at Canadian; Thomas L. born in Lipscomb, Texas, in 1890, a graduate of Canadian College, Bailey University at Waco. Texas, and the law department of the State University, a famous sprinter and all-around college athlete, and captain of the track team at Bailey: Edward, born in 1895, at Canadian, Texas, a graduate of Canadian College who entered the State University in 1913; and Louise, born in 1895, and Vashti born in 1990, both at Canadian, and both now students in Canadian College.

Mr. Hoover is a Democrat in his political views, but has not entered actively into the struggles of public life, He is interested fraternally in the Odd Fellows, being a charter member of Canadian Lodge No. 349.

JAMES M. POTTER. The strongest financial institution between Fort Worth and the Red River is the First National Bank of Gainesville, an institution with a continuous history of thirty years, and with which either under its original form or with another bank which is now a constituent part of the First National, Mr. James M. Potter has been identified from the beginning.

Mr. Potter is one of the oldest and ablest bankers of north Texas, and his career is one that does credit to a vocation considered to be among the most important of those assigned to men of action.

James M. Potter is a native of the state of Mississippi, born in Pontotoe county, in 1852, one of a family of ten children born to Cincinnatus and Mary Ann (Casteel) Potter. Mr. Potter's brother, Judge C. C. Potter, is one of the eminent lawyers of the north Texas bar. and a resident of Gainesville; and the only other living member of the family is his sister Dixie, wife of L. H. Mathis, an attorney of Wichita Falls, Texas. The father, whose vocation was farming, moved from Mississippi to Cooke county, Texas, in 1858 and was one of the early settlers along the north Texas border. The following year he bought a small tract of land, which he increased by subsequent purchases, and eventually became one of the large land holders of Cooke county. He was known all over the county as a man of exceptional education, and for his generosity and public spirit in community affairs. He held office in the county gov-erument and during the frontier days had command of a company of local militia or minute-men, who were given the responsibility of keeping the Indians away from the lorder. Later he was elevated to the rank

James M. Potter, who was six years old when the family came to Texas, grew up in Cooke county, attained his schooling in the country, and in an academy in Gainesville, after which he was sent to the University of Missouri at Columbia, where he took a Normal course and was graduated in 1877. Like many other men of success and prominence in affairs, he began his career as a school teacher, in Cook county, and continued work in that capacity until January 1, 1883.

At the last-mentioned date he entered the employ of the First National Bank, which then opened its doors for business. He was a book-keeper at the beginning, and during his service was promoted and served in dif ferent capacities. Later was organized the Red River National Bank, and he joined the new institution, in which he served with credit and was finally elected president of the bank. In 1903, when the Red River National was consolidated with the First National, he was chosen active vice president of the First National Bank. Those who have most familiarity with banking affairs in Cooke county attribute much of the progress of the First National Bank during the past ten years to the capability and judgment of this active vice president. In that time the capital stock has been increased to two hundred and fifty thousand dollars, and the name of the First National Bank of Gainesville stands among the larger institutions of the entire state. Mr. Potter gives all his time to banking and his success has been due to the fact that he has concentrated his efforts along one line of business.

In politics he is a Democrat, but has never taken any part in party matters. He is a member of the Methodist church and is affiliated with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. In matters and organizations more directly affecting the welfare and material improvement of his community Mr. Potter is never behind hand with his support and cooperation. He is vice president of the Commercial Secretaries and Business Men's Association of the state. He is also one of the executive committee of the Chamber of Commerce of Gainesville. He has membership in the rural life association of Cooke county, an organization whose object and work are especially worthy of commendation, since they relate to the general betterment of country life conditions in the

Mr. Potter was married in 1879 to Miss Ella Lee, a native of Missouri, and a daughter of L. W. and Mary Ann (Fryer) Lee, her parents now living at Valley View, Texas, were both natives of Missouri. Of the six children of Mr. and Mrs. Lee only two are now living, Mrs. Potter's sister being Zoe, wife of Roy E. Mann, of Denver, Colo. The two children of Mr. and Mrs. Potter are: Ora, wife of J. B. Hilton, a merchant of San Diego, California; and Hugh Morris, who was born in 1888, and having completed his law studies in the University of Texas, is now engaged in practice in Houston, Texas.

WILLIAM R. HATCHER. Among the prominent young native born business men of this section of the state of Texas, William R. Hatcher, as president-treasurer of the W. R. Hatcher Construction Company, takes a leading place among the business men of Dallas. He was born at Peoria, Hill county, Texas, in 1876, and is a son of Jerry M. and Mary Jane (Williams) Hatcher. Jerry M. Hatcher was a native son of Virginia, who came to this state when very young, in company with his widowed mother, three sisters and three brothers. They settled in Hill county, where being reared to man-They secreted in 100 country, where vering rearest to man-bood, he gave up the work of the home farm for the carpenter trade. He married Mary Jane Williams in young manhood, she being a daughter of an Arkansas family who came to Texas in the early days, and being born in Hillsboro, Texas, or near that city.

William R. Hatcher received a common school education in his boyhood, and learned the carpenter's trade under the instruction of his father. He was eighteen years old when in 1894 he left home and went to Waco, Texas, where he settled down and engaged in the contracting business. After some time spent in independent business there, he moved to Bosque county, Texas, where he married, and continued in the contracting business until 1900, in which year he moved to Dallas, Texas. Here he formed his present business firm, known as the W. R. Hatcher Construction Company, and he has since carried on a thriving business in building and contracting. Among the many prominent structures that have been reared under the supervision of his concern may be mentioned the Coliseum at the State Fair Grounds, which cost $135,000; the Dallas Transfer Company's warehouse, a four story fire-proof building, containing ninetyseven thousand feet of floor space; and the Sonnentinet building, which compares favorably in size and construction with the others. The business of the company in 1912 exceeded $450,000, with every prospect of passing the half million mark in the present year.

Mr. Hatcher is one of the leaders in business circles in Dallas, and is president of the Dallas Builders' Exchange. Socially he is a member of the Dallas Auto Club, and his fraternal affiliations are with the Masonic order, in which he has membership in the Scottish Rite body, wherein he has taken the thirty-second degree; Hella Temple, Ancient Arabic Order of the Nobles of the Mystic Shrine; Dallas Chapter No. 47, Royal Arch Masons, and Oak Cliff Lodge No. 705, Ancient, Free and Accepted Masons. He is also a member of the Inde-pendent Order of Odd Fellows of Dallas.

In 1887 Mr. Hatcher was married to Miss Lee Maxey, daughter of Rice Maxey, of Bosque county. She is a member of an old Texas family that had its first establishment here prior to the Civil war period. They have one son, Maxey M. Hatcher. The family home, which is a center of many social activities in the city, is at 224 Sunset avenue.

JUDGE WILLIAM W. BOGEL. That citizenship is a duty as well as a privilege is the keynote in the career of Judge Bogel of Marfa, for the past twelve years county judge and ex-officio county superintendent of county judge and ex-onice county supermeanent of public schools in Presidio county. It is upon the social character and public spirit of its members that the prosperity and advancement of a community depend, and in Judge Bogel Presidio county has had one of the vital forces in its progress.

William W. Bogel was born in Goshen, Ohio, July 23, 1855, a son of Augustus J. and Julia W. Bogel, As a boy he was given the advantage of private schooling, after which he entered the Louisiana State University at Baton Rouge, where he was graduated with a druggist, and after leaving college he entered the store and spent a few months as a clerk. That was in 1875 when he was about twenty years of age, and he has been a resident in this state ever since. settlement was in Frio county, which at that time was a part of the great South Texas cattle range, and he remained there for about five years and was engaged in sheep raising. He then brought his stock out to Marfa, and was one of the earliest sheep men in this portion of West Texas, and continued actively in that industry, and was one of the largest producers of wool in this region until 1897. In that year he retired from the sheep industry and turned all his attention to cattle, and is still one of the large stockmen of Presidio county. His fine ranch is located twelve miles from Marfa. At San Antonio on February 15, 1882, Judge Bogel married Miss Sarah Newton, daughter of Col. S. G. Newton of San Antonio. Seven children have been born to their union, five sons and two daughters, named as follows: Jessie, wife of Harry J. Hubbard, a resident in Rosario, Old Mexico; Augustus J., who is unmarried and lives in Presidio county; William W., Jr., who is married and lives in Marfa; Galitzen N., who is unmarried; Edward L., single and at home in Presidio county; Amos G., who is in Presidio county and Genevieve, who is in the family home at Marfa.

Judge Bogel is senior warden in the Episcopal church of Marfa, and fraternally is affiliated with the Ma-sonic Order from the Blue Lodge to the Shrine, and with the Woodmen of the World. In his larger relations with the public life of his county, Judge Bogel has shown himself to be not only a public-spirited citizen in the ordinary sense of the term, but has manifested a practical effectiveness in his public work. He is the energetic president of the Presidio County Commercial Club, and has been an influential member of the Republican organization in this county. For nearly ten years he has held the office of county judge, and during this time has also performed the work of superintendent of county schools. While his management of the fiscal affairs of the county has been excellent in every par-ticular Judge Bogel has probably directed his most enthusiastic efforts toward the improvement of the public school system, and it is as a result of his practical efforts in that direction that Presidio county now has a school system much better than the average county with such a large area and such a scattered population. During the past year an addition was added to the Marfa school building at a cost of $15,000. Judge Bogel is very fond of automobiling and horseback riding, and has a prominent place in the social affairs of this community.

OLIVER LOVING. In proportion as the eattle industry was for many years foremost among the productive forces of economic wealth in Texas, in like manner will the name Loving, through its prominent connection with the live stock business, both as an individual undertaking and in the organization of cattlemen, always have pre-eminence among early Texas captains of industry and great men of the frontier and the range. During the early history of the cattle industry, from the beginning of settlement in north Texas until his death soon after the close of the war, there was no more striking figure than that of Oliver Loving. He was a pioneer among cattlemen, and it was largely through his enterprise and forethought that the ranchmen of his state first found a market for their surplus cattle among the miners of the Rocky Mountain regions and the United States troops who were placed on the frontier for their protection. He was a recognized leader among men, and was possessed of great decision and firmness of mind-traits of character which were of especial value in those days of constant danger, when a moment's indecision might cost a human life or the loss of a cattle herd representing a hard-earned fortune. His death was a loss to the state at large, and among all the old cattlemen who survive from that early time his memory is cherished and kept green,

Oliver Loving was born in Hopkins county, Kentucky, in 1813, and grew up to manhood in that county. He moved to Texas with his family in 1845, and in the fall of 1846 located in Collin county, before that was an organized county, and secured a homestead of six hundred and forty acres of land. His home was near where the town of Plano now is located, where he became engaged in farming, raising cattle and buying and selling cattle and horses; also in freighting with ox teams. At that time there were no railroads in the state, and all merchandise for North and Northwestern Texas was freighted on wagons from Jefferson, Texas, Shreveport, Louisiana, and some from Houston, Texas. He owned and operated several large ox wagons and teams hauling for merchants, and for the United States government, to the military posts on the frontier. In 1850 he hauled supplies for the government from Preston, on Red River in Grayson county, to Fort Belknap on the Brazos river, now in Young county, going through the wilderness with the first soldiers that explored the country, and the same that established Fort Belknap.

In 1855 settlement had progressed so far that Collin county was being included within the scope of operations by small farmers, and this fact caused Mr. Loving to sell his homestead and go further west. In October, 1855, he settled in what is now known as Loving's Val-This valley took its name from Mr. Loving and is situated in the northeast corner of Palo Pinto county. Here he engaged more extensively in raising cattle and in trading in cattle and horses than before. In 1858 he and John Durkee, his neighbor, drove several hundred beef steers from Texas to some point in Illinois, driving them overland all the way and making good money on them. In 1860 he and three other men drove the first herd of cattle, consisting of several hundred head, that was ever driven from Texas to Colorado territory. He remained in that territory for twelve months, and until after the Civil war had begun. On his return he found his family living in Weatherford. During his absence the Indians had broken out and killed many of the settlers along the frontier, and near his home and ranch, causing his family to move to Weatherford for safety.

During the war Mr. Loving became a contractor for the Confederate army, furnishing beef and bacon, and driving several herds of beef steers to various points on the Mississippi river and delivering his eattle to the army on the east side.

In 1866 Oliver Loving formed a copartnership with Charles Goodnight, the noted Panhandle cattleman, for the purpose of buying and driving cattle to New Mexico and Colorado. They drove several hundred head of beef steers in the same year to New Mexico.

The following incidents, constituting one of the tragedies of the early Texas cattle industry, and containing the circumstances of Loving's death, were written by H. C. Holloway of Fort Worth, who was with one of the herds of cattle belonging to Loving and Goodnight and was familiar with all the circumstances:

"In the spring of 1867 Oliver Loving and Charley Goodnight commenced to gather another herd of cattle around Black Springs in Palo Pinto and Jack counties, to drive to New Mexico and Colorado. They were engaged in gathering this herd of cattle until about June 1. About this time they left Black Springs with two thousand beef cattle for Fort Sumner, New Mexico.

"The first event of note that occurred on the trip was on the south bank of the Brazos river in Young county, near old Camp Cooper. At this place, while in camp at night, the Comanche Indians crawled up behind a bank nearby, and opened fire on the cattlemen with both guns and arrows. The only man wounded in this fire was Long Joe Loving (no relative of Oliver Loving), who was shot back of the ear with an arrow which Guodinght pulled out with a pair of nippers next morning. They then proceeded with the drive by way of Phantom Hill and old Fort Chadburne and the Concho River, The trip from Brazos River to this point was uneventful, except the great hardship of doing without water for the distance of ninety-six miles. At Horse-head Crossing, on the Pecos River, they remained for several days, resting themselves and grazing their horses and cattle.

"The manner of making these drives was to drive eattle and loose horses all together, through the day; at night, each man selected one horse on which to do guard duty of about three reliefs through the night. The balance of the horses were herded close to the beef herd, so as to be close by in case of surprise. It was always the prime object of the Indians to get the horses, and in the spring of 1867 they captured at Horsebead Crossing several herds of cattle and horses complete.

"From this place they proceeded up the Pecos River, about three days' drive, when Oliver Loving and 'one-armed' Bill Wilson left the herd to go on ahead to Fort Sumner, a distance of about two hundred and fifty miles, to look out for the sale of cattle and to look after some unsettled business of the previous year. Loving and Wilson were traveling together up the Pecos River, and on the third day had reached a point about twentyfive miles above the Delaware River, and about five miles below where the river and the Apache Monntains come together, when about the middle of the afternoon they saw, off to their left, coming out from the mountains, about eighty Comanche Indians. The Pecos River was just to their right, and near by; a glance at the situation showed them that it was no use to run. Loving and Wilson dropped back toward the river and abandoned their horses. The Indians came up near and commenced a conversation with them in Spanish, Wilson being able to speak Spanish to them. The Indians proposed to Loving and Wilson that if they would lay down their arms they would not molest or hurt them. In the meantime some of the Indians showed a disposition to get around to the bank of the river, where short cane was growing in which one could secrete himself. While Wilson was holding a conversation with the Indians, he told Loving to look out that the Indians did not reach this cane or hiding place before they themselves did; for he thought that if the Indians reached concealment they would commence firing on them. But in the anxiety of the conversation Loving and Wilson allowed some of the Indians to reach the hiding place unnoticed by themselves, and, as expected by them, the Indians commenced firing on them as soon as they reached that point. In the first engagement Loving was wounded, the ball striking him in the wrist and passing through and enter-ing the side, making only a flesh wound. Loving and Wilson immediately dropped back under the bank of the river. The firing then became general from the Indians, bullets and arrows falling thick around them, in very many cases the arrows passing over the bank and sticking in the ground an arm's length from them. When this condition had prevailed for some time Loving and Wilson crawled up from under the bank and secreted themselves in this cane. At that time the firing by the Indians had ceased and all was quiet. While in this condition Loving had lost much blood, and was growing weak and faint. The exact position in which they were in at this time was as follows: Wilson was lying on his side, the side next the ground on which there was no arm, in the shape of a man sitting in a chair if he were laid over on his side, and grasping his six-shooter in his only hand. When this stillness had prevailed for some length of time they heard a noise in the cane about fifteen or twenty feet away; the noise did not seem to be confined to exactly one spot, but was a noise as if of an Indian crawling through the cane with a spear, the noise apparently being made by the Indian and the point of his spear passing through the cane. About this time they heard the rattling of a large rattlesnake. The noise made by the Indian just at this point ceased, but the rattlesnake came toward Wilson and Loving, they lying perfectly still. The snake came and coiled itself up in the lap of Wilson, its head being not more than twelve inches from Wilson's face. Shortly after this they heard the noise made by the Indian rid of the snake. Wilson began uting its upper knee slightly, until he saw the snake turn its attention toward his knee, and in a short while the snake countended to crawl off around his knee, across his feet and went away.

"It was near sundown. Loving and Wilson remained there in that place until after dark. Then Loving began to importune Wilson to make his escape. Wilson refused for a considerable time to do so. Wilson thought from Loving's conversation that he was growing a little delirious. Loving continued to insist upon Wilson trying to escape, and about midnight Wilson concluded to un dertake it. He removed all his clothes from his body except his shirt and drawers. The moon was about two hours high, easting a shadow over about half the river, Wilson got out into the water and commenced to float down the river on the dark side. At about twenty-five yards below he passed an Indian on his horse leaning forward with his head beside his horse's neck, whipping in the water with a switch or an arrow. Wilson passed the Indian unobserved by him. Some two hundred yards further on down the river he got out of the river and started back for the herd, barefoot with only his wet underclothes on. He traveled all that day, the next day and the next night, when he gave out and became exhausted. About eight or nine o'clock the next morning Goodnight came along with the berd, and found Wilson sitting up in a hole in the cleft of a rock.

"The Indians remained around Loving, at the place where Wilson had left him, until a little after sunrise the next morning, when they left, never venturing into the place where Wilson and Loving were supposed to be hiding.

"Wilson quickly told Goodnight the story. They at once mounted their horses and started back for the scene of the tragedy. Loving had told Wilson that if the Indians did not kill him, or if he lived from the wound that he had received, he would remain at that place until Wilson would return with help. The distance was about sixty miles from the herd back to where Loving was left wounded. They rode the distance that day, reaching the place late in the evening. They made close and diligent search, but were not able to find Loving. They then returned to the herd, thinking that Loving was killed. In the meantime, instead of Loving remaining there, as he had agreed to do, he went up the river five miles, to where the mountain and river are so close together that there is just a roadway between. He remained there in that condition five days, at the end of which time three straggling Mexicans happened to pass that way. When found, Loving was burning his buckskin glove on a little fire in order to eat it. Loving gave these Mexicans one hundred and fifty dollars to take him to Fort Sumner, a distance of one hundred and fifty miles. Fort Sumner was at that time the Navajo Reservation, where about seven thousand Indians were being fed by the Government. When taken there the army surgeon thought it necessary to amputate his arm. He did so and Loving seemed to be doing well until about the ninth day, at which time the taking up of the artery in his arm became loose, from which there was considerable loss of blood, resulting in his death soon after.

"Mr. Loving was buried at Fort Summer, in a coffin placed in a large box filled with charcoal. Some time in January, 1868, he was taken up by Charles Goodnight, H. C. Holloway and Joe Loving, his son, was placed in a wagon and brought back to Weatherford in Parker county, and there buried.'

connty, and there buried.

Early in his young manhood Oliver Loving was married in Kentucky to Miss Susan D. Morgan. They came to Texas with five children, one child was born during their first year's residence in Lamar county, and alto-gether there were nine children, all of whom lived to be grown, and eight of them lived into the twentieth century. The children in order of birth were: Sarah I., who married John Flint; James C. Loving, a famous Texas cattleman whose sketch follows; William W. Loving, who died in 1861 at Weatherford; Susan M., who married Mack B. Roach; Jane E., who married Professor O. W. Keeler; Joseph B. Loving; Mrs. I. N. Roach, who was the wife of Judge Roach, of Weatherford; George B. Loving; and Maggie, married to Thomas Wilson, and after his death to Dr. C. B. Raines. Mrs. Loving lived at Weatherford after the death of her husband until her death in 1882. Loving county in Texas was named after Oliver Loving.

James C. Loving. As long as the Cattle Raisers Association of Texas shall have a place in the history of the Lone Star State the name of James C. Loving will be appropriately honored. At the time of his death in Fort Worth on November 24, 1902, Mr. Loving had served nearly twenty-six years as secretary of the association and eighteen years as its general manager. To him, more than any one man, was due the success of the association, and he enjoyed and deserved an unbounded esteem from all the old-time Texas cattlemen.

A son of the pioneer Texas cattleman, Oliver Loving, whose career has been sketched above, James C. Loving was born in Hudson county, Kentucky, June 6, 1836. He was nine years old when the family moved to Texas, and spent most of his early life on the frontier. At the age of twelve he began work as a teamster in driving an ox team. His father, as has been mentioned, was engaged in freighting during the years before the war, and for six years James C. Loving was almost all the time on the road with a long team of oxen, and was regarded as one of the ablest "bullwhackers" in the

In 1855, when he was nineteen, the family home was transferred from Collin county to Loving's Valley in Palo Pinto. The freighting business was then disconrince except for home supplies, and J. C. Loving was admitted to partnership with his father under the style of O. Loving & Son. They engaged in a general merchandise business, in cattle raising, buying and selling cattle, horses and mules. They handled nearly all of the beef produced in the country surrounding their head-quarters for several years, from 1855 to 1862. J. C. Loving has been described as a merchant, cowboy and beef drover, and a kind of all-round man. Opportunities for education were extremely limited on the frontier, and he never had the advantages of common school education, but made up for these handicaps, and was one of the most practical and able men in Texas for many venrs. On January 15, 1857, he married Mary E. Willett, and they became the parents of three children.

From 1862 until the close of the war Mr. Loving was in the State service on the frontier against the Indians, and with the rank of first lieutenant commanded a company of fifty-seven men. The mercantile business had been discontinued and the partnership between himself and his father dissolved soon after the beginning of the war. In 1866 Mr. Loving once more resumed merchandising at Weatherford, and continued in that line for three years. He also assisted in buying and collecting cattle for the firm of Loving & Goodnight, and after the death of his father in 1867 it became necessary for him to go to Colorado territory to assist Mr. Goodnight in closing up the copartnership. In the spring of 1868 he collected a large herd of cattle, and started with them across Indian territory and through western Kansas to Colorado. This was a drive fraught with many risks and hardships, and while in southwest-ern Kansas at Great Bend of the Arkansas River the outfit was stopped by a large war party of Comanche and Kiowa Indians, and it was only after a prolonged parley that the Indians refrained from an attack and allowed the cattlemen to proceed. Mr. Loving remained in Colorado three months, assisting Mr. Goodnight in selling out the cattle and winding up the business, returning to Texas in January, 1869.

The career of such a man as Mr. Loving affords many incidents which are interesting of themselves and furnish illustrative matter on the conditions and difficulties which surrounded the prosecution of the cattle business during the decade following the close of the war. literature of the Texas cattle industry has already been enriched by description of a number of adventures in which Mr. Loving had a part, but for this publication it will be necessary to condense the abundant material at hand, and to give only one or two striking incidents with some detail.

In 1870 Mr. Loving bought one-half interest in the cattle and ranch owned by Charles E. Rivers, then located in San Valley in Palo Pinto county. At the close of the year they divided the cattle, and Loving ranched on Dillingham prairie in Jack county, some six or eight miles from the Rivers ranch. In the spring of 1871 the two ranches made a joint cow hunt of several days, west and north of their range. Loving and Rivers were both in the work, and while on the hunt a trade was agreed on, by which Loving bought out Rivers' entire stock of cattle, horses and outfit, and was to take possession as soon as the hunt was over. They camped on the night of the 15th of June, 1871, at the Loving cattle pens, on Dillingham prairie, the two outfits camping some three hundred or four hundred yards apart. There were some twelve or fifteen men in each outfit, and some fifty to sixty head of horses in each. The horses were put under guard that night as there was great danger of the Indians running them off. Some time in the night the Indians attacked the Rivers' camp and horse herd, wounding Mr. Rivers, and driving off the horses, some fifty odd head. The shooting aroused the Loving outfit, who rounded their horses into a close bunch and prepared to defend them, but the Indians did not attack them. messenger from the Rivers camp brought the word that Mr. Rivers was shot, and wanted Mr. Loving to come to his camp at once. On the arrival of Mr. Loving he found Mr. Rivers wounded by a gun shot, which afterwards proved fatal. The sale to Mr. Loving of the Rivers herd as agreed upon was made final by Mr. Rivers before his death, after making proper reduction for the horses taken by the Indians. Mr. Loving continued in the cattle-raising business on Dillingham prairie under many disadvantages, as the Indians continued to depredate on his range, and at several different times drove off all the horses owned and used by him in herding and looking after his cattle, and he had several engagements with the Indians, and it was almost a miracle that he passed through all these dangers with his life. In 1873 he was in the town of Palo Pinto when some boys came from Keechi and reported that a band of Indians had run them some distance that morning, on the north side of the Brazos find the Indians, and Mr. Loving joined them. The trail of the Indians was soon found, and followed to the foot of a mountain, near the mouth of Keechi Creek, on the Brazos River, and there it was found that the Indians had gone up on the mountain, which was so steep and so covered with rock and timber that it was almost impossible to ascend it on horseback. Accordingly six of the party left their horses and took the trail on foot, while the remaining six followed with the horses as best they could. The advance party when within three or four hundred feet of the top heard the sound of horses' feet up on the level. Thinking the Indians had heard their pursuers and were running away, the men ran forward as fast as they could, and on reaching the level were in plain view of about twenty Indians. dians had been in camp since some time in the forenoon, and were then rounding up their horses preparing to start for the purpose of raiding some settlement near by. The Indians and their pursuers discovered each other at the same time and opened a lively fire on each other. the Indians keeping up the most unearthly yelling that ever was heard in those mountains. The men had run some distance up the mountain, and in consequence of the fatigue and the excitement were somewhat unsettled and in no condition for accurate shooting, still they sent the bullets fast and thick over towards where the Indians were, and in turn the Indians cut the leaves and small limbs from the trees over the boys' heads, showing that they too were excited and shooting too high. In a few minutes the Indians fled down the mountain on the other side, leaving six or eight horses and a lot of their camp equipage. The six men back with the horses had heard the shooting, and pushed forward with all possible haste to help the boys on foot, and reached the top of the mountain just in time to see the last Indian disappear on the other side. No attempt was made to pursue the Indians just then, as the mountain side where they disappeared was very rough and rocky.

In August, 1873. Mr. Loving moved his cattle from Dillingham prairie to Lost Valley in Jack county, some twenty miles or more north of the Dillingham prairie ranch. The Indians still continued to depredate on his horses and cattle at the new ranch. A few days after reaching Lost Valley the Indians ran through his camp one night, whooping, yelling and shooting, and ran off nine head of horses belonging to some beef buyers, who had stopped for the night at Mr. Loving's camp. In June, 1874, the Indians killed one of Mr. Loving's compose by the name of J. K. F. Wright, some four miles side of the valley. The mountain is known in that country as the Wright Mountain, taking its name from the murdered cowhoy.

The last raid on Mr. Loving's stock was made in May, 1875, when a party of six Indians visited the ranch one night, coming in on foot, and mounted themselves on his horses. The rangers camped close by were notified early the next morning, and following the trail, overtook and killed five of the Indians. Lieutenant Long was in command of the rangers, and deserved and received much praise for the good work done on that occasion. That ended the Indian trouble in that country, as no raids were made by them after the killing of the five by Lieutenant Long.

While Mr. Leving had no current Indian troubles, he found hinself hadly involved financially. He had bought several stocks of cattle at range delivery and had bought teem mostly on time and had no be solitized from the mostly on time and had no the solitizations up to 1876. But on necount of heavy loss of both cattle and horses run off by the Indians, and an additional loss of cattle by white thieves, he found himself unable to pay his debts maturing in 1876. A portion of his creditors, refusing to give an extension, forced him to make an assignment, when he turned over to the receiver all cattle, horses and other property owned by him, having previously let his homestead near Weatherford go in payment of debt. He owned about three thousand head of cattle at the time he failed.

That left him with little or nothing save his experience and energy. He was then in the prime of life and not in the least discouraged. He continued to live in Lost Valley, and by 1889 had accumulated some cattle and land, and became one of the organizers of the Loving Cattle Company, of which he was general manager for ten years, up to 1892. During the last quarter of a century he was regarded as one of the leading cattlemen not only through his personal influence, but as a result of his extensive operations, and in spite of many vicissitudes and ups and downs of fortune, such as practically all Texas cattlemen experienced, he came out on the successful side, and his individual success was in keeping with his prominence as an executive official of the Cattle Raisers Association.

With the organization of the Cattle Raisers Association in February, 1877, Mr. Loving became secretary and was re-elected at each annual meeting until his death. In 1879 he was also elected treasurer and held both offices until 1893. From 1893 until his death in 1902 he was general manager of the association. For many years the office of the secretary was at Jacksboro, but in 1893 was removed to Fort Worth, and Mr. Loving claimed that city as his home until his death.

Hon. James C. Wilson. United States District Attorney for the northern district of Texas, with office at Dallas and residence at Fort Worth, a position to which he was appointed by President Woodrow Wilson in August, 1913, James C. Wilson is a grandson of the noted pioneer cattleman, Oliver Loving, and was named for his uncle, the late James C. Loving, two eminent Texans whose careers are sketched in preceding paragraphs. Mr. Wilson is a son of Thomas and Maggie (Loving) Wilson. His mother was the youngest child of Oliver Loving, and is now living as Mrs. C. B. Raines at Min-eral Wells, Texas. Thomas Wilson was born in Fayetteville, Tennessee, served four years in the Confederate Army from that state, came to Texas in 1867, locating in Palo Pinto county, and was a citizen of much prominence during the early days in that county, which was then on the western frontier of settlement. He was elected to the office of sheriff of Palo Pinto county, and his death occurred in 1879 at Austin while attending the first meeting of the Texas Sheriffs' Association. Mr. James C. Wilson has a sister, the wife of Dr. J. H. McCracken, a distinguished physician of Mineral Wells, and a former president of the Texas State Medical Association; and a brother, Horace Wilson, engaged in the tattle commission business in Fort Worth.

Mr. Wilson has been a successful lawyer in North Texas for the past eighteen years, and has long been one of the active young leaders in politics and affairs. He was born in Falo Pinto, received his education in Authority of the Authority of th

After graduating from the university Mr. Wilson was in the practice of law at Weatherford until November, 1912, and then moved to Fort Worth, and on November 19th of the same year was appointed assistant attorney of Tarrant county. During his residence at Weatherford Mr. Wilson was for two years assistant county attorney of Parker county, and later served as county attorney for three terms, being first elected in 1902. For three terms he was also chairman of the Parker county Democratic executive committee.

Mr. Wilson was married in Parker county to Miss Esther English, who was born at Pieton, Nova Scotia, and came to Texas as a teacher. They are the parents of three children, James C. Jr., Horace and Emily Loving,

ASA C. WILSON is essentially a Texas product. He is one of the best known and most prominent men in the city of Dallas, which has represented his home since the year 1902. Mr. Wilson is manager of his late father's estate, and finds his duties in that respect sufficient to occupy his time and attention, though he has found time to devote to military affairs in the state and has a highly creditable record as a member of the National Guard of Texas.

Mr. Wilson was born on his father's ranch, known familiarly as the "Twelve Mile House," because of its distance from Waco, in McLennan county. He is the son of Jay C. and Margaret N. (Naler) Wilson, of whom brief mention is here set forth,

Jay C. Wilson was born in St. Joseph, Missouri. He enjoyed excellent educational advantages, being a graduate of Yale University, and almost immediately after he received his degree he joined the gold-seekers in the rush to the Black Hills of South Dakota. It was not until 1871 that he came to Texas, locating at Waco, where he became prominent and prosperous. This was in the well-remembered days prior to the advent of the railroads into this part of the state, and Mr. Wilson established himself on a ranch just twelve miles from the then frontier town of Waco. His place, "Twelve Mile House," was one of the best ranches in that part of the state, and there Mr. Wilson accumulated a comfortable fortune, consisting mostly of property interests in MeLennan county, in Waco, the city of Dallas, and in other parts of the state. He died August 3, 1910. The wife and mother, who was born in Georgia, came to Texas in 1870, and she is living in Dallas.

Asa C. Wilson attended the public schools of McLeman county until he was graduated therefrom, and thereafter entered Baylor University, at Waco. In 1893 he entered the third-year class in the civil engineering course at the Agricultural & Mechanical College of Texas, at College Station, at which time former Governor Lawrence Sullivan Ross was president of the institution. Finishing his studies there, he entered Bingham Military School, at Asheville, North Carollina, and he was there distinguished by becoming an honor graduate of that famous school, having attained the rank of major of a hattalion of infantry. It was this training that induced his later military service, in which he made a most enviable record.

After his return home, Mr. Wilson associated himself with the First National Bank of Wace, and was thus occupied for six years. He removed to Louisiana in 1900, where he resided two years, and in 1902 he came to Dallas, and was there Cashier of the Texas National Bank for several years, or until its consolidation with the American Exchange National Bank. Upon the death of his father, in August, 1910, Mr. Wilson beame manager of the estate of the senior Wilson, and he maintains his office in the building at No. 1514 Main street, one of the properties included in the Wilson estate.

As has been previously mentioned, Mr. Wilson has distinguished himself in his military service as a member of the Texas National Guard. He first enlisted as a private in Company K, Second Texas Infantry, known as the "Mayor's Guard," of Waco, on October 27, 1896. was soon promoted to the post of corporal, and later sergeant of the company, and when the Texas Volunteer Guard, as the organization had been known up to that time, was reorganized by the late Brig. Gen. Thomas Scurry, in the latter part of 1899, Mr. Wilson was commissioned by Gov. Joseph D. Sayers as first lieutenant, Company K, Second Texas Infantry, and was in command of that company when it won the first prize as being the best-drilled company in the military establishment of the state. He then became acting battalion adjutant of the First Battalion, Second Texas Infantry, commanded by Brig.-Gen. Gordon Boone. On July 6, 1906, he was commissioned by the late Gov. S. W. T. Lanham as captain and paymaster of the Texas National Guard, and served in that capacity until December 3, 1908, when, upon the death of Maj, George T. West, major and paymaster general, Texas National Gnard, Captain Wilson was commissioned by Governor Thos, M. Campbell as major and paymaster general, with that rank, serving from December 4, 1908, until November 15, 1913, when he was promoted by Gov. O. B. Colquit to be lieutenant colonel of the Second Infantry, Texas National Guard. He served with that rank until November 30, 1913, when, after more than seventeen years of continuous service in various capacities, he was, upon his lower request, placed upon the retired list of officers of the Texas National Guard.

Mr. Wilson is a Roman Catholic in his religion, and fraternally he is identified with the B. P. O. E., Dallas Lodge No. 71, and with the Order of Hoo Hoo, No.

On December 5, 1901, Mr. Wilson was married at Dallas to Miss Clara S. Burke of Louisiana. She died October 10, 1913, at Dallas, the mother of two children: Thomas Crittenden Wilson, born in New Iberia, Louisiana, October 25, 1902, and Pamela Clara Wilson, born at Dallas, Texas, August 10, 1905.

OLUPE W. LEE. When there is any movement on foor which will be of benefit to the people of Munday, Texas, or of the surrounding country, one of the men whom one is fairly certain to find among the leaders is Oliver W. Lee. Mr. Lee is prominent in the life of this locality, not only politically and commercially but socially as well. Mr. Lee is mayor of the city at present and his regime has been a highly creditable one. He has brought to bear on political problems, the straightforward business methods for which he is well known and has gained the respect of his political enemies and the increased admiration of those who are his friends and supporters. Mr. Lee is, however, a man whom everyone likes, and has few enemies, even political ones.

Officer W. Lee was born in Jackson country Tennessee, on the bit of January, 1867. His father, Russell K. Lee was born in Tennessee and lived in that state during the greater part of his life. He was a farmer and when he came to Texas in 1900 he continued to farm, his property being located in Knox country. During the Civil war he served in the Confederate army, part of the time as a member of an infantry regiment and part of the time in the cavalry. He saw much active scruice and took part in some of the heavy fought battlet he hapt to the fact that the fact that the fact the country of the country Until Oliver W. Lee was eighteen years of age he attended the public schools of that part of Tennessee in which he lived. He spent his time, when he was not in the school room, helping his father with the work of the farm, but when he was eighteen years old he decided to start out for himself. He began as a school teacher and for a few years was thus engaged. Then for about two years he operated a sawmill. His next position was in the surveying and map making department of the Pennsylvania Oil Company. After this he went to farming and until he eame to Texas this yas

It was in October, 1899, that he came to this state and located in Munday, and he has resided in this county ever since. When he first came to this section he followed farming, this being his occupation for about three years. He next went to Benjamin, the county seat, where he worked in the office of the sheriff and tax collector. After five years of this work he was elected to the office of tax assessor. He served one term in this office and then came to Munday. Here he established the business in which he is successfully engaged at present. This business is general insurance, rentals and collections.

In politics Mr. Lee is a member of the Democratic party and he has always taken a very active and prominent part in politics. He is now serving on his second term as mayor of Munday. In religious matters Mr. Lee is a member of the Baptist church. In the fraternal world he belongs to the Knights of Pythias and to the Improved Order of Red Men. He is a member of the Munday Commercial Club and is an important factor in the work of this organization, now being its vice present of the second of the second

Mr. Lee was married in Clinton county, Kentucky, on the 11th of November, 1906, to Miss Irene Belle Smith, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. P. H. Smith, of Clinton county. Mr. and Mrs. Lee have become the parents of four children, namely: Irene Seytha, Russell Harvey, Grace Irwin, and Robert Sydney.

J. G. MILLS, M. D. The history of the Gill Well, at Dallas, is an interesting one and is but another exemplification of the fact that some of the world's greatest discoveries are made through sheer accident. In 1902 the mayor and board of aldermen of the city of Dallas let a contract for a deep well to secure water for municipal purposes. Work was commenced, and at a depth of 1910 feet the drillers encountered a copious flow of hot mineral water, which could not be used for domestic purposes and was accordingly permitted to run to waste. It was feared by the succeeding administration, as well as by the taxpayers whose money had been used to sink the well, that a serious blunder had been perpetrated, but decided to have an analysis made of the waters, in the hope that they might be found of chemical or medicinal value. Wherefore in 1905 Dr. J. G. Mills, a practicing physician of Marlin, Texas, with wide experience in medical practice in connection with thermal and medicinal waters, was sent for. Due analysis demonstrated that this well contained virtues which make it one of the most remarkable of its kind in the Southwest and that the money disbursed in sinking it could not have been expended more judiciously. Since that time Doctor Mills has been at the head of the Gill Well Sanitarium Company and, through careful management, has made it the most popular resort in the state.

Dr. J. G. Mills was born in Cherokee county, Texas, in 1877, and is a son of Green and Cornella Britton (Gray) Mills, both of whom are now deceased. His father was born in Washington county, Georgia, a son of Elisba Mills, who came to Texas with his family during the late forties. In 1880 Green Mills died, and Mrs. Mills was subsequently married to Mr. S. E. Jones, by whom Doctor Mills was reared and who is still living, at Jacksonville, Texas. The maternal grandfather of Doctor Mills was a soldier during the Mexican War and was one of those who fell at Monterey.

Dr. Mills was reared in Cherokee county, Texas, and attended school at Jacksonville, that county, the greater part of his education being secured at Alexander Collegiate Institute, from which he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Science. He went to 8t. Louis at the age of nincteen years and matriculated in the Missouri Medical College, from which he graduated with the class of 1899, and then, returning to Jacksonville, began practice there, remaining two years. Subsequently he removed to Marlin, Texas, where, beginning in 1901, he successfully practiced his profession, being physician at the Marlin Sanitarium and the Arlington Hotel, and, in fact, since first going to Marlin has had extensive experience in medical practice in connection with thermal and medical waters.

When sent for to look into the merits of the waters

at Gill Well, Doctor Mills secured five gallons of it, which he shipped to Dr. Seth M. Morris, chemist and which he shipped to Dr. Seth A. Morris, cleans a mixture toxicologist of the medical department of the Texas State University, Galveston, who made the following analysis: Sodium Bicarbonate, 147.93 Grs. per U. S. gal; Sodium Sulphate, 188.38; Magnesium Sulphate, 22.51; Calcium Sulphate, 73.62; Sodium Chloride, 3.39; Alumina and Iron, 3.32; Potassium Sulphate, 0.99; Silica, 0.56. Total, 440.70. Appreciating the rare and expension cellent combination of medicinal properties in the water, he made application and secured a twenty-year lease, with a ten-year option to purchase the well from the city of Dallas at its actual cost of construction to the mineral water strata, and in 1906, complying with the terms of this contract, purchased nearly three acres of land on Maple avenue, 2200 feet distant from the Gill Well, where he erected a bathhouse of brick and equipped it with necessary apparatus to properly utilize the water. property is situated one and one-half miles north of the postoffice, and now has greatly added value and attraction on account of being situated on the beautiful Turtle Creek Boulevard, work on which was begun by the city of Dallas in 1914. The place overlooks the picturesque wooded vale of Turtle Creek, and, being located within easy distance of the heart of the city, makes its future bright with promise of great usefulness to the public and profit to its owner. Doctor Mills has in contemplation the erection of a modern sanitarium on the property. In a medicinal way, the water is laxative, diuretic, anti-acid, and tonic, but, unlike others in this group, is harmless and contains the maximum of properties of merit. It is of value in treatment of all forms of rheumatism, neurasthenia, diabetes, gout, neuralgia, and many disorders of the kidneys, liver, and digestive tract. Doctor Mills constructed of reinforced concrete a large swimming pool, in which he uses the mineral water exclusively, and practically the entire output of the well flows through the pool, rendering it fresh, warm, and sanitary at all times.

Doctor Mills was married to Miss Leticia Anna Smith of Falls county, Texas, daughter of Robert Smith, who came to Texas from Tennessee. Her maternal grandfather was a Miliken and a member of a family which came to Texas with Stephen F. Austria's colony in the twenties.

DANIEL D. Orstort. With the coming of Daniel D. Otstoft to Dallas, in 1911, there was added an element of strength and purpose, of fine capacity, and of commercial integrity to the upbuilding business forces of this thriving Southwestern metropolis. Bringing with him experience gained through long association with men of business stability, acumen, and strength of character, he at once took his rightful place among the men whose activities are advancing the city's commercial importance, and since that time has found the time and the inclination to interest binself in matters pertaining to the civic welfare. Mr. Otstott was born in the city of Cincinnati, Ohio, in 1872, and in his youth was given the invigorating and healthful training incident to life on the farm, his father's homestead being located in the vicinity of Oxford, Butler county, Ohio. His educational advantages were secured, for the greater part, in the Oxford High School, and in 1891 he entered upon his business career when he went to Chicago and secured a position with the wholesale mercantile firm of Lock, Huleatt & Company. Being content to embark in business life in a humble capacity, he made himself a thorough master of the dry goods business, and in 1898 resigned his position to enter the house of Butler Brothers, with which he has been connected ever since. This is one of the most extensive wholesale general merchandise concerns in the world, having great branch houses in nearly every large city of the United States. The firm was established in Boston, from which city the three Butler Brothers (of whom only one now survives) removed to Chicago and established their headquarters in the latter city. The wonderful growth and expansion of this business is familiar to everyone who is at all conversant with commercial affairs in America. The house sells to merchants by catalogue only, employing no traveling salesmen. In 1911 Butler Brothers completed their great branch house for the Southwest at Dallas, Texas, and at that time Mr. Otstott came to this city as merchandise manager, their territory embracing Texas and Oklahoma. To speak only of the building itself-it is a splendid edifice, the largest mercantile structure in the Southwest, eight stories high, and occupying the entire block on South Ervay street extending from Young to Marilla street and back to Evergreen street, this being in the heart of the city.

Since coming to Dallas, Mr. Otstott has taken time from the important and exacting duties connected with his business to engage actively and public-spiritedly in the general business and social affairs of the city. has been especially interested in the Young Men's Christian Association, of which he is a member of the board of directors and in which he organized and managed a campaign that resulted in a large increase in the membership of the organization. He is particularly interested in the boys' department, of which he is a helpful official. Mr. Otstott is a consistent member of Trinity Methodist Church.

While a resident of Chicago, Mr. Otstott was married to Miss Ida Bonnell, who was born at Lincoln, Nebraska, and they have three children: Frances, John and Du-Shane.

COLONEL WILLIAM C. YOUNG. One of the finest counties in northwest Texas now bears the name of this splendid old pioneer, who was one of the heroes of the Texas Revolution, an Indian fighter and a participant in the war against Mexico, and whose activities and character well deserve the honor which was bestowed in giving his name to one of the county divisions of the

Colonel William Cocke Young was born in Tennessee May 12, 1812, and was of Holland Dutch and French stock. The Young family was established in Tennessee by two brothers, Abraham and Dan Young, the latter being the father of Colonel William C. Young. The family and its connections were among the most prominent of central Tennessee,

Colonel Young when a young man of twenty-two in 1834, came to Texas, locating in Red River county and engaging in the practice of law. He came with the true spirit of the pioneer, intent upon a life in a new and undeveloped country, and participated in every phase of that development until the close of his life. He was a soldier at San Antonio, and in the border and Indian warfare which followed the Revolution took a prominent part and was associated with John B. Denton's expedition. When Colonel Denton was slain by the Indians in 1841, it was William C. Young and a companion who volunteerd to go to the scene of the massaere and recover the body of their leader. Through a country infested by Indians, and daring all the risks and dangers of such a journey, they performed their duty with the determination that was characteristic of the hest frontiersmen, and finally returned to headquarters with the body of their murdered leader, having escaped all the dangers attendant upon such an enter-

At the outbreak of the Mexican war Colonel Young raised a regiment of volunteers, in which he was commissioned colonel, and saw much active campaigning during that brief period of hostilities. Following the Mexican war Col. Young resumed his law practice and in 1851 moved to Shawneetown in Grayson county, and continued to be prominent in public affairs. He had served as sheriff two terms and later as county attorney in Red River county, and in 1857 was appointed United States marshal of his district, holding the office for three years until he resigned to take part in the war between the north and the south. He had also been a member of the first constitutional convention of the state.

A short time prior to the outbreak of hostilities between the states Colonel Young was called into consultation with Jefferson Davis, and on returning from his last visit with the president of the Confederacy raised the Eleventh Regiment of Texas Cavalry and went into active service. He led his regiment until failing health compelled him to resign and return home. As a representative of the Southern government he continued to perform important service in North Texas. and it was during the performance of his duty that he met his death, being assassinated by bushwhackers in Cooke county during the unsettled conditions in that region towards the end of the war. One of his fellow citizens had been shot down and the murder was traced to the work of a band of outlaws, and while Colonel Young was in search of the body of the victim he himself was killed while near his own home. One of Colonel Young's sons succeeded in tracing the murderer to his regiment in the Confederate army, demanded and re-ceived his surrender, took him to the spot where his father had been so foully killed, and there some of the colonel's own negroes strung up and summarily exacted the penalty of death from the assassin. Colonel Young was one of the most influential men of his time in Texas, and it was to perpetuate the memory of his distinctive services that Young county was named in his honor.

Colonel Young was three times married. His first marriage was to Sophie Thomas Gleaves, and of the children of that marriage one, Captain John G., is now a prominent retired resident of Sherman. By a second marriage Colonel Young had two other children. His third wife was Mrs. Annie Black, who bore him two children: Simpson Morgan and Margaret, who married

J. B. Davenport.

RUSSELL H. KINGSBURY. A successful business lawver, Russell H. Kingsbury has been engaged in the practice of law at Waco since 1880. The years that have followed have brought him ample practice and high reputation, and he has long been regarded as one of the leaders at the bar of McLennan county.

Judge Kingsbury is a native of North Carolina, born in the town of Oxford, January 29, 1860, a son of Russell H. and Elizabeth L. (Gilliam) Kingsbury. His father, who was born in Albany, New York, in 1822, when a young man moved to North Carolina, met and married Eli: abeth L. Gilliam, who was born at Gainesville in that state in 1829, and in 1872 they settled at Waco, Texas, where the father was engaged in merchandising until his death in IS98. The mother died in 1908. There were five children, namely: Henry P., of the Eighth Cavalry, U. S. A., now inspector general of the Department of Lakes; William G., a retired farmer, ranchman and capitalist at Temple, Texas; Katherine S., who is the wife of J. H. Brown, of Dallas; Russell H.; and Frederick H., also a lawyer of Waco.

The career of Russell H. Kingsbury has been a singularly active and interesting one from earliest boyhood. His literary education was begun and completed at Horner & Webb's Academy at Oxford, North Carolina. He entered that institution when but five years of age, and completed his training there at the age of eleven. Professor Webb was for a time a United States senator from Tennessee. Mr. Kingsbury was between eleven and twelve years of age when the family settled in Texas. He became interested in journalism, and when fourteen vears of age was editor of a little publication at Waco. His venturesome spirit led him a year later to become a Texas ranger, in the command of Colonel John B. Jones, and his service with the Texas state troops lasted one year. He then took up the study of law under the preceptorship of Judge Clark, was admitted to the bar when twenty years of age, and at once opened his office at Waco and began the practice which has engaged him with increasing success ever since.

A Democrat of the old school, Judge Kingshury believes in a "good old-fashioned democracy and good government for Texas." During the Clark-Hogg campaign he was an ardent Clark man and campaigned the state from end to end in Judge Clark's behalf. For two years he held the office of city judge of Waco. He takes no active part in politics, believing that the primary system of selecting candidates is a failure, and longs for the time to come again when the people will have an opportunity of a voice in determining who their official representatives shall be. He is just an old-fashioned Democrat without any prefix, or affix, believing that the people are best governed when least governed. Mr. Kingsbury is a member of the Episcopal church, and belongs to the Young Men's Business League of Waco.

Ernest W. Townes. Few of the younger members of the legal profession in Texas has begun their careers with better inheritance of professional tradition and ability, than Ernest W. Townes of the firm of Carlton, Townes & Townes, whose offices are in the Stewart Building at Houston. Mr. Townes has been a member of the Texas bar for more than ten years, and has acquired a position of distinction through his successful practice during this time.

Ernest W. Townes is a grandson of Judge Dick Townes, who was chancellor of the northern district of Alabama, and who in 1854 brought his family to Texas and settled upon a large plantation in Bastrop county. He later moved to Travis county, where in addition to his farming operations he conducted a law business. He was honored with election to the legislature and was also a member of a constitutional convention and took a very prominent part in organic law of the state.

Mr. Townes was born in Travis county in 1875 and is a son of John Charles and Kate (Wildhahn) Townes. His father born in Alabama, was au infant when the family came to Texas, and later for some years was judge of the forty-sixth judicial district comprising the counties of Travis and Williamson. He is now one of the most honored members of the Texas bar and is dean of the law department of the University of Texas.

Ernest W. Townes was graduated from the University of Texas in 1898 with the degree of A. B. and then continued his preparation for the law in the same institution and was graduated in 1900, LL. B. Admitted to the bar in the same year, he began the practice of his profession at Austin, where he remained for three years, and then moved to Houston, where he has since had his office, with the exception of a short interim while associated with Mr. L. A. Carlton in Beaumont, and enjoys a generous share of the legal business in this city. In 1911 be became a partner in the firm of Carlton, Townes & Townes, when that combination opened its Houston office. Mr. Townes is a member of various Masonic bodies and also belongs to the Beta Theta Pi fraternity of the University of Texas, and to various clubs and other organizations. In 1906 he married Miss Adele Verleye of Chicago. Their home is at 3017 Brazos street.

J. Ross Bell. The office of county attorney of Cottle county has been filled since July, 1912, by one of the ablest young lawyers of the Cottle county bar. services in the office have won the approbation of the public, and both as an official and as a lawyer he has proved his efficiency and popularity.

J. Ross Bell was born in Flatwoods, Tennessee, February 22, 1884, a son of Joseph and Delphia (McLemore) Bell, both parents natives of Tennessee. The father, who was a farmer and planter, was a resident of Tennessee throughout his life and died in July, 1901, at the age of forty-four. The mother now lives with her children in Paducah, Texas, at the age of fifty-two. The county attorney was the oldest of four children. His brother, Joe D. Bell, is a graduate of Cumberland University, in Tennessee, in 1912, and is now a practicing lawyer. The sister, Mary V. Bell, was born in Tennessee. One child, Brownie M. Bell, is deceased.

J. Ross Bell spent his early life in Tennessee, attended schools in Spring Hill and Scott's Hill, and took both his literary and law courses in the Cumberland University, at Lebanon, where he was graduated in law in 1910. In the same year he came out to Paducah, locating in that town in July, and since that time has enjoyed a liberal share of local practice. He was elected county attorney in July, 1912, on the Democratic ticket. Mr. Bell is a Royal Arch and Knight Templar Mason and is senior warden of his Lodge. He is also affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Woodmen of the World, and his church is the Methodist. He is unmarried, and all the family live in an attractive home in Paducah. Both brothers are very fond of outdoor life and are among the most progressive young citizens of Cottle county.

CHARLES F. HOFF, a prominent Texan, a resident of Rockport, Aransas county, dates his birth at Yorktown, DeWitt county, Texas, September 22, 1861. He was reared on his father's farm in that county and at the age of twenty-one left the parental home to seek his fortune in the West, Tucson, Arizona, being his objective point. At Tucson he lived almost continuously up to 1909, excepting one year spent in Los Angeles and San Francisco, California, Since November, 1909, he has been a resident of Rockport.

In Arizona Mr. Hoff was in the mercantile business and always an energetic worker in the Tucson Board of Trade. In 1890 he installed the telephone system, which is still operating under the same franchise. In 1897 he installed the present street railway system in Tucson, which is now one of the finest electric systems in the West. Being the controlling owner he disposed of his interest in this system in exchange for his present holdings in Texas, chiefly in Aransas county,

All his life Mr. Hoff has taken an active interest in public affairs, paying a great deal of attention to political affairs of the Territory. He took a leading part in organizing the Democratic party in Arizona, as president of the Arizona Association of Democratic Clubs, and has acted as chairman of the Democratic state, county and city committee, also secretary of the state, county and city committees. He was national vice presideut of the National Association of Democratic Clubs for four years. He was secretary of the Statehood convertion and also secretary of the Statehood committee and he, with Ex-Governor Murphy, was appointed dele-gate to Washington in the interest of Statehood. In 1891 he was made chief clerk of the House of Representatives and in 1893, the Arizona Senate being a tie, he was selected as a compromise candidate for secretary of the Senate. In 1892 Mr. Hoff was unanimously nominated for mayor on a progressive platform, but was counted out by the Republicans' election board. In 1895 he installed a telephone system at Nogales and while there took part with thirty Americans in driving the Yaquis out of the Mexican custom house, of which they had taken possession, killing seven guards in order to do so. The Yaquis, who were in the custom house. were armed with Springfield rifles, but after an hour's fighting the Americans drove them out of the city with-out any casualties, while the Yaquis left seventeen dead.

In 1896 Mr. Hoff was elected County Treasurer. He served two years and declined a renomination. In 1899 he came back to his old home and married Miss Helen Eckhardt. They lived in Tucson until they moved to Rockport. Mrs. Hoff has been a leading spirit in all civil work and is a most enthusiastic worker in the Mothers' Club of Rockport. Four children have been born to them, as follows: Carol, Charles F., Jr., Rosalie and W. H. Barnes Hoff.

From 1906 to 1907 Mr. Hoff served as City Councilman in Tucson and in 1908 the county convention of his county, composed of 120 delegates, unanimously indorsed him for National committeeman, but at the State convention he was defeated by the corporation tools, who controlled the convention. He went to the Denver convention and there worked with Charles Bryan, Mr. Allen, James C. Dahlman and others for the Bryan cause, and after the convention suggested the plan of financing the Democratic campaign, which was adopted by the National committee, and the first time in its history the National committee had a surplus after the campaign. Mr. Hoff was also a delegate to the last Grover Cleveland convention, and in 1912 he was elected a delegate and served in that capacity in the Democratic convention at Baltimore. Also in 1912 he was elected president of the Rockport School Board. In 1910 he was made a member of the executive committee of the Commercial Club and delivered an address before the United States board of engineers upon the definite location of the harbor. In 1911 he was made chairman of the Prohibition Association for Aransas county. He was made president of the Commercial Club in 1911, is still the incumbent of that office and has proved himself the right man for the place. Rockport feels a just pride in its leading citizen, Charles F. Hoff.

WILLIAM D. SANDERS. Among the citizens of Titus county none have displayed greater enterprise and energy in the development of the best resources of the home county than William D. Sanders. Mr. Sanders has long been known in the public life of this section and has in recent years turned his attention to the development of the oil and gas deposits of the county. He was known among his associates as a man of remarkable push and energy and whatever he undertakes he usually carries through to a successful conclusion. He represents one of the prominent old families of Titus county and the name of Sanders has for many years been identified with business enterprise and sterling

William D. Sanders was born in Titus county in 1874. His parents were Thomas J. and Lou J. (McClure) Sanders. The father, who was born in the state of Alabama, with several of his brothers emigrated to Texas during the early fifties and he located a ranch on Sulphur Prairie in the north part of Titus county. Among the old-time cattle men of Texas, Thomas J. Sanders was one of the best known. He was one of the developers of the industry before the Civil war and in those days went up to the Pease River country in northwest Texas, taking a large bunch of cattle with him to the open range, and being one of the first to take domestic cattle into the country which for centuries had been the home of the buffalo and the wild Indian. Among his early day associates was Dan Waggoner, one of the best known of Texas cattle men. His efforts before the war resulted in fine success and he accumulated a large number of cattle, being recognized among the most prosperous men in the cattle business of that period. When the war came on he enlisted in the Confederate service and went through the entire conflict as a soldier of the south. With the close of hostilities he returned to Titus county and then going into Northwest Texas tried to collect the herds which had been scattered during the previous years, in which he was largely un-The Indians, who had before the war been as a rule peaceful, began almost constant raiding and hostilities after the rebellion and the Indian depredations, together with other misfortunes, operated to his disadvantage in such a manner that he was never able to regain his old time prosperity in the cattle business. A portion of his later life he spent in Oklahoma, but died in Titus county. His wife, who also represented a pioneer family in Titus county, was born in Georgia and died at Mount Pleasant at the age of twenty-nine.

The early life of William D. Sanders was spent on a farm, where he received all the training which was necessary for his active career. For six years he filled the office of constable, then resigned and became claim agent for the Texarkana & Fort Smith Railroad at Texarkana. From this position he took an appointment as special agent for the Cotton Belt Railway and while employed in that capacity in 1906 was elected sheriff of Titus county. By re-election in 1908 he served the county efficiently for four years. Since retiring from that office he has served as city alderman and is now city marshal by appointment.

Since 1910 Mr. Sanders has been largely identified since 1910 Mr. Sanders has been largely identified with the real estate and allied interests. The development of the oil and gas possibilities in Titus county has been the object of his most ambitious work. He organized the Titus County Oil & Gas Company, of which he is manager, being associated with Mr. A. Reed. This company has under lease about twenty-five thousand acres of land in the county, all situated in what is considered the oil and gas belt. In 1912, under the direction of Mr. Sanders, his company began drilling an oil well on a portion of its holdings some three and a half miles south of Mount Pleasant. Drilling in other locations has since then been inaugurated. Mr. Sanders married Miss Nannie Edwards, a native of Titus county. Their one daughter is named Hazel Sanders.

Mr. Sanders is affiliated with several fraternal orders and is a member of the Baptist church,

R. E. Pennington, who has won substantial recogni-tion of his fine legal attainments, his fidelity to professional duties, and his careful conservation of all interests entrusted to his care, is well known to the bar, not alone in his own locality of Brenham, but throughout the state, as a careful, painstaking, profound, and conscientious lawyer, a thorough scholar, and a dignified and accomplished gentleman, whose connection with important cases has made him a familiar figure in the courts of the state, as well as the highest federal tribunal-the United States Supreme Court. He is a native of Texas, born at Brenham, May 13, 1865, and is a son of Elijah and Ellen (McAllister) Pennington.

Elijah Pennington came to Texas with his father, Riggs Pennington, from Galesburg, Illinois, and crossed the Brazos river on the old ferryboat at Washington in December, 1836. He was a Texas veteran and participated in Gen. Alexander Somerville's campaign in 1842, while during the Civil War he served four years in the Confederate army. Mrs. Pennington was born at Hot Springs, Arkansas, and it was there they were married, in 1845, the trip to Texas being made through a wild country, with no blazed trails part of the way. The journey was made on horseback and consumed three months. Making their home at Brenham, these people attained the advanced ages of ninety and eighty-seven years, respectively, and all their long and useful lives were citizens who did much good, in a quiet way, for the people about them, and their honorable and upright careers won them universal respect and esteem.

After completing the curriculum of the Brenham public schools, R. Pennington attended the Agricultural and Mechanical College, from which he was graduated in 1884 with the highest rank, "Senior Captain," and with the degree of Bachelor of Science. He then took up the study of law in the office of Poindexter & Paddleford, and later in the office of Sayles & Bassett, at Brenham, and was admitted to the bar of Texas in 1888. He at once entered practice at Brenham, and in 1898 was admitted to practice in the United States Supreme Court. Mr. Pennington was city attorney of Brenham for ten years, from 1890 to 1990, and was county attorney of Washington county for four years. He has become prominent in his profession, and, in addition to a large general practice, has been attorney for the First National Bank of Brenham for twenty years. He has been connected with many of the prominent civil and criminal cases which have been tried in this part of Texas, in one of which he successfully conducted the case of Mrs. Addie E. Kelley against Charles Dillingham, receiver for the H. & T. C. Railroad, an action for damages, and which he contested successfully in the district and state courts and in the Supreme Court of the United States. He has also been eminently successful in many other large and important cases, both civil and criminal, Mr. Pennington has always been a Democrat and strictly in line with his party's principles, and for a number of years he served as chairman of the county Democratic executive committee. He has always been a friend of education, and for six years was a trustee of the Brenham public schools. He belongs to the Masonic fraternity, to Elks Lodge No. 979 of Brenham, and to Brenham Lodge No. 10, Knights of Pythias; has been prominent in the affairs of these orders and has passed through the various chairs of the lodges. Mr. Pennington is a good man in every broad sense that the word implies.

On July 6, 1891, Mr. Pennington was married to Miss May Williams, daughter of H. E. and Isabel Williams of Louisiana. They have no children. Mrs. Pennington's family originally eame from London, England, to Richmond, Virginia, prior to the days of the War of the Revolution, in which members of the family participated. Subsequently the family moved to Louisiana. Mrs. Pennington has always been a Democrat and strictly in line Daughters of the American Revolution of Houston, Texas, and of Brenham Tom Green Chapter, Daughters of the Confederacy. Her religious connection is with Giddings Memorial Methodist Church, Mrs. Pennington has been doing literary work for ten years and in May, 1914, was elected a member of the Texas Women's May, 1914, was elected a memoer or the texas women's Press Association. She is widely and favorably known for her writings, all of which have appeared in the Galveston News among them being: "History of Washington County's Dead Towns," "The History of the Gity of Brenham," "The History of the City of Brenham," "The History of Dr. Richard F. Brenham," "The History of the Mai Fest," and a book of poems entitled "Penn Poems." Some copies of this beautiful book were illustrated by Mrs. Pennington, who is not alone skilled as an authoress, but has decided 'alent as an artist. Her life has been an active and conspicuous one and her labors have ever been directed toward the forwarding of Brenham's interests. A prominent figure in religious, educational, charitable and social movements, she has gained a wide acquaintance among people of culture and refinement, and in her home he displays the graces of gracious hospitality to her any friends.

GEN, JOHN S. GRIFFITH. In that galaxy of brilliant stars whose effulgence yet lights the memory of the body struggle between the North and the South none line brighter or with a steadier glow than that consecrated to the name and fame of John Summerfield Griffith. Where gallant soldiers contended for the plaudits of fame and when individual heroism was the dauly rule, it would seem invidious to make distinctions. But all the honors that are due to this gifted son of exas may well be accorded to him, with disparagement to none. His personality represented a man of unselfish characteristics, of patriotic impulses and a brave commander and a sagacious military counsellor. He lacked, it is true, the strength of body to endure prolonged hardships of war, and he resigned his commission at the moment of his greatest success and brightest promise. He ever demonstrated a real genius for military plans and the courage and audecity for their execution. He was the central figure in many of the leading activities of the war, and gave to the South a service that none of her sons could excel in patriotism and gallanty.

den John Summerfield Griffith was born in Mont-gomery county, Maryland, on June 17, 1829, and is a son of Michael B. Griffith and a grandson of Capt. Henry Griffith of the Revolutionary army, and a lineal descendant of Llewellyn Griffith, who came from Wales to this country prior to Revolutionary days. Michael B. Griffith devoted his life to mercantile pursuits for the most part, but misfortune pursued him and he was reduced gradually from a state of comparative affluence to almost indigency by the time he reached Texas. He left Maryland in 1835, stopped in Jefferson City, Mis-souri, thence to Portland, Missouri, and at both those points his funds steadily were dissipated. When he reached Texas in 1839 he possessed only a thousand dollars. He settled at San Augustine, and there the three sons and three daughters of the family grew up. Mr. Griffith married Miss Lydia Crabb, a daughter of Jeremiah and Elizabeth Crabb. She was a lady of rare attainments and dominating her were those qualities needed for the rearing of a family in adversity on the frontier. Her culture and accomplishments were not mere outward show, but were a part of herself, and were stamped indelibly upon her children. Her hopeful view of things under dark and foreboding conditions was a strong factor in surmounting the many obstacles the family encountered in those lean years, and to her many excellent qualities General Griffith attributes whatever of success in life he has himself achieved.

John Summerfield Griffith received his education chiefly in the home of his parents, and he entered life with a knowledge of the English branches equal to a common school education of today. In 1850 he became a clerk in San Augustine and the next year he engaged in business for himself at that place, borrowed capital making possible the venture. He prospered, to state the matter briefly, and in 1859 he moved to Kaufman county, there established bimself in merchandise at Rockwall, and identified himself in the live stock industry as well. He continued in active business until the opening of the war in 1861, when he sprang to the defense of the Confederacy, becoming Captain of Company B of the Sixth Texas Cavalry, commanded by Col. Warren B. Stone. His company was raised at Rockwall and was tendered to Colonel Greer of the Third Texas Cavalry, but was declined, although the Captain offered to hear the expense of the company for three months on condition of acceptance. Upon the organization of the Sixth Regiment, Captain Griffith's company was accepted, and he was elected Lieutenant-Colonel of the organization. The first real engagement occurred with Federal Indians at Chustenahalah, where Colonel Griffith was in command of a battalion of his regiment. Colonel McIntosh placed the Sixth on the right of the line and ordered its commander to await further orders, but, seeing the opportune moment for striking the enemy, he moved his troops against the enemy without orders, charged over a deep gulch and was the first man to engage the Indians in a hand-to-hand encounter with pistol and sabre. Three times this charge was repeated by Colonel Griffith before the stubborn enemy fled the field, and an inventory of his own casualties showed the Colonel to have received a blow on the head from an Indian's gun, a horse shot under him, a tuft of beard shot from his chin, and his clothing perforated with minie balls.

With the battles of Oak Hills and Elkhorn, the Texas troops formed a part of the army ordered to Corinth, where the Confederate forces were in need of reinforcements, and Colonel Griffith's genius soon made itself felt against General Grant, then pressing hard toward Vicksburg. The Texans were dismounted in Arkansas and their horses such back to Texas, a move that proved unpopular with the troops, and it was decided to remount them while operating about Holly Springs, information to that effect reaching the men and subsequently causing a serious situation in the army. The delay in the arrival of the horses aggravated the men and at Lumpkin, Mississippi, they showed a mutinous disposition when ordered to march by shouting "Horses! Horses!" without offering to move. Colonel Griffith took in the situation and addressed his Texans, appealing to their patriotism, their honor and their sense of duty, until every man, save one, yielded, and the ugly situation cleared up as if by magic.

The transfer of the mean army to the East gave Colonel Griffith greater apportunity to display his ability. He studied the location and disposition of Grant's forces and conceived a plan of campaign against the enemy's rear which met with the endorsement of his co-ordinate officers and resulted in the Holly Springs campaign, with the capture of its garrison and immense stores and supplies. This success not only refurnished the Confederate troops, but it disarranged the plans of General Grant and thereby relieved Vicksburg from immediate sack. This campaign was undertaken under the direction of General Pam Dorn and was made with the approval of General Pemhetron. The service rendered by Colonel Griffith proved so ardnous that his naturally delicate physique threatened a breakdown and a few weeks later the felt impelled to resign his command and return home.

Upon his return to Texas, Colonel Griffth, as a brevet Brigadier, was elected a member of the Tenth Legislature, where he became chairman of the committee on military affairs. On March 1, 1864, he was appointed Brigadier General of state troops by Governor Murrah, for District No. 2, which embraced practically all of the counties along the Brazos and Trinity rivers and east to Van Zant county. In the discharge of his duties in that capacity he elicited the commendation of the Governor of the Eleventh Legislature, and he continued in command of the district until the end of the war.

In 1876 General Griffith was elected a member of the Fifteenth Legislature and he aided in putting the new state constitution into operation. He was made chairman of the committee of public printing, where he earned the reputation of a tircless worker, and where he proved to be a veritable "waste dog" of the treasury. Several laws hear the impress of his legislative hand, among them being the statute making drunkenness in office a misdemeanor, and which might be regarded as a pioneer effort toward prohibition in Texass.

In 1873 General Griffith came to Terrell and was here engaged in the merchandisc business for a time. He was a large stock raiser before the war, and in later years he identified himself once more with that industry, but he was retired from active business for many years before his death, which took place Angust 6, 1901.

In his citizenship General Griffith showed forth a personality that towered high and which had few superiors. His address was pleasing, his mind was active, acute and penetrating, and his judgment was clear and unfailing. He was a man inclinate to deeds of impulse, but seldom did rashness characterize his moods, and he was always just. He lived down among his fellows, and no material success in life, however great, lifted him above the common people whence he came. His restless energy and his indomitable will urged him on continuity, and from his very nature he could of the fact than the state of the presentation of the fact than the country of the presentation of the fact than the country of the fact than the fact of th

That the service of the General was of the highest order during his military activity is amply attested by the possession of a letter from General W. H. Jackson, upon the retirement of General Griffith from the Confederate army.

"Headquarters First Cavalry Corps.
"Spring Hill, Tennessee.
"May 8, 1863.

"Lieut.-Col. J. S. Griffith:

"Colonel: Permit me to offer the testimonial of my high appreciation of you as a gallant, competent and meritorious officer of exceptional moral character. It affords me great pleasure to refer to the valuable services rendered by your command at Oakland, Mississippi, in repulsing and routing a superior force of the enemy, advancing upon General Grenada and thereby saving our retreating army; also the gallant and signal service of yourself while we were together and commanding separate brigades on the raid to Holly Springs and West Tennessee. Please accept the assurance of my highest consideration, and with many regrets that your continued ill health compels you to leave this corps, and a wish that you may soon regain your health sufficiently to enter the service again, I remain, very respectfully,

"Brigadier-General Commanding Cav. Corp." General Griffith had brothers and sisters as follows: Crabb, the eldest of the family, served in the Mexican war and was a merebant in Parmersville, Texas, later moving to Terrell, and there retiring. He died in 1912, leaving a family by his wife, Grace (Price) Griffith comprising two sons and two daughters. Elizabeth Griffith married Frank Powell and died in Shelbyville, Texas, without issue. Joseph served for a time in the Confederate army and later became a merchant in Farmersville; he married Lacy Roberts and left three sons and a daughter. Matilda married William Menaniel and lives at Sulphur Springs, Texas. She has three sons and two daughters.

On December 8, 1851, General Griffith was married to Miss Emily Simpson, a daughter of John J. and Jane (Brooks) Simpson. The marriage occurred in Nacogdoches county, Texas. The father of Mrs. Griffith came to Texas from Kentucky, his native state, where he was born in 1788, and he died in Nacogdoches county in 1833. He spent his life as a planter, and was always a large slave holder. His family included children as follows: Mary, who married William Buford and spent her life in Sulphur Springs, leaving a family of four children at her demise. William married Letitia Buford and was at her demise. a boatman and captain, who did a considerable trading in lands and died at San Augustine. Caroline married Albert Nelson and died in Nacogdoches with three daughters and three sons. John died at the age of twenty-one in Nacogdoches. Victor was a farmer near Nacogdoches. He married first Harriet and then Nannie Arnold and died on his farm. Fannie married Conda Reguet and lived in Nacogdoches, where her husband carried on mercantile operations. When she died she left three daughters and a son. Sarah Emily, the wife of General Griffith, was born on November 20, 1833. Florence married Augustus Edwards and died in Terrell, leaving two daughters and a son. Augustus married Emma Kyle and spent his life as a miller and farmer in Garrison, Texas; he died there, leaving five sons and three daughters.

Mr. Simpson was a man of plain but liberal education, and he came to Texas in about 1829, entering heartily into the hardships incident to those pionere days in the history of the Republic. Their life was marked by all the stress and strain of existence in a new and wild country, and many a long night did the wife and mother spend sleeping in the brush to keep herself from the Indians while her husband was out with others defending the community against the marauding redskins. He became a large landholder in his vicinity and came to be a man of importance in the community. A member of the Methodist Church, he was a man of the highest integrity and the stanchest religious convictions, and he reared his children in that faith.

To General and Mrs. Griffith were born a goodly family, those who reached years of maturity being: William Crabb, of Terrell, where he is engaged in real estate. He is a business man of many and varied interests, and is known to be one of the potent business factors of the city. He married Miss Georgia Charlton and they have children: Lydia, Charlton, Summerfield, Guyan and Max. Miss Lydia has studied voice culture in London, Paris and Berlin, and is au especially talented young coman. Charlton Griffith is a real estate man in Terrell; Summerfield is a farmer and a married to Miss dent at the K. M. J. Augustus B. Griffith married Miss Nannie Harmon, and they have one child, Emily. Emma married Matthew Cartright Roberts, and they have five children: Emily, Annie Ruth, Summerfield, Matthew C

After the death of her gallant husband, on August 6, 1901, Mrs. Griffith continued to reside in Terrell until her death, December 39, 1913, after a short illness. Sile was a gracious and whole souled lady and had a host of stanch friends in the community where she passed so many years of her life and where she was long identified with the church and social activities there carried on.

JULIAN CAMPELL CLOPTON. Long years of identification with the hotel business have given to Julian Campbell Clopton a reputation as a host with the travelingpublic that is indeed enviable, and his own native business ability has been the cause of his excellent success. He has owned and operated a number of hotels in Fort Worth and in other parts of the state and has seen misfortune in his day, but he is at the present time regarded as one of the most successful and prosperous men of the city and there is every reason for that belief.

A Kentuckian by birth, Julian Campbell Clopton was born at Jordan Station, Fulton county, Kentucky, on May 28, 1875, and he is the son of R. M. and Sally (Clopton) Clopton, both of Mississippi. The family, it should be stated, is one of the oldest of English ones, dating back in this country to 1757, when the first of the name came to these shores. The great-great-grand-father of Mr. Clopton, Reuben Clopton, was the son of William and Elizabeth (Hales) Clopton, who were the direct descendants of Lord and Lady Clopton of England, where the family had its origin in the four them century, the first mention of the family in history being in the year 1437, and members of the house of Clopton being oft found named in the pages of the early history of the kingdom.

Julian Campbell Clopton attended the public schools, but did not complete his high school course. He was deflected from that as a result of a difference of opinion with his father, which ended in the boy leaving home, and he first came to Texas in 1889, locating at Fort Worth, which he has made his home ever since. His first enterprise here was in selling papers in the streets, the Fort Worth Gazette being his stock in trade, and he soon established himself as a reliable business boy, with a paying route, the largest in the city. He saved money at this business, continuing for eighteen months, when he took a position as messenger with the Santa Fe Railroad. He remained thus occupied but a short time, then went to East Texas and worked in a saw mill at Montgomery for the firm of Montgomery & Bantley. His next move took him back to the employ of the Santa Fe road, in the building department, and he was thus employed in the construction of bridges for about two years. Worth at this juncture again claimed his notice and here he took employment with the Metropolitan Hotel as a night clerk, in which capacity he served for two years, then becoming chief clerk of the same hotel. This was his first introduction to hotel life and from then until the present time he has been continuously identified thus. with the exception of one year, when he terminated his connection with the Metropolitan Hotel and going to St. Louis worked for the R. J. & R. Shoe Company. his return to Fort Worth he again took a clerkship at the Metropolitan Hotel, remaining for a year, when he bought out the Harris Hotel at Terrell, Texas. He was without capital and went into the deal largely on his nerve, as the saying goes, but he made money and met his obligations promptly as they fell due, and in a few years sold the same at a profit and went to Mineral Wells, where he built the Oxford Hotel. This hotel was destroyed by fire, the disaster finding Mr. Clopton without insurance, and when the smoke cleared away he found himself at the bottom of the ladder again with a cash capital of thirty-five dollars in his pocket and a wife and baby looking to him for maintenance. He wasted no time in vain regrets, however, as many a less enterprising man might have done, and he secured employment for the time being in Watson's Cafe in Fort Worth, remaining there only a short time.

Mr. Clopton had a bost of good friends in the city among the best business people of Fort Worth and with the backing they brought to his aid he built and equipped the business people of Fort Worth and with the backing they brought to his aid he built and equipped from the built of the built

Mr. Clopton enjoys the genuine confidence of the public and he has a host of friends in the city, where he is known to be one of the most popular men of the community. He is a Mason of the thirty-second degree, with affiliations in the Shrine, and he is an Elk and an Odd Fellow as well.

Miss Alma Craft became the wife of Mr. Clopton, she being a daughter of John Craft of Mineral Wells. They have two children: Marion Elizabeth, born in Mineral Wells, September 20, 1907, and Julian Campbell Clopton, Jr., born in the Siehold Hotel, Fort Worth, on January 31, 1913.

JOE C. KERBEY, JR. One of the leading factors in the development and progress of Travis county is the land and investment firm of Joe C. Kerby & Company, which, although founded only seven years ago, has grown rapidly into a recognized force in its particular line. The directing head of this business, Joe C. Kerbey, Jr., is one of Austin's progressive and energetic young men of business, who has won a place for himself among the substantial men of his community by his inherent ability, his enthusiasm and his wealth of modern ideas. Mr. Kerbey was born at Wankesha, Wisconsin, September 4, 1883, while his parents, Joe C. and Maria (Mc-Fall) Kerbey, were making a trip to the North. father, born in Pennsylvania in 1822, left home as a boy and for a time lived in Arkansas, but in 1854 came to Texas and resided in different parts of the state until the outbreak of the war between the states. At that time he became connected with the quartermaster's department of the Confederacy, with headquarters at Tyler, Texas, from which point he was engaged in getting supplies for the army and attending to the forwarding of the same. After the war he became connected with the firm of C. R. Johns & Company, in their land business, and remained with this concern until January 1, 1872. Mr. Kerbey at that time practically retired from active business affairs, although he superintended the management of the lands which he had accumulated. His death occurred in 1907, when he was eighty-free years of age. Mr. Kerbey was married in Tennestee to Maria McFall, who was born at Columbia, that state, and she still survives and is now making her home in Austin. Three children were born to Mr. and Mrs. Kerbey, namely: Joe C., Ir.; McFall, born in 1846, educated at the University of Texas, where he was graduated with the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1988, and now at Washington, D. C., being connected with the Washington Hereld, was married in January, 1911, to Miss Elizabeth Waite of Yonkers, New York, and has one daughter—Elizabeth; and Mary Louise, who is the wife of Arthur L. Skelley of Austin, has one daughter—Mary Louise.

Joe C. Kerbey, Jr., received his early education in the publie schools of Austin, following which he entered the University of Texas. Upon his graduation therefrom he entered the banking business as clerk of the Capitol Bank & Trust Company, but resigned his position at the time of his father's death, and in 1908 embarked in the real estate and investment business, specializing in realty at Houston, El Paso and Austin. He has been successful in building up a large business and his standing in realty at Houston, El Paso and austin. He has been successful in building up a large business that he is worthly representing the honored name which he bears. He is a member of Hill City Lodge, No. 465, A. ustin. Council, No. 2, Rev. 1978, No. 487, A. ustin. Council, No. 2, Rev. A. & S. R., and I Fidelity Lorge of Perfection, No. 4, A. & A. & S. R., and also holds membership in the Beta Theta Pi traternity. Mr. Kerhey is unmarried. He maintains well appointed offices at Nos. 809-810 Scarborough building and resides at No. 2610 Whitis avenue.

JOHN CORNELIUS FLOREA. A lawyer by profession and one of the leaders of the Fort Bend County bar, former superintendent of the county schools and also bonored with other county offices, the owner of a large amount of property in which he is interested as a developer, Mr. Florea is for these substantial reasons and for many others one of the best known and most enterprising citizens of Fort Bend county. He has had an interesting and varied career and first came into Texas as a school teacher, an occupation which he followed with much credit for some care.

with much credit for some years.

John Cornelius Florea was born in Adams county, Ohio, in November, 1866, a son of Hamilton and Adeline (Peterson) Florea, his parents being natives of the same county. How the family got established in Ohio would make an interesting story if told in detail. The outline is as follows: The original ancestors of the Floreas were French Hugnenots, who fled from France during the era of persecution and settled in America. The founder of the American branch was Jacob Florea, who was the great-great-grandfather of the Richmond lawyer. He was not only an early American settler, but helped the colonies fight in their struggle for independence against Great Britain. His son Joshua, the next in the line of ancestry, went over the Alleghany Mountains into Kentucky along with Daniel Boone and other pioneers of that territory. It was in Kentucky that Grandfather John Florea was born. The father of John had received a grant of land in Ohio in what was then called the northwest territory, and, on coming of age, John Florea located upon this land and thus established his family in Adams county. Grandfather John Florea had all the characteristics of a true pioneer, was a man strong and rugged physically and possessed all the hardy virtues of the best men of his time. He reared fourteen children to maturity and he himself died when eighty-seven years of age. Hamilton Florea, the father, spent all his life as a farmer and lived and died on the original grant of land in Ohio. During his younger days he taught school and was always a hard worker, but a quiet unassuming man who performed his duties without any ostentation. His wife's people were of Danish stock, although residents in America for several generations.

The Richmond lawyer has one sister, Rhoda Ellen, the wife of J. M. Wisecup of Highland county, Ohio. Mr. John C. Florea up to the time he was of age lived on his father's farm and learned all of its duties. Many a day he drove an ox team and became accustomed to the hardest kind of work, and no doubt the energy and thriftiness thus installed were largely responsible for the success he has achieved in professional and business life. The common schools afforded him his early education and he attended them about six months each year. For one year he taught his home school and then worked his way through the Academy at North Liberty, Ohio. It was in Missouri where he and three other young men were trying an experiment by themselves and kept their own house while doing the work involved. The death of his father recalled Mr. Florea from Missouri and he returned and settled up the estate. ne then entered the noted educational institution known as the Holbrook School at Lebanon, Ohio, and by hard work paid his way through that school and was graduated with three degrees. In the meantime he had been engaged as a teacher of summer normals and soon afterward came to Houston, Texas, where he was principal of one of the public schools for one year.

In 1893 Mr. Florea married Miss Jessie Dunlop of Houston. She is a daughter of Andrew and Ella Dunlop. who were early settlers of Texas, her father having served from this state in the war as a Confederate soldier. Somewhat later Mr. Florea left Houston with his wife and settled in Fort Bend county, where he bought four hundred and thirty-eight acres of land. He still owns this handsome property and during the first seven years was engaged in cultivating it as a practical planter. Being an educator of experience he was next honored with election to the office of superintendent of county schools and supervised the county school system in this capacity for four years. In the meantime he had taken up the study of law and was admitted to the bar, since which time he has had an office in Richmond and has enjoyed a splendid practice. In 1908 he mond and has enjoyed a spiranti practice. In 1203 he was elected county attorney and held office four years and during his residence on the farm had served as a justice of the peace. Mr. Florea is identified with varied interests in this section of Texas. About the time he was admitted to the bar he bought the newspaper known as the Texas Coaster, a weekly paper, in which he still retains a half interest. He is a member of the Richmond Development Company and is giving much attention to the improvements of his own property in this county. The five children of himself and wife are unentioned as follows: Louise Adeline, the wife of Joseph Austin of Richmond; Nellie is in school at Denton, Texas; Minnie, George Dunlap and Jesse Merriam are all at home. Mr. Florea and wife are active members of the Christian church, he is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias, and Mrs. Florea is a member of the Daughters of the Confederacy. Mr. Florea is a keen student of men and affairs and whether in official capacity or as a private citizen has always maintained a deep interest in educational activities. He is regarded as one of the brightest men in Fort Bend county.

JOEL R. McGEE, M. D., of New Boston, Bowie county, Texas, belongs to one of the pioneer families of the "Lone Star State."

He was horn in Bowie county, two miles south of the present town of New Boston, in 1870, son of J. Tom and Elizabeth (McCright) McGee. J. Tom McGee was born near Rome, Georgia, in 1846, and in 1849 came with his father, Joel McGee, and other members of the family, to Texas. The family settled in Cass county, which we county. This has been their home ever since. J. Tom McGee, at the age of eighteen, enlisted in the Confederate army, and saw one year of active service. He married soon after the war, and with the passing years seven children and fifteen grandchildren were given to them, all of whom are still living, with one exception—a grandchild was claimed by death in September, 1912.

Joel R. McGee attended the common schools of his native county and the New Boston high school, and he also pursued a course of study at the Sam Houston Normal School at Huntsville, of which institution he is a graduate with the class of 1894. Then for nine years he taught school in Bowie county. Meanwhile he decided to enter the medical profession. He prepared himself for this work at the University of Tennessee, at Nashville, where he graduated from the Medical Department in 1903. Immediately following his graduation, he opened an office for the practice of medicine at New Doston, where he has since continued, meeting with that success which his thorough equipment and carnest efforts merit.

Dr. McGee, like all progressive, up-to-date members of his profession, has identified himself with numerous fraternal organizations. He is a member of the Bowie County, Northeast Texas, Texas State, and American Medical Associations.

He married, in Bowie county, Miss Carrie Eliza Ellis, a native of Illinois, and they have four children: Lillie, Joel R., Jr., Mildred, and Ellis.

THOMAS M. ANDERSON. One of the pioneers of Goree, Texas, and one of the men whom every one respects and likes, is Thomas M. Anderson. He has given of his time and energy for years in the effort to build up this section of the state and is one of the most valuable eitizens Goree has ever owned. As a farmer and rancher in this section Mr. Anderson early realized the opportunities which the country offered to settlers, and he has been indefatigable in his efforts to aid in its development. He is now engaged in the real estate and loan business and has made a decided success of this business.

Thomas M. Anderson was born in Gilmer county, Georgia, on the 4th of April, 1869. He grew up in his native state and received his elementary education in the public schools of Georgia. He then took a course in Cumberland College, in Murray county, Georgia. When he completed this work he was only sixteen years of age, but he was mature for his years and a fine student, so he was offered a position as a teacher in Marion county, Tennessee. After one year as a teacher he returned to his home in Georgia, but only remained there for a short time before he went to Kansas. He followed farming and the cattle business in this state for a few months and then came to Texas. After coming to the latter state he taught school for seven terms and then settled down to farming and cattle raising in Knox county, where he had been teaching school. It was in 1885 that he came to Texas, at a time when this section was in a very crude and undeveloped state, and he has lived here ever since, and has been one of the leaders in the marvelous development that has taken place. He has followed farming and stock raising during all these years, and now operates a farm three miles from Goree. In 1908 he established his present office and is now doing a prosperous business in real estate, insurance and loans.

Mr. Anderson is a member of the Democratic party and has always taken an active interest in politics where local matters have been concerned. He was Justice of the Peace for eighteen years and for four years was a member of the board of county commissioners. In religious matters Mr. Anderson leans toward the Methodist Church, but he is a supporter of all denominations. In the fraternal world he is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, being one of the charter members of this order in the county. He is also a member of the Knights of Pythias and of the Benevolent Protective Order of Elks. As a member of the Commercial Club his judgment and experience have been of much benefit to the work of this organization.

Mr. Anderson was married to Miss so Glandaton, Mr. Anderson was married to Miss so Glandaton data daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. M. Gallle Gilliand, of Knox county, on the 3d of October, 1907, the marriang taking place in Knox county, Mr. and Mrs. Anderson have two children, both of whom are girls, namely, Montie and Tommie.

R. L. McMeans, M. D. Now regarded as one of the best physicians in Amarillo in point of ability and extent of practice, Dr. McMeans has been identified with his profession in this state for about twenty-four years. His success has been due to hard study and application of all the energies he possesses, and from the first he has aimed at the highest ideals of professional service.

Dr. McMeans was born at Palestine, Texas, September 9, 1806, a son of James L. and Alexena (Ricks) McMeans. His father, a native of Alabama, came to Texas in 1854, locating in Anderson county, where he followed with considerable success the occupation of farmer and stock raiser. His death occurred in 1895 at Palestine, when he was seventy-five years of age, and he was buried at that city. The mother also a native of Alabama received her education and was married in that state and is now living with her son in Galveston, Judge S. A. McMeans of the court of civil appeals. Ten children comprised the family, of whom the doctor was the youngest.

He attended the local public schools during his boybood and at the age of seventeen lott home and lassince fought his own way to the top. He finally outdeness acquired by his own efforts entered the Beamout Medical College of St. Louis, where he was gradunted M. D. in 1889. The first five years of his professional career were spent in the railway hospitals at Palestine and Tyler, Texas, and he established himself in general practice at Plano, where he remained for twelve years. In 1906 he came to Amarillo, and since that time has enjoyed an excellent general practice. The dector is a member of the county and state medical societies and the American Medical Association, and is lecturer in the nurses? school of St. Anthony's Sanitarium of Amarillo, and at the present time is serving as county physician of Potter county.

Dr. McMeans is a Democrat, and a member of the Methodist church. He is prominent in Masonry, baving taken all the degrees in the York Rite, including the Commandery and Shrine, Hella Temple, Dallas, Texas, and is also affiliated with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Woodmen of the World. At Childress, Texas, in July, 1904, he married Miss Annett. H. Harris, whose parents are now living in San Antonio. Dr. McMeans is a director of the Amarillo Bankers & Trust Company. He is fond of outdoor life and recreation and has a broad acquaintance throughout Potter county.

JAMES G. WRIGHT, M. D. A successful practice as a physician and surgeon at Big Springs for the past twelve or thirteen years has made Dr. Wright one of the leading editizens of that place and asids from the duties connected with a large medical practice he is a valuable worker in the community, and maintains a public spirited attitude toward all undertakings for the general welfare.

Dr. James O. Wright was born December 8, 1867, at Searcy, Arkansas. His parents were Thomas D. and Mary Elizabeth Wright. On the father's side the ancestry is Irish, and on the mother's German, and the father belonged to an old southern family which owned slaves and large estates before the war. Thomas D. Wright was a native of Tennessee, whence he moved to Searey, Arkansas, and spent more than forty years at Searcy, in the practice of his profession as a physician and surgeon. He had moved to Searcy when he was about twenty-one years of age, and continued there a few years when he came to Texas where he lived until his death, at 66 years of age. There were seventeen children in his family, twelve by the first marriage and five by the second, and Dr. James G. was the eighth in order of birth, among the first family. At the present time there are five of the first family, and three of the second still living. The family moved from Arkansas to Texas in 1874, spending one year in Johnson county, and in the fall of 1875 moving to Brownwood, Texas, where the parents both died.

James G. Wright had his education chiefly in the public schools of Texas, and early turned his attention to the profession which his father had followed with such distinction and success. He completed his medical studies in the University of Tennessee, in the medical studies in the university of Tennessee, in the medical department located at Nashville, where he was graduated in 1896 with the degree of M. D. He is a progressive physician and has never been entirely satisfied with his attainments and is the kind of man who would with this attainments and is the kind of that who would never lose ambition for higher accomplishment in the line of his profession. Since taking his regular medical degree, he has studied as a post-graduate in the Post Graduate School of Chicago, in 1899, and in 1905 pursued further courses in the Chicago Polyelinic. His first practice was at May, Texas, where he remained from 1893 to 1900, and in the latter year located at Big Springs, where he has enjoyed a large practice to the present time.

The doctor has been a staunch Democrat since casting his first vote, and is affiliated with the Masonic Order, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Woodmen of the World. At Brownwood, Texas, July 18, 1891, Dr. Wright married Miss Sarah O. Carter, daughter of J. I. Carter. Her father was a substantial farmer of Brown county, and is now deceased. Her mother lived in the home of Dr. and Mrs. Wright and is seventythree years of age, yet well preserved and a cheerful old lady. Dr. Wright and wife have four children, whose names are Altus, Vivian, Inez and Ona. The children in age range from twenty to fourteen years, and all are in school except the second boy, who is now a drug clerk,

WILLIAM LUCIUS ADKINS. By more than thirty-five years of successful practice as a lawyer and by varied and important relations with local affairs, William L. Adkins is one of the best known citizens of Colorado county, and both for his own career and that of his family it is appropriate to give some place in these biographical annals of Texas.

William Lucius Adkins was born on the Colorado river in Colorado county, October 18, 1859, a son of Dr. W. L. and Susan (Munn) Adkins, the father a native of Georgia and the latter of Alabama. Great-grandfather Daniel Adkins came to the Georgia colony with James Oglethorpe, and his name appears on the records of the Second Baptist church of Georgia as deacon in 1779. Through the various generations have appeared many men successful as planters, doctors and Baptist preachers. Grandfather John F. Adkins followed his son to Texas, bringing his slaves, and was known through the rest of his life as a leading planter.

Dr. W. L. Adkins, father of the Columbus lawyer, was one of the pioneer physicians of Texas, having come to the Republic in 1837 and settling at LaGrange in Fayette county. After a number of years' practice in that locality, in the early fifties he moved to Colorado county and spent the rest of his days there. He was a man of wealth, at one time owned forty-five thousand acres of land in Colorado county, and was one of the largest planters. Though a slave holder, he did not believe that human slavery could result in ultimate good, and also believed in the integrity of the Union, and accordingly voted against secession. During the Mexican war he had enlisted with a regiment from Texas. Dr. Adkins died in 1861, about the beginning of the war, and his wife survived him about ten years.

William L. Adkins was educated in the local schools of Fayette county and in the Military Institute at Austin. In early manhood he married Miss Jeannie Bowers, who was born at Columbus, a daughter of Dr.

John H. Bowers.

The career of Dr. John H. Bowers deserves more than passing notice. Born in Alsace, then a Province of France, he died at Columbus, Texas, when almost ninety years of age. While a student at Mulhausen University, he was one of the students body delegated to attend the funeral of Marquis de LaFayette in 1834. At the age of eighteen he left France, traveled in India and China, and while in the Orient had considerable experience in treating Asiatic cholera. He brought with him to Texas a chest of medicines, which had been presented him by an English military officer, and these medicines proved an invaluable aid to him while treating the cholera epidemic in Texas in 1851. Dr. Bowers landed at New York in 1836, and traveled around by sea to Galveston. In his professional capacity his services were given to many of the most prominent early Texans, including General Sam Houston and the second Mrs. Houston, besides many other notable characters of the era of the Republic. He made the acquaintance of General Santa Ana and Col. Almonte while they were prisoners in Texas, and Gen. Santa Ana some years later invited Dr. Bowers to visit him in Mexico City. Dr. Bowers was a fine type of the pioneer physician, disregarding all personal inconveniences and hardships and dangers in attending his patients, and it is said that in the early days he made several trips between Galveston and Brownsville, at a time when the greater portion of that distance was a wilderness and infested with Indians and outlaws. He had arrived in Texas shortly after the battle of San Jacinto, was attached to Houston's army for a time, and also saw service in the Mexican war.

After his marriage Mr. Adkins was engaged in the drug business for several years at Columbus, and studied law in the offices of Major Ford and Wells Thompson. Admitted to the bar in 1887, he began practice at Columbus, and has for many years had a position as one of the leading lawyers in his part of the state. He has also given political service, having served as county chairman, as Democratic Congressional chairman, represented Columbus county in the Twenty-second Legislature, was presidential elector on the Alton B. Parker ticket in 1904, and was a delegate to the Democratic convention which nominated William J. Bryan the second time. Mr. Adkins is the owner of a large amount of land in Colorado county.

Mr. and Mrs. Adkins are the parents of one son, John Bowers Adkins. With his wife Mr. Adkins has memhership in the Baptist church, that denomination having claimed the representatives of the Adkins family for many generations.

Major James Shepherd Grinnan. When Major Grinnan died in Terrell a few years ago, it was said that no other contemporary had done so much to enrich his community in those elements which make for civic wholesomeness and material prosperity. Such a citizen was an honor to Texas history, and the brief synopsis of his genealogy and eareer in succeding paragraphs, is but a meagre memorial to one whose life left much that was practical in its accomplishments and inspiring in its

Although a Texan by adoption, Major Grinnan was a Virginian by birth, born near the historic town of Cul-pepper, January 2, 1838. Major Grinnan's grandfather,

JB Irvine

Daniel Grinnan settled in Culpepper county in 1764 on a farm purchased from Governor Spotswood. With his son John he fought in the Revolutionary war, taking part in the battle of Guilford Courthouse. This same Dan Grinnan was a surveyor of Culpepper county, and in one of his surveys was associated with George Wash-

Major Grinnan was the son of William Stewart Grinnan and Mary Edmondson Welch. His father was twice married, the first time to Miss Shepherd, a niece of President Madison, the marriage taking place in Montpelier, Madison's country home. To this union were born two sons, James and Shepherd, after whom Major Grinnan was named, and a daughter Frances. To his second wife, Mary Edmondson Welch were born eight sons and one daughter. The only ones besides the major to live and marry were Mary Elizabeth Grinnan Nelson, and William Welch Grinnan.

Three of Major Grinnan's brothers gave their lives a willing sacrifice to the south and her rights. In 1860, even before the Confederacy was organized, James S. Grinnan as a private soldier joined the Culpepper minutemen, the same company in which his great-grandfather served during the Revolutionary war. He served under General A. P. Hill, was with General Stonewall Jackson at Harper's Ferry, and also served under J. E. B. Stuart. After Stuart's death he was appointed, by the secretary of the Confederacy, Col. Crump, receiving the indorsement of the Confederate Congress, to a position in the secret service; it being his duty to keep open the communication between Lee's army and the Trans-Mississippi department. In this capacity he acted as messenger, financial and confidential agent in touch and communication with the army and cabinet of the Confederacy. In the discharge of these duties, he made thirteen trips across the Mississippi river and back, twenty-six trips in all, carrying money and dispatches from President Davis' headquarters. He also made two trips through Texas and into Mexico. At the time of the surrender he was on his way to Mexico again, but went to New York and sailed for Europe instead, where he remained eight months.

Early after the opening of hostilities his keen business foresight caused him to remove the earnings of his young manhood from the dangers and uncertainty of his surroundings to the Bank of England, and it was for this reason, as well as to watch developments in the first days of reconstruction that he went abroad.

On his return, having in his trip through Texas been impressed with the bright future in store for the Lone Star state, he settled in Texas. He located at Tyler, going into business with his brother Welch Grinnan, who remained there until his death in 1898. In 1868 Major Grinnan moved into Jefferson, Texas, where he went into business with Mr. Wayland, afterwards Senator Wayland. In 1872 Major Grinnan engaged in the banking and cotton commission business in Galveston, the firm being known as Grinnan, Wayland & Duval. In 1878 he removed to Kaufman county, where he resided until his death July 29, 1907, in Terrell.

A great advocate of public education, he was foremost in the organization of the Terrell Public Schools, and was president of the first board. It was perhaps more to his efforts than to any other's that Terrell secured the location of the North Texas Hospital for the Insane. He served on the board of directors of that institution as president through the Ireland, Ross, Culberson and Sayers administrations, and was also on the board under the Lanham administration. Major Grinnan acted as vestryman of the Church of the Good Shepherd from the date of its founding until a few years before his death. He was also a member of the Masonic Order. During his residence in Galveston he was offered the nomination of state senator by the Democrats of the district, the Republicans offering to make no opposition if he accepted the nomination, but, at the request of his wife he declined the honor.

He was a man of strong and forceful personality, with a keen sense of humor, a Chesterfield in manner, and public spirited. During the thirty years prior to his death there was scarcely a movement of a public nature in which he did not figure conspicuously. As a leader in public matters, his sound judgment and unselfish spirit always won for him the full confidence and support of his own community. His zeal, enthusiasm and intelli-gent public effort did more for the advancement of the town in which he lived than could be credited to any other one citizen. Always liberal, he responded promptly to every public need. Major Grinnan was known through-out the state, where he was respected and revered as he was at home. High in moral standing, firm in his belief of what was right, he was tender, devoted, and lavish in his home. Though sorrow touched him many times, he always maintained the same calm, diguified bearing and the same cheerful outlook for the future.

He died confident in his God and resting in His promises. During his residence in Tyler, in 1868, he married Miss Disha Belzora Ham, a native of the town and the eldest daughter of Frederick Jourdon Ham and Lucinda Wells Ham. Mr. Ham was born in North Carolina, but moved to Texas in the early days. He was a man of edueation and refinement, fond of reading, of quiet bearing, but of the most unflinching courage. It was said of him that "his word was as good as his bond." He was a civil engineer, and accumulated a comfortable fortune in the pursuit of his profession. He died on his plautation, near Tyler, in 1855. Mrs. Ham died in 1914 at the age of eighty-six at the home of her daughter, Mrs. P. C. Coleman of Colorado, Texas, formerly Miss Lucy Ham, one of Texas' most noted belles. Mrs. Ham is the daughter of Colonel Rice Wells, a banker of Brandon, Mississippi. He was a colonel in the war of 1812, fighting the battle of New Orleans under Andrew Jackson. He moved to Texas during the Republic, settling in Harrison county in 1842, afterwards moving to Smith county. He died in Starville, and has a great number of descendants in this state.

Mrs. Grinnan died at Broadlands, the country home, in 1895. She left eight children to mourn her loss: Libbie, Mrs. L. E. Griffith (now deceased), who was the mother of Mrs. Janie Belle and Libby Lucinda Griffith; James Shepherd, who married Miss Bertha Dollahite of Terrell; Lucile, now Mrs. William H. Lyon; Frederick Ham and Helen Benners, both of whom died in 1904; Belle Shortridge, now Mrs. Frank Martin, who had two children, Frank and James Grinnan; Louis Porter, married to Miss Genevieve Manning; and Kate Nadine, who died in 1910.

The two sons are engaged in business in Terrell. James, like his forebears, responding to his country's call, took part in the Spanish-American war and went to Cuba with Hood's Immunes. He is a vestryman of the Church of the Good Shepherd, a member of the Asylum board, and also a member of the executive committee of the Democratic party of Texas, and is a thirty-second degree Mason. Louis is also a thirty-second degree Mason, is prominent in social circles, and is a noted globe-trotter.

J. B. IRVINE. In the death of J. B. Irvine, which occurred during a temporary residence at Mineral Wells on September 13, 1911, the city of Sherman and Grayson county were deprived of a citizen whose influence and character they could ill afford to lose. He had for many years been a business man and farmer and stockman in the vicinity of Sherman, but his success in material directions was perhaps less important to his fellowmen than his devotion to civic ideals and service, and his unflinehing integrity in every relation with society, community and church.

J. B. Irvine was born at Timber Ridge, Virginia, July

30, 1853, and was fifty-eight years of age when he died. He came to Texas in 1883, first locating at San Marcos, but a year later moved to Sherman, locating in the Fairview addition to that city. For some years he was identified with the packing house market business in Sherman, and later turned most of his attention to the supervision of a large farm west of the city. He was the youngest in a family of five daughters and two sons, whose parents were William F. and Christiann (Berry) Irvine, his father a native of Pennsylvania and his mother of Virginia. The Irvine family has for a number of generations been established in America, and has furnished a number of prominent names, including a general of colonial troops during the Revolutionary war. The late Mr. Irvine's father was a Pennsylvania farmer. J. B. Irvine was reared and educated in Virginia and was married in that state to Miss Ella Wilson, whose parents were Robert T. and Eliza (Ingles) Wilson. parents were both natives of Virginia, and the Wilson and Ingles families had settled in that old colony at a very early date and secured their land direct from the Indians. In 1850 the Wilson family moved to Knoxville, Tennessee, where Mrs. Irvine was born March 13, Vinc, telmessee, where Mrs, Irvine was norm March 18, 1853, helig he fourth of nine children, six daughters and three sous. Of these, besides Mrs. Irvine, the only survivors are: Mrs. Ida Fultz, of Rockbridge county, Virginia; Mrs. W. P. Bonds, of Quay, New Mexico, and Miss Nora Ingles Wilson, a trained nurse living at Roanoke, Virginia.

To the marriage of Mr. Irvine and wife were born the following children: A. Percy, born at Lexington, Virginia, March 22, 1876, is unmarried and is a prospector living at Glendale, Arizona. Sid H., born at Lexington, Virginia, September 8, 1877, is unmarried and is man-ager for the N. K. Fairbanks Company at Atlanta, Georgia. John Kyle, born at Lexington, Virginia, on August 30, 1879, died as a result of injuries received in the cyclone at Sherman in 1896. Janie Ingles, born May 13, 1881, at Timber Ridge, Virginia, was married December 14, 1904, to W. R. Greer, a merchant at Bowie, Texas, and they have one son, Rudy Irvine, now five years of age. Maggie S., born at San Marcos, Texas, January 21, 1883, was married March 22, 1905, to Dr. C. J. Colling, lives in Sherman and has two children, Margaret and Beverly. Ross A., born April 22, 1885, at Sherman, married November 14, 1907, to Gertrude Barthlow, a native of Sherman. Nellie Joe, horn January 13, 1887, at Sherman, was married December 27, 1913, to Guy Bounds, a rancher of El Paso county and a son of Ed Bounds proprietor of the Circle Ranch. Mary M., born December 5, 1888, at Sherman, was married April 20, 1912, to Osgood Campbell, ticket agent and rating clerk for the Missouri Kansas and Texas Railroad at Sherman, and they have a daughter, Elizabeth Berry, born July 14, 1913. Robbie, the ninth child, died in infancy. Charles W., born April 19, 1891, now farmer and managing his mother's affairs, was married September 25, 1913, to Miss Mattie Miller, a native of Sherman. Miss Bess, born April 12, 1893, at Sherman, lives at home. Miss Ruth, the youngest, was born the twelfth child on the twelfth day of the twelfth month in 1897 and is now a student in the Sherman High School.

While the business relations of the late Mr. Irvine were of a successful character, the more important feature of his career was his attitude toward community and the moral and religious affairs. After his death a tribute came from Mr. P. W. Horne, at one time superintendent of the Sherman schools, and now at the head of the publis eshoel system of Houston, and from his letter, published at the time, will be found the most salient characteristics of this sterling Sherman citizen:

"During the seven years that I had the privilege of being superintendent of the city schools of Sherman, there was no man who stood by me more faithfully than did he, or who contributed more to the educational upbuilding of Sherman. Mr. Irvine always stood for the thing that he believed to be right. Like all the rest of us, it was at any time possible that he might be mistaken; but, if he believed a thing to be right and just, he had not the slightest hesitancy in saying so in unmistakable terms. He had the courage of his convictions, he was not afraid to fight, if need be, for what he considered the right. More than this, he had a kindly, sympathetic heart. If any question arose in the administration of the schools, he always leaned toward the side of kindness and off mercy. " When he thought that a certain course would stand for the moral courses were always to the side of the toward the side of the

"He was a devoted member of the Presbyterian Church and loved his church dearly; but he never allowed a sectarian influence to bias his vote on any school question. He had his political views, but what they were no one could ever have decided by a scrutiny of his school record. As a member of the board he stood for the entire town and not for any one portion

"It has been my pleasure in the last twenty years to know a number of good, strong men who made excellent members of a board of education, as well as a very few who did not. In all this number I never knew one who surpassed J. B. Irvine in his unfaltering devotion to the surpassed J. B. Irvine in his unfaltering devotion to the number his charge. In this particular he has been did not under his charge. In this particular he has been developed by the surpassed in his community, in his church, and most of all in his family. He will be dieply missed by many men seat-tered over a wide extent of territory, and among these latter I am one."

RIPLEY H. Huyten, M. D., one of the well-known and successful physicians of Pallard, has practiced his profession in Smith county, Texas, for more than a quarter of a century, and is identified with some of the county 's industrial and financial institutions, being president of the Cititzes' Yatae Bank of Bullard and also of the Bullard Lace Leather Company. He was born near Farmington, Marshall county, Tennessee, December 20, 1858, a son of James N. and Cynthia (Hayes) Hunter, this paternal great-grandfather came from Ireland at a comparatively early day and settled near Charleston, South Carolina, and his grandfather, Ephraim Hunter, was one of the first generation descended from this Irish enigrant. Ephraim Hunter married a Miss Bishop, and might be supported to the state of the state

James N. Hunter was a man of modest ambition, a quiet, unassuming citizen, who engaged in farming and mereantile pursuits at Farmington, Tennessee, where he died in 1889. For many years prior to his death he was a member of the Methodist Episcopal church and took a commendable interest in promoting its good works. His widow is still living, at the advanced age of eighty-seven years. Their children were Virginia, who married W. C. Adams and died at Farmington; Sallie, who is now the wife of W. K. Long of that place; Dora, who died in Farmington as the wife of T. G. Slate; Alice, who is now the wife of J. H. Culbertson of Farmington; Dr. Ripley H.; Etta, who married a man named Roberts and, after his death, became the wife of Nicholas Boren, is now deceased; Lula, who married L. M. Bell and died at Louisburg, Tennessee.

In his horhood and youth Dr. Hunter enjoyed the advantages of both country and town life, his early years being passed on his father's farm and in the little city of Farmington. After acquiring an academic education, he taught for some time in the country schools, and then began the study of medicine under the preceptorship of Dr. W. C. Ransom at Farmington. Here he was prepared for entrance to the medical department of Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tennessee, where he was graduated with the degree of M. D. in 1883. Upon receiving his degree he began the practice of medicine in his native town, where he remained until in 1886, when he decided to try his fortunes in the great state of Texas. In that year he located at Selman, among strangers, and practiced there for ten years. In 1896 he removed to Bullard, where he built and opened the first drug store, which he conducted in connection with his professional duties as a physician. He is still engaged in the drug business; was one of the organizers of the Citizens' State Bank, in 1907, of which he is now president, and, as above stated, he is also the president of the Bullard Lace Leather Company. However, Dr. Hunter is first of all a physician, and his connection with other enterprises has never prevented him from attending to his patients. In his profession, he has kept fully abreast of the progress of medical science, and is recognized as one of the progressive doctors of Smith county. He is a member of the Masonic fraternity, and he and his family belong to the Methodist Episcopal church.

Dr. Hunter has been twice married. In September, 1887, he married Miss Jessie Bone, daughter of Dr. R. D. Bone of Selman, Texas, and to this union were born two children-Annie May and Mina. The former is now the wife of L. F. Kay of Bullard, and the latter is Mrs. P. Barclay of Beaumont, Texas. Mrs. Jessie Boue Hunter died in 1892, and in October, 1893, Dr. flunter married Miss Berniee Jones, daughter of John Jones of Rusk county, Texas. To this second union have been born six children—Lula, Mary, Rusb Q, Ripley H., Bonney and Sara. Lula and Mary are students in Kidd-Ker College, at Sherman, Texas, and the other children are at home with the parents.

JAMES E. Corren. Mayor of Port Aransas, leading real estate dealer of the place, and the proprietor of the Famous Tarpon Inn, eelebrated the world over for the excellency of its cuisine, James E. Cotter takes his place as one of the forement or, indeed, the foremost man of the place. He was born in Eric, Pennsylvania, in 1876, and spent his early boyhood in Topeka, Kansas, whence he came to Texas in 1892, settling first at Port Aransas, then known as Ropesville, afterwards changed to Tarpon, Port Aransas in those days was the only town on Mustang Island, and since the name was changed from Tarpon it has become widely known for the great work the government has carried on there in building jetties, dredging and deepening the harbor of Aransas Paes. It is now a place of regular call for cotton-carrying steamships, and there is also a regular line of oil-carrying steamers between Tampico, Mexico, and Port Aransas. The town is situated directly upon the harbor and is receiving the benefit of its most fortunate situation in the building of large warehouses, oil tanks, cotton compresses, etc. It is also an important center of the fish industry of these parts.

When Port Aransas was newly incorporated, James E. Cotter was elected mayor of the city, in 1910, and, by subsequent election, has served continuously in that office. He is a capable and efficient official and has done excellent work in the office of chief executive of the city.

For several years Mr. Cotter has been the owner and manager of the famous Tarpon Inn, known all over the world for its cuisine of fish and other sea food, as well as for being the headquarters of the greatest tarpon fishing waters in America. The Tarpon Club holds forth at this hotel, and the most expert devotees of this rare sport are regular summer visitors at Mr. Cotter's hostelry, as well as large numbers of guests who come season after season for the pleasures that may be derived on extended holidays in so delightful a spot. In addition to these enterprises, Mr. Cotter is also the leading real estate dealer in Port Aransas, and finds himself one of the busiest men of the place, as well as the most popular and prom-

McDonald Meachum, Lawyer and a former prominent member of the Texas State Senate, McDonald Meachum, with law offices at 1004-5-6-7 Union National Bank Bidg., Houston, Texas, has won a successful place, both in his profession and in the public life of his stateling and useful activities of his forebears, for he represents one of the old families of South Texas.

McDonald Meachum was born in Anderson, Grimes county, August 5, 1876. His parents were Col. W. and Mary E. (McDonald) Meachum. His father, a native of North Carolina, emigrated to Texas during the fifties, settling in Grimes county, where he is well known as member of the pioneer bar of that county, and during the Givil War, in which he enlisted as a private, was promoted for gallantry and served with official rank in a Texas regiment. The mother was born in Texas, a daughter of General James G. McDonald, who came to Texas from Nashville, Tennessee, during the early days of the Republic, settled near Anderson, in Grimes county, and for many years was a leading member of the bar of that section, District Attorney and State Senator in the early days of Texas History, and was a close and intimate friend of General Sam Houston.

McDonald Meachum was reared in Grimes county, educated at the Anderson High School, and in 1894 entered the law department of the University of Texas, where he was graduated LL. B. in 1896. During his last year at the University he was president of the Senior Law Class, With the conclusion of his studies and his admission to the bar, he began practice at Navasota, in Grimes county, in the month of November, 1896. It was in that community that he attained rank as a successful lawyer and won his most conspicuous honors in public life.

In 1902 Mr. Meachum was elected to the legislature as a representative, serving during the 1903 session. After one term in the house, in 1904 he was elected to the senate, and sat in that body from 1905 to 1911. In the latter year he resigned in the senate and moved his home and law office to Houston, where he has since practiced. While in the senate, Mr. Meachum attracted attention for his ability, both as a debater and originator of practical and useful legislation. He took a part in practically all the important discussions over public matters during his official term. He was either a member or chairman of some of the most important committees in the senate, including chairmanship of judiciary committee number one. For a time he served as president pro tem of the senate. It was Senator Meachum who prepared and introduced the bill providing for the building of a monument at state expense over the grave of General Sam Houston, at Huntsville. That bill, by unanimous consent, passed both houses, and at the dedieation of the monument, on April 21, 1911, Senator Meachum shared the platform bonors of the day with the Hon. William J. Bryan.

Mr. Meachum has membership in Navasota Lodge, No. 299, A. F. & A. M.; B. F. Wilson Chapter, No. 125, R. A. M.; F. Wilson Chapter, No. 125, T. Wilson Chapter, No. 126, T.

On December 5th, 1899, Mr. Meachum married Miss Lucile Shaw, daughter of James M. Shaw of Navasota. Her father was one of the early settlers in Grimoscounty; for twenty years was cashier of the First National Bank of Navasota, and is now connected with the Rio Bravo Oil Company. Mr. Meachum and wife have a daughter, Marguerite. JAMES ISAMC EASON. Bunking has been the field to which Mr. Eason has devoted the energies of his active career for a number of years. With his long experience be combines an unusual equipment of ability and skill in the organization and management of financial institutions. About six years ago he organized and took an executive post in the First Guaranty State Bank of Plano, and as cashier and active manager of that institution has made it one of the most serviceable banks in Collin county.

James Issae Easen was born June 29, 1872, at Dalton, Georgia, a son of T. J. and Mary Allen Eason. Both pareuts were natives of Greeneville, Tennessee, and, at loyal soldier of the Confederacy, served throughout the struggle, and at the conclusion identified himself with Georgia as a cotton merchant, and later followed general mercantile lines. About 1855 he moved to Texas, locating at Ennis, in Ellis county, and continued as a farmer and stock raiser until his death, in about 1890. The mother died in Dalton, Georgia, about 1854.

James I. Eason, who is the youngest in a family of eight children (seven sons and one daughter), five of whom are now living, was about thirteen years old when the family established their home in Texas, and his early calucation, begun in Georgia, was completed in this state in the public schools. His first business experience was acquired as a clerk in a dry goods store at Waxshachie, and, after five years of clerkship, an election to the office of city tax collector gave him considerable public experience during the next four years. At the end of that time he accepted a place as bookkeeper in a department of the state government at Austin, and lived and was thus employed at the state capital for five years.

With this broad experience, Mr. Eason next moved to Blardwell, in Ellis county, and organized the Bardwell State Bank, in which he took the position of cashier. A year later, however, he sold his interests, and in 190s moved to Plano and organized the First Guaranty State Bank of Plano. His first official relations with that bank were as assistant eashier, but after one year he became cashier, and now has the chief management of the bank's affairs. This bank has a capital stock of thirty thousand dollars, has accumulated six thousand dollars' surplus, and has made a splendid showing in deposits and in commercial service to the community.

The political experience of Mr. Eason has always been in harmony with the Democratic party, and fraircrnally he is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias, and belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church Souti. On December 24, 1899, at Waxahachie, Mr. Eason narried Miss Ava Johnston, a daughter of J. C. Johnston. Her father came from Kentucky, was a farmer and stockman in Ellis county from the early days, and is now living, partially retired, at Plano, though looking after his interests as a farmer. Mr. and Mrs. Eason have one son, born Pebruary 28, 1903, and now attending school. During the six years of his residence in Plano.

Eason has come to be regarded as a permanent factor in the business and social life of the community, and his plans for the future contemplate continued residence and activity in what is regarded by many as the garden spot of all Texas.

CAPT. THOMAS D. Corns. During a successful earer as a lawyer in Texas for more than thirty-five years, Captain Cobbs has gained many of the more important distinctions of professional and public life. He is known all over the state as a careful, painstaking, conscientious and profound lawyer, a thorough scholar, a disinterested but aggressive worker for what he believes to be the best welfare of state and country, and a dignified, accomplished gentleman. At one time or another Judge Cobbs has been retained as general or special counsel for many of the large corporations of Texas, and his entire career has been characterized by strict adherence to the best ethics of his profession.

Thomas D. Cobbs was born in Choctaw county, Alabama, a son of Chancellor Thomas and Lucy (Thom) Cobbs. The Cobbs family was founded in America by Joseph Cobbs, who settled at Yorktown, Virginia, in 1613. The paternal grandfather, Thomas Cobbs, was at one time mayor of Raleigh, North Carolina, and married a Miss Boone. The earlier generations of the family furnished soldiers of the American side to the Revolutionary war and the pioneer history of both the Carolinas and of Georgia contain frequent mention of the

The late Chaucellor Thomas Cobbs, who died in 1898, served for more than a quarter of a century with great distinction on the bench in Alabama, and was during the greater part of that time chancellor of the court of chancery, and was regarded as one of the ablest lawyers concluded the court of the Memphis & Charleston Railroad, which changed the status of railroad interests throughout the case of the status of railroad indicates throughout the nation. Chancellor Cobbs was one of the learned amost able jurists in the South, and both in his professional and in his private life was bonored and loved for the great integrity of his character, his fine ideals and his important service in all his relations.

the great integrity of his character, in 8 me iceas and his important service in all his relations.

By his marriage to Lucy Thom, Chancellor Cobbs brought into the family relationship a line of distinguished lineage. The Thom family had its original seat in Virginia, and Lucy Thom's mother was Lacy Hamsborough, who was relatation the Tomas from 1849 1853. Another Hamsborough ancestor was Major Hamsborough, who gained his rank and title as a soldier of the American Revolution. The Thom family was founded in America by Alexander Thom, who was from Seotland and belonged to the clan Cameron in Invernesshire. He died in Westmoreland county, Virginia, in 1788, and had been one of the devoted followers of the Stuart Prince Charlie at Culloden in March, 1746. The Thoms were chartened for their royalist tendencies, and during the American Revolution a number of them remained loyal to the mother country. Mrs. Lucy (Thom) Cobbs continued to live at her home in Birmingham, Alabama, She died in 1911 while on a visit in Culpepper, Virginia,

The late Chancellor Cobbs practiced law at Livingston, in Sumter county, Alabama, for a number of years, and it was there that Thomas D. Cobbs grew up and received most of his early education, and in Lindisfarne Academy, a school conducted by the Episcopal Church at Marion. He studied law in his father's office and was admitted to the bar at Livingston in 1875. He had already gained a somewhat varied experience, at first as civil engineer during the construction of the Alabama & Chattanooga Railroad, and also as circuit court solicitor in Choctaw county, Alabama. On coming to Texas in 1878, Judge Cobbs became a law partner of Major Hannibal Boone, at Navasota, in Grimes county. Major Boone was at that time attorney-general of Texas. From Navasota Judge Cobbs moved to San Antonio in April, 1893. This removal was partly due to his practice as attorney for the land department of several railroads, and it was a matter of greater convenience for him to live in San Antonio in carrying out his His services were required in connection with the lands originally granted by the state to the Texas & New Orleans, the Galveston, Honston & San Antonio, the Galveston, West Texas & Pacific, the Houston & Texas Central, and the Waco & Northwestern Railroad Companies. This naturally gave him practice of large and profitable character, but he also followed a large general practice in all the courts. Judge Cobbs was admitted to practice in the United States Supreme Court in October, 1893.

Judge Cobbs practiced for a time at San Antonio as a member of the firm of Denman, Franklin, Cobbs & McGown. He is now senior member of the firm of Cobbs, Eskridge & Cobbs. His public service has been of a varied and important character. For a number of years he was connected with the State Militia and gained his rank of captain by service in that organization. Governor Lanham appointed him on his staff with the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1902 Captain Cobbs was elected to represent Bexar county in the Twenty-Eighth Legislature, and he was re-elected in 1904 and in 1906. Captain Cobbs went to the legislature as the result of a public opinion in his district that demanded men of the highest ability and character rather than mere politicians. He never made a campaign for election, and during his presence at Austin was regarded as one of the forcible leaders in the assembly, and was a member of the judiciary committee No. I and of several other important committees. Judge Cobbs has never been afraid to take an independent stand on any issue which he believed to be vital to the welfare of his com-munity or state. While in the legislature, although one of, a handful, he opposed what were known as the tax bills to increase taxes on corporations, his opposition being based upon the unconstitutionality of such bills, especially the gross tax bill. His contention has since been sustained by action of the Supreme Court of the United States. Judge Cobbs is a friend of the working classes, and his record in the legislature shows that fact, although nothing in his public or private record could be found to indicate any undue discrimination or prejudice in favor of any class, and it is his belief that laws should be fairly and impartially administered for all. On the basis of his splendid professional accomplishments the appointment of Mr. Cobbs as au associate justice of the Court of Civil Appeals was an honor as much to the state and to the bench as to himself. Judge Cobbs recently resigned his position in the Court of Civil Appeals, and now devotes himself to the many important interests intrusted to the firm of Cobbs, Eskridge & Cobbs, at San Antonio.

Judge Cobbs was married at Navasota to Miss Carrie Quinney. She was born in Texas, and her father was a prominent physician of Grimes county. Her mother was a daughter of General Barnes, a distinguished citizen of Grimes county.

Thomas D. Cobbs, Jr., the only son and child of Judge Cobbs and wife, was born at Navasota, Texas, in 1885, graduated bachelor of science from the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, and subsequently received his degree LL. B. from the law department of the University of Texas at Austin. He is now junior member of the well known law firm of Cobbs, Eskridge & Cobbs, and has already proved his ability both as a court and office lawyer. Mr. Cobbs, Jr., is a member of the Beta Theta Fi college fraternity, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, of the Travis Club and the Casino Association of San Antonio 78 and Atonio 78 an Harr Roberts, Among the prominent business men in Bonham, Texas, who feel that it is their duty to take some of their time from their business affairs to devote to the public welfare of the town is Harry Roberts, one of the principal merchants of the place. He is a native of this state, and practically all of his life has been spent within her borders; so his love for Texas is a very real one. He is as yet a young man, and his success in the business world makes it easy to prophesy his future success, for he is not afraid of hard work and has undoubted ability in the line has achose.

The father of Harry Roberts, Ruffin C. Roberts, was born in October, 1828, in Limestone county, Alabann. The father of Rufin C. Roberts owned one of the harge plantations in Limestone county, and the boy gew my plantations in Limestone county, and the boy gew my in the easy, husrions days preceding the Civil war. His father owned many negroes and was a man of considerable wealth and influence in the community. Life on a plantation in those days did not, however, offer many proportunities for an education, and Rufin C. Roberts could not have been called an educated man; yet be inherited the education that belongs naturally with birth and breeding and was a man of considerable mental powers. His mother was a Miss Cox previous to her marriage, and the family consisted of Matthew, Fountain, Carrie, who married a Mr. Nunn, and Rufin C.

Ruffin C. Roberts entered the mercantile business when he reached manhood, but the outbreak of the Civil war caused him to lay aside his yardstick and enter the Confederate army. He became a member of General Bragg's army, and participated in the Atlanta campaign, near which city he was wounded. After the close of the war he resumed his business in Alabama, but the devastation that the four years had caused determined him on seeking a new field. He consequently came to Texas and located in Bonham, where he established a mercantile business and where he remained for nine years. He then moved to Palo Pinto, Texas, where he was engaged in selling goods and in freighting to and from Weatherford or Gordon and Palo Pinto. In 1887 he returned to Bonham, and there spent the remainder of his life, retiring from active business some years before his death, which occurred in 1908. In religious matters he was a member of the Cumberland Presbyterian church, and in political questions he was a staunch Democrat, though never earing to hold office. He married Miss Jennie Cox, who was born in Osceola, Missouri, the daughter of Judge Cox. The latter came to Texas and located in Bonham, where he died. Mrs. Roberts is still living in Bonham, and is the mother of seven children, all but two of whom and is the mother of seven children and out the are living. Of these, Miss Lelia V. has been for twenty years in charge of the Normal Mission Schools of the Methodist Church South at Saltillo, Mexico. Benjamin died in Bonham without having married. Odeneal is a merchant in Bonham. Mattie is an assistant to her sister in the mission school. Harry is the next in order, and then comes Charles of Ravenna, Texas, and Albert, who passed away unmarried.

Harry Roberts was born in Bouham, Texas, on the 1st of March, 1874, about four years after his father had come to Texas. He was educated in the public schools, and while still a boy went into the business world as a clerk for one of the merchants in Bonham. He spent a number of years in the employ of Harris Brothers, with whom he remained for five years. After leaving the employ of the latter firm, he entered that of J. L. Ware, and remained here for three years. He then was employed by the Bonbam Wholesale Grocery Co., spending a year in the office. He was now familiar with the selling end in the house and with the clerical work of the business, and, thinking that for thorough knowledge he ought to know something of salesmanship on the road, he now took a sample case, and for nine years was a traveling salesman for the firm in Texas territory. He then abandoned the road and engaged in merchandise for himself in Bonham as a member of the firm of Rogers, Woodward and Roberts, being in charge of the dry goods department. On the 1st of January, 1911, the Bonham Wholesale Grocery Company were able to make an announcement that not only pleased them very much, but was very satisfactory to their customers, and that was that Mr. Roberts had been persuaded once more to enter their service, as manager of the house, succeeding J. F. Arledge, who became president of the company. Mr. Roberts is a stockholder and director of the company and has been very successful in the management of the affairs of this important commercial house.

In public life, Mr. Roberts was a member of the city conneil of Bonham, being the representative from the first ward. He was elected in 1911, and his platform, which was prepared by the citizens of the town, has been ably followed out by him during his terms of office. This platform called for a campaign of public improvement, which included some solution of the city water problem, the building of cement walks, and the paving of streets. While he was in office, a bond issue of thirty thousand dollars was voted for water and one hundred thousand dollars was voted for water and one hundred thousand dollars for walks and street improvement. During the two years two deep wells have been brond, and the city is supplied with an abundance of good, pure water. There miles of paving have been completed and seventy-five to one hundred blocks of concrete walks have been laid.

Mr. Roberts has always been very active in church work. He is a member of the Methodist church, and has been a steward of the church for fifteen years. He has been active in Sunday school work for many years and recently attended the annual conference.

Mr. Roberts was married in LaGrange, Georgia, on April 1, 1899, to Miss Annie Reid, a daughter of Sidney A. Reid, who is a lumber dealer in Birningham, Alsman. Her mother was Miss Bettie Morris before be marriage, and Mrs. Roberts is the 'eldest of five children as follows: Mrs. Benjamin Freeman of LaGrange, Georgia; Mrs. W. D. Cooper of Birmingham, Alabama, and Charles and Gus Reid of the same city. Mr. and Mrs. Roberts have four children—Lelia E., Gus Reid, Harry Morris, and Annie.

Carey A. Gray, M. D. Well and favorably known to the medical profession of Fannin county and to the community at large is Dr. Carey A. Gray, a resident of Bonham for the past quarter century and one who has participated largely in the civic affairs of his county and is state politics as well. His life has been one of the utmost usefulness, both professionally and as a citizen, and the county owes to him a high place in its esteem and consideration, in view of his long and honorable career therein.

The Gray family is one that came out of Virginia in days gone by, the first of the name to establish the family outside that state being Hiram Gray, the paternal grandfather of the Doctor and who in his young manhood pioneered to Ohio, later locating in Indiana, in which state he passed his remaining years, his home being long established at Brownburg, in that state. He was born in 1814, and his life was spent in devotion to the farming and stock raising industries, in which he gained a degree of prominence and prosperity that gave him a sure place among the leading citizens of his district. He married Roxana Logan in early life, and their children were seven in number, among whom may be mentioned Harry, Andrew J., William, and Oscar. There were three daugh ters as well, all of whom married men of good social standing in their various communities and contributed their full share to the prosperity and growth of the localities where they established homes.

One of these sons, Andrew J. Gray, became the father of Dr. Carey A. Gray of this review. He was born in Indiana in 1820, and he died in Seneca, Missouri, in Indiana in 1820, and he died in Seneca, Missouri, in 1876, where he had been engaged in business since 1869. He had been en land in the Givil war, serving as a private in the Union army, and prior to the war had been engaged in farming with his father in his native community, in Indiana, the down of Madison having represented his bome. Mr. Gray was a man of more than average education and was recognized as a man of prominence in his community as long as he lived. He married Anna Tewel, a daughter of A. Z. Tewel, who was a native of the state of Ohio. Mrs. Gray, however, was born in Indiana, and she is now a resident of Bentonville, Arkansas, where she went as the wife of a Mr. Turner after the death of her first bushand and where she was widowed for the second time. Four children were born to Andrew Gray and his wife, but of that number only two reached mature years, one of them the subject of this review and the other being Miss Stella Gray, who shares ber mother's bome, in Bentonville.

Dr. Carey A. Gray was born in Madison, Indiana, on September 15, 1864. The family soon after moved to Seneca, Missouri, where the father entered upon a career at blacksmithing and wagon-making, in which he was occupied until his death. It was here that young Gray spent the years of his minority, and his public school training came to him in the Seneca schools. His mother had been a school teacher prior to her marriage, and, following her widowhood, she resumed the duties of her former profession. The son thus bad the benefits of an atmosphere of education that the average youth is denied, and he profited well by the advantage thus accorded him. When he felt himself sufficiently prepared to enter into a business life, he engaged with an old friend of the family to launch out for himself, and that friend was Harmon Dustin, who had long retained a fatherly interest in the young man. The two engaged in the drug business at Southwest City, Missouri, and continued thus for some years. He later became associated in business with a man of the name of Jones, and the two, in prospecting about for a desirable location for the continu-ance of the drug business, settled at Bonham, Texas, in 1888. There they conducted operations under the firm name of C. A. Gray & Company a short time. Dr. Gray however, was strongly inclined to the study of medicine as a result of his close acquaintance with the profession through his activities in the drug business, and in 1892 he took up the study in earnest. He went to Louisville, Kentucky, and there enrolled in the Louisville Medical College, finishing his studies there three years later. He returned to Bonham in 1895 a full-fledged M. D., and here he has since continued in practice. He has further prosecuted his medical studies from time to time as a student in the Post-Graduate School of Chicago and with the well-known Mayo Brothers, at Rochester, Minnesota, in both of these clinics adding very materially to his qualifications as a physician. His professional work in Bonham and throughout Fannin county has been of an order that has placed him among the foremost medical men of north Texas, and he has long been prominent in the medical societies of the state. He has given honored service as president of the Fannin County Medical Society and of the North Texas Medical Society as well and has served as Counsellor of the Fourteenth district. His connection with the S. B. Allen Memorial Hospital of Bonham since its opening has been a highly creditable one, calculated to further his prominence and reputation among medical men of the city.

In his political persuasion, Dr. Gray came up in the atmosphere of Republican politics, and has been interested in the success of Republican policies and candidates since he became a voter. He readily fell in with Texas leaders in the party and won a place among the local and state Republicans as a political organizer. He was at one time a member of the state committee and for years took part in all the state conferences and conventions. He was a delegate to the national convention in 1908 and cast his vote for the nomination of President Taft. In 1912 he was an alternate to the Republican National Convention at Chicago, but illness prevented bim from being present at that time. He has done some campaigning as the Republican candidate of the Fourth Texas District for Congress, and in 1906 was the Republican nominee for Governor of the state. He is now a member of the Executive Committee of the Progressive party for Texas, baving aligned himself with the forward movement of the Republican party in 1912.

The chief civic duties that Dr. Gray has performed in Bonham as an official have been as the incumbent of the post of city health officer. In that office he has wrought faithfully and well, demonstrating the interest of a good citizen in the administration of the duties of his position. In July, 1883, Dr. Gray was married at Southwest City, Missouri, to Miss Sallie Radcliff Smith, a daughter of Dr. B. F. Smith, who moved to that district from Circleville, Ohio. Besides Mrs. Gray, only one of the children of Dr. Smith survive, that one being a banker of Southwest City, Missouri. Mrs. Gray passed away on September, 19, 1899, as the mother of four children, concerning whom brief mention is here made as follows: Mabel, the eldest of the four, is the wife of F. N. Hall of El Paso, Texas; Harry R., also of El Paso, is married to Miss Louise Brownlee and is occupied in civil engineering; Carey A. Jr. is a farmer of Fannin county, and the youngest is Miss Lucile, who makes her home with her father, in Bonham.

The doctor is prominent socially as well as professionally, and has membership in the Masonic Order as a Knight Templar, in the Knights of Pythias, and the Elks. He has no churchly affiliations, but his life has manifested the better qualities of citizenship.

JAMES THOMAS JONES. As county collector of Lamar county. James Thomas Jones is among the youngest of the native sons of his county to achieve so responsible a position in the service of the public. He was born a few miles from Paris on September 22, 1880, where his paternal grandfather, Jefferson Jones, settled in 1851. The family is one that came to Texas from the state of North Carolina, and its pioneer head passed his life as a farmer. During the Civil war he was a mail carrier for the Confederate States of America, that constituting the only public service of an official nature ever rendered by him. Not until the dawn of the twentieth century did the family enter the field of politics, and the first of the name to enter into political activity was Jacob Jones, the father of James Thomas Jones of this review.

Jacob Jones was born at the point of the settlement of his father in Lamar county, on November 2, 1856, and reached mature years without more of education than that afforded by the public schools of his native community. He became a farmer here, and continued in this vicinity until he removed to Hardeman county, in 1904, where he is now engaged in carrying ou his agricultural activities and is one of the commissioners of the county. He is the fourth child of his parents, his mother being Margaret Long, a daughter of one of the pioneers of Lamar county, whose posterity has maintained a family prominence in the business and professional life of Paris. Prominence in the business and professional life of Paris. Junes, are Charles 1.; James, who died just following the battle of Shiloh, as a soldier of the Confederacy; Mary, who matried Douglas Bullington and resides in Lamar county; George, who passed away in Oklahoma, and Robert E., a resident of Paris, Texas, at the present writing.

Jacob Jones married Margaret, a daughter of Pinckney and Nancy (Brown) Mayfield, who located in this district from the state of Tennessee. They became the parents of eight children, named as follows: James Thomas; Laura, the wife of J. W. Peace of Hardeman county, Texas, in which county also reside George W., Joseph, Duncan, Jesse, Luella and Ruby.

James Thomas Jones was a pupil in the rural schools, and also in the public schools of Paris, and he continued in farming until he had passed his majority. He then came to Paris and secured a position as a salesman and bookkeeper in a grocery concern, serving in that capacity until his appointment as deputy in the office of John T Bullington, county collector of the county of Lamar. He later served under John F. Williams in the same office, and succeeded that service by making the run for office on his own responsibility, but suffering defeat at the polls. During the two years that followed he engaged in the grocery business, and was then nominated for the office of county collector on the Democratic ticket. He was nominated against three competitors and drew twothirds of the popular vote at the election, in 1912, and assumed the duties of his office on December 1, 1912, as the successor of Collector Dennis.

On December 22, 1908, Mr. Jones was united in mar-riage with Miss Lenna Knowles, a daughter of Henry Knowles, a contractor of Blossom, Texas, where the marriage ceremony was solemnized. She was one of the four children of her parents, the others being Brenna, Floyd, and Fletcher. Mr. and Mrs. Jones have one daughter, Janice, now three years old.

The Jones family holds to the faith of the Missionary Baptist church, and the Knowles people to the Methodist church, but the family of James Thomas Jones maintain no church relations.

GEORGE F. BRANNON. The arduous tasks that formerly confronted every housekeeper are being revolutionized in large degree by modern methods which have arisen from a demand for science in the homely labors of life as well as in the fields of industry and trade. Answering this call, the modern laundry has become recognized as one of the most helpful of institutions, and, conducted along sanitary lines, gives relief from the hard household labor and produces results more generally satisfying than those possible to attain in the ordinary home. Prominent among the Texas industries of this nature is found the McKinney Steam Laundry Company of McKinney, a venture that entered upon its business life under modest circumstances, but which, under the directorship of an able management, has grown and developed until it is accounted one of the thriving industries of a thriving city. The proprietor of this business, George F. Branuon, a man of enterprise, progress, and practical views, is emi-nently worthy of the title of self-made man. When he started upon his career he had but little capital, and less experience, but, what was better than either, he had a stern and unflagging determination to succeed, and his present firmly-established position among the business men of his community is sufficient evidence of the gratification of his ambition.

Mr. Brannon is of Irish and Holland descent, and was born in May, 1878, at Heflin, Cleburne county, Alabama, a son of J. F. and Mary E. (Vaughan) Brannon, the former a native of Georgia and the latter of Alabama. His father, formerly a farmer and cotton grower of Alabama, came to Texas in 1892 and located at Sherman, where he continued in agricultural pursuits and stock raising up to the time of his death, in September, 1908. Mrs. Brannon still survives her busband. Of the eight sons and five daughters of J. F. and Mary E. Brannon, nine are now living. George F. was the fifth in order of birth.

George F. Brannon commenced to attend public school in his native state, but the latter part of his education was secured in Texas, his training finding its completion in a course in the Metropolitan Business College of Dallas. His first venture of a business nature was in writing insurance, a line in which he continued for two years with a fair measure of success. For some time he had been possessed of the idea of establishing himself in the steam laundry business, and in 1899, in partnership with his brother, C. M. Brannon, founded the McKinney Steam Laundry Company, becoming its first manager, a position which he has continued to hold to the present time. His brother is now president of the Ideal Laundry Company, at Dallas, Texas, in which George F. also is a stockholder; and, in addition, with Mr. W. I. Dungan, they own the laundry at Ennis, Texas, which is under the able management of W. I. Dungan.

When the McKinney Steam Laundry Company was first founded, it commenced operations upon a small scale, in a poorly-equipped building, and with a small though promising trade. In several years it was found necessary to enlarge the quarters and to improve the equipment, and, as the years have passed, the plant has constantly been made larger and the latest machinery has been installed. At this time this is one of the few plants operating its own Corliss engine, in addition to having its own deep well for its water supply. Twentyfive people are employed in its work, the trade of Mc-Kinney is controlled, and about sixty per cent of the business comes from outside the city. In addition to the regular laundry department, special work is done in the way of dry cleaning, dyeing, and hat work. Mr. Bran-non has been prudent and conservative, and, while enterprising in projecting his plans, he has never speculated, although he has ever been quick to see an opportunity and courageous to grasp it and carry it through to a successful conclusion. A man of genial, courteous personality, his popularity has done much to add to the volume of his business, while his straightforward and honorable methods have contributed toward giving him a high standing in business circles of his adopted city. In polities a Democrat, he has not found time to enter actively into political life, but takes a keen interest in those things that affect the welfare of McKinney. He has a firm belief in the future of this part of the state, and it is but natural that he should feel grateful to the locality in which he has attained such a decided success. Fraternally, he is a Mason, in which he has attained to the Royal Arch degree, and also holds membership in the Independent Order of Old Fellows and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. He is a consistent member of the Baptist church, to which his wife also belongs.

Mr. Brunnon was married November 2, 1901, at Mc. Kinney, to Miss Florence Johnson, a daughter of John Joneson, a function of the Mr. John Joneson, and estate overer and renter of this city. Two to Mr. and Mrs. Brannon: Annette, aged eleven years, who is attending the graded schools, and the baby, Charley May, aged six years, who is just beginning her school experience. The family is widely and favorably known in Northern Texas, and, in addition to Mr. Brannon's family and that of his father, he has four nephenshere, who came from Alabama and Georgia, and three aunts on his mother's side—Mrs. Dungan, Mrs. Reid, and Mrs. McDowell.

Reuben S. Morrison, county attorney of Archer county and a practicing attorney of Archer City since 1908, is one of the best known men in the legal fraternity in these parts, and one who enjoys a generous measure of success in his chosen profession. He has been prominent in public service for several years, always in the line of his profession, and gained a name for himself in that department of activity as well as in private practice.

Born in Selms, Alabama, on June 30, 1885, Reuben S. Morrison is the son of J. G. and Mary (Carson) Morrison, narea of the control and and Alabama, respectively and the solution of the war. He was in later years identified with mechanical pursuits, having a decided gift for mechanical pursuits, when the pursuits of a large family of fourteen children, and Reufen S., of this review, was the ninth in order of birth. Following his high school days, Mr. Morrison read law under H. C. Conn at Hazelburst, Mississippi, and in 1883 he was on mitted to practice, leginning di there in practice for six years, when he went to Vernon, Texas, and was there busy with the practice of law until 1897. In that year he removed to Warren, in Greer county, Oklahoma, where he removed to Warren, in Greer county, Oklahoma, where he remined until 1908, when he came to Archer City, and here he has been in constant practice since that time. He received his appointment to his present office while still in Oklahoma. This is very unusual, but nevertheless true. Owing to his prominence as an attorney he was induced to accept his position in Texa while a resident of Oklahoma, and he has served constantly since that time, being twice re-elected since he began his service as county attorney of Archer county. While a resident of Wilbarger county, in 1888, he was assistant county attorney for two terms, and in that and in his present office he has given an excellent account of himself in his official capacity.

A Democrat, Mr. Morrison has given splendid service to the party wherever he has been. He is a member of the Baptist Church and of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Homesteaders' Association.

On February 28, 1833, at Jackson, Mississippi, Mr. Morrison was married to Miss Cora Antoinette Wheeler, Morrison was married to Miss Cora Antoinette Wheeler, of Hazelmyrt, Mississippi, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Wheeler, a well known family of planters of that state. Twelve children have come to them: Sylvester Weldon, superintendent of the Tipton High School at Tipton, Oklahoma, married, and the father of three children; Mrs. Reuby Anderson, living in Tulsa, Oklahoma, the work of the Central Business College at Sedalia, Missouri; John G., born in Vernon, Texas, now attending school same place as his brother, T. E.; Ethel, also horn in Vernon, a student in this city; Emma Joto, born in Warren, Oklahoma, and are now attending school in their home town; Mary Belle is deceased, and Bessie, who was born at Hazelhurst, Mississippi, is also deceased, her death occurring at Harrold, Texas.

This goodly family has taken its place in the leading social and other worthy netivities of Archer City since it became identified with the community some years ago, and enjoys the esteem and friendship of an ever widening circle hereabouts. Mr. Morrison is regarded as one of the ablest attorneys in the state, and enjoys the regard of a number of the most influential men in the state, prominent among whom is Senator Joseph Bailey, with whom Mr. Morrison has been intimately associated since bowhood and for whom he entertains the warmest regard.

JACOB HANNE HARISON. In the long and varied career of Jacob Hayne Harrison there is found much material of an interesting nature. School teacher during the seventies, public official through a period in which the Southwest was experiencing an era of untest, editor and publisher as a pioneer in journalistic wife, in several sections of the state and finally identified with some of the leading loan, abstract and monaged companies of Texas, his life in the Lone state where here has musually active one declared the companies of the state and finally identified here. It is a several section of the state and monaged companies of Texas, his life in the Lone state with the has been seen that the section of the superficial quality.

Jacob Hayne Harrison was born in Rockingham county, Virginia, April 26, 1851, and is a son of Daniel and Huldah B. (Hayne) Harrison, members of prominel Virginia families. His maternal grandmother was a Duke, of Hanover county, Virginia, and his grandfather was a relative of "Tippecanoe" Harrison, the President. In 1857 Mr. Harrison's father and family left Virginia and moved to Tennessee, locating first in Jefferson county and later in Greene county. This was heart of the Tennessee country that furnished so many volunteers to the Union cause in the Civil war and Mr. Harrison's older brothers enlisted in the ranks of the blue. He himself can remember as a boy some of the moted characters of that day who were frieads of the family and frequent visitors at his father's home, in cluding "Andy" Johnson, "Parson's Brownlow and other members of the Brownlow family. In the fall of 1868 the family moved to Carroll county, Missouri, and Mr. Harrison's father died there. In 1874 Mr. Harrison came to Texas alone, and, locating in Hill county, secured employment as a teacher in the early schools. He recalls that during that period he played the "fiddle" for the weekly Friday night dances of the neighborhood, at which congenial occupation he earned more money than he did at teaching school. In 1878 Mr. Harrison was elected justice of the peace for that precinct of Hill county of which what is now known as Hubbard City was the center, an office which he held for six years, and during two years of that time was also county commissioner, in addition to which he had charge of the postoffice at Hubbard City. For about one year he was editor and publisher and issued the initial number of the Hubbard City News, which was the successor of the Herald. In the fall of 1883 Mr. Harrison removed to Hillsboro, the county seat, and there founded the Hillsboro News, of which he was editor and publisher until the office was destroyed by fire, and at that time he retired from the field of journalism. Later he was appointed city tax assessor and collector of Hillsboro, a position which he held for about one year, and at † same time began abstract work at Hillsboro for the firm of Tarlton, Jordan & Tarlton. In connection with his abstract work he began loaning money for the Texas Loan Agency of Corsicana, but in the spring of 1886 removed to Gatesville and purchased and controlled the entire abstract business of the county. Eighteen months of hard and unremitting labor destroyed his health, and, being compelled to give up inside work altogether, he went on the road as traveling inspector of loans for the Texas Loan Agency and moved to Corsicana with his family in the fall of 1889. Since that time he has been engaged in the capacity of inspector, or securities man, for the Texas Loan Agency, Francis Smith & Company of San Antonio, and the British & American Mortgage Company of Dallas, the latter having been his position since 1899, since about which time he has made his home

Mr. Harrison, as said before, is best known as a poet, his verse having attracted wide attention and won the commendation of some of the best critics in the country. One of the most beautiful things that have come from his pen, "The Yellowhouse Canyon," appears in the work, Library of Southern Literature, but his beautiful thoughts have usually been given to the public through the medium of the newspapers and magazines, and have reached their widest and most appreciative circle of readers through the columns of the Dallas News and the Texas Farm and Ranch. Mr. Harrison took up verse writing at first merely to occupy his thoughts and time while waiting for trains during the early days of his travels, but took courage from the fact that the publishers recognized merit in his work, and from that time his poetry has steadily grown in power, in finish and in interest. Most of his verse breathes the spirit of the free outdoors, of hunting and fishing and life on the great prairie stretches of the west, over all of which he has traveled in connection with his business. Other poems, however, are purely of a domestic nature. The poems published in connection with this review show, perhaps, as well as any of his others, the high character of his work.

Mr. Harrison has been twice married, the first time September 28, 1878, to Miss Theodosia C. Powell, of Limestone county, Texas. She died in March, 1905, the union having been blessed by the birth of three children: Claude N. Harrison, Judge Harrison and Miss Dixie W. Harrison. On August 21, 1910, Mr. Harrison was married to his present wife, who before her marriage was Miss Lillian Kendrick Byrn. She was brought to Texas in early childhood by her paernts, who settled in San Antonio, in the schools of which city she received Vol.12—8 the major part of her education. Here, amid the picturesque semi-tropical beauty of the sleepy old cry, she grew into an intimate sympathy with all that pertains to real history, real achievement of noble ends; and with the growth of the present hustling metropolis came the expanding of her own perceptions which litted her for the literary work that she was later to undertake.

During her high school years her poems and stories began to attract attention and she was the winner of several literary competitions. After the death of her father, Lucas Haynes Byrn, descendant of an Irish settler of the first Virginia colony, she taught for several years and continuing her studies also, obtained literary degrees from the State Normal Institute, Museo Nacional de Mexico and University of Chicago, at which latter institution she specialized in anthropology under the noted explorer, Frederick Starr. Making teaching the means of travel, Miss Byrn covered the greater part of Mexico, studying its history, ancient and modern, its customs, literature and resources, and writing a great many magazine articles and brochures on these subjects.

Opportunity for editorial work came in Boston, where she was associated in the editorship of Home and Abroad, a magazine devoted to travel and study. Following this she went to Nashville, Tennessee, where, as literary editor of the Bob Taylor's Magazine, and after the consolidation, of the Taylor-Trotwood Magazine, she became a potent factor in the upbuilding of a broad journal of two years spent in travel in Fern, Chile, Bolivia, 4x gentina and Brazil gave her wide opportunities for acquaintance with the social life of our neighboring continent, and in the extensive ruins found all over South America, she accumulated a vast amount of literary and scientific material.

Her marriage, in August, 1910, to Jacob Hayne Harrison, of Harrisonburg, Virginia, then as now a resident of Dallas, brought her again to a residence in the Lone Star state where in their Dallas home they dispense a hospitality typical of their Virginia forbears.

As an officer of the Dallas Fen Women, a member of the National Pen Women's League, The National Geographical Society and the Royal Anthropological Institute (London), Mrs. Harrison, although devoting herself to the career of home-making, continues her interest and to some extent her activities in literary work.

Mrs. Harrison is a daughter of Mrs. Jennie Kendrick Collins, of San Antonio, who after the death of Lucas Haynes Byrn, married James E. Collins.

A CRY FOR THE OPEN RANGE

I long for a whiff of the desert air,
For the scent of the desert sund.
For the spreading reach of the billow hills
In that sea of the rolling land;
For the fiery glint of the western sun
And the feel of the pulsing heat—
The crunch of the carpet of glinting grit
I would sense with my weary feet.

I long for the fan of the desert breeze When stars are alight in the skies, The shadows that fall on the eastern hills As a rest for men's weary eves; For the dew that sprinkles the sleeping face When the curtain of night is drawn, And the glory that glows in the smiling east When the day brings back the dawn.

You may have the city with all its pomp, Have its wealth and its mansions fine, Its tables that groan with the richest food, And its goblets of sparkling wine; But give me the measureless solitude
Of the sand, and the desert air,
With the trackless plain and the cheerless scene,
And the feeling that God is there.

THE DESERT CAMP

The wagon, gray with grime and dust, stands with its front toward the south, A sun-burnt plainsman, lithe and tall, Sits smoking in its cavern mouth; A pile of saddles, ropes and guns Lie to the right upon the ground, And blankets damp from recent use, Left there to dry, are spread around.

A fire of "chips" and grease wood brush
Is burning on an open place,
And over this a "Greaser" bends
With active hands and leathern face;
Intent upon the meal be cooks,
For it is nearing supper time,
And coffee, beans and broiling meat,
Send far abroad aroma prime.

There on the mesa to the left The horses crop the stunted grass, Nip tender shoots of dwarf mesquite, And sniff the "loeo" 'as they pass; While on that rocky point beyond, A lonely "lobo" keeps his ward, And watches all the movements here With baleful eye and keen regard.

The sun, a blood-red, blazing orb, Winks at the world from out the west, While Nature seems to stretch and yawn, As half inclined to go to rest; Dry winds alive with nerid dust Go sighing by as if in pain, While ghosts of ages dead and gone Cast phantom shadows on the plain.

A dozen deep and angry yelps, Succeeded by a hungry how! Tell where not far toward the east A pack of snarling "tobos" prowl; They seent the broiling hacon fumes, Gaunt, gnawing hunger does the rest, And they may even charge the camp Before they cease their sniffing quest,

The plainsman leaves the wagon seat,
The horses worst, then ture and run,
The 'Greaser' puts aside his pots,
And with a grin picks up his gun.
'Los lohos maios,' he exclaims,
'Los lohos whis gleaming teeth the while—
Ye gods; this satyr of the plains
Could freeze a sunbeam with his smile!

The horses wheel and gallop back, Then stop and snort and wheel again, Describe a circle, pause and neigh, Then fly in fright across the plain; And in their wake the "lohos" trail, Forgetful of the bacon scent, And they will follow, true and swift, Until the horses' strength is spent.

But no, they wheel and here they come,
They make a ''bee line'' for the camp,
And even now, mid howl and yelp,
We hear the thunder of their tramp.

On, on they come—and see the wolves;
Ah, but that pace is one to kill,
And can they hold it, will they last?
Yes, God be praised, they will, they will!

Ah, hear that spitting "Marlin" speak, And see that "lobo" 'grawt the ground, Again, again, that keen report, And it is dealing death around! While gleaming teeth are flashing white From satyr lips devoid of mirth, And eyes are scintillating light That only hate can give its birth.

"Los lobos son diablos, si!"
The "Gresser" cries with fiery breath,
"Muerto-what you G-r-r-ingoes say?
Ah si, yo know, you call beem death!
He keel muchacho mio, si!
Ah, now yo pay heem-si, yo weel!
It is hees sangre yo would dreenk,
Ah, eet see heaven heem to keel!"

And panting, pounding, here they come, The yelping "ilobos" give them wings; Those milk white teeth are flashing yet, And listen how that "Marlin" sings! Five wolves are down, yet four come on, The "Marlin's" magazine is spent, And still the horses are not safe— Those "ilobos" are on blood intent.

The range is long for pistols yet, But see, they slip from holsters now, Drop out in front of stretching arms And send abroad a growling "pow!" Another wolf has gone to earth, And see, another limps away— The sun has set, the dusk is here, The horses, too, have won the day.

They stand beside the wagon now,
Their heaving sides a mass of foam,
The fear they felt they feel no more,
The wolves are gone—and this is home!
The camp is quiet once again,
The "Gresser" raps a tinkling plate,
The plainsman stretches, yawns and says:
"Well, supper is a little late,"

The moon is rising in the east,
The dust is laid, the winds are still,
And softly through the golden night,
The flutings of the whip-poor will Come floating sweet across the plain,
As earnest from a peaceful land,
That He who set the stars in place Holds even deserts in His hand,

MEXICO *

An ancient land that teems with yellow gold,

Whose fanes were weather-worn when Greece was young,

In mystic script its history was told, Before blind Homer's Iliad was sung. Yea, long before the pyramids were built, Or silent Sphynx began her stolid gaze,

This soil of mystery was richly gilt, With stars that glint through dark tradition's haze.

*Written especially for the History of Texas and Texans, 1914.

Its ancient ruins show the sculptor's art, Its shadow dials tell its early lore, Its mystic cypher holds within its heart, A secret that no modern can explore. Its temples show religion's angust sway, Before the walls of Karnak were begun, And there is patent evidence, today, That they were dedicated to the sun.

Grim, human sacrifice they all declare, With recking blood their ceremonics tem, And ritual that lends a tragic air, Which haunts you like a horrifying dream. About it all the pall of age is spread, Conjecture sits immobile on her throne, You feel the presence of a mystic dread, And all the terrors of a fear nuknown.

Within the forest solitudes they lie,
These rulus of an ancient virile race,
Ten thousand years of humus slumbers by,
To prove the desolation of the place.
And over all the forest sentrics stand,
Deep rooted in the debris that abounds,

Deep rooted in the debris that abounds, Yet even in their death, we find them grand, The temples that bestrew these ancient grounds.

Adown the ages then we follow on, Until the Montezumas come to reign, And in the crumbling ruins find, anon, The evidence of internecine pain; The history of civil war and strife, Deep graven by the giant hand of Time, Grim, bloody fiends who sap a Nation's life, And leave it writhing in a sea of crime.

There despotism shows its iron hand,
The common herd were driven with a goad,
That only those can fully understand,
Who feel and hear its agonizing load.
For liberty and right were put aside,
To serve the purpose of the ruling few,
And slavery, the worst that can betide,
For centuries, the common people knew.

Then came the Spanish dons, with cruel might, Cortes the brune, by papal mandate blest, A. Christian (2) becourge probab mandate blest, A. Christian (2) becourge probab mandate blest, And made of gold and lead his primary quest, With fendish hand he robbed and burnt and slew, His tyrant heart regarded self alone, While Plunder was the only law he knew, And music was, to him, a captive's groan.

The seum of Spain found ready refuge there, Till ''Sawage Mexico'' would hold no more, At least until the jailers made it clear, That they had giren up their vicious store. It came, this seum, instructed by its king To kill the native men, and take their wives, And priests were sent to make the chancel ring, With masses meant to cleams these culprit lives.

The native blood thus tainted with the crime, And all the rotten vice that prisons knew, Brought forth syen in the rotten vice that prisons knew, It made the soul of Heaven six to receive. It made the soul of Heaven six to receive the motion purifies the putrid stream, And time will cleanse the taint in human blood, Therefore, in course of years, there came a gleam, To even these, of peaceful brotherhood.

The patriot Hidalgo led the van,
That routed Spanish vice and tyranny,
While Juarez perfected Hidalgo's plan,
And won, at last, a taste of liberty.

The galling yoke was lifted from the neck,
That centuries had borne its cruel weight—
How, hardly, can a ruling Nation reck,
The venom of a conquered people's hate!

The Spaniard was a tyrant, not a fool, whose prime consideration was to win, He never let his selfish ardor cool, And never counted robbery a sin. The native was a savage Nature child, Revengeful, superstituous, fierce and brave, A creature, while not altogether wild, That Heaven never meant to be a slave.

Amalgamation then was simply crime, Upon the page of history a blot, A mixture that produces human grime, With cruelty and helish passion hot. Theoretore, a thousand years, at least, must pass, Before the cleansing hand of Time is shown, And blood must spill a thousand times, alas, Before the sweets of liberty are known.

For education has not paved the way, To democratic government, as yet, Dictatorship still holds its rigid sway, Though Liberty must view it with regret; And Revolution, time and time again, Must light the seene with War's consuming brand, And wrench the Nation's heart with martial pain, While hungry Rapine devastates the land.

But when the tainted blood is purified,
And all the sin of Spanish crime is spent,
When savage that by this is modified,
Caucasian grace and native vigor bleat;
And all the force that mental strength can bring,
Together with the culture it will gain,
Then Mexico her banners wide will fling,
And prove a queen of Nations on the Main.

Her mines will pour their precious metals forth,
The marts of trade will glorify her name,
Financial centers testify her worth,
And all the world will sing her glowing fame.
Her riches are intrinsic, and secure,
Her minerals and fertile valleys rare,
A wealth that through the ages must endure,
And only needs the patient hand of Care.

With proper tillage, she could feed the earth, Her precious gens Golconda could not buy, Of ruby wines she need not suffer dearth, And man knows not a sorter, bluer sky, Her forests teem with all the richer woods, Her splendid rivers find the placid sea, And they would serve as highways for her goods, If only all her energies were free.

But prostrate, bound, she lies before us now, While evil war is sucking at her blood, The mark of Cain shows plain upon her brow, Self-murder sags the strength of brotherhood. An internetine death her vitals grips, And Mexico must tremble in the toils, Till Justice with her stern, impartial lips, Shames Fate until she drops ill-gotten spoils.

OLMET DAVIS. As a thiving and growing city of the Southwest and an important country. Plano has taken a leading part in the business history of Northern Texas and has attracted to it some of the active minds, not only in the various professions, but those capable of controlling financial and business interests. This feature alone is one that has contributed to this municipality's prosperity—the fact that its interests demand action and ability—for where men possessing these attributes congregate, success is sure to follow and a further enlargement of business fields and operating opportunities. No man ever rose above his fellowan unless he possessed something more than they—advantages of money, mind, or native ability, and more frequently than not the first plays but a small part, compared with the latter. An illustration of this truth may be found in the career of Olney Davis, president of the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Plano, a man who has risen because he has made the most of his opportunities and who is today the directing head of one of the institutions which is contributing materially to Plano's importance and prosperity. Mr. Davis is a native son of Texas, having been born in Ellis county, February 17, 1857. His parents, R. A. and M. P. (Sweat) Davis, were natives of Tennessee, who came to Texas in 1852 and located first in Collin county, subsequently moving to a property in Ellis county. There R. A. Davis carried on his operations with slave labor until the outbreak of the Civil War, during which he enlisted in the Confederate army and served the last two years of the war, being still in the Gray when General Lee's surrender at Appomattox marked the fall of the "Lost Cause." He then returned to the peaceful pursuits of civil life, and continued to carry on his operations in Ellis county until his retirement from active pursuits, several years prior to his death, which occurred at Waxahachie, Texas, in April, 1903. He was a more or less prominent man of his community, serving as county surveyor for several years, and was prosperous in his business operations because of his industry and good management, combined with strict integrity. Davis died in 1898, having been the mother of six children, of whom four are now living, Olney being the next to the youngest.

The early education of Olney Davis was secured in the public schools of Ellis county, and during this preliminary training he spent much of his time in assisting his father in the work of the homestead place. Later he was a student in the industrial school of the University of Illinois, at Champaign, Illinois, and upon his return home he had his first business experience as a farmer and stock raiser in Collin county. His ventures in this field proved eminently satisfactory and prosperous, but in 1887 he turned his attention to the field of finance, when he assisted in organizing the Plano National Bank, of which he was made vice president. About 1895 he disposed of his interests in that institution, and in 1900 he directed the organization of the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Plano, of which he became the first president, a position which he has continued to hold to the present time. Mr. Davis possesses excellent organizing and executive ability. Public confidence is with him; he has popularized the coffers of the institution by his wise and conservative direction of its policies, and each year has seen the bank grow in scope and power. He has met each emergency capably, and his associates have learned to depend upon his judgment and foresight. Mr. Davis has always been a Democrat and has at all times given the candidates and policies of his party the benefit of his influence. In 1891 he was chosen by his fellow citizens as chief executive of the city, and occupied the mayoralty chair until 1896, and during the five years of his sane and businesslike administration the city grew and developed in size and prosperity. At the present time he is serving his second term as alderman, and is also acting in the capacity of city treasurer. Fraternally, Mr. Davis is connected with the local lodges of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. While his private interests are many, demanding the greater part of his time and attention, Mr. Davis has ever heen ready to give of himself in the forwarding of movements looking toward the advancement of education and good citizenship.

On April 20, 1881, Mr. Davis was united in marriage with Miss Efie Mathews of Collin county, a daughter of B. F. Mathews, who was one of the early settlers of Collin county, a prominent farmer, and died in 1878. Nine children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Davis, six of whom are now living, as follows: R. A., who is cashier of the Farmers and Merchants National Bank of Plano and one of the energetic and progressive young business men of the city; Mrs. Edna M. Houston, wife of H. H. Houston of Teague, Texas, vice president of the First State Bank of that place and a grandson of Gen. Sam Houston; diss Mand, a graduate in music of St. Mary's School, Dallas; Miss Mard, a graduate in mase of St. Mary's School, Dallas; Miss Vera, also a graduate, in a special course, at St. Mary's school; Miss Pauline, a member of the class of 1914 in the Plano High school and was the honor student of 26, which constituted the class, and Miss Helen, who is attending the graded schools of this city.

JOIN L. LOVEJOY. From humble clerkships have risen some of the leading men in the financial and business world of Texas. In fact, the majority of the financiers who have left their impress upon this section have had their training in the counting-room or behind the country and in this class stands Join L. Lovejoy, president of the First National Bank of McKinney. He has been a resident of Colin county for sixty-four years, and has been an eye witness to the wonderful development which has brought this section from a wide, open range to a center of industrial and commercial activity and through his cown operations has contributed in no small way to this growth and progress. Mr. Lovejoy was born August 22, 184s. at Parts, Lamar country, Texas, and is a son of

George W. and Polly (Highfield) Lovejoy.

The Lovejoy family is of Scotch-Irish extraction and was founded in Texas by the grandfather of Mr. Lovejoy, the Rev. John L. Lovejoy, who was a prominent Methodist divine of this state and chaplain of the state legislature during the administration of Governor Throckmorton. An uncle, James H. Lovejoy, living now at Houston, was a resident of Collin county for a number of years and was the first deputy sheriff under the first sheriff of the county, subsequently becoming himself the second sheriff. At present he is living a retired life. George W. Lovejoy was born in Georgia, and was a youth when he accompanied his parents to Texas, in 1836, the family settling at Pin Hook. In 1849, after his marriage, he moved to Collin county and purchased land, on which he continued to be engaged in successful farming and stock raising, the old homestead being located two miles west of McKinney. There he passed away in 1859. By her first marriage she had four children, and by her second union two children. Mrs. Lovejoy, who survives the father, is living at Gatesville, Coryell county, and, in spite of her ninety-three years, is still alert in body and active in mind and is capable of doing her own house-

John L. Lovejoy received but meager educational advantages in his youth, his training being limited to about three months of each winter in the primitive log-cabin district school. He was ambitious and industrious, however, and his receptive mind and retentive memory permitted him to become better schooled than many of his fellows. Since that time, wide reading, much travel, and keen observation of men and affairs have given him a broad fund of knowledge on a number of subjects, and one cannot be with him long without realizing that he is a very well-educated man. Mr. Lovejov's first business experience was as a clerk in a drug store at McKinney, following which he accepted a position as a traveling salesman for Mever Brothers, wholesale druggists of St. Louis. His career as a banker began when he opened a national bank at Greenville, Hunt county, of which he continued as president until September, 1907, since which time he has acted in the capacity of vice president. During this time he had been a stockholder and director in the First National Bank of McKinney, at McKinney, and in September, 1907, was chosen president of that institution, recognized as one of the strongest in this part of the state. His able direction of its policies has popularized its coffers, and its standing in banking circles and in the confidence of the public is equally high. Mr. Lovejoy is the owner of his father's old home and farm west of McKinney, where there are 1241 acres of land, rented to nine families. A Democrat of the Jeffersonian persuasion, Mr. Lovejoy has always heen an active and ardent supporter of his party's policies and candidates. In Masonry he has achieved a high place, having attained to the Scottish Rite degree, and he is at this time treasurer of the Commandery at McKinney. He holds membership also in the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and is a charter member of the local lodge of the Knights of Pythias. A lifelong member of the Southern Presbyterian church, he has acted in the capacity of deacon thereof for a number of years.

In 1882 Mr. Lovejoy was married at McKinney to Miss Carrie Emerson, a daughter of Francis Emerson, who came to America as a boy from Ireland and located in Texas about 1855 as an early settler. In 1869 he organized the present First National Bank of McKinney, and continued as its president up to the time of his death, in 1901. Mr. and Mrs. Lovejoy are the parents of one daughter, Margie, who is the wife of Dr. C. G. Comegys, a practicing physician of Gainesville, Texas.

Mr. Lovejoy is very fond of travel, and generally spends his vacations in visiting prominent Masonic and Shrine gatherings in all parts of the United States and in taking occasional trips with his family to Europe, having spent six months there during the Paris Exposition. However, he finds his greatest pleasure at his home, and is now the owner of a beautiful residence at No. 401 North Kentucky street, McKinney.

Wilford E. Rucker, M. D. Since 1900 Dr. Rucker has been one of the leading members of the medical profession in Collin county. Dr. Rucker graduated in medicine more than twenty years ago, has kept himself in close touch with the advance in knowledge by private reading and by post-graduate work, and has well deserved his success.

Born at Cleveland, Tennessee, May 10, 1863, Wilford E. Rucker is of Scotch-Irish ancestry and a son of William R. and Mahala (Underwood) Rucker. Both his father and mother were natives of Tennessee. His father during his active career was a farmer and merchant; volunteered for service in the Union army from east Tennessee, and participated in some of the important battles and campaigns in that part of the country. Among the engagements in his experience as a soldier were the battles of Chickamauga, Missionary Ridge, and many others, and in one fight he was wounded. He is now living, at the good old age of seventy-four, at his home, in Cleveland, and for several years has been commander of the Grand Army post at that place. wife, the mother of Dr. Rucker, died about 1869. were the parents of four children, two sons and two daughters, Dr. Rucker being the oldest. Dr. Rucker's brother, W. H. Rucker, is postmaster at Nevada, in Col-lin county, and his sister is the wife of B. C. McDowell, deceased, and lives in Oak Cliff, at Dallas. He also has a half-brother, J. B. Rucker, in the real estate business at Dallas, and a half-sister, Eula Rucker, a teacher in the public schools of Dallas.

Dr. Rucker acquired his early education in the public schools of Tennessee, from the Flint Springs Academy. and in 1892 was graduated in medicine from the medical department of the Vanderbilt University, at Nashville. His practice was begun at Altoga, in Collin county, and from 1896 to 1900 he practiced in Dallas county. Since 1900 his home and the center of his professional activi-ties have been at McKinney. For several years he was associated with Dr. T. W. Wiley in the management of the local sanitarium. Since his graduation from the Vanderbilt University, Dr. Rucker has taken three postgraduate courses in the New Orleans Polyclinic.

In political views, he is liberal, and usually votes for the man rather than the party. His fraternal affiliations are with the Masonic Order, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. In 1892, at Altoga, was celebrated his marriage with Mrs. Sims (nee Miss Fanny J. McMurray). Her father, Professor McMurray, was for a number of years an active educator in the state of Georgia, and taught for several years after moving to Texas. Her mother was a member of the prominent Holt family of Georgia. Dr. Rucker and wife have one son, now nineteen years old, who was educated in the Bingham Military School, in North Carolina, and is now employed in the hardware business in McKinney. Dr. Rucker has his office at 105 W. Virginia street, and his home is at the corner of College and LaMar streets.

JAMES HENRY HAMNER. Among the well known newspaper men in western Texas there is perhaps none better qualified and with a more diversified experience than James Henry Hamner, editor and proprietor of the Claude News. He was horn in Shelby county, Tennessee, February 28, 1839, a son of Hezekiah Ford and Caledonia Musadora (Scales) Hamner. The father, a native of Virginia, in 1835 moved to Tennessee, where he was one of the early settlers in Shelhy county and where he maintained his residence until his death, in 1845, at the age of forty-two. By occupation he was a planter; by inclination a student and a man of great literary attain-ments. The mother was born in North Carolina, from which state her parents moved into Tennessee in 1834. The paternal grandparents were of Scotch and Welch stock, coming to Virginia at an early day, many members being prominent in the early history of that state. On the maternal side the ancestry is Scotch and the family was of ancient and noble lineage. The mother died in Mississippi in 1865, at the age of fifty-four, leaving four children, of whom the Texas editor was the second.

Mr. Hamner was reared in Tennessee, where he attended the local schools. He took up the trade of printer as his first regular occupation, and for many years he was connected with the newspaper and printing business in Memphis. During his whole life Mr. Hamner was an ardent Southerner. When the war broke out his young heart beat responsive to the call of the drum and he gladly enlisted with General Bedford Forrest when the latter organized his battalion. From then on to the end of the war, from battlefield to battlefield, on long, hard marches and hot campaigns, he followed his leader, serving as high private with faithfulness and marked courage. At the hattle of Fort Donelson he was wounded in the left leg, the smaller bone being shattered by the bullet, which killed the horse that had carried him into action. Then followed a harder fight with death in a hospital in Clarksville, Tennessee, a thrilling escape, a danger-fraught ride on horseback to Corinth, Mississippi, when a furlough enabled him to go home to his mother in West Point, Mississippi, where his stay was prolonged until he could abandon his crutches. After his return to the army his battalion was merged into the Tenth Tennessee Regiment and figured at Resaca, at Missionary Ridge and Chicka-mauga, at Franklin, at Nashville, interspersed by many lesser engagements. His surrender was made at Gainesville, Alabama, May 10, 1865.

Mr. Hamner took up life again with nothing but hand and head and heart as assets, handicapped by a wound that proved a life-long menace and annoyance. In 1892 Mr. Hamner and family moved to Claude, Texas, where he established the Claude News. For three and a half years he edited this weekly, only abandoning it when he moved to McLennan county. Here he again entered the newspaper field. At the end of six years he sold his establishment and returned to Claude, seeking health for his invalid wife. He resumed the original paper, the News, on July 8, 1902, since which time his mane has appeared in the editorial column as editor and proprietor. He has kept the News up to the highest standard of journalism, guarding its columns jealously from the unclean and vicious, and has one of the best papers in the Panhandle country.

Mr. Hamner is a Royal Arch Mason and he served as treasurer and secretary of his chapter for several years. He has been active in citizenship and served as treasurer of Armstrong county during 1903-04-05-06, his election having come on the Democratic ticket. He was affiliated with the Christian Church.

In Marion, Alabama, April 21, 1867, Mr. Hammer married Mrs. Laura Hendrix Parker, daughter of William and Althea Vernon (Oliver) Hendrix. Her father was a well-known Alabama planter, a former member of the Alamaba legislature and grand master of the Masonic order of his state. He was one of the three Masons in the United States who at that time had taken the 33d degree in Masonry. Miss Laura Vernon Hammer, the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Hammer, was born at Memphis, Tennessee, July 17, 1871, and after years of successful work in the schoolroom is now postmaster at Claude, Texas.

AUGUSTUS G. HUBBARD, the Postmaster at Paris, Tex., has been intimately associated for nearly thirty years with the business interests of Paris and with its commercial life. He was identified as a member of the Paris Dry Goods Company for twenty years, and with its financial life as an officer of some of the leading banks of the city. He is a native Texan and was born in Harrison county, December 13, 1851. His father was James Hubbard, who came to Texas from South Carolina, in the Abbeville district, where his birth occurred in 1824; but the family is one of New England origin, its head having migrated from Connecticut in the person of James Hubbard, who went first to Virginia, and served through the war of 1812 from that state, and later married a Miss Wilson of Staunton, that state, and moved to South Carolina. James Hubbard engaged in the wholesale grocery business at Hamburg, South Carolina, there acquired a goodly estate, chiefly consisting of Negro property, and died at that point in 1847.

The family of James Hubbard comprised James and John, who came to Texas with their mother, who, it may be said here, died in Marshall after the Civil war. Both sons served in the Confederate army, and died here. Two daughters were also numbered in the family, they being Mrs. Bayless Taylor of Marshall, Texas, and Mrs. Charles H. Bowles of that city. James Hubbard came to Texas in about 1849, and spent a few years in Harrison county. He first engaged in farming, and in 1850 married Miss Eliza M. Dandridge, a daughter of Nathaniel Watson Dandridge of Virginia, out of which family came Martha Washington. In later years Mr. Hubbard settled in Bowie county, and there engaged in farming. Rebellion came on, he became a strong advocate of Independence for the South and joined the Confederate Army in support of the movement to that end. He joined Crump's Battalion, was commissioned a first lieutenant. and rose to a captaincy early in his military career. His command crossed the Mississippi river in time to take part in the affair at Corinth, and for three years Captain Hubbard remained in the eastern department, where the great campaigns of the Civil War took place. Returning to the Trans-Mississippi Department, he raised a company, and was assigned to duty under E. Kirby Smith during the remainder of the war. He escaped wounds and capture and came out of the long struggle with sufficient health and courage to resume the cultivation of his Red river farm, and was later elected to the office of county judge, in which he officiated for many years, discharging his duties in a manner most satisfactory and dispensing a justice worthy of a higher court.

Captain Hubbard was a man of education, his training having been received in a Catholic institution in Georgetown, D. C. He was not, however, an orthodox churchmen. He was a strong writer upon topics engaging his best thought and took rank among the best citizens of Bowie county. His wife died at Boston in 1870, and he passed away in Paris in 1887. Their children were Salie E., now Mrs. J. H. Barry of Paris, Texas, and Augustus G. of this review, he being the first-born of the two Augustus G. Hubbard was educated sparingly in the schools of Marshall and Boston, Texas, the best of his training coming in the years when the war was in prog-ress, when educational systems in the south were at a low ebb, and he grew up chiefly in Bowie county, around about old Boston. He began his working career as a clerk in a dry goods store there, and in 1874 he went to Cooper, Texas, and engaged in a business of the same character on his own responsibility, just at the time when Delta county was being projected. He remained there in successful business until 1884, when he identified himself with his present location, straightway assuming a conspicuous place among the citizenship of Paris. He quitted mercantile life in 1904, having been long identified with business there as a member of the Paris Dry Goods Company, and entered the banking business as cashier of the Paris National Bank. With the merging of that institution with the First National Bank he became cashier of the latter institution, continuing as such until May, 1912, when he retired from it and from all other business activity. Circumstances, however, altered his plans, and he felt impelled to once more enter the lists, and he did so as president of the Guaranty State Bank and Trust Company in November, 1912. The concern just mentioned is capitalized at $50,000 and was organized in 1912 by the Duncan and other local interests, and its destiny is in the hands of a popular and capable management. He was appointed postmaster by President Wilson in March, 1914.

Mr. Hubbard was married in Bowie county, Texas, in January, 1874, to Miss Eugenia Moss, a daughter of Robert J. Moss, a Virginia settler of that county in an early day. Mrs. Moss was formerly a Miss Blackhurn, whose parents located near Blossom, Texas, in 1845, so that the family is one that has long been identified with the state. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Hubbard are as follows: James, a merchant of New Boston, Texas, who is married to Alberta Martin and is the father of six children—Augusta, Eugenia, Robert and Thomas (who are twins), and Alberta Lee. Robert M. Hubbard is an attorney of New Boston and is married to Miss Bertie L. Hart. Thomas is a merchant at Sweetwater, Texas; he married Pearl Lancaster and has one daughter, Virginia, William E. of Memphis, Texas, is a merchant and met of the married the state of the married to Miss Bertie L. Thomas is a merchant at Sweetwater, Texas; and met of the married the state of the married folia of the state of the married folia of the state of Paris, State, and they have one son, Jack Hubard Gibhons Mrs. Mary Meyer, also of Paris, has one son, Gus Hubbard Meyer. Eugenia V. married Frank A. Bailey, and has one daughter, Eugenia Gibhons Bailey, Dudley C. is a young business man of Paris, and Augusta Virginia is the youngest of the ten.

Justs W. Etans. One of the men of whom Bonham, Texan, is especially proud and who has accomplished a great work for this city is Idris W. Evans, who was superintendent of its schools for thirteen years. Mr. Evans has given his entire life to the cause of education in Texas, and he is one of the few educators who seem to have solved the problem of a practical education, a question that is causing much discussion today among not only educators, but all thinking people. He has combined with the scientific and literary branches such practical subjects that give a student who can take no more than a high school course some assets when he starts out in life for himself.

The father and mother of Idris W. Evans were Welsh, being natives of the region about Cardiff, Wales, and belonging to the mining class in that industrial section. His father, Daniel J. Evans, married Jeanette Jones clandestinely when they were scarcely more than children, and their journey to the United States was their bridal tour. Mr. Evans, like so many of his countryman, was a musician of more than ordinary ability, and he first settled in Ohio, being a teacher of vocal music. In 1831 he came to the south, and located in Arkansas, and for the past several years he has been supervisor of music his Daniel J. Evans and his wife, the two clusts of these having died in childhood. Of those living, Idris W. is the eldest; Mrs. J. E. Collius, living in Carbon, Texas; Gomer, who is auditor for a lumber company in Oklahoma, and Gwilym, who is employed by the Cudaby Packing Company in Little Rock, Arkansas.
Although Mr. Evans is thoroughly southern in his personality and through the circumstances of breeding and education, by the accident of birth he is a native of Ohio, having been born in Summit county on the 20th of October, 1871. He came to Texas as a youth of sixteen, with the foundation of a good education and the ambition to acquire a broader oue. He was an unusually brilliant student, and determined to earn his living and at the same time increase his own knowledge by becoming a school teacher. His first experience in this field was near New Boston, Bowie county, Texas, where he taught the Ramsay school. He remained in that county until some time during the nineties, when he came to Fannin county and taught the Orangeville school. He was later elected principal of the Dodd City school, and then of the school at Leonard. While in charge of the school at the latter place, he was elected county superintendent of schools. He was re-elected in 1900, and served six months of his term, when he resigned to accept the position of superintendent of the Bonham schools.

This was in 1901, S. B. Foster having preceded him as superintendent. When he took charge, there was one small building for the negro pupils, and a frame building almost in ruins, and a tumble-down brick structure, both of which occupied the site of the present high school, for the white children. The value of all the school property was about fifteen thousand dollars. There is now a modern high school building, a large campus and an eight-room building in northeast Bonham, a three-room building set in ample grounds in South Bonham, and an enlarged building for the negro school. The property valuation is placed at one hundred and twenty-one thousand dollars, and there has been an additional seventy-five thousand dollars in bonds voted for a new high school. The force of instruction has been materially increased, there being now twenty-three white teachers and four negroes. When Mr. Evans came to the school, eleven grades had been established, but he broadened and strengthened the curriculum until now the high school is one in fact as well as in name. There was only the nucleus of a library then, and now there are volumes of reference, text-books, and fiction, sufficient to do credit to a much larger school. The science department, which has been woefully neglected in most of our southern high schools, at the time of Mr. Evans' advent included only physics and chemistry. It has now been enlarged to include physical geography, physiology, botany, zoology, agriculture, domestic science and domestic art, manual training, and mechanical drawing, while German has been added to the literary course. Splendid instruction is offered in all these branches, the money expended for the high school alone for instruction being over seven thousand dollars.

Bonham was one of the first cities in the state to avail itself of the aid offered by the state in giving instruction in the departments of agriculture and domestic science and, in addition to the five thousand dollars of the state's money that has been expended, it has expended ten thousand of its own money on these depart-

In a bulletin just issued by the United States Department of Agriculture at Washington, D. C., the Bonham high school is given conspicuous mention for its work of pioneering education in the Texas schools. The bulletin speaks as follows:

"The Bonham High School took advantage of the provisions for state aid in teaching agriculture, manual training, and home economics, enlarged and equipped laboratories for the work, and purchased five and one-half acres adjoining the school. The first-year students have complete charge of the school farm, and upon them rests the responsibility of preparing the ground, selecting the seed, planning the rotations, and planting the various crops. They have five recitations from the text-book in agriculture each week, and each afternoon one division of the class goes to the field.
"The farm is divided into one-fifth and one-tenth acre

"The farm is divided into one-fifth and one-tenth acre plats. Each plat is permaently staked and numbered, and the boys have drawn a large map and made blue prints of the farm. Under the direction of the manual training teacher, they have built a house sixteen by thirty feet, with a loft capacity of about six tous. This is being used for the storage of implements, tools, seeds, and produce, as well as for class work in seed testing, grading, and all other indoor activities of the farm.

"One or more of the following crops have been planted: Cotton, corn, oats, barley, emmer, rape, millet, Kaffir corn, broom corn, mangels, cowpens, velvet heaus, soy beans, peanuts, cabbage, onions, tomatoes, beets, and bush beans. Other crops, such as alfalfa, vetch, bur elover, crimson clover, rye, wheat, and winter oats are in the rotations for fall soving.

"A few simple experiments have been planned and are being carried out, such as the use of acid phosphate on cotton and lime on alfalfa, leaving cotton thick and thin in the row and so forth. In most of the work the school is aiming to demonstrate principles that have been already well established. The following are some of the demonstrations that have been undertaken: (1) That barnyard manure is valuable and should be utilized, (2) that erop rotation is a necessary feature in successful agriculture and that legumes should occupy a prominent part in these rotations, (3) that winter cover crops are essential in retaining soil fertility in the South, (4) that improved seeds are important for high yields and should be selected annually from the growing crop, (5) that early surface cultivation for conservation of moisture is necessary as a safeguard against possible drought in July and August, (6) that deep plowing rather than shallow is necessary on upland soils to retard erosion and (7) that the better cultivation of fewer acres and diversified farming involves less risk, distributes the work more uniformly throughout the year and in the end is more profitable than straight farming to cotton and corn. The boys do all the work and seem glad of the chance to do something from which they can see immediate results."

During the period in which Mr. Evans has been a teacher he has spent much time perfecting bimself in his especial line of work. He has devoted his spare moments to advanced work in education both at Grayson College at Whiteright, Texas, and at the Summer School of the University of Chiego. But he demonstrated his ability chiefly in the success with which he has applied the methods which the class rooms of these two institutions promulgated. He is a constant student and ever on the watch for any way in which his school may be bettered. A man of broad education bimself he superintendents, that his school is prefet, but he was ever open to suggestion. In the summer Mr. Evans was chiefly occupied with normal school work in which he acted as an instructor. He has made addresses on education throughout the state and some of his time was given to his work as a member of the state board of examiners. This contact with people in all sections has brought him a wide acquaintance and the character of the work which he has accomplished together with his personal popularity has caused a wide demand for his services.

Mr. Evans was married in Dodd City, Texas, on the Aft. Fains was matted in 1900ct City, 122a, or adoughter of William H. Walker, who was a farmer and an exconfederate soldier. Her mother was Mary E. (Kincaid) Walker and they were both natives of the state of Tennessee. Two children, Idris and Kenneth, have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Evans and the whole family are members of the Methodist church. Mr. Evans himself has been a teacher in the Sunday school for a number of years. He is not a member of any of the fraternal orders nor has he ever taken part in politics.

JAMES N. BLAKE of the firm of Blake & Hinkle, well known as lumber dealers in Paris, has been identified with the business and political activities of the city since 1884. He has been a man of no little prominence in Paris and in the county and his prosperity is greatly of his own making. Born in Kauffman county, which is now included within the limits of Rockwall county, Texas, on November 25, 1857, he is the son of Christopher Columbus and Mary (Thompson) Blake.

Christopher C. Blake, it may be said here, was born in Lexington, Kentucky, in 1825 and in 1845 came thence to Texas. He married Mary Thompson in the state of Indiana and soon after established himself on a farm in Kauffman county. When the county was divided he found himself located in Rockwall county and there Mrs. Blake died, while he passed away in Collin county, this state. Christopher Blake was the sole member of his father's family to identify himself with the Lone Star state. He served in the Confederate army under General Griffith and soon after the close of the war he located in Lamar county, locating near Tanner's tanyard, where he pursued his calling as a farmer. He was a wise parent and reared his family in the knowledge of the dignity of labor, inspiring them with an ambition to follow the simple industrial arts. He had three sons. John H., the eldest, is now a resident of Hemphill county, this state; James N., of this review, was the second born, and the third and youngest is Monroe, of Seattle, Washington.

The country schools prepared James N. Blake for the civil duties of life and for many years after he attained his majority he was occupied in the work of the farm and in the tanyard. In 1884 he came to Paris and here got his first real experience in business when he entered the employ of Joseph Brown, a merchant of Paris, in the capacity of a clerk. He spent seven years here in the one place and then went to the Frisco Railroad Company, with whom he was employed in the construction of their line into Paris.

In 1892 Mr. Blake began to gain some prominence in a political way, and in that year was nominated for the office of district clerk of Lamar county, being elected as the successor of George W. Martin. He was twice re-elected—in 1894 and in 1896—and when he retired, after six years of honorable service, he added his presence and his active participation to the lumber concern which he had previously established with Albert B. Hinkle, who is still his business associate. The firm of Blake & Hinkle has conducted a thriving lumber business for as many years as it has been in existence in Paris and is recognized as one of the leading commercial establishments in the city.

On December 15, 1881, Mr. Blake was married to Miss Olivia P. Davis, a daughter of Palmer Davis and a granddaughter of the pioneer, J. W. Davis, who came to Texas in 1838 from Cleveland, Ohio, and entered a large body of land in Red River county.

J. W. Davis was a doctor and practiced medicine for many years among the people of his locality. He was many years among the people of mis locaticy. He was twice married and the three children by his first wife settled at Sacramento, California. The children of his second marriage were Palmer and David H., who spent their lives in Lamar county. Dr. Davis is buried at Spring Hill, Texas. Palmer and David H. Davis were merchants in Paris prior to the Civil war, in which they served as soldiers of the Confederacy, and Palmer Davis died in Paris in 1867. He married Miss Martha Harrison, a daughter of W. H. Harrison. Mr. Harrison was of the Virginia branch of this prominent and honored family. The children of Palmer Davis and his wife were as follows: Anna, who died in Paris, the wife of Ed Bonbam, leaving one son, Edward; Olivia P. was born January 22, 1863, and John W. who died in 1891, unmarried. No children have been born to in 1891, unmarried. Mr. and Mrs. Blake.

Mr. Blake is a Past Master of Paris Lodge, No. 27, A. F. & A. M., and is a Past Chancellor of the Knights of Pythias. He was reared in the influence of the Presbyterian faith and has followed in the precepts of that church.

J. D. COTTRELL. For thirty-one years J. D. Cottrell has been a resident of Plano, Texas, and for nearly twenty years of this time has been prominent at the bar. Primarily a legist, he developed such aptness for affairs, such strength of character and solidity of judgment, that he became a legislator, a leader in the public life of the community, and an important factor in social affairs in his adopted place. Practically the entire growth of Plano has passed under his eyes and he has contributed in no small way to the development which has made this one of the leading cities of Collin county and a center of business prosperity, professional importance and educational and religious activity.

Mr. Cottrell was born on a farm in the vicinity of Cumberland Gap, Claiborne county, Tennessee, February 3, 1866, and is a son of Samuel E. and Mollie (Norvell) Cottrell. On the paternal side of the family he is of Welsh descent, while his mother's ancestors were French and the grandparents on both sides migrated from Virginia to Tennessee at an early date. In the paternal grandfather's family there were fifteen children, while the maternal grandfather had nine sons and daughters. and at this time Mr. Cottrell has no less than one hundred and eight living cousins of whom he personally knows. A sister of Mr. Cottrell, Alice, the wife of J. H. Potts, resides at McKinney, Texas. Samuel E. Cottrell was born in Virginia and was a youth when taken by his parents to Tennessee. There he grew up a planter and stockraiser, adopted those vocations when he embarked upon a career of his own, and, like his father, operated his land with slave labor prior to the outbreak of the Civil war. He was an energetic and enterprising man and made a success of his operations, continuing to be engaged therein until his death, about 1896, the mother having passed away in 1873. Samuel E. and Mollie Cottrell were the parents of nine children, of whom two died in infancy, while five still survive, and J. D. Cottrell is the fourth in order of birth. The father was married a second time to Miss Mary Mundy, daughter of Lake Mundy, a brick mason and carpenter of Tennessee, and to this union there were born seven children, all of whom are living.

After securing his primary educational training in the public schools of his native state, J. D. Cottrell started assisting his father in the work of the home farm, but, tiring of farm life, at the age of seventeen he left the parental roof and made his way to Texas. Here he took a course in the Plano Institute, at that time one of the highest institutions of learning in the state, being conducted by the well-known Professor W. F. Mister and Professor T. G. Harris. Following one term in that school he soon thereafter took up the study of law and January 15, 1895, was admitted to the bar, and at once took up the practice of his pro-fession at Plano, which has since been his field of endeavor. It has been said that in the legal profession there is no royal road to promotion, its high rewards are gained by diligent study and long and tedious attention to elementary principles and are awarded only to those who develop, in the arena of forensic strife, characters of integrity and moral worth. In that most difficult and perplexing of professions, the mere occupation of distinguished position argues for its possessor solid ability, signal skill, sound learning, untiring in-dustry and uncompromising integrity. It has been through the possession of these qualifications that Mr. Cottrell has risen to his present high position at the bar of Collin and the surrounding counties. His career has been aided by no happy chance or circumstance, Each step has been carefully planned and energetically worked out. Among his professional brethren he is known as a man who thoroughly respects the unwritten ethics of his calling and he has also succeeded in gaining that most difficult of acquisitions—public confidence. A Democrat in his political views, he has ever been an earnest and zealous worker in the ranks of his party and on frequent occasions has been called to offices of high responsibility. He was the youngest alderman ever elected to the city council of Plano, and while in that capacity was called upon to act during two terms as mayor pro tem. He also served one term as city attorney and four years as assistant county attorney, and in 1902 was elected a member of the Twenty-eighth Legislature of the state. His work in that body earned him re-election to the Twenty-ninth session, and during the latter term was a member and chairman of a num-the Knights of Pythias. On March 25, 1891, Mr. Cottrell was married at Cuero, Texas, to Miss Josephine Cook, daughter of Fred Cook, an early settler of DeWitt county, Texas, who became a large farmer and stockman, and is now deceased. children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Cottrell, of whom one is still living: Travis Josephine Cottrell, born May 31, 1895, a graduate of the Plano High School, and now attending the Southwestern University at ber of important committees. Since that time he has served an additional term as city attorney. In 1912, through the earnest solicitation of his friends, he became a candidate for Congress, but after the start of the campaign his health failed and he was forced to withdraw from the race. Since that time he has devoted his entire attention to his law practice. Mr.

Cottrell has few interests outside of his profession and his home, but is appreciative of the enjoyment of companionship with his fellows and is a popular member of Georgetown, Texas.

Since coming to Collin county thirty-one years ago Mr. Cottrell has witnessed a marvelous change in material development here. At the time of his arrival but one railroad passed through the county and one small bank was able to handle all the business of the county. Land was to be secured for ten dollars an aere that now demands from $140 to $150 an acre. He has been a promoter of the movements which have comhined to develop and advance this part of the Lone Star state and has prospered with its prosperity, thus establishing his right to a position among Collin county's representative men.

J. F. HARRINGTON. Although he is numbered among the more recent acquisitions of the legal profession in Collin county, J. F. Harrington has already won a firmly established position in the ranks of his calling here, and the confidence in which he is held by his fellow-citizens was given expression in 1913, when he was elected city attorney of Plano, a position which he now holds. He is a native son of this city, and was born August 29, 1887, his parents being John H. and Mary Frances (Mathews) Harrington.

Mr. Harrington is of Scotch-Irish descent, his greatgrandfather having emigrated to this country from Scotland at an early day. His maternal grandfather, R. F. Mathews, was a drummer in a Confederate regiment during the Civil war. A. Harrington, his paternal grandfather, was a slave holder before the Civil war, was one of the early settlers of Collin county, Texas, and was the first person to be buried in the Rawlett Creek Cemetery in this county. John H. Harrington was born in the vicinity of Plano, whence his parents had come from Kentucky, and was reared a farmer, a vocation which he has followed throughout his life. At this time he is carrying on successful operations on a tract of land taken up from the state by his father. He has led a life of industry, and has been successful in his ventures, being known as one of the substantial men of his community. He married Mary Frances Mathews, also a native of Collin county, who also survives, and they have been the parents of four sons and three daughters, of whom four sons and one daughter still survive: S. Walter, who is engaged in farming in Collin county; Mattie M., who is the widow of Thomas A. Robertson and a resident of Plano; Clint A., a student of the Plano High school; J. F.; and Robert L., who is also a student of the Plano High school.

When he had completed the curriculum of the public schools of Plano, J. F. Harrington entered the University of Texas as a student in the law department, and was graduated therefrom in 1910, shortly after which he was admitted to the bar. He at once took up the practice of his profession at Plano, and here he has continued in the enjoyment of a large professional business, having on his books the names of some of the most prominent people and leading business houses of the city. He is known as a careful, painstaking, conscientious and profound lawyer, and has been retained at one time or another as general or special counsel in leading cases of jurisprudence in Collin county, thus becoming more or less a familiar figure in the courts. In political matters he is a Democrat, and is a great admirer of President he is a Democrat, and is a great annier of Fresident Wilson and an advocate of his policies, especially in re-gard to the Mexican situation. In April, 1913, at the earnest solicitation of his friends, he consented to be the candidate of his party for the office of city attorney, and his subsequent election gave evidence of his true worth and widespread popularity. Aside from the organizations of his calling, he belongs to the Masons and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, in which he has numerous friends, as he has, in fact, in all walks of life. He is a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and a member of the board of trustees of the Fanny Harrington Chapel of that denomination at Plano, named in honor of his mother.

On October 23, 1913, in the Walnut Grove Presbyterian church, Collin county, Mr. Harrington was united in marriage with Miss Mytte E. Harris, daughted of the Rev. M. C. Harris, a minister of the Presbyterian church and pastor of the Walnut Grove church of that faith. Reverend Harris came to Collin county from Arkansas about the year 1870 and during his long years of labor here has become widely known to the people as an earnest and zealous minister of the Gospel.

THOMAS E. CRAIG. The manager of the McKinney Compress Company is an electrical and mechanical engineer by profession, and has had a very successful career both in his profession and in business. Mr. Craio has given service as construction or consulting engineer in connection with a number of Texas enterprises, including railways and electric power plants, and still a young man has a career of great promise in the future as well as a record of successful performance up to the present time.

Thomas E. Craig was born March 3, 1875, in Hopkins county, Kentucky, a son of J. L. and E. Y. (Owens) Craig. The family is of Scotch-Irish stock. His parents were both natives of Mississippi, came to Texas in 1868, locating in Hopkins county, where the father was a farmer and merchant until ill health compelled him to retire, and his death occurred in Sherman in 1911. The mother is now living at Kingsville, Texas.

The mounts is the oldest of four living children, minimaxing from Austin College at Sherman and acquired his technical education in the University of Tenessee, where he completed a course in both the electrical and mechanical engineering departments and graduated Bachelor of Science. The following five years were spent in the employ of the General Electric Company at Boston and New York, at the end of which time he joined the engineering staff of the Dallas International World of the People's Light Company at Corpus Christi, and remained in charge of its operation for some time. His home has been at McK inney, since 1911, in McKinney Compress of this construction work. In 1907 Mr., Craig creeted the plant of the People's Light Company at Corpus Christi, and remained in charge of its operation for some time. His compress of the properties of the McKinney Compress of the Compress of

Mr. Craig has always been a Democratic voter, affiliates with the Masonic Order and from boyhood has been a member of the Presbyterian church. On November 2, 1910, at McKinney occurred his marriage to Miss Kathryn Heard. Her father, S. D. Heard, is a prominent McKinney capitalist and business man. Their home is on W. Hunt street in McKinney.

JONAS KNIGHT, D. O. At McKinney one of the physicians who can claim a patronage of exceptional numerical strength and value is Dr. Jonas Knight, who is one of the ablest exponents of the osteopathic school of medicine in north Texas. Within the past twenty years the practice of osteopathy, starting in restricted localities and hampered by prejudice, has spread from coast to coast, and has won its place with older schools.

Dr. Jonas Knight was born April 2, 1884, at Commerce, Texas, the son of John T. and Susan E. (Williams) Knight. The family is of Scotch-Irish stock and Dr. Knight was the youngest of twelve children, eight sons and four daughters, eight of whom are still living. All his near relatives live in the state of Texas excepting one sister, Mrs. S. T. Patterson, of Roswell, New Mexico. The five brothers are all at Commerce or in that immediate vicinity, namely: John Knight, now retired from active business and president of the Farmers' State Bank of Commerce; Thomas Ingram Knight, also retired from business; Lemuel Lee Knight, Anignt, also retified from dusiness; Lemind Lee Ringat-a farmer, Amos Knight, eity marshal of Commerce, and Ira Knight, a farmer. The family are characteristic for their excellent health and their fine physical con-stitution and longevity is a trait of the people of that name. The father is a native of Alabama and the mother of Mississippi, and they came to Texas about 1850, first locating in Wood county. The father was a farmer and stock raiser, and during the war served for two years in the Confederate army. He took part in some of the historic battles of the war and was slightly wounded in one engagement. His occupation as a farmer and stock raiser continued from the end of the war until his death in 1907, and his wife passed away in 1909.

Dr. Knight received his early training in the public schools of Hunt county, later attended the East Texas Normal College at Commerce and in 1908 entered the American School of Osteopathy at Kirksville, Missouri, from which he was graduated in 1904 with the degree D. O. His first practice was at Greenville, Texas, but in a short time he went to his old home town of Commerce and was in practice there four years. Following a post-graduate course at Kirksville in 1908 at the American School, Dr. Knight returned to Texas and located at McKinney, in which vicinity he has built up a large practice since 1909.

Dr. Knight is a Democrat in politics, affiliates with the Masonic Order, the Chapter Degrees, with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and is a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church South at McKinney, On January 17, 1906, at Butler, Missouri, was solemnized his marriage with Miss Lorena Lampton. Her father, Dr. W. E. Lampton, was a physician of the Osteopathic school and is still in practice in Missouri. Mrs. Knight diel July 12, 1911. Dr. Knight has his office in the Foote building in McKinney.

D. W. SMITH. Milling occupies an important place among the thriving industries of Northern Texas and many of the most successful business men of this section are concentrating their energies on this branch of activity. The progressive men of Grayson county have not been slow to realize the advantages offered by their locality in this direction and some of the most important enterprises of this kind are to be found in Whitewright, among which may be mentioned the Womack Milling Company, much of the success of which may be accredited to the progressive methods of its capable secretary, treasurer and manager, D. W. Smith, a man of broad business experience, who has brought to his labors an enthusiasm that is rapidly bringing his concern to the forefront.

Mr. Smith was born at Dakota, Stephenson county, Illinois, August 22, 1872, and is a son of Samuel and Virginia Smith, the former a native of Pennsylvania and the latter of Virginia. The father, who spent his life as a carpenter and contractor, died in January, 1888, the mother passed away in May, 1910. D. W Smith received his education in the public schools of the Prairie state and he early took his place among the world's workers, as his father died when he was sixteen years of age. He came to Texas in 1894, locating in Whitewright, where he secured employment in a livery establishment and also clerked in a grocery store. Sub-sequently he became bookkeeper for the Whitewright Oil Mill and then received his introduction to the grain and feed business, as proprietor of a venture of his own. He was thus brought into connection with other enterprising and progressive business men here, and in 1912 was offered and accepted his present position. The Womack Milling Company was founded in 1898, as a Womack Milling Company was founded in 1818, as a stock company, and since its inception has enjoyed a steady and healthy growth. The product consists of flour and meal and the firm also deals in seeds and grain of all kinds, the trade extending all over the Northern and Northeastern sections of Texas. The capacity of the mill is 250 barrels of flour per day, a grain elevator is operated in connection and twelve men are employed. In the management of this business Mr. Smith has shown himself capable and thorough, a master of every detail of the business and a man of acumen, foresight and sterling judgment. He has the unqualified confidence of his associates and is widely known in the trade throughout this section. He has always been a Republican in his political views and has at all times supported the interests of his party, but has not sought preferment, his only public service being in the capacity of city secretary for one term. He is a member of the United Commercial Travelers' Association and the Knights of Pythias and his religious affiliation is with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. He is known as one of the enthusiastic "boosters" of his section, with a firm belief in its future development and the ability to inspire that faith in others.

In February, 1906, Mr. Smith was married at Bryan, Tess, to Miss Emogene Martin, daughter of the late James Martin, a successful farmer for some years and a veteran of the Civil war, through which he served as a soldier in the Confederate army. He died in 1903. Mr. and Mrs. Smith have one daughter, Vivian, a bright child of four years.

CHARLES W. BRYANT has been a resident of the community of Whitewright for a period of fifty-eight years and is now living retired from business cares save for the supervision which he gives to his invested interests. He is a man of excellent business ability, of genuine personal worth and of strong and admirable traits of character, and well deserves mention in this work as one of the representative men of Grayson county. He is a native of this county, born hear the present site of Whitewright, September 6, 1856, and is a son of Anthony M. and Susan S. (Binkley) Bryant, being of Irish and French descent on his father's side of the family and of German ancestry on his mother's side.

Anthony M. Bryant was born in Kentucky and was there married to his first wife. He came to Texas with his two children in 1852, they being a daughter, Mariah, who died in 1859, and a son, Judge David E. Bryant, who was a prominent lawyer of Sherman for many years, served as federal judge of the Eastern District of Texas for twenty years, his first appointment to that position coming from President Harrison, and died in February, Anthony M. Bryant married for his second 1911. wife Susan S. Binkley of Tennessee and they became the parents of four children, of whom three are now living: Charles W., of this review; C. B., president of the First National Bank of Whitewright, and Mary, the wife of W. H. King, who has been postmaster of Whitewright for the past twelve years, and at this time is a director of the First National Bank. On coming to Texas the father settled in Grayson county and here continued to be engaged in farming and stock raising up to the time of his death, October 3, 1889, the mother passing away April 11, 1900. He served as county judge of Grayson county for two terms and at all times took a great in-terest in matters pertaining to the welfare of his state and county, being known throughout this section as a helpful and useful citizen, as a man of the highest personal integrity and probity and as one who had the regard and esteem of those with whom he came into contact.

Charles W. Bryant has spent his entire career in agricultural pursuits and has made a success of his ventures. He was educated in the public schools of his native county and as a youth adopted the tilling of the soil as his field of labor, and in later years has had no reason to regret his choice of occupations. He has been an eyewitness to the wonderful advancement of his community, where he has lived for more than a half a century. He remembers the founding of the town of Whitewright, about the year 1880, and recalls the time when goods were freighted by ox teams from Jefferson and Galveston to this point. But few families resided in the community and land sold at from five to fifteen dollars an acre that now commands from $120 to $135 an acre and is steadily advancing in value. He has prospered with the prosperity of his section, through hard and energetic labor, and is now living in quiet and comfortable retirement in his handsome Whitewright residence, a modern structure worth in the neighborhood of $8,000.

Mr. Bryant is a Republican in politics, but is likeral in his views and often votes rather for the man than the party. He has served efficiently as mayor of the city and his administration was marked by consecutive advancement and progress. Fraternally he belongs to the Masons, in which he has attained to the Knight Templar degree. With his family he belongs to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, of which he has been a member of the board of stewards for twenty years,

On December 15, 1881, Mr. Bryont was married in Grayson county to Miss S. F. Fitzgerald, daughter of G. S. Fitzgerald, formerly of Virginia, and later of Grayson county, where he served as county commissioner for a number of years. He died in 1893, Mr. Fitzgerald in the Confederate army, served on the western froutier during the Civil war up to the time of General Lee's surrender. Mr. and Mrs. Bryant have had seven children, of whom six are now living: James Monroe, who has for two years been engaged in the drug business at Whitewright; Albert and Alberta, twins, the former a farmer and the latter the wife of E. F. Everhart; Mrs. Fannie Fielder, who died in November, 1912; George Fitzgerald, aged twenty-one years, who is engaged in farming in Grayson county; Charles W., Jr., aged seventeen years, in the Carlyle Military Aeademy at Whitewright, and Marvin B., aged sixteen years, also a student in that seademy.

After a long period identified with the best interests of his county, Mr. Bryant is now enjoying a well-merited rest, well merited because it has come to him as a direct result of his own labors, his close application and his careful business management. His clean and wholesome life and his many sterling traits of character have attracted to him a wide circle of warm friends and admirers, and few citizens of Whitewright stand in higher general esteem.

THOMAS B. WILSON. There passed away at his beautiful home, a short distance north of McKinney, on September 3, 1913, one of the best beloved of Collin county. Thomas B. Wilson had lived in north Texas since boyhood and since pioneer times, had fought with the Confederate troops in the great war, spent his business career as a farmer and stock raiser, acquired a generous prosperity and used his ample means in many ways to promote the happiness of others and to develop the resources of his community. His life was extended beyond the time of three score and ten, was filled with kindly deeds and energetic accomplishments in everything he undertook and it was in the spirit of sincer affection and esteem that so many hundreds of his old friends and neighbors gathered to pay their last tribute to his memory at the time of his death.

The late Thomas B. Wilson grew up in Collin county on the old farm six miles north of McKinney and, as might be expected from the conditions which prevailed in that part of the state during its period of early settlement, his education was very limited so far as school attendance was concerned. It is said that he attended a country school for only three months. However he had a mind of unusual capacity, was eager for knowledge, spent all his leisure time at home in study the college. "A self-made and self-clueted man, he rendered himself capable in many ways, was a practical man, and while prospering himself did not neglect his duties to his home and state. During the war, while in the vigor of his young manhood, he served a short time in the Confederate army, but was discharged on account of ill health. By practical experience he prepared himself for the profession of surveying and served for twenty years as county surveyor, first appointed by the governor of the state and later by the people of Collin county. Later for about the same length of time he was deputy sheriff of the county. In the meantime he had applied bimself with his characteristic energy and with marked success to the business of farming and stock raising and acquired large possessions and was regarded as one of Collin county's most successful men. For a number of years during the latter part of his life he was in the abstract business at McKinney and that business is now continued by his son, A. G. Wilson.

The late Mr. Wilson from the time of his majority until his death always supported and was a valued worker in the Democratic party, serving as a member of the County Democratic committee at the time of his death. After an illness of only three days he passed away at his commodious home, two miles north of McKinney. The funeral was held at his residence on September 5 and hundreds came to hear testimony of their respect for the deceased, the house, porches and the yard being filled with the concourse of those who had known him in life. His body was laid to rest in the Pecan Grove cemetery of McKinney and the funeral was preached by the Rev. C. C. Young of the Methodist Episcopal church. Those who knew him best speak with admiration of his progressiveness as a citizen, his willingness to lend his support to every worthy enterprise for the benefit of his community, his friendship to the poor, his helpfulness as a neighbor and the singular devotion and affection which he lavished upon his family. Perhaps with a keen sense of his own early handicaps in the way of education, he provided liberally for the training of his children, and believed in the substantial comforts of the world and erected in his later years a beautiful residence as the most conspicuous feature of his splendid farm north of McKinney. His home cost about five thousand dollars and his widow and two youngest children still occupy it.

At Dallas, Texas, December 23, 1882, Thomas B. Wilson married Miss Etta Eastes, a daughter of George W. and Eliza Eastes. Her father was one of the surviving veterans of the war with Mexico during 1846-18, was for many years an active farmer at Collin county and died March 3, 1891, while his wife passed away October 20, 1909. To the marriage of Mr. Wilson and wife were born three childrent, two daughters and one son: Pauline B., the wife of J. L. McEntire, a farmer with her mother, and Addison G., who lives at home, carried on the abstract business founded by his father and also the farm and the settlement of his father's estate.

Dr. Frank Litten. One of the successful and prominent physicians and surgeons of Austin is Dr. Prank Litten, a lifelong resident of this city, where he was born on September 8, 1863. He is a son of Dr. James M. and Mary L. Litten, natives of South Carolina and Tennessee, respectively. The father came to Austin in 1852 and was occupied in the general practice of medicine until the time of his death, on March 31, 1900. He was a man of prominence here, successful in his profession and highly thought of in all walks of life. The mother is yet living and has her home in Austin. For years Dr. James M. Litten was physician to the State Lunatic Asysurgeon to the Pederal troops while they were stationed here affer the Civil war. He was of English descent, tracing his ancestry back to the Pilgrim Fathers of early American settlement.

Dr. Frank Litten was educated in the public schools of Austin in the matter of his early training, after which he attended Jefferson Medical College of Philadelphia, in 1887, graduating therefrom with his M. D. degree. Immediately the young doctor engaged in practice in company with his father, and that association was terminated only by the death of the elder man. They were successful in their concerted work, and had a wide practice in the city, which Dr. Frank Litten has retained since the passing of his father, successfully carrying on the worthy work long ago inaugurated by the senior member of their professional combination.

Dr. Litten is a member of the Local and State Medical Societies, and is active in the work of both bodies.

On June 15, 1904, Dr. Litten was married to Miss Mildred Reses of Waco, Pexas. She was a daughter of Major E. F. Reese, long active in the carriage manufacturing business, but now retired. He was Sergent-Major in the Confederate Army, Hapgoods First Regiment of South Carolina, and served throughout the entire war, having enlisted at Charleston when the first gun of the war was freed. He came to Texas in 1869, establishing himself in business, and here he has since continued, having long had a prominent place in husiness and other circles of Waco, where the family home has been located. Dr. and Mrs. Litten are socially prominent in Austin, Dr. and Mrs. Litten are socially prominent in Austin,

Dr. and Mrs. Litten are socially prominent in Austin, and the doctor is highly regarded in professional circles of the city and county. The home of the family is at

George W. Fox. In Collin county the first wholesale grocery house established was due to the enterprise of George W. Fox, who for a number of years was identified with the business and has since been in the real estate and loan business at McKinney. His record as a business man and citizen is well known in that part of Texas and he has spent all his life in Collin county and has made his career one of value both to himself and to his community.

His hirth occurred on a farm in Collin county March 30, 1867. His parents, S. H. and Sallie (Barnes) Fex, were both natives of Missouri, came from that state to Texas and were early settlers of Collin county, where the father followed farming throughout his active career. During the war between the states he volumeered for service in the Confederate army, participated in a number of the strennous campaigns of the war and though wounded several times continued in the service until the end. After the war he resumed farming and stoke raising, and is now living at the age of about seventy-eight, retried from business, in McKimney, enjoying the fruits of a well spent career. The mother is also still living.

George W. Fox, who was the sixth in a family of fourteen children, seven of whom are living, was echeated in the public schools of Collin county, took a business course at Dallas and had his first regular experiences as a clerk in a department store at McKinney. From that he transferred his enterprise to a retail grocery house, was in business eleven years as a retail grocery house, was in business eleven years as a retail grocery house, was in business eleven years as a retail grocery house, was in business eleven years as a retail grocer and then organized the Fox Wholesale Grocery Company, which, as already stated, was the first establishment of its kind in Collin county. Mr. Fox remained its president and general manager about six years, then bought out the rest of the stockholders and continued in business under the name of G., W. Fox, Wholesale Grocer. Ill health compelled him to retire from the grocery trade in 1911 and since then he has given his attention to real estate and loans.

In political matters Mr. Fox can be found in the regular ranks of the Democratic party, but has not sought any public office. He is none the less an active worker for local progress, is a member of the Chamber of Commerce and is secretary and treasurer of the good roads organization of Collin county. His fraternal affiliations are with the Masonic Order and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and his church home is the Christian denomination.

At McKinney in 1889 Mr. Fox married Miss Lula

Frank Killen. M.D.

Lillard, who lost both her father and mother when she was a child and was brought up an orphan. Of the four children born to their marriage the two now living are: Grace, who married Edgar McKinney, who is secretary of the Home Relief Association at McKinney, and Miss Maude, aged thirteen, and now attending school. The business office of Mr. Fox is on Kentucky street, in the Masanie building, and his home on North College street.

THOMAS WATER WILEY, M. D. The tangible result of years of effort, intelligently directed by a thoroughly trained mind, are substantially gratifying to the individual who has devoted his life to carrying out the highest ideals of a certain chosen calling. No man can be greater than his appreciation of the responsibility he owes the world, and the professional men who rise highest are those who endeavor to aid humanity and to contribute to the achievements of the science which has enlisted their efforts. One of the distinguished medical men of Texas, whose career has been characterized by high achievements and steadfast devotion to exalted aims, is Dr. Thomas Water Wiley of McKinney, where for forty-eight years he has been engaged in constant practice.

In Dr. Wiley's character are found embodied the best traits of his Scotch and Irish ancestors, as well as those of his English and German connections. He was born November 14, 1838, in Butler county, Alabama, and is a son of J. McCaleb and Elizabeth T. (Duckworth) Wiley, the former a native of North Carolina and the latter of Alabama. His father was for years a dis-tinguished southern legist, a slave owner and a district judge, and died two years after retiring from the bench at about the age of seventy-two years. The mother was related to Sir John Duckworth of the English Navy, who was an officer of the flagship Prince Royal of Admiral Byron, and sailed to the West Indies, where he participated in the engagement with the French Early in 1799 he was raised to the rank of rear admiral and sent to the West Indies to succeed Lord Hugh Seymour. While in command of the Royal George he forced the passage of the Dardanelles and sustained considerable loss in effecting his return, the Turks having strengthened their position. Sir John Duckworth sat in Parliament for some time as member for New Romney.

To the union of J. McCaleb and Elizabeth T. (Duesworth) Wiley there were born four children, of whom Dr. Wiley is the third in order of birth and the only survivor. The second marriage of Judge J. McCaleb Wiley was to a Mrs. Taft, formerly Miss Appling, and to this union there were five children. A. A. Wiley, one of the sons, was lieutenant colonel of the Fifth U. S. Infantry during the Spanish-American war, and for meritorious services was appointed by the general in charge in Cuba as law officer of the island. After his return to Alabama he was elected to office as congressman from the Montgomery District and died while serving his fourth term, being succeeded by his brother, Oliver C. Wiley.

Dr. Thomas Water Wiley grew up in his home locality in Alabama, and there his early education was scenred. Like his father he became an owner of slaves and when the war between the states broke out he east his fortunes with the Confederacy and voted for Secession in 1861. However, the continued with the Confederacy and the state of the continued with the company that the company until 1863, in which year he was transferred to Company 1.6 of the Fifty-Fourth Alabama. He was wounded at the battle of Peach Tree Creek, in front of Atlanta, July 20, 1864, and remained on crutches as the result of a broken leg until the latter part of 1865, when he surendered at a hospital in Alabama. As he was penniless he was compelled to make his way as best he could with his crutches more than two-thirds of the way to his home at Troy, a distance of fifty-six miles. In 1867 Dr. Wiley came to Texas and located at McKinney and this has since been his field of practice. He has served as health officer for several years, but his reputation has been won along the line of personal achievement rather than in positions of preferment. He was the first surgeon in Collin county to successfully perform hysterectomy and appendectomy, the first to operate on the stomach for gunshot wounds, the first to remove the lower jawbone for bone disease and the only physician who has performed successfully the Cesarian operation and delivered a crying infant. Keen discrimination in the diagnosis of a case, sound judgment in prescribing methods of treatment, unerring skill in delicate surgical operations and a constant devotion to the highest ethics of his honored calling have won him rank among the foremost practitioners of the state. He belongs to the various organizations of his profession and still continues to be as faithful a student as he was when he first entered upon his career. In Masonry he has attained high position, having advanced to the Knight Templar degree, and in Oddfellowship is past grand master of the Grand Lodge of the state and past grand representative from Texas to the Sovereign Grand Lodge of the World.

On December 21, 1859, Dr. Wiley was married to Miss Susan Henderson of Troy, Alabama who died in 1871, leaving five children: James E., of McKinney; Etta, who is the wife of James Ball of Dallas; Henry, who is a commander in the United States Navy, and two daughters, twins, one now deceased and the other Mrs. Lela Henderson, living at Jacksonville, Florida. On June 19, 1873, Dr. Wiley was married to Miss Martha E. Hudson, daughter of Richard B. Hudson, a farmer and slave holder of Mississpip piror to the Civil war. Three children were born to this union: Miss Betsy, of Dallas, assistant in the City Library; Walter II., who is a rural mail carrier out of McKinney, who is the wife of L. P. Carlton, auditor for the Stone & Welster Railroad contractors. Dr. Wiley resides in his comfortable home at No. 205 West Louisiana street, McKinney.

REV. WILLIAM B. KENDALL, pastor of the First Baptist church of Paris, is one of the stirring and spirited men of the ministry of Texas.

Born at Graysville, Kentucky, July 3, 1874, William B. Kendall is the son of Rev. John G. Kendall, connected with the First Baptist church in Waco, Texas, for the past twenty-three years. He was born in Todd county, Kentucky, in 1847, received his education at Greenville, South Carolina, and at an early age engaged in the ministry. He was a son of John W. Kendall of Graysville, Kentucky, born there of North Carolina parents. His mother rode from the old Tarheel state on horseback when a young girl, crossed the Allegheny mountains and settled in the vicinity of Graysville, where she planted the weeping willow switch she cut for a riding crop before she left her native state. It grew into a mammoth tree and shaded her children and grandchildren as they grew up and stands today as a monument to the foresight of the young girl who planted it a hundred years ago. John W. Kendall shared in the sentiments of the southern people upon the issues of the Rebellion, and two of his sons were Confederate soldiers, while he himself held some position with the government in aid of its commissary department. He married Miss Margaret Lucrecia Gray, for whose family Graysville was later named, the Grays being one of the first families to plant itself in the wilds of Kentucky. They were related to other families of prominence in the state, among them the Edwards, the Larrys and the rodds, and they belonged to the agricultural slave-holding class. In the family of John W. and Margaret (Gray) Kendall were the following children: Ben E. Kendall, who always lived on the old homestead and there is passing his life; William W., who moved to Waco, Texas, in its pioneer days and there passed his life, dying at the age of fifty-five years; Colonel Robert B., of Elkton, Kentucky, the birthplace of the father; Rev. John G., the father of the immediate subject of this review, and Lucy Elizabeth, the widow of Judge J. W. Dawson, of Elkton, Kentucky. Rev. John G. Kendall married at Verona, Mississippi, Rev. John G. Kendall married at Verona, Mississippi, in 1873, Mississ Mattle Bell, a daughter of David Bell, and the children of their union were: Rev. William B.; Ben. Kendall, a lawyer of Waco, Texas; Miss Margaret, who teaches music in Baylor University at Waco, and Mrs.

B. B. McReynolds, of Waco.

William B. Kendall's childhood days were passed near Hopkinsville, Kentucky, and there he attended the county schools. From the public schools he entered Bethel College, Russellville, Kentucky, and equipped himself for teaching, at which work he continued for a brief time. He came to Texas when he was twenty years old and did his first pedagogic work in this state in the schools of McGregor. After two years he returned to Kentucky and entered the Southern Baptist Theological Seminary at Louisville. Taking up the work of the ministry his first charge was at Tyler, where he was pastor of the Baptist church. During the two years of his stay there he was ever active and up and doing, and he emphasized his strenuous labors by the building of an addition to the church, a characteristic that he has displayed throughout his ministerial career. He then went to Terrell as pastor of the First church, remaining for six years, and during that time he was in-strumental in bringing about the building of a splendid brick structure for the Baptists of that place. He came to Paris in 1907 and here has been performing the most effective labor in behalf of the congregation, adding materially to the standing of the church by the erection of a fine new parsonage, reared at a cost of $5,000 and for the past fifteen years has been actively interested in ministerial work. Rev. Kendall was president of the Baptist Young People's Convention of Texas for five years and brought to bear an enthusiasm and zeal in the work of the society that was resultant in much good to the organization throughout the state. The furtherance of the cause in which he labors is the supreme interest of his life, and he has given liberally of his surplus and his earnings in the aid of the church aside from his own immediate charge in Paris. He has no fraternal relations, is a member of no clubs or social organizations, his membership in the Baptist church demanding his every energy, to the exclusion of all lesser interests.

On January 4, 1899, Mr. Kendall was married in Hopkinsville, Kentucky, to Miss Florence Rives, the daughter of R. F. and Virginia (Follard) Rives, the father a well known planter of that region. Mrs. Rives was a native of Virginia and the mother of four children. The children of Rev. and Mrs. Kendall are three in number. Robert Rives, the first born, died in infancy, while Ben Gray and William W. Kendall survive.

A. H. GEE. Few bankers of North Texas have been so long in the executive duties of their positions and have a more interesting career of progressive rise from lowly beginnings to commercial prestige and power than A. H. Gee, president of Pilot Point National Bank

Born December 25, 1849, in Huntington, Carroll country, Tennessee, the youngest in a family of fourtien children of J. H. and Ann W. (Hamkin) Gee, A. H. Gee is of Scotch-Irish stock, and of a family which has lived in Texas for fifty-five years. His father came from Virginia and his mother was a native of Maryland. The father located in West Tennessee when a young man, was a surveyor by profession, served as one of the early country clerks of his locality, and was so long bnorred by his fellow citizens that his term as country clerk continued for nearly thirty years. Early in his youth be was a member of General Jackson's staff in the war of 1812, and was present at the battle of New Orleans concluding that second struggle between the United States and Great Britain. Subsequently he furnished six sons for service in the Confederate army. The father moved to Texas in 1859, locating at Greenville, and thereafter lived retired. His death occurred about 1883 when at the good age of eighty-six years, and his wife passed away in the same year, but seventy-five years of age. Of their fourteen children there were ten sons and four daughters, and five are now living. Besides the Pilot Point banker, J. M. Gee and R. B. Gee live retired in Greenville; Mrs. I. N. Harrison, a widow, lives in Oklahoma City; and Mrs. Maggie G. Scott, wife of W. M. Scott, who is in the ginning business at Sherman.

A. H. Gee had a limited education in private schools at Greenville, Texas, being about ten years of age when the family came to this state. His opportunities as a youth were somewhat limited, but he is the type of man who succeeds in spite of handicaps and limitations. When sixteen years of age he was a clerk in a store, and at the age of twenty-one moved to Jefferson and found employment in the wholesale store of Wright & Clark. Early in 1872 Mr. Gee identified himself with the little locality of Pilot Point, and set up a dry goods store, which was continued with substantial results for twelve years. On January 1, 1884, Mr. Gee became one of the interested principals in the Pilot Point Bank, and served as its eashier until July, 1892. At the latter date the bank took out a national charter, and since that time Mr. Gee has been president. The vice-president is A. P. Crasgrove; the cashier is J. A. L. McParland. One special distinction of this bank is that since it took out a national charter more than twenty years ago there has not been a single change in its official managment, and there is perhaps no other national bank in Texas which has a similar record.

Politically Mr. Gee is a Democrat, voting and working for the good of his community and the welfare of his state. Fraternally his affiliations are with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythis, the Knights and Ladies of Honor, the Knights of the Maceehees, and he belongs to the Pilot Point Commer-eial Club.

On March 28, 1872, at Pilot Point, Mr. Gee married Miss Nettie Harrison, a daughter of W. R. Harrison, a merchant and prominent business man of that section for a number of years, but now deceased. Of the seven children born to Mr. and Mrs. Gee, three are now living, two sons and a daughter, as follows: H. W. Gee, with the Southwestern Surety Insurance Company at Demission, and assistant treasurer of that corporation; W. L. Gee with the International Fire Insurance Company at Port Worth; and Mrs. Vera Hellings, wife of J. M. Hellings, assistant cashier of the Interstate National Bank of Kansas City, Missouri. Mr. Gee by more than forty years' residence in Pilot Point is one of the veteran business men, and through his own substantial activities and influence has contributed in numerous ways to the advancement and solid welfare of the community.

HARVIN COOPER MOORE, M. D. A member of the medical profession of Houston since 1902, Dr. Harvin Cooper Moore has attained high distinction in the ranks of his calling as a specialist in skin and genito-urinary diseases. A true son of the Southwest and a descendant of distinguished Texans, he has passed his entire career within the confines of the Lone Star State, where the family has been widely and favorably known in various lines of endeavor for more than half a century. Dr. Moore was born at Crockett, Houston county, Texas, March 19, 1875, and is a son of Harvin W. and Georgia (Cooper) Moore. His father, a native of Alabama, came to Texas about 1860 and located at Crockett, where he entered upon the practice of law. Shortly after the close of the war between the North and the South, he was appointed district attorney of Houston county, a position he continued to hold for a number of years, His death occurred in Pebruary, 1912, when his community lost one of its best citizens and ablest attorneys. Harvin W. Moore married Miss Georgia Cooper, who was born in Georgia, a daughter of Leroy W. Cooper, who brough his family to Texas about 1855 and here became prominent in politics. He was a member of the Republican national committee, and, although a resident of a district which had a strong Democratic plurality, was repeatedly sent to the State Senate. Mrs. Moore still survives her husband and makes her home at Crockett.

Harvin Cooper Moore secured his early education in the public schools of Crockett, this being supplemented by attendance at the Southwestern University, where he was graduated in 1895, with the degree of Master of He then entered upon the study of medicine and, after some preparation, became a student in the medical department of Tulane University. On receiving his degree and diploma from that noted institution, in 1898, he began practice at Hallettsville, Lavaca county, Texas, where he continued four years, and in 1902 came to Houston and began a general practice. In 1906 the Doctor spent some time in post-graduate work in New York and Chicago, and since his return has specialized in skin and genito-urinary diseases, along which line he has won recognition and distinction. In this connection he is dermatologist and urologist to the Baptist Sanitarium of Houston, and is also lecturer on skin diseases to the Nurses' Training School. In 1912 he was president of the Harris County Medical Society, and still Medical Association, the Texas State Medical Association, the Southwestern Medical Association M ern Medical Society and the American Medical Association. He is also connected with the Alpha Kappa Kappa medical fraternity and the Knights of Pythias. He maintains well-appointed offices at No. 912 Union National Bank Building.

On December 23, 1902, Dr. Moore was married to Miss Mabel Peters, daughter of Walter H. and Elizabeth Peters, of Beeville, Texas. To this union there has been born one son: Harvin Cooper, Jr. The modern family home is located at No. 1314 Fairview avenue.

James Harvey Robertson. Until his death on March 2, 1912, one of the most eminent attorneys of Texas was the late James H. Robertson. For upwards of forty years he practiced law in this state, and long occupied a large sphere of usefulness and honor. In the Texas bar few men were better known or more highly appreciated for their services.

The Robertson family of which he was a rorpesentative held a particularly distinguished position in Tennessee history, in which state they were pioneers, among the founders of the Commonwealth. It was in the state of Tennessee that the late James H. Robertson was born, and came from there to Texas during the seventies. He started practice with his brother John W. Robertson of Austin, who had gained the rank of Colonel in the Confederate army and was one of Austin's prominent lawyers and one of the city's early mayors. James H. Robertson after a brief practice at Austin moved to Round Rock, where he opened an office for the general practice at law. Early in the eighties he moved to Austin, and soon gained a prominent position in the law. He was elected District Attorney and Governor Held, and the control of the control o ant cases in the courts, and among other interests intrusted to his charge was the management of the famous case in defense of H. Clay Pierce. He served as a member of the Thirtieth, Thirty-first and Thirty-second legislatures, and his name will continue to be long associated with important legislation of Texas during his membership in the legislature. He was the author of the Robertson Insurance Law, which required all life insurance companies doing business in Texas to invest in this state seventy five per cent of the reserve set aside for the payment of policies of insurance written in Texas. That was one of the pioneer laws of its time in the United States, and has been considered one of the most beneficent acts of legislation passed within recent years for the safeguarding of Texas resources. He was also author of the Anti-Lobby Bill. The late Judge Robertson married Miss Susie Marsh Townsend, who was born in Austin. They became the parents of six children, four of whom are now living, namely: John B. Robertson; Warren T., now retired from the practice of law; Mrs. Zeno C. Ross, of Fort Worth, Texas; and Margaret Robertson. Judge Robertson was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

John B. Robertson, son of the late Judge Robertson, and a successful young attorney with offices in the Little-field building at Austin, was born in that city July 14, 1882. He was educated in the public schools of the city, and in 1906 received his degree of LL. B. from the University of Texas. He at once took up practice, and has done much to win a distinctive place in the profession. He married Miss Julia M. Young, of Austin, Texas, and resides at 1500 West Sixth street.

BENJAMIN F. ROUNTREE. Another of the native citizens of this community who has fallen into line with the recent developments in the peach industry in this district is Benjamin F. Rountree, today one of the big producers in Franklin county of the famous Elberta peach. Thirty-five acres of one-time cotton land today represents his interest in growing fruit, and the success that was denied him while he directed his endeavors to other departments of agriculture has been his abundantly in recent years.

Benjamin F. Rountree was born near Mount Vernon, on May 1, 1866, and is a son of Wiley B. Rountree, concerning whom further mention is made elsewhere in this historical and hiographical work, so that further expression concerning the parentage of Mr. Rountree is not an essential feature of this sketch. In the country schools of Mount Vernon and vicinity Mr. Rountree received his early training in book lore, and he grew to manhood in close acquaintance with the duties of farm life, to which station he had been born. Upon reaching manhood, he felt an inclination to travel about some before he settled down definitely, and he spent a few seasons in rambling here and there, getting his bearings and learning something about the country. In Jefferson County, Arkansas, for two seasons he was employed as a clerk in a country store, and later was occupied as station agent at Linwood on the Iron Mountain Railway. With his return to Mount Vernon, he turned his attention to the farm again, continuing there until the autumn of 1891, when he went to Wise county, Texas, then on to Abilene, and finally to Jones county, Texas, in the latter place spending several months in the employ of his uncle, engaged in the prosaic task of grubbing mesquite. Here he eventually engaged in farming for himself and for five years he remained in that locality. It was while there that he married, and the serious business of his life actually began, his career as a home builder seeing its inception at that time.

Conditions then in West Texas, were, as now, unsuited to satisfactory general farming, and Mr. Rountree soon brought his family back to Franklin county and located at Purley, where his efforts were given to common farm ing until the fall of 1902, when he purchased a small place adjoining Mount Vermon and known as the Rutherford Farm. He entered with a right good will into the work of rejuvenating the old place and converting it into a live proposition as a fruit farm, planting a small orchard of Elberta peach trees, a crop that was then being exploited in Franklin county, and which gave promise of being a highly successful experiment. Mr. Rountree was among the first to test out the new idea, and he nursed his orchard anxiously but hopefully through the years of cultivation, pruning and worming, until a commercial orchard stood at his hand, ready and willing to bear luxuriantly each season. Encouraged by his experience, Mr. Rountree began adding to his orchard, until today he has thirty-five acres in bearing, and is continually adding to his operations in the peach in-

On July 3, 1892, Mr. Rountree married Miss Dollie Long, a daughter of the pioneer James Long, who came to Texas from McNairy county, Tennessee, in 1845, and starting his career with the birth of the new commonwealth. Mr. Long was born in 1820, and was a man with a fair education, who devoted his life to the farming industry. He settled in the Purley locality, then a part of Titus county, and during the Rebellion served as a soldier in Walker's Division of Confederate Troops, in Colonel Waterhouse's regiment. He was a comrade of Wiley B. Rountree, the father of the subject, and with that honored veteran, participated in many activities of the Civil war. James Long was a son of Ned Long and his wife, Mary (O'Neal) Long, both having numerous relatives in and about Henderson, Tennessee. The issue of Ned Long and his wife were James; Polly, the wife of Robert Junell, who died in Hopkins county, Texas; William, killed in an accident in Hunt county, Texas, leaving a family; Dorcas married Dr. A. M. Wommack, and died in Erath county, Texas, and Robert passed away unmarried. The father died in Wood county, Texas, at an advanced age, as did also the mother.

James Long married in young manhood, and his death occurred in 1901, his wife having preceded him some years before. He was a member of the Primitive Baytist church and a stanch Democrat all his life. Their children were as follows: Sarah, who died unmarried; Jennie married J. D. Templeton and died in Franklin county; Warren passed away here in 1913, leaving a family; Robert lives at Commerce, Texas, and Silas at Purley; Thomas was killed in Franklin county; Dollie married Mr. Rountree; Lulu is the wife of J. J. Nance and lives in Cleburne, Texas; and Parker is a resident of Franklin county, Texas. Mrs. Rountree was educated in the country schools, in the schools of Mount Vernon and in the State Normal at Huntsville, graduating there in 1886. She became a teacher in the common schools before graduation and followed it subsequently for a few years. She gave up the work with her marriage, and thereafter devoted herself to the care of her home and growing family, carefully watching over their progress in an educational way, but in 1912 she was again induced to take up graded work in the Mount Vernon schools, and has thus once more identified herself with educational work of the community, in which she has gained a splendid popularity and proven most unmistakably her fitness for that phase of work. Mr. and Mrs. Rountree have three children. Mary is a graduate of the Mount Vernon high school class of 1911. She has taught in the public schools since then, and is now adding to her musical training in preparation for the work of instructor in that branch, to which she has given a deal of attention all her life. Lucile completed her high school course in 1912, took a diploma in music, and is well equipped for service in that work. Linnie Scott is still attending high school.

The family are members of the Christian church, and Mr. Rountree has fraternal relations with the Woodmen of the World and the Southern Woodmen. He is a Democrat, stanch and firm in his political convictions, but has never offered himself for office.

CYRUS B. LUCAS. There are few citizens of Southwest Texas with so many important relations with the commercial and other substantial interests as Cyrus B. Lucas. Berclair in Goliad county owes more to Mr. Lucas' town-building and business enterprise than to any other one citizen. In recent years Mr. Lucas has also maintained a residence at San Antonio, where he is also known as one of the men of large means and high financial connections.

The basis of his prosperity was laid in the cattle industry, and among Texas stockmen he is one of the most prominent. For a number of years he was a member of the executive committee of the Texas Cattle Raising Association.

He has several good cattle ranches in this part of the State; Fair Oaks Ranch, near Berclair, late about half in Goliad and half in Bee County and consists of between firty-eight and sixty thousand acres; Buena Vista Ranch which embraces seventeen thousand acres of land in Live Oak County and fronts the Nueces river for several miles, and the St. Charles Ranch which contains about fifty-six thousand acres of land in Aransac County and Refugio County. He runs ten to twelve thousand head of Hereford cattle on these ranches and his cattle usually bring the top urice in the market.

his cattle usually bring the top price in the market. While a veteran cattleman, Mr. Lucas has followed the modern trend in that business, and through his individual enterprise has done a great deal for the development of agriculture in Southern Texas. His farm, which comprises a portion of the Fair Oaks Ranch, consists of four thousand acres, and adjoins the limits of the town of Berclair. His main erop is cotton, although corn and other staples of that locality receive attention. The farm is regarded as one of the model places in Goliad county, and represents a great deal of money invested by Mr. Lucas and is one of the most profitable enterprises. In its operation are employed the very best practices of modern agricultural science, and Mr. Lucas is one of the most of modern agricultural science, and Mr. Lucas is one of the men who understand how to make farming Bay.

And although Mr. Lucas is not the original founder of the town of Berelair, he is now at the head of its leading institutions. He built and owns the finest cotton gin in South Texas, operated under the name of the Berelair Gin Company. The Berelair State Bank was also organized principally with his capital, and he is president. He also established and is president of the Berelair Mercantile Company, the largest store of the town. In various other directions his influence has been instrumental in laying the foundation of a thriving community. Berelair is in Goliad county, close to the line of Bee county. Mr. Lucas is First Vice President of the Commercial National Bank of Beeville and also a director of the State Bank & Trust Company of San Antonio, and has various other interests in that city.

Though practically a lifelong resident of Texas. Cyrus B. Lucas is of Canadian birth, and of Irish and English parentage. He was born November 14th, 1856, at Stratford, Ontario, Canada, and his parents Richard M. and Louisa (Winter) Lucas, were both of English descent. His möther was born and reared in London, England. His father was born and reared in London, England and of the Mount Lucas branch of the several members of the Lucas family who emigrated to Ireland from England in the early part of the 17th Century. For part of the 17th Century. Ontario, and during the decade of the fifties came to the Southwest, locating in Goliad, Texas, and spent the rest of their lives in this state.

Mr. Lucas grew up in Goliad county, and his father's ranch, with which his boyhood associations are indentified, was located on Blanco Creek, five miles below the present town of Berelair. For a man whose youth was spent in the sixties and seventies, Mr. Lucas had more than ordinary schooling, and for his early education is principally indebted to Concrete College in DeWitt county, which at that time was under the direction of Professor John V. E. Corey, one of the most noted educators of his day in the state.

Although the Lucas family consider Berclair their real home, their fine residence on Lexington avenue in San Antonio is where they spend much of their time. Be-fore her marriage Mrs. Lucas was Miss Lizzie Scott, who was born and reared in Goliad county, and is related to some of the most prominent pioneer families in that section of the state. Her parents were J. J. and Ruth (Greenwood) Scott. The grandfather, Noah Scott, a native of Virginia, was a member of Austin's original colony, settling in Texas when it was a province of Mexico, and his children were born in the Texas Republic. The first settlement of the Scotts was near Bellville in Austin county, but they subsequently became early settlers in DeWitt county, still later moved to Bee county and after his marriage J. J. Scott located in Goliad county. On her father's mother's side Mrs. Lucas is a great-granddaughter of Thomas York, a Virginian, who was one of the first settlers in DeWitt county and was the founder of Yorktown in that county. The Greenwoods were also early settlers of the state, first locating at old Nacogdoches in the days of the Texas Republic. Mrs. Lucas received most of her education in Professor A. A. Brook's Academy in Goliad, a high-class educa-tional institution which prepared many Texans for worthy lives. Mr. and Mrs. Lucas are the parents of two children: Richard Pryor Lucas and Miss Lena Claire Lucas.

BRUCE C. WALLACE, M. D., who has been practicing medicine at LaRue, Texas, since 1892, is the senior physician of the southern end of Henderson county. He was reared in the Bethel community of Anderson county, where his parents made their permanent settlement on coming to Texas in 1870. His father, Col. George P. Wallace, died as tax collector of Anderson county in 1887, and is buried in the Bethel Cemetery. He was born in Perry county, Alahama, in 1829, and was ten years of age when he went to Mississippi while his father, Jones Wallace, who was a slaver and planter along the line of the Yokabockany river, at Kosciusko, Attala county, and died there in 1851, when aged about fifty years. Jones Wallace was an Alabaman of Scotch ancestry, and married a Miss Pierson, who passed away about the time that he died, their children being: Wil-liam J., who was a Confederate soldier of General Lee's army, came to Texas with Colonel Wallace, spent his life as a farmer, and died at LaRue, leaving no family; Martha, who died in Mississippi as the wife of Willis Wingo: Mary, who married William McMillen, and died in Texas; Col. George P., Virgil H., who was a Confederate soldier and spent his life in Attala county, Mississippi; Samuel, who was killed in battle as a Confederate soldier during the Civil War; John, who died in the same service; and Emily, who married O. T. Stephens, and died in Mississippi. William J. Wallace was lieutenant in his company, and belonged to Gen.

A. P. Hill's Corps.
Col. George P. Wallace was educated in the country school and was using slave labor as a planter when the Civil War broke across the country in all its thery. In 1862 he ealisted for service in the Confederate army, In 1862 he enlisted for service in the Confederate army and was commissioned Lieut. Col. of the Fortieth Nississippi Infantry, bis regiment being added to the army under General Pemberton, about Vicksburg. He took part in the engagements preliminary to the siege and was paroled at the surrender of that city to General Grant. Immediately after the surrender he was promoted to the rank of Colonel and took his regiment to Johnston's army and participated in the defense of Atlanta and in the 100 days of fighting of the Atlanta campaigu. At the battle of Peach Tree Creek he lost his left arm, and after spending some weeks in the hospital was taken by the wife of Capt. Henry Lamar to her home and cared for until sufficiently recovered to return to his home. Colonel Wallace was practically a bankrupt when peace was declared in 1865. He felt the financial ruin of the family keenly and decided upon taking up his residence in a new country to begin life over. Accordingly, he made the trip to Texas by rail and water and purchased what land his finances would permit, combining the industry of his body and mind and the virtue of his citizenship to the Bethel mind and the virtue of his criticismip to the bester neighborhood. His farm of several hundred acres was worked with free black labor, to which condition he seemed to adapt himself readily. He proved his sympathy for the ex-slave by providing him with the necessities of life from his plantation commissary, and requiring the negro to repay him in labor whenever he should need the work. At such a time he would ride about the neighborhood after supper, summoning help, and the next morning his yard would be filled with "free negroes" waiting for breakfast to start the day's business. He was wont to carry a hoe while overseeing the "hoe hands" and cut an occasional weed as a sort of accompaniment to the darky hoe. It was but natural that Col. Wallace should become active in politics. Having com-manded men in time of strife, he could be trusted to do so in times of peace. He was a Democrat, and was his party's candidate for tax collector of Anderson county in 1880, and was elected to that office, following which he moved to Palestine with his family, just hav ing gotten nicely started with his duties when he was stricken by death. Colonel Wallace was a Royal Arch Mason, and ever took an active interest in the work of that fraternal order, while his religious connection was with the Methodist church. In 1849, Colonel Wallace was married to Miss Mary A. Hodge, a daughter of Rev. Robert H. Hodge, whose career is mentioned fully on another page of this work. Mrs. Wallace died March 21, 1906, having been the mother of the following children: Eugene, who died in Mississippi at the age of nineteen years; Robert J., a resident of Palestine, Texas; Ella, who died when a young girl; Laura B., who married H. E. Nash, and died in LaRue, Texas; Isa M., who died unmarried; Roena, who also died single; Georgia, who married S. L. Love, and died in Oktoberov. Oklahoma; Lela B., who died in Anderson county, Texas, as Mrs. F. S. Jackson; Betty V., who died at the age of sixteen years; and Bruce C., of this review.

Bruce C. Wallace was born October 17, 1868, and secured his early educational advantages in the public schools. He assisted his mother in the work of the home farm at Bethel, Anderson county, until the age of twenty-one years, when he entered the I. & G. N. Railway Hospital, at Palestine, Texas, to receive his first lessous in his student work for the medical profession. He acted as a prescriptionist and student there for one year, following which he entered Tulane University, New Orleans, in October, 1890, and one year later passed the examination for the certificate of practice. Locating at Emhouse, Navarro county, Texas, he continued there until 1892, and then came to LaRue and completed his course in medicine, at the Kentucky School of Medicine, graduating in 1893. In 1900 Doctor Wallace took a post-graduate course in the New Orleans Polyclinic, and has never ceased to be a close and careful student of his ealling. He affiliates with the Henderson County Medical Society and the Texas State Medical Society, is widely and favorably known among his professional brethren, and through his success in a number of complicated cases has won the full confidence of the people of his adopted place. In the domain of agriculture, he has been responsible for bringing under cultivation some of the producing lands adjacent to LaRue. His home is of his own building and is a splendid example of the architect's art of rural home, a roomy, one-story frame structure, with ample galleries, standing upon high ground almost at the doors of the corporation. Its white exterior can be seen for miles. Doctor Wallace is vice-president of the state bank of LaRue, is a Methodist in his religious belief, and affiliates with that church.

He, like his father, is a Royal Arch Mason.

In February, 1896, Doctor Wallace was married to Miss Linna Campbell, daughter of Dr. S. E. Campbell, who settled at Fincastle, Henderson county, and practieed medicine for forty years. Two children have been born to Dr. and Mrs. Wallace, Bruce C., Jr., and Linna

Laura.

THOMAS VOLNEY MUNSON. The great majority of men are honored for their ability to confer benefits-for the wealth, or influence, or power that they control. The late Thomas Volney Munson was a man who was reverenced and beloved, not for what he had, but for what he was. Probably no man ever lived in Texas whose character attracted greater admiration, or whose removal caused more general regret than did his, and the memory of his pure life, of his gracious presence and kindly deeds lingers like a sweet fragrance in the air. In the science of horticulture his name will live for generations, for his contributions thereto were invaluable. He loved Nature, her trees, fields, fruits and flowers, and knew them well; and he loved his kind and was lavish in his benefactions to those, who, helpless, appealed to his sympathy. When he passed away, January 21, 1913, at his home in Denison, thousands mourned—not alone those who knew him personally, but those whom his life had impressed as a teaching.

Thomas Volney Munson was born on a farm near Astoria, Fulton county, Illinois, September 26, 1843, and was a son of William and Maria (Linley) Munson, the former a native of New Hampshire and the latter of Kentucky. Reared a farmer's son, he obtained his early education in the district schools, later went to the academy at Lewiston, subsequently took a course at the Bryant and Stratton Business College, and in order to make his way through the University of Kentucky boarded himself with his brother, the two doing their own cooking and practicing numerous small economies. This brother was William Benjamin Munson, now one of the leading capitalists of North Texas, the other or the leading capitalists of North 16838, the other brother and sisters being: Mrs. Louisa E. Douglass, of Tecumseh, Nebraska; J. T., a resident of Denison, Texas, and a member of the large real estate firm of Munson & Brother; and the Misses M. G. and T. M., of Point Loma, California. In 1870 Thomas V. Munson was married to Miss Ellen Scott Bell, of Lexington, Kentucky, and to this union there were born seven children: William Bell, of Denison; Mrs. A. A. Acheson, of Hugo, Oklahoma; Roscoe W., of Denison, Texas; Miss Neva, of Denison; and Mrs. N. C. Calvert, Mrs. W. C. Green and Miss Marguerite Munson, all of Denison.

Shortly after his marriage, Dr. Munson removed to the vicinity of Lincoln, Nebraska, from whence he came to Denison, and here all of his industrial, scientific and literary work was done. He established one of the most Interary work was done. He estantisticate one of the most famous vineyards in the South, besides building up a reliable and well-known nursery business. He became the acknowledged authority on the native wild grapes of North America, and Bulleton No. 3, Division of Pomology, United States Department of Agricultures of North America, which he wrote analysis of the North America, which he wrote analysis of the North America, published in 1890, is one of the most painstaking pieces of botanical work ever done in this country. It made the way for his later and greater work, "Foundations of American Grape Culture." His horticultural and seientific work in hybridizing and perfecting the American Vitis won for him a diploma from the French Government in 1888 and the decoration of the Legion of Honor, with the title of "Chevalier du Merit Agricole," for the aid he had rendered France in viticultural matters. He was a member of the American Academy of Science, the National Agricultural Association of France, vice president of the American Pomological Society, member of the American Breeders' Association, the Association for the Advancement of Science, and president of the Texas Horticultural Society. In 1903-4 he was a member of the Texas World's Fair Association. He was a member of the jury of awards at the St. Louis Exposition in 1904, an honorary member of the American Wine Growers' Association and also a vice president of the Society for Horticultural Science. The most complete botanical display of the whole grape genus ever made was prepared by Professor Munson and exhibited at the World's Columbian Exposition, Chicago, in 1893. This collection, now in the United States Department of Agriculture, will ever be a sterling record of Dr. Munson's wonderful patience, painstaking care and skill. His splendid book, "Foundations of American Grape Culture," is regarded as the most practical, complete and satisfactory account of the American grape yet issued, and is a lasting monument to his zeal, energy and scientific investigation. Such, in brief, is a cursory review of the life and some of the achievements of a man who has left his impress indelibly stamped upon the annals of science, literature and the hearts of his fellow men. It does not become the biographer unfamiliar with the science to which Professor Munson devoted his long and useful life, however, to write of his attainments. Such a task is more fittingly accomplished by one whose labors were conducted along the same lines, and for this reason we are allowed to quote from an article written for the Texas State Horticultural Society, which, in part, said as follows:

"Professor Munson is with us no more, and we sadly miss him. It is with mingled feelings of pleasure and regret that I respond to the assignment to present to the members of the Texas State Horticultural Society the short memoir of our friend and co-worker, the late T. V. Munson. Of pleasure we delight to revert to and honor his memory, who was a great man in natural en-dowments, in application and in grand achievements, a distinguished life member and one of the founders of this society, a true and faithful friend and a noble and useful citizen. Of regret because of his departure from "The ordinary extravagances of eulogy do not express our feelings and are not proper on this occasion, but the sacred converse of the life labors and of the departure of our near and dear friend, co-worker and benefactor. All of you who enjoyed the acquaintance and friendship of Brother Munson will bear me out that it was a rare pleasure to have known him in his beautiful home, in his remarkable trial grounds, orchards and vineyards, in our many horticultural and other conventions and in every form of intercourse. It was a rare treat indeed to walk with Mr. Munson in his trial grounds and have him unfold the fascinating, yet intricate, work of originating and improving the many thousands of new varieties which he has given to the world. The impression he made was of one thoroughly at home among his new creations, of one easily the complete master of the laws and knowledge of plant selection and reproduction. Not only was he a master of his line, to his great abilities were added the higher qualities of a courteous and cultured gentleman, kind and wise husband, warm and loyal friend and useful and broad-minded citizen.

"Mr. Munson was a deep and thorough student, going to the bottom of the subjects which he studied and practiced. We may well class him as a student and investigator with such men as Huxley, Agassiz, Tyndal, Joseph Cook, Professor Bailey and the like, going further really than they in that he utilized his knowledge of the deep things of nature in the production of new and rare plant creations, creations which should combine the best traits of the various parent plants which he chose to utilize in hybridization and in cross-pollina-

"The love for pomological experimentation and the achievement dominated the life of Professor Munson, and our horticulture of the present day and of all future time has received a great blessing in his life and labors. We are fortunate indeed that Mr. Munson chose horticulture as his life work, rather than the professions or finance, in any of which he might have shone with distinction.

"The fullness of the life and labors of Professor Munson will probably never be fully known. His great mind was a rare storehouse of knowledge. His library is rich, a treasurehouse. His observations and writings would fill volumes, which, while they would make a rich heritage for the horticulturists of comining generations, may never be published.

"These productions have been carefully classified and filed by him, with the aid of his son, William B. Munson. The writer has been accorded the privilege of entering the sacred precincts of his study, his great workshop, and of examining these treasures which he left. And let me suggest here that the Texas Horticultural Society, of which he was a founder and president for many years, combined with the American Horticultural Society, of which he was a life member, and the American Pomological Society, of which he was vice president for many years, would do well to appoint a joint committee to confer with his family as to the practicability of formulating such a biography of this great man which should contain or utilize much of the unpublished life work of Mr. Munson. One volume especially upon which he spent a great deal of time and careful thought and investigation is a thesis prepared on the "Native Trees of the Southwest," and which was done under the direction of the Department of Agriculture at Washington.

"'Mr. Munson's life work was, however, well done. He stated at his death that he was well satisfied with his life work. He had no regrets; he was ready to go. The results of his labor are a rich heritage to our horticulture. They constitute a monument to his great life more enduring than shaft of marble or granite, and increasingly blessed as time goes on. Thousands of carefully bred new varieties have been given to the world, especially of grapes, but also of many other fruits and ornamental plants, by him.

"Mr. Munson's last book, 'The Foundation of American Grape Culture,' is a fit and characteristic product of his life. It is a gem of classic literature, as well as rich and valuable to the viticulturist. It should be in the library of every home in the land. The writings of Mr. Munson are gems of deep thought and of exquisite culture, and are much sought after by the leading journals, both domestic and foreign. "On account of great services done by Mr. Munson in producing and furnishing phylloxera—resistent stocks with which to restore the phylloxera infested vineyards of France-and for other valuable services rendered the viticulture of France, he was given the highest honors that could be awarded, viz., membership in the Legion of Honor, with the title of Chevalier du Merit Agricole. Really, there is scarcely a vineyard in the world that is not now or will some time be benefited by the work of Mr. Munson. On account of the thesis on the 'Forests and the Trees of Texas,' as has already been mentioned, the Kentucky Agricultural College in 1883 conferred upon him the degree of Master of Science.

"Professor Munson was for many years an active member and honored officer of the American Pomological Society, of the American Horticultural Society, a member of the Texas State Horticultural Society, the Society of Horticultural Science, of the American Breeders' Association, and other scientific and useful organizations, and was everywhere highly esteemed for his deep learning, his philanthropic spirit and his practical utility. Everywhere Professor Munson will be greatly missed, for his words were those of wisdom.

"In his home life and in his own community, Mr. Munson shone with greatest lustre. In his own family he was loved to devotion by his wife and seven children, all of whom survive to honor his memory and lament his absence. In his own community Mr. Munson, while naturally retiring, never desiring any political preferment, yet had decided opinions in all public matters, and was always found on the side of conservative advancement, especially in matters of higher education. He was a valued member of the Denison school board for eight years.'

At the time of Professor Munson's death numberless expressions of admiration for the man and his work. and regrets for his departure, were sent by mail and telegraph from all parts of the world, the press all over the country paid him eulogies, and his funeral was one of the most largely attended that Denison or adjoining cities has known. From the beautiful suburban family residence just south of the city of Denison, the body was borne tenderly to the spacious auditorium of the XXI Club, which had been donated by his brother, J. T. Munson. There the funeral services were held before a congregation that filled the auditorium to overflowing. The services were simple and brief. Mr. R. L. Legate, a warm personal friend of the deceased, read the funeral oration, "Philosophias' Funeral Oration, Made Over His Own Grave," which had been written by Professor Munson when still in good health, and which he had requested to be read at his funeral. From the auditorium the funeral train moved to Fairview the auditorium the functal train moved to Faitzew Cemetery, where Mr. W. B. Munson, brother of the deceased, read the following beautiful tribute, with which we shall close this all too brief sketch:

"Dearest Brother: We now surrender you back to the bosom of the great universe into whose mysteries during life you so loved to delve. Your life has been an inspiration to your family and friends, and will be an example to all as the happy results of a life well spent. You fell asleep like a child on its mother's bosom, without a struggle, your every feature indicating the satisfaction of having earned the plaudits of your fellowmen. 'Well done, thou good and faithful servant.'

"Your heart was as loving and tender as the flowers you grew; your resolution in the discharge of duty as strong as the oak and as firm as steel; your energy was tireless, your patience most wonderful; your character and conduct spotless and clean; your love of nature was only surpassed by your love of man. You found your greatest happiness in the bestowment of lasting benefits upon your fellowmen.

"You will live in the moral fibre of your posterity, in the impress your life has made upon those who knew you, in the finer fruits of vines you created, and in the wider intelligence your writings have wrought. The world will be better and happier for your having lived.

J. REX STEGALL. As cashier of the Texas State Bank of Farwell, Parmer county, and as a large cattle owner, J. Rex Stegall is in close touch with the activities of his locality and is representative of the younger sons of the "Lone Star State."

Mr. Stegall was born at Vernon, Wilbarger county, Mr. Stegall was born at version, variety of Texas, September S, 1889, and is a son of John A. and Mary E. (Lafferty) Stegall. On the paternal side he comes of Scotch Irish descent. The Stegalls were early settlers of Tennessee, and J. J. Stegall, the grandfather of J. Rex, was a veteran of the Civil war, having rendered service in the Confederate Army. John A. Stegall was born in Tennessee, spent his early years in that State, and in 1877 came to Texas and settled down to ranching. For seven years he was general manager of a ranch. During that time be gained a wide acquaintance throughout Ford and Wilbarger counties and proved himself to be made out of the kind of material they needed for sheriffs. As the choice of the Democrats, he was elected Sherif of the counties of Ford and Wilbarger, both at that time being under one government, and for eight years be filled that responsible position, with credit to himself and to the entire satisfaction of his constituents. On his retirement from public office, he engaged in the live stock business on his own account in Ford County, and he is still identified with this industry, now being the leading and controlling spirit in a company composed of twenty-six members. This company owns seventy-six sections of land besides having large leased holdings. They have approximately 30,000 and a daughter of J. A. Lafferty, a loncer settler of Hall county, this State. She is the mother of eight children, of whom J. Rex is the second. The parents are identified with the Methodist Church and have reared their children in its faith.

The educational training of J. Rex Stegall was received at Clarendon, Texas, and Fayetteville, Arkansas. He spent his boyhood vacations on the range, where he thoroughly learned the stock business, and following his graduation at Clarendon College, he engaged in the eattle business on his own responsibility. He is still interested in the business and is the owner of a herd which numbers no less than 2,300 head. In the mean time, in April, 1907, young in years but with training and ability to match the work, he became cashier of the Texas State Bank, of which he is a stockholder, and this position he has since filled.

Politically, young Stegall has followed in his father's footsteps, and ever since he has been a voter he has taken an active part in Democratic politics in his locality. He has a membership in the church in which he was reared, and he enjoys fraternal relations with the B. P. O. E. and the F. and A. M., his work in the Masonic Order including the Royal Arch degrees, Mr. Stegall is unmarried.

CECLI A. KEATING. In the life of affairs of Texas as a whole, Mr Keating's name is best known as a whole-sale dealer in agricultural implements and as a manufacturer of plows, having for many years been head of one of the large industries of Dallas, and he is also well known for his work, continued for more than twenty years, in connection with the great project of canalizing the Trinity river and converting it into a navigable stream from Dallas to the Gulf.

resident of Dallas for nearly forty years, Cecil A. Keating was born at Halifax, Nova Scotia, March 20, 1850, and comes of English and Scotch families long prominent in the military and civil life of England and her colonies. Mr. Keating's ancestors were at different times stationed in India, Ceylon, the West Indies, South America, Central America, Canada and elsewhere. William Henry Keating, bis father, was born September 26, 1807, in Manchester, England, a son of John and Ann (Hall) Keating. John Keating was a son of Captain John Keating, of the British army, who in 1758 was married in North Carolina to Mary Wayne, whose uncle was Anthony Wayne, the brilliant American solder, Grandather John Keating was married in North Carolina to Mary Wayne, whose uncle was Anthony Wayne, the brilliant American solder, Grandather John Keating was merical in North Carolina to Mary Wayne, whose uncle was Anthony Wayne, the brilliant American solder, Grandather John Keating was merical to the state of the s

Captain Johnston took his family to Halifax, Nova Scotia, where he served with his regiment and died in

William Henry Keating studied law at Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, was admitted to the bar in 1828, for a number of years held the office of judge of probate in the county of Yarmouth, also master in chancery, represented the United States government as consular agent, and in 1839 was appointed deputy provincial secretary at Halifax, filling that place with distinction until 1863. He then was made Register of Deeds of Halifax, and continued a man of prominence in public affairs in Nova Scotia until 1887, when he moved to California and died in that state in 1898.

At Yarmouth, July 17, 1837, William H. Keating married Eliza Walford Forbes. She was born February 25, 1819, at Gibraltar and died in California, December 15, 1902. Her father, Captain Anthony Somersall Van Crosen Forbes; born in 1792 at St. Kitts in the West Indies, and educated in England, was given a commission in the English army, was stationed at Annapolis Royal in Nova Scotia, later was ordered to Europe to take part in the campaign against Napoleon, and after the battle of Waterloo returned to Nova Scotia, and was later in command at Gibraltar, where his daughter Eliza W. was born. He finally returned to Nova Scotia, and after retiring from the army became collector of customs at Yarmouth, where he died in 1838. The Forbes family ancestry is traced back to Salvathius Forbes, who married Moravilla, daughter of Gregory the Great, King of Scotland. Captain Forbes was married in Nova Scotia in 1815 to Susan Gloriana Davoue, a daughter of Frederick Davoue, a British citizen of Huguenot descent, who had come to America and settled in New York, but

The enterprise displayed by his forefathers as soldiers and in civil affairs was transmitted to Cecil A. Keating. His youth was spent in Nova Scotia, among the scenes made famous by Longfellow in his "Evangeline" and for a time he followed the sea. In 1870 he went to Chicago, was there during the great fire of 1871, and as an employe of a large implement factory received his first experience in the business which he made the foundation of his success in Texas. Mr. Keating came to Dallas in 1875, soon after the first railroad had reached that city, and engaged in business under the name of Stone & Keating in a canvas tent at the corner of Elm and Jefferson streets, where subsequently arose the large buildings housing his implement company. In 1882 he bought out his partner and continued the business under the name of C. A. Keating until 1884, when it was in-corporated as the Keating Implement and Machine Company, for many years the largest establishment of its kind in the southwest. In 1905 Mr. Keating retired from the active management and his brother, H. S. Keating. assumed the personal supervision of the company's affairs. Mr. Keating was also the founder and president of the Texas Disc Plow Company, organized in 1894, to manufacture and put on the market a type of plow then new and known as Disc plows, for which he bought the patent. It was the Disc plow that revolutionized plowing in the dry lands of Texas, and made plowing by steam or other than horse power practical and successful. The business grew rapidly, and the demand for the Disc plows caused shipment all over the United States and many foreign countries. In 1898 northern plow fac-tories appropriated the disc principle, and Mr. Keating had a long drawn out litigation in the United States courts to defend his rights under the patent laws. Mr. Keating withdrew also in 1905 from the active management of the Disc Plow Company, which also came under the active control of his brother.

As a business man and employer Mr. Keating came into direct personal relations with his subordinates and the estimation in which he was held was well evidenced when he retired from the management of the Keating Implement house. His old employes, some of whom had been under him for almost thirty years, presented him with a handsome silver loving cup as a token of their admiration. Mr. Keating is a widely known, public-spirited citizen, and for many years has been a foremost figure in the growth and development of Dallas as the commercial metropolis of the southwest. He took an active part in the Dallas Fair, was vice-president of the association and in 1904 became president. That was a critical year in the association's history, but with his own financial backing established the Fair on such a secure basis that during the following year it returned a profit, and has ever since been one of the great institutions of the southwest. In Dallas he is especially well known for his long years of unselfish work and financial aid in connection with the Trinity river pavigation project, With Commodore Duncau and T. W. Griffiths he was the leading spirit in the operations of the Trinity River Navigation Company, organized in 1891 to promote the improvement of that stream as a waterway. He was honored as president of the company year after year until it was no longer necessary to keep up such an organization by reason of the United States government having taken active charge of the improvement. Through the efforts of this organization the plan received approval from Congress in 1902, and since that time about a million dollars has been appropriated for the deepening and canalization of the Trinity river When this work is finished it will convert the channel. Trinity river into a canal throughout a distance of five hundred miles from Dallas to the Gulf, so as to afford water transportation to cities lying along that stream giving them the advantage of lower rates, due to the possession of a navigable water course.

In 1877 at Kankakee, Illinois, Mr. Keating married Miss Nellie C. Joy. Their son, William, died in Colorado in 1908, at the ago of twenty-two, and the two living children are: Ceell Phillips and Miss Eliza C. Mr. Keating was married in 1914 to Mrs. Ruth Evelyn Shaw, of Covington, Kentueky, widow of Judge William McD. Shaw, and devotes his time to his real estate and other investments and in traveling.

HORACE G. JOHNSTON. Through his long official connection with the American Well & Prospecting Company of Corsicana, Mr. Johnston has been a very prominent factor in the oil regions of the southwest, particularly in Texas. He is president and general manager of the company, which is one of the largest concerns of the kind in the world, and its connections and operations are world-wide, Corsicana being only the business headquarters for operations which extend to different sections of this country, and to practically all the continents of the world. Horace G. Johnston has been a resident of Texas since 1891. In that year he went to Marlin to drill the deep well for artesian water which uncovered the hot-water area of that section, and which has brought fame to Marlin as a bathing resort. When the company's work was finished at Marlin, Mr. Johnston moved his tools to Corsicana, and drilled the deep well at the State Orphans' Home, and later a well for the city. It was at that time that signs of oil were discovered that led to the company's prospecting for oil, and soon afterwards oil was discovered in paying quantities, resulting in the opening up of the great Corsicana oil and gas fields. In the work of development about Corsicana, the American Well and Prospecting Company took not only the leading part, but for a number of years has been a very important factor. It has sent its drills into the oil sands at various points in the territory about Corsicana, and its operations are still extensive in that viThe American Well & Prospecting Company, of which Mr. Johnston is president and manager, was organized in Kansas in 1886 at which time Mr. Johnston associated himself with Mr. Akin and others, all of whom are yet members of the firm. As a result of their oil discoveries a plant in Corsicana for the manufacturing of deep-well tools, supplies, and other paraphernalia used in oil well operation. In 1896 the company opened a small factory employing a half dozen men, and with the gradual increase of successive years, this factory is now one of the largest local industries, with one hundred men on its payroll, and with a shop and storage house in Bartless wille, Oklahoma, another at Los Angeles, and one at Houston, Texas. They also maintain an agency at London, England, one at Baku, Russia, and their goods go abroad to every territory where oil has been found, to Japan, Russia, the Balkan country, to South America, to Mexico, and elsewhere. The annual business of the firm is about six hundred thousand dollars a year.

Mr. Johnston got into the drilling business without premeditation in Kansss in 1886. He was in central Kansas when the salt beds were discovered there, and soon afterwards became one of the organizers of the American Well and Prospecting Company, which drilled at Hutchinson, Kingman, Ellsworth, Lyons and Little River, their developments covering a period of five years, and including the gas fields about Paoli and Cherryvale.

Mr. Johnston had prepared for his profession as an engineer in the Greenshurg Seminary in Ohio, and while in his native state he assisted in the building of a road from Cauton to Beech City. He went to Kansas in 1832 as a civil engineer to do railroad construction work, and had charge of construction for a part of the Missouri Pacific System from Salina west. While he was connected with that work, twenty miles of track were built in sixty days, and that was considered one of the remarkable feats of railway construction in that early time.

Horace G. Johnston was born near Akron, Summit county, Ohio, April 15, 1851. His early years were spent on a farm. His father, Alexander Johnston, settled in Summit county in 1814, when a boy of six years, the grandparents having immigrated from Center county. Pennsylvania, becoming among the first to locate in that section of Western Reserve of Obio. Alexander Johnston belonged to a family of colonial settlers in Pennsylvania, and the first ancestors came from the north of Ireland. Alexander Johnston was educated much better than the average young men of his time, and became a pioneer teacher in Summit county. Among his pupils was the father of Mrs. Thomas A. Edison. After some years of teaching Alexander Johnston took up farming, and early in life had an official career. In politics he was first a Whig, and was the first man elected to the office of recorder of Summit county. Later he represented his county in the lower branch of the legislature. For many years he was a factor in politics in that part of Ohio. His death occurred in 1896, after surviving his wife some years. He married Lavinia Thursby, a daughter of William Thursby, who had come to Ohio, from Williamsport, Pennsylvania. The children of Alexander Johnson and wife were: Horace G.; Isaac N., of Pasadena, California; and Miss Anna M., who occupies the old homestead near Akron.

In Navarro county, Texas, in December, 1901, Horace G. Johnston married Miss Genevieve Chancey, a daughter of Thomas Chancey of East Texas. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Johnston are Anna Ellen, born in 1904; Elliott Alexander, born in 1906; and Horace G., Jr. Mr. Johnston has membership in the American Society of Civil Engineers, and in polities is a Republican.

WILLIAM D. HAYNIE. It was the fortune of the late William D. Haynie to possess the power of accumulating wealth and managing large resources with almost invariable success. His genius in this sphere was accompanied by corresponding attributes of public spirit and worthy influence. During his lifetime he was recognized as a philanthropist, but his widow by her benetactions has enriched the usefulness of several important religious and educational institutions of the state.

For many years the late William D. Hannie was a prominent factor in the industrial and financial affairs of Navarro county, and died at his home in Rice, October 14, 1906. He had come to this locality before the building of the Houston & Texas Central Railway, and from 1867 until his death was active in the affairs of the community.

William D. Haynie was born in Tipton county, Tennessee, April 29, 1837, and came to Texas as a pioneer with his father, George Haynie, in 1847. The family settled at Tchuacana Hills, where his father died about 1856. William D. Haynie became an active factor in the management of the estate, and grew up on the frontier, as a boy mingling with the Indians who came and went and maintained friendly relations with the early settlers. His hardy training and experiences gave him a vigorous constitution and a zest for practical business It was with little education except such as was supplied by country schools and he subsequently profited by observation and reading. He was still a young man when the war between the states broke out. From 1860 to 1862 he had been a merchant with a small store at the Cotton Gin, in partnership with Mr. Joseph Lynn. In 1861 another store was opened at Chatfield, but Mr. Haynie closed out when the call to arms became too urgent to resist. On March 18, 1862, he joined a company in Colonel Bates' regiment, and himself took a squad of thirty men to Galveston for organization. He was made a first lieutenant of his company, and after considerable service around Velaseo as a coast guard he entered the commissary department and continued in Louisiana and Texas until the end of the war.

His return to civil life found him without resources, and like many others he established himself as a stock man. Few of the old-time cattlemen in that section of the state prospered so steadily as the late William D. Haynie. He had a faculty of making everything he touched prosper, and while enriching himself he did not neglect his fellow men and his community. As the population of the country multiplied and the demand for farm land increased he foresaw the time when the open range stock industry must move on, and prepared to get out of the business. He sold his cattle to the Matador Cattle Company, and turned his attention to the real estate and loan business and to banking at Corsicana. He aided in promoting the Corsicana National Bank and was one of its officers at the time of his death. Associated with others he organized the Corsicana Building & Loan Association, a concern which went into voluntary liquidation before his death. The late Mr. Haynie was a man of extraordinary business sense and never indulged in speculation, making investments where the security was unquestioned and accumulating an estate regarded as princely by those who knew his history from the close of the war.

Mr. Havnie was an ardent Democrat and his activity extended to the attendance upon every state convention after reconstruction days, though he never sought political honors for himself. At the age of twenty-one he had affiliated with the Masonic Order and kept in good standing all his life. He was a firm Christian, and filled some office in the Methodist Church South during most of his mature life. Physically he was a man six feet two inches high and weighed over two hundred pounds. He was deliberate in his movements and in his speech, and his personality was somewhat distinguished.

On February 7, 1860, at the country home of I. B.

On February 7, 1860, at the country home of I. B. Sessions, Mr. Haynie married Miss Viola E. Sessions. Her father had come to Texas in 1846 and to Navarro county in 1847. Mrs. Haynie was born on the line of Chickasaw and Choctaw counties in Mississippi, April 18, 1844, and as a child when she came to Texas grew up within five miles of the town of Rice. Her education was finished in Dr. N. P. Modrell's school in Corsicana. Her married life was devoted to her husband and to her neighbors and religious affairs. She and Mr. Haynie never had any children, and they gave their time and means to the welfare of others. Mrs. Haynie has been one of the benefactors of higher education in Texas, and contributed substantial amounts to various colleges from time to time. Her chief interests centered in the Southern Methodist University of Dallas, to which she donated twenty-five thousand dollars for the endowment of a school of theology. She gave more than two-thirds of the money for the building of the new Haynie Memorial Methodist Church, South, of Rice, which was constructed at a cost of twenty-two thousand dollars. The various institutions to which she has contributed are the Southwestern University of Georgetown, the Texas Women's College of Fort Worth, the Old Preachers' Home at Georgetown, now called the Haynie Home, the Virginia K. Johnson Home for the Rescue of Delinquent Girls in Dallas, and to the Corsicana Young Men's Christian Association

WASTIER OWEN WASTINGTON. The technical professions have grown in importance in proportion to be development and complexity of modern industrial ban and have consequently drawn into their ranks some of the ablest young men now found in professional and business affairs. It is as Civil Engineer that Walter Owen Washington is best known; and during the past ten years has been concerned with much important work, at first chiefly in railway engineering, and latterly in independent practice throughout Southwest Texas, with main offices at San Antonio, with a definite reputation as an irrigation engineer. Mr. Washington represents one of the older families of Texas, and one which in earlier generations centributed soldiers, planters, business men and able citizens to the state.

Walter Owen Washington was born near Austin, Texas, September 24, 1883, and his parents, Thomas Pratt and Ella J. (Maxwell), are still living in that city. His father was born in Travis county, of which Austin is the county seat, in 1856. Grandfather Thomas Pratt Washington, Sr., who was one of the pioneer settlers of Travis county, locating there in the early forties, was a colonel in the local militia during the Mexican war. This Texas pioneer was a native of Virginia, and after a few years' residence in Alabama, where he married, came to Texas. Colonel Thomas P. Washington's grandfather was Henry Washington, a brother of Colonel William Washington, who gained his title during the Revolutionary war, and whose family in a still earlier generation produced the ancestors from which George Washington sprang. Ella J. Maxwell is a diagniter of the late Dr. A. C. Maxwell. Achingdons which George Washington sprang. Ella J. Maxwell is a diagniter of the late Dr. A. C. Maxwell with the product of Virginia in the Confederate army during the war between the states. The old Washington plantation, about twelve miles below Austin, is one of the oldest homesteads in Travis county, and a place of much local historic interest.

Mr. W. O. Washington began life with the distinct advantage of a good family heritage and also with a good liberal education. From the public schools of Travis county he entered the University of Texas at Austin, spent four years there, and was graduated with the degree of Civil Engineer in the class of 1904. His first experience was in general and railroad engineering in both the United States and Moxico, and for some time he was one of the aggineering staff with the Harriman railroad lines in Old Mexico. In 1910 Mr. Washington established an independent practice as engineer at San Antonio, and is a member of the well-known firm of Whiteaker & Washington, with offices in the Moore build-Whiteaker & Washington, with offices in the Moore building. Their practice is of a general nature, and their services have been largely employed and their reputation is chiefly based upon their skill and success in Irrigation and Highway Engineering works. As an indication of Mr. Washington's standing in his profession it should be noted that he is an Associate Member of the American Society of Civil Engineers. This honor is extended only to those who have a recognized degree of proficiency in the profession. He is a member of the National Geo-graphic Society, is a York Rite Mason, a member of Een Hur Temple of A. A. O. Nobles of the Mystic Shrine and takes an active interest as member of several omine and makes an active increase as member of several other organizations, civic, professional, and religious. In 1910 Mr. Washington married Miss Bernice Haskell of Greenville, Texas. Mrs. Washington was also a student of the University of Texas. Their children are Elizabeth Emma, born December 5, 1911, and Walter

Owen, born January 24, 1914.

JOHN BURROW HAYNIE. One of the men whose talent for finance and administrative business has been developed to unusual success is John Burrow Haynie of Rice, who has been a factor in the business of that place since 1875. After locating there he soon became inter-ested in merchandising and other features of its business affairs.

Mr. Haynie moved to Rice from a farm at Eureka in Navarro county, where he had settled about the time he reached manhood. He was a child of seven years when he accompanied his father to Texas in 1847 and which as accompanied his latel to I easy in 1977 and settled at Tehnacana Hills. At that time Navarro county was on the frontier, and Indians still rosmed over its hills and prairies. In that vicinity, as one of the pioneers, that vicinity, as one of the pioneers, the stock raiser until he died about 1856, past fifty years of age. George W. Haynie was born in Tipton county, Tennessee, had about the educational advantages of the average pioneer, and brought his family to Texas in wagons. With the rest of his equipment he brought in wagons. With the test of the coupling as observed as few negroes, and during his brief stay in this state was a man of industry. George W. Haynie married Sidney Lynn, who died at Eureka when past sixty years of age. Their children were: Lewis B., who was a merchant and farmer and land man and died at Rice leaving a family; William D., who died at Rice, an ex-Confederate soldier, a farmer and stock man; Amanda, who married Mr. Robert Tyus and died at Pine Bluff, Arkansas; John B.; and Mary Jane, widow of George Mayo of Kerens.

John B. Haynie came to man's estate with a fair education and with an experience as a soldier in the great war between the states. In March, 1862, he had entered the Confederate army in Captain Melton's Company of Bates' regiment, and was a guard along the Gulf coast. Most of the time he and his men were sta-tioned at Velasco, and was frequently shelled by the enemy, and he saw more or less of the turmoil of war until its end. His company disbanded at Velasco, but at the time Mr. Haynie was at home on detailed service. After the war he took up civil life as a modest farmer and stock man. His prosperity has been won from a starting point at zero, and hard work was the factor that counted most in his early life. He bought his first land during the war at Eureka with Confederate money, and continued to prosper in that vicinity until his re-moval to Rice. About Rice he acquired a large amount of land, and a great deal of this has been brought under cultivation with crops of both grain and cotton. At the present time his ownership extends to several valuable farms in the Rice community. Altogether his efforts have brought under cultivation about nine bundred acres, and on his farms and in Rice he has erected twenty houses. His agricultural interests give employment to about Farming has not been his sole vocation. Mr. Havnie engaged in merchandising after coming to Rice, built a cotton gin and operated it for several years, and finally disposed of these interests. About eight years ago he engaged in banking, and is now president of the First State Bank and was one of its active managers for some time. He is also interested in the lumber business.

Mr. Haynie has not taken an active part in politics, is a Democrat, and while originally he did not favor Wilson is very much pleased with the president's success. A member of no fraternity, he has his religious connections with the Cumberland Presbyterian church. On November 14, 1861, Mr. Haynie married Miss Mary A. Jones, a daughter of J. C. Jones, a northern man who came to Texas from Arkansas, was a farmer and extensive stock man, and died at Eureka, where he had settled during the decade of the forties. Mrs. Haynie was born in Arkansas in August, 1843, and died February 15, in Arkansas in August, 1843, and died February 15, 1914. Their children are: Mary Elizabeth, who married R. S. Clark of Rice and has the following children: Balfour; Mary B., wife of A. V. Brown of Rice; Manford; Ruth, who married Mr. Cash; Cora; and John. The second child of Mr. Haynie is Jodie, wife of The Hugh Sloan of Rice. The roungest child is Viola, wife of John T. Fortson of Rice.

MITCHELL S. CLAYTON. A native son of Navarro county, Mr. Clayton has here served as county sheriff and is now county statistician, with residence and official headquarters in the city of Corsicana. He has been identified with the agricultural and stock industries of the state. He is a scion of one of the sterling pioneer families of Texas, has well upheld the honors of the name which he bears and is entitled to specific recognition in this publication.

Mitchell Steele Clayton was born on a farm near the village of Kerens, Navarro county, Texas, on the 18th of September, 1854, and he is a son of Joseph A. and Amanda (Poole) Clayton, both of whom were born in Tennessee. Joseph A. Clayton first came to Texas in 1835, as a youth of seventeen years, and it was his to live up to the full tension of life on the frontier. He soon became a member of General Sam Houston's army, organized for the purpose of gaining independence to Texas, which became a republic as a result. As a private soldier he took part in the historic battle of San Jacinto, and for his services as a soldier he was given a grant of land, but when he made a permanent settlement it was not on this land but in the vicinity of the old town of Washington, about 1847. He did some service for the United States in the Mexican war, and also did much scouting in the early Indian service, besides working effectively with surveying parties during the formative period of statehood in Texas. He finally returned to Tennessee, where he wedded Amanda Poole, an orphan girl, and he then came again to Texas and located near old Washington, where they resided until 1852, when old washington, where they resided until 1502, when they settled near Kerens, Navarro county. Both died at Chaffield, this county, in the year 1873, the father passing away August 1, and the mother July 31. At the outbreak of the Civil war Joseph A. Clayton enlisted in the Confederate army in Texas. He was reared in Marshall county, Tennessee, and received but limited educational advantages in his youth. His alert mentality enabled him to overcome this early handicap and he became a man of broad information and mature judgment. He was a close student of the Bible and while not formally identified with any religious body his faith was in accord with the tenets of the Baptist church. He was both a Mason and an Odd Fellow and he assisted in the organization of some of the early lodges of these fraternities in Navarro county, including the first of the latter order in the county, the same having been established at Chatfield. Of the children the eldest was Ida C., who became the wife of James P. Fortson and who died at Rice, Navarro county; Mary E., who became the wife of William H. Bachman, died in Dallas county; Joseph H. and Hervey A. are still residents of Navarro county; J. Roger is at Tamalipas, Mexico, where he is a farmer by vocation; Dixie B. is the wife of James M. Kead and they likewise reside at Tamalipas, Mexico; Jennie P. became the wife of Dr. Edward Brown, and her death occurred at Merkel, Texas; and Mitchell S., or this review, was the third in order of birth.

Mitchell S. Clayton was reared to adult age at Chatfield, Navarro county, where he availed himself of the advantages of the country schools. His father was engaged in the raising of sheep and horses and upon attaining to his legal majority Mitchell S. turned his attention to the same line of industry, with which he continued to be identified until 1887, the sheep business until that time having been a profitable enterprise in Texas. With the curtailment of the open range profits naturally diminished, and Mr. Clayton found it expedient to curtail his stock of sheep to a small limit, finally retiring entirely from the business. He passed a part of his early manhood in the cattle country of western Texas, where he remained from 1874 to 1878 and where he worked as a cowboy for representative cattle men of Denton, Cooke, Grayson and Clay counties. Upon his return to Navarro county he engaged in the sheep business, as already noted. Upon his retirement from this field of industry he engaged in farming, upon a part of the family estate, and he brought under effective cultivation 150 acres of land, besides making additions to his estate, by the purchase of adjoining land, the improvements made by him having been of excellent order. He remained on his farm until 1892, when he was elected peace officer of Precinct No. 2 and established his residence in the village of Chatfield, where he remained until his election to the office of sheriff, in 1908, when he removed to Corsicana, the judicial center of the county and his present place of abode. He served as constable for ten years, during which time and for a number of years thereafter he held also commission as deputy sheriff of the county. He was elected county sheriff in 1908 and re-elected in 1910, thus holding the office four years. His administration was efficient and acceptable and he retired from the shrievalty in November, 1912. A few months later he was appointed cotton statistician for Navarro county, a position in which he is required by the government to keep an accurate record of the number of cotton baled ginned in the county, the amount of cotton consumed by the Corsicana cotton factory, stocks of cotton retained in warehouses, amount of seed crushed and statistics concerning production in the various cotton-seed oil mills of his district, and other incidental data, ten gin reports being made by him to the census bureau in Washington between September and March of each year.

Mr. Clayton is a staunch supporter of the principles of the Democratic party, and he is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He has a host of friends in his native county and as a citizen he maintains a liberal and public-spirited attitude.

In August, 1885, Mr. Clayton wedded Miss Georgia Pannill, doubler of Major Henry Pannill and Maggie (Jones) Pannill, henry Pannill and Maggie (Jones) Pannill, her father having come to Texas from Virginia and having been an officer of the Confederate service in the Civil war. Mr. and Mrs. Clayton became the parents of two children,—Maggie E., who is the wife of Charles H. Highnote, of Corsicana, and Joseph P., who died in 1912, at the age of seventeen years.

EYERETT OSCAR VAUGHAN. A veteran railway man, learning telegraphy in his native Virginia and coming to Texas over thirty years ago. Everett O. Vaughan is the agent of the Houston & Texas Central Railway at Corsicana, and has lived in this state since 1882.

Mr. Vaughan came to Texas direct from Halifax county, Virginia, at South Boston in which county he grew up. He was born in Amelia county, Virginia, February 2, 1858, and his childhood was spent in town. His father, Adolphus Vaughan, a mechanic, was also born in Amelia county, about 1828, and spent his time as a saddler, and died in 1878. The father married Mary Haskins, who died before her husband. Their children were: Albina, who married Hiram Carter and lives in South Boston, Virginia; Edgar H., who died in Virginia; James O., of Paces, Virginia; Henry T., who died in Navarro county, Fexas, leaving one child; Ross, who married W. H. Shepherd of South Boston, Virginia; Everett O.; Joseph, who died at South Boston; and

Aaron H. of South Boston. Everett O. Vaughan was educated in the public schools and as a boy learned telegraphy with the old Richmond and Danville Railway Company at South Boston, During his residence in his native state he continued in the employ of that company, and while there met the young woman to whom he gave his heart and hand, and after their marriage they came to Corsicana in 1882. Mr. Vaughan at once began work as an operator with the Houston & Texas Central Railway Company. After five years in that position, employed by both the Houston & Texas Central and the Cotton Belt, he was transferred to the Missouri, Kansas & Texas and Texas & Pacific Railway Company's joint office in Dallas. After a year there, in 1892, he returned to Corsicana and resumed work with the Houston and Texas Central. He was operator, bill clerk, car clerk, eashier and agent, and in 1911 succeeded E. L. Gibson, deceased, in the office of 1911 succeeded F. I. Chromy utcases, in Texas.

Mr. Vaughan has never identified himself with official affairs in Corsicana, and has given all his time to railroad work and his family. He and his wife are members of the Baptist church. On June 11, 1882, he married Miss Blanche Mullins, daughter of Seth G. Mullins, a Baptist minist church. On June 11, 1882, he married Miss Blanche Mullins, daughter of Seth G. How, James Henry McCullooft. No more pronounced study in contrast is found available among the upbuilders of Navarro county than that presented in the career of James Henry McCulloch, mayor of Dawson. Mr. McCulloch's present status is represented by the possession of large and important business boldings, by his prominence in the business and public life of his section, and by the general high esteem in which he is held by his fellow critzens. When he first came to Texas he did not even own a horse with which to till his land. Between his labor-enslaving and poverty-clouded days and those of the prosperous present have occurred many varied and of the prosperous present have occurred many varied and stamps him as a man of courage, initiative, and resource.

James Henry McCulloch was born August 15, 1859, in Morgan county, Alabama, a son of Thomas D. McCulloch. Samuel McCulloch, his grandfather, passed his life as an Alabama farmer and died during the period of the Civil War. He married Hester Dannell, who died in advanced age, and they became the parents of the following children: Samuel, Richard, Harvey, John, Thomas, Lee, Mary, who married Houston Knapps, and Marka, who became the wife of J. H. Kitchens. Thomas D. McCulloch was born in Morgan county, Alabama, and ivoung manhood adopted the calling of farmer, which be followed until the time of his enlistment in an Alabama infantry company for service during the Civil War. Wounded at the battle of Day's Gap, Alabama, he was captured by the enemy and taken a prisoner to Richmond, and there his death occurred. His widow subsequently married William N. Oden, but they had no children. Mr. and Mrs. McCulloch had two children: James Henry and William Thomas, who came to Texas with their mother and settled in the Dawson neighborhood. Mrs. Oden died at the home of her son Thomas, in Stamford, Jones county, in 1908.

James Henry McCulloch received his education in a typical log schoolhouse in his native county, and lived with his mother until he was married, at which time he engaged in farming on his own account. He was a ienter for ten years, and at the time be and his wife started their married life he did not even own a horse to help him in his work. He was married in his native county, and came to Texas by rail, it taking about all he had made in three years of steady work to bring the family here. Resuming farming, he rented a place near Dawson until he was able to purchase 120 acres of land, and this became much more valuable by his labor and improvement, so that subsequently he purchased some property in Dawson, upon a part of which he erected the McCulloch gin, this succeeding the gin erected by Akers Brothers. His gin plant is a six seventy-saw Munger and is one of the four gins of the town.

Mr. McCulloch has been identified with some of the leading and successful business enterprises of Dawson, and through his capable management and wise direction has developed them into prosperous ventures. He built the original telephone exchange at Dawson, assisting Mr. Duke, whose first efforts marked the development of the telephone system here, and Mr. McCulloch operated the plant for some ten years, and in 1913 sold it to J. W. Pruitt. He assisted in the organization of the First State Bank of Dawson, and since its inception has held a place on its directing board. Mr. McCulloch was one of the incorporators of Dawson, was an alderman for a time, and has been mayor for two years, during which time he has been instrumental in securing numerous greatly needed municipal reforms, giving the people a clean, businesslike administration. He has also served as a trustee of the school board, and at times has filled various offices in political, fraternal and social life of Dawson. He is past master of Dawson Lodge, No. 155, A. F. & A. M., and a member of Hubbard City Chapter, R. A. M., and also holds membership in the Odd Fellows. With his family, he attends the Methodist church, has been a supporter of its movements, and for several years has acted in the capacity of steward.

Mr. McCulloch was married August 12, 1877, to Miss Jane Roper, daughter of Nelson and Taddy (Carter) Jane Roper, daugater of Aelson and Laddy (Carter) Roper of Alabama. The children horn to this union have been as follows: William Henry, an engineer at Daw-son, married Zelia Whitener and has two children, Delora and Janie; Hettie, the wife of W. Carroll of Laneaster, who has three children, Winnie Lois, Jenice, and Eloise; Lonnie of Dallas, a bookkeeper with the Times-Herald, married Miss Vera Roddy and has a daughter, Evelyn; Lee, connected with the First State Bank of Dawson, married Letha Sims and has one child; and Arthur, Allie, and Mabel, who reside with their parents.

JUDGE ROBERT L. BALL. During the last thirty years it is doubtful if any Texan has been more distinguished for influence and success, whether as a lawyer, banker, and in civic affairs, than Judge Ball of San Antonio. He made his reputation years ago as an attorney of exceptional skill among the scattered population and semi-frontier conditions of Western Texas, and during his residence at San Antonio has represented some of the most important litigation originating among the livestock interests of the state. In the bar of Texas, especially among jury lawyers, Mr. Ball ranks second to none of his contemporaries, and his ability and standing may be estimated on terms of easy relationship with any of the more prominent lawyers and jurists of the state. Though in recent years much of his attention has been devoted to banking, Judge Ball still holds a place of large prominence in the legal profession. The famous Fant-Sullivan case of a few years ago, which was carried to the highest courts, and in which Judge Ball recovered over a million dollars for his client, is but one incident in many others of large cases in which his services have been retained. The legal affairs of extensive ranch and other property interests throughout Southwest Texas are in his charge; and as an executor, the settling up of some of the wealthiest estates of this section has been entrusted to his care.

Born in Jackson county, Missouri, in 1861, Robert L. Ball rose to prominence out of conditions and environments which would naturally handicap any person not possessed of unusual determination and ambition. His parents, Robert Austin and Constance (Rose) Ball, the former a native of Kentucky and the latter of Virginia, were among the early settlers of Western Missouri in Jackson county, their home being only six miles from the Kansas line. Judge Ball became an orphan at the age of six years, and the results of the bitter border warfare during the '60s in Western Missouri and Eastern Kansas added to the adverse circumstances of his youth. Reared on a farm, with toil and struggle as his lot, he made his own opportunities and won success in spite of his early destiny. His first important venture was at the age of sixteen, when he rented one of the largest farms in Johnson county, Kansas, got credit for sufficient equipment to operate the land, and by several years of bard work accumulated a few hundred dollars, His ambition was to get a college education, and in pursuance of his plan he invested his earnings in a course at the University of Kansas from 1878 until 1880. Having finished his college work, Judge Ball went to Galveston, Texas, and read law under Major Frank M. Spencer until admitted to the bar in 1882.

The scenes of his early successes as a lawyer were laid in the midst of the open-range cattle country. Locating, in 1883, at Colorado City, he soon established a good and growing practice, was elected city and county attorney, and for six years was president of the Colorado National Bank. The firm of Ball & Burney, of which he was the senior partner, were the first general attorneys for the Texas Cattle Raisers' Association of Texas, and incidentally a large amount of individual practice came to the firm through this relationship. In that time and locality the chief sources of business were the conflicting interests of individual cattlemen and criminal cases. As a trial lawyer as counsel for the defense in criminal cases, Mr. Ball probably had no equal in a large section of country, and gained a reputation for his successful defense of numerous noted murder eases

Judge Ball has often been referred to as the "cowman's lawyer'' of Texas, and it was his growing practice as attorney for leading cattlemen that eventually caused him in 1894 to locate in San Antonio, which city has now been his home for the past twenty years. several years he was a partner of the late Hon. Tully A. Fuller. Besides his professional business, of which a mere record of cases would hardly be appropriate for this article, Judge Ball has gained large business interests at San Antonio and vicinity, and is well known as a banker. He was one of the organizers in 1903 and the first vice-president of the National Bank of Commerce, later served for some years as president of the bank, and is now chairman of the board of directors, having at all times been active in the direction and management of the bank's affairs. The National Bank of Commerce of San Antonio has in ten years made a remarkable growth, and is now one of the strongest banks in South Texas. Plans have already been prepared for the erection of a new bank building on the northwest corner of West Commerce and Soledad streets.

Judge Ball has taken a prominent part in Masonic circles, is a Past Master of Alamo Lodge, A. F. & A. M., Past High Priest of Burleson Chapter, R. A. M., and Past Eminent Commander and now Grand Captain-General of the Grand Commandery of Texas Knights Templar. In 1892 occurred his marriage to Miss Marian Cooke, who was born and reared in Washington county, Texas. Their three daughters are Constance, Marian Ellen, and Hallie Cooke Ball.

BENJAMIN WINSLOW DUDLEY HILL, M. D., of Dawson has been identified with this locality since 1886, when he came here as a young physician, newly graduated from the medical department of the University of Tennessee. Since that time he has steadily advanced in his profession to a leading and recognized position, but his strength as a citizen is based not only on his successful and honorable record as a medical practitioner, but as a business man, a financier, and a thoroughly useful and helpful citizen who has steadfastly allied himself with those movements which have made for civic betterment and general progress. Doctor Hill was born in Warren county, Tennessee, January 3, 1863, and is a son of Jon-

The Hill family originated in Wales, and some of its members came to America during Colonial days, settling in Virginia, and from there drifting to Georgia and later to Tennessee. Ervin Hill, the grandfather of Doctor Hill, died in Tennessee when a comparatively young man, being one of the pioneers of the Volunteer state, where his father, Henry Hill, settled. Jonathan Hill, the father of Doctor Hill, was born in Warren county, Tennessee, and was a farmer of the slaveholding class of eizenship of that state. He was on detail for the Confederacy during the war between the North and the South, and had two brothers in that service. He also had a brother killed at the battle of Monterey, Mexico, during our war with that country, and another brother died on the gulf while returning from that war. The family has ever been lined up with the Democratic party, and Jonathan Hill had two uncles who helped frame the constitution of Tennessee. One of them, H. L. W. Hill, went to Congress, and another brother, George W. Hill, after whom Hill county, Texas, was named, served as secretary of war under President Houston, was one of the congressmen of the Texas Republic, subsequently returned to his medical practice in Navarro county, and died in the vicinity of Dawson in 1859 without issue. Benjamin J. Hill, a cousin of Jonathan Hill, was a Confederate brigadier-general. Jonathan Hill was married in Warren county, Tennessee, to Vesta Scott, who was a daughter of Cooper Scott, a native of North Carolina, who moved to Tennessee in boyhood and spent the balance of his life as a farmer. He married Elizabeth McCullom, and they became the parents of a large and the dependent of the parents of a faring family. The children of Jonathan and Vera (Scott) Hill were as follows: Ervin L., who is in business as a merchant at Dawson; Lucian C., who died at Hillsboro, was once county judge of Hill county and left a family at his death; Dr. B. W. D. of this review; Lee, a farmer of Dawson; Sue, who is the wife of C. M. Etter of Waco, and Miss Linda, who is engaged in teaching school at Sacaton, Arizona.

As Doctor B. W. D. Hill grew to manhood, he attended the public schools of his native county, and later was a student at Irving College, and, after leaving that institution, began life as a country school teacher. This he followed for ten months in Grundy and Sequachie counties, and then chose medicine as his life work and began his preparation in the medical school previously mentioned. When he graduated, in 1885, he entered practice at his home place, and was there a year before coming to the West. Doctor Hill came to Navarro county without acquaintances and found Dawson a wooden town with a good farming trade and with four physicians already here—Kirksey, Dean, Berry, and Meredith, all of whom have since vanished. During the quarter of a century or more that he has been located here he has taken postgraduate work in New Orleans, at Tulane University, in the Post-Graduate School at Chicago, and the Polyclinic at New Orleans. He has been president of the Navarro County Medical Society and is a member of the State and American Medical Associations.

Soon after coming here, Doctor Hill became identified with farming in Navarro county, and, associated with his brother, purchased 633 acres of raw land, which they his brother, purchased one acres of the brought nearly all under the plow, put six buildings upon brought nearly all under the plow, put six buildings upon brought nearly all under the plow, all the plows and the plow of t it, and, after years of cultivation, disposed of it. They also purchased other tracts of land and have given labor to numbers of wage-workers as farmers. Doctor Hill has devoted his farms to cotton raising and grain. He took an interest next in the promotion of the Dawson Cotton Oil Company, of which he was vice president, and was next prominent in the organization of the First State Bank of Dawson, being elected its vice president, and in 1909 was elected its president, a position he now holds. The bank was chartered with a capital of $25,000 seven years ago, and now has $85,000 in the surplus and seven years ago, and now mas $85,000 in the surplus and undivided profits. The vice president is J. C. Keitt and the cashier C. O. Weaver, the other members of the board of directors being P. L. Adams, M. L. Berry, J. L. Taylor, F. L. Hill, J. F. Sims, W. N. Matthews, and C.

Doctor Hill purchased the Dawson Supply Company, which he is conducting at this time. This venture is in the nature of a department store, and, with all its departments, is the chief business place of the town, handling dry goods, hardware, saddles, harness and implements. Doctor Hill has extended his building interests only by the investment of his capital in improved property in Dawson. In politics, Doctor Hill is a Democrat, and has taken an active part in the success of his party in this county, having served as precinct chairman on several occasions and as county chairman during the Bailey and Johnson fight for delegates to the national convention at Denver. His first state convention was at Waco, and the next at Dallas, when Governor Campbell was nominated, and since that time has been frequently selected as delegate, but has declined the service. He advocated Woodrow Wilson for president at the time the Professor was elected governor of New Jersey, and has been steadfast in his support. Dr. Hill has served Dawson as city health officer for five years and as president of the school board for a period of four years. Frafernally, he belongs to the Blue Lodge, Chapter, and Council of the Masonic order. On January 17, 1893, Doctor Hill was married at Dawson to Miss Cynthia Adams, a daughter of Peter L. Adams, M. D., who practiced medicine near Dawson, and came here prior to the Civil War from Tennessee, and served as a soldier in that struggle. Ten children have been born to Doctor and Mrs. Hill, namely: Ermine, Mark, Annie, Ada, Robert, Virginia, Joe, Evelyn, Lynn, and Benjamin Winslow Dudley, Jr.

LEVI FRANKLIN GABLE. The life history of Levi Franklin Gable, now one of the most prosperous and highly esteemed residents of Dawson, is lacking in no detail that makes interesting biography. Beginning life handicapped by lack of educational or other advantages, a soldier when still in his early 'teens, thrown upon his own resources before he had reached man's estate, a pioneer in a new and untried country, gradually fighting his way upward in spite of the most discouraging circumstances, and finally winning financial independence and the respect of his fellow men-such are the salient points in a career crowded with interesting events and characterized at all times by a faithful adherence to high princi-

Mr. Gable has been a resident of Navarro county since September, 1885, when he came hither from Tishomingo county, Mississippi. He was born in Anderson District, South Carolina, July 29, 1847, and in 1852 his parents left that locality and moved to Mississippi, where he secured scarcely any education, the struggle between the South and the North coming on at his most critical school period. His father, Henry Gable, was a small farmer, and became captain of the Home Guard during the Civil War. He was born also in South Carolina, and died in Tishomingo county, Mississippi, at past eighty vears of age, while the mother, Martha Hanks, a daughter of George Hanks, passed away at the age of sixtyfive years. Their children were as follows: J. Asberry, who died while in the Confederate service; Eveline, who married Paul Finch of Tishomingo county, Mississippi; George, who contracted a disease at Ft. Donaldson as a wearer of the gray and died at Granada, Mississippi; Stacy, who passed through the war in the Confederate service, but died soon after the close of the struggle, in Pemiseot county, Missouri; Levi Franklin of this review; Elizabeth, who married Henry Pitts and resides near Dawson, Texas; Jane, who married William Vinson and lives at Dawson; Cordie, who married Jonathan Bolden of Lomesa, Texas, and Tina, who married Jack Tankersley of Mississippi.

Levi F. Gable joined the Confederate army in 1864, enlisting in the Seventh Alabama Cavalry, Moreland's regiment and Forrest's command. He saw service in Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, and Mississippi, and took part in a lot of skirmishing; also at Athens, Alabama; Pulaski, Tennessee; Sulphur Trestle and Decatur, Alabama; Monte Valley, and on down to Selma. The command was demoralized during the last campaign, and scattered, and Mr. Gable, with others, made his way home, He never surrendered and never reported to a Federal officer for parole. After the war, Mr. Gable went out to Pemiscot county, Missouri, and remained for three years, accepting such honorable employment as presented itself. He then returned to his home, but again went back to the West, at Fort Smith and the Indian Nation, and one year afterward again went back home, without having accomplished anything worth while. Soon after going home, October 5, 1874, Mr. Gable married Miss Elizabeth Milford, a daughter of John and Frances R. Kay Milford, who was originally from Anderson District, South Carolina.

Mr. Gable began about as humble a married life as could be imagined. He possessed one pony, and rented land on shares, and during the first fall gathered his crop and came out about even with the world. His first home was a log house, furnished with primitive furniture, worth perhaps twenty-five dollars. He was without a cook-stove, a sewing-machine, or a rocking-chair, and for a wagon he spliced in with a neighbor and made a team and vehicle. When he found himself at the close of business the first year just where he started, in the spring he proposed to his wife that they wear their old clothes and eat corn bread and thus stay out of debt the next year, and this she agreed to do. They lived on the same place again, and his record established for paving as he went has been maintained ever since, save for in-debtedness made when he purchased his first home in Texas. When he left Mississippi, Mr. Gable sold all of his property and came away with $350. Mr. Gable came out to Texas on a prospecting tour first, at the sugges-tion of his wife, and, after looking over much of the black-land region of North Texas, as well as the central portion of the state, selected Navarro county, and re-turned and informed his wife that he could do better in Texas than in Mississippi. She consented to come, and they located at Dawson, the best place he had found on his exploration, and here he achieved his first success.

Mr. Gable's first work on coming to Texas was as a cotton picker on the black land for W. T. Moore at fifty cents a hundred and board for himself and family, while

Mrs. Gable helped Mrs. Moore do the work about the house. In his efforts to secure a place on which to live he failed, as did his employer in finding a place for rent, and, about discouraged, was on the point of leaving the locality when Mr. Moore asked him one day if he were willing to take the "Allen Carroll place." Allen Carroll was a negro in the last stages of consumption, and Mr. Gable hesitated for a time, but finally agreed, because of his desperate situation, and accordingly moved into the little home after thoroughly scouring and scalding it. During the three years he lived there, Mr. Gable declares, he never enjoyed himself more in his life. Wild game was plentiful, turkey and deer abounded, and, as he loved sport with the gun, he lived chiefly on wild game while it lasted. He made money every year on that place, and subsequently moved on the ridge where Mr. Moore had lived, and spent two years there, then going to "high prairie" and buying a home of 129 acres, with a good house and barn—the best in the county at that time. He paid eighteen dollars an acre for this land, giving $1,000 down and notes for the balance, payable in one and two years. At the end of the time his land was paid for, and he owed no man, having found it no was paid tot, and the doct no man, as may remain the trouble to make money where there was an earnest will and domestic harmony. In the fall he piled up from forty to eighty bales of cotton from that place, and found himself becoming very independent, so purchased a tract of fifty acres, at twenty-five dollars an acre, spot cash, and in a few years purchased another fifty acres, adjoining, at forty-two and one-half dollars an acre.

At that time Mr. Gable had reached a point where the education of his children became a matter of concern, and, as the facilities in this locality were very poor, he moved to Dawson and purchased the R. B. Mansh residence for $1500 spot cash. He continued to farm actively and to add to his holdings, and prospered all the way along the road. Mr. Gable is a Democrat, but has not bothered with politics and no secret order has not bothered with politics and no secret order has troubled him with its wiles. He has built several cottages in Dawson, which contribute to his income. His religious connection is with the Methodist church, which he has supported generously.

Mr. Gable's children are as follows: George Warren of Tahlequah, Oklahoma, president of the State Normal School; Oscar R., a teacher in Wesley College, Greenville, Texas; Ellis, superintendent of the schools of Forney, Texas; Maud, the wife of Felix Davis, a farmer near Dawson; May, the widow of Dr. Frank Smith of Dawson; Ethel. who married W. J. Rochelle of Corsicana, Texas; Miss Tina, an English teacher in the Devine (Texas) High School; James J. and Blanche, a junior at Southwestern. Mr. Gable's achievements have been many and notable, yet what he considers the best work of his life has been the education of his children, all of whom have been well fitted for the places in life which they have been called upon to fill, and all of whom are proving themselves worthy of their education and training. George Warren is a graduate of George-town and Chicago Universities and began teaching in the country. His graded school work was done at Groesbeck, Frost and Kerens, in Texas, and at Duncan and Checota, Oklahoma, where he was principal, following which he was appointed to his present high position. Oscar is a graduate of Georgetown University, as is Ellis. Mand was a teacher for eight years before her marriage and received a thorough training. May was well educated and was a teacher of elecution for several years. Ethel was a teacher for five years prior to her marriage. Miss Tina is a graduate of Georgetown University, James J. is a student of the class of 1915 in a medical college at Oklahoma City and Miss Blanche holds a state teacher's certificate.

George W. Ratliff, chief clerk of the Railway Mail service, District No. 4, at Denison, Texas, has been connected with the mail service for a quarter of a century and his rise to his present position of authority has been steady and continued, a result of his ability, his energy and his faithful performance of duty. A native son of Texas, he was born in Washington county November 30, 1867, and is a son of George W. and Mary (McClellan) Ratliff, the former of English descent and the latter of Scotch-Irish ancestry. There are many of the name located in different parts of Texas, whence a number of the family came at an early day, and all have held honorable positions in life and maintained the high reputation of the family.

George W. Ratliff, Sr., was born in Mississippi, where he grew to manhood with but few educational avantages, although in his later years he remedied this oversight by study and observation and is known as a well-informed man on numerous subjects of importance. In 1859 he migrated to Texas, locating in Hays county, where he was residing at the time of the commencement of hostilities between the Southern and Northern states, and he immediately cast his fortunes with the Confederacy, enlisting in a Texas volunteer regiment. He served under Colonels Carter and Giddings at Brenham, Texas, and was among those detailed on the scouting line, subsequently participated in the raid through Louisiana after General Banks, took part in a number of hotly contested battles and continued to serve until the close of the war. His regiment for a time was connected with the army of General Price. He proved himself a brave and gallant soldier and had an excellent military record, although his record as a business man has been no less admirable. When he laid aside the musket for the implements of peace, he took up farming and stock raising in Fayette and Coleman counties, Texas, and through industry and good management made a success of his operations. He is now living a retired life at his home in the city of Fort Worth. A man of strong mind and iron constitution he is still active and alert at the age of eighty-two years, perfectly capable of attending to the duties of life. The mother, who was born in Tennessee, died in 1906. There were three sons in the family: George W., of this review; Charles C., in the Railway Mail Service at Texarkana and in charge of the Terminal R. P. O., and Samuel R., of El Paso, also in the Railway Mail Service and in the Terminal R. P. O. at that city.

After completing his preliminary educational training in the public schools of Fayette county, George W. Ratliff spent one year in the University of Texas, and with this training embarked upon his career. His first employment was at clerical work for his father, for whom he kept a set of books, and subsequently he entered the employ of the Calcasien Lumber Company, at Austin, in a like capacity. For some time following this he was associated with the Breckenridge & Tinnin Lumber Mill, in Polk county, Texas, but in 1889 entered the Railway Mail Service at Fort Worth, and has continued to be identified with this branch of the government to the present time. In January, 1905, Mr. Ratliff came to Denison to take charge of District No. 4, which embraces North Texas and Eastern Oklahoma, there being 150 clerks necessary to handle the large mails of this section. A man of energy and enterprise, Mr. Ratliff has introduced a number of reforms into his department which have served to facilitate the work of mail handling and the service has no more trusted or faithful employe. In political matters he is a Democrat.

On February 23, 1893, Mr. Ratliff was united in marriage at Coleman, Texas, to Miss Nettie Wilson, whose father was a steamboat captain during the Civil war and lived in the city of Savannah, Georgia. After the close of that struggle he engaged in the grocery business at Savannah. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Ratliff: George W., nineteen years of age, who is a bookkeeper in the National Bank of Denison, and Miss Marion C., aged fifteen years, who is attending school. During his vacations Mr. Ratliff has done some traveling to the large cities of the West, but is content with the advantages and opportunities to be found in his home city of Denison, where his numerous friends are always sure of a welcome at his comfortable residence at No. 1015 West Morton street.

CICERO FRANKLIN HENDERSON, M. D., an active practitioner in Pittsburg, is a man in the full vigor of professional and physical manhood and is enjoying to the utmost those benefits arising from his social and professional standing. He was born near Cason, in Morris county, at a time when it was still known as Titus county, and when Snow Hill was a well known country place established by the pioneers of Ante-Bellum days. His natal day is May 8, 1865, and he is the son of John and Millie A. (Hayes) Henderson.

John Henderson accompanied his parents to Texas in 1844 and they settled at Snow Hill, where he spent his remaining years as a farmer on a modest scale. Hendersons of this branch were not slave-holding people. They were not aggressive planters, but contented themselves with comfortable lives and modest surroundings. John Henderson was born in Mississippi in 1825 and his somewhat meager education was derived from the old field schools of that state. He was a son of Michael Henderson, who carried in his veins the stanch blood of Scot and the versatile temperament of the Celt. He died at Snow Hill some years prior to the opening of the war. His children were reared as farmers and they were as follows: John, the father of the subject; James, who died in Florida without family; Michael, who died in Comanche county, Texas, and left a family; Adeline, who married Allen Barcfoot, and one other who married Young Box, and all three of the last named spent their lives in the vicinity of Snow Hill. John Henderson maintained himself and reared his family by the products of the soil and gave himself no concern about matters outside his own domain, save when the question of war between the states was being settled. He demonstrated a patriotic attitude for the old in-stitutions of the south and gave his service as a soldier in the ranks of the Confederate army. When the war was ended he accepted the results with what complacency he might muster and settled down to the work he had quitted to enter the service. He had little ever to do with politics, save to vote his sentiments as a Democrat, and he possessed no inclination or desire to mingle with his fellows as a leader of the public or a speaker in their midst, satisfying his mind and his spirit as a worshiper in the Missionary Baptist church. He was twice married and by his first wife had one son, James, who resides in Brown county, Texas, and a daughter, Mary, who married George Janes and died in Correll county, Texas. For his second wife Mr. Henderson married Millie A. Hayes, a daughter of Hugh Hayes, who came to Texas from Tennessee about the time when the Henderson family migrated hither. Mr. Hayes died in Titus county before war times and is buried near Snow Hill. Millie A. Henderson was born in Tennessee in October, 1838, and resides in the old neighborhood of Snow Hill. Her husband died on June 8, 1905, and their issue are as follows: Humphrey, a farmer and a mill and gin man of Cason, Texas; Tennie, the wife of D. Whittaker; Monroe, a resident of Mount Pleasant, Texas; Cicero F. of this review; Ida, the wife of Robert Montgomery of Cason, Texas, and Walter and R. L. Henderson also of Cason, Texas.

Cicero Franklin Henderson was a boy about the farm near Snow Hill during his minority years and was educated in the country schools. He assisted one term in his locality and abandoned the work for what he thought would be a career in the liquor business at Cason, but soon after he began the preparation for his professional career under Dr. Evans at Cason. He took his first course of lectures in the Kentucky School of Medicine in Louisville and entered upon practice on a certificate at Lafayette, Upshur county, in 1895. He continued so until he returned to complete his medical studies in the Memphis Hospital College, from which he was graduated in 1900. He continued in practice in Upshur county until 1908, when he moved to Pittsburgh, and this has been the center of his professional activities since that time.

In 1911 Dr. Henderson took a post-graduate course in the Polyeline of Thlane University in New Orleans and has in many ways kept up his studies so that he stands well to the forefront in his profession in these parts. He is a member of the County Medical Society and is now its acting secretary, while he served at one time as its president. He attends the annual meetings of the State Medical Association, of which he is a member, and in every way lives in the spirit of his profession. In addition to his regular duties as a practitioner Dr. Henderson is the official examiner for the New York Mutual Life Insurance Company of Kansas City and the State of the Companies of the Compani

Politically Dr. Henderson is a Democrat, although he is not one to take any active part in the political affairs of the community, and his churchly affiliations are with the Missionary Baptist denomination.

The Doctor is a Master Mason, but is not especially active in his lodge affiliations. He is a citizen of the highest order, wide-awake and always up and doing and in him Pittsburg has a resident of whom she may well be proud.

WILLIAM ASHTON VINSON. As an active and prominent member in the firm of Lane, Wolters & Storey, attorners, William Ashton Vinson plays a leading part in the legal activities of the city of Houston, his firm being one of the most impressive of its kind in the city. His identity with Houston was established in 1909, when he formed an association with his present firm, his previous legal affiliation having been with Judge Wilkins, of the firm of Wilkins & Vinson, at Sherman, Texas, where he was located for something like ten years, where he was located for something like ten years, where he was located for something like ten years, where he was located for something like ten years, where he was located for something like ten years, where he was located for something like ten years, where he was success in his profession has been in every way worthy of him, and he has shown himself to be ambitious as well as stalented, though his modest and unassuming nature impels him to shun the limelight as much as is consistent with success in his career.

William Ashton Vinson was born at White Oak, South Carolina, on December 22, 1874, and is the son of John and Mary Elizabeth (Brice) Vinson, both natives of South Carolina, and people who came originally of French and Scottish ancestry. The family came to Texas in 1887, settling at Sherman, where the father identified himself with the mercantile business. He was a man who had served through the last year of the Civil war in the Confederacy, having been a student at Charleston, South Carolina, when hostilities were started. His father is still living at Sherman, Texas, but his mother died in 1895.

A boy of thirteen years when he came with his family to Texas, William Ashton Vinson thus gained the major part of his education in the Lone Star State. He was graduated in 1896 from Austin College, at Sherman, after which he applied himself to the reading of law in the office of Judge W. W. Wilkins, at Sherman, and was duly admitted to the bar in 1898. He began the active practice of his profession as a partner of Judge Wilkins, who had so ably instructed him, and for ten years Wilkins & Vinson conducted a highly successful proceeding the second of the second profession as a partner of the second properties at Sherman. During that time Mr. Vinson was now, in which he served faithfully daring of City Attorney; in which he served faithfully dare thus faithfully and office he has ever held during his earer thus far, having no penchant for public life, and entirely content to devote himself to his profession.

In 1909 Mr. Vinson came to Houston, and soon after became a member of the firm of Lane, Wolters & Storey, with whom he is yet associated. Aside from his profession, Mr. Vinson is identified with the Continental Bank & Trust Company of Fort Worth, Texas, as a director, and is director, and it is director, and it is director, and it is director, and it is a director and pany of Sherman, Texas. On March 1, 1912, he was appointed by Mayor H. B. Rice to membership on the Carnegie Library Board of Houston, and one year later his appointment was re-confirmed by Mayor Ben Campbell. He has given splendid service to the library and bell. He has given spicards service to the horary and the city in his capacity as a director. Socially, Mr. Vinson has membership in the Houston Club, the Houston Country Club, and the Lumberman's Club of Houston, and in all of them he has made a wide circle of friends.

On December 19, 1900, Mr. Vinson was married to Miss Ethel Turner, the daughter of Judge Augustus C. Turner, of Sherman, Texas, who was long prominent in Grayson county politics and who was for many years district judge there. Two daughters have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Vinson—Virginia and Julia Elizabeth.

JOHN C. HUTCHISON, a pioneer resident of Queen City, Cass county, Texas, is entitled to the distinction of being foremost in developing the iron ore industry in this county. He belongs to the family of Hutchisons who pioneered in North Carolina and possesses to a marked degree that initiative which characterized his worthy ancestors. Mr. Hutchison is a native of Tennessee. He was born in Tipton county, that state, in 1845, son of Charles Harris and Adeline (Thompson) Hutchison. Charles Harris Hutchison was born in Mecklenburg county, North Carolina, a grandson of Captain William Hutchi-son, who owned the land upon which Charlotte, North Carolina, was built. Captain William Hutchinson was one of the promulgators of the Mecklenburg Declaration of Independence, was captain of troops in the Con-tinental line in Revolutionary war and was a prominent figure in North Carolina history. Charles H. Hutchison lived in Mecklenburg county till after he was grown and soon after his marriage to Miss Adeline Thompson of that county he emigrated to Tipton county, Tennessee, where he lived till December, 1854, when he removed with his family to Cass county, Texas. They settled in the woods and opened up a farm seven miles east of Jefferson, in what was known as the "Bend" country and in what is now Marion county, which county was formed out of Cass county. He and his wife lived in this place until 1878. From this home they moved to Queen City, Texas. The wife died in 1888 and the husband in 1898. They had seven children: James H., deceased; Amand Kirkland, now living in Dallas, Texas; John C.; Sarah A. Mathews, deceased; Tennessee Harwell, deceased; Margaret A. Britton, now in Fort Worth;

Charley Milton, now living in Atlanta, Texas.

At the time the Hutchison family came to Texas John C. was a lad of nine years. He was yet a youth in his early teens when the war of the Rebellion broke out, but before its close he tendered his services to the Southern cause and spent two years in the Con-Texas (Waterhouse's) Regiment, Walker's Division, in the Trans-Mississippi Department. After the war he returned to his father's home and entered school immediately, going to W. S. Glass during the remainder of 1865. On January 1, 1866, he entered school at the Nance old school house, going to one J. N. Adams. In 1867 he went to school at Sulphur Springs, going to Uncle Jo Clark, one of the pioneer educators of East Texas, and returned to the farm for the next two years, 1868 and 1869. In 1870 he accepted a clerkship in a store at Jefferson, which at that time was one of the most important commercial cities of Texas. In 1871 he went to Linden, the county seat of Cass county, and established a grocery store. This grocery stock he soon disposed of and the following year turned his attention to drugs. was the beginning of the drug business in which he and, later, his sons have since been engaged.

In 1874, upon the completion of the Texas & Pacific Railroad through Cass county he removed his business from Linden to Lanark, a station on the new road, and in 1876, when the station of Queen City was established, he removed his drug store to this place and had the distinction of being its pioneer merchant. With the growth and prosperity of his business grew the demand for "Hutchison's Magic Oil," a healing preparation of his own. On its own merits, and without advertising, the fame of this medicine spread until Mr. Hutchison decided to retire from retail drug business and devote his entire attention to the manufacture and sale of Magic Oil. As a result of this decision the Hutchison Medicine Company was organized of which Mr. Hutchison is president. His two sons, John C., Jr., and James E., are officers of the company and have active charge of the business, which in 1908 was removed from Queen City to Texarkana. Mr. Hutchison, however, continued to make his home in Queen City until November 1, 1913, at which date he and his wife moved to Texarkana and he again became actively engaged with the Hutchison Medicine Company. The company has a fine plant in a modern brick building at the corner of State and Thirteenth streets in Texarkana, from which it distributes its product to the jobbing trade and where it is doing a constantly increasing business.

Since 1891 Mr. Hutchison has been a prominent factor in the development of the iron ore business in Cass county. That year he bought, from the receiver of the property, the famous Bowie Hill iron ore lands, five the property, the famous Bowle Hill from one lands, he miles north of Queen City. This was the location of the old Sulphur Forks Iron Works, which had been established during the war by the Confederate States of Texas, Arkansas and Louisiana, and operated for the benefit of the Confederate government, and for this reason is of historic interest. Mr. Hutchison has since sold a part of his interest in this property, but is still the owner of over one thousand acres, which is subject to future development. And this promises to be an important industry in the State of Texas.

Referring to Mr. Hutchison's early identity with Queen City, it should be recorded that he opened up the first street in the town. And, as showing his enterprise and public spirit, it should be further recorded that in 1876 he operated a saw mill in the town, at considerable expense to himself, and sawed lumber free for every person who would build a house there and was not able to pay for it.

Mr. Hutchison was married February 22, 1872, to Miss Margaret C. Sharp of Marion county, Texas, daughter of Jehu H. Sharp, a prominent citizen of that county, and they have five children living: Mrs. Annie Cabe of Stamps, Arkansas; Mrs. Maggie Allday of Atlanta, Texas; John C., Jr., of Texarkana; James E., also of Texarkana, and Mrs. Adine Ellington of Atlanta, Texas. The third child, Charley Harris, was taken to Heaven at two years of age.

Fraternally Mr. Hutchison is a Master Mason and religiously he is a Methodist. Last, but not least, he is politically a Democrat.

ROBERT MONROE WHITE. The residence of the White family has been continuous in south Texas, in the country about Galveston Bay, and in Chambers county, since 1819. That was before the establishment of the first Austin colony. It was about the time Mexico won in-dependence from Spain. Up to that time American settlers had been strictly forbidden to enter Texas and find homes in territory. The population of what is now the Lone Star State was centered almost entirely about a few Mexican forts and towns, chiefly about San Antonio, and on the extreme east at Nacogdoches and Anahuac, Texas. These facts are mentioned to indicate how very early in the pioneer period was the settlement of the White family. Three or four generations have succeeded one another as prominent citizens, large land owners and cattle raisers, business men and publicspirited citizens, in what is now Chambers county, and among the prominent representatives of the name now living and active in affairs are Robert Monroe White and James T. White, two of the largest ranchers and land owners in the state of Texas.

Robert Monroe White was born at White's (or Turtle) Bayou, Chambers county, Texas, in 1856, and James Taylor White was born in 1854. Their parents were James Taylor and Amanda (Speght) White. James Taylor White was likewise born at Turtle Bayou in 1829 and all his life was spent in Chambers county, where he died in 1905. He was a son of James Taylor White, who was born in Louisiana, came from that state to Texas in 1819 and at that time located in what is now Chambers county, establishing his home on Turtle Bayou, which, because of the prominence and long residence of the family, has also been known as White's Bayou. The original place settled upon by Grandfather James Taylor White more than eighty years ago is still owned and occupied by the family. The ranch at White's Bayou consists now of about six thousand acres, and is owned by Robert M. White and his brother, James Taylor White. There are few old homesteads in Texas which have longer associations and memories for one family. After the battle of San Jacinto, in 1836, the Mexican General Santa Ana, while being escorted as a prisoner on his way to New Orleans and thence to Mexico, was kept overnight at the White home and Grandfather James T. White furnished a pilot for transporting the party across the Sabine River into Louisiana. Besides the home place mentioned above Robert M.

White and J. T. White are owners of the famous White's Ranch in Chambers and Jefferson counties. That is one of the largest and finest cattle ranches in Texas. Eighty thousand acres comprise the broad domain over which the White cattle range and few estates are now left in Texas with such a princely acreage. Travelers over the railroad through Chambers county are familiar with White's Ranch Station, located about seven miles south of Stowell, and the ranch adjoins this station. Mr. White, like his father and grandfather before him, has been engaged in the eattle business since boyhood and from it has acquired his wealthy and influential position.

Mr. White married Miss Mattie Smith, who was born in Orren county, Texas. Their four children are: J. Cade White, Forrest White, Anna White and Lillie May White. In 1902 Mr. White established his residence at the town of Stowell, on the Gulf & Interstate Railroad, where he has a beautiful and commodious home, surrounded by every comfort and convenience.

ARCHIE N. Justiss. As postmaster of the city of Corsienas, Navarro county, Mr. Justiss is known as an able and popular public official, but further than this he is one of the representative members of the newspaper fraterinty in Texas, as editor and publisher of the Corsicana Courier-Light and Weekly Observer, and has been a recognized power in the councils and political manoeuvers of the Democratic party in the Lone Star State, which has been his home since early youth. He is one of the progressive and public-spirited citizens of northeastern Texas and his character and achievements entitle him to specific mention in this history of the state.

Archie Norris Justiss was born at Lebanon, Wilson county, Tennessee, on the 19th of January, 1866, and is a son of John and Rachel (Debou) Justiss, both natives of Wilson county, Tennessee, and representatives of old and honored families of that state. John Justiss continued his residence in Tennessee until 1885, when he came with his family to Texas, settling first at Alvarado, Johnson county, and removing thence to Hills-boro, Hill county, where he died in 1895 at the age of seventy-one years. He was born in 1823 and was a son of Samuel Justiss, who was a native of North Carolina and an early settler in Tennessee, where he became a prosperous planter and the owner of a considerable number of slaves. He continued to reside in that state until his death, and it is worthy of special note that three of his sons were found enrolled as valiant soldiers of the Confederacy in the Civil war. Mrs. Rachel (Debou) Justiss was a daughter of Bird Debou, who was the most extensive planter in Wilson county, Tennessee, where the family was long one of much prominence and influence. The old homestead plantation of Bird Debou was situated between Lebanon and Hunter's Point and he was the owner of sixty-five slaves at the time when the Emancipation Proclamation deprived him of this property. He had distinctive business ability and was able to retrieve to a large extent the financial loss which he encountered as a result of the Civil war, after the close of which he accumulated a large and valuable estate. The death of Mrs. Rachel Justiss oc-curred in the city of Waco, Texas, in 1888, and her memory is revered by all who came within the compass of her gracious influence. Of the children the eldest was Robert, who was a resident of Collin county, this state, at the time of his death; Millie, who married, was survived by one son, who died in Tennessee. Her other son, J. Morgan, was a resident of Hubbard City, Texas, at the time of his death, the result of an automobile collision; Bird, who is survived by a son and daughter, died at Hillsboro, Texas; Archie N., of this review, was the next in order of birth, and Mary, who became the wife of Henry M. Fowler, died at Waxahachie, Texas, being survived by three children.

Archie N. Justiss acquired his preliminary education in the schools of his native state and was about · nineteen years of age at the time of the family removal to Texas, in 1885. He continued his studies in the public schools of Hillshoro and thereafter he completed an effective course in Hill's Business College, in the city of Waco. After his graduation in this institution Mr. Justiss removed to Corsicana, which city has been his home since September, 1889. Here he assumed the posi-tion of city circulator for the Corsicana Daily Light, and during the long intervening years he has continued to be actively identified with newspaper interests in this thriving Texas city, where his influence has constantly been given to the furtherance of high civic ideals and progressive policies. He soon won promotion to the position of reporter on the Daily Light, and for several years he was also a correspondent for the Dallas News,

He finally purchased an interest in the Daily Light and in 1895 he effected the consolidation of this paper with the Daily Courier. He has been editor and publisher of the Courier-Light since 1900 and has made the page a power in political affairs as well as a most effective exponent of local interests in general.

Mr. Justiss has been most actively identified with Democratic politics in Texas from the time when the Terrell election law became operative. He first served as precinct chairman of the Democratic committee of his ward and thereafter he held for four years the position of secretary of the county committee of his party in Navarro county. In 1908, by election, he was made chairman of the county committee, and of this office he continued the valued and efficient incumbent for four years, his duties thus including work in the national campaign of 1912, in which he so aided in maneuvering the forces at his command as to make Navarro county fall into line with a strong plurality in favor of President Wilson. He became also a member of the senatorial and congressional committees of his party, and for six years he served as chairman of each of these committees in his district. He has been a delegate to virtually every Democratic state convention in Texas for the past score of years, and from 1904 to 1906, inclusive, he was a member of the state executive committee of the party. It is worthy of note that after the nomination of President Wilson Mr. Justiss started in Navarro county a popular subscription to aid in the ensuing campaign, the result being that about $1,500 were raised in the county and added to the national campaign fund. He was anpointed by Governor S. W. T. Lanham as a member of his personal staff and holds a commission from Governor Lanham with the rank of Lieutenant Colonel. This was in the year of 1903 and 1904.

Mr. Justiss is a charter member of both the Booster and Commercial Clubs of Corsicana, the former of which he assisted in organizing in 1894 and he has given hearty support to their measures and enterprises projected for the general good of the city. After the campaign of 1912 Mr. Justiss became a candidate for the office of postmaster of Corsicana, and he won the commission, notwithstanding there were twenty-six applicants for the same. He circulated no petition for support or commendation, but gained the voluntary support of a host of loyal friends, with the result that he assumed the duties of office on the 1st of April, 1914. At the State Postmasters' Convention held at Austin in May, 1914. Mr. Justiss was elected secretary and treasurer of the association for the ensuing year, a pleasing compliment to a young member over so many older members at the convention. This is an important office. Mr. Justiss is affiliated with the Woodmen of the World, the Praetorians and the Mystic Circle, in which last he is worthy ruler, and he and his family hold membership in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

In Coustean on the 12th of October, 1893, was a considered to the constant of the constant of splendid character, good intelligence, ambitious and industrious. He constantly reminds me of my former partner, his grandfather, Judge Sam R. Frost, in his amiable disposition and well balanced character. If he does not, even in early life, attain positions of honor, prominence and influence, I think it will be due to some extraneous circumstances that operate from this time forward to carry him away from his present well formed ideas and aspirations. I think he should be stimulated to pursue his scholastic work, which will unquestionably not only give him culture but also the breadth and depth necessary to the practice of law and valuable in any pursuit."

Addison Perry Moore. The commercial life of Tyler, Tesas, has since 1880 known the influence and activities of Addison Perry Moore, and the part he has played in the industrial and fluancial progress of the city has been no insignificant one. As president of the Moore Grocery Company, a wholesale house with branches at several points in East Texas, his operations are wide in their scope in that field alone, and as vice president of the Guaranty State Bank he maintains a position of importance in financial circles of the city.

Addison Perry Moore was born in Alabama, in December, 1857, and came of a family of slave-holding planters. His father, Frank Moore, was born near Cheraw, South Carolina, and died in Tyler, Texas, in 1897, at the age of sixty-eight. He was married in his early days in Alabama to Miss Alice Silliman, the daughter of a North Carolina man, who died before his family of sixteen children were all reared. Of this numerous progeny twelve were boys, four of whom became doctors, four ministers and four farmers, and each of them acquitted himself in his particular field of activity in a mauner that was a distinct credit to the father and mother who called them into existence. Dr. James Silliman of Palestine was one of the sons, and at his death he left a splendid estate and a son in the same profession who is continuing his father's work and devoting his life to the welfare of humanity.

Frank Moore became a prosperous planter of Alabama in the years prior to the Civil war period, and with the outbreak of the Civil war the loss of his hundred or more slaves gave him a financial blow from which he never quite recovered. He held fast to his farm, however, and enjoyed the comforts of his home place until the weight of years forced his retirement from active work, when he left his Alabama home and moved to Texas in order to be near his sons, and located in Tyler. His faithful wife passed away in 1896, when she was sixtyfour years of age. Their children were seven in number and concerning them brief mention is here incorporated as follows: John S., the eldest, served through the war in the Confederacy, he later entered the ministry of the Presbyterian church, moved to Sherman, Texas, where he built the First Presbyterian church and was its honored pastor for almost a quarter of a century before death claimed him. Mary died in Tyler, Texas, as Mrs. Newton Priestwood; Susan is the wife of Mark as Mrs. Newton Priestwood; Susain is the of Mark Sledge of Smith county, Texas; W. R. died in Austin, Texas; Sarah P. married Strother Burke and died in Tyler; Hettie is Mrs. A. G. Boyd of Livingston, Alabama, and Addison Perry, of this review, is the youngest of the seven.

Addison P. Moore acquired a liberal education in the Cooper Institute in Lauderdale country, Alabama, and he came to Texas before he had attained his majority. He came to the state in the company of his brother, W. R., now deceased, on the return of the latter from a visit to the Alabama home, and he began his business life and career as a partner of one Mr. Phillips in the grocery business. After a little more than a year in this connection Mr. Phillips died and thereafter Mr. Moore carried on the retail business, with a jobbing of the property of the partment in connection, and he continued so until 1893, when he embarked in the wholesale business and put two men on the road in his interests. He ran the business under his own name, and though he was young in years he was successful in business and so marked was his success individually that he had no difficulty in securing additional capital for the enlarging of the activities of the firm. He first took a Mr. Starr into the firm and the firm known as the Moore-Starr Grocery Company did business until John B. Mayfield came into the partnership, when his name was added, making the firm name the Moore-Starr-Mayfield Grocery Company. Subsequent developments caused the various partners one by one to withdraw from the business, and in due time Mr. Moore had by purchase come to be the sole owner and proprietor of the establishment, and it was then that the Moore Grocery Company was incorporated for $200,-000, with A. P. Moore as president, A. F. Sledge as vice president and H. R. Moore of Houston as secretary and treasurer. Branch houses have been established at Palestine, Longview and Pittsburg, and a force of fourteen salesmen wait on the trade of the system, covering East Texas in the most compreheusive manner. They have a well established and ever growing trade in this section of the state, and handle their trade in a manner that is highly conducive to continued patronage and augurs well for the future fortunes of this flourishing system of grocery supply.

It is especially pleasing to contemplate the splendid success of this concern when it is remembered that Mr. Moore came to Texas without capital and without those less tangible assets known as prospects. He had nothing but his innate energy and ability, but they have been sufficient to permit him to demonstrate his capabilities as a merchant and made it possible for him to meet in the most telling manner every emergency arising from the demands of trade. His present connection shows him to be a strong factor in the commercial field of the state and his position as vice president of the Guaranty State Bank speaks sufficiently well of his standing as a financier. His home at No. 503 South Fannie avenue, in Tyler, is a handsome one and marks a striking contrast between the man of today and the boy of tender years who made his advent into Tyler in 1880. Mr. Moore has given valuable public service as a member of the board of education, on which he served for many years, and as au alderman of the city, but he is in no sense of the term a politician, giving but little time to the activities of any of the political factions.

Mr. Moore has been twice married. He was first married on March 17, 1886, in Crockett, Texas, to Miss Mary Aldrich, a daughter of Oliver Aldrich. Mrs. Moore died in 1900, leaving two sons,-Aldrich, now a traveling salesman for the Moore Grocery Company, and Addison. On June 7, 1902, Mr. Moore was married in Nevada City, California, to Miss Rachel Morgan, a daughter of the venerable John T. Morgan, a Welchman, who pioneered to California in 1855 and there became a successful business man and banker. Mr. and Mrs. Moore met while attending the World's Sunday School Convention of the Presbyterian church at Denver, in 1901, both being members of that denomination, and their marriage resulted in consequence of that meeting. The home life of this couple has been most idyllic in all its phases, and they have two sons,—John Morgan and William Aubrey. Mr. and Mrs. Moore are both enthusiastic church workers and are immersed in the activities of the various departments of their church in Tyler. Mr. Moore is an Elder, and has represented his church and congregation in Presbyteries and Synods at various times, and at-tended the General Assembly of the church at Mobile, Alabama. Their lives have been characterized by a strong religious faith and fervor, and both enjoy the esteem and hearty good will of all who share in their acquaintance and know them for what they are.

Leona A Lewis

for On Lewis

John M. Lewis. One of the substantial and honored etizens of Kanfman county, Mr. Lewis has been a resident of Texas since his boyhood days and is a scion of a sterling pioneer family that was founded in the Lone Star commonwealth nearly sixty years ago and about a decade after the admission of the state to the Union. He has marked the passing years with worthy accomplishment, has witnessed the development and upbuilding of the noble commonwealth that has long been his home, and is one of the representative citizens of Kaufman county, where we was formerly regagged in the mercantile business. Mr. Lewis has been one of the progressive men of Texas, has contributed materially to the civic and industrial advancement of the state, and he further has the distinction of having made a gallant record as a soldier of the Corfederacy in the war between the states. John M. Lewis was born in Marengo county, Alabama, on the 15th of April, 1842, and thus was a lad of four-teen years at the time of the family removal to Texas in the Christmas week of 1855. He is a son of John G. and Margaret (McIntyre) Lewis, and is a scion of a patrician old Southern family, the name of which has been identified with the annals of American history since the early Colonial era. John G. Lewis was born in Pendleton district, South Carolina, in 1817, and was reared to maturity in Marengo county, Alabama, where his marriage was solemnized. In 1846 he removed with his family to Mississippi, where he became overseer on a large plantation. Finally he determined to come to the new state of Texas, and he set forth with teams and wagons, by means of which he transported his family and a limited supply of household effects. En route he stopped at Shreveport, Louisiana, as he found what promised to be profitable employment in connection with the grading of the new westward line of the Texas & Pacific Railroad. He utilized his teams in connection with the construction work and also lent a considerable sum of money to the contractors by whom he was employed. After several weeks of service he found that his confidence had been greatly abused, as he not only failed to receive compensation for his work but also lost the money which he had advanced to his employers, Literally a poorer but wiser man, he proceeded on his way to Texas, and with the limited remaining funds in his possession he purchased a small tract of land on the east fork of the Trinity river, this embryonic home Saving been on the bleak prairie and remote from civili-vation, Indians being the nearest neighbors. Mr. Lewis bravely faced the ordeal of reclaiming his land and providing a home for his family, and he labored with all of energy and determination, the while he endured his full share of the bardships incidental to pioneer life on the frontier. His farm was situated southwest of the present thriving town of Forney, Kaufman county, and there he continued his labors until he went forth in defense of the cause of the Confederacy, his life having been virtually sacrificed in this cause. He entered the Confederate service in company with his son, John M., subject of this review, and took part in the early engagements of the contending forces in southern Missouri and northern Arkansas, including the battle of Elkhorn.

After receiving his honorable discharge he returned to his home, but later he re-enlisted and again went to Arkansas, where he was in service at the time he was stricken with the disease that terminated his life, at Little Rock, in 1864. He was a man of invincible integrity in all the relations of life and lived up to the opportunities that came to him as one of the world's workers, both he and his wife having been members of the Methodist church. His first wife, whose maiden name was Margaret McIntyre, was a daughter of John McIntyre, of Marengo county, Alabama, and she was summoned to the life eternal in 1855. Of the children of this union it may be recorded that Elizabeth died.

unnarried, when a young woman; John M. is the immediate subject of this sketch; Susan became the wife of George Daugherty and was a resident of Texas at the time of her leath; Bayless W. died in childhood; Finkney G. resides in Foruey. Texas; Esther was a child at the time of her death; Christopher C. resides at Segoville, Dallas county, Texas; and William Edward died when a boy.

Madison Earle Lewis, grandfather of him whose name introduces this article, was born in South Carolina, in 1789, and he became a prosperous farmer in Alabama, where he also held a contract for the carrying of the United States mail by a stage route. He was comparatively a young man at the time of his death. He wedded Mary Griffin, and of their children John G. was the eldest. The second son bore the name of Major, and the other children were Joseph, Sarah and Naney, the elder daughter having become the wife of a man named Modawell and Nancy having become the wife of Abraham S. Nail, who was a resident of Mississippi at the time of his death. Major John Lewis, father of Madison Earle Lewis, was a member of a staunch old Virginia family and was born about the middle of the eighteenth century. He was a patriot-soldier in the War of the Revolution, in which he served as a member of the Virginia company commanded by Captain Weeks, and he participated in the battles of Monmouth, Brandywine, Germantown, and Yorktown, besides the capture of Stony Point. Major Lewis became a citizen of prominence and influence in Rutherford county, North Carolina, where he was a leader in political affairs and where he served as county sheriff, two of his brothers having simultaneously held county office. He finally removed to Pendleton district, South Carolina, where he passed the residue of his life. Major Lewis married Annie Earle, who was born in 1763, and they became the parents of several children. Major Lewis was a son of John and Sarah (Taliaferro) Lewis, both natives of Virginia and representatives of old and honored Colonial families of that historic commonwealth,

John M. Lewis, to whom this sketch is dedicated, passed his childhood days in his native state and there received his rudimentary education. He was fourteen years of age at the time of the family removal to Texas and he was reared to maturity in the county where he still has his home. He attended the pioneer schools in Kaufman county.

Mr. Lewis was eighteen years of age at the time of the inception of the Civil War, and he promptly manifested his loyalty to the Confederacy by enlisting as a private in Company A, Sixth Texas Cavalry, commanded by Colonel Sullivan Ross. He took part in the battle of Elkhorn, Arkansas, and thereafter accompanied his command when its crossed the Mississippi river and went to the aid of Beauregard's army, at Corinth, Mississippi. He took part in the engagement at that point and also in the military operations incidental to the closing of the Vicksburg campaign, after which his regiment became a part of the Army of Tennessee, under General Joseph E. Johnstone, and took part in the Atlanta campaign, after which the Sixth Texas Cavalry accompanied General Hood's forces back to Tennessee. There Mr. Lewis took part in the battles of Franklin and Nashville, and in the engagement at Anthony's Hill be was shot in the left breast, the missile penetrating just above his heart. On the retreat from Nashville he was taken prisoner for a second time, his first capture having been in connection with the Holly Spring raid, in Mississippi, from which state he was taken as a prisoner of war to Camp Douglas, in the city of Chicago. He was released on parole and his exchange was soon afterward effected, at City Point, Virginia. He rejoined his regiment in Mississippi and thence went forth as a participant in the Atlanta campaign. After his second capture he was soon released, this action being taken by his captors when they discovered the serious nature of his wound. He finally made his way to the home of his uncle, Abraham S. Nail, in Mississippi, where he recuperated and where he remained several months after the close of the war. He arrived at his home, in Kaufman county, Texas, in September, 1865.

Mr. Lewis' first occupation after the close of his military career was in the gathering of seed for hedges, and this product he sold to northern hedge-growers at a good price. By this means he acquired his first cash He then obtained employment on the Daugherty stock ranch, in Kaufman county, and for two years he represented this extensive ranch in the marketing of cattle at Shreveport and Jefferson. He then engaged in agricultural pursuits, on a small tract of land near Forney, and to this line of enterprise he continued to give his attention until 1880, when he established himself in the general merchandise business at Forney. He became one of the most successful and popular merchants of this part of Kaufman county and long controlled a substantial and representative trade. He continued his mercantile business until 1910, when he sold the same, and he has since lived virtually retired, though he finds ample demands upon his time and attention in the general supervision of his fine landed estate, lying adjacent to Forney. He here owns a tract of more than six hundred acres, and the practical work of the place is given over to desirable tenants. Mr. Lewis bas made the best of improvements upon his estate and has made the same one of the model places of the northeastern part of Texas. In 1910 he erected his handsome residence, which is of the bungalow type, with spacious rooms and wide galleries encircling the building, and this ideal home is known as a center of gracious but unostentatious hospitality,

Mr. Lewis has not only achieved distinctive success through the medium of his own ability and well directed efforts, but he has also shown marked civic loyalty and public spirit. He has been prominently identified with the upbuilding of the town of Forney, where he has erected a number of business buildings, which he still owns, as does he also other local realty upon which be has made excellent improvements. He is a director of the cotton-oil company at Forney, which owns the light and ice plants in this village, and is also a stockholder of the Farmers' National Bank. Mr. Lewis has inviolable place in the confidence and esteem of the community that has long represented his home, has served as a member of the board of aldermen of Forney, and from 1878 to 1884 he held the office of county commissioner, the county court house having been completed and furnished within the period of his service as a member of the board of commissioners. He has ever been ready to lend his co-operation in the furtherance of measures and enterprises projected for the general good of the community, and in politics he is aligned as an uncompromising supporter of the cause of the Democratic party. He is one of the substantial capitalists of Kaufman county, is a representative citizen of this part of the state, is genial, sincere and kindly in his associa-tion with his fellow men, and he has reason to be well satisfied with the results of his many years of earnest satisfied with the results of his many years of camese endeavor, as well as with the gracious conditions that compass him now that he is permitted to enjoy the rewards of worthy and productive effort.

In 1867 Mr. Lewis wedded Miss Leona Dunnica, who was born in Cherokee county, this state, in 1850, and who is a daughter of the late John Dunnica, an honored Texas pioneer who came to this state from Kentucky during the Republic of Texas. In conclusion of this sketch is entered brief record concerning the children of Mr. and Mrs. Lewis: Edward C., who died in Kaufman county, married Miss Sallie Kelley, who survives him, as do also two children—Emma, who is the wife of M. G. Vernon, of Strawn, Palo Pinto county, and Jennie, who is the wife of Wallace E. Jones, of Forney. Frank, who is a representative business man of Forney, wedded Miss Elizabeth Dice. Miss Kate Lewis remains at the parental home. Jessie is the wife of Madison Brooks, who is engaged in the insurance business in Forney and who is a member of the board of county commissioners at the time of this writing, in 1914. John A., who is a prosperous farmer in Van Zandt county, married Miss Lillian Pendleton. Frederick M., who is engaged in the insurance business at Forney and who was graduated in the law department of Cumber-land University, at Lebanon, Tennessee, married Miss Laura Foster.

George J. Cook. The only proper way to measure success in life is to estimate the obstacles overcome. Measured by these standards, there are few more successful men in Texas than George J. Cook, of Eustace. Some of the details of his business career to be set down in a later paragraph, illustrate how men may often gain an exceptional success at a vocation for which they have absolutely no previous training, and in which apparently all the probabilities are against them.

The Cook family have been residents of Texas for many years, and was founded in this state by Joab Cook a Hardshell Baptist preacher in Rusk County. He sub-sequently moved further to Henderson, where he was also a pioneer, and died in Athens before the Civil war. He was the father of twenty-two children by two wives. Several of the children of his first marriage died before maturity, and the others are mentioned as follows: Thomas, who died in Henderson county, leaving a family; George, who also left a family at his death; John, who died in Texas with a family; Francis M., mentioned in the following paragraphs; Becky, who married James Simmons, and died in Navarroe country, Texas; Hettie, twin sister of Becky, who married Dr. Glover, and is now deceased; Emily, who married a Crosby, and died in Nacogdoches. By the second wife of Joab Cook, the following children were born: Benjamin, who died in Hill county, Texas, left a family there; Stephen, who has his home in Nacogdoches county; Josephen, who had and left a family; Margaret, wife of William Box of Henderson county; Cumile, who died the wife of Mr. Joss Davis in Henderson county; and Hannah, who married Amos Etheridge and resides in Navarro county.

Francis M. Cook was born in 1831. The circumstances of his childhood and youth prevented his getting even the first elements of book learning. He went through life without knowing the letters of the alphabet or being able to write his name. Notwithstanding that handicap he competed successfully with his fellow men, and at his death, November 21st, 1910, left a good estate. He was very sagacious in the barter and exchange of commodities, and by close attention to details gained a generous prosperity. He brought under cultivation some two hundred acres of land in the vicinity of Eustace. He was a staunch Democrat and stood for righteousness in business as well as in society. Because of physical weakness he was unable to carry a musket during the war, but he was loval to the Confederacy and did some important work within the boundaries of the state. He never missed an election and voted the Democratic ticket from early manhood until late in life. Francis M. Cook married Miss Catherine Star, a daughter of John Starr, who came from Illinois to Texas, Mrs. Cook having been born in the former state in 1839. The Starr family moved to Texas in 1843 and settled in Cherokee county. Francis M. Cook and wife had the following children: Thomas, who died in childhood; Jane, who married F. M. Leach, and resides in Henderson county; Catherine, who died in infancy; Ellen, who married John A. Owen, and lives in Henderson county; M. W., whose home is in Navarro county; Henrietta, who married James E. Rogers of Henderson county; John, whose bome is in Navarro county; George J., of Eustace; Robert, who died in childhood; Albert J., of Eustace; Cora, wife of R. S. Carpenter, of Jones county, Texas; Edward, also in Jones county; Edgar, a twin of Edward, who died as a child; Emily Ann, who died in infancy, and Jesse C., whose home is in Jones County,

It was in Tarrant county that George J. Cook was born January 18, 1867. His home and business activities have been centered about Eustace all his career. a boy he started in to bear the share of the family burdens, and he did so much work on the home place that he had practically no time to attend school, and his education gave him only the ability to spell out the words and read very slowly and stumblingly, to work the four general rules of arithmetic, and display a very poor hand at penmanship. He had never written a letter when he started out as a merchant, yet in spite of those adverse conditions he has made a useful citizen and a financial success in life. Mr. Cook remained with his parents until he was twenty-two years of age, at which time he began farming for himself, and by four erops gained a capital of five hundred dollars. Payne Springs, he established a store with a stock of goods valued at one hundred and fifty-three dollars. The hills submitted to him by the wholesale house showing cost of articles and indicating prices for selling were as so much Greek to him. For a time he sold goods at half what they cost him or double the amount, as the case happened to be. He worked over his bills, made a study of his business like a child learning his letters, and mastered the situation after great mental strain and much embarrassment in correspondence. He knew nothing of literary composition, spelled poorly, and his capitalization was in hit or miss fashion. Persistency and hard work will conquer many difficulties. At first his business little more than paid its way, and he helped out by chopping cotton and pulling fodder while watch-ing his store and training himself for merchandising. At the end of ten years he had gained a success probably much above his original expectations, and he sold out his stock of goods at five thousand dollars, that amount representing his net earnings during his ten years. In 1903, Mr. Cook moved to Eusface, and established a store there. He was a member of the firm of Cook & Campbell, whose establishment at the end of one year burned out with a net loss of six thousand dollars. With the insurance money of three thousand dollars the firm resumed business and after several months Mr. Cook purchased the interests of his partner, and continued alone for six years. Nearly twenty years of close attention to business had proved a severe strain upon his energies, and he then sold out and retired from general merchandising. In order to get more of outdoor employment, in November, 1912, he bought the lumber business of his father-in-law, the enterprise which he still has. Mr. Cook's net capital when he began business has already been stated. His preparation for a commercial life has been briefly suggested, and something of the success he has attained may be inferred from the substantial interest he now owns in Eustace. He built one of the best pressed-brick stores in Eustace, has a home ample for the comforts of his family, and also considerable property besides the stock of his lumber yards. He is vice-president and a director of the state bank of Eustace.

On December 11, 1910, Mr. Cook married Miss Lillie Melton, a daughter of Joab Melton, who was born on the site of the old brick hotel in Athens, Texas, in 1856, a son of Josiah Melton, who came to Texas as a young man and settled in Henderson county. Through several generations the Melton family have been prominent in Texas, but the record does not extend back beyond Josiah Melton, who was an orphan. Josiah married in Henderson county. Miss Emeline McMannus, a daughter of Joab McMannus, a pioneer Missouri settler, who lived for a number of years near Athens, and who died in 1906, at the age of eighty-seven. Joah McMannus married Rebecca Eads, and their children were Emeline and Mary, the latter the wife of John T. Paschal of Murchison, Texas. Josiah Melton moved to a farm ten miles north of Athens, soon after the birth of his son Joab, and died there in 1859. His widow subsequently married Hamp Phillips, and had children as follows: Thomas, Elijah, Rhoda, wife of O. T. Jeter, and Jacob, all of Henderson county. The children of Josiah Melton were: Leonidas, who died a few years ago at Shrevesport, Louisiana, Joah, and John-both the latter of Oklahoma.

Joab Melton grew up on the farm where his mother now lives and continued farming until he reached his majority, in the meantime getting a country school education, with also two or three years of training in the Goshen school, which was then an educational center of much importance. He began clerking at Goshen, and subsequently got into store keeping for himself. After twenty years he moved to Eustace in 1900, and estab-lished the lumber business which was conducted with. much success by him until it was sold to Mr. Cook, in November, 1912. Among other interests, Joab Melton has been identified with farm development and increased the material resources of Eustace by the erection of a good home, and in other ways. He served as president of the school board at the time the new school house was erected, and had active control of the work as superintendent. He is an elder in the Christian church, supermitmenent. The is an ender in the Christian church, and a Democrat in polities. Joah Melton was married November 9, 1885, to Miss Nannie Whatley, of Bell county, Texas, and a daughter of William Whatley, a farmer from east Texas. The Melton children are: Lottie, now Mrs. Gook; and Clara, wife of Simmons McLaughlin, of Eustice, the McLaughlin children being Pausford and Gladar. Bueford and Gladys.

To the marriage of George J. Cook and Miss Lillie Melton were born the following children: Lillian Ruth and Oscar Branch.

WILLIAM H. LEASE. Official honors were never bestowed more fittingly than on William H. Lease, present county and district clerk for Brewster county, with residence in Alpine. Mr. Lease has spent more than twenty-five years in western Texas, and is a product of the old cattle range, and the activities which preceded the present era of modern stock farming. He was thrown on his own responsibilities when but a child, and began riding own responsibilities when but a clini, and negan rules the range when he had difficulty in reaching up to the pommel of his broncho saddle. He learned the cattle industry in all of its details, and this practical and diversified experience was the foundation of the prosperity which he won for himself. For many years he has been in the cattle business on his own account, and now owns a splendid ranch in Brewster county.

William H. Lease was born in Edwards county, Texas, August 7, 1868. When he was three years of age his father died, and the mother had passed away somewhat sooner, so that he was reared in the family of a stepmother. Such education as he attained was from the country schools at limited periods of attendance, and when he was thirteen years old he began the battle of life on his own account. He took a position with the firm of Hurd, Finley & Kerr at Uvalde, and was quickly initiated into all the activities of the cattle range. He began at a salary of $20.00 per month, and continued working at a salary in different parts of the state until 1886. He then came out to Brewster county, where he accumulated a little herd of cattle, and during the next dozen years or so was energetically engaged in building up a ranch enterprise of his own. He has long since been numbered among the prosperous cattlemen of Brewster county, and his ranch in this county, located about fifty miles from Alpine, is a valuable property, and is still carried on under his non-resident management.

Mr. Lease has one brother and one sister in Texas. Mrs. Mary Kelso is a resident of Sabinal, where her husband is engaged in business; and Thomas M. is unmarried and is a rancher in Presidio county. At Alpine, on November 13, 1898, Mr. Lease married Miss Mollie Shoemake, whose father, James Shoemake, was a former resident of LaSalle county, this state. Mr. and Mrs. Lease are the parents of seven children, five sons and two daughters whose names are William A., Gladys, Mamie, Thomas M., Clarence A., Henry O., and Norma A. The family worship in the Baptist church, and Mrs. Lease is a member of the Ladies Aid Society of that church. Fraternally Mr. Lease is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Pretorians. As a good citizen of his community he is an interested member of the Alpine Commercial Club and also belongs to the social club known as the Mountaineers. It was on the Democratic ticket that he was elected to his present office as county and district clerk, but his popularity as a citizen and well known standing in the community were sufficient of themselves to have been honored with such an office. As an old cattleman, he still finds his greatest pleasure in riding out over the country on a good horse and among his cattle. He is particularly fond of a good speech or lecture, and says that he enjoys hearing a smart man talk no matter on what subject he may choose.

JUDGE GARLAND SAITH. The public administration of Jasper county affairs is in excellent hands, under the direction of Judge Garland Smith, now serving his first term as county judge. Judge Smith is a lawyer by profession, and represents the fourth generation of a family which has been identified with Texas since the year of the Revolution.

Judge Smith was born in Gaudalupe county, Texas, in 1882. His parents were Guy French and Mary J. (Johnston) Smith, and his paternal grandsire was French Smith, a native of Virginia and a Texas pioneer who located in this state in 1836, the year in which the battle of San Jacinto was fought, and in which the Texas Republic was established. He located in Gaudalupe county, at a place twelve miles from Seguin and four miles from Belmont, and there he long was resident. One of his daughters, Mrs. Dowdy, still resides on that old farm. French Smith saw service as a soldier in the Mexican war, enlisting from Texas, and was active in much of the strenuous life of early Texas, as many will be found to testify. He was a man of unique and in many ways pleasing characteristics, and much has been written and said of him in Texas publications. An article, especially happy in its portrayal of the character of the pioneer Texan, was published in a Seguin paper in 1900, under the caption of ''in Old Seguin' and under the initials ''S. S. P.'' This article so faithfully portrays the Colonel in his many little oddities and at the same time depicts his bigness of character, that generous quotation is here made verbatim from the sketch, with due credit accorded to the author, "S. S. P." The article follows in part: "Associated with our recollections is the tall form and classic features of Col. French Smith, who was one among the earliest settlers in Seguin -in fact, one of the original shareholders of the town. A Virginian by birth, a gentleman by nature, a man of many oddities, a citizen of many virtues, a man whose mouth was full of strange oaths but whose heart was full of human kindness-such was French Smith,

"Colonel Smith was one of several brothers. Peter, Paris and Anderson are the names of the brothers now remembered by the writer. They came to Texas in an early day and all saw more or less service in the military organizations of the infant republic. Prench Smith as a soldier was, as in everything else, a remarkable and distinctive character. Though ever ready to go forth to combat in defense of his country and in defense of the scattered families of the settlers, he was never a member of an organized company in Texas. He was a free lance; he sought no leadership himself, but he acknowledged no leadership in any other man as far as he personally was concerned. He morely asked the privilege of fighting if slighting was to be done. His name was found upon no other muster roll. Were he alive today he could not be placed upon the pension roll of veterans of the Mexican war, yet he participated in many bloody battles with the Mexicans and Indians.

"He claimed on all occasions that he had been in Texas since 'the year one,' and he disliked exceedingly to hear a man styled an old Texan' who had only been in Texas twenty-five or thirty years. We remem-ber on one occasion we attended a Democratic barbeeue near the mouth of Mill Creek. It was a presidential election year and there were numerous speakers present. One of them, one of the most gifted orators the county ever possessed, had closed one of his characteristic speeches in which he more than once had alluded sate speeches mark mark he more than once had antided to the fact that he was an old Texan, and had lived in Texas twenty-four years. Colonel Smith had not spoken, and with the close of Judge B.'s address, there came calls of 'Colonel Smith! Colonel Smith! A speech!' Slowly the giant form of the old man mounted the rostrum and for a moment his keen blue eyes scanned the vast audience before him. After a few preliminary remarks the speaker launched into one of the most stirring appeals to the people to stand by the Democracy that it was ever our fortune to hear. His speech was an appeal to the friends of good government, denunciation of the party in power, a quaint medley of persuasive eloquence, savage denunciation, pathos, wit, humor and anecdote. He alluded to the long years he had spent in devotion to the service of his adopted state, Texas, on the battlefield and otherwise, and that he, in truth, was entitled to call himself an 'old Texan.' Turning to Colonel B., who sat near by, Colonel Smith with ridicule in every twinkle of his eye and feature of his face, continued: 'My dear friend, Colonel B., has been pleased during the course of his remarks, to call himself an "old Texan," and to announce to you the fact that he has lived in Texas twenty-four years. Why, fellow citizens, when Colonel B. can say that he has lived in Texas half as long as French Smith, then he can begin to call himself an "old Texan," Seguin is now a thriving town and was a thriving town when Colonel B. first saw Texas. Yet, fellow citizens, old French Smith slept with his saddle under his head in what is now the public square of Seguin when this country was a howling wilderness; he has met and fought the wild Comanche Indian in his mountain fastnesses and picked the bones of the buffalo on these western prairies when Colonel B. was a sucking babe.

"The speaker descended from the platform amidst a burst of laughter and applause, and Col. B., though somewhat taken aback by the quaint comparison of their respective claims to the title of 'Old Texan,' warmly shook the band of the old veteran and congratulated him upon his excellent speech.

"On one occasion may years ago, Colonel Smith visited a neighboring town while district court was in session, and heing, as we suspect, in a somewhat hilarious mood, did, or omitted to die something in the presence of the court which his Honor thought merited a fine for contempt, and forthwith caused the clerk to enter a very heavy fine against the Colonel, and committed him to the custody of the sheriff until the fine he paid. The sheriff, not anticipating that the Colonel would take French leave, 'was a little lax in his watch, and the Colonel, seeing a good opportunity, quietly mounted his horse and rode away to Seguin, congratulating himself on the easy manner in which he had for the time being got out of a rather had box. Time passed on and another term of district court was about to convene in the same town, and Colonel Smith concluded it would be well to go over and settle his fine, which he did not most offer the most remarkable way a fine was ever settled before.

"It appears that between times there had been a change of Judge, Clerk and Sheriff. The new Judge was to hold his first term of court in the county and he was totally unknown to the sheriff and clerk of the court, as was also Colonel Smith. The Colonel arrived in town and learned that the new judge had not arrived but was expected to arrive and open court at any moment. An idea occurred to the Colonel, and he wended his way with much dignity to the court house. Entering the room he was promptly addressed as 'judge' by the new sheriff and clerk who were in attendance. Very gravely the Colonel assumed the Judge's seat and said, 'Mr. Sheriff, open the court. Mr. Clerk, give me the docket.' After turning the leaves for a while he said: 'Mr. Clerk, I observe that at the last term of court a very heavy fine was unjustly imposed upon Col. French Smith, an honorable and very respectable citizen of Seguin, and I shall exercise my first judicial authority as judge of this district in relieving Colonel Smith of the unmerited stigma upon his character. Therefore, Mr. Clerk, you will enter an order remitting the fine imposed upon Colonel Smith for contempt of court at the last term of this court, and I shall so mark it on the docket. Mr. Sheriff, it is late, and having traveled a long distance, the Court is tired and needs rest and refreshment. Please proclaim an adjournment of this court until tomorrow morning at nine o'clock.' Which was accordingly done and the crowd dispersed, remarking that though the session was short, the new Judge graced the bench with much dignity, and that his first official act was one of justice to a much injured individual.

"It is said that the joke was considered so good, and the new judge having some knowledge of the Colonel, did, in a more regular way, remit the fine.

"No man ever lived in Seguin who left more pleasant remembrances among his friends than did Col. French Smith. He was known far and wide for his openhearted generosity. No neighbor in distress ever appealed to him in vain. We do not believe he was ever appeared to him in vain. We do not believe he was ever a communicant of any church, but he occasionally at-tended divine worship. Often we have seen him sitting among the congregation of the faithful in the little log church near his home, listening with grace and dignified demeanor to the words of the preacher, and woe to the person, old or young, who disturbed the service. At one time he caused the Grand Jury to indict two young men who engaged in a quarrel near the church during services. He often entertained preachers in his home, the only drawback to the entertainment being the necessity of frequent apologies for unique swearing in the presence of his guest. But the preachers all liked Colonel Smith and never slighted him when money was to be raised for religious or charitable purposes.

"Colonel Smith was of the same type as Wash Jones and Phil Claiborne. He had the mannerisms of a bygone age. His dress and manner reminded one of the days of Clay and Webster and Calhoun. He had a magthough it might have served as a model for a Greek cameo."

It is not possible, with the space available, to quote further from the article from which the above is culled. but enough has been written to indicate something of the bluff frankness of the old pioneer, and to show in a measure what his life was in Texas and in what ways he was endeared to the people of his time. He lies buried within the limits of Seguin, on the bluff of the Guadalupe, along whose banks his feet wandered eighty years ago, when the great state of Texas was not yet a part of our domain, and was just emerging into independence from her Mexican bondage.

Guy French Smith, the son of Colonel French Smith and the father of Judge Garland Smith of this review. was born on the old homestead in Guadalupe county, and in 1884 he took his family from his native county into Uvalde county, in southwest Texas. He located on a ranch in that county on the line where it joins Zevalla county. There he was engaged in farming and stock raising for a number of years, but in 1896 he moved his home to east Texas in Jasper county, where his death occurred on March 30, 1906. Mrs. Mary J. (Johnston)

Smith is still living.

Garland Smith attended school at Uvalde and after coming to Jasper county at the age of fourteen entered the high school in Jasper. He took up the study of law at Jasper and in January, 1905, at the age of twentythree, was admitted to the bar. During 1907-08 Judge Smith served as county attorney, and in 1912 was worthily honored by the people of the county in his election to the office of county judge for a term of two years. It thus comes about that the grandson of Colonel French Smith actually takes his place on the bench as the duly accredited judge of the district, with the authority to remit a fine, should he feel so disposed, and none to dispute his ruling.

Besides his official duties, Judge Smith conducts a large law practice in the higher courts, and is a capable and efficient lawyer, and splendid type of the young public-spirited citizen. Judge Smith married Miss Jessie Swann, a native of Sabine county, and they have one daughter-Miss Garland Smith,

HON. JOHN R. McGee. The oldest established lawyer of Lubbock is John R. McGee. He has been identified with the Texas bar for more than twenty years, and about thirteen years ago located in Lubbock. The career of Mr. McGee contains many chapters of instructive experience. Left an entire orphan when but five years of age he had to make his way as only a poor orphan boy can. The Civil War came on about three years after the death of his mother, his father having died in the second year of his age, and under the prevailing conditions during the war and for several years thereafter afforded him rather meager opportunities for obtaining an education. He attended probably half a dozen terms of the country schools of those times and this was the extent of his schooling. Having a thirst for knowledge he formed the habit of reading good books in his young manhood and has been a close student all his life. He purchased the school text books after he was a grown man and took a curriculum course in them with himself as teacher. Being dependent on his own efforts for a means of support he did whatever his hands found to do in honorable pursuits. In 1875 he accepted a posi-tion as clerk in a general mercantile store at a salary of ten dollars per month with board and lodging furnished. From this small beginning he eventually became one of the leading merchants of Brady, Texas, but being ambitious for a learned profession put in most of his spare moments in close study until the year 1891 when he gave up the mercantile business and took up the law. Read law in the office of Walter Anderson, one of the leading attorneys of Brady, until 1893 when he was granted temporary license and the following year admitted to practice in all the courts of the state. John Ralph McGee, the subject of this sketch, was born April 25th, 1853, in Polk County, Texas, three miles west of Patrick's Ferry on the Trinity River, His father was a neighbor of Governor George T. Wood, second governor of Texas after it became a State, who lived in the same locality. Mr. McGee says that he has a more vivid recollection of Gov. Wood's pet bear than of the Governor. On the paternal side the ancestry was Scotch-Irish and on the maternal side Welsh. His grandfather, Ralph McGee, came to Texas in 1834 and first settled on the west bank of the Trinity River near what is now known as Point Blank in San Jacinto County and later moved to Moscow in Polk County. His grandfather, Isaac Jones, came to Texas in 1832 and settled on the west bank of the Trinity River in what is now the northern portion of San Jacinto County. Grandfather McGee was horn in Alabama in 1795, and Grandfather Jones was born in North Carolina in 1793, and they lived neighbors after coming to Texas. Grandfather McGee died in 1856 and Grandfather Jones died

Mr. McGee's parents were Absolom and Melissa (Jones) McGee. They were married in 1849 and lived happily together until 1855 when his father died and in 1858 his mother died. There were two sons born of this union, Henry and John, the latter being the subject of this sketch. Henry died in early childhood. Absolom McGee and his wife spent their married life on a two hundred acre tract of land presented to the latter by her father, Isaac Jones, and followed the pursuit of farming and were quite successful. John R. McGee, after the death of his mother, lived with his relatives in Polk County for about two years when he was placed with Richard Foster, first cousin, who moved with his family to De Witt County where they resided about four years returning to Polk County in January, 1864. In March of this year his grandannary, 1804. In March of this year his grand-father, Jones, "moved out west," taking Mr. McGee along when he was but a lad eleven years of age, stopping a few months in Williamson County; thence they moved to Hays County where they lived nearly four years. Running away from his grandfather in the spring of 1865 he spent the balance of his stay in Hays county with distant relatives of his father and strangers. In 1868 he went to live with an uncle, W. W. Jones, at Fort Mason in Mason County where he spent ten years of his life. During eight years of that time the wild Indians made frequent depredations in Mason and adjoining counties stealing horses and often killing and scalping the settlers. He had some of the exciting experiences of frontier life during that period going after and frequently running from the Indians. Served four months as a Texas Ranger under Capt. James M. Hunter in 1870.

In 1878 Mr. David Doole, a merchant of Mason, established a branch store at Brady, Texas, and sent McGee there in charge of that husiness. In 1882 he purchased Mr. Doole's interest in that store and continued the business until 1891 when he sold his mercantile interests and turned his attention to the law. He continued to reside in Brady until 1901 when he removed to Lubhock where he now resides.

At Mason, Texas, on June 18th, 1879, he was married to Miss Cassie Davis, who was born in Llano county, a daughter of Ben. F. Davis, an old settler of that Their four children are named as follows: G. R. McGee, a prosperous druggist of Dalhart; Ethel, deceased, who was the wife of H. B. Earnest, her death occurring March 9th, 1908, at Lubbock; Hattie, wife of C. O. Collins, a traveling salesman, and Phillip, who died in infancy.

Mr. McGee has made some advancement in Masonic circles. He was made a master mason in McCulloch Lodge No. 273, A. F. & A. M., at Mason, in December, 1880; was a charter member of Brady Lodge No. 628; his chapter degrees were conferred in Lubhock Chapter No. 248, R. A. M., in 1904; has taken the Cryptic degrees in the Council; he is affiliated with Lubbock Commandery No. 60 of the Knights Templar, having been dubbed a Knight Templar in Plainview Commandery No. 53 in 1909; served five years as district deputy grand master of the ninety-third Masonic district; Mr. McGee is an elder in the Christian Church.

He is a Democrat in politics and served several years as county chairman in McCulloch county. In 1878 he was elected county treasurer of McCulloch county and filled that office for nine terms, eighteen consecutive years. In 1906 he was elected county judge of Lubbock county and served in that office three terms, six years.

WILLIAM T. MOWDY, D. D. S., M. D. Known as a specially able representative of a vocation that is to be considered both as a profession and a mechanic art, Dr. Mowdy is engaged in successful practice in the city of Cameron, Milam county, and his large and important professional business denotes the popular estimate placed upon him as a man and as a skilled practitioner of both operative and laboratory dentistry. He has not only been most successful in the work of his profession but has shown also great circumspection in connection with capitalistic investments and business affairs, the while he stands exponent of loyal and liberal citizenship, as one of the progressive men of Milam county and its fine capital city or county seat.

Dr. Mowdy was born in Perry county, Alabama, on the 5th of April, 1858, and of the same county his parents likewise were natives, his father, William Mowdy, having been born on the 20th of November, 1823, and his mother, Mrs. Melinda (Laginer) Mowdy, having there been born on the 28th of October, 1826. William Mowdy came with his family to Texas in 1868, passing the first year in Panola county and then removing to Milam county, where he passed the residue of his life, the greater part of his active career having been devoted to the basic industry of agriculture, in connection with which he achieved definite success. He was one of the honored pioneer citizens of Milam county at the time of his death, which occurred February 9, 1900, and his wife survived him by about six years, her death occurwhile striving in 1907. They became the parents of nine children—Nancy E., Melinda E., Margaret F., John G., William T., Mary A., Allen W., Martin, and one who died in infancy.

Dr. Mowdy attended school in his native county, in Alabama, until he was ten years of age and he then accompanied his parents on their removal to Texas. He continued his scholastic discipline in the public schools of Milam county and in pursuance of higher training he then entered the University of Tennessee, in the department of dentistry of which institution he was graduated in 1888, with the degree of Doctor of Dental Surgery. For the purpose of fortifying himself further for his chosen profession he completed also a course in the medical department of his alma mater, the University of Tennessee, from which he received the degree of Doctor of Medicine in 1890. He has given his attention principally to the practice of dentistry and has kept in touch with all advances made in its scientific and mechanical phases. As a student in the university he had the distinction of winning a handsome gold medal, valued at fifty dollars, this having been the Founder's medal, awarded for the best evidence of proficiency on all subjects. He has also another medal, valued at twenty-five dollars, this being awarded him for making the best record of his class in his first course in the dental department of the university,

After his graduation Dr. Mowdy was engaged in the practice of deutistry in Hays county. Texas, for eight months. He then, on the 10th of May, 1890, established his residence at Cameron, Milam county, where he has since continued in the successful practice of his profession and where he has gained recognition as one of the representative dental surgeons of Texas. Doctor is a stockholder and director of the Texas Fidelity Bonding Company, of Waco, also the Peerless Fire-ity Bonding Company; he was formerly vice-president of the Gaston-Sprinkle Mercantile Company, of Cameron, with which he continued to be thus identified from 1901 until his retirement, in 1908; he is the owner of 400 acres of improved farming land in Milam county, 5,500 acres of coal and timber land in Tennessee, and 962 acres of oil and agricultural land in Mexico, and also has real estate property in Long Island, New York. His residence in Cameron is one of the most attractive in the city, even as it is one of the most hospitable of homes. He and his wife are members of the Christian' church in Cameron and he is affiliated with the local lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

On the 8th of October, 1881, Dr. Mowdy wedded Miss Josephine Parker, daughter of William S. Parker, of

W Mourly MADDS

Milam county, and she died in 1884, as did also their only child, Charles W. On the 26th of February, 1890, was solemnized the marriage of the Doctor to Miss Adelia Barnes, daughter of Dr. William C. Barnes. Of this union were born four children, of whom three are living—Charles W., Bettie M., and Thomas J. Susan A., the third child, died in infancy.

Haver L. Rix. The merchandising and business enterprise of Big Spring has no larger and more prosperous establishment than that of the Rix Furniture & Undertaking Company. The members of the Rix family connected with this company have shown themselves to be business builders of remarkable ability, and have not only established a large concern, but have carried it through all the preliminary difficulties to permanent prosperity. The business supplies furniture, house furnishings, musical instruments of all kinds, and practically everything that goes into a home from cellar to garret as permanent furnishings, and a separate branch of the business offers the most complete undertaking service and equipment to be found in all this part of Texas.

Harvey L. Rix, the active head of the business, was born in Cedar Creek, Wisconsin, on January 30, 1880. His ancestry is full blooded American, the first members of the family having come from England in 1645, and through the many generations have furnished men of prominence in affairs and business. The parents of Mr. Harvey L. Rix are Barnett and Eliza M. Rix, of Washington county, Wisconsin. His father was engaged as a farmer in that county before coming to Texas, and he brought his family to this state in 1887, first locating at Colorado in Mitchell county, and in 1890 came to Big Spring. While in Mitchell county he was engaged in stock raising and on coming to Big Spring opened a stock of hardware, which in 1896 e sold and then in 1905 joined his son Harvey in the furniture and undertaking business.

In 1910 the business was incorporated under the name of the Rix Furniture & Undertaking Company with a capital stock of $20,000. The stock of goods carried by the firm values at from eighteen thousand to twenty thousand dollars, and three buildings are occupied with the stock and the display rooms, besides the barns and other houses for the horses, hearses, vehicles and other equipment. One of the buildings was constructed especially for undertaking, and all the goods of that class of its equipment if contains a reception hall and chapel and morgue, and as undertakers the Rix Brothers control nearly all the business for a distance of one hundred miles about Big Spring. Both Harvey L. and his brother J. A. Rix are licensed embalmers.

Mr. Harvey L. Rix received his early education in the public schools and subsequently attended the Metropolitan Business College at Dallas, where he was graduated August 28, 1896. In politics he has always voted the Democratic ticket, and fraternally is affiliated with the Woodmen of the World, and the Modern Order of Pretorians. His church is the Methodist South. On June 15, 1994, he married Bertha Deats of Big Spring, daughter of L. T. and Elizabeth Deats. Her father is now mayor of Big Spring and a well known financier, is now mayor of the Spring and self-the English of the Christian of the

GREENLEAR L. BROWN. The live stock industry and general business interests of West Texas have had no more capable nor more successful representative during the past thirty years than Greenleaf L. Brown, now and for many years a resident of Big Spring. Mr. Brown is the owner of thousands of acres of this west Texas county, and has his herds scattered over country which is almost an empire in extent. He is a banker, and having had his ranch headquarters in the vicinity of Big Spring before the building of the railroad and the founding of the town, his interest has always been devoted to the progress of this locality and he has probably done as much as any other individual citizen for the advancement and welfare of the community.

Greenleaf L. Brown represents a family which has been prominent in Texas since the time of the Republic, and Brown county, where Mr. Brown was born, at Brownwood, on February 2, 1861, was named in honor of this family. His parents were William Franklin and Elizabeth (Gilliland) Brown, both of whom were born at Atlanta, Georgia. William F. Brown, now one of the most venerable old residents of Texas, was married first in the 'thirties and his wife, the mother of our subject, died when her son was about eight years old. The father married again at Atlanta, and in 1867 brought his bride in a wagon drawn by ox teams the entire distance from Georgia to San Augustine county, Texas. The first born children, Martha and John, came with them. Subsequently he moved into the Brazos Valley, and finally in 1857 located permanently in Brown county, where he still resides retired in peace and comfort at the age of ninety-three years. He is a hale and hearty man for all his varied experiences and career and usefulness. He has one sister, Eliza Gilham, who The wife of William E. Brown died in 1872, and he sub-sequently married Miss Talitha Harris, who died December 5, 1912, at the age of eighty-seven. William F. Brown served in the Indian wars of Georgia and Alabama during the campaigns of the 'thirties which finally subdued the native tribe in the southeastern state. When he was seventy-five years of age, his application for a pension in reward of these Indian war services was finally approved and he received $1,100.00 in back pay and is now enrolled on the regular pension list. He is probably one of the oldest Indian fighters in the United States and his services are receiving only a just recognition, belated though it is, from the national govern-

Farming and stock raising were his regular pursuit until be retired. In the early days he frequently took berds of cattle from Brown county across the country to Shrevesport, La. A successful business man he was always high in the steem of his community, and was always high in the steem of his community, and was always high in the steem of his community, and was always high in the steem of his politics is the old school Democracy. William E. Brown was the father of twelve children and four are now living. W. H. Brown, his oldest now, was killed in western Texas by the Comanche Indians in 1875, John P. Brown, the oldest living son, is a critical farmer in Brownwood; Missouri is the wife of Rev. W. D. G. Anderson, a Baptist minister in Comanche country, G. L. Brown is the next in age of the living children and Emma is the wife of Samuel Tipton of Brown country.

Mr. G. L. Brown received his education in the public schools of Brown county, and eft school when seventeen years of age. His carliest associations were with ranch life, and he was a covboy as soon as he would ride a horse. He went out to Mitchel county, after leaving school, and worked as a condowled county for ten years. Saving his carnings he finally began in the cattle raising business on his own account. During the early years of his operations in what are now Mitchell and Sterling counties there was no settlement at Big Spring, although the springs attracted several cattle outfits to that vicinity. After the railroad station was established there in 1881, Mr. Brown became one of the first permanent settlers of the town. He afterwards sold out his interests in that locality, then transferred his operations to the panhandle and to New Mexico, but finally returned to west Texas and located in Howard county in 1897. From year to year his business grew in magnitude, and his herds increased until he was running from 2.500 to 25.000 head of cattle over his various ranches in Howard, Sterling and Ector counties. Mr. Brown recalls the fact that he bought full grown cows in Texas some years ago at 80.25 per head, while at the present time he is paying $31.00 per head for calves. In an experience of thirty years he has weathered all the ups and downs of stock raising, and in the final result has acquired such a success as few men in the state can exhibit as a result of their life's work. Mr. Brown is now the owner of eight thousand acres of land in Ector county and five thousand acres in Howard county.

As already stated, Mr. Brown has been a leader in the upbuilding of Big Spring. He organized the west Texas National Bank in 1903, and was the principal member of the company which constructed the finest bank and office building in the city, a modern fireproof structure, steam heated, and a credit to the city. Mr. Brown has been president and the largest stockholder in the bank since its organization and is also a large stockholder in the bank of Coahoma. He and his family enjoy the comforts of a beautiful home in Big Spring.

Mr. Brown is a Royal Arch Mason, has been affiliated a with the order for some fifteen years, and is also a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He was married in El Paso, April 18, 1888; to Miss Eddie Lee, who was born in Lampassa county, daughter of Andrew Peter and Mattlda (Masters) Lee. Her father was a native of Missouri, and her mother of Texas, Mr. Lee, her father, mow deceased, was one of the old stockmen of west Texas, and during the time of the Indian wars served as eaptain of a company of minutemen. The three children of Mr. and Mrs. Brown are as follows: Burton, who has already taken his place as one of the leading stockmen of Ector county, with residence at Odessa; Ethel, who is a student in the Texas Christian University; and Enla, also a student in the same university.

HON, JAMES R. HARPER. The first public office that Hon, James R. Harper ever held was that of Justice of the Peace, to which he was elected in 1892, and which office he held for one term. Since that time he has filled numerous offices calling for a higher quality of service, and today is serving as Chief Justice of the Court of Civil Appeals of the Eighth Supreme Judicial District, with J. F. McKenzie and E. F. Higgins as associate judges.

Jacks Harper was born in Jackshoro, Texas, on May 28, 1869, and has lived in his native state all his life. He is the son of William R. and Sarah Elizabeth (Ayres) Harper, natives of Illinois and Kentucky, respectively. The father came to Texas from Illinois in the early fifties, here engaging in the business of farming and stock raising. He was a carpenter and builder by traite, and though he gave some little attention to the work in Texas, he achieved his greater material prosperity as a result of his acquantance with the soil and with the stock business. He died in 1871 and is buried in Jackshoro, Texas, His widow survived until 1904, and is resting by his side. They were the parents of six children, and of that number James R. Happer of this retiew was the fifth born child and the youngest

James R. Harner received his early education in the public schools of Denton county, the same being followed by a course in the University of Texas where he took the junior course in law. Upon leaving college he returned to his home town and there resumed the study of law, gaining admittance to the lar in 1990, when he came to EI Paso and took up the practice of his profession. EI Paso has from that day represented his home and the seene of his principal legal activities and he has gained a name and fame far in excess of that which is accorded to the average aspirant for legal honors.

Two years after locating here Judge Harper was elected to the office of Justice of the Peace, in which he continued for one term. In 1896 he was elected county Judge, in which office he served until 1902. He was in the latter year chosen for the office of District Attorney, in which he continued until September, 1904, when he was appointed District Judge to fill an unexpired term. He was elected to the office of district judge at the succeeding election, so well did he acquit him-self in the discharge of his duties, and served until December 1, 1912, when he was appointed to the post of chief justice of the court of the Eighth Supreme Judicial District, again to fill out an unexpired term. This appointment resulted in his election to the office at the next election, and he is now serving on the bench as Chief Justice of the district. In his various offices Judge Harper has dispensed a quality of justice that has admitted of no questionings, and he has proven the calibre of his judgeship to be of the highest order,

As a Democrat, stanch and true, he has taken an active interest in local and state polities, and has been foremost in the political battles that have been waged in his district since he came to be a voter and a man of affairs. By reason of his early initiation in the realm of public office, Judge Harper maintains little or no private practice, the duties of his office restraining him from giving attention to private matters. Judge Harper is fraternally identified with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and is a member of the Christian Church, although Mrs. Harper has membership in the Presbyterian Church of El Paso. The marriage of Judge Harper took place on June 30, 1910, when Clara Belle Deason, the daughter of Mrs. Mary B. Deason, of Denton county, Texus, became his wife. Two children have been born to them, Mary Elizabeth and Frank. Mrs. Harper is prominent socially in El Paso, and has a leading place in the club life of the city, while she takes a wholesome interest in charitable and philanthropic work in her home community, and is president of a local school organization.

Judge Harper has naught but the kindest of things to say for the state of Texas, and regards it as a place where honest effort will never fail of its material reward. He lays especial stress upon the abundant opportunities that are open to the man who is upon farming bent, and sees for such men the brightest possible future.

JOHN K. WEBSTER, M. D. To a profession which probably has the largest range of social service, Dr. Webster has given his energies and talents for a period of over twenty years, and since 1907 has been active in practice at Athens. in which neighborhood he was reared from childhood, Dr. Webster is well qualified for the work of a physician, and though a quiet, unassuming gentleman, has often exercised his influence for the seafform of his lower town and comput.

states broke out he enlisted as a Confederate, and was commissioned an officer of his company some time during his service. Later he was detached from his command for special duty in his state, and at the final surrender he and his comrades disbanded and left the field. The disappointment he suffered at the termination of the war told upon him throughout his life, and he seemed to have experienced little satisfaction in the political or social sphere of our national life thereafter. He took no part in Confederate Veterans' reunion, and as little interest in politics as an observant of the ordinary proprieties would sanction. His strong prejudices would have made him a Democrat even if his ideas as to public policies had not themselves drawn him into the ranks of that party. He served as a member of the first board of aldermen at Athens, and aided in starting the machinery of local government. He was also an elder in the Presbyterian church.

William J. Webster brought his family from Carthage, Moore county, North Carolina, to Texas, in 1872. The trip to Texas was made by boat as far as New Orleans, and then by a river boat up to Shreveport, whence they followed the Texas and Pacific Railroad to Hallville, which was then its terminus. From there they took a wagon overland to Palestine, where the family lived one year, and in 1873 reached Athens. At Athens, William J. Webster resumed his trade, and for a number of years was busy with the construction of many homes and other buildings in Athens and vicinity. Such has been the material growth of the county seat in recent years that few of those buildings stand. His death occurred at Athens when seventy-two years six months of age, and his wife died in 1896. Her maiden name was Isabel Kelly, a daughter of Angus Kelly of North Carolina. Their children were: Daniel; Dr. John K.; Nannie, the wife of Mr. Adams of Athens; and Mollie, who married a Mr. Weaver.

Dr. Webster was eight years of age when the family moved to Athens, and after getting a common schooling, his first experience was in working under his father at carpentry, and also at farming. He later entered the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville, where he was graduated M. D. in the class of 1891. Returning to Texas he began his practice of Malakoff, where he remained and enjoyed a large and prosperous patronage until 1907. In that year he moved to Athens, opened his office, and has since enjoyed the best of professional connections. In 1900 Dr. Webster took a post-graduate course in New Orleans Polyclinic. He is a member of the County and State Medical Societies, and has served as president of the Henderson county society. Through his profession he has also given some public service, chiefly through the office of health and county physician. His politics are revealed only when he votes the Democratic ticket. Dr. Webster is an elder in the Presbyterian church.

In February, 1897, was celebrated the marriage of Dr. Webster with Miss Mattie Smith, a daughter of W. C. Smith, of the mercantile house of Smith & Smith at Malakoff in Henderson county. Mrs. Webster's family are old and respected residents of this part of Texas. The children of the doctor and wife are Mary Belle, born in 1898; Flora, born in 1903; and William Smith, born in 1906. The family home is on Tyler Street in Athens.

FREDERICK J. BURKEY. Thirteen years of continued residence in Houston have brought to Frederick J. Burkey a prominence among the more solid citizens of the community of which he is well worthy. In these years he has been active in the veterinary field and with his son, Fred H. Burkey, carried on a widespread practice as a veterinary surgeon of especial ability. Though a resident of Texas since 1890, it was not until the year of the Galveston disaster that he located in Houston, his first ten years in Texas being spent in Galveston.

Mr. Burkey, it should be said, is a native son of Illinois. He was born in Jonesboro, that state, on October 21, 1859, and is the son of John B. and Elizabeth (Von Thierstein) Burkey, both natives of Switzerland, who came to the United States in about 1859. They made their first American home in Illinois, and became citizens of genuine worth. The father, in fact gave his life for the hest interests of his adopted country, for when the war broke out he enlisted in the Union army, and later died in Cincinnati as a result of wounds received at the battle of Fort Donelson,

The boyhood of Frederick Burkey was one attended by a good many hardships, his orphaned state being an unenviable one, and his early education was of such an order as to be an almost negligible factor. Of schooling he had but little, and it might be said with all propriety that he secured his education in the well known school of "hard knocks." He was not one to submit easily to the ill winds of Fortune, and it is much to his credit that he was, through various means, able to make his way through the Chicago Veterinary College, from which he was graduated in 1890.

In the year of his graduation, Dr. Burkey came to Texas, locating almost immediately in Galveston, where for ten years he gave himself to the work of his pro-fession. During that time he spent four years as a special student at the Medical Department of the University of Texas, at Galveston, devoting his studies mainly to microscopical work in that institution and furthering his professional efficiency greatly as a result thereof. In 1900, when Galveston was destroyed by the great tidal wave that inundated the city, Dr. Burkey came out of the disaster financially ruined. Precisely speaking, he possessed fifty cents in actual coin of the realm when he began to look about him after the blow fell. Thus it was that Dr. Burkey began life over again after ten years of faithful work, but this time he took up his professional labors in a new field, Houston being the city of his choice.

Dr. Burkey has never had occasion to regret his choice of a new location, for he has prospered most happily in this city. He has an excellent following in his profession, and is highly regarded among well known veterinary surgeons of the South,

Aside from his professional duties, Dr. Burkey has found time to devote to other affairs, and he is today one of the most prominent Masons in Texas. It is worthy of mention that he has gained his high position in the old and honored order as a result of his actual labors in the interests of the society. For several years past he has been chairman of the Board of Masonic Relief, and he devotes a generous portion of his time to Acties, and he decoies a generous portion of his time to this work, which is among the most important branches of its activities. His titles and offices in the Masonie order may be briefly mentioned as follows: Past Worshipful Master of Gray Lodge, No. 329, A. F. & A. M.; Past High Priest of Washington Chapter, No. 2, R. A. M.; Past Eminent Commander of Ruthven 2. R. A. M.; Past Emment Commander or Rutuven Commandery, Knights Templar; Past Wise Master of Lodge of Perfection, A. & A. S. R. He is also a mem-ber of El Mina Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S., and a member of Texas Consistory, No. 1, being a Mason of the thirty-second degree. His most recent Masonic honor was conferred upon him on October 21, 1913, he have a monitored a Knight Companyler of the when he was appointed a Knight Commander of the Court of Honor of the Supreme Council, A. & A. S. R. This last honor is directly due to the excellent work Dr. Burkey has done in his varied important Masonic connections, and comes as a Reward of Merit, as one might say, at the hands of his Masonic brothers. As such, it is a distinction of which he may well be proud, and it is undeniable that he has added not a little to the excellencies of the manifold activities of the order in this state.

In the year 1877 Dr. Burkey was married to Miss Anna Grunert, who was then a resident of Milwaukee, Wisconsin. Three children have been born to them. Emma, the eldest, is the wife of F. M. Whitman, a resident of Houston, while Fred H. and Frances are still members of the family home circle. The Burkey residence is maintained at 1711 Preston avenue.

D. LEON SANDERS, M. D., of Wills Point, where he has been engaged in practice since 1906, is the representative of one of the oldest families in the south, members of the family having been identified with affairs in Alabama, North Carolina and Texas for sev-

Born in Ben Wheeler, Texas, on October 2, 1871, Dr.
Sanders is the son of Levi L. Sanders, a retired merchant and farmer of Ben Wheeler, himself the son of Benjamin Sanders, a blacksmith of Jackson county, Alabama. The latter was killed by the Federals during the war of the sixties. He was born in North Carolina, and was the son of an Irishman of that state, who died in Alabama when he was more than one hundred years of age. He had two sons and six daughters, and one of his sons was Levi L., the father of Dr. Sanders of this review.

Levi L. Sanders was born in Jackson county, Alabama, in 1837, and he learned something of blacksmithing from his father while in his youth. He became dissatisfied with his home while yet a mere boy and ran away, thinking to better his conditions and for a time he was employed on a Mississippi River Steamboat. When he reached Texas in 1848, he found a home with Rev. Nels King, of Rowlett, Dallas county, and he stayed there until he took unto himself a wife, Miss Susan Collins, who was a daughter of William and Minerva Collins. Our subject's mother had three brothers, Leon, Van and Tom, who were Texas Rangers and who were stationed at Ft. Worth with Gen. Worth, who was in command of the fort, Ft. Worth being named in honor of him. And it was through the three brothers' influence that the Collins family came to Texas in the pioence that the Collins family came to Texas in the pioner days, and Collin county was named in honor of some of the Collins boys. Levi Sanders was a settler to Texas from Alabama. In Oak Cliff, Dallas county, he established his home. The town was then in embryo, and he opened a shop, engaged in blacksmithing, and continued there for a few years. He moved then to Brownsboro, in Henderson county, going there prior to the war, and after four years of residence there he is also the Considerate and was a mechanic in the conjoined the Confederate army as a mechanic in the company of Captain Bridges, Company O, Sixth Texas Infantry Regiment in General Ross's Brigade, and he was made brigade blacksmith by General Ross. He served throughout the war without accident or untoward happening, and when peace was restored he returned to his place at the anvil, moving his shop to Ben Wheeler, in Van Zandt county, continuing there in his trade until about 1870. when he established himself in the merchandise business in Ben Wheeler, continuing in that enterprise until 1905. During the passing years he prospered, in whatever line of business he was engaged in, and he acquired con-siderable farm lands thereabout and developed a number of fine farms, at the same time engaging to a greater or less extent in the business of stock raising. He was well in the advance of his community in the introduction of blooded horses and cattle and in the breeding of fine mules, as well, and the influence he had thus spread abroad over a considerable portion of the country. He has ever been an active man in the Methodist church, and is a Master Mason. He is a Democrat, and as a veteran of the Civil war is an enthusiastic member of the Confederate Veterans of the South.

The first wife of Levi L. Sanders died in 1877, and she left children as follows: Lorenzo Dow Sanders, who died in Smith county, Texas, in 1899, leaving a family; Henry W., died in Leon county, this state, also leaving a family; Mrs. H. J. Craft, of Canton, Texas; Mrs. H. E. Wallace, the wife of Dr. Wallace of Ovalo, Texas; B. Franklin, a resident of Ben Wheeler, Texas; Josiah, who died unmarried; Dr. Leon, of this review Mrs. T. C. Sharp, of Leon county, Texas; Levi S. died young, and James F., a merchant of Ben Wheeler, Texas. Later in life Mr. Sanders married Fannie Smith, the daughter of Nick Smith, a German resident of Ben Wheeler, and their children are Morgan G., county attorney of Van Zandt county, and Grace; the wife of Henry Cates, a farmer of Van Zandt county.

Dr. Leon Sanders was born in Ben Wheeler, Texas, on October 2, 1871. When he had finished the common schools he studied in Alamo Institute, and then took a course in Transylvania University, being graduated therefrom with the degree of B. S. He entered the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville and was graduated there in 1894, after which he spent two years in school teaching in the country schools of Van Zandt county. When he was ready for medical practice he located at Edom, and he came to Wills Point in 1906, where he has since continued. Since his graduation Dr. Sanders has taken four post graduate courses in the New Orleans Polyclinic. He is a member of the County and State Medical Societies and the North Texas and the Southern Medical Associations, and is secretary of the county society.

Dr. Sanders is a Mason, with affiliation in the junior orders, and he is a Pythian Knight and a member of the Woodmen of the World.

The Doctor has been twice married. He was married first on July 5, 1893, in Van Zandt county, to Miss Alice nrst on July 2, 1893, in van Zandt county, to Miss Altee Gray, whose father was Dr. A. J. Gray. She died in 1907, leaving three small daughters—Constance, Blanche and Mary Lee. On June 30, 1909, Dr. Sanders mar-ried Miss LaNear Aldridge, a daughter of John H. Aldridge, of Weatherford, Texas. They have no chi-dren. Dr. Sanders is a member of the Methodist church, and has for years been a member of the Texas State Historical Association, and is a member of The National Geographical Society.

Hon. Edwin J. Mantooth. It is rare indeed that nature, in the distribution of her gifts, favors an individual with so many and varied talents as are possessed by Judge Edwin J. Mantooth, of Lufkin. Well known in financial affairs as vice-president of the Lufkin National Bank, prominent in industrial and commercial concerns of this city and at times the incumbent of high official position, he is one of his community's men of power and influence. Also for many years he has been known as one of this section's most distinguished legists, is dean of all the attorneys of Angelina county, and because of his long connection with the bar and with those movements and measures which have had a direct bearing upon the welfare and upbuilding of this region, it would be difficult to find an individual who has a more intimate knowledge of the events which have shaped its history and the men who have promoted its progress. He has been a resident of Texas since 1857, and is a son of Thomas Mantooth who brought his family hither from Tennessee, made the journey by wagon, crossed the Mississippi river at Natchez and located first on the Neches river in Angelina county. He was a cattle man and small farmer and soon located at Homer, then the county seat of Angelina, where he died in 1865.

Thomas Mantooth was born in North Carolina February, 1811, and was a son of Thomas Mantooth, who died in the Old North state. He acquired little more than the elemental principles of an education, rather shunned public appearance, but was induced to accept the office of probate judge. He opposed secession until Texas left the Union, when he lent his moral aid to the cause of the South. He possessed strong personal convictions, expressed them rather decidedly but with consideration for the feelings of others and was a man of wide popularity. He was of Scotch blood and was, it is believed, of colonial ancestry. In his family relations, Thomas Mantooth, Jr., married first Mary Sisk, and they became the parents of the following children: Albert, who died in Lufkin in 1899 and left a family; Eveline, who married Austin Vinson and died here in 1893; John, who passed away in 1859, unmarried; and Calvin, who is a retired merchant and an ex-Confederate soldier and resides at Lufkin. For his second wife Mr. Mantooth was married to Miss Lydia Dillon, a Tennessee woman and of Irish blood. She was born in 1829 and she and her husband and a young daughter passed away at the same time as a result of poison administered to them by a quack doctor of the community, who, however, had no intention of committing a crime. Of their eight children, seven grew up, namely: Lafayette, a prominent physician and surgeon, who died in 1911, at Lufkin, leaving a family; Edwin J., of this review; W. Blackburn, who passed away here in 1901 and left children; Florence, who is Mrs. W. H. Bonner, of Lufkin; Hester, who married B. L. Me-Pherson, of Lufkin; and Thomas C., ex-sheriff of Angelina county, who also is a resident of this community.

Edwin J. Mantooth was born in Cocke county, Tennessee, April 10, 1852, and was educated in the rural schools. His youth was passed as a farmer and at eighteen years of age he took a clerkship at Homer with a dry goods house. As a further preparation for life he subsequently attended an academy at Pennington, Trinity county, Texas, and made his law preparation in Cumberland University, Lebanon, Tennessee, where he was graduated with the class of 1879.

Mr. Mantooth was admitted to the bar at Homer during that same year by Judge Wood, and upon the recommendation of his examining committee, composed of Judge R. H. Guinn, Judge Sam A. Wilson, H. G. Lane and R. E. Borden. He was elected county attorney immediately and tried his first important case in court as the incumbent of that position. He declined a second term and entered the practice alone, and, save for his present professional association, and his partnership with W. J. Townsend, he has practiced his calling alone. He is now senior member of the law firm of Mantooth & Collins, and his practice for years has been largely in land and corporations and in closing up estates of deceased persons, several of which he has handled as executor without bond and which have involved property worth from one hundred and fifty thousand to two and one-half millions of dollars.

Mr. Mantooth's business connections are extensive and varied. He owns a majority of the stock of the Lufkin Telephone Company, which he promoted; was one of the organizers of the Lufkin National Bank, and has been its vice-president and a member of its directing board ever since; is a stockholder of several lumber mills of the county and is general counsel for all of them, and his contributions to the building interests of Lufkin have been large, including his personal residence on Ragnet street. Here his grounds are the largest of any private home in Lufkin, and in addition he holds much other valuable real estate in the city.

Among his early appearances in politics was as a delegate in the convention that named Horace Chilton over W. B. Herndon for delegate to the National Democratic Convention. He was also a delegate to the state convention that nominated Hogg for attorney general, and to the convention that nominated Throckmorton, Hubbard and Hogg for governor and supported the latter all through his political campaigns. In the state-wide movement of 1887, Judge Mantooth was in the campaign for prohibition and has been more or less connected with the battles for temperance in the state ever since. He is not connected with any fraternal order, but is a member of the Christian church, and has been liberal in its sup-

On May 31, 1874, Judge Mantooth was married at Lufkin to Miss Callie Watson, a daughter of David and Jean (Clark) Watson. Mr. Watson came to Texas before the outbreak of the war between the South and the North, from Mississippi. He spent his life as a farmer, and reared only one child. Judge and Mrs. Mantooth have had these children: Louis P., who died at the age of thirty years, leaving four children by his wife, who had been Lela Bonner; Edwin Wood, M. D., a graduate of Tulane University, who died in 1910, at the age of twenty-eight years; Dell, who is the wife of W. E. Lanter, of Orange, Texas; Winnie, now Mrs. G. W. Shotwell, a merchant of Lufkir; Milton, of this city; Chloe, the wife of C. B. Collins, law partner of Judge Mantooth; Cleo, who married Kester Denman, a successful practicing lawyer of Lufkin; Winifred, who died at the age of thirteen years; and Misses Robbie and Mollie, who make their home with their parents.

JOHN HUMPHRIS. The real estate business of Presidio county and Marfa has no more enterprising business man than John Humphris, who does a general business in real estate, but does not confine his attention to brokerage and handles a large amount of his own property. One of the old residents of this section of the state, although he is himself not an old man, but rather belongs to the progressive and vigorous young generation of men who are doing big things in this part of the state.

John Humphris is a native of England, where he was born December 23, 1868. His parents were John and Mary (Walker) Humphris, both natives of England. The father came to Texas about 1871 and was engaged in the live stock and mercantile business for many years, his name being prominently associated with business af-fairs in Marfa. He took considerable interest in politics and was at one time sheriff of Duval county. He was an active member also of the Episcopal church, as is his wife, who now makes her home in Marfa. The father died in 1900 at the age of fifty-five years. There were five children in the family, John, being the oldest.

The first settlement of the family after arriving in the United States was in Maryland, where John Humphris attained to the age of eight years, and then accompanied the family to Texas in 1874. He has now been a resident of this state for nearly forty years. first home selected by the parents was at Corpus Christi, where they lived for about five years, thence removed to Duval county, where their home was for another five years and thence to Maverick county, and finally in 1883 to Presidio county. The early education of Mr. John Humphris was as the result of private instruction from his mother, who was a woman of unusual intelligence and great strength of mind and soul. Subsequently he studied in the public schools, and bad a high school course in San Antonio and a training in a business college. When he was fifteen years of age he left school, and attained his first position which paid him regular wages, as manager of the Commissary on a sheep ranch. Subsequent to this he worked in a mercantile establishment and continued in this way for about twenty years. During part of this time he was manager of the Shafter store, and subsequently eashier of the Marfa establishment. In 1908 he resigned and established his own office in the general real estate, abstract and insurance business, and his deals cover a wide scope of country in this part of Texas.

Mr. Humphris has a family of five children, three sons and two daughters, named Herbert, Hester, May, Oren and Robert. The family worship in the Episcopal church and he is a member of the Masonic order. He is also an active worker in the Marfa Commercial Club. In politics he is a Prohibitiouist though he takes no active part in party affairs. In the list of county offi-cers of Presidio county, Mr. Humphris' name is found opposite the office of county treasurer, in which he served for one term. He is a supporter of the wholesome outdoor sports, particularly of base-ball, and has the distinction of having played on the first base-ball team organized in Marfa. His tastes also run to music and general literature, and he has had a wholesome well-rounded development of character which enables him to sympathize with and take an interest in all the activities of his community.

Dr. Marion R. Mahon. In Marfa and Presidio county the best medical practice is that possessed by Dr. Mahon, who has been identified with this locality since 1906, and in that time has built up a splendid business professionally and has acquired a foremost place in the civic life of this town and county.

Marion R. Mahon was born in Gonzales county, Texas, September 1, 1868, representing one of the old families in that section. All his life has been spent in Texas, and for his early education he attended private schools. His career has been one of self-advancement and he made his way from boyhood and followed different lines of work in order to pay for his medical education. After leaving high school, he attended Trinity University at Waxahachie, where he was a student for three years. At the age of nineteen he became clerk in a merchandise house. While a student in Trinity, and also while working in the store, he pursued his medical studies and during four years of mercantile experience he was very thrifty and saved his money to enable him to continue his professional preparation in medical college. Then in 1905 he came out to Marfa and opened his office and soon attained his first cases. Dr. Mahon has a personality in whom people naturally repose great confidence, and his oft-quested ability as a physician has won him rapid advancement and as already mentioned he undoubtedly enjoys the best practice in this section of the state. Dr. Mahon has been twice married. At Cuero, Texas, he married Miss Alice L. Heard, who died in 1903. His second marriage occurred at Austin in 1907 to Miss Lena Bishop. His four children are all by his first wife, and are named: Mabel C., Willie Mae, Alice L., and Eldnar, all being daughters. The doctor and Mrs. Mahon are both active members of the Methodist Church, and he is affiliated with Masonry in the Blue Lodge and Chapter and is also a member of the Woodmen of the World. As a public spirited citizen he has membership in the Marfa Chamber of Commerce, is a Democrat though not active in party affairs and since 1908 has been county health officer for Presidio county. For the past six years he has also served as local and examining surgeon for the Southern Pacific Railway at Marfa. Each year Dr. Mahon takes a trip for hunting and recuperation in the splendid outdoor country of western Texas. Among the various classes of amusement and entertainments he enjoys particularly a good speech or lecture.

Dr. Mahon's father was William T. Mahon, who was born in Virginia, and came to Texas when a boy of sixteen, and in 1861 entered the Confederate army serving as a loval soldier of the South from the beginning to the end of the war. He also saw much service as a Texas ranger, belonging to that intrepid force of citizen soldiery for a number of years. Stock raising and general farming were the business occupations to which he devoted his attention with much success. He was a member and deacon in the Presbyterian church and died in 1909 at the age of seventy a good Christian gentleman. He is buried in Gonzales county. His wife's maiden name was Mattie Randle, who was born in Texas, where she married, and she now resides at the old home in Gonzales county. She is also an active member of the Presbyterian church. There were three children in the family, all sons, the doctor being the oldest and the other two named as follows: William E. Mahon, who is a rancher and makes his home in the doctor's family at Marfa; and Ernest Cliston, who runs the old home ranch in Gonzales county.

WILLIAM H. MONDAY, M. D. One of the most prominent surgeons in the state of Texas, William H.

Monday is widely known throughout this region, his home being in Terrell, Texas. Dr. Monday has been a practicing physician for the past forty-two years in Kaufman county, and each year has seen not only an increase in his clientele but the winning of more friends. He has been prominent in the public affairs of the city in which he has made his home for so long, and being a student and by nature progressive he has had a strong influence in slope the better firm believer in the control of the property of this section of the state and his belief in its prosperity of this section of the state and his belief in its prosperity is shown by his ownership of farm lands.

William H. Monday was born in Tennessee, in Lawrence county, on the 27th of April, 1843. His father, who was born in Knoxville, Tennessee, in 1816, was the son of William Monday. He came to Texas with his family in 1857 and settled in Houston county. He was a slave owner and a plain, practical man, typical of the ante-bellum school, a man of limited education but a successful farmer. He was a member of the Methodist church and belonged to the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, being a Master Mason. He died in Kaufman county, Texas, in 1885, and his wife, who was born in South Carolina in 1818, died near Terrell, Texas, in 1878. Seven sons and two daughters were born to Mr. and Mrs. Monday, of whom Dr. Monday was the third in order of birth. The eldest, Isaphine, married J. C. Cantrell and resides in Swisher county, Texas; Columbus M. died at Lovelady, Texas, baving served in General Walker's division of the Confederate army and afterwards living as a farmer until his death. He married Cornelia Ellis. William H. is the next. John C. was graduated from the medical department of Tulane University, married Louise Smart, of Louisiana, and was practicing medicine in San Antonio when he died. F. M. Monday is a merchant of Temple, Texas, and is F. M. Monday is a merciant of Temple, Texas, and is married. Josie married Joe McCurdy for her first husband, but is now the wife of Rufus Braught, of Phoenix, Arizona. J. O. Monday is a banker, merchant and capitalist of Houston, Texas. Lonnie A., who was a farmer, married Willie Duesse and is now dead. Harvey D., the youngest, married Mattie Gray and is also dead.

William H. Monday received a limited education in Harden county, Tennessee, and came to Houston county, Texas, in 1858 with his parents, but left that locality to enter the ranks of the Confederate army with the outbreak of the Civil war. He became a member of Company "1," of the Fourth Texas Volunteers, which Company 1, of the Fourth least volunteers, which was under the command of Captain D. A. Nunn, of Crockett, and Colonel James Riley, of Nacogdoches. The command rendezvoused at San Antonio and then went to the frontier in New Mexico, to serve under General Sibley. After some time in the territories, during which the battles of Val Verde and Glorietta were fought, the army came back to Texas and the Fourth Regiment took part in the recapture of Galveston, then went into the Red River country and became part of the gallant little force that opposed General Banks' army in the famous Red River campaign. Dr. Monday took part in a number of battles, among them being those of Mansfield, Pleasant Hill and Yellow Bayou, the last named being the last important engagement in which the doctor had a share. He was third lieutenant of his company during the last eighteen months of his service and held that office when the command was disbanded at Mosley's Ferry on the banks of the Brazos river in May, 1865.

After the war Dr. Monday took up his studies again in the Rockwell High School and after completing his literary course there entered the medical department of Louisiana University, the Tulane University of today, from which he was graduated in 1871. He then began the practice of his profession at Johnson Point, Kaufman county, now Abner, Texas, but only remained there a year and then he came to College Mound neighborhood, near Terrell, Texas, where he located. Here he engaged in farming as well as in the practice of medicine, taking a keeu interest in the developing and improving of the farm on which he located. After many years of this life, he found that he would have to abandon farming or medicine and since his heart was in his medical work he gave up farming to devote himself wholly to his profession, and this necessitated his moving to Terrell. He still owns the old home and also is the owner of two other farms in this section. Since coming to Terrell bis practice has grown in size and he has not with continued success. Dr. Monday has kept closely in touch with the advance in his profession, taking a post-graduate course in the medical department of Tulane in 1893 and another in 1912, and thus being enabled to give his patients the benefit of the latest scientific discoveries and methods. In 1888 Dr. Monday was made local surgeon for the Texas & Pacific Railroad Company and has held this position ever since. He was later appointed local surgeon for the Houston & Texas Central Railroad, and when this corporation was transformed into the Texas Midland he was made local surgeon of the latter road. In 1893 this railroad appointed him chief surgeon and he has held this responsible position since that time.

Dr. Monday is a member and an Ex-President of the Kaufman County Medical Society and is also a member of the Texas State Medical Society. For a time he held membership in the National Railway Surgeons' Association and he was president of the Texas Railway Surgeons' Association. His only fraternal allegiance is with the Knights of Pythias and he is a trustee of the local lodge.

In religious matters Dr. Monday holds allegiance to no one creed. He is a member of the Commercial Club and has rendered valuable services to the city through his chairmanship of the educational committee and as one of the directors of the club. He has always taken a very active part in all matters pertaining to the welfare of the general public, especially in educational matters. He has served on the common council of the city and for a long term of fifteen years was a member of its educational board, during which time he was president, and influential in all questions of education. He has always been a man of wide and deep thought and when the matter of a commission for Terrell was being agitated Dr. Monday was one of the foremost men in urging this departure from old ways. He was made chairman of the committee that framed the charter and was active in seeing the charter put into service. In politics Dr. Monday is a member of the Democratic party. He has served as one of the medical examiners of his judicial district by appointment of Judge Rainey.

On the 13th of September, 1873, Dr. Monday married in Anderson county, Texas, Aliss Mollie J. Hamlett, a daughter of William J. Hamlett, She was born in Shelby county, Texas, and died in 1883. Three children were born of this marriage. The eldest of these, Dr. H. Albert Monday, married Miss Essie Duvail, and is a physician and mining man of Taviche, in the state of Oxaxea, Mexico, being one of the successful and prominent Americans in the Mexican republic. Charles B. Monday, the second son, is a lumberman of Marlin, Texas. He married Miss Hannah Miller, of Lake Charles, Louisiana, and they have two daughters, Louise and Sybil. Jewell Monday, the youngest child, became married again in 1883, his wife being Miss Willie N. Roberson, of Cherokee county, Texas, and they have five children, namely, Mollie, Netta, William Luther, Nellie and Raymond. Mollie married J. H. Waters, of Terrell, Texas, employed by the Texas Milland Railroad.

BENJAMIN FRANKLIN BERKELEY, M. D. Out in west Texas, at Alpine, resides a Texan who is one of the vital factors in the industrial and civic affairs of his state. Locally, Dr. Berkeley is a successful physician and banker, but has become known all over the state as an advocate and practical worker for various lines of civic reform, and more especially, perhaps, as president of the Texas Dry Farming Congress.

Benjamin Franklin Berkeley is a native of Merce county, Kentucky, where he was born February 2nd, 1875. He attended the common schools of his native state; then was in high school, and later in the Hoggsetts Academy, at Harrodsburg, Kentucky. He was a student at Transylvania University, in Lexington, Kentucky, and soon afterwards came out to Texas, spending about a year in Sutton county. He then entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons, at San Francisco, California, where he was graduated M. D. in 1902. Immediately after his graduation he located at Alpine, where he has enjoyed a large practice in medicine.

The Alpine State Bank was organized in 1907, and a little later Dr. Berkeley became a member of its board of directors. In 1911 he was chosen president, and has directed the affairs of this substantial financial institution to the present time. In the line of his profession, he is local surgeon for the Southern Pacific Railway, and while bis private practice is of a general nature, he is recognized as probably the ablest surgeon in Brewster county.

Dr. Berkeley was married at Tucson, Arizona, February 2, 1903, to Miss Clara Louise Dugat, a daughter of C. C. Dugat, who, with his wife, is now a resident of Alpine, Texas. A son and daughter comprise the home circle of Dr. Berkeley and wife, the names of the children being Ralph Gordon and Frances Louise Berkelev. The family worship in the Christian church, of which the doctor is a member of the board of trustees. His fraternal affiliations are with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias, and he has filled all the chairs in the Lodge of Odd Fellows, and at the present time is deputy district grand master. He is an ex-president of the Alpine Commercial Club and now a member of its executive committee. In politics, is a Democrat. He is a man of wide reading and broad information on political questions and events, and, while not in practical party politics himself, is an influential factor in local good government, and also in the public affairs of the state. His favorite recreations are tennis and hunting, and he also enjoys the social amusements and the pleasures afforded by his private library.

Dr. Berkeley has for some years been a well-haven per several to the control of t

Hal. C. Dunbar. Although till a young man, and one whose subjective modesty has made him refrain from thrusting himself into the limelight, Hal C. Dunbar has so directed his activities that his career has been one of signal usefulness to his community. He has been connected with the county tax collector's office of Henderson county for a number of years, and his management of the affairs of his responsible position is vindicating the coufidence reposed in him by his fellow citizens. Mr.

Dunbar is a native of the Prairie State, having been born in Greene county, Illinois, January 28, 1882, and came to Texas at the age of ten years, locating at Palestine, Anderson county, where his father, the late Peter Dunbar, was a conductor on the I. & C. N. Railroad.

Peter Dunbar was born near the city of Dublin, Ireland, in October, 1849, and was five years of age when he left his native Erin and accompanied his parents to the United States. He was one of five children, three of whom are milliners, now located in Indiana, while the other is a brother, Charles Dunbar of Buffalo, New York. Peter Dunbar grew to manhood in Indiana, and in his youth received only limited educational advantages, as the family was in modest circumstances and his as sistance was needed in the family support. He early chose railroading as his field of endeavor, and some time prior to the outbreak of the war between the North and South came to the Lone Star State and secured employment with the I. & G. N. Railroad at Palestine. Some years later he went to Illinois and entered the employ of the Chicago & Alton Railroad at Roodhouse. While there, he was united in marriage with Miss Sarah Hudson, and to this union there were born two children: Minnie, who became the wife of C. L. Murff of Athens, Texas, and Hal C. In 1892 Peter Dunbar resumed his connection with the I. & G. N. at Palestine, Texas, and ten years later, after thirty-nine and one-half years of railroad service, retired from all work, came to Athens, and here passed the remainder of his life, dying in 1912. His widow, who survives him, still lives at Athens, where she has a wide acquaintance,

Hal C. Dunbar commenced his educational training in the public schools of Greene county, Illinois, and continued them in Palestine, Texas. It was the ambition of his father that he become a civil engineer, and he accordingly entered the University of Texas, at Austin, where he was graduated in the engineering course when but twenty years of age. Following this, he secured a position in the civil engineering department of the Southern Pacific Railway, and, after four years spent in doing special engineering work with the Houston & Texas Central Railway, abandoned his profession and came to Athens. Here he entered public life as a deputy to Tax Collector A. C. Hart, whom he served five years, succeeding which he acted in a like capacity during the term of Hart's successor, A. Scott. Feeling himself qualified for the duties of tax collector of Henderson county, Mr. Dunbar then entered the race on his own account. political belief was in accord with that of the dominant party of Texas, and, despite the fact that he had four competitors, he won the nomination in the first primary with 318 more votes than the opposition combined. All along the line of his duties Mr. Dunbar has shown himself able, faithful, and conscientious, and, as the past is generally conceded to be a fairly good criterion of the future, it is reasonably safe to predict that he will prove one of the most capable and popular officials who has yet filled the county tax collector's office. His courteous, obliging nature has won him numerous friends in the county among all classes and political parties.

Mr. Dunbar was married at Athens, Texas, August 22, 1909, to Miss Winifred Larkin, a daughter of Dr. Percy Larkin of this city. They have had no children.

ELIAS BARRY. The Fort Stockton Pioneer, of which Mr. Barry is editor and publisher, is one of the best edited and best written papers in the state. The character of its news and editorial column and the influence of its contents rank the paper far above the position usually occupied by the smaller journals of the state, and its position is well indicated by the fact that its circulation enters into thirty-seven states of the Union, and it is acread in Canada, Mexico. Central America, and in Cuba. The editor and owner, Mr. Barry, is a man of exceptional education, and has unusual qualities, both as an editor and as a citizen. He has been identified with Fort

Stockton for about four years, but previous to that was well known in the newspaper life of Kentucky well known in the newspaper life of Kentucky.

Elias Barry was born in Sumner county, Tennessee, November 15, 1849, and when he was seven years of age his parents moved to Benton, Kentucky, which state was his regular home until January, 1909. He then came to Texas, and for the first fitteen months was proprietor and citior of the Colorado Citizen. He then sold out and moved to Fort Stockton, where he bought his present bushness. The Pioneer office is thoroughly equipped with bushness and is quartered in a fine was greated printing business and is quartered in a fine was greatly for the office,

As a boy, he was reared in Kentucky, attended public schools there, and at the age of sixteen began his practical career. He had few resources and not enough money to take him continuously through school to the point which he desired as his educational goal. He worked on a farm until he was nineteen, and then attended the Marshall county Seminary ten months. After that, he taught each year in his home county for five months and for another five months attended school. He kept this up for five years, and at the end of that period was principal of the Marshall County Seminary, and was then elected county school superintendent. After serving two terms in that office, he was chosen county judge, an office be held for one term of four years. He then went on the road as a traveling salesman, and was in commercial life six years. Twenty months of that period were spent in Alaska, after which he returned to Kentucky and engaged in the newspaper business in his old home town. He first bought and was editor and proprietor of the Marshal County Democrat, and subsequently of the Benton Tribune, continuing to be identified with journalism until his removal to Texas. During that time he served one term in the Kentucky legislature.

Mr. Barry was married in Paducah, Kentucky, August 22, 1877, to Miss Laura O. Paine, daughter of Thomas P. Paine of Paducah. The three children (two sons and one daughter) of their marriage were: Thomas J. and Robert B., both deceased, and Mrs. J. L. Mitchell, a resident of Fort Stockton, where her husband is a contractor and builder. Mr. and Mrs. Barry are active members of the Christian church, he serving as elder and as superintendent of the Sunday school, while Mrs. Barry is a member of the Ladies' Aid Society. Mr. Barry has also for forty-two years been a member of the Masonic order, and his wife is affiliated with the Eastern Star. His other fraternities are the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias. He served one year as secretary of the Fort Stockton Commercial Club and is now postmaster of Fort Stockton. He is one of the party fighters in the Democratic organization, and it is note-worthy that he was one of the original Wilson men and advocated the nomination of that scholar and statesman through the columns of the Pioneer. Mr. Barry finds his best recreation in the newspaper business and in the hard work connected with it. He is a great mixer socially and is one of the most popular men in Fort Stockton and vicinity.

John H. Highsmith. Now proprietor of a transfer, storage, ice, and feed business at Fort Stockton, Mr. Highsmith is one of the progressive young business men of west Texas. He began his career as a hard-working clerk at a meager salary, and is now one of the influential men of Fort Stockton.

John H. Highsmith was born in Lampassa, Texas, January S, 1876 a son of Henry A. and Sallie Highsmith. He was the fifth in a family of seven childrenthis early education was in the public schools of Ronad Rock, and at fifteen years be began his own career, when he took a place in a general store and worked as clerk for one year at a salary of thirty-five dollars per month and board. He then went into a bardware store, where he spent nearly two years, after which he came out to west Texas and was introduced to the life of this country by eight months of work on a ranch. He returned home, and then began buying and selling stock on his own account. He was later in the mule and horse business for several years, after which he managed the ice business at Hutto, where he remained for about two years. In 1908 he came to Fort Stockton to close up the estate of G. H. Cato, his brother-in-law, and has remained with this place ever since. He set up in the contracting business for the construction of streets and highroads, and has constructed nearly all the made streets in Fort Stockton and scretced nearly art the made streets in Fort Stockton and nearly every wagon road in Pecos county. From the contracting business he got into his present line, and now handles a complete line of stock food supplies, has a storage warehouse, and deals in ice and does a general transfer and heavy hauling business. The sign on all his buses, "We never miss a train," is indicative of the spirit of punctuality and promptness which has characterized Mr. Highsmith's entire business career.

His church is the Presbyterian, and he is affiliated with the Woodmen of the World and the Knights of Pythias, belongs to the Fort Stockton Commercial Club and the Fort Stockton Club, and is one of the active workers in the Democratic ranks. At the present time workers in the Democratic rains. At the process that he is serving as city pound officer. Baseball is his favorite diversion, and he is a broad-minded man, who takes an interest in everything that concerns the welfare and wholesome conditions in his home town,

F. M. NEWMAN. A native son of Texas, where he has passed his entire career, F. M. Newman has risen to an enviable position at the bar of McCulloch county, and for more than a quarter of a century has been in continuous practice at Brady. In no walk of profescontinuous practice at blady. In a walk of pacto-sional life is the value of thorough preparation more evident than in the domain of law. Mr. Newman pre-pared himself with patience and thoroughness before venturing into the practice of his chosen vocation, his training including work as a teacher in Texas schoolrooms, with the result that when he finally became active as a legist he was able at once to take a position of prominence among the thorough and learned men of his profession. With increasing competition in the legal field, he has been able to maintain his position, and today he is recognized as one of the leading practitioners of his locality.

F. M. Newman was born November 4, 1860, in Washington county, Texas, and is a son of Joel and Mary A. (Overton) Newman. The Newmans are of English origin. They came to America during the Colonial period, and the family was founded in the Southwest by Jonathan Newman, the grandfather of F. M. Newman, who was a member of the Austin Colony and came to Texas in 1825, here passing the remainder of his life Texas in 1929, here passing the tenanticle of the min farming and stock raising pursuits. Joel Newman, father of F. M. Newman, was born in what is now Washington county, Texas, but which at that time was a portion of Mexico. He was reared to agricultural pursuits, and, with his father, Jonathan Newman, being a slaveholder, at the outbreak of the war between the South and North, his sympathies were naturally with the Confederacy. Accordingly, Joel Newman enlisted in the service of the South and continued to do duty until the close of hostilities, the greater part of his service being passed in Galveston. He subsequently returned to his native locality, and continued to be engaged in farming and stock raising until his death. which occurred at his home, located within 600 yards of where he had been born, in 1890. His wife, a native of Tennessee, passed away in 1873, having been the mother of four sons and two daughters, F. M. heing the second in order of birth.

F. M. Newman was reared to manhood on the home place in Washington county, and there received his primary educational training in the community private schools. Subsequently he entered Baylar University, from which he was graduated in 1885, with the degree of Bachelor of Arts, being the last graduate of that institution before it was moved from Independence to Waco. During his last year in the University, he was one of the teachers, devoting half of each day to hear-ing recitations and the other half to his own studies. Following this, Mr. Newman taught school for one year, being principal of a public school, and in the meantime prosecuted his legal studies. In June, 1886, he commenced the study of law exclusively at Brenham, and in 1887 was admitted to the bar. In October of that year he came to Brady, and this city has since been his field of practice. Mr. Newman has devoted himself to his profession and he has pursued it upon the same method as the scholar in science-quietly, enthusiastically, and industriously bringing to it the highest intellectual qualities and attributes of character which have given him an envious position and earned him conspicuous success. There is no doubt that he would be emi-nently successful on the bench, for on several occasions he has accepted appointments as special judge, yet he has not courted publicity nor has he shown any desire to thrust himself into politics except as an earnest supporter of the principles and candidates of the Demo-eratic party. In this connection he is known as a zealous worker, for whatever he undertakes receives the full benefit of his energetic nature. In Masonry he has attained to the Chapter and Council degrees and is a Past Master and Past High Priest, and he is also a popular member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and the Woodmen of the World. His wide circle of sincere friends testifies to his popularity both in and outside of his profession.

On February 4, 1891, Mr. Newman was married at Brady to Miss Laura Sheridan, daughter of John P. Sheridan, a retired Texas rancher, who migrated to this state from Indiana. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Newman: Pearl, born February 2, 1892, and F. Sheridan, born October 20, 1909.

HERMAN H. BUTZ. County treasurer of Pecos county, Mr. Butz is one of the well-known business men of Fort Stockton; was for a number of years associated with Mr. James Rooney in merchandising, and now does a large business in general real estate and insurance lines. He belongs to the old, substantial German stock, an element which had done so much for the development and enterprise of Texas, especially in the south and southwest, and he himself well represents the solid characteristics of his race.

Herman H. Butz was born in one of the chief centers of German colonization in Texas, at New Braunfels, July 12, 1876. His father was Theodore Butz, who was born in Germany, and came to Texas when a young man, following various occupations and during the Civil war serving as a Confederate soldier. He was a member of the Knights of Honor and well known in his community. His death occurred in 1883, at the age of forty years. He married, in Texas, Augusta Koehler, who was also born in Germany, and she now makes her home at San Marcos, Texas. Of four children, Herman H. was the first, and the other sons and daughters also live in this state.

Herman H. Butz had his early education in the public schools, and at eighteen years began for himself. He came out to Fort Stockton, took a clerkship in a store, worked one year at a salary, and then joined Mr. James Rooney and bought out the mercantile business which has since been conducted and is now known as the Rooney Mercantile Company. Mr. Butz was associated actively with the management of this concern for about ten years, and at the end of that time became interested with several other local business men in the organization of the First State Bank of Stockton. He held the office of cashier in that institution for six years, at the end of which time he resigned, and since then has managed his private investment, and also has an office for general real estate, insurance, and investment business.

As a Democrat, Mr. Butz has been an influential leader in this part of the state, and at the present time is serving his fifth consecutive term in the office of county treasurer. He is also president of the school board, having been connected with the board for ten years, and at one time was secretary. He is a member of the Commercial Club, and, besides his other interests, has for the past five years held the office of local observer for the weather bureau at Fort Stockton. This work, through its practical scientific features, has interested Mr. Butz very much. He was married in Fort Stockton, December 20, 1898, to Agnes Rooney, a daughter of Francis Rooney, the old pioneer of Fort Stockton. Mr. and Mrs. Butz are the parents of five children, four sons and one daughter, namely: Francis, Karl, Marvin, Walter, and Mary Agnes. Mrs. Butz and her children are members of the Catholic church, while Mr. Butz was reared in the Episcopal church. He is active in the Woodmen of the World, having served as clerk for several years, then in the position of banker, and is now one of the board of managers.

GEORGE C. ROBINSON. Mr. Robinson is one of the solid, progressive business men of Marfa. During fifteen years, with active business affairs, has acquired a generous prosperity, and is one of the influential citizens whose advice and support are sought and consulted on all matters affecting the local welfare.

George C. Robinson is a native Texan, born in Wealde county, February 15, 1871. His father was George W. Robinson, who was born in Georgia, and came to Texas when a very young man, and for a number of years we engaged in ranching and the general stock business. He now lives retired at Sabinal, in Uvalde county. He takes much interest in religious affairs, and is a member of the Christian church, in which his wife is likewise interested. The maiden name of his wife was Caroline Kelley, and she was born in Arkansas, but was married in this stack. Of the nine children in the family, George C. was the third.

As a boy in Uvalde county, he attained such education as the public schools afforded, and, when about sixteen, left school in order to begin work on the home ranch. He has had a thorough experience in the ranching industry of Texas and knows it in every detail, but during the greater part of bis career has followed other lines of business. When about twenty-three years of age he left home and went into Oklahoma and northern Texas, where he spent about two years engaged in the handling and trading of horses. He then returned home, and a year later moved to Marathon, Texas, where he engaged in the contracting and building business. This experience led up to his location in Marfa, in 1898, and for several years he was engaged in contracting and building here. In 1906 he bought an interest in the general building supply concern at Marfa with which his name has since been associated. He has since become owner of the entire establishment, and is now its sole proprietor. In his warehouses and yards he handles a full line of lumber, lime, cement, wire, and everything used by the building trade. His retail business extends all over Presidio county, and he also does some wholesale trade.

At Marfa, on August 20, 1900, Mr. Robinson married Miss Mamie Sheilis, who was formerly a resident of Fort Davis. Their two children are Helen George and Ruth Sue. Mr. Robinson gives his support without discrimination to all the churches, without special affiliation with any one denomination. He is a Blue Lodge and Chapter Mason, and also affiliated with the Woodnen of the World. His public spirit in citizenship and local enterprise finds a medium of expression through the Marfa Chamber of Commerce, of which he is one of the direct-ors. Mr. Robinson's favorite anuscements are hunting.

fishing, and baseball. With regard to his home community, he says that, taking the future into consideration, for general business purposes there is no better town in the state than Marta, Texas. If a man wants a home and a permanent location, no matter what his vocation, if he will set forth his honest efforts he will never be disappointed in this part of Texas.

GUS ELMENDORF. A representative of the old Elmendorf family of San Antonio, one of the most prominent names in that city and representing the test of the old German stock in the citizonship of south Texas, Gus Elmendorf is a progressive young business man and manufacturer, who some years ago chose Marfa as the field for his enterprise, and is now one of the active heads in the Marfa Manufacturing Company, one of the largest local enterprises.

Gus Elmendorf was born in San Antonio, September 3, 1875, a son and the second among ten children of Emil and Emelia (Heilig) Elmendorf, both of whom were natives of Texas, the father a native of San Antonio. Emil Elmendorf was for many years engaged in the hardware business at San Antonio, where he died in 1898 at the age of forty-eight, and his remains now rest in one of the beautiful cemeteries of that point. The mother still resides in San Antonio. Mr. Elmendorf, as a boy, first attended the noted old German-English school at San Antonio, and subsequently continued his courses through the grammar and high school, and then finished with a course in the Alamo City Business College. When he was seventeen years of age he began to make his own way, and found employment for the first year in Hondo City, after which he came to Marfa. The first employment which he accepted on arriving in this flourishing west Texas city was as a clerk in a local store, and he continued in that occupation until 1909, when he bought an interest in the Marfa Manufacturing Company. He is now secretary and treasurer and also office manager of this enterprising firm. His partner is Mr. Emmett B. Quick, who has charge of the mechanical and ont-side part of the business. This business is general blacksmithing and machine shop and repair work, and also handles automobile supplies and accessories, maintains a first-class garage, has a complete stock of oils, packing, windmills, gasoline engines, and other supplies for the mechanical trade. Their shops are large and well equipped and in shop and warehouse the business uses a floor space of more than 12,000 feet, and the large payroll of the company is one of the important industrial assets of the town of Marfa. The establishment is well known and patronized extensively throughout this part of Texas.

In April, 1904, at Marfa, Mr. Elmendorf married Miss Julia Lopez, daughter of Mrs. Monica Lopez of Marfa. The three sons born to their marriage are named Gus Jr., Richard, and Eugene. Mr. Elmendorf has no regular church membership, though he is a supporter of all denominations and religious work in general. In politics also he is interested only to the extent of voting his ticket in the interest of good government, and usually supports the Democratic candidate.

He has himself been solicited to run for office, but has always declined such honors. He is fond of hunting and all outdoor sports and gives his support and encouragement to athletics.

THOMAS M. WILSON. Now president of the Marfa State Bank, and financially and officially connected with several other important business undertakings at Marfa, Mr. Wilson began his career in Presidio county about twenty-five years ago, a young man, with only limited experience and capital, and during the subsequent years has attained a place of large influence and, through his public-spirited activity, has been able to assist the community in its development and welfare.

Thomas M. Wilson was born at Halletsville, Texas,

Oliver Thomas

September 14, 1865, and was a son of Thomas and Flor-ence Randolph (Davenport) Wilson. Thomas Wilson was born in Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and was only a boy when he came to Texas. For a number of years he was engaged in the real estate and drug business. He was a very prominent Mason in this section of the state. His death occurred in 1867, when his son Thomas M. was but two years of age. His widow, who was born in Virginia and was married in Texas, lived until 1911, and was seventy-one years of age at the time of her death. She was a devout member of the Episcopal church, Thomas M. was the oldest of the three children, and of the others, his sister Annie is deceased and his sister

Julia now reside in San Antonio. Thomas M. Wilson attained his early education in the public schools, but left at the age of sixteen in order to begin the battle of life for himself. His first job was on the old home ranch, and he remained there, looking after the property and conducting a general stock business, until he was twenty-one years of age. With such experience and equipment for a practical life, he came west, to Presidio county, and went into the cattle business for himself. For upwards of a quarter of a century he was one of the well-known stockmen in this part of Texas and conducted his activities on a large scale. He is one of the most popular members of the old Cattlemen's Fraternity, and his name is well known from the Rio Grande to the Pan Handle. After selling out his stock and ranch business, in 1910, Mr. Wilson organized the María State Bank, and has since been its president and active executive. The bank does a general banking business and has made a remarkable record in the three years of its existence, its capitalization having been increased from $10,000 to $50,000 and all its resources accordingly. Mr. Wilson is also director in the Murphy-Walker Mercantile Company and the West Texas Wholesale Grocery Company, both of them being among the largest enterprises of the kind in Presidio county.

At Alpine, Texas, November 27, 1902, Mr. Wilson mar-ried Lucy Powe, daughter of Henry Powe of Alpine, the family having formerly come from Mississippi. The son and two daughters of their marriage are Nellie May, Henry Meade and Florence Julia. Mr. Wilson's church is the Methodist, and his wife is a very active member in that denomination in Marfa. Fraternally, he is affiliated in Masonry from the Blue Lodge, through the va-rious degrees of the Scottish Rite, including the thirty-second, and is also in York Rite Masonry through the Commandery, and also affiliates with the Mystic Shrine. He is one of the members of the Marfa Chamber of Commerce, and as a voter gives his support to the Demo-cratic party and to every individual and principle which will promote the best welfare of the state and country. He has never been active in party affairs, but has been honored once with the office of county commissioner, and for a time served as deputy United States marshal. He takes much pleasure in hunting and in horses, and is a broad-minded, liberal citizen, whose cordial co-operation can be enlisted in any undertaking which will strengthen the prosperity and develop the resources of this section of the state. As an old resident of west Texas, his opinion as to the resources is based upon full observation. He calls particular attention to the fact that lands in this section during the past five years have advanced from $1.00 to $5.00 per acre, and at the same time live stock bas increased in value from $14.00 per head to $30.00 per head. In this rapid rise of economic values Marfa has benefited materially, and has increased in population and general development more during the last five years than in the twenty years previously.

OLIVER THOMAS. Many beautiful words could be written in commemorating the life of Oliver Thomas, for his work was successful, he was ever just in his dealings and he ever maintained the highest standard of citizenship. He was called from earthly cares and trials in March of 1893, but he had so lived and labored that he left the impress on his community of a successful, progressive and honest man, and a wide circle of acquaintances will long continue to miss the splendid personality of Oliver Thomas,

He represented a family who have lived in Dallas county since pioneer days-prominent farming peopleand in the city of Dallas one of the principal residence streets and one of the most attractive residence additions have been given the name of this honored family, a permanent memorial to their name. The late Oliver Thomas represented the second generation of this family here, and he was born near Plano, in Dallas county, in 1855, a son of James and Jane (Routh) Thomas, who came to this commonwealth from Tennessee in 1851. James Thomas became prominent both as a rancher and later as a merchant of Dallas, and in 1869 he moved from his farm and erected the home where his widow now lives on the corner of McKinney and Pearl streets. It was in that home that James Thomas laid down the burden of life and passed over to the silent majority, his death occurring in the year 1875. Of the seven children born of his marriage with Jane Routh the late collider born or his marriage with Jane Route the lace Oliver Thomas was the eldest, the others being as fol-lows: Mary, who lives with her mother in Dallas; Ella, deceased; Mattie, wife of John Aiken, of Nevada; Jesse D., deceased; William, also deceased; and Colby, a business man of Lubbock, Texas. Oliver Thomas spent the days of his boyhood and youth in Dallas county, receiving in the meantime his preliminary educational training in the home schools, and he was preparing for a college course when his father's death occurred. He was a lad of nineteen years when this sad event threw upon him, as the eldest son, the resad event turew upon min, as the cruest son, one are sponsibility of looking after the family estate, thus having to forego his college training. At that time the home now occupied by his mother was a farm of forty acres, principally devoted to the raising of fruit, and the son continued its management for a few years, after which he engaged in business on his own account. About this time the farm was also platted into town lots and became known as the Thomas Addition. In order to dispose of these lots Mr. Thomas engaged in the real estate business, and later became head of the firm of Thomas Brothers, dealers in real estate and fire insurance. He continued to be thus identified with the business interests of Dallas until the time of his death. He honored the honored name which he bore by his consistent and meritorious career, and he may be numbered among those who made Dallas the city it now is.

Oliver Thomas was married in 1883 to Miss Mary Smith, a daughter of Colby and Mariam (Stevenson) Smith, of this city, but both now deceased, the father passing away in 1876 and the mother in 1888. Mr. Smith owned a small tract of land which is now incorporated within the city of Dallas and which is known as the Excelsior residence district, now almost entirely built up with fine houses. Four children were born of this marriage: Clarence, Willie May, Ina and James Oliver, all of whom are at home. In his political affiliations Mr. Thomas was a Democrat, and was serving as an alderman at the time of his death. He was an active worker in the Christian church, and for several years prior to his demise held therein the office of deacon. The Thomas home is located at 2500 McKinney

James Normand. A prominent stockman who has for more than thirty years owned and operated a ranch in Presidio county, Mr. Normand is a Scotchman by birth, came to this country when a young man, and, after several years of experience in the southwest and in old Mexico, established his headquarters in what is now Presidio county, and is one of the oldest ranchers who has been continuously in business down to the present time.

He is closely identified with banking and mercantile enterprises in Marfa, and few among his contemporaries have enjoyed such successful prosperity during their careers as has Mr. Normand. James Normand was born in Scotland, September 23, 1859, and as a boy attended the parish schools and then the Fettes College, at Edinburgh, after which he took a course in the Royal Agricultural College, at Circneester, England. When about nineteen he began the battle of life for himself, and his first work was in his father's linen manufacturing establishment, where he remained for two years. He then determined to break away from old home ties and to find a new field of enterprise in the new world. When about twenty-two years old he came to the United States, and on coming over had his mind set upon learning the cattle business. On arriving in this country, he was engaged in work with several cattle companies on different ranches in the old Indian Territory, Kansas, New Mexico, and Old Mexico. Finally he crossed the river at Presidio and moved into Texas, in 1882. He brought stock from Mexico and bought ranch headquarters located twenty-six miles from Marfa. This ranch, which has been in his possession for more than thirty years, was the foundation of his present excellent prosperity, and in that vicinity he has gathered his herds about him and has pursued the operations of cattle raising down to the present time.

At Edinburgh, Scotland, in August, 1895, Mr. Normand married Eleanor Mildred Dodds, daughter of Dr. George Dodds of Edinburgh. Mr. Normand has no special affili-Blue Lodge and Chapter of Masonry, belongs to the Marfa Commercial Club, and in politics votes independently and for the best man and for good government. Some years ago he was honored with the office of county commissioner of Presidio county. Mr. Normand is vice president of the Marfa State Bank, is president of the Murphy-Walker Company, president of the West Texas Wholesale Grocery Company, and President of the Marfa & Mariposa Mining Company. He owns an automobile and takes much of his pleasure with his machine, while he also enjoys a fishing and hunting excursion. He is a firm believer in the resources and the possibilities of west Texas, where he himself has gained his general prosperity, and he feels that the same opportunities are extended to every one else as afforded him such abundance of the world's goods and the esteem of his fellow citizens.

East. A. Rossberry, M. D. With a splendid record as a physician, surgeon, and citizen, Dr. Rossberry is one of the residents of Van Horn whose presence here is due to the fact that a few years ago be suffered ill health and a weakened constitution in the middle western states and came here to recuperate. His period of recuperation was extended into permanent residence, and the community now has no more loyal citizen than Dr. Rossberry.

Earl A. Roasberry was born January 2, 1883, at Mansfield, Ohio, the son of Dr. William H. and Martha (Au) Roasberry, both natives of Ohio. The father has been actively engaged in the profession of medicine in Ashland, Ohio, for the past thirty years. He is also a prominent Democrat at that point. The mother died in 1994, and she now rests at Mansfield. The doctor was the first of their children, and the others are Mauriee E., who is engaged in the practice of medicine at New London, Ohio; Ennice L., who is a graduate nurse and an own in the Huron Road Hospital, at Cleveland, Ohio; and Leota, also a nurse and at the same hospital with resister.

Earl A. Roasberry was excellently educated in literary schools, and attained his medical training in the Cleveland Medical College, where he was graduated with the class of 1966. He had nractical experience as an interne in the Huron Road Hospital, at Cleveland, and he then engaged in private practice at New London. Then, owing to poor health, he gave up his practice there and came to western Texas, locating at Van Horn in the fall of 1910. The doctor is a member of the El Paso County Medical Society and of the Ohio State Medical Society.

and fraternally is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He has an attractive home at Van Horn, and he and his wife are valuable members of local society.

Our December 20, 1907, Dr. Ronsberry married Miss Mary Donnely of Ohio, daughter of William E. and Ella (Pord) Donnely, natives of Ohio and prominent eitizens and farming people of that state, her father having been every active in Republican polities. Three children were born to the doctor and wile, one of them being deceased and the other two being Martha E. and Marjory. Dr. Ronsberry foresees a great future for this section of Texas, owing to its mineral resources and the cheap price of its lands. Since coming to west Texas he has found opportunity to exercise his taste as a sportsman and spends a large part of his leisure time in hunting excursions. He and his wife both worship at the Presbyterian church. A progressive physician, and always seeking to keep his capabilities apase with the achievements of the profession, Dr. Ronsberry during 1913 attended postgraduate studies in New York city.

WILLIAM P. MURPHY. The Murphy-Walker general department store and the West Texas Wholesale Groery Company are two solid business enterprises of Marta which have a proper bistory of their own and which illustrates the increasing prosperity of Marta as a commercial center and the career of one of its foremost citizent.

Thirty years ago, in 1883, when William P. Murphy first came to Marfa and attained a place as a clerk in a business of which he is now manager, the establishment was conducted under the firm name of S. F. Wiles & Company. The company part of this firm subsequently bought out Mr. S. F. Wiles and changed the firm name to Humphries, Murphy & Company, and subsequently to Humphries & Company, and then, in 1901, the business took its present title of Murphy-Walker Company. This is a very extensive establishment and carries a full line of everything found in a first-class department store and all the supplies used on the ranch and the other special requirements of west Texas life. The management of the business is perfect, each department having a head of its own and being conducted as a separate part of the system, both in accounting and in general detail. The business occupies a floor space of more than ten thousand feet, and the regular retail store is a large collection of related buildings, including a garage for automobiles, barns, stables, yards, wagons, coal storage plant, etc. The Wholesale Grocery business is conducted entirely separate from the other concern, and its trade throughout all the towns in west Texas has made this one of the central commercial institutions of Marfa and of great value to the growing city.

William P. Murphy, who now for the past ten years has been the genius of these important firms, was born at Bath, Maine, April 15, 1866. His parents were James K, and Mary Jane Murphy. When he was two years old the family went to Havre, France, where they remained until he was about nine years of age, and while there he received the portion of his education in private schools. On the return of the family to Bath, Maine. where he lived until seventeen years of age, he continued in the public schools, and also the high school, and on leaving school at Bath began the battle of life for himself. He was thus seventeen years of age when be first came to Marfa, in 1883, and took a position as a clerk in the old house of S. F. Wiles & Company. He remained here for about four and a half years, at the end of which time he resigned and went to El Paso, where he spent a year and a half. He was engaged in railroading for some time, and finally drifted to San Francisco, where during a residence of more than three years he was employed in a wholesale mercantile establishment, and thus gained the most thorough and practical portion of his equipment for his subsequent career. He was connected with a wholesale business in New York City for a few years, and then, in 1902, returned to the city which had first been the object of his affections in Texas and took charge of the business with which his name and management are now associated in such important relations.

Mr. Murphy was married in Brooklyn, New York, to Miss Florence McDonald, daughter of James McDonald of Brooklyn. Mrs. Murphy is a member of the Catholic church, but he has no special church affiliations. He is a Mason, in both the Lodge and Chapter, and a member of the Woodmen of the World. A Republican in politics, he takes only the part of the voter and good citizen. He is also a member of the Marfa Commercial Club, and as an avcention he is especially fond of baseball, being a real fan. He also enjoys good horses, and his tastes likewise run to good books and intellectual entertainment of every has no nore loyal nor more enthusiastic citizen than Mr. Murphy, who considers Texas the graudest state of the Union, offering more and better opportunities for me with limited means and with sturdy ambitions and energies than any other part of the world.

FEED P. GIRSON. In the recent development of the business and general resources of Van Horn and Culberson counties no individual has taken a more active and influential part than Fred P. Gilson who, after a long period of service as a telegraph operator and station agent at different points on the Texas and Pacific, came to Van Horn in 1908 on account of failing health. During the subsequent five years he has not only made a successful position for himself, but has contributed much to the development of his home community. In all this prosperity Mr. Gilson would never omit a large share of credit to his capable wife, who has been his loyal assistant in their mutual work of creating a home and fine property which now represents their joint enterprise.

Fred P. Gibson was born August 17, 1880, a son of William W. and Kate M. (Lewis) Gibson, natives, respectively, of Mississippi and Tennessee. The parents have for many years been residents of Van Zandt county, Texas, where Mr. Gibson was born, in the town of Wills Point. The senior Gibson is now a resident of Grand Saline, where he is engaged in the land and insurance business. In earlier years he was in the cotton business at Galveston, but in 1875, owing to an outbreak of yellow fever, he left that coast city and began the practice of his profession as civil engineer at Wills Point. William W. Gibson made a brilliant record as a Confederate soldier, and his service in the armies of the south deserves special mention in this article. There were four children in the family, the others being named as follows: Walter, who has for twenty years been agent for the Texas and Pacific Railway at Grand Saline; Florence, who is associated with her father in the insurance business, and Williard, who is in the general offices of the Texas & Pacific Railroad at Fort Worth.

Mr. Fred P. Gibson received his education in the public schools of Wills Point, leaving school at the age of seventeen and learning telegraphy. He was an operator in the general offices of the Texas & Pacifier at Dallas and other large points. He then became station agent on the same line at Gladewater and at Atlanta, and continued in that work for six years, until failing health compelled him to move in to the 'extreme west of Texas, so that in 1908 he became agent for the Texas & Pacific at Van Horn, On resigning this office, in 1910, he became a partner in the Beach Mercantile Company, and about the partner in the Meach Mercantile Company, and about the of land in Gulberson energy. The first thousand acres of land in Gulberson energy of the first that while he continued his work as station agent at Van Horn his voung wife was living on this large body of land alone, her experience entitling her to special mention as one of the hardy and courageous women of western Texas. It was as a result of these hard labors and self-denials that they laid the corner stone of their success. After selling out his rauch lands at good advantage, Mr. Gibson bought an interest in the firm of Beach & Platt Mercantile Company, buying Mr. Platt's interests, and subquently others, until he acquired a third interest in one of the largest, oldest, and most practical stores in Van Horn. Mr. Gibson now owns property in Waco and has one of the most attractive homes of Van Horn.

At Dallas in 1905 he married Miss Alma L. Hunter, a native of Wills Point and a daughter of William R. Hunter. Their two children are named Freda, aged six, and Ruth, aged three. When Mr. Gibson came to Van Horn, in 1908, there was little or nothing in the way of entertainment or social life at this point. Since then he has taken a foremost part in organizing many of the wholesome features of social diversion as well as the more valuable institutions of education. Through his efforts and those of Mr. Beach, his partner, was organized the Masonic Lodge, known as Van Horn, No. 1208, A. F. & A. M., Mr. Gibson having become a master mason when tweuty-one years of age. He is also prominent in the local Baptist church, being a deacon of the society. He is a member of the Van Horn school board and takes much pride in the general claims that this is one of the best schools in the state. Mr. Gibson is now devoting his spare time to the study of law, not with the purpose of entering the profession, but on the theory that every up-to-date business man should be informed on the fundamentals of law. In Mr. Gibson's opinion, Culberson county is best adapted to stock raising; but he calls attention to the presence in this locality of splendid mineral resources, consisting of copper, silver, lead, zinc, and mica, none of which resources have yet been developed, and, as a public-spirited citizen, he will gladly co-operate with any parties interested in such a field for industrial enterprise.

EBSKINE LONG. From the early seventies until his death, March 27, 1909, the late Erskine Long was one of the most extensive and best known farmers of Cooke county, and he had peculiar success in his vocation. He was a Confederate veteran and a man who bore his civic and private responsibilities with the same fidelity he displayed as a soldier.

Erskine Long was born in the state of Missouri in 1844, a son of John Pope and Elizabeth (Story) Long, the former a native of Kentucky and the latter of Missouri. John P. Long was also a farmer, and in early life studied medicine, although he never practiced that profession.

The late Erskine Long, the only child of his parents, grew up in his native state, and on his grandfather's farm until he was fifteen years old, or until his grandfather's death. In the meantime he had received some advantages in the public schools there and had learned the lessons of industry under his father. When the Civil war canic on, he joined the Confederate army as a private, and went through from beginning to end, Pollowing the struggle between the states, he resided with an uncle in Missouri and spent two years working at wages on his farm. For some time after that he traveled about the country and had varied experiences. Then in 1871 Mr. Long married Miss Molly Black,

Then in 18/1 Mr. Long married Miss Molly Black, who was born in Goke county, Texas, a daughter of John D. and Ann (Duty) Black, her father a native of John D. and Ann (Duty) Black, her father a native of the second of the mother of Arkansas. Mrs. Long was one of the mother of Arkansas. Mrs. Long are so that the second of the mother of the mother of the mother of the mother of the ceased, who was a farmer and left three children. The eight children born to Mr. and Mrs. Long are mentioned as follows: Bettie, wife of William Murrell, of Fort Worth, and the mother of three children; Sallie, who is a teacher by profession and resides at home Gainesville; Lole, who is the wife of H. B. Murrell, of Walnut Bend, and the mother of three children; Molly, Walnut Bend, and the mother of three children; Molly, who married S. F. Murrell of Walnut Bend; Edna, wife of F. C. Gillock, of Oklahoma; Lutie, Erskine, and Alice, who are all unmarried and living at home with their mother.

After the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Long they located in Cooke county, and lived on a farm until his death. His estate comprised nine hundred and sixty acres of land, six hundred acres of which was in cultivation to corn and crop. This large farm since the death of Mr. Long has been leased to tenant farmers. Mr. Long was a Democrat, but not a politician, and never sought office. He and his family worship in the Christian church. Mrs. Long, who is well known in social circles at Gainesville, resides at 108 kitchie street.

Expow R. Silliman. Cashier and active manager of the Van Horn State Bank, Mr. Silliman has since 1909 been closely identified with the general commercial enterprise of Culberson county. The successful position of the bank has been largely due to his personality and abiliity as a financial organizer and manager, and, beside looking after this institution, Mr. Silliman is also owner of considerable property in this section, and is always ready to lend his influence to promote the further upbuilding and development of this section of Texas.

Elton R. Silliman was born on August 17, 1872, at the old capital of Texas when it was the province of Merico, at San Felipe, in Austin county. His parents were Abram F. and Samanthas (Dresser) Silliman, natives, respectively, of Mississippi and Texas. His parents are now deceased, the father passing away in 1891 and the mother in 1874, and both rest side by side in the old cemetery at San Felipe. His father, who for many years was a farmer, was a man of special education and during his early life taught school in Texas. There were in the family eight children, Elton R. being the youngest.

He attained his early education in the public schools of Austin county, and subsequently was a student in the Hills business college. His first employment was that of bookkeeper for a mercantile house of Sonora, Texas, and after a few years he entered the field of local politics and was appointed deputy county and district clerk of Sutton county, Texas, Sonora being the county seat. He served in that capacity for three years. In 1898 he moved to Eldorado, Texas, where he established a mercantile business of his own, and continued successfully in that business out il selling out, in 1904. In 1909 he came to Van Horn to take charge of the Van Horn State Bank as its cashier, director and stockholder. He also owns a residence in Culberson county, and his present home at Van Horn. Beginning his career in a clerical capacity, Mr. Silliman, by his thorough ability and by good management, has acquired an independent position in business affairs.

At Van Horn he is an active factor in the community and is now chairman of the school board. Fraternally, he is a Royal Arch Mason and Knight of Pythias, and his polities is Democratic. He and his family worship in the Methodist church. On February 3, 1897, he married Miss Margaret Murcheson, daughter of Robert W. Murcheson, a retired and wealthy ranchman of El Paso. Their two children are Elton Jr., aged et en, and Hazel, aged four. Among his recreations, when he finds time to rest himself from business, Mr. Silliman is especially fond of hunting. He foresces a bright future for Van Horn and Culherson counties, and, owing to the fact that lands are being sold at a reasonable price, and the presence of great mineral resources here, he believes that the locality will bring wealth and happiness to twenty times the number of people who are now inhabitants of the county.

Samuel W. White. The first prosecuting attorney elected in the new county of Culberson, Mr. White has been a member of the Texas bar for the past ten years and has a successful position in professional and business life.

Samuel W. White was born September 20, 1883, at Dardanelle, Arkansas, son of John W. and Bettie (Hyers) White, natives, respectively, of Mississippi and Tennessee. The father is now deceased, and the mother resides with her son at Van Horn. The parents came to Texas in 1887, locating in San Antonio, where the father was engaged in the land business up to the date of his death, in 1899. Samuel W., the only surviving child, received his education chiefly in the public schools of San Antonio and subsequently graduated from a San Antonio business college. He began the study of law in the offices of Kellar & Williams, prominent members of the San Antonio bar, and, on completing his preparatory work, was admitted to practice on June 20, 1903. During the following three years he directed his principal attentions to the land business of the manger of the advertisement department of the Denison Herald. At the end of that time he came nint owest Texas, and at Pecco established a real estate office, and still owns considerable property of his own in that vicinity.

Mr. White was elected county attorney of Culberson county on April 18, 1911, this being prior to his residence at Van Horn. He was reelected to the office at the general election of November, 1912, his first election coming with the beginning of Culberson county's official costinence, its territory having formerly been a part of El Paso county. Mr. White is a very active and popular bemocrat and one of the able stump speakers in this county. Aside from his duties as prosecutor, he has built up a nice private practice in the law, and also has a set of abstract books in his office. Fraternally, he is affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and is chaplain of the local lodge. A member of the Baptist church by early training, he has, since taking up his residence at Van Horn, worked with the Presbyterians in the Sunday school work and is now superintendent of the Presbyterian Sunday school. In 1904 Mr. White married Miss Elizabeth Martin, daughter of Hon. Judge J. D. Martin, who for many years was district judge at Beammont. They are the parents of two sons, Samuel Martin and John W. White. The family occupy one of the pleasant homes of Van Horn.

John Henny Ferry. A distinction which will always be associated with the name of Mr. Feely in the history of Culberson county is the fact of his being the first sheriff elected after the organization of the county. Mr. Feely has been identified with this section of Texas for a number of years, and Culberson county has no more popular or public-spirited eitizen than the present sheriff.

His career is one of exceptional interest, from the viewpoint of its accomplishments against heavy odds. John Henry Feely was born June 20, 1871, in Cole county, Missouri, near Jefferson City, a son of Henry and Elizabeth (Magee) Feely. His father was a native of Indiana and his mother of Missouri, both now being deceased. The father was for many years a farmer and merchant in Cole county, and made a fine record as a soldier, serving in the Mexican war, and later as a Confederate under General Price, with which noted leader be fought in numerous battles. In 1876 he came paged in faming and stock raising until his retirement, attaining to the fine old age of eighty-five years before his death. His remains now rest at Vernon, Texas, while his second wife, the mother of Mr. Feely, died at Pilot Point, where she now is buried.

Sheriff Feely, one of two children, his sister being now deceased, attained his education in the public schools of Pilot Point, and when sixteen years of age was thrown upon his own resources, and has since fought the battle of life by himself. He began work as a farm hand, and, though a mere boy, did a man's work. This was his oc-eupation until 1904, at which time he became a section hand with the Texas & Pacific Railroad. He knew how to work, and was a natural leader of men, and in a short time became foreman of his section. In this work he took great pride, and was frequently complimented by the roadmaster on the condition of his section. This was his regular work up to 1910, in which year he was elected to the office of sheriff of the newly organized county of

Culberson on the Democratic ticket,

Probably to Mr. Feely as much as to any other individual is due the fact that the courthouse is now located at Van Horn. He was an earnest advocate of this place as the county scat, and he made a vigorous and successful campaign for this end. He has also been an aggressive factor in securing the new courthouse, which is at this writing rapidly nearing completion and a structure which is a credit to the new county. Fraternally, Mr. Feely is a Mason, and owns a pleasant home in Van Horn, where he married Miss Ida Trammel, a daughter of James Tramel, a native of Dallas. Their six children are named as follows: Ones, Eula, Lorina, Clyde, Dorothy, and Ida Derrell.

SOLOMON H. LEVENSON. No man can more quickly perceive the great opportunities which this country offers to the industrious man than can the foreigner, especially if he comes from one of the countries of the old world where there is a large agricultural population. Solomon H. Levenson, coming to the United States from Russian Poland, was quick to see opportunities that might have been unapparent to the native-born American, and his success has been largely due to this insight into conditions and his determination to make a success of whatever he undertook. He is now one of the most successful merchants in El Paso as a member of the firm of Levenson & Rosenberg, wholesale and retail dealers in dry goods, men's furnishings, and shoes, with two stores in El Paso. The Palace is at 314 Overland street and The New Bazaar is at 118 E. Overland street. Both these men are progressive and wide-awake merchants and are regarded as among the most influential and capable business men in the city.

Solomon H. Levenson was born in Russian Poland in September, 1881, the son of Samuel and Anna (Rogalsky) Levenson. Both his father and mother were natives of Russia, and his father was a well-known merchant of Vilna, Russia, up to the time of his death, in 1913. He was fifty-five years old when he died, and his entire life had been spent in his native land. His wife, who was reared and married in Russia, is still living in her old home, having reached the age of fifty-three. Five children were born to Samuel and Anna Levenson, and of these Solomon was the eldest.

As a child and young boy, Solomon Levenson attended the schools of his native land, and then he attended a commercial and business college for two years. After completing his business training, he became a book-keeper, and for several years was thus engaged. In 1902, he came to America, first going to Hibbing, Minnesota, where he remained until August, 1904. During his residence in Hibbing be was employed by the Great Northern Railroad Company. In 1904 he eame to EI Paso and went to work as a clerk in a mercantile house here. He only remained a short time, and then went to Dawson, New Mexico, as manager of the branch house of the Southwestern Mercantile Company. After two very successful years in this position, he returned to EI Paso, and worked here until August, 1911, when he established his present business in association with Mr. Rosenherer.

From a small heginning, the business has expanded nicely, until today the firm carries a stock of about $855,000, and ten salesmen, hesides himself and his partner, are required to take care of their trade.

Mr. Levenson is one of the energetic business men of the city and one who has a fine faith in the future growth and development of the place. His confidence has found emphasis in his investment in El Paso real estate and in the opening of a second mercantile establishment, which they named The New Bazaar and which is located on East Overland street, as has already been noted. Mr. Levenson is one of the stockholders of the Texas Bank and Trust Company of El Paso, and is otherwise identified with business enterprise in the city, aside from his mercantile establishments.

In politics, Mr. Levenson gives his allegiance to the Democratic party. He is a member of the Knights of Maccabees, but has no other fraternal affiliations.

On December 20, 1908, Mr. Levenson was married to Lena Bromberg at El Paso, and one child, Bessie Levenson, has been born to them. She was born on March 1st, 1910, in this city.

CHARLES DEUTZ. The name Deutz has been closely identified with the hardware business in Texas for more than half a century. The pioneer work was done by the late Joseph Deutz, whose splendid ability and vigorous salesmanship made him one of the most successful of Texas past merchants. He began business in San Antonio in 1856, moved to Laredo in 1879, and kept his hands on his affairs and gave them the benefit of his judgment till 1896. The business is now carried on under the style A. Deutz & Brother.

Its trade is international, and for many years the name Deutz has had a recognized commercial value on both sides of the Rio Grande. In 1911 the firm built their present splendid store on Hidalgo street in Laredo. one of the finest buildings of its type in the Southwest, and there are very few finer hardware stores in the United States. They have a large wholesale as well as retail trade, and carry an extensive stock of hardware, implements, vehicles, queensware, plumbing supplies, engines and machinery for both agriculture and mining, and the brothers have a reputation for flawless integrity as well as for keen enterprise. The building, of one story, is located on a prominent corner, and has frontage of 150 feet of solid plate glass, with marble base and aluminum strips. A hanging awning with prism glass overhead extends along the entire front. There are two very large display windows and two other display windows, and all three vestibules are laid with selected tile. The ceiling of the building is steel, with two rows of iron pillars supporting the roof. The entire building has a frontage of 150 feet and a depth of 110 feet, 87 feet of this depth being used for floor space. The rear of the building is divided into several rooms, one as a retail stock room and the other as a manufacturing and repair shop, while in the center a balcony, or mezzanine floor, makes two rooms, the upper being used as a general office. The building is constructed of brick, and to increase its protection against fire is equipped with fire hydrants placed conveniently for immediate use and fire extinguishers. There are three large skylights, and provision for artificial lighting by electricity and natural gas. The store equipment com-prises the Heller system of shelving, and all the showcases are of plate glass with marble base. The establishment is equipped with a modern telephone system, with private switchboard, so that every department of with private switchhoard, so that every department of the store is connected with every other and with the general office. As a large part of the business is country trade, the system also provides for adequate long-distance telephone service. As one of the oldest established firms in the Rio Grande valley, its trade extends up and down for many miles from Laredo, and probably no other firm in the line express so much goods across the boundary into Old Mexico.

Charles Deutz, junior member of the firm of A. Deutz & Brother, comes naturally by his ability as a hardware merchant. He assisted his father from early boyhood in buying for the firm and in shipping goods to Old Mexico, and has proved a worthy successor to his honored father. Charles Deutz was born in San Antonio, Texas, in 1871, a son of Joseph and Agatha (Lincke) Deutz. The late Joseph Deutz, who as born at Coblenz-on-the-Rhine in 1827, came to America when twenty-one years of age, in 1848. The steamer landed him in New York City, and that was his home for two years. He was attracted to southwest Texas, because it was one of the chief centers of German colonization in the United States, and arrived in San Antonio in 1850. For several years his experience was that of a worker for others, and in 1856 he married and began in the hardware trade for himself. From almost the first he interested himself in the extension of his business into Mexico, and in 1862 moved across the boundary and became a member of the firm of Guilbau, Herman & Company at Monterey. His stay in Mexico at that time was profitable and gave him a fair knowledge of conditions which have ever since been utilized in the hardware business conducted under the Deutz name. Returning to San Antonio in 1866, Joseph Deutz continued in the hardware business as a member of the firm of Norton & Deutz until 1879. In the latter part of that year he established his business headquarters at Laredo, and that city was his home the remainder of his life. The business at Laredo was first conducted under the name of Deutz & Koehler, and subsequently became J. Deutz & Sons. Though he retired from active duties in 1896 he always maintained a vigorous and hearty old age. For several years he served as president of the Laredo National Bank.

His death at his home in Laredo on October 18, 1912, meant the loss of one of Texas' pioneer merchants and finest citizens. At the time of his death he had the distinction of being the oldest living hardware merchant in Texas. His initiative and strength of character were the chief factors in his success, and at the same time he was greatly admired for his thorough honesty and uprightness and his many exceptional personal qualities. As an example of the spirit of progress which always animated him, as early as 1857 he was using shelf boxes of his own invention and may be considered as the originator of the system which has contributed materially to successful retail methods in modern times. He bought up eigar boxes in large quantities, covered them with green paper and placed them on his shelves, with samples of the articles within fastened on the outside. News of his extensive purchases of cigar boxes came to the ears of the revenue officers, and they suspected that Mr. Deutz was refilling them with eigars. Secret service men investigated, but were soon convinced that the merchant was using the boxes in extremely practical as well as legitimate manner. Mrs. Joseph Deutz died in Laredo in 1892.

Charles Deutz was liberally educated, attended the noted German-English school in San Antonio, from which so many prominent men in southwest Texas received their early training. After a two-years' course at the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Bryan, he returned home in 1887 and in his father's store continued his thorough business training under the careful eye of the latter.

Charles Deutz has been a hardware buyer for twentyseven years and probably no other man of his age;
seven years and probably no other man of his age; in the United States can say the same. He was one of the four Deutz brothers who succeeded to the business in 1896, and in 1903 Deutz Brothers sold the business to Adolph Deutz and Charles Deutz, and since that time the firm name has stood as it is today, A. Deutz &
Brother, with Charles Deutz as its nanager.

BATES MCPLRIAND. At the end of forty years' active practice in the law Bates McFarland stands as one the ablest and prominent members of the Texas bar. For more than a decade he has been located in the city of El Paso. He represents one of the old and honored families of Texas, and his father before him was one of the able lawyers and judges of the state.

Mr. Bates McFarland was born February 24, 1850, at the old town of LaGrange, in Fayette county, Texas, a son of Isaac B. and Adaline McFarland. The father died at Rockport, August 20th, 1899, at the very venerable age of eighty years. His career was one that brought him into association with the leading men of Texas during the middle half of the last century. He had for sixteen consecutive years served as a district judge, during which time he resided at Brenham, and was for many years engaged in the active practice of law. Although a thorough Texan in every sense of the word, he was a staumch Republican.

Bates McFarland received his college education at Trinity University, at Tehnacana, and subsequently graduated from the law department of the Cumberland University, at Lebanon, Tennessee, where he was given the degree of LL. B.

Since 1873 Mr. McFarland has been regularly engaged in the practice of law in this state. For about ten years he had his offices at Brenham, and from there moved to Rockport, and then, in 1900, to El Paso. Notwithstanding his father's affiliation with the Republican party, Mr. McFarland has always been a staunch Democrat and one of the influential men in civic affairs.

On February 1, 1879, at Courtney, in Grimes county, Mr. McFarland married Miss Bettie B. Holland, a daughter of Col. James K. Holland of Courtney, Texas. Her father and grandfather were both intimately identified with legislative affairs in the early years of Texas, both as a Republic and as a state. The four children of Mr. McFarland and wife are named as follows: Bates H., who is now about thirty-seven years of age; Lilly E., the wife of F. G. Belk, about two years younger than her brother; I. B. McFarland, age about thirty-one, and Addline A., age twenty-nine.

By his long career of residence and professional activy Mr. McFarland has indicated his affection for Texas and Texans, and there is no one more positive in his belief as to the great future of this state. He is thoroughly well informed about the natural resources and opportunities of the state at the present time and is possessed of a large knowledge, gained from personal observation, covering the history of the state during the past thirty or forty years.

WILLIAM HENRY BARTON. Of one of the old and representative families in east Texas, Mr. Barton grew up in Rusk county and had a college education. He began his business career as a merchant in Overton, and bas also followed farming and merchandising at Overton for the past thirty years; is a banker there, and one of the most influential and prosperous citizens.

William Henry Barton was born in Henderson, Texas, July 4, 1855, a son of James M. Barton and a grandson of Benjamin Barton. The grandfather came to Texas during the early forties and was killed in Harrison county in the moderator and regulator war, about 1842. Benjamin Barton married a Miss Baker, and their clidren were: James M.; Ben, who was killed by the Indians; Tead and Lem of Texas; Watson of Hubbard, Texas; Bailey of Texas; Elliott, who died in Rusk county, leaving a family; Melissa, now deceased, who married William Baker, and Züphia, who married Thomas McCarty.

James M. Barton was born in Pickens district of South Carolina, was reared on a farm, had a limited education, and soon after his father's death, in Harrison county, Texas, settled in Rusk county, at Millville, where he was elected sheriff and served for some eight or ten years in that important office at a time when the duties of sheriff meant almost constant association with the rough and lawless element. James M. Barton was not only a soldier of the Mexican war, in General Taylor's army, but when the Civil war came on he took sides with the Confederacy and was commissioned a captain, his service being principally east of the Mississippi River. He was in the battle at Corinth, and saw much other active service, until the failure of his health caused him to give un his commission. When he left the army he held the rank of colonel in his regiment. After the war, Col. James Barton was engaged in business as a merchant at old Bellview, and afterwards at Hallville, and still later at Longview. The burning of his store at Longview caused him to leave the business, and he then retired to his farm at Bellview, giving his time and attention to the quiet vocation of farming until his death, in September, 1879. At the time of his death he held the office of sergent at arms in the Texas Senate.

Gol. James M. Barton married Miss Emily Miller, a daughter of Judge John C. Miller, who came from Georgia in an early day and was county judge of Rusk county for many years, and lived on his farm, near Henderson, until his death, in 1876, when about sixty-five years old. Judge Miller married a Miss Thompson, and of their children, besides Mrs. Barton, there were: Mrs. Josephine Mitchel, Captain W. A. Miller, and Dr. H. L. Miller. Mrs. James M. Barton died in September, 1878, at the age of fifty years. Her children were J. A. Virgi and Belle, twins, of whom Belle married James H. (Cyelone) Davis of Sulphur Springs, Texas, and Virgil died at Kilgore, Faxas, leaving a family; William Henry and

Dr. Augustus Wiley of Overton.

William H. Barton grew up at Henderson and vicinity, and finished his education in the old Trinity University, at Tehnacana. After reaching manhood, he started in as a farmer, an occupation which he varied by work in his father's store, and finally, in 1883, he entered merchandising at Overton, and his record of steady and reliable business dealings has been continuous in that place for thirty years. When he first offered goods to the public as a merchant, his capital comprised about seven hundred dollars, and he had a wife and child to support. Though merchandising has been his regular vocation, a portion of his time has been devoted to farming, and at the present time he is vice president of the Farmers & Merchants State Bank of Overton. Mr. Barton has also built himself one of the comfortable homes of the little city. His public service has likewise been important and stamps him as a public-spirited citizen. For eighteen years he was one of the school trustees, and also has been a member of the board of aldermen. His church is the Methodist, and he is a member of its board of stewards. Fraternally, he is affiliated with the Masonic Lodge.

On October 7, 1879, occurred the marriage of William H. Barton and Miss Jeffie Davis Wynne, a consin of Col, R. M. and W. B. Wynne. Her father was Colonel Robert E. Wynne, who came from Tennessee and whose wife was Miss Mary Watkins of the old San Angustine family of that name. Mr. and Mrs. Barton's oldest child, William Pevton Barton, graduated from Tulane University with his medical degree in 1904, and is now a practicing physician at Overton; Robert Virgil married Miss Lois Gray, and their children are Gray and Sue; Henry Miller Barton is associated in business with his father; John Wynne is a student in Columbia University, in New York City, and the youngest is Mary Emily.

JAMES M. JONES. The present popular and efficient county clerk of Rusk county, Jumes M. Jones, has spent his life chiefly within the confines of the county and is a member of the county and is a member of Texas. He was born in the community of Pine Hill, where his father, the Hon. J. Rasmus Jones, settled February 5, 1867, coming here from near Milledgeville, Georgia. The latter's public service to Texas has been given as a member of the lower house of the legislature, in which service he won prominence as an investigator of the state's penal affairs, as a man of measures, and as a debater and legislature, as

J. Rasmus Jones, or "Ras" Jones, as he is known among public men of Texas, was born in Georgia, August 26, 1834. His education came from his perusal of the old blue spelling book and from seventy-two days as a pupil in school. He was a natural seeker after knowledge, and when going on an errand for his father or to mill he was wont to earry his spelling book with him to make good use of his idle time. To avoid the jeers and scoffs of the other boys about the mill because of his friendship for the junior Webster, he would hide the small volume under his coat and seek a lonely place where he could commit its contents to memory, and it is said that he became so familiar with it that even in the decline of life he could call the next word of any column one would pronounce to him. Being of an inquiring turn of mind, "'Ras'' Jones acquired the habit of learning alone. His fund of information came to mark him as a learned man, and the accuracy of his knowledge surprised his friends and his legislative colleagues as he displayed it in the midst of debate upon the floor of the house or in stating facts in the course of his speeches. He was master of himself and of every situation when he occupied the floor. Interruption did not perturb him and he answered questions with such readiness and resumed the thread of his discourses with such ease and confidence as to gain him a wide confidence among his contemporaries of the legislature. Mr. Jones was elected to the honse of representatives of his state first in 1884. His polities harmonized with the dominant party of Texas, and he represented Panola county at intervals during sixteen years. He suffered defeats at home once or twice during this long service, but the character of his service always dimmed the lustre of his successor and his return to power invariably followed. Among his committees was the one on Roads, Bridges and Ferries, of which he was chairman for a time, and it was his report of the investigating committee of the penitentiary management that opened the eyes of Texans. He was a member of this committee and its investigation revealed such a shortage to the state that taxpayers stood aghast at the muddle their partisan friends had made of things for the commonwealth. Mr. Jones was so long before the people and mingled so freely with Texas leaders as to establish his reputation as a strong conversationalist. In his home or among his neighbors his bearers never tire. He delivers himself pleasantly and with a faseination that never fails to entertain and instruct. He delighted in communing with men of recognized mental worth and formed friendships among the great Texas public men. He always aided the ambitions of Senator Bailey and had a warm place in his heart for Governor Ross, and in the contest of 1905 he gave valuable support to the candidacy of Hon. Pat Neff, the successful contestant. During the Civil war he offered himself to the Confederacy, but was rejected for military duty and was assigned to hospital work as a nurse. Mr. Jones was a successful farmer after the old methods and had a strong belief that a mule and a plow, with himself at the helm, was the most potent force possible in the production of a crop of cotton. So wide a confidence was bestowed upon him among Henderson merchants that they always bought his cotton without the usual formality of inspection. All they seemed to eare was that it was the product of his own farm and of his own picking, for that meant the best fiber of the season. He sought no new method and seemed to give little thought to the experiments going on to increase the crop per acre or to find a new staple with a larger vield ner stalk. His unimportant fraternal work has been done as a Master Mason. His religious faith is that of the Missionary Baptist church,

"Ras" Jones was a son of John A. Jones, who came to Texas some years after his son and died on his farm near Pine Hill. His family comprised L. Augustus, who died at Pine Hill, Texas; J. Rasmus and Carrie, who married a Mr. Newman. These children were by his first wife, who died in Georgia, and by a second union Mr. Jones had Harrison of Clavton, Texas: Joseph; George; Christopher, who is deceased; "Coot"; Thomas, who is deceased, and Mattie and Nannie, both of whom married.

J. Rasmus Jones married Miss Emily Rosseau, a daughter of Lucius Rosseau, of a French family. Mrs. Jones died June S, 1906, having been the mother of these children: Dr. John R., a physician of Arkansas; Charles of Garrison, Texas, ex-county clerk of Panola county, Mrs. Lizzie Liles of Winnsboro, Texas; Emma, who married W. A. Liles, and is now deceased; W. R. of Rowswille was educated in the public schools of Rusk county, was admitted to the bar after teaching for a time, was elected county attorney of Panola, and after serving four years as district attorney resigned to take up the practice of law at the mouth of the Rio Grande; James M., of this notice; Daisy, who married W. E. Lawrence of Clayton, Texas; Homer, who served as a page of the Texas house of representatives as a boy and now resides at Pine Hill, and Belle of Clayton, Texas, who married first J. W. Langley and is now Mrs. J. H. Jones.

James M. Jones was born May 2, 1876, acquired his education in the public schools at three months yearly, was appointed a page in the Texas legislature and served as such in the session of 1889, gained some experience as assistant to a teacher in Pine Hill, and when he abandoned the atmosphere of the school house entered a drug store at Minden. A few months later he came to Henderson and took a position in an abstract office. He was made deputy tax assessor by Mr. W. D. Arnold and served three and one-half years, and a like period as assistant postmaster under Mrs. E. V. Flanagan. He was appointed deputy county clerk in 1902 and served under Clerk Lonnie Smith during his administration, and in 1912 made the race against two competitors and was nominated for the office and elected in the following November. His services have been of such a nature as to inspire confidence in the people of the community and to show that they made no mistake in choosing Mr. Jones for the position.

On November 10, 1904, Mr. Jones was united in marriage with Miss Marie L. Sinclair, daughter of F. P. Sinclair, whose family was of Louisiana French origin. Two children have been born to this union: Thetys J. and James Mason. James Mason Jones was born November 1, 1912, and died November 26, 1913.

WILLIAM M. COLR. M. D. Among the active members of the medical profession in Longview, the subject of this review occupies an enviable position. He is a native of the Lone Star state, having been born at Ladonia, Pannin county, Texas, January 1, 1865, and is a son of James H. and Zerelda (Houston) Cole, the former one of the leading merchants of Ladonia. The foreign of this branch of the Cole family was in County Cork, Ireland. Its American founder was Jacob Cole, the great-grandfather of Dr. William Cole, who came from the Emerald Isle while the government of the United States was still in its swaddling clothes and settled at Baltimore, Maryland. A razor which he brought with him from his native land and which has done service in the family through the succeeding generations, is now in the possession of Dr. Cole of Longview. A son, Jacob, who was born in 1799, ran away from home at the age of thirteen and made his way to the neighborhood of Danville, Kentucky, where he passed the remainder of his life, dying of cholera in 1853. He first married Miss Mary E. Hootsell of Danville, and James H. Cole was the only issue of this union. After the death of his first wife he married again, and to this second marriage was born a son, Andrew, who passed his entire life in the vicinity of Low's Station, Kentucky, Kentucky, Nere

James H. Cole was born in Danville, Kentucky, in 1826, Opportunities for attending school were rather meager at that period and he obtained little more than the rudiments of an education in the local schools. Being endowed with a strong native talent and an aptitude for making application of his powers, he added to his limited education by observation and self-culture until he could associate with the best informed men without feeling in the least humiliated. History was a favorife subject with him and one in which he excelled many whose opportunities had been far better than his own. The community in which he lived benefited by his knowledge of history in the talks he made before public schools and on sundry other occasions. Politically he was in harmony with the dominant party in the South, and served as the first mayor of his town, as well as rendering other municipal services in various capacities. He was a soldier of two wars. In the war with Mexico he was a member of Colonel Cassius M. Clay's regiment, which served under General Zachary Taylor, and took part in the battles of Monterey, Saltillo, Buena Vista and a number of minor engagements. At Buena Vista Mr. Cole was wounded, which ended his military service in that contest. An incident that occurred while he was engaged in the war with Mexico is worthy of more than passing mention. On one occasion he was captured by the enemy and condemned to be shot as a spy. Seven men were detailed to carry out the order and Mr. Cole happened to discover that the officer in command of the squad was a member of a secret brotherhood to which he himself belonged. At the first op-portunity he made this fact known, when it further developed that four of the seven members of the detail were also members of the same society. The commander then sent away the three members that were not "brothers" and one of those remaining was instructed to conduct Mr. Cole to the American lines. The grave was then filled up and the officer then reported grave was then filled up and the officer then reported to his superiors that the duty had "been performed." In this way Mr. Cole's life was spared. When the Civil war broke out in 1861 he enlisted in the Confederate army until he was wounded in action near Memphis, Tennessee, which ended his military career and left him a cripple for life. He was a prominent member of the Masonic fraternity, in which he attained to the thirty-second degree, and, being a student of the history and traditions of the order, he was frequently called upon to deliver addresses before Masonic bodies.

called upon to deliver addresses before Masonic bodies.

Before leaving his native state of Kentucky and coming to Texas in the year 1857, James H. Cole on August 21, 1849, married Miss Zerelda Houston, a daughter of Samuel Houston, who was a cossin of Glear Coles and "Houston, who was a cossin of Glear Coles and "Houston, who was a cossin of Glear Coles and "Houston, who was a daughter of Colonel Richard Lee, a member of that illustrious family of soldiers and patriots whose deeds of military daring and strategy adorn the pages of American history. She was born in 1843 and died at Ladonia, Texas, in 1876, her husband surviving her until March 10, 1908. Their four children are all living. Eugene G. is a merchant of Durant, Oklahoma; Mic is the wife of G. B. Yager of that city; Dr. William Mr.; and Virgil M.; as resident of Durant, Oklahoma.

Dr. William M. Cole came to Longview in 1886 and entered the offices of Dr. Stansberry as a student. After a thorough preparation under this able preceptor he matriculated in the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville and was graduated with the degree of M. D. in 1891. Returning to Longview he began the practice of medicine here and from that time to the present he has devoted himself to his chosen calling, with the result that he has built un a lucrative practice and stands high in the estimation of the public and his brother practitioners. Notwithstanding the numerous calls upon him in his professional eapacity he has found time to serve the city of Longview as councilman, and during his administration as mayor from 1906 to 1910 the city was placed upon a cash basis. He has shown his faith in the future of Longview by creeting some of the finest buildings and residences in the city. Realizing the benefits that result from organization, Dr. Cole holds membership in the American Medical Association and the Texas State Medical Society. He is a Royal Arch Mason and a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, in which he has held the office of district deputy grand master.

On February 25, 1891, Dr. Cole was united in marriage with Miss Gay Keener, daughter of Bowland and Mary (Pogues) Keener and the only surviving child of the family. Her parents came to Longview from Rusk country, Texas, Dr. and Mrs. Cole have two children, Nelwyn, aged thirteen years, and Zerelda, aged ten.

WILLIAM R. NEWTON, M. D. The medical profession in Milam county has no stronger member than Dr. Newton of Cameron, who during the past fifteen years has built up a splendid reputation as a skillful physician and surgeon and enjoys a constantly growing prestige and influence throughout his home community and in the medical profession of that section of the state. His most important contribution to the medical and surgical facilities of Milam county has consisted in the erection of a splendid hospital at Cameron, an institution that is a credit to the community and the means of a competent and excellent service to a large surrounding

Dr. Newton was born in Boone county, Arkansas, September 1, 1873, and is a son of the late Major George W. and Nannie (Brown) Newton. His mother, who was born in Pope county, Arkansas, in 1847, now lives in Cameron. The ten children of the family were: Jefferson D., Dixie, John H., William R., Mary E., George W., Mattie, Jimmie, Laura H. and Minnie. Dr. Newton is a son of a distinguished Confederate soldier who spent his last years in Milam county, Texas, but whose career was chiefly identified with his home state of Arkansas. Major George W. Newton was born in Johnson county, Arkansas, in 1835, and died at the home of his son, Dr. Newton, in Buckholts, Texas, March 15, 1907. He was in Pope county, Arkansas, at the beginning of the Civil war, having returned from a prospecting trip to California. He enlisted as a private in Captain Thomas Liucoln's Company, Scotts squadron. For gallantry at the battle of Pea Ridge in March, 1862, he was promoted lieutenant and later made a captain. He did faithful service in Arkansas until after the battle of Elk Horn, and was then transferred to Brook's battalion to Mississippi. After a period of ill health he returned to the service as major in Jackman's regiment in Shelby's division. He took part in General Price's famous raid through Missouri in 1864, marching over fifteen hundred miles in two months and engaging with the enemy about forty times. Again and again his bravery as a soldier was commended by his superior officers. Returning to Arkansas after the close of the war, he went home with the resolve to accept the fate of arms, but such were the conditions during the hateful period of reconstruction that he could not quietly sit by and witness the tyranny of carpet-bag rule, and to the outlaws and renegades who held the irresponsible and arbitrary civil power in his section of Arkansas he proved a leader whose name was a terror in the restorabroved a reader whose hame was a certor in the restriction of law and order. For many years after the war Major Newton operated a large plantation in Boone county, Arkansas, and was one of the most influential citizens of that locality. He was a minister of the Baptist church and for many years carried on his gospel work and took a leading part in establishing a seminary in his section of Arkansas. His life deserves long memory and two brief paragraphs from a tribute written by a friend at the time of his death deserves quotation at this point:

"He was always a positive force. His worth and influence were always felt, respected and valued. He was pre-eminently a man of peace, just, true, and the soul of southern honor in all the duties and relations of life. Since the birth of southern chivalry there has uot answered to the call of duty, country, home and friends a nobler, truer, braver spirit, a more valiant, faithful and unselfish patriot.

"In life he was known and loved by an 'innumerable company' of the good and true; now, that he is at rest, his devoutness as a Christian, his kindly and genial spirit as a neighbor and friend, his sterling worth as a citizen, and his distinguished valor as a worth as a chirch, and his distinguished value as a soldier are to his life-long friends a cherished memory, and to his surviving wife and children a heritage of which they may be proud."

Dr. William R. Newton grew up in Boone county, Arkansas, attended the public schools there, graduating from the high school in 1895. His studies were pursued at the Memphis Hospital Medical College in Memphis, Tennessee, until graduating M. D. in 1898. It has been his ambition to perfect himself for increasing duties and responsibilities of a successful practice, and he has availed himself first of the advantages of the New York Polyelinie for post-graduate study in 1904, and then at the Chicago Policlinic in 1910. After two years of private practice at Runsellville, Arkansas, Dr. Newton in 1900 established his office at Buckholts in Milam county, Yeass. His was a general practice until recent years, when he has given more and more of his time to surgery and to hospital management. In 1911 he built a sanitarium in Buckholts, Texas, but it was burned down in the following year. In 1913 he began the erection of his splendid hospital at Cameron at a cost of more than sixty thousand dollars, including the price paid for the grounds. It was formally opened January 6, 1914. This hospital has one hundred beds, and in its facilities and in its service stands in the front rank of similar institutions throughout the southwest.

At Cameron on May 17, 1906, Dr. Newton married Matilda J. Mondrick, daughter of Joseph Mondrick of Cameron. They have two children: William Joseph and George W. Mrs. Newton's father is a retired merchant. Dr. Newton has affiliations with the Masonie order, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Wood-men of the World, and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and has relations with the medical societies. His church is the Baptist, and he has taken an active part in the Democratic activities of his section, having been chairman of the county organization for four years. His diversious are in travel with his family, and in an occasional hunting and fishing trip.

Dr. Newton has important business interests, and his position as a business man is only second to his work as a physician and surgeon. Besides his sanitarium at Cameron he owns a good residence, has two hundred and twenty acres of improved farm land in Milam county, a section of land in Midland county, and four hundred acres in Old Mexico. In 1907 Dr. Newton led in the organization of the Buckholts State Bank and of the Buckholts Mercantile Company.

REV. T. J. OLIVER CURRAN. It was a seeming bit of ill fortune that sent Rev. T. J. Oliver Curran to Texas in the year 1910, when continued ill health caused him to locate in Terrell, Texas, in the hope of improving his condition, but he regards that circumstance today as one of the best things that has happened to him during his very active and busy career, for he is well pleased with Texas. He has been rector of St. Luke's Episcopal church in Denison for over two years, and is undeniably one of the most popular and highly esteemed men in the city.

A native son of Ireland, he was born in Lisburn on August 8, 1863, a son of James and Susanna Curran. His father was a noted artist of Ireland and a grandson of the well known John Phillpot Curran. He died in Lisburn when he was about sixty years of age, and the wife and mother died on May 1, 1892, in Chicago. They were the parents of three sons and two daughters, and of this family of five Rev. T. J. Oliver Curran is the youngest born.

Educated in private schools in Ireland and in Queens University at Belfast, up to the age of eighteen, young Curran came then to the States with his mother, and they located in Chicago. There he became interested in the insurance and real estate business and he was very successful. So much so, in fact, that it is highly probable that he would have achieved distinct success in that field had he chosen to remain so identified. But the natural inclination of the young man was toward the church, and so strong was this conviction that he turned his attention definitely to the study of theology in the Western Theological Seminary of Chicago, where for five years he was a close and careful student. He was graduated in 1905 with the degree of B. D. and was ordained to the ministry in Chicago by Bishop McLaren of that city.

The first ministerial work of the young cleric was that of a missionary in the Diocese of Chicago, and after a number of years there he experienced a physical breakdown that induced him to take up his abode in Wheeling, West Virginia. There his religious enthusiasm and his love of humanity combined to make of him one of the most potent forces for good in the factory districts that the city had known in many years, and he spent eight years of his life there in his work among the people of the mills and factories. These years were crowded big with experience and results, and it would be difficult to form any adequate estimate of the force and effect of the activities of the young minister in those years.

In West Virginia his health again broke down from the hardships of his work and he left that field and was under the care of specialists in Philadelphia for two years. While in that city he assisted the Rector of St. Andrew's church, Thirty-seventh and Barings streets, At the end of that time his medical advisers suggested that he try the Texas climate, and he accordingly located at Terrell. There he soon found himself fully recovered and in full possession of his former strength and vigor. Filled with renewed ambition he sought a wider field for his labors and the result was his removal to Denison, where he located on November 30, 1911. Here he has carried on his work in the city and has continued to enjoy the fullest physical health, so that he regards his removal to Texas as most fortunate.

Rev. Curran, in addition to his duties as rector of St. Luke's, is identified with considerable outside work among the people of Denison. He is a Democrat politically and, unlike many clergymen, exercises his right of franchise unfailingly when opportunity presents itself.

His wife, who was Miss Laura Agnes Reed, is a daughter of the great pioneer, Stillman S. Reed of Mansfield, Ohio.

The family of Rev. T. J. Oliver Curran is one that has but few representatives in the States, and the nearest relative he claims this side of Ireland is John Phillpot Curran, Judge of the King's Bench, in Winnipeg, Canada. The family, however, is one that is well represented on its native heath, and men of the name have been prominent in politics and in Irish art and letters through a number of generations.

Joseph H. McBroom. One of the leading members of the El Paso bar, Mr. McBroom located in El Paso over ten years ago as semi-invalid, having been attracted to this western city as a place to restore a constitution which had long been failing. Thus he is both a representative of the health resources of this city and of its possibilities as a business center,

Joseph H. McBroom was born at Monticello, Illinois, January 30, 1871, and was a son of Lewis and Elizabeth McBroom. The family is of Scotch-Irish descent. His father was for a number of years a substantial farmer in Piatt county, Illinois, and from there moved to Monticello. Joseph H. McBroom as a boy attended the Monticello high school, of which he is a graduate, and later graduated from Wabash College at Crawfordsville, Indiana, in June, 1897, taking the degree of Master of Arts. Admitted to the Indiana bar he began practice and remained for four years at Crawfordsville. Ill health compelled him to make a move to a different climate and as a result in September, 1902, he arrived in El Paso. Mr. McBroom is a vigorous specimen of physical manhood at the present time, and in the years since locating here has built up a fine practice in the better class of litigation,

During the Spanish-American war of 1898-99 Mr. McBroom was for six months with the One Hundred and Fifty-Eighth Indiana Volunteers. In politics he has been a Republican in principles and as a voter usually supporting the candidate, but during the last campaign in 1912 was allied with the Progressives, During 1908 he was president of the Taft-Sherman Club of El Paso. Fraternally he has membership in the Kappa Sigma College Fraternity and is a member and trustee of the Presbyterian church at El Paso.

At Newtown, Indiana, September 14, 1904, he married Miss Alice M. Parnell of Newtown, a daughter of Robert and Minerva Parnell. Their one child is a daughter named Marjorie Dell. It is superfluous to add that Mr. McBroom is an enthusiast regarding the climate and the business possibilities of El Paso and western Texas, and it is needless to say that such is his confidence in the place that he would live nowhere else.

Joseph M. Lewis. Coming to America a boy of twelve years and starting out for himself only a year later, Mr. Lewis after a varied experience and the successful overcoming of many obstacles finally got into the theatrical and amusement business and is now known as one of the proprietors of the largest and finest theaters in El Paso and all west Texas, and is a very enterprising promotor of high class theatrical entertainment in this city.

Joseph M. Lewis was born at Odessa, Russia, May 21, 1879, being the third of eight children born to Morris and Anna Lewis, both natives of Russia. The family came to America in 1891, locating in Houston, Texas, where the father has ever since been connected with merchandising.

Joseph M. Lewis received his education in the schools of his native country and for a very brief time after coming to America attended school. At the age of thirteen he began working in a store and continued in one place or another, getting experience more than capital up to the time he was eighteen. He then became interested in the decorating and advertising trade and was in that line until 1904. In the city of Dallas he established what has ever since been known in advertising circles as the Lewis System, and it has been a very effective means of setting before the public the current business opportunities and attractions and amusements of the day. Mr. Lewis has been a resident of El Paso since February 6, 1911, and in this city established what is known as the Princess Theater. On October 26, 1911, he and Mr. V. B. Andrews opened to the public the Grecian Theater, which easily ranks as the finest theater building in El Paso, and one of the very best in the entire southwest. Both the Princess and the Grecian are owned by Messrs, Lewis & Andrews. The Grecian is located at the corner of El Paso and Overland streets. Mr. Lewis has other real estate holdings in El Paso and is regarded as one of the very successful citizens and one who has a public spirited attitude toward all things for the betterment of the city.

He is a Democrat in politics, but has never sought any official honors. He is affiliated with the Benevolent and

Mr UMs James, G. Hudson

Protective Order of Elks and belongs to the Moving Picture Exhibitors' League of Texas.

On January 27, 1902, at Fort Worth, he married Miss Jessie Griswell, daughter of Charles Griswell. Mrs. Lewis was born in Tennessee, but was reared in Texas. Their home is in the Virginia Apartments on North Oregon street.

Anton Camozze. As a business builder few men in El Paso have a record of such substantial prosperity as that of Anton Camozze, head of the largest ice cream manufacturing establishment in the southwest, and of the only exclusive concern of this kind in El Paso, Mr. Camozze came to this city a little more than ten years ago, after having suffered disastrous reverses during the panic years of the nineties. He had begun as a poor man on coming to America, many years ago, and by dint of industry and business talents of more than ordinary caliber, he had acquired what would be considered a substantial fortune. Nearly all of this he lost in the panic years of the nineties and came to El Paso with what remained of his little fortune and began his fight all over again. He is now probably more prosperous than ever and has acquired a place of substantial influence in his city, Anton Camozze was born in Switzerland on May 28, 1859. His father was Matthew Camozze, a native of Switzerland, a coppersmith by trade, and a very promi-nent man in his canton and republic. He came to America in 1870, but after five years returned to his beloved Switzerland, where he died in 1879, on April 19, at the age of fifty-six. He was a devout member of the Catholic church and took a very active part in political and civic matters in Switzerland. He served as mayor of Cozzo, also as treasurer of the town, and for a number of years was treasurer of his church. His political thought was that of the radical republican faction. He was a man of determined and lofty character and carried the high respect of his fellow men to the end of his life. The maiden name of his wife was Josephine Galli; she was born in Switzerland and died at the age of twentyseven years on June 11, 1859. There were four children in the family, of whom Anton was the youngest.

Educated in the schools of his native land, passing through the high school, he left home and school together at the age of sixteen and set out for America, where at the age of sixteen and set out for America, where he arrived on May 9, 1876. From New York he came to St. Louis, where he found employment with the Cabanne Milk Company. A year later he entered the employment of the St. Louis Stamping Company, in which plant he learned the tinsmith's trade and followed that for a number of years. He remained in St. Louis from 1876 until the end of 1879, and in 1883 went out west and located in Denver. There he established himself in the confectionery and grocery business and gradually enlarged his stock and quarters and trade until he has made himself master of a very fine and profitable business. His home was in Denver from until 1900. Subsequent to the panic of IS93 he lost about $30,000. Beginning with a cash capital of $1,000 in Denver he has gradually got ahead until his resources were a comfortable amount, so that the disaster which came to him almost wiped out his lifetime accumulations. With what remained of his capital he came to El Paso, where he arrived on November 11, 1900.

On May 1, 1901, Mr. Camozze established at the corner of Oregon and Franklin streets a wholesale and retail ice cream and confectionery business. This was the only exclusive factory for ice cream in El Paso, and owing to the fact that Mr. Camozze has kept his product up to the highest standard of quality and sanitary wholesomeness he has enjoyed a business with a tendency to increase in volume every year. He not only supplies a large part of the local trade, but ships his creams and ices throughout a large scope of territory of which El Paso is the logical business center. The office and plant of the establishment are at the corner of Octavia and San Antonio streets, and the plant which Mr. Camozze owns and which he erected cost $15,000. He is also the owner of a large amount of other real estate and owns his beautiful residence at 1211 San Antonio street.

In politics Mr. Camozze is a Socialist, with progressive ideals and yet thoroughly practical and commonsense principles along political lines. He is affiliated with the Iudependent Order of old Fellows, the Wood-men of the World at El Paso and was brought up in the faith of the Catholic church. At Denver, Colorado, on November 29, 1890, he married Miss Belzameer Giguere, who was born in Quebee, Canada, of French parentage. Mr. and Mrs. Camozze have no children.

JAMES GUINN HUDSON. The late James Guinn Hudson was a resident of Gainesville, Texas, for upwards of ten years when death claimed him in 1899, and in the years of his residence here and elsewhere in the state he had accumulated a goodly portion of property. His residence in Gainesville was marked by his identification with the restaurant business, in which he was particularly successful. Born in Tennessee in 1839, Mr. Hudson was a son of Andrew and Martha Hudson, both natives of Tennessee, where they passed their lives. The father was a farmer in that state, and the subject was one of the six children born to the parents. The others are: Mary, living in Tennessee; Felix, who died in Texas; Elizabeth, unmarried and living on the old home place at Camden, Tennessee; Henry and Christopher also live on the old home place.

James Guinn Hudson grew up on the old home place and there gained such education as he was permitted to acquire. He was rather young when he started out for himself in life, but he made his way successfully, first venturing at one task and then at another, until he found himself in full-fledged manhood. He was forty-seven years old when he married, and then he bought a farm of his own and settled down upon it, continuing thus for six years. He then moved to Texas, settling in Gainesville, and starting up in the restaurant business, in which he continued successfully until he died on March 13, 1899. He left a fine farm of several hundred acres, which his widow has since sold, but she still retains a two story building on North Commerce street and six acres of land near to the city.

Mr. Hudson was a Democrat in his politics, and was tax collector in his home county in Tennessee for six years, although he never held any office during the years of his residence in Texas. He was a quiet man, devoted to his home and home life, and there found his greatest pleasures. He was a man of enterprising business habits, and was known for a public-spirited man, and one who concerned himself in the interests of his community, always shouldering his full share of the responsibility when any worthy work was in progress, either eivie, social or otherwise. He was a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and of the Knights of Honor.

In 1887 Mr. Hudson married Miss Mary Bell, a daughter of John and Lucy Ann (Blackwell) Bell. Both parents were natives of Tennessee, and both died when Mrs. Hudson was a small child. She is one of the five children of her parents, the others being: Nar-cissus, James, Sarah and John, all of whom are deceased.

No children came to Mr. and Mrs. Hudson. The lat-ter makes her home at No. 211 North Commerce Street.

Alfred Golding. Since 1889 a resident of El Paso, where for many years he was engaged in the painting and decorating trade, Mr. Golding in 1904 established a business as contractor in papering and painting, and maintains a fine store and office at 110 South Stanton street. He has the largest business of the kind in the eity, and is a successful man from the material point of view and is also a public-spirited citizen and one who is willing to corroborate in any movement for the advancement and welfare of El Paso. Alfred Golding is a native of England, born June 12, 1860, in London. His father, Alfred Golding, was born in England and for the greater part of his life was connected with the railroad service. For twenty-one years he was super-railroad residence of the service of the se

Alfred Golding, the oldest of the family, attained his education in the public schools of London until he was fifteen years of age, and then began to prepare for the practical work of life. He was apprenticed to learn the painters and decorators' trade, and passed a six years' apprenticeship in that work. In July, 1884, when twenty-four years of age, he came to the United States and continued to work at his trade as a journeyman until 1904, in which year he established his present business. He took up his residence in EI Pase in September, 1889, and has been here long enough to have witnessed practically all phases of the growth and improvement of this city.

In politics Mr. Golding is a Socialist. He has frateral relations with the Woodmen of the World and the Maccabees. In November, 1900, at El Paso, he married Miss Fannia Alexander, a daughter of Solomon Alexander, who was born in Baden, Germany. They are the parents of no children and their home is at 1314 North Kansas street, where Mr. Golding owns an attractive home of his own.

CHARLES G. McDow. A young business man of EI Paso who has made a notable success during the last few years, Mr. McDow represents an old family in this part of the southwest. He was born in Chihushna, Mexico, December 18, 1856, a son of Charles L. and Refugio (Contreas) McDow. His father was a native of Illinois, who came to Mexico in an early day, and became prominent as a cattle man of that country, and is still hiving in old Mexico at the age of fifty-four years. In Mexico he married a member of one of the well known old families, and the mother is also still living, being now forty-two years of age. There were four children in the family and Charles G. was the oldest. His early schooling was in the public schools of EI Paso, after which he entered the New Orleans Collego

His early selooling was in the public schools of El Paso, after which he entered the New Orleans College of Pharmacy, where he studied up to the junior year and then entered the University of Illinois, where he was graduated from the department of pharmacy in 1906. In that year he returned to El Paso and began work as a licensed pharmacist for Kelly & Pollard, with whom he continued for four years. Having in the meantime acquired a thorough practical experience in the business, and having a small amount of capital, he established a business and has since built up one of the best drug houses in the city, with a large local and outside trade. Mr. McDow has membership in the Ellianza Hispano Americano Society, the Socialea Catholic Society. In politics he is independent and is a member of the Catholic church.

On June 10, 1909, at Juarez, Mexica, Dr. McDow married Miss Marguerite Rodriguez, daughter of Isadore and Marguerite Rodriguez, both parents heing still residents in El Paso. The one child born of their union is D. Wilhelmina, who was born April 14, 1910, in El Paso. Mr. McDow owns his own home and other property and though be began his career without influential aid or capital, has gained a gratifying degree of prosperity. Hugh S. White, M. D. An El Paso physician and surgeon of high standing, now serving as county physician, Dr. White has gained most of his professional experience in west Texas, and has won a secure place through his thorough training, his native endowments and enthusiasm for everything he undertakes,

At Lexington, the county seat of Rochbridge county, Virginia, Higgh S. White was born on a plantation October 14, 1875. The family has long been identified with the Old Dominion, where his parents, Thomas S. and Sallie (Cameron) White, still live. The old homestead is two miles from Lexington and has long been noted for its well ordered management and as a stock farm is one of the best known in the county. Its specialty is fancy imported hogs, and the home is also characterized for the hospitality that pervades the best of old Virginia homes. Thomas S. White is an honored veteran of the war between the states, was twice wounded and bears sears from his encounters on many fields. He was for a time under the famous leader, Stonewall Jackson. As a Democrate has long taken much part in local affairs, and is a member of the United Confederate Veterans.

The third in a family of five, Dr. White grew up on a Virginia plantation, went to the public schools in Lexington, was a student of the Washington and Lee University in the same city and then hegan preparation for his profession in the University Medical College at Richmond. After his graduation as Doctor of Medicine in 1900 he acquired valuable clinical experience by one year spent as interne in the Richmond hospitals.

With this equipment he came into the southwest and first located at Pecos, in Reeves county. He also practiced for a time at Toyah, in the same county, and from there moved in January, 1906, to El Paso, where he has found a field more in keeping with his abilities. Dr. White enjoys a large and profitable practice, has served several years as county physician, is secretary and treasurer of the El Paso Pasteur Institute, is also secretary and treasurer of the El Paso County Medical Society and a member of the Texas State Medical Society and a member of the Texas State Medical Society and the American Medical Association. He has been a student ever since entering practical work, and has done considerable post-graduate work. He affilliated with the Knights of Pythias, is a Democrat and a member of the Episcopal church. His wife is a member of the Episcopal church.

is a member of the Episcopal church.

In April, 1909, Dr. White married Miss Annie Perrin
Kemp, who was born and reared in Texas and belongs to one of the old and well known families of El Paso.
Her parents were Judge Wyndham and Mary Lewis (Maury) Kemp, who were both from Virginia and early settlers in Texas. The late Judge Kemp gained large distinction as a lawer and judge, and bis career is sketched elsewhere in this publication. Dr. White and wife have one child, Wyndham Kemp White. Mrs.
White is an active worker in church and society, and home and in travel, and occasionally return to his old home in Virginia. Dr. White is a broad-minded and in private lends his support to every movement that will tend to advance the destiny of western Texas.

HENRY C. TROST. All that is most distinctive in the architecture of El Paso is the product of the skill and genius of Henry C. Trost, who, in his field, is undoubtedly the premier architect of the southwest. During many years of practical work in the southwestern states and territory, Mr. Trost has designed and created buildings which are the most conspicuous in many cities, and which are characterized by a successful combination of the utilitarian and the artistic in all their exterior lines and general arrangement and accommodation of symmetry and proportions to practical usefulness. El Paso is fortunate in possessing this prominent architect, who in many ways has been able to influence the standards and ideals of the business and residence construction of a permanent heauty and benefit of the community. While Mr. Trost has always been a diligent student of tradition in architecture and has followed the old and approved models, he has never slavishly copied from his predecessors and contemporaries, often displayed a striking originality in his conceptions, and has taken into consideration the surroundings and has endeavored to harmonize building construction with both the natural narmong buttong construction with note that me are environment and the uses for which it is designed. Henry Charles Trost was born in the city of Toledo, Ohio, March 5, 1800, a son of Ernest and Wilhelmina (Frank) Trost. His parents, both natives of Germany, came to America in the early fifties and settled in Toledo, where his father became a successful contractor Reared in Toledo and with an education derived from the public schools, Henry C. Trost gained a thorough working knowledge of his craft from his father and early evinced special inclination and talent for architecture, to which he has been devoted as a student and a practitioner since reaching manhood. At the age of seventeen he had graduated from an art school and had a thorough skill and knowledge of the fundamentals leading into his profession. During the three years following his graduation from the art school he was employed as a draftsman by architects at Toledo and then at the age of twenty entered upon independent

Mr. Trost's first field of independent operations was in Pueblo, Colorado, where for several years he was the best equipped and most original architect and designer in the city. Until he left Pueblo in 1884 his services were employed in drawing the plans for many of the best business and public structures erected in those years. Two years were then spent in travel through the west and south, and also employed by the state government of Kansas to design the senate chamber for the state capitol. This senate chamber has been regarded as one of the best in exterior lines and internal arrangement among all buildings of its purpose and kind in the country, and it did not a little toward establishing Mr. Trost's permanent reputation as an architect.
When it was completed in 1885 he traveled in various other states for a time and in 1886 opened an office for practice in Chicago, which was his home for twelve years, and a considerable list might be drawn up of his work in that western metropolis.

From Chicago Mr. Trost again went west and after about a year in Colorado Springs moved to Tucson, Arizona, which was then one of the most thriving towns in the entire southwest. In a short time he had acquired a large practice as an architect, extending through many cities besides Tucson, Architecturally considered Tueson in all its modern aspects is practically the creation of Mr. Trost's genius, and during his residence there he made many handsome additions, including the buildings for the University of Arizona, the Carnegie Library, the finest hotel in the city and many other notable buildings. It was in Tucson that he established a reputation since maintained for thorough and beautiful work. His home was in the Arizona city for six years and on moving to El Paso he organized the firm of Trost & Trost, comprising Henry C. Trost and his two brothers, G. A. Trost and A. G. Trost, and their nephew, G. E.

El Paso is deservedly proud of its many fine and handsome buildings, business blocks, its churches, schools and libraries and other semi-public institutions, and its residences. It is not too much to say that Mr. Trost has drawn the plans for practically the better class of buildings in El Paso since he located in that city, and the harmonious architectural lines which visitors comment upon with admiration are due to his work. Among prominent buildings that the firm has erected in El Paso may be mentioned the Mills building, which cost three hundred thousand dollars; the Paso Del Norte hotel, erected at a cost of half a million dollars: the new Masonic Temple, which was completed in 1913 and cost one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars, and many others of less importance. Mr. Trost at the same time has done a large business in New Mexico, Colorado and Arizona, and his firm has practically a monopoly on all classes of the finer and costlier building construction in the State of Arizona and other parts of the southwest. While he has been devoted to his profession in its practical aspects, Mr. Trost has always been a student, and has never allowed himself to lag behind in his professional attainments. A part of nearly every year is spent in the east, where he enjoys association with the best known architects of America, and where he has opportunity to learn all that is new and noteworthy in his field. Mr. Trost owns one of the beautiful homes of El Paso, and has other valuable property in the city. In polities he is a member of the Progressive party and enthusiastic in its support.

Ross Shaw Sterling. A thorough Texan, whose ancestors were prominently identified with the early struggles of this now thriving commonwealth in the days before the existence of the Republic, Ross Shaw Sterling is one who by his own efforts has become an active and substantial citizen of the state, and whose commercial and financial interests are large and extensive. He has always been a leader in the development of southeastern Texas, and much of the credit for the advanced conditions in these parts today is due in generous measure to Mr. Sterling, who has regarded the fortunes of the state as identical with his own at all times and has conducted himself in accordance with that idea. His connection with the R. S. Sterling Company, wholesale and retail dealers in grain and feed, is but one of the places where he is found to be officially prominent and active, a full list of his business connections being given at a later point in this brief sketch. Born in Anahuac, Chambers county, Texas, on Feb-ruary 11, 1875, Ross Shaw Sterling is the son of Capt. Benjamin F. and Mary Jane (Bryan) Sterling. The father was born in Monticello, Mississippi, where he followed the trade of a cabinet maker, until he came to Texas in 1849, where he settled in what is now Chambers county and there engaged in farming. During the war between the states he served as a captain in Wahl's Texas Legion. Of Scotch ancestry, Mr. Sterling's American progenitors came to America in the days prior to the Revolution, and men of that name and family were prominent in Scottish history for many generations, as all will affirm who are in any wise conversant with Scottish history. The mother was born at Liberty, Texas. She came of Irish ancestry, her ancestors having come from Ireland to the United States when the United States was in her infancy. The family settled in North Carolina, and came to Texas in about 1830, locating in Liberty. During the Texas revolution they were prominent in the upheaval, and Luke Bryan, an uncle of Mrs. Sterling, was a participant in the battle of San Jacinto.

Ross Shaw Sterling was educated in the common schools of Anahuac to the age of twelve years, when he began the active work of his career by taking service as a clerk in a mercantile business in Chambers county. In 1896 he started up in the mercantile business for himself, since which time he has been very prominent in the commercial and financial activities of the state.

In 1903 Mr. Sterling moved to Sour Lake, Texas, where he became interested to some extent in the grain business, and in 1904 he moved to Houston, which city has since been his headquarters for his varied and many sided interests. In Houston is located the main office of the firm of R. S. Sterling & Company, Wholesale Grain and Feed, and they conduct branch retail stores at Saratoga and Humble, Texas. Mr. Sterling in addition to his commercial activities, above named, is president of the Dayton Mercantile Company, of Dayton, Texas, as well as being president of the Day-Dayton, Texas, as wen as being presented ton Lumber Company of the same place, and of the Hymbla Oil Company at Humble, Texas, He is secre-Humble Oil Company at Humble, Texas, tary of the Harris County Navigation District, better known as the Houston Ship Channel, and in addition to these he has large real estate investments in the city of Houston. He is president of the Trinity Valley Northern Railroad Company, and in a financial way is also deeply interested as president of state banks at Dayton, Humble, Weimer, Sour Lake and Saratoga, Texas. These varied interests occupy his time and attention to such an extent as to exclude him from many activities of a social nature, and beyond his membership in the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World and the Houston Club and the Houston Country Club, he has no social or fraternal affiliations.

Mr. Sterling was married in 1899 to Miss Maud Gage the daughter of Fred Hamilton Gage, of Illinois, and they have five children, as follows: Walter Gage; Mil-dred; Ruth; Ross Shaw, Jr., and Norma Sterling. The home of the family is located at 224 Faun Avenue, and is one of the hospitality and social centers of the city.

WALTER S. CLAYTON. Since 1888 a resident of Texas and during most of that time at El Paso, Mr. Clayton is one of the citizens of this city whose long residence, success in business and high personal character entitles them to the best distinction in public life, and their previous records insure faithful and intelligence service in the public interest. Mr. Clayton has, during his long career at El Paso, built up a large wholesale flour and feed business, and at the present time is one of the city aldermen. The people of El Paso have come to appreciate his work and realize that when his name is associated with any undertaking for the public welfare that the enterprise is already well upon its way to successful accomplishment. Although one of the most prominent business and civic leaders of the city he is in every respect an unassuming gentleman who accomplishes results without any aggressive display of energy and with a quiet effectiveness which is a patent characteritsic of a really strong personality.

Walter S. Clayton is a native of the city of New Orleans where he was born July 19, 1867. His father, William Clayton, was a Virginian by birth, moving to New Orleans, where he died in 1872. Throughout his active life he was engaged in railroading. The maiden name of his wife was Jane Hozey, and she was born in New Orleans where they were married and where she died in 1876. The parents are buried side by side in one of the cemeteries of New Orleans. There were three children, Walter being the second and only son.

He spent the first twenty-one years of his life in his native state and then came to Texas in 1888. Since then he has resided in this state. His first location was near Fort Stockton, and during his year's residence there engaged in the cattle and live stock business. On coming to El Paso he took a position with the Mexican Central Railroad as a clerk, and remained with that trans-portation company for about eight years during which time he filled various executive positions at different points in old Mexico. On resigning he established a flour, feed, hav, grain and similar supplies depot, and has built this up to one of the largest commercial concerns of the kind in western Texas, now engaging in a general wholesale and retail business.

Mr. Clayton's early schooling was obtained in Louisiana, first in the public schools, and then in a private college at New Orleans. During the latter period of his schooling be worked in the day time and attended to his studies at night, and in this way fitted himself for a career of usefulness. After leaving college he took a position with a wholesale dry goods house at New Orleans, continuing with that for one year, and was then a clerk with a firm of English cotton buyers, continuing in the latter place until he left for Texas.

At New Orleans July 16, 1895, Mr. Clayton married Miss Rose Gaines, a daughter of Col. Lucius Gaines, of an old Virginia family. Five children, three sons and two daughters have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Clayton, namely: Rose M., Walter G., Frances, Frank B., and William E. Mr. Clayton and family are communicants of the Unitarian church. He is affiliated with the Elks and Beavers Fraternities, with the Toltec Club, has membership in the T. P. A., was president during 1912 of the El Paso Chamber of Commerce, and since 1909 has been president of the Business Men's Protective Association of El Paso. Politically he is a Democrat, and interests himself to a considerable extent in party affairs, and always in good government. As a member of the hoard of aldermen, he is one of the most progressive and energetic of the present municipal administra-tion, and his presence in the city government is good grounds for confidence among the majority of citizens as to the wholesome integrity and efficiency of the city administration. He is now serving his second term as an alderman. Outside of his business and civic relations, Mr. Clayton has great fondness for horses and all outdoor sports. His esthetic tastes run especially to music, though he is almost equally fond of literature and takes great pleasure out of his well selected private library. He is the type of citizen who is doing most for the upbuilding of the city of El Paso and is one of the strongest individual influences for good government and for continued material prosperity along all lines.

HORACE B. HAYES. Two fine drug stores in El Paso represent the business enterprise of Mr. Hayes, who came to El Paso about six or seven years ago, and in this brief time by his energy and business ability has succeeded and made progress such as few of his business contemporaries have equaled. He seems to possess the native ability of a merchant, at any rate his experience and equipment has been such that as a retailer and business builder he is enjoying a most noteworthy emegage

Horace B. Hayes was born at Hillshoro in North Carolina, October 29, 1873, a son of William A. and Susan B. Haves. His early education was in the private schools of North Carolina, and after leaving school he took a position in a general mercantile establishment in that state. Two years there gave him experience and also afforded him the funds for his next move in life. From North Carolina he went to Baltimore, when he was about eighteen years of age, and by work on the side he paid his way through two years of study in the Maryland ms way through two years of study in the Maryland (College of Pharmacy, After graduating in 1894, he began his regular work at the profession, and soon bought a share in a business, in which he had been a clerk during his college career. He was actively engaged in business at Baltimore, until he came to El Paso in 1906. After a few months Mr. Hayes bought an interest in a local drug store, and has since been the active manager of the business. The style of the firm is Hayes, Harp & Ponas. In 1907 Mr. Hayes opened a branch store, and now has two elegant drug establish-ments, well situated to command the best trade and carrying a complete line of drugs and druggists' sundries, surgical supplies and periodicals, and everything which should be found in the stock of a modern drug store.

Mr. Hayes was married at Hickory, North Carolina, October 3, 1900, to Miss Estelle Le Noir Clinard, a daughter of Frank C. Clinard of Hickory. They are the parents of one child, Charlotte. Mr. and Mrs. Haves are both members of the Episcopal church, he is affiliated with the Masonic Order, and is a Democratic voter, although not an active partisan in party affairs, beyond that. Hunting and fishing and baseball are his favorite amusements when he can get away from busness and he is a man of broad interests and takes pleasure in watching and helping when he can the upbuilding and development of his home city.

ARTHUR W. HOUCK. The distinctive prestige of El Paso among western cities, aside from its remarkable advantages in climate, has been the result of its splendid position with reference to the great mining resources of this vicinity. These mining industries have attracted to the city many men who have made reputations for themselves as practical miners and engineers and in the other technical pursuits connected with the industry, and one of these, who has been a resident of this city for more than ten years is Mr. Houck, who has had a quarter century's experience in assaying and who has an office and a large established practice in that profession in El Paso. His offices in this city are at 403 North Oregon Street. Arthur W. Houck was born at Lincoln, Nebraska, July 28, 1873, a son of George and Imogene Houck. The father died at Lincoln in 1875 and the mother is still living. The father was a farmer near Lincoln. Reared in Nebraska, Mr. Honck attained his early education in the public schools of that state, and following his inclination for scientific pursuit he then entered the school of mines at Golden, Colorado, where he was graduated B. S. in 1887, having given particular attention to chemistry and mineralogy. He at once became identified with the active work of his profession, and was located at various points from 1888 to 1902 finally in the latter year coming to El Paso and establishing his present business. In politics he is Republican, but has always maintained an independent attitude and has voted for the man or the principle rather than the party. He is one of the charter members of the El Paso Country Club.

At Chicago, Illinois, June 2, 1895, Mr. Houck married Miss Agnes Withers, a daughter of Mary D. Withers. Her father died when she was an infant, and her mother now lives with Mrs. Houck. The children of Mr. and Mrs. Houck have been eight in number, four of whom died in childhood, and the four now living are:

Gerald W., Guenn M., Dorothy A., and Arthur W., Jr. In ancestry Mr. Houck is of German origin on his father's side, while his mother was a descendant of Mayflower settlers, with prominent connections with some of the early families of Pennsylvania. Mr. Houck has been very successful in his business and is a loyal citizen of El Paso. He has been especially impressed with the wonderful climate and the material resources of southwest Texas, and as a man of scientific knowledge and broad observation he has always tried to extend the information concerning this country to all who are interested in the vicinity as a possible place of residence.

James Garries Smither Tamily, of which Captain Smither is a member, has been identified with Montgomery and Walker counties and Texas since the establishment of the Republic. It has furnishment of the Rapublic, it has furnishment affairs, to professional and agricultural life, and may of the name served as soldiers in the various wars of the nation.

James Gabriel Smither has spent all his life in Huntsville, where he was horn April 19, 1846. His father was Robert G. Smither, and his grandfather John Smither, John Smither, who spent his last years in Huntsville, was born May 27, 1779, in Richmond county, Virginia, was captain in a Virginia Regiment in the war of 1812, and died at Huntsville in September, 1860. He had a twin brother, William, and three other brothers, Lanncelot, Gabriel and Richard, and three sisters, Priscilla, Lucy and Nancy, the last two being twins. John Smither's mother was Wilmoth Sydnor Routt, and her mother was a Miss Sydnor, of Virginia. John Smither was married February 18, 1898, Ko Mary Patience Greenway, who also died iu Huntsville. Her grandfather, John Harper, lived in Alexandria, Virginia. Mary Patience Greenway's mother was Rebecca Harper, who married Charles Greenway. The children of John and Mary Patience Smither were as follows: Charles G., who died in Teanessee; Robert G.; Gabriel and William, both of whom died in Mississippi, leaving large familles; James L., who also served in the Mexican war, in a Tennessee Regiment, and died in Huntsville, leaving one child; Julia Ann, who married Washington Viser and died in Madson county. Texas, leaving three children; John R., who died in Huntsville, and left a large family; Joseph A., who died in Huntsville without children.

Robert toolloe Smither, father of Captain Smither, was born at Washington, Rappahaanock county, Virginia, November 21, 1811, and died September 10, 1853. He was a man of ordinary education, and devoted his life to business. He spent some time in Mississippi, and came to Texas during the thirties, locating in the country, a few miles from Huntsville. He hater moved to the city and was one of the first merchants of the place During the war for Texas independence, he served with the rank of major in the Texas troops, and participated in the campaigns in 1842 against Vasquez and Woll, who invaded Texas in spring and fall of that year, this death occurred at Grand-Ecore, Louisiana, while returning from New York on a trip to buy goods. He was a Democrat, an Odd Fellow and a church member.

Robert G. Smither married Elizabeth Emmeline Calmes, who was born February 9, 1817, in Fairfield dis-Calmes, who was norn reocuary 3, 1911, in rainlend dis-trict of South Carolina. Her brother, John Johnstone Calmes was born November 7, 1819; and her sister Mary Caldwell Calmes was born March 3, 1821. Their father was Marquis Calmes, who was born May 9, 1784, served in the War of 1812, moved to Tennessee in 1826, was first sheriff of Tipton County, Tennessee, and died in Covington, Tennessee, in November, 1841. His father William Calmes born near Winchester, Virginia, in 1761, served under Lafayette in the Revolutionary War.
Marquis Calmes married Mary Ann Johnstone on June 28, 1810, at Fairfield, South Carolina. The children of Robert G. Smither and wife were: William Bowles, born October 10, 1839, at Oxford, Mississippi, was Lieutenant of Co. K., 31st Texas (Confederate) Cavalry, and died March 15, 1875, at Huntsville; Mary Aletha, born December 6, 1841, and who died in infancy; John Marquis, born January 7, 1844, in Montgomery county, Texas, now a resident of Huntsville, and who was a former county judge, a former judge of the district court, and saw service as a Confederate soldier in Lee's army. James Gabriel, who was born April 19, 1846; Juliette Ella, born October 13, 1848, and lives in Hunts-ville; Miles Temple, born April 21, 1851, who died February 2, 1881, without a family; Robert Elizabeth, born October 7, 1853, and who died February 15, 1870.

James G. Smither was educated largely by experience, since his youth was spent in the troublous days preceding and during the Civil war. He attended for a brief time Austin College, while it was located in Huntsville. In the fall of the second year of the war he entered the service in Captain Hamilton's Company in Roundtree's battalion, and Colonel Brown's 31st Texas Cavalry regiment. With this command he remained until the close of hostilities, seeing much service in Texas and Louisisiana. His regiment was in front of General Bank's army on its retreat and fought some of the battle army on its retreat and fought some of the battle of the Red River campaign. After that campaign the command was ordered back to Texas and was dishanded at Independence, in Washington county. Cartain Smither was on a furlough at the time the troons were dishanded.

His career after the war was identified with farming for several years. The most important of Mr. Smither's positions has been in connection with the state prison at Huntsville. He was appointed assistant superintendent of the Huntsville penitentiary in 1888 by Governor Ross and had charge of the prison there until 1903. His service really began in the prison in 1878, when he was made a sergeant by Major Goree, and served as an under officer for ten years. During his administration the service was kept up at the highest point of efficiency, and all those who know anything of Captain Smither's administration will recall that he ruled more by love and patience than by a rigid discipline which has been all too common in penal institutions. Kindness was his universal practice with convicts, and they all admired and obeyed implicitly his jurisdiction. Outside of his prison work, Captain Smither has been officially identified with the town of Huntsville or Walker county. In politics he has done some important work, having attended all the big conventions as a delegate and having helped to nominate all the governors up to the present time. In Congres-sional conventions and judicial and other local conventions he has seen a broad and intimate service. He has helped to build up Huntsville, and is one of the most substantial and best known citizens of that old Texas city. In Walker county on January 12, 1870, Captain Smither married Miss Mary A. Walker, a daughter of Oliver Hazard Perry Walker and Elizabeth (Walton) Walker. Her father, who was born in Montgomery county, Alabama, came to Texas as a boy with his uncle, and became a merchant in Huntsville and died at Waxahachie, Texas, and is buried there. His wife died in Huntsville, and her children were: Mrs. Smither; Thomas E. of Walker county; John I. H., who died young; and Sarah Ellen J., who died unmarried. After the death of her first husband, Mrs. Walker married Martin Gibbs, and her children by that union are William Rufus; Jeff Davis; and Bessie Martin, who married J. D. Nance of Huntsville. Mr. and Mrs. Smither have the following children: Robert, of Huntsville, who mar-ried Maggie Davenport, and has a child, Mary Irene; Walton Calmes, of Burrwood, Louisiana, who married Ella Robinson, and has two children, Evelyn Calmes and Jimmie Waldron. Captain Smither is fraternally identified with the Knights and Ladies of Honor, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, and the Home Circle. He is not a church man, but his family attend and support the Baptist denomination.

WHITAKER KEESEY. Only unusual character and activity can command such high personal esteem as is paid on all sides to this venerable retired buisness man and pioneer citizen of Fort Davis. It is no inconsiderable distinction that he became identified with Fort Davis soon after the war and from the early seventies until his retirement was a factor in the development of one of the most flourishing commercial houses of West Texas. There are hundreds of people, beneficiaries of his spirit and practice of loving kindness, who would claim that all the fruits of his vigorous com-mercial efforts, excellent though they are, should be estimated as inconsiderable against the finer products of his generosity, his practical christianity. others may point to institutions founded and organized benevolences supported, the charity of Mr. Keesey is still finer and better. Scores of men are prosperous and occupy a creditable place in their community as a result of financial aid and business counsel from Mr. Keesey. In the country about Fort Davis during the last forty years it is said that he has helped nearly everybody. When loans were refused by everybody else, a certain resort in time of need was this kindly Fort Davis merchant. And the result of his experience with men has increased rather than lessened his faith, for almost invariably men have eagerly sought to repay him out of the first fruits of a renewed prosperity.

Only in a broad outline it is possible to sketch the career of Whitaker Keesey. He has been too busy to keep a record even in memory of the many changes and vicissitudes of his experience, and these are, as already stated, inconsiderable and of no great importance as measured against the gratitude for his life and services which is impressed in the hearts of men in various sections of West Texas. Whitaker Keesey was born September 4, 1843, at Lancaster, Ohio, and was reared in the city of Steubenville on the Ohio river. His parents were George and Nancy (Thomas) Keesey, his father a drayman, who in 1851 went west to Culifornia, and never returned to his family. There were six children thus left without adequate means of rearing and support, three sons and three daughters, and Whitaker was born in Ireland and married a Miss Miller, a native of Germany, after coming to America settled in Pennsylvania and from that place in 1804 emigrated to Ohio. There is a record that grandfather Keesey took out his naturalization papers in 1806. Grandfather and grandmother Thomas were both natures of Scotland, the latter's maiden name being Rufner and they emigrated from Virginia to Ohio in 1812.

Whitaker Keesey, partly as a result of the compara-tive poverty of his widowed mother and partly from the circumstances of the times, had an extremely limited schooling, although his native abilities and intelligence have proved a good substitute for some of the book knowledge which he otherwise might have acquired. His attendance at school was limited to two years, for one year and four months he was in the schools of Steubenville, during his seventh and eighth year. Almost as soon as his strength permitted he was put to work on a farm for his board and clothes, and during the two years thus employed he attended school three months of each winter. Following that he began earning regular wages, being employed on an adjoining farm for eighteen months at five dollars a month for the first year and five dollars and a half a month for the succeeding six months. With such variety of work and with experience that contained many hardships be went on to the age of sixteen. At that time he began learning the trade of baker, and followed that business for a number of years. To those who know the kindly traits and character of this Fort Davis citizen, it will increase the respect and esteem in which he is held to record the fact that in his early life, in addition to the hardships of poverty, he had to endure severe treatment from supposedly christian people in whose homes he lived or for whom he was employed. The prejudices ne uved or Ior whom he was employed. The prejudices thus aroused and deep set in his mind he has never succeeded in entirely overcoming. In his earlier years he was exceedingly devoted to a kindly Sunday school teacher, whose kindness to the little boys of her class will never be forgetten, but his own rugged battles and struggles with the world made it impossible for him to retain his belief in many of the tules of christian conduct which he learned from that teacher.

Mr. Keesey was still a youth when the war broke out between the North and the South. At the second call for three months' volunteers be enlisted and was with the Eighty-fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and later served twenty months in the Fifth Ohio Volunteer Cavalry in Company P, being discharged with the rank of sergeant.

Not long after the war Mr. Keesey set out for the Southwest. Leaving his old home at Steubenville, Ohio, Pebruary 5, 1867, he found employment under General J. S. Mason in the care of his two small boys as they were then, and also three horses. The little party arrived at San Antonio March 6, and on May 25, 1867, there being no railroads in that section of Texas, General Mason secured for young Keesey a position as baker to accompany the troops to Fort Davis, then under command of General Wesley Merritt. The distance of four hundred and seventy-five miles from San Antonio to Fort Davis was accomplished in a journey by wagon roads in thirty-one days. When he arrived Mr. Keesey had travelled sixty-two days between Steubenville and Fort Davis. It is a matter of interest to recall the fact that this trip, though a long one, can now be accomplished in four days, and that is a graphic illustration of the remarkable advance made in transportation and in all other living conditions during modern times. Mr. Keesey's early years in and about Fort Davis were of the real frontier life, with all its pleasures and hardships, and after some years of that experience he and a brother engaged in merchandising in 1873. Their stock of goods was one of the first opened for trade at a military post, which was in the midst of a great wilderness occupied only by the range cattlemen. The brother finally withdrew from the busi-ness, and Mr. Keesey continued it alone until 1907, in the meantime establishing and building up one of the oldest and most successful commercial houses in all West Texas. When he retired in 1907 from the active cares of life it was with a satisfying degree of success, and now at the age of seventy-one he enjoys and deserves to enjoy the contentment and prosperity of a career that has brought him material good and has resulted in encouragement and support for so many others. His career seems to illustrate the truth of the aphorism that to the one who is least regardful of his selfish prosperity shall be returned the greatest abundance, and it is certain that Mr. Keesey prospered beyond all his expectations, and he affords the credit for that to his Divine Father, and as a result of reliance upon the virtues of prudence, truthfulness and honesty in all his business relations,

He has been honored with civic office as often as he could spare the time, he held the position of hide inspector four years, was treasurer of the county four years, was county commissioner eight years, and has always participated in matters for the benefit of the locality. In politics he has voted with the Republican party, but believes in independent action in such matters and supports the qualified honest man regardless of the party label. Since his admission on December 2, 1891, Mr. Keesey has been affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows He is a member of the T. P. A., a commercial men's accident insurance order. and also with the Benevolent League, a branch of the T. P. A. He is a member of the National Geographic Society of Washington, a member of the Texas State Historical Association, and an honorary member of the Luther Burlank Society. Mr. Keesey has no regular church membership and confesses to a variance with the views expressed and held by many with church membership. He believes that all churches are good regardless of denomination, and has steadfastly supported and endeavored to have some investment in all new church buildings erected in his part of Texas. It is his view that no one can predict the scope and breadth of the influence for good that may result from churches in after years. Oue improvement, he holds, would do much to strengthen the churches and stop the increase of membership in fraternal orders, and that would be the establishment of a regular branch of the church for the care of the poor, the sick and distressed members and for the upbringing of the fatherless orphans.

On Åpril 14, 1892, at Wellsburg, West Virginia, Mr. Keesey married Namie J. Carmichael, daughter of J. W. M. and Mary Carmichael of Wellsburg. Mrs. Keesey became a member of the Presbyterian church at the age of fourteen, and lived a devoted and active christian life, ever ready to assist the needy and distressed and orphan children. She was an untiring worker in the Rebekah branch of the Odd Fellows order, and on the Rebekah branch of the Odd Fellows order, and on the Rebekah branch of the Wellsburg. Wellsburg. State of the New York of the Wellsburg. State of the New York of the Wellsburg.

In his earlier years Mr. Keesey had to struggle and work hard for every advancement, and as a rule his Vol. IV-12 honest and truthful methods of dealing commended him to the confidence of all who employed his services. When he established a business of his own, he insisted upon the same principles of incorruptible integrity, and his business standing was from the first unquestionable. Thus he built solidly for himself, and was also able to care for and protect the interests of many poor cattlemen who needed his assistance from time to time. Thus between his endeavors to gain for himself sufficient means in the declining years, and accomplishing his purpose of bringing a little sunshine into the dark places for the more unfortunate, his career has heen an exceedingly husy and useful one, and there have been few more beneficent lives although his deeds of kindness must of very necessity go largely unrecorded except in the hearts of those who will cherish gratitude for his deeds as long as life lasts. Many men now prominent in West Texas owe their start to Mr. Keesey, and in the course of twenty years he has again and again advised boys and young men in such manner as to start them properly on worthy and useful careers. It is for this influence of an upright christian life that Mr. Keesey will deserve lasting memorial among the citizenship of West Texas.

John Mattiew Cartwright. It is an unusual distinction of a Texas family to have been represented through five successive generations in the state, but that distinction belongs to the Cartwrights. John Cartwright the pioneer settler at what is now San Augustine in the year 1818, two years before Stephen Austin planted the first permanent American colony, and seventeen years before Texas gained her independence from Mexico. In the family of John Matthew Cartwright, the well known land owner and planter at San Augustine, are two children, who represent the fifth generation of the family. There are several collateral branches of the Cartwright family in different sections of Texas, but the descent of the one now under consideration is through the original settler, John Cartwright, Matthew Cartwright, Columbus C. Cartwright, to John Matthew Cartwright, to due to the second of the second of the content of the content of the content of the cartwright, to John Matthew Cartwright, and the last named's children.

Concerning the original John Cartwright there is little information at hand. Concerning his son Matthew, however, it is known that he was born in Wilson county, Tennessee, November 11, 1807, and came here when a boy with slaves. He started a mercantile business and traded with the Indians, also opened up a farm and worked his slaves thereon. The farm was three miles east of the present site of San Augustine, and there he continued in farming and merchandising until 1833 or 1834. A short time after Matthew came his father and family also came. Three miles northwest of San Augustine at that time lived the family of Col. Isaac Holman, who had come from Lincoln county, Tennessee about 1833. Matthew Cartwright was married in 1836 to Amanda Holman and of their family of children two are still living. Matthew Cartwright after his marriage became a merchant in San Augustine, with his father as a parfner, later was in business by himself until 1847, and then up to the time of the war was engaged in locating and dealing in Texas land, for which work he rode horseback throughout all the settled portions of the state. He had one horse on which he rode over 20,000 miles. He was a man of great liberality and justice in all his relations, and again and again granted extensions to the families of settlers who were unable to meet the strict terms of agreement, concerning their land purchases. After the war he resumed merchandising, but soon turned the business over to two of his sons. His death occurred April 2, 1870. His wife survived him twenty-four years, dying at San Augustine in her seventyseventh year.

Columbus C. Cartwright, son of Matthew, was born in San Augustine in 1837, and died in 1902. He was engaged in the real estate business for many years, was a very worthy and highly respected citizen, and bore the same homorable relations to the business and social community which had characterized his father. Throughout the period of the war he served as a soldier, and his brothers A. P. and Leonidas were also in the army Columbus C. Cartwright married Sallie Lane, and of their children, besides John Matthew, there are now living Robert L. Cartwright of Waco; A. H. Cartwright of San Augustine; Mrs. Mary Bewley; and Mrs. Ella Sharp, the latter two of San Augustine, John Matthew Cartwright was born at San Augustine, John Matthew Cartwright was born at San Augusting, in 1862. Reared in his native locality, with the exception of a few years spent in Central Texas, he has always had his home here. At the present time he is the owner of a fine farm of two hundred acres adjoining San Augustine on the south. This is a historic place, having been in possession of the Cartwright family since the earliest days of settlement, and some of the land has been in cultivation for nearly a hundred years. Mr. Cartwright still raises splendid crops of cotton and corn, and from his experience one may conclude that the fertility of Texas soil in San Garty and the settlement of the cartwright farm are devoted to pecan culture, and that pecan orchard is one of the most valuable assets of the farm. Mr. Cartwright is also owner of other valuable farm property in the county.

John M. Cartwright married Miss Emma Massey, a daughter of C. B. and Eliza (Jones) Massey, of Rusk, Texas, pioneers of this commonwealth. The two children of Mr. and Mrs. Cartwright are Holman L., and Baxter

Polk.

JUDGE HENRY KINSKY POLK. Among the old families of eastern Texas the Polks have had a prominent place from the time when eastern Texas was the battle-ground between the advancing American colonization and the resisting forces of Mexico. In ante-bellum days, served with the Confederacy, and gave more than ordinary sacrifices of life and property during the war and during the subsequent half century. Their lives have been led along the paths of quiet industry and prosperity and as good citizens and officials they have done their full share for the enrichment of community life.

Henry Kinsey Polk, now county judge of San Augustine county, was born at San Augustine in 1860, a son of Charles I. and Victoria (Thomas) Polk, in whose family were three sons—H. K., I. D., J. V. The grand-parents were Albert and Nancy (McKeever) Polk, who came from Tennessee to San Augustine county in 1836. The late Alfred Polk settled on a farm four miles southwest of San Augustine. From the original stock of the Polk family was also descended President James K. Polk, and the history of the Polks goes back to the earliest times in Scotland. Alfred Polk was born in Tennessee, and for seventeen years was county judge of San Augustine county, his records making a portion of the early history of that county, as his grandson's does in the later years. He married Nancy McKeever, whose history proves that she was a remarkable woman. She reared ten children of her own, two sets of orphan children, kept house faithfully for sixty years, and her husband's death was the first that occurred in her family. Judge Alfred Polk died in 1889. Six of the sons of Alfred and Nancy Polk served in the Confederate army, and one of them was killed in battle.

Charles I. Polk, the father of Henry Kinsey, was born in Tennessee in 1831, and was five years of age when the family moved to east Texas. For many years he was a merchant at San Augustine, where he died in 1890. He was reared on bis father's farm, near San Augustine, but at the age of nineteen became a resident in the fown and spent the remainder of his years there. For seven years he was a clerk in the store of Thomas Pavne, and then engaged in business for himself. During the war he entered the Confederate service and bore arms in the Southern cause for several years. He married Miss Victoria Thomas, who was born in San Augustine, a daughter of 1. D. Thomas, one of the first settlers. I. D. Thomas built at San Augustine what is said to have been the first twostory residence in Texas. He settled in East Texas, in what is now San Augustine county, in 1824, and established the first store on the site of San Augustine when that became the site of the city. For some years he held rank as one of the largest merchants in the entire state. Mrs. Victoria Polk is still living, and is an aunt of Seymour Thomas, the famous portrait artist of Paris, who came to America in 1913 to paint the portrait of President Woodrow Wilson, and several of his canvases have been hung in the Paris Salon.

Henry K. Polk spent his boyhood in San Augustine, attained his early education in the local schools, and afterwards was a student in the Agricultural and Mechanical College, at Bryan. In his business carree has been very successful. He is the owner of valuable land in the town of San Augustine, including a fine fram of two hundred and eighty-seven acres within the city limits, besides other town and country property.

Mr. Polk has given a number of years to the public service of his country. To his present office, as county judge, he was elected in November, 1912, entering upon his duties on the first of December of the same year. He previously held the office of county judge, and for six years was county commissioner, during most of which time he performed the duties of judge. Mr. Polk is affiliated with Redland Lodge, No. 3, F. & A. M., and his father before him was an active member of the same fraternity.

Judge Polk married Miss Ella Burleson, a native of San Augustine county and a daughter of James Burleson. She is a cousin of Ex-Congressman Albert Burleson, who is postmaster-general in the Wilson cabinet, Mrs. Dolk was educated at Baylor University. They are the parents of seven children: Mrs. Jamie Gombert, Mrs. Hallie McParland, John Alfred Polk, Kate, Carlo, Mamie and Henry.

JAMES H. HILL. With its growing importance as a railroad center, Galveston has become the home and headquarters of many prominent railway officials, and one of the best known members of railway circles in the city is James H. Hill, who recently became vice president, treasurer, and general manager of the Galveston, Houston & Henderson Railway Company. Mr. Hill has been a resident of Galveston for the past seventeen years, and is a veteran railroad man, having taken up that line of work about as soon as he left school. His career has had all the interesting features of progress, from a position as minor clerk to one of the highest officials of the service, his ability and personal character having won him a steady promotion from one grade to another

In 1884 occurred the marriage of Mr. Hill to Miss Fanny Gillette of Buffalo, Illinois. They have three children: Merian, wife of L. M. Higgins; Gillette, a student in the Culver Military Academy, in Indiana; and Beatrice. Their home is at 1616 Scaly ave., Galveston.

LEWIS FISHER. Bearing an old and distinguished name in Texas, Lewis Fisher, now the mayor-president of the city of Galveston, has well performed the responsibilities and creditably lived up to the expectations of his family history. The history of modern Galveston begins with the year 1900, and in the reforms and improvements which has rehabilitated and remade the greatest port on the Gulf coast Lewis Fisher, first as county judge of Galveston county and later as head of the municipal commission, has been one of the greatest individual factors. During his administration as county judge the great sea wall, one of the most remarkable constructive enterprises ever undertaken by any city, was begun and completed, and during his administration as mayor, Galveston has rapidly gone to the front, until it is now the second largest port on the American continent, being exceeded in its commerce only by the port of New York City. Mr. Fisher is by profession a lawyer, and for a number of years has given all his ability as an attorney and as a practical executive and administrator to his home city.

Lewis Fisher was born at Austin, Texas, October 28. 1872. It is only necessary to refer to the early pages of Texas history, particularly in the era which made an independent republic of what had been a province of Mexico, to perceive the early prominence of the Fisher name in Texas annals. S. Rhoads Fisher, grandfather of Judge Fisher, was one of the delegates to the convention which met at Washington on the Brazos on the first of March, 1836, and was one of the fifty-eight delegates who adopted and signed the Declaration of Independence for Texas on March 2, 1836. After Texas beeame a Republic, he served as secretary of the navy until his death, in 1838. The parents of Lewis Fisher were Rhoads and Sophia (Rollins) Fisher. His father was born in Matagorda county, Texas, March 13, 1832, and had a long career in the real estate business, and for eighteen years served as chief clerk in the land office at Austin. During the war between the states he saw service as a Confederate soldier. The mother of Judge Fisher was a native of Mississippi and died February 5, Lewis Fisher spent his boyhood and early youth in Austin, where he attended the public schools, also St. Edward's College, and was graduated from the law department of the University of Texas in 1895 with the degree of LL. B. In the same year he came to Galveston and took up the practice of law. In 1900, the year in which occurred the great disaster which nearly destroyed Galveston, he began his first important public service in the office of county attorney of Galveston county, and served until 1902. His term of county attorney was followed by his election as county judge in 1902, and he served nearly four years. As county judge, he was ex officio chairman of the county commissioners court and had supervision of the construction of the sea wall, which was completed during his administration, at a cost of one and a half million dollars. On one of the granite pillars marking the western end of the sea wall are inscribed the names of the county officials and others prominently identified with the construction of the enterprise, and the name of Judge Fisher appears at the head of this list.

Judge Fisher resigned his office as county judge to accept the appointment given by Governor Lanham as judge of the Tenth Judicial District, his name having received the indorsement of the entire Galveston bar for this office. As district judge, his services were performed with credit until the year 1909. In the municipal elec-tion held in May of that year be was the expressed choice of many prominent citizens of Galveston for the office of mayor, or president of the commission. Up to that time there had been no changes in the personnel of the commission from its inception, under the new charter, and Judge Fisher became a candidate to succeed H. A. Landes. Judge Fisher's individual name on the municipal ticket proved stronger than the name of the rival candidate, though the latter was supported by the entire press of the city and by the exertions of the city clubs. His campaign and election were a most noteworthy feature of the year in municipal politics and were a practical demonstration of the power of a popular personality in any political contest. He was re-elected in 1911, and again in 1913, without opposition.

Judge Fisher maintains his law offices in the Trust

Judge Fisher maintains his law offices in the Trust Building, and there transacts a great deal of his duties as mayor. Mayor Fisher is always accessible to citizens of Galveston and in every way is really the head of the city administration. Outside of his profession and his official affairs, he is well known and prominent in social circles. Judge Fisher has attained to the thirty-second degree of Scottish Rite Masonry, and belongs to Tucker Lodge. No. 297, A. F. & A. M., of Galveston, El Mina Control of the Control of Control of Service and Control of Control of Service of Control o

Verein.

In 1901 Judge Fisher married Miss May Masterson, a daughter of Branch T. Masterson of Galveston. Her, naternal grandfather was Wilmer Dallam, who is distinguished as having prepared the first digest of the laws of Texas, known to all lawyers as "Dallam's Digest," Lewis Fisher and wife are the parents of four children; Lewis Dallam Fisher, Wilmer Rollins Fisher, May Masterson Fisher, and Rebecca Branch Fisher. Their residence in Galveston is at 1703 Thirty-First Street.

HARRY PHILLIP JORDAN. In the field of civil, commercial, corporation and insurance law, Harry Phillip Jordan has won merited distinction at the har of Waco. He is also prominent in military and Masonic affairs, and is well known in public life, being the representative of the Sixty-first District in the legislature of the state. Still a young man, his achievements have been noteworthy and he is recognized as one of his city's virile and helpful citizens, who has ever displayed a conscientious regard for the responsibilities of citizenship and the highest ideals of his learned calling.

Mr. Jordan was born at Warrington, Virginia, February 16, 18-75, and is a son of Powhatan and Bertic (Edwards) Jordan. His father, a native of Portsmouth, Virginia, born in 1827, was a well known physician and surgeon of Virginia, where he practiced for many years, and in 1876 was appointed federal quarantine officer at New Orleans, being an expert along the line of yellow fever and smallpox. He remained in the Louisiana city until 1881, in which year he came to Texas and established himself in practice at Beaumont, where he continued to reside until his death in 1904. He was widely and favorably known in his profession and bewield and favorably known in his profession and beautiful for the surface of the surface of

Harry Phillip Jordan was educated in the public schools of Beaumont and at Beaumont Academy, following which he took a course in civil engineering at the Texas Agricultural and Mechanical College and was graduated from that college in 1895, with the degree of B. C. E. He next took up the study of law as a student in the University of Texas, from which he was graduated in 1898, with the degree of LL. B., and in that same year was admitted to the bar and established himself in practice at Waco, where he has offices at No. 801 Amicable building. He has steadily advanced in the ranks of his calling, and in his special lines of civil, corporation, insurance and commercial law has been connected with a number of noted cases. The corporation lawyer who would win a full measure of success must not only be an alert and broad member of his profession, but a keen and far-seeing business man. His is pre-eminently the domain of practical law, in which solid logic and hard fact, fertility of resource and vigor of professional treatment are usually relied upon, rather than ingenious theory and grace of oratory. Mr. Jor dan is possessed of these traits in marked degree. he is a successful business man is shown by his connection as stockholder and director in the Texas Fidelity and Bonding Company and stockholder in the Guarantee and Trust Company, the McKnight Sundries Company and the White Rock Sand and Gravel Company, and he is also the owner of much realty in Waco, including his residence at No. 2021 Austin avenue and about twelve other pieces of business and residence property. Politi-cally a Democrat, he was secretary of the Democratic county executive committee for several years, was assistant county attorney from 1898 until 1902, and in 1912 was elected to the legislature of the state to represent the Sixty-first district, from McLennan county. For twenty years a member of the Texas National Guard, in 1913 he was elected colonel of his regiment, and he also takes a keen interest in Masonry, being a thirty-second degree Mason, a Knights Templar and a Shriner. He helongs to the Young Men's Business League and the Chamber of Commerce, and has associated himself with other earnest and progressive citizens in forwarding movements for the betterment of business conditions. With his family, he attends the Episconal church.

On June 9, 1908, Mr. Jordan was married at Waco to Miss Vera Higginson, daughter of Cyrus H. Higginson, a planter of Waco, and to this union there have been born two children, namely: Margaret, who was born August 20, 1909; and Harry Phillip, Jr., born May 18, 1912.

BERTRAD ADOUE. For more than forty years probably no name in all Texas was more thoroughly significant of business ability and finest commercial integrity than that of Adoue. In the early years of railroad extension after the war the late Bertrad Adoue's mercantile enterprise followed the line of the Houston & Texas Central northward. He then concentrated his efforts at Galveston, where in the financial and wholesale district there was no more familiar figure. The world admires the successful business builder, but admiration becomes honor and esteem when the proceeds of commerce are diverted judiciously to the welfare of the community. Probably no citizen of Galveston was more quietly efficient in his business undertakings, and his broad philanthropy was characterized by the same spirit. Few distinctive mon-uments proclaim his beneficence, but those who have some familiarity with practical charities and the larger institutions which are conspicuous in that city are well aware of the sturdy helpfulness afforded by Mr. Adoue during his lifetime and his valuable bequests at his death. He was one of Galveston's finest business leaders and most loyal friend.

Bertrad Adoue was born near Aurignac, France, September 9, 1841, and died when past seventy, November 17, 1911. Educated in France, he came to the United States in 1859, first locating in New Orleans. In 1863 he went to Brownsville, Texas, where he was engaged in the general merchandise business. In 1866 was formed the partnership with Joseph Lobit, an association which has been one of the oldest and closest in the commercial history of the state. This partnership was continued until the death of Mr. Adoue, forty-five years later, the firm name being Adoue & Lobit. They were at first engaged in general merchandising at Bryan and at other places along the Houston & Central Texas Railroad while that road was being slowly extended northward from Houston. As the road progressed and new towns were established, they also moved their store, and thus afforded their mercantile facilities as pioneers in a number of now thriving cities in central and north Texas. In 1874, the railroad in the meantime having been completed to Dallas, the partners moved to Galveston, and in 1875 discontinued the general merchandise business, engaging exclusively in banking. As bankers, the firm of Adoue & Lobit is one of the oldest in the financial district of Galveston, and its connections extended to all the fiancial centers of the world. At the death of Mr. Adoue, in 1911, the other partner, Mr. Lobit, retired from active business.

The late Bertrad Adoue was not only very prominently identified with business in Galveston, but was also one of the public-spirited citizens. He was president of the Texas Brewers Association, was president of the Galveston Brewing Company, active vice president of the Lone Star Brewing Company of San Antonio, active vice president of the American Brewing Assn. of Houston, president of the Galveston Maritime Association for many years until his death, was president of the Galveston Dry Goods Company, a member of the firm of Mistrot Brothers & Company of Galveston, vice president of the Lasker Real Estate Association of Galveston, and first vice president of the Galveston Hotel Company. His activities in connection with enterprises, either of public or semi-public nature, were equally notable. He was for a number of years a member of the Galveston was 10 a number of years a member of the Garasson Deep Water Committee. He was president of the Oster-man Widows & Orphans Fund, and for many years served as vice consul for Sweden. At his death he left many bequests, among which may be mentioned the following: 'A fund to enable ward patients at St. Mary's lowing: A fund to chance ward parents are a full fifthmary to have private rooms where necessary for their comfort and benefit; a fund to Trinity church of Galveston to be used by the rector in a nonsectarian manner as he sees fit. Mr. Adoue owned considera property in his native country of France, and this, comprising farms and improvements valued at about twenty thousand dollars, was left to his native town to be used for charitable purposes. His most notable bequest was for the erection and maintenance in Galveston of a seamen's bethel. This practical charity has been established and was presented by his family to the board of trustees of the Seaman's Friend Society on June 9, 1913. The fund for the maintenance of this institution, at the latest report, amounted to fourteen thousand dollars. The dedication and presentation of the bethel made one of the interesting events in the history of Galveston publie institutions, and, as the scope and value of the philanthropy may not be thoroughly appreciated by a great many people living in Texas, the following paragraphs are quoted from the principal address of the evening, delivered by an emineut New York social worker and official in the American Seaman's Friend Society. This speaker described the purposes of the local Bethel as follows:

"Three things this house stands for-a house of refuge, a house of happiness, and a house of worship. As a house of refuge, it will shelter between thirty-five thousand and forty thousand of the birds of passage we call sailors who annually visit this port, natives of all nations, brought to your doors from all the seven seas. You've built a splendid place for a house of refuge.

"As a house of happiness, it embodies the things desired by the sailor folk-those people who are made with a 'wanting heart'-wanting those things which are common to you, but far too uncommon to them. I'm glad you built the interior and made it bright and cheerful. The sailor doesn't want your dim, religious light when he gets ashore. He gets all the dim, religious lights he wants in his dim and none too religious fo'e'sle. Put yourselves in the sailor's place. You'll understand his joy in this house that is going to bring joy to the hearts of thousands of sailors. What a sailor wants when he comes ashore isn't a prayer meeting. 'Way out yonder on the sea, when the sun has been blazing hotly, he has promised himself a long, cool drink the minute he gets ashore. He's human. When he lands, and steps off the dock, there the saloon confronts him, It's bright, His fo'c's'le hasn't been bright. There's a piano—out of tune. What does that matter when he hasn't for weeks seen a piano? There are the foaming steins of ale; there are the mahogany sandwiches, over which the flies disport themselves. But the ale looks good to him, even if it isn't good for him; and who cares for a few flies when he has been shaking the weevils out of his food? That's why I'm glad this bethel is bright and cheerful.

"And, lastly, this place is to be a house of worship. Kipling say that 'single men who live in barracks don't grow into plaster saints.' They don't. Neither do single men who live in forecastles. But 'way down, underneath the rugged exterior, 'way beyond speech, in the sailor's heart, is an appreciation of religion. And here he shall be taught the alphabet of religion. Every sailor is a man under authority. At sea or elsewhere you can't do anything with a man who won't obey. And if a man has been trained to obey his God, he'll obey his ship-

master.'

In considering the career of the late Mr. Adoue it should not be forgotten that his success was almost entirely the result of his individual efforts, beginning at a time when he was a boy. With an energy and ability much above the ordinary, he won a large success, and always honorably and in such a way that he continued to enjoy the esteem of his community to the closing years of his life. His charitable work was conspicuous for his breadth and nonsectarian character. To the Catholic hospitals, to the Episcopal church, to the Sca-men, and to his native town, while his personal unrecorded philanthropies were probably never influenced by any consideration of race or creed.

The late Bertrad Adoue married Miss Albertine Schneider of New Orleans. Mrs. Adoue, who survives her husband, is the mother of four children, as follows: Bertrad C., deceased; Pauline Eliza, who married G. F. McFarland of Toronto, Canada; Louis A., and Mimie Elaine of Galveston. The family home is at 1526 Post Office Street.

Louis A. Adoue, the only surviving son, since his father's death has taken over many of the large business affairs associated with the name. He is a member of the firm of Mistrot Brothers & Company, now known as Mis-trot & Adoue, wholesale dry goods. He is vice president of the Galveston Brewing Company, vice president of the Lasker Real Estate Association, vice president of the American Indemnity Company of Galveston, is a member of the Galveston Deepwater Committee, a trustee of the Rosenberg Library, and is vice consul for Sweden.

HON. ROBERT G. STREET. Probably no member of the Texas bar still in active practice is more widely known over the state and throughout the south than Judge Street, for more than ten years judge of the fifty-sixth district court, and a member of the Galveston bar since 1866. During his career on the bench his district has had the satisfaction of knowing the judicial functions were being discharged with a degree of human and technical understanding that rarely comes to the public service. Judge Street is an able lawyer, a citizen whose career has in many places touched the public, and always beneficially, and, besides his other services, has contributed at least two important works to the literature of law.

Robert Gould Street was born in Greensboro, Alabama, December 12, 1843, a son of John Vernon and Elizabeth (Torrence) Street, A Virginian by birth, his father was a prominent physician, and engaged in practice in Alabama until his death, in 1854. The mother was a native of North Carolina, and died at Galveston in 1910, at the age of ninety-four years,

From the private schools of Alabama, Judge Street entered the University of Alabama, and was in his junior year when the war between the states came on. Enlisting as a Confederate soldier, he first served in Company I of the Twentieth Alabama Infautry, and later in Company H of the Fifty-First Alabama Cavalry. His highest rank was that of Sergeant Major. He went through the war from beginning to end; was out of active service nearly two years on account of imprisonment. On June 27, 1863, at Shelbyville, Tennessee, he was captured, and was confined at Fort Delaware until March, 1865. When the war was over, he went home and found work as a school teacher. Taking up the study of law, he was peculiarly fortunate in choosing his preceptor. His guide in his law studies was his colonel during the war, John T. Morgan, whose name in later years was one of the most familiar in national affairs, through his splendid work as United States senator from Alabama. Under Gen. Morgan he continued his studies, and, on examination before the Supreme court of Alabama, was admitted to the bar in 1866.

In the following year Judge Street located at Galveston, and has now been a member of the local bar for forty-five years. His first important public service was as a member of the Texas State Senate, to which he was elected in 1880, and served one term. In 1902 Mr. Street was elected district judge of the Fifty-Sixth Dis-In 1902 Mr. trict. His first term ran to 1908, when he was reelected, and in 1912 he was again elected. For many years Judge Street has been considered an authority on several branches of legal learning, and his writings have also been frequent on general economic subjects. He has been a regular contributor to the law magazines and has delivered many addresses on political, legal, and social topics. With his name on the title page as author and compiler, was published in 1909 "The Law and Personal Injuries in Texas," a work familiar to every Texas attorney and a specially noteworthy publication, in that it was the first treatise on the subject from the standpoint of one state. Mr. Street is also editor of the sixth edition of "Shearman & Redfield on Negligence." These and other contributions to the science of law and sociology have made Judge Street's name familiar to thousands of lawyers and students outside of his home

Judge Street has been a member of the Texas State Bar Association since its organization. His membership in the American Bar Association dates back to 1881. He is an honorary member of the Galveston County Bar Association, and is an active member of the American Economic Association, the American Political Science Association, and the American Social Science Association. Fraternally, he is associated with the Temple of Honor, and in politics is an active Democrat.

In 1868 Judge Street married Miss Maria Ethelvide Lauve, daughter of Omer Lauve of New Orleans. Mrs. Street died in 1880, and their five children have also passed away. Judge Street resides at 1704 Avenue K, in Galveston.

JAMES B. STUBBS. For more than forty years a member of the Galveston bar, Mr. Stubbs easily stands in the very front rank of his profession in his home city, and in commercial, corporation, and admiratly law stands second to none in the state in ability and successful experience. Very few of the present Galveston bar were practicing here when Mr. Stubbs opened his office and success has kept pace with the advancing years in practice.

James B. Stubbs, who has lived in Galveston since he was three years of age, was born at Montgomery, Alabama, August 28, 1856, a son of Theodore B. and Elben A. (Kirkpatrick) Stubbs Moving 16 Galveston in 1853, Theodore B. Stubbs began a long career as a successful merchant. As a business man and citizen, he stood high in the community, and also left an honored record as a soldier. He served as colonel of the First Texas Volunteers during the war, and was a volunteer on one of the steamers which took part in the capture of Galveston from the Federal forces on January 1, 1863. His death occurred March 26, 1896. The mother of James B. Stubbs died in Alabama in 1852.

The literary education of Mr. Stubbs was completed at Pass Christian College, in Mississippi, where he was graduated with the degree of A. M., and from that institution he entired the Washington and Lee University of Lexington, Virginia, where he was graduated in the law with the degree of LL. B. In 1872 Mr. Stubbs was admitted to the har at Galveston, and in the same year took up active practice. In later years his work as a lawyer has been almost entirely confined to conuercial, corporation, and admirally practice, and in these lines he is one of the best attorneys in the entire south. Mr. Stubbs is senior member of the firm of James B. and Charles J. Stubbs, counselors at-law, with offices at 212 22nd Street, Along with a large practice as a lawyer, Mr. Stubbs has for many years been prominent in political and civil affairs. In 1881 he was chosen to the state senate. Since 1904 he has been chairman of the Democratic county executive committee, and since 1908 has been a member of the Democratic state executive committee. From 1882 to 1885 he was city attorney, and held the same office from 1899 to 1901. In his profession he has been equally honored, and in 1902 was president of the Texas Bar Association. During 1910-11 he was president of the Galveston Bar Association.

In Masonic circles he has had an active part for more than forty years. He received his degrees as a Master Mason in Harmony Lodge, No. 6, A. F. & A. M., at Galveston, on September 9, 1872, and is a past master of that lodge. He also has membership in the Grand Lodge of Texas. In the York Rite he is a member of San Felipe de Austin Chapter, No. 1, R. A. M. In the Scottish Rite holies, including the Texas Consistory, No. 1, at Galveston, and Elongs to all the Scottish Rite bodies, including the Texas Consistory, No. 1, at Galveston, and El Minah Temple of the Mystic Shrine. Mr. Stubbs also affiliates with Oleander Lodge, No. 5, Knights of Pythias

In 1876 occurred his first marriage, and in 1901 he married his present wife. His two children are: James B. Jr. and Janie A., widow of James B. Maupin of Washington, D. C. The Stubbs home is at 1724 Twentyfirst Street.

ALBERT L. ANDERSON, M. D. Among the medical men of Brown county, Texas, one who has won descreed distinction as a practitioner in diseases of the eye, ear, nose, and throat is Dr. Albert L. Anderson of Brown cood. Although he has been located here only since 1906, the recognition of his high attainments has attracted to him a large and representative practice, among his professional brethren he has gained an enviable reputation for his strict observance of the ethics of his calling. He is a Texan by nativity and training, having been born at Marshall, Harrison county, February 19, 1867, and is a son of William V. and Asha E. Anderson.

The Anderson family is of Scotch descent and was founded in Texas many years ago, the father of Doctor Anderson having been born in this state. He was reared to agricultural pursuits, and the family owned numerous slaves prior to the war between the North and the South. In that struggle William V. Anderson enlisted as a Confederate soldier and served throughout the war, making a record as a gallant and faithful soldier. Although he was wounded at Franklin, Cumberland Gap, and in a minor engagement, he never asked for nor received a furlough. Upon his return from the war, he again took up farming and stock raising, settling in Hopkins county, and still resides in the vicinity of Sulphur Springs and carries on operations, being remarkably active for his seventy-five years. His wife, also a native of Texas, d about the year 1886, having been the mother of eight children, of whom Doctor Anderson was the first-born.

Albert L. Anderson received his early education in the public schools of Texas, and subsequently went to Central College, at Sulphur Springs. Following this, he was engaged in teaching school in Hopkins county until 1892, when he entered the University of Texas, at Galveston, and was graduated in 1896 with his medical degree. His first field of practice was the city of Eddy, McLennan county, but after ten years there came to Brownwood and established himself in a general practice, which he successfully carried on until 1911. In that year he gave up his general practice to devote himself exclusively to the treatment of diseases of the eye, ear, nose, and throat, and as a specialist along this line has gained wide distinction. With the acquirement of his degree, Doctor Anderson did not give up his studies, but has continued to be a most assiduous student and each year has taken a post-graduate course for the past four years in the Chicago Polyclinic. He holds membership in the various large medical organizations and in every possible way keeps himself fully abreast of the auvancements made in his calling, a large portion of his leisure time being given to personal research.

On January 27, 1897, Doctor Anderson was married Galveston, Texas, to Miss Tillie Emmett of that city, at Galveston, Texas, to Miss Tillie Emmett of that city, daughter of W. P. and Josephine Emmett. The father received an appointment under the United States Government at Panama, but his death occurred during the month of September, 1913. The mother died in 1910. One child has been born to Doctor and Mrs. Anderson: Kathryn Ellen, born January 20, 1900, and now attending the public schools of Brownwood. Mrs. Anderson is of Irish descent. Doctor and Mrs. Anderson are members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. In politics, he is a stanch Democrat, but his connection with political matters has been limited to working for his party's interests, as he has never sought personal preferment. He is a Knight Templar of the Masonic order and a member of the local lodge of Elks. He is an enthusiast in regard to the healthful climate, progressive citizenship, and unrivaled opportunities of his adopted locality. and has done much to attract ambitious men to this section, and thus and in other ways has assisted in its advancement and development.

Join Wesley Dobrins. In the death of John Wesley Dobkins which occurred at his home in Gainesville on January 17, 1908, North Texas lost one of its oldest settlers, and one who had been especially identified with the earlier growth and development of Gainesxille and Cooke county, where the family was first established more than sixty years ago. The father of the late John W. Dobkins belped survey the first town site at Gainesville, and Mr. Dobkins himself, during the early days, before the construction of the nilroads, struction of the first store at St. Jo. Texas, and brough any loads of goods from Fort Smith, Arkansas, and Shrevport, Louisiana, overland by wagon to Gainesville in the early days. Mr. Dobkins was one of the largest land holders and most successful farmers of Cooke county, and was a man of exceptional ability and influence throughout his lifetime. John Wesley Dobkins was born in Tennessee, in 1839, a son of Jacob and Rachael (Speaks) Dobkins, both parents natives of Tennessee. Their five children; all now deceased, were: Ann, James, John Wesley, Lazarus, and Minerva. The father was a farmer by occupation and when his son John W. was twelve years old, immigrated from Tennessee to Texas, locating two and a half miles north of the present city of Gainesville. He took up government land, on what was then entirely the domain of the Indians and the buffalo. Fort Worth had been established barely four years, and the Dolkins home was one of the very few in the expansive country between the Trinity and the Red Rivers, Gainesville had not yet been platted as a town, and the only residents were the few farmers and ranchers who had ventured out into a country still infested by the Indians. The Indians were very troublesome in the early days, but the Dobkins family was one of those that remained in spite of all difficulties and hardships, and it was in such pioneer conditions and surroundings that John Wesley Dobkins grew to manhood. He was well trained for his part in life, and was far beyond the average successful in all his enterprises. He was a stockholder in the First National Bank of Gainesville, having assisted in the organization and establishment of that institution. He was still one of the large holders of in the institution at the time of his death, and his widow maintains that interest to the present time. The late Mr. Dobkins was especially well known as a stock raiser, and was the owner of some three thousand acres of farm land in North Texas. Mrs. Dobkins owns half of this land, and the rest has been divided among the children. The late Mr. Dobkins was a Democrat in polities, was active during his early life in the Methodist church, and was especially devoted to his home and family, for whom he provided very liberally. The family residence, where Mrs. Dobkins now lives, is at 311 North Taylor Street.

J. W. Delkins

Mr. Dobkins was married in 1865 to Miss Susna Berton, a native of Tennessee, and a daughter of William and Ursula (Wilson) Benton. The children of the Benton family were: James, deceased; Sarah Jane, wildow of John Parsons, of Rhine, Oklahoma; Mrs. Dobkins; and William, a stock dealer in Belcher, Texas. The six children born to Mr. and Mrs. Dobkins were: One that died in infaney. Rachel, is the wife of J. B. Hinton, a farmer of Cooke county, and their three children are Weldon, William and Beattie. Jonathan, is a successful farmer in Cooke county, and has one child named Horace. Ida, now deceased was the wife of Arthur McCann, of Deedsville, and she left a family of eight children. Dovie is the wife of J. B. Burch, one of the largest farmers and stockmen and dealers in cattle in Cooke county, where he has nine hundred acres of land, two hundred of it in cultivation. Mr. and Mrs. Barch are the parents of two children, Lacy

MARCELLUS S. CARPENTER. As a citizen of wide information, unbounded popularity, and unquestioned good standing in Lamar county, as well as a business man of the most successful type, Marcellus S. Carpenter enjoys a foremost place in the ranks of the prominent men in this section of the state. Fifteen years of connection with public life in the county served to fully acquaint the citizenship of his district with the many excellent qualities that mark him, and no public official has ever retired from service in Lamar county after years of official position leaving a more worthy record or with a more secure place in the hearts of his fellow men. In the office of county sheriff and in others of a subordinate mature he proved his worth as man and official, and the approval of the public voice is the just reward of his faithful work.

Born in Smith county, Tennessee, on March 18, 1868, Marcellus S. Carpenter is the son of Edward C. Carpenter of Dixon Springs, Tennessee, whose life has been passed as a successful farmer and stockman. The father was born in Kentucky, in which state the Carpenter family is widely and favorably known. Concerning the earlier American ancestry of the Carpenters, it may be said at this point that the family had its Kentucky origin in the settlement of four brothers Carpenter, namely-John Adam, Bernard, and George. These brothers came from Virginia in 1779 and settled in Lincoln county, Kentucky. There they built a blockhouse, and the place was called Carpenter's Station. Soon after they located there they were joined by the Depeers and Barnnetts, and for the next twenty years concerted efforts on the part of the Indians to break up the little settlement proved unavailing. They were located three miles west of the town of Huntwell, in Lincoln county, and there carried on farming activities. In the winter of 1779-80 one of the brothers made a trip through the wilderness, despite the terrors of the region at that time, the journey being made for the securing of provisions at Booneville. When he returned, he brought also with him a bushel of corn, and from that the first corn produced in their section was raised. A daughter of George Carpenter, Margaret by name, figured prominently in an Indian attack. She was sitting in the lap of a negress servant in the vard when they were fired upon by Indians, the negress being killed immediately. The child ran to the house, seized a gun, and fired upon the red men. The shots aroused the men folk, and they gave chase to the Indians. Margaret Carpenter subsequently married Lindsay Powell, and the Kentucky Powells of the present day are the direct descendants of that heroic young woman. One of her daughters married George Carpenter, the grandfather of Marcellus S. Carpenter of this review. The father of George Carpenter was John, whose other sons were Owen, Jacob, and Mack. George Carpenter's son, Edward, was born in Kentucky in 1837 and is now a resident of Smith county, Tennessee, the town of Dixon Springs being his home place. The father, George, spent his remaining days in Wise county, Texas. He married Sallie Powell in his early manhood, and soon after the Civil war removed to the place named above, where he employed himself in the business of a farmer and stockman. His children were Lindsay, George F., Edward C., William H., Lou, who became the wife of James Gill: Lizzie, who married Willis Montgomery, and James.

Edward C. Carpenter was born in Kentucky, and there acquired a liberal education. After his marriage, this materiage of Miss Bettie Feagan, he settled down to the business of farming, and in that industry he enjoyed a generous measure of success. His wife died in 1875, with the following issue: John M. of Paris, Texas; Marcellus 8, of this review, and Mamie, who became the wife of J. C. Haley of Wellington, Texas

Marcellus S. Carpenter was one of the two of his father's children who chose the hardships of the unknown world in preference to those of what should have been a happy home, but which failed to contain that element. He was early inured to hard work on the home farm and gave much of his youthful strength to that business before he left home. He went to Texas, where he secured work on a farm at a remuneration of $12.50 a month. Always ambitions, and with a hunger for the education that had been denied him as a boy, he saved sufficient from his earnings to make possible a course of study under Professor Butler and Professor Walpole at Blossom, Texas, and it may well be said that this added training, incomplete as it was, yet gave to him strength and fitness for the duties of citizenship and the responsibilities of public office that came to him in later life.

The second year that Marcellus S. Carpenter passed in Texas was on a ranch in Jones county, where he received for his services $25.00 a month, and when he had retired from his ranch duties he came to Paris and took a position in the office of Sheriff Hammond of Lamar county. His duties were somewhat in the nature of those of an office boy at first, but, whatever they might have been, he served a thorough apprenticeship in the duties of the higher office, and for years he continued in the position, filling every niche in the department, from the most insignificant duties to those of chief and managing deputy of the office. While he was serving his em-ployer in the whole-souled manner that has ever characterized his performance of duty, Mr. Carpenter was in-advertently drawing to himself a host of friends throughout the county and unconsciously creating a strong sentiment in his own favor. Thus it was that when Sheriff Martin announced his candidacy for a third term in the office, contrary to his expressed intention some time previous, Mr. Carpenter was prevailed upon to enter the race for the office of sheriff. In the primary election following he received more votes than both his competitors, and in the November election he was elected to the office by a flattering majority, and succeeded to the duties of the office in 1902. He was twice re-elected, and retired after a period of fifteen years of active public service, honored of all and secure in the confidence and regard of every honest man in the county. The administration of "Sel" Carpenter, as he is familiarly known, as sheriff of Lamar county was notable for the rugged persistence with which it followed criminals and lessened crime. Paris in his official regime was prominent as a federal court town and was scourged with the open saloon, with gambling, and with other attendant forms of vice. It might almost be said to have been as wide-opened, as "wild and wooley" as an earlyday frontier town, and it offered an ideal opportunity for a sheriff to make a record for efficiency and capability. To preserve order and maintain a standard of decency came entirely within the purview of the sheriff's oath of office, and Mr. Carpenter proved himself to be the man who possessed the firmness and the conscientious determination to make the law supreme in his bailiwick. He entered upon his campaign of reform with the avowed purpose of putting offenders behind the bars or else causing them to seek other quarters. He forced the liquor men to a strict observance of the regulations governing their business, and, in ordinary parlance, put a "crimp" in the activities of the criminal habitues of these places. Sheriff Carpenter faced almost as formidable a problem throughout the county as he did in the city of Paris, for the county at that time was the acknowledged rendezvous for horse thieves and other un-desirables of the "hide and seek" variety from the Indian territory, near by. He was able to break up this illicit and shameful traffic in stock, and put stripes on many who were found to be implicated in the work, as well as on those who actually carried it on. Men who in the stress of passion or in more calculating moods took human life found in him a relentless pursuer, and few offenders there were who failed to be summoned to the bar of justice during the regime of Marcellus Carpenter. Counterfeiters no longer pursued their netarious business with any degree of safety of success, and many of the most noted gangs in the history of the state saw their undoing as the result of his well-directed activities. These constituted some of the chief features of one of the busiest and most successful administrations of the office of sheriff in Lamar county and gained for Mar-cellus Carpenter a leading place among the strongest peace officers of the state.

In 1908 Mr, Carpenter retired from the office of sheriff, and for a time thereafter was engaged in various activities. He invested in Paris real estate at a most timely season for his own well-being and pecuniary advantage, and in 1910 the situation was so favorable to his plass that he decided upon a venture he had been turning over in his mind for some little time, and engaged in the furniture business in Paris. Prosperity has thus far attended his efforts, and he occupies the place of a successful business man in Paris today. Candor and fairness are qualities that shine resplendent in his every action, and no man in the county has a more stable or enviable reputation for honor and integrity than has he. His career has been one of the most worthy order, and the success that has attended his efforts is well worthy of the name, and Lamar county will long remember him as an official who did much for her honor and distinction during the fifteen years of his service.

Mr. Carpenter has been twice married. On February 21, 1592, he married Miss Josie R. Thomas of Paris. She died on October 28, 1898, leaving two children—Bessie A. and Marcellus. His second marriage occurred on August 25, 1904, when Lola Phillips, the daughter of L. B. Phillips, became his wife. The children of the latter union are John Mead and Clara Aldem Carpenter.

ROLLIN W. RODGERS. For nearly a quarter of a century Mr. Rodgers has been engaged in the practice of law at Texarkana, Bowie County, and he has won distinction and success in his chosen profession. His close attention to business and integrity of purpose has caused him to be recognized as one of the representative members of the bar of Northeastern Texas. His loyalty to the fine, old Lone Star State is vitalized by his being one of its native sons and a scion of one of its old and honored families.

Mr. Rodgers is one of the progressive and publicspirited citizens of Texarkana, which has been his hisosime his boyhood days and which he has seen advancefrom a mere frontier hamlet to one of the most attractive and prosperous cities of this section of the state.

Mr. Rodgers was born at Jefferson, the judicial center of Marion County, Texas, on the 30th of September, 1867, and is a son of Colonel Robert W. and Frances (Montgomery) Rodgers, the former of whom was born in the state of Tennessee and the latter in Missouri. Colonel Rodgers accompanied his parents on their removal from Tennessee to Southwestern Missouri, and in that state his parents passed the residue of their lives, his father devoting the major part of his active career to agricultural pursuits. At the inception of the war between the states, Colonel Rodgers subordinated all personal interests to tender his aid in defense of the cause of the Confederacy. He was appointed by Governor Claiborne F. Jackson as Division Inspector of the Seventh Military District of Missouri on June 12, 1861. He was in the engagements at Oak Hills, or Wilson's Creek, Mo.; Pea Ridge, Ark., etc., and then went to Memphis, Tenn. Under orders of General Price, Col. Rodgers went to Jordan's Saline, now known as Grand Saline, in Van Zandt County, Texas, to establish and operate the salt works, the products of which were used by the Confederate armies. He handled this enterprise with vigor and efficiency and continued in active supervision of the works until the close of the war. On the lands then worked by him has since been developed one of the extensive and important industrial enterprises of Texas.

After the close of the war, Colonel Rodgers, who had previously been engaged in the lumber business in Missouri, decided to establish his permanent residence in Texas, with whose resources, advantages, and attractions he had become much impressed. He accordingly located at Jefferson, Marion County, where he erected and equipped a sawmill, to which he continued to devote his attention until 1874. His success was on a parity with his entry and the success was on a parity with his entry and the success was on a parity with his entry and the success was on a parity with his entry and the success was on a parity with his entry and the success was on a parity with his entry and the success was on a parity with his entry and the success was on a parity with his entry and the success was on a parity with his entry and the success of the succe tributed in generous measure to the social and material upbuilding of the town. His was the first frame house built in Texarkana, and the building is still standing, at the corner of Third Street and Maple Street.

Colonel Rodgers gave freely of time, effort, and means to fostering the development and progress of Texarkana, and his death, in 1884, was uniformly regarded as a great loss to the thriving little city, as well as being a source of deep regret and sorrow in the community, to whose every interest he had been signally loyal. His widow still survives, and resides in Texarkana. Of this family, there are now living two daughters (Mrs. W. J. Moroney, at Dallas, Texas, and Miss Frances G. Rodgers, at Texarkana) and four sons. Besides the subject of this sketch, they are Thos. F. Rodgers of Collinsville. Texas, engaged in the banking business; Joseph D. Rodgers, Manager of Moroney Hardware Company, Dallas, Texas, and Leo Rodgers of the Rodgers-Thomas Sales Company, Dallas, Texas, and Leo Rodgers of the Rodgers-Thomas Sales Company, Dallas, Texas, Manger of Ress, Manager of Agents for electrical machinery, etc. Rollin W. Rodgers was a lad of about seven years at the time of the family removal from Marion County to Texarkana, and to the schools of the new village he is indebted for his early education, which was supplemented by an effective course in College at Bowling Green, Kentucky. In preparation for the work of his chosen profession he began reading law under the able preceptorship of the well-known firm of Todd & Hudgins of Texarkana, and later he continued his studies in the law department of the historic old University of Virginia, at Charlottesville. Upon passing a most creditable examination, Mr. Rodgers was admitted to the bar of his native state at Texarkana in the year 1889, and here he began the active practice of his profession. He was first associated with the firm of Todd, Hudgins & Rodgers (afterwards Todd & Rodgers) until 1897. He has appeared in much important litigation in the courts of this section of the state and has handled some of the hardest fought cases, involving the construction of the Interstate Commerce Act, in the U. S. Courts of this District.

He is now senior member of the well-known and representative law firm of Rodgers & Dorough. Mr. Rodgers was for six years the efficient and valued incumbent of the office of City Attorney of Texarkana, and while he has been a zealous and effective worker in behalf of the cause of the Democratic party, he has not sought public office of political order.

In the year 1892 was solemnized the marriage of Mr. Rodgers to Miss Mattie Lee Hudgins of Marshall, Texas, her birthplace. Mrs. Rodgers is a daughter of the late Captain William P. Hudgins and Harriet (Kirk) Hudgins. Captain Hudgins was a son of Colonel Thos. Hudgins of Mathews County, Virginia. At the beginning of the Civil war he was conducting an Academy in Northumberland County, Virginia, from whence he enlisted in the Army of Virginia. He was wounded at Malvern Hill, Virginia, and while convalescing in Richmond became acquainted with Hon. Jno, H. Reagan, Postmaster General of the Confederate States of America, who had Captain Hudgins appointed to a position in the Postoffice Department and directed him to establish at Marshall, in Harrison County, Texas, the Post-office Department's headquarters for the Trans-Mississippi division of the Confederate Government. After the war, Captain Hudgins opened an Academy at Marshall, and for many years was one of the leading edu-eators of this part of the state. He was Special Agent of the U. S. Treasury Department under both of the administrations of President Cleveland, with headquarters at Galveston and San Antonio, Texas.

Mr. and Mrs. Rodgers have one son, Rellin W. Jr., who is a member of the class of 1915 in the University of Texas, at Austin, and who is a popular factor in the social activities of his home city. Mrs. Rodgers is a gracious chatelaine of the attractive family home, and the same is a center of generous and unostentatious hospitality.

John Raleigu Brigos, M. D. For more than twenty years a practicing physician and surgeon of Dallas, and the founder and proprietor of the Briggs Sanitarium at the corner of Jefferson and Tyler Streets, in Oak Cliff, the life of Dr. Briggs was a benefit and an inspiration to the people of his community, and in his untimely passing out, on December 28, 1907, Dallas and north Texas lost a man who could hardly be spared from the ranks of her valuable and admirable citizens. His life and work among the people of the community, in which he had been a familiar figure for so long, was of an order eminently calculated to win to him the respect and love of all, and in those qualities his life was richly endowed.

John Raleigh Briggs was born in Meigs county, Tennessee, March 3, 1851, and was fifty-six years of age at the time of his death. His early education was received in private schools in his native state, and at an early age he entered the Nashville Medical College, where he was graduated M. D. at the age of twenty-two. In 1874, a year after his graduation, he located at Savoy, in Fannin county, Texas. He soon took rank as a man of exceptional ability, and built up a large general practice in Fannin county. His energy and ambition did not allow him to remain in the ranks of the average doctor. however worthy their service, and there were frequent interruptions to his regular work in order to better perfect himself for higher accomplishments. In 1880 he took a post-graduate course in the Missouri Medical College, at St. Louis, specializing in diseases of the eye, ear, throat, and nose. In 1882 he located at Gainesville, and the following year moved to Fort Worth, and from there to Dallas in 1886. With the exception of time spent in various medical institutions and hospitals, both in this country and Europe, he continued in the practice of medicine at Dallas until his death.

Dr. Briggs studied abroad at various well-known mediical centers, including Edinburgh, Berlin, Paris, and elsewhere, most of his studies abroad being directed to the treatment of tuberculosis. He was an ardent advocate of the tuberculine treatment. It was as a result of this preparation and post-graduate studies that Dr. Briggs established at Oak Cliff his sanitarium in 1896. This institution, through his ability and effective management, was listed high above the ranks of private sanitariums, and during the eleven years of his management thousands of cases came under his supervision. About sixty per cent of the curable cases resulted in recovery. The location of the sanitarium was on the highest point of beautiful Oak Cliff. The building formed three sides of a court, around which ran an unbroken veranda eight hundred feet in length. This inclosure made a safe promenade for patients in all kinds of weather. The grounds were beautified with forest trees, shrubbery, and flowers and was a veritable bower of two acres in extent. A fine orchard supplied a variety of fruit in season. The architecture was perfectly adapted to the most modern ideas of sanitation, with perfect and free ventilation both day and night. From its beginning the institution was increased from a dozen rooms to sixty, and but for the early death of its founder the sanitarium's usefulness to the community would have been indefinitely prolonged. While the material facilities of the sanitarium were regarded as almost perfect, it was the magnetic personality of Dr. Briggs which acted as a continual inspiration to his patients and was the prime factor in his success. In 1909, two years after death of Dr. Briggs, the sanitarium was completely destroyed in thegreat fire that swept the Oak Cliff district of Dallas, destroying, in all, 65 residences.

Dr. Briggs served as vice president of the National Tuberculosis Association, and was for many years prominent in the membership of that association. During his early residence in Dallas, and previous to his Europeantrip and the founding of the sanitarium, Dr. Briggs served several terms as a member of the Dallas City Connell. For two terms he was president of the connell and on numerous occasions acted as mayor pro tem. However, he gave up politics, saying in his humorous way that he "Coulant" him medicine and politics." Dr. Briggs established the Texas Medical and Health Journal, and for a number of years was its editor. In 1886 and again in 1888 he was awarded the prize of one hundred dollars in gold offered by the State Medical Society for the best essay submitted to the committee empowered by that body as judges.

In 1877 Dr. Briggs was married to Miss Annie Carson Cooke of Cleveland, Tennessee. Of the five children born of their union, one died in infancy and John Roy in early manhood. Those still living are: Raymond, Stella, and Willie Cooke, the only son. Miss Raymond Briggs is now the wife of Dr. H. H. Oglivie of San Annon, and Miss Stella Briggs is now wife of W. A.

Boatman of Dallas.

Dr. Briggs, during his long practice, did an nunsually large amount of charity work. It is said that he never turned away a patient on account of inability to pay. Notwithstanding his liberality in this way, he was steadily prosperous and made a modest fortune from his practice. For a long number of years he was a faithful member of the Baptist church, was a devout Christian, and in his community as well as in his family exemplified the finest traits of manhood and Christian character. Fraternally, he was affiliated with the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and the Knights of Pythias.

Louis J. Christer, City Superintendent of Schools, Laredo, Texas, is one of the active, public-spirited citizens of the place, interested generally in its varied affairs. He is thoroughly qualified both by nature and training for the responsible position he holds as edueator in this up-to-date, progressive city.

Mr. Christen is a native of New Orleans. He graduated from the high school of that city, and then went to Europe, where he spent six years in study, two years in Germany, in the University of Bonn, and four years in France, a student in the Besaucon, near Paris.

Laredo, Texas, has been Mr. Christen's home since 1882. He was Mayor of the town for ten years previous to becoming Superintendent of the City Schools, which latter position he has held since 1904. Under made great progress. This is especially notable in the mew high school building, which was built in 1910, at an approximate cost of $35,000, one of the handsomest and best equipped in the State. It is constructed of brick and stone and is thoroughly fireproof; has two stories and basement and contains eighter, and accomtation rooms.

Segregate of one thousand pupils. The citizens of Laredo have just cause to feel proud of their handsome school building and the wholesome condition of their schools.

Mr. (bristen liss for some years been interested in agriculture, special lines of which he has made scientific study. He owns and supervises a fine onion farm near Laredo.

Fraternally he is identified with the B. P. O. E., of is that of the Catholic Church. Mr. Christen's wife was formerly Miss Stella M. Burbank. She is a native of Southwest Texas and they were married at Lareb

George Walton Langer Sutth. There are probably few individuals in Texos who during their careers have been intimately associated with more of the great figures in our national political history of the past several decades than has George Walton Lanier Smith, postmaster at Henderson and a citizen of Texas since 1874. Although be himself has not been a secker after preferment in the political arena, save as an influence, he is nevertheless widely known in the ranks of the Republican party in Texas and his sid is eagerly sought by those whose ambitions have led them to desire the honors of office. Mr. Smith was born at Quitman, Mississippi, September 27, 1857, and passed through the youthful ordeal of securing an education before he left his native state. His father, the Hon. Charles A. Smith, was a distripuished citizen of that commonwealth for many years and, as a scholar and gentleman, measured up to the standard of elegance represented by the personalities of the Lees, the Gordons, the Davis's, and other great leaders of the chivalrous age of the South.

Judge Charles A. Smith was born in Maury county, Tennessee, in 1826, and was a son of Richard F. Smith, an affluent planter of the Old Dominion, who went into Maury county, Tennessee, from Virginia about the year 1800. The latter belonged to the royalty of the South, his intellectual attainments, his many negroes, and his great wealth combining to give him such a distinguished classification. He married Miss Lucy Lanier, his social and intellectual counterpart, and they passed their lives in the enjoyments of their independence, their friends, and their own family. Their children comprised four sons and two daughters. Charles A. Smith early displayed an inclination to explore the fields of learning, and his parents accordingly supplied him with a tutor and kept him in the classical centers of Europe, especially in Athens, until he became a renowned scholar. He knew Greek, Latin, and Hebrew as only the masters know these languages, and when he reached his majority it was with a thorough and finished education. He chose as his life work the law, and studied the subject under old Judge Nicholson of Tennessee, and was required to confine hinself to the Bible, Shakespeare, Webster, and Blackstone, and no man came to know them better than did he. Judge Smith first selected his home at Jackson, Mississippi, where he was admitted to the bar. He attained to such heights in his profession as to win the admiration of leaders of thought and action all over Southern Mississippi, where he practiced his profession, and when the clash between the two opposing sections of our country came he threw himself into the fray as one of the "fireeating" class of secessionists and acquired a leadership in formulating the plans for the confederation of the slave states. His advice and counsel were invaluable, and it was his province to serve the South rather in ministerial or ambassadorial capacities than in the military arm of the Confederacy. When the struggle ended he was found by the military government of the United States occupying the office of district judge and was deposed when he refused to take the ironelad oath and subsequently suffered imprisonment at Dry Tortngas because of his lack of allegiance. Upon being restored to his liberty, Judge Smith resumed his profession, and for a time was a partner of Admiral Raphael Semmes. of the Confederate navy, in the practice of law at Mo-bile. In 1874 he came to Texas and settled in Henderson, a physical wreck from overwork and exposure. He died in 1875, an unreconstructed man.

Judge Smith married Miss Lner Arrington, a daughter of Dr. A. S. Arrington, who moved to Mississioni about the year 1851, and died in 1886, when ninety-two years of age. Doctor Arrington was a native of North Carolina, and married there. Mrs. Smith died in 1886, at the age of fifty five years, laving been the mother of these children: Bettie, the widow of O. W. Dodson, who founded the Rusk County News, and is now a resident of Henderson, Texas; George Walton Lanier, of this review; and Lney, who is the wife of Lee McKnight and makes her home at Minden, Texas.

George Walton Lanier Smith has passed his life in the railroad service. He entered therein with the I. & G. N. Railway Company in 1874, as an agent, and was with the company that constructed the Overton & Henderson branch of the road, and during the twenty-nine years that he was connected with this transportation company served as dispatcher, conductor, agent and traffic man at Dallas. He left the service of the company and abandoned raditoned work in 1904 and returned to Henderson, with which town he had kept in touch during all these years. From 1904 until his entry of the Henderson office as postmaster in 1912, he was engaged at Dallas, Texas.

Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Smith was brought Notwinstanting the ract wards in the standard with Republicanism as viewed from the standpoint of the war, he chose his political home with the Republican party because of the American principle of protection, and cast his first presidential vote for General Garfield in 1880. At every national election since he has maintained his allegiance to that party, and dropped his ballot for each quadrennial nominee. It was his inclination to partake of the excitements of political campaigns that led him to accept place on state and national delegations for convention work, and few conventions in Texas during the last thirty years have deliberated in the interest of the party and the nation without his presence and his voice. He was a member of the state committee for fifteen years and was the nominee for Congress for the 3rd district in 1906 and opposed Judge Gordon Russell with the usual Republican results in Texas.

In national politics Mr. Smith soon came to know many of the leaders personally, for he began his attendance upon national conventions as early as 1880, when he heard the speech of Conklin, placing General Grant in nomination for the presidency for the third time and the classic effort of Garfield performing in a like honor for John Sherman-which effort caused Conklin to send him a note of congratulation as the "dark horse of this convention." He was a delegate to the convention of 1884 which nominated "that great warrior, that plumed knight from Maine," who fell a victim to "rum, romanism and rebellion," and Grover Cleveland went into the White House chair. He also attended the conventions of 1904, when he assisted to nominate Theodore Roosevelt, and 1908, when he did a like service for Mr. Taft. Although he has rubbed elbows with national personages, has advised with the leaders at Washington and has done big things politically, Mr. Smith is an unobtruding man and dislikes to put himself forward. Personally a well-preserved man, rosy and rugged with health and evidently standing for the good things of life, he is an interesting conversationalist and a man well informed upon a wide range of subjects.

Mr. Smith was married at Henderson, Texas, January 15, 1880, to Miss Mary Claiborne, daughter of James C. and Sarah (Akin) Claiborne, epople from Tennessee, Mr. Claiborne was a farmer and merchant, and six children comprised his family. Mr. Smith's children are stollows: Lanier Charles, a civil engineer at Alvin, Texas; James C., a conductor on the I. & G. N. Rail way, at Mart, Texas; Fen W., assistant postmaster at Henderson; and Sarah W., wife of E. Arnold McManus of Houston; Lenore and Ada.

William A. Hinnant, sheriff of Jim Wells county, a oscilion which he has held since the county came into existence May 9, 1911, is one of the most progressive and prominent citizens of Alice, Texas, one who has prospected in business, and has aramed success in public life production for the strength of the strength o

John Hinnant was born in North Carolina, and there spent his early years, in young manhood moving to Missisippi, where he met and married Nancy Hudson, who had been born and reared in that State. About 1844 or IN45 be came to what was then the Republic of Texas, locating in Gonzales county, and there took up the lite of a cattleman on the wide open range. He continued successfully in Gonzales county and settled on the range on the Nucces county, and settled on the range on the Nucces river, about twelve miles from the county seat of Corpus Christi. He continued his operations in raising and shipping cattle, became successful in his business, and when he died was known as one of his community's prominent and highly respected citizens.

William A. Hinnant secured instruction in the public schools of Gonzales and Nueves counties, and was reared to the life of the range. When still a lad he began assisting his father as a cowboy, making long trips over the trails with large herds of cattle, often as far as Kansas. He was an active participant in the stirring history of the cattle business in the days of the great open range, ending in the early '80s, and assisted in no small manner in the development and progress of his section of the country. He continued to have his home in Nucces county until the present county of Jim Wells was formed out of the western portion of Nueces, when the geographical change made him a resident of the new county. Jim Wells county was organized and began its existence on May 9, 1911, and on that date Mr. Hinnant became, by election, the first sheriff of the new county. Subsequently, in the regular election of November, 1912, he was elected to succeed himself for the regular term of two years. A man of courage, sagacity and high ideals as to the responsibilities of public serv ice, he has given the public splendid service, and his record is one to which he may point with pride. He has had at all times the support and co-operation of the law-abiding element, and his success in bringing male-factors to justice has made him justly feared by the eriminals of this section. In addition to the duties of sheriff, he combines those of tax collector, and his services in this office have also been above reproach.

Mr. Hinnant was married in Nueces county to Miss Fannie Beckham, and they have been the parents of one daughter and six sons, as follows: May, who is now the wife of Charles B. Du Bose; and Claud W., Raymond L., Thomas J., Bertie, Archie and King. The members of the Hinnant family are widely known and have many warm friends throughout this section.

VALUE NORRIS, M. D. Vice president of the R. H. JOSEPH J. MICKLE. A little more than a quarter century ago, Joseph J. Mickle was a clerk in Fort Smith, Arkansas, drawing a meagre salary and with only the prospects of time and destiny ahead of him. In Memphis, Texas, he is today known as one of the leading and most influential business men, and his interests comprise land, town real estate, stocks in hanks, investments in cattle and ranching, and other enterprises.

Joseph J. Mickle was born in Sebastian county, Arkansas, April 18, 1863. His father, Archibald Mickle was born in Arkansas and died in that state in 1865, when his son Joseph was three years old. His death occurred at Newtonia, Missouri, while on his way home from the Civil war. He had enlisted and served in the Second Regiment of Arkansas Cavalry in the Union Army, and was commissary sergeant in his regiment. By occupation before the war he was a farmer and stockraiser, and enjoyed comfortable prosperity. He was in politics a Republican, and a member of the Methodist church. The maiden name of his wife was Zilpha Bell, who was born in Tennessee, a daughter of Henry Bell, who was one of the pioneer settlers of Sebastian county, Arkansas, where his daughter was married to Mr. Mickle.

Joseph, at Memphis, The youngest of seven children, Joseph J. Mickle was educated in the public schools of his native county, and in Buckner College of Sebastian county. Considerable intervals separated his attendance at school for from the age of thirteen he had become self-supporting, and earned his first money as a clerk in a store in Arkansas. He continued as a clerk for six years, and his first in-dependent venture was in 1886 at Fort Smith, where he had an interest in a general store. He continued to be known chiefly as a merchant until about five years ago. He had both a native and acquired ability to understand the wants of his patrons, and on this knowledge he built up a large and successful establishment wherever he located. Mr. Mickle became a resident of Texas on the first day of January, 1892, his first location being at Honey Grove in northeast Texas. He moved to Memphis in 1904, where he has been known as a merchant, as a real estate man, and also a farmer and rancher. During six years' residence in Fort Worth he was in the wholesale hardware business, under the firm name of Mickle-Burgen Hardware Company. Later he was secretary and treasurer of the James Mickle-Schow Company of Fort Worth, a firm engaged both in manufacturing and in wholesaling. At the present time Mr. Mickle has stock and invested interests in commercial enterprises, banks, owns a good deal of land and cattle. He is the owner of sixty-four hundred acres of land in Roberts county, and five thousand acres in Randall county, stocked with high grade cattle. In Memphis he has built and owns a number of business and residential structures, including his very beautiful home.

A Republican in politics, he has never sought any official position. He has taken thirty-two degrees of Scottish Rite Masonry, and is well known in Masonic circles. He is a member of the commercial club its a steward in the Methodist church and for seven years was superintendent of the Sunday schools, and for a similar term was chairman of the Board of Stewards.

In National City, California, on Christmas Day of 1883, Mr. Mickle married Miss Georgia Horton, a native of Arkansas and a daughter of George R. Horton, who was horn in Michigan, but was one of the early settlers of Arkansas, having been a jeweler and merchant at Fort Smith. The five children born to Mr. and Mrs. Mickle are named as follows: Omar Ogden; Ethel, deceased; Joseph J., Jr.; Georgie Ella; and Zilpha Margaret.

"Mr. Mickle's present position in life is due entirely to his own industry and efforts. When the war closed his mother was left with seven helpless children, and when the estate was sold she accepted Confederate money, which of course became almost at once value-less. Thus the son, Joseph, had to begin work as soon as he was able, and at the age of twelve had almost the entire responsibility of supporting the family. His ancestry on the paternal side is of Scotch descent, his grandfather having come from that country, but of Scotch Irish stock. Grandfather William Mickle settled in Wirghin, having. The maternal ancestors were early Tennesseeans, and of mingled English and Scotch stock. They were old settlers of Schastian county, Arkansas, and members of the Bell family were doctors and merchants.

Join C. Thomas. The Childress Post, of which John C. Thomas has been citized and publisher since 1907, is one of the weekly journals of northwest Texas with a definite influence as a moulder of public opinion and with a reputation as a news gatherer and publicity organ. The editor of this paper, who belongs to a family which has been identified with Texas from the heginning of its statehood started out in life a poor boy, won his education as a result of hard work, was a successful teacher for a number of years, and has proved himself exceptionally capable in the field of journalism. John C. Thomas was born July 4, 1869, near Lexington, in what was then Burleson county, now Lee county, Pexas. His grandfather, Jeremiab Watts Thomas, canie to Texas in 1845, was a farmer by occupation, and owned a large number of slaves. He had a very influential part in early-day polities, and was a member of one of the early state legislatures, possibly the second. The father of John C. was Jesse Thomas, a native of Mississippi, who located in Burleson county, and during the Civil war served four years as corporal in the Eleventh Texas regiment. He was wounded at the battle of Shiloh, and after the surrender of Vicksburg was paroled. He is still living in Williamson county, edity. Mr. Thomas was reared to manhood at Liberty Hill in Williamson county, and before reaching his majority started out on his own account, finding work which eventually enabled him to get a better education than he had been privileged to enjoy while growing up. His early career was spent on a farm and ranch, and he afterwards entered the National Normal University at Lebanon, Ohio, where he was graduated in 1889, and thus equipped for his practical eareer. After leaving college, he took up teaching in Bell county, where he remained six years. He continued teaching altogether for fifteen years, and his last school was at Memphis, in Hall county. Then on June 1, 1907, he took charge of the Childress Post as editor and proprietor, and has since given all his time to making a first-class paper. The Post was originally established in 1901, and has had a continuous and fairly prosperous existence for twelve years. Mr. Thomas has developed a very modern plant, and has been quite successful, being owner of the entire printing establishment, has a nice home, and other city property in Memphis. The Post has a circulation of one thousand paid subscribers, is issued weekly, and its politics is Democratic.

Sh Laany

Mr. Thomas affiliates with Masonry, being a Royal Arch Mason, and also with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. He belongs to the Childress Commercial Club. He has never sought any public office, but exercises much influence personally and through his paper on local political affairs.

On April 28, 1901, at Wichita Falls, Texas, Mr. Thomas married Miss Maude Howell, a native of H.I. County, Texas, and a daughter of J. H. and Mary C. (Lewellyn) Howell. They bave one daughter, Maynet, born at Round Rock, Texas, in January, 1902.

Col. D. C. Giddings. Only men of unusual character and ability can perform the work and acquire the distinctions which made the life of the late Colonel Giddings notable among the eminent Texans of his time. A brilliant lawyer and public leader, he used the official honors paid him in order to render inestimable public service to his state, and his talents for large business enterprise were also employed in countless ways to build up the resources and commercial prosperity about Breuham, which for sixty years or more has been the family seat of this name in Texas. Colonel Giddings died in 1903 at the age of seventy-six, but his name is still borne by his son, D. C. Giddings, Jr., who is active head of the firm of Giddings & Giddings, bankers at Brenham, one of the oldest financial houses of the state, and is prominent in other business undertakings and in the public life of Washington county and of the state.

Colonel Dewitt Clinton Giddings was born in Susquehanna connty, Pennsylvania, July 18, 1827, and represented an old American family of Scotch origin, his first ancestor being George Giddings, who came to America in 1635. Members of the Giddings relationship served as soldiers in the war of the Revolution. James Giddings, father of the colonel, was born in Connecticut, followed the sea as captain of a vessel for some years, but later farmed in Susquehanna county, Pennsylvania, until his death in 1863. His wife, Lucy Demming, was of French descent, and her family also furnished patriots to the war of the Revolution. She was a woman of exceptional force of character, and her sons inherited from her as well as from their father the native endowments which made them all prominent and useful

The youngest of the family, Colonel Giddings, was well born and reared in a home of excellent influences. His brothers, one by one, as they reached early man-hood, had gone into the Southwest, and in order to restrain his youngest son from following their example, the father refused to give Dewitt an education that would fit him for a profession, hoping by that course to keep him at home. The temper and ambition of the boy were not to be thwarted by such measures, and from the proceeds of tenching a country school he acquired what was then called a liberal education, qualified as a civil engineer, and in 1850 took up the study of law in Pennsylvania. In 1852 he followed his five brothers to Texas, the first of whom, Giles A., had sacrificed himself on the altar of liberty at the battle of San Jacinto. On reaching Texas Colonel Giddings became associated with his brother J. D. Giddings in the practice of law at Brenham. Though opposed to secession, he went with his state into the Confederacy, and in 1861 was chosen exptain of a company of cavalry which became a part of the Twenty-first Texas Cavalry, and he served that command as lieutenant-colonel, but was virtually in command of the regiment throughout its service. The regiment was on duty in the Trans-Mississippi department. At one time near Helena, Arkansas, he was captured, but was released after six weeks and took part in Marmaduke's raid into Missonri, and in most of the fighting of the Louisiana campaign. He was a capable soldier and a highly esteemed officer.

His practice had been lost and much of his material accumulations dissipated during the war, after which he returned to Brenham and soon regained a distinguished place in the Texas bar and for years his abilities were sought for the public service. In 1866 he was elected a member of the state constitutional convention and was one of the most aggressive and influential Texans during the era of reconstruction. In 1870 he accepted the Democratic nomination for Congress, and entered the primary campaign which was well nigh hopeless in view of the still existing dominance of the Republican party and its black cohorts. Notwithstanding the dangers to which he was exposed of assassination at the hands of the ''Davis police'' he went all over the district, comprising nearly a quarter of the state, in a buggy, and was often preceded by a negro company of these police, who daily threatened to arrest him and put him in irons. In forty days he delivered sixty speeches, and at the election was chosen by a good majority over his carpetbagger opponent, Gen. William T. Clark. Governor Davis refused to accept the undoubted evidences of his popular election, and gave a certificate of election to General Clark. A spirited contest followed for the seat in the House of Representatives, and in spite of the prejudices which prevailed in that body the evidence in favor of Colonel Giddings was so overwhelming that he was given his seat by a unanimous vote. That was the first of the few instances in which a Southern Democrat won his case in such a contest. Colonel Giddings was re-elected to Congress against A. J. Evans, and in 1876 against Col. George W. Jones, an independent Democrat. Of his services in Congress it has been said: "Colonel Giddings was one of a conspicuous group of southern men whose sturdy bravery and tactful resistance against the overwhelming reconstruction forces defended the South from yet greater evils than those which did befall. The seat of government at Washington at that time was the source of the greatest evils which the defeated South would yet experience, and in staying the ruthless and arrogant power of a northern Congress Colonel Giddings and his associates earned a meed of lasting renown,"

One other incident of his larger public service should be noted. During the war Texas had sent United States bonds to the amount of three hundred thousand dollars to Europe to be sold, the proceeds to be used in buying arms and supplies for the use of the Confederacy. Part of the bonds had been sold and the proceeds used before the final surrender of the Southern army. The unnsed money and bonds had been deposited with bankers. The United States government having refused the interest on the bonds that had been sold, the holders of such bonds attached the unsold bonds and enjoined the bankers against paying the money on deposit to the state of Texas. After several lawyers had represented Texas in the negotiations, J. D. & D. C. Giddings were appointed as state agents. They took the case, and after much work, Colonel Giddings returned from Europe and turned over to the state treasury three hundred and thirty-nine thousand dollars.

Colonel Giddings retired from the active practice of law in 1875, and thereafter devoted himself to the management of the bank of Giddings & Giddings, which had been established in 1866. He gained prestige as one of Texas' ablest financiers, but throughout his career his public spirit in behalf of his home county and state, and his high sense of personal responsibility to his fellowmen, were as noteworthy as his business achievements.

In 1860 Colonel Giddings married Miss Malinda C. Lusk. Her father, Samuel Lusk, a native of Alabama, moved from that state to Tennessee, and came to Texas in 1834, two years before the winning of independence. His home was in Washington county near the old town of Washington on the Brazos, and he was one of the early planters in that vicinity. He left his plantation early in 1836, joined the patriot forces under Houston, and at the time of the battle of San Jacinto was on detail duty in protecting the women and children. In the same year he was a member of the constitutional convention which met at Washington on the Brazos and passed the declaration of independence and framed the first organic law of the Republic. For many years he was honored with the office of county clerk of Washington county, and was a member of the congress of the Republic which ratified the annexation of Texas to the Union. His daughter Malinda C. was born in the year of independence, 1836, near the old town of Independence in Washington county, after the successful campaign of San Jacinto, and after the families of the soldiers had returned to their homes following the retreat of Santa Anna and his army, A son of Samuel Lusk, Patrick H. Lusk, who in December, 1842, joined the historic Mier expedition across the Rio Grande, went with that ill-starred command into Mexican territory, was captured, and was one of those who in the famous "lottery of death" drew the white bean and was thus spared immediate death, and after untold hardships and sufferings finally returned to Texas.

Colonel Giddings and wife had five children, but the only survivor is Dewitt Clinton Giddings.

Dewitt Clinton Giddings, Jr., son of Colonel Giddings

and Malinda C. (Lusk) Giddings was born at Bren-ham January 27, 1863. He was educated in the Brenham public schools, the Agricultural and Mechanical College at Bryan, the Southwestern University of Georgetown, finishing in the University of Virginia. In 1881, at the age of eighteen, he entered the bank of Giddings & Giddings, and has been continuously identified with that institution for more than thirty years. His early services with the bank merited promotion, and in 1884 he was given an interest in the business, and since his father's death in 1903 has been active head of the private banking house which was established by his father and uncle at Brenham in 1866.

Mr. Giddings is president of the Brenham Compress, Oil & Manufacturing Company, a consolidation of the Brenham Oil Mills, the Brenham Electric Light Company and the Brenham Ice & Cold Storage Company. He is also president of the Brenham Compress Company, and president of the South Texas Cotton Mills of Brenham, that being one of the oldest cotton mills in the state, having been established in 1901.

A successful young business man who recognizes his duty to the public, Mr. Giddings was for many years chairman of the Washington County Democratic Executive Committee, and in 1895 was elected a representative to the Twenty-fourth state legislature, serving one term, and since 1905 has been city treasurer of Brenham. He is a charter member and was first Exalted Ruler of Brenham Lodge No. 979, B. P. O. Elks.

Mr. Giddings was married in 1884 to Miss Carrie Bas-sett, daughter of William H. Bassett of Evergreen, Louisiana, an extensive planter and merchant of that state. To this marriage have been born three children: Linda, who married E. P. Anderson, Jr.; D. Clinton Giddings, Jr., now with his father in the bank of Giddings & Giddings; and Carolyn Giddings, who married John D. Rogers, of Allen Farm.

HON, CHARLES BLAIR FELDER, County Judge, Wichita Falls, Texas, has in his make-up a combination of German, French and Scotch-Irish blood, and is a Texan by birth and education, possessing to a marked degree the broad, generous views of the typical native of the Lone Star State.

Judge Felder was born in Washington county, May 12, 1873, son of Rufus King and Maggie (Matthews) Felder, the former of South Carolina birth, descended from German and French ancestors; the latter a native of Mississippi, of Scotch-Irish descent. Rufus King Felder is a veteran of the Civil war, having served as a private in Company F, Fifth Infantry, Hood's Brigade, for a period of four years. He participated in many engagements, and surrendered with Gen. Lee at Appointation. At the close of the war he returned to Texas and settled in Washington county, where he met with moderate success as a planter. He is still a resident of Chapel Hill. Politically, he is a Democrat, and, religiously, a Methodist, having long been identified with the Methodist Episcopal Church South. His wife is deceased. She was a daughter of the Rev. Jacob Matthews, and in her girlhood came with her parents to Texas, their settlement being in Washington county. That was before the war, and it was here that she afterward met and married Mr. Felder.

Charles Blair Felder was the third born in his father's family. He was educated at Chapel Hill and in the Southwestern University, Georgetown. He received the degree of B. S., as a member of the class of 1893, and immediately after his graduation he took up the study of law. In 1895 he was admitted to the bar and began the practice of his profession at Brenham, Washington county, where he remained thus engaged about four years. Then he came to Wichita Falls, where he has since been in continuous practice, and where also he has been interested in various enterprises. In November, 1910, he was elected to the office of County Judge. In November, 1912, he was re-elected to this office, and is now serving his second term, January 9, 1906, at Terrell, Texas, Charles Blair Felder and Miss Maude Worbington were united in marriage, and to them has been given one child, Elton, born in October, 1906, at Wichita Falls. The Felders reside in their own home at 1109 Burnett street. Mrs. Felder is a native of Texas and a daughter of H. G. Worbington, one of the early settlers of this State.

Mr. Felder is a member of the County Bar Associa-tion and of the fraternal order of Knights of Pythias. His religious creed is the one in which he was reared, that of the Methodist Episcopal Church South.

JOHN WESLEY THOMAS was born September 11, 1887, at Sulphur Springs, Hopkins county. Texas, and is a son of John Wesley and Mollie (Mackechney) Thomas. On the paternal side his grandparents were William Thomas and Susan (Buford) Thomas, pioneers of San Augustine, Texas, and both living at Sulphur Springs, the grandfather being a retired merchant and ranchman. Of his maternal grandparents, the former is deceased, and the latter lives at Wichita Falls. The father of Mr. Thomas was born in 1863, was married at San Augustine, and for a number of years was successfully engaged in mercantile pursuits at Sulphur Springs. He and his wife, who also survives have been the parents of two children: Mrs. H. W. Green, who is now a resident of Wichita Falls, Texas; and John Wesley.

John Wesley Thomas received his education in the public and high schools at Sulphur Springs, and after his graduation from the latter institution, at the age of eighteen years, embarked upon his business career. In that year he came to Wichita Falls, and for one year following was engaged in office work. In 1910 he became assistant secretary of the Wichita Falls Chamber of Commerce, and on January 1, 1913, was made acting secretary of that organization, a position he has continued to hold to the present time. He is also secretary of the Retail Merchants Association, and State secretary of the Retail Merchants Secretaries Association. In his official capacities he has formed a wide acquaintance, and through a pleasing personality has gained a large number of friends.

Mr. Thomas is unmarried. He is a Democrat in his political views, but has not sought public preferment. For some years he has been connected with the local lodge of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, in which he now holds the ratu of Esteemed Loyal Knight.

ROBERT L. LIGON. Practically all of Robert L. Ligon's business career has been one of devotion to the lumber interests, the only exception thereto being a period of five years when he gave his attention to the land business in Oklahoma. He located in Byers in 1902 and here established his present business and as head of the Ligon Lumber Company, he conducts a thriving business in lumber and building materials. Other local interests have claimed his notice, and he is now serving as vice-president of the First National Bank of Byers and as president of the Byers Oil & Gas Company, the latter being one of the newer enterprises of the community, and one of its most promising. A citizen of influence and power in the community, he has well merited the position he has gained through his activities.

Born in Clay county, Missouri, on October 15, 1866, Robert L. Ligon is the son of John A. and Margaret (Drennan) Ligon, both native Missourians. The father after his removal from his home state in 1878, lived in Kansas, later in Oklahoma, and still later in Texas, where he now resides in Byers. He served all through the Civil war as a soldier of the Confederacy, and participated in many of the more severe conflicts of the struggle. He is a member of the Christian church, and an active Democrat. His wife, who was a devoted woman in her family was a woman of the most excellent Christian character, long a member of the Christian church, and she died in 1906 at the age of sixty-six years. The family was then resident in Oklahoma and years. The family was then resident in Oklahom she is buried there in the Timberlake cemetery. were the parents of four children, Robert L. of this review being the second born and parents. As pioneers in three different states, the family has contributed its full quota to the settlement and development of the country, and are eminently worthy of some mention, however brief, in a history of the character and purpose of this publication.

Robert L. Ligon was ten years of age when the family quitted their native state and moved to Kansas, where they continued to reside for twelve years. Coming to Texas then, they settled in this county, remaining for about nine years, during which time the subject was connected with the lumber business. Five years ensuing were spent in Oklahoma, during which time he devoted himself to the land business there, after which he returned to Texas, and settling in Byers, against identified himself with the lumber enterprise. He established the Ligon Lumber Company at that time, the same having prospered in the passing years, and it is now among the busiest and most successful concerns in the city. A full line of lumber, building materials of all kinds, sash, doors, etc., is carried.

Mr. Ligon is a Democrat and concerns himself in state and national politics, as well as in local affairs, in which he has been especially active as a resident here. He has served here as a member of the school board. He is secretary of the Byers Commercial Club, and in the years of his Oklahoma residence, he served at one time as mayor of Frederick.

Mr. Ligon was married at Commerce, Texas, on April 7, 1896, to Miss Alice Waggoner, a daughter of D. N. Waggoner, and wite, of Commerce. Two children have been born to them: Ernest M. and Annie Ligon.

The family have membership in the Christian church of the city, and Mr. Ligon is a member of the Masonic order, with Blue Lodge and Commandery affiliations, and is also a member of the Order of Hoo-Hoos. Mr. and Mrs. Ligon stand high in social and other circles of the community, and have many genuine friends in and about the county.

J. Fleetwood Reed, M. D. It has been only practically in recent years that the self-sacrificing services of the physician have been given their full due, although through his labors in medicine the plagues and epidemic diseases of the world have been well nigh abolished from civilization, the contagions and infectious maladies largely shorn of their fatality; the virulence of all disease modified; the horrors of war lessened. Aside from his professional services, however, the physician of standing is almost invariably found occupying positions of prominence, of trust and of responsibility, in business and financial life, in the public arena and in social circles. An excellent example of the successful practitioner who has not confined his activities to his vocation, is found in the person of Dr. J. Fleetwood Reed, of Wichita Falls, who in addition to having various business inter-ests of an extensive nature and being vice-president of the First State Bank, is serving his community very capably as alderman from the Fitth Ward. Dr. J. F. Reed was born at Winchester, Franklin county, Tennessee, September 13, 1855, and is a son of Shipman and Lettic White (Campbell) Reed.

Shipman Reed was born in the State of Alabama, and at the age of twenty-six years migrated to Tennessee where he met and married Mrs. Lettie (White) Campbell, a native of Franklin county, that State. He continued to reside in Tennessee throughout the remainder of his life, and died in 1899, when seventy-nine years of age. During the entire Civil War he served as a member of a Tennessee regiment of volunteers in the Confederate army, and rose to the rank of captain, serving under Generals Bragg and Johnson, and participating in a number of the greatest battles of the war, the confederate army in 1884, at the age of sixty-five daughters, J. Fleetwood being the second child in order of birth.

After receiving his preliminary educational training in the public schools of Franklin county, J. Fleetwood Reed pursued a literary course of study at the Winchester Normal school, and then took up his medical studies in Vanderbilt University, where he was graduated with his degree in 1887. Later he supplemented this preparation by post-graduate courses in Vander-bilt University and the University of Nashville. For four years Doctor Reed was located at Kelso, Tennessee, and at the end of that time came to Texas, locating first at Iowa Park, and thirteen years later coming to Wichita Falls. He opened offices in this city in January, 1894, and since that time has been successful in building up a large and representative practice. At the time of his advent here he also bought an interest in a drug business and this he has continued to hold to this time. Doctor Reed is a deep thinker and close student, and has ever devoted himself to research and study. His sympathetic nature and kind and gentle personality have assisted him greatly in his work and have made him one of the most beloved of his profession. His interest in the work of the various medical organizations is keen, intelligent and active and at this time be is a member of the State, county and national societies.

His fraternal connections include the Odd Fellows and the Masons, in the latter of which he has attained to the Knight Templar degree. In political matters, Docthe Knight lempar agree. In pointed matter, 50c-tor Reed is an earnest Democrat, and is now giving his fellow-citizens excellent service as the representative from the Fifth Ward in the city council. In addition to being vice-president of the First State Bank, he is a director in the Wichita Falls Floral Company, the Wichita Falls Brick Company and the Wichita Falls Furniture Company.

Doctor Reed was married in 1888, at Bell Buckle, Bedford county, Tennessee, to Miss Josie Edmiston, daughter of the late Mr. and Mrs. William Edmiston of that place. Doctor and Mrs. Reed have had no children.

James D. Stephenson, For many years James Dover Stephenson has been a resident of the city of San Antonio, Texas, and of this section of the country. has seen the state of Texas advance in wealth and population, and with the growth of the country has come the growth of his own fortunes. One of the best stockmen in the country, his registered Jersey cows and Berkshire hogs are well known throughout the country. He now conducts a wholesale dairy business just outside of San Antonio, in which he has been exceedingly successful.

James Dover Stephenson was born in Alston county, Cumberland, England, in 1849. His father was John Stephenson and his mother was Ann (Dover) Stephenson, both of whom were natives of the north of England and both are now deceased. It was in this part of the mother country that James D. Stephenson grew to manhood, being reared to follow farming and stock raising for a livelihood. It was in 1872 that he came with his parents to Texas, locating in Robertson county. Within a few months of his arrival, however, Mr. Stephenson determined to move to Boerne in Kendall county, and here he took a contract for the building of a rock fence for Dr. Kingsbury, a well known pioneer of southwestern Texas. After this he went into the freighting business, for this was in the days when the railroads had not penetrated to this section of Texas. He was engaged in freighting from San Antonio to Kerrville, Fort Concho and other western points, and after going out of this business took up well drilling. He was engaged in drilling wells and in erecting wind mills throughout the southwestern part of Texas, and after a time had enough money saved to enable him to go into the farming and stock raising business.

It was in 1900 that he established his home in San Antonio, principally for the purpose of giving his children the educational opportunities which the city afforded. His own work continued to be located outside of the city for some time. When he first moved to San Antonio his home was located on Buena Vista street, but later he removed to his present home, which is beautifully located on Lake View avenue, to the west of the city and just outside of the city limits. Here he owns a handsome residence with twenty acres of land. The land is principally planted to feed stuffs, and this is where he carries on his dairy business. He raises very fine cattle, and his splendid herd of Jersey cows is well known. The wholesale milk business in which he is engaged has grown from year to year until now it is a very prosperous enterprise. About a mile to the southwest, on West Commerce street, is Mr. Stephenson's hog ranch. Here he raises a splendid breed of registered Berkshire hogs, which are considered among the finest in southwestern Texas, and when he markets them they command the highest prices.

Mr. Stephenson married in Boerne, Texas, Miss Julia Perrin, who was born in Illinois but was reared in Iowa. Mrs. Stephenson has always been an active aid to her busband in his business, understanding stockraising thoroughly. The children, of whom there are seven, have all been reared with the idea of self support. All of them have received good educations in the San Antonio schools, and their success in life has been due in no small measure to the careful training which they have had at the hands of their parents. Miss Daisy Stephenson, the eldest, has been very successful in raising chickens. Miss Floy Stephenson, the next, has carned several thousand dollars in the dairy business, independent of her father. There are twin sons, Walter and Wilfred, the former also engaged in the dairy business, independent of his father and to whom he has been of splendid assistance for many years, and the latter a successful contractor in San Antonio. Miss Annie Stephenson, another daughter, is a teacher in the schools of San Antonio. The two younger children are daughters, Mabel, taking a course in Baylor Hospital, and Marion, attending school.

THOMAS B. NOBLE. Occupying a place of prominence in business circles of Wichita Falls as the active directing head of the Noble Frank Hardware Company, and holding as high a position in the confidence and esteem of the public on account of his long and faithful official service, Thomas B. Noble is eminently worthy of more than passing mention among the representative men of this progressive Texas city. He is a native of the Lone Star State, having been born in Sabine county, February 15, 1869, and is a son of I. O. and Frances (Schurlock) Noble.

Both the Noble and Schurlock families have been prominent in military life, the maternal grandfather of Mr. Noble having been captain of a volunteer regiment in the American army during the Mexican War, while his father served valiantly as a private in a Texas regi-ment in Hood's brigade during the struggle between the South and the North and was wounded both at Chickamanga and Gettysburg. I. O. Noble was a native of Mississippi, and was brought to Texas in childhood, the family settling in Shelby county, where he grew to manhood. He was for some years engaged in a mercantile business at Orange, but at the close of the Civil War removed to Sabine county, and there continued to reside until 1907, in which year he came to Wichita Falls, where his death occurred in February, 1907, when he was sixty-nine years of age. His wife, who was born, reared, educated and married in Sabine county, Texas, died there in 1896, when fifty six years of age. She was the mother of six sons and one daughter, and of these Thomas B. was the fourth in order of birth.

The primary stage of Thomas B. Noble's educational training was passed in the public schools of Sabine county, and this was supplemented by a business course at Texarkana. His introduction to business life was secured in the capacity of clerk in a mercantile estab-lishment at that place, but after three years came to Wichita Falls and embarked in the confectionery and stationery business, in which he was successfully engaged for upwards of fourteen years. Selling out at an advantage, he became general manager of the Wichita Falls Broom Factory, and while thus engaged, in 1904, was elected mayor of Wichita Falls. In this capacity his long business training stood him in good stead, and under his administration the city entered upon a period of prosperity that greatly advanced its growth and development. The people of the city were not slow to recognize and appreciate his signal services, and for the three following terms he succeeded himself as chief executive of the municipality, resigning his office in 1912 when he felt he had done his full duty by his fellow-citizens. He also served for two years, from 1902 to 1904, as a member of the city council, where his earnest and conscientions services first brought him prominently before the public. On the completion of his public services, Mr. Noble, on May 10, 1912, reorganized the hardware business that had been founded by his brother in 1909, and the Noble-Frank Hardware Company has developed from a humble enterprise into one of extensive proportions, being known as one of the important factors in the business life of Wichita Falls. The success which has rewarded Mr. Noble's efforts may be accredited solely to his own energy and perseverance; he has fought his own way to the front, and what he has gained has been gained fairly. His integrity is firmly established and to him his associates look for leadership and counsel.

In January, 1897, Mr. Noble was married to Miss Zuda Heath, of Wichita Falls, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. W. C. Heath, the latter now deceased, while the former, an old pioneer settler of Texas, still survives. Two children have been born to this union: T. B., born in Cotober, 1897, at Wichita Falls; and Margaret, born in May, 1899, now attending high school in this city. Mr. and Mrs. Noble are members of the Methodis Episcopal Church, South, where he is serving as clairman of the board of stewards. His politics are those of the Democratic party, while his fraternal connections of the World, the Modern Woodmen of the World, the Modern Woodmen of America, and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elis. He is trustee of the E. P. O. E. of Wichita Falls. His wide circle of friends testifies to his universal popularity.

FRANK H. GOHLEE, of the firm of Bean & Gohlbe, real estate dealers. Wichita Falls, Texas, was born at Louisville, Kentucky, December 14, 1875, and has in his make-up a mixture of German and Swiss blood. His father, John G. Gohlke, was born in Germany in 1831 and in 1846, a boy in his teens, came to America and settled at Victoria, Texas. About the close of the Civil war, he was married at Cincinnati, John, to Anna B. Heldrigher, and shortly afterward they took up their residence at Louisville, Kentucky, where they remained until his death, and where his widow is still living. She was born in Switzerland in 1839 and has been a resident of this country since her twelfth year, the first few years of her life here having been spent in New Orleans, Louisiana, Of the children born to John G. and Anna B. Goblek, five are living, three being residents of Texas.

Frank H. Gohlke grew up in his native city and received his education there. After completing his work in the public schools he took a course in a commercial college, and his first position in the business world was that of clerk in a railroad office. Afterward he was successively in express service, commercial club work, newspaper work, and real estate business. From 1904 to 1908 he was assistant secretary of the Spokane Chamber of Commerce, secretary of the Washington State Live Stock Association, secretary of the Spokane Mining Exchange, and secretary of the Wichita Falls Chamber of Commerce, becoming the first secretary of that commercial club under its reorganization in 1908, and which was probably the first organization in the South to raise and expend a fund of $10,000 for publicity work in a city of 6,500 population. Mr. Gohlke is secretary-treasurer of the Developers Oil & Gas Company of Wichita Falls, Clay County, Texas, and is identified with the real estate business here under the firm style of Bean & Gohlke.

Politically, Mr. Gohlke was formerly a Republican but now affiliates with the Progressive party.

July 16, 1904, at Louisville, Kontucky, Frank H. Golike and Callie Lee Brashear were united in marriage, and to them have been given two children: Bernice B. Born February 3, 1906, at Spokane, Washington, B. Born February 3, 1906, at Spokane, Washington, B. Brashear of Louisville and a daughter of Samuel Brashear of that place, the date of her birth being February 27, 1884. Both her parents and grandparents were slave-owning planters of Kentucky.

As indicated in the mention of Mr. Gohlke's various business connections, he spent some time in the Northwest. And he has traveled over a major portion of the United States. This experience has given him standards for comparison, and it is his opinion that Texas offers some of the greatest opportunities for development and advancement that an earnest worker can find anywhere.

JUDGE JOHN B. LITTLER. The leading attorney in point of sullily and extent of practice in Howard county, Judge Littler has been identified with the bar and with public life in this section of Texas for more than twenty years. His distinctive place in the affairs of Howard county is illustrated by the fact that he held the office of county judge for ten consecutive value and during his last campaign for that-office received larger and more gratifying majority than ever before in his political career. He came out to Texas a young lawyer from Ohio, and has gained success and become a valuable factor in the miblic service of his expectation.

uable factor in the public service of his county.

Born in Highland, Ohio, September 15, 1865, John B.

Littler was the son of James H. and Ann (Dovo) Littler, both of whom were natives of Ohio and are now deceased. His father was a farmer by occupation, and one of the prominent citizens of Highland county. He was active as a Democrat in a county which was a Republican stronghold, and his individual popularity is evidence of the fact that despite this political condition, he served his county for twenty years in the office of Trastee. His death occurred in February, 1904, when in 1891, and began the practice of his profession in Midland. In order to have a larger field for his ability, he subsequently moved to Fort Worth, where he is now one of the leaders of his profession.

John B. Littler, as a boy attended the public schools of Hillsboro, Ohio, and took up the study of law in the office of Newby & Morrow at Hillsboro. He studied law and had much practical experience in the duties of a law office and by constant observance of the court files and other legal proceedings, and was well equipped for his profession when he was admitted by examination before the supreme court of Ohio in 1890. He was in practice at Hillsboro until the end of 1891, and then came to Texas. His first location was at Stanton in Martin county. Being one of the early lawyers in that locality and a man whose popularity gave him much prestige, after a brief residence he was elected to the office of county judge of Martin county, in 1892. He resigned this office in 1894 in order to locate in Big Springs, where he opened his office and has since enjoyed a liberal share of the legal business of the county. Judge Littler is now head of the well known firm of Littler & Penix. In 1896 he was elected to the office of county judge, and was reelected four consecutive times, so that he gave ten years of service in this important administrative office. Since the close of his last term in 1906 he has devoted all his attention to private practice and now enjoys the best clientage of any lawyer in Howard county. Judge Littler is local attorney for the Texas and Pacific Railway, an office which he has held for some years, and is also attorney for the First National Bank of Big Springs.

Fraternally the judge is affiliated with Masonry and has attained the Knight Templar degrees in the York Rite, and has also passed all the chairs in the lodge of Odd Fellows, Mrs. Littler has long taken an active part in the Rebekah degree of Odd Fellowship and was president of the Rebekah Assembly at Texas in 1907. Judge Littler was married in 1901 to Miss Ervilla Holmes, a native of Ohio and daughter of Dr. J. W.

and Mamie Santee Holmes. The only child of their marriage is now deceased.

Judge Littler owns about one thousand acres of ranch land in Howard county, and considerable city real estate including the beautiful home in Big Springs. He and his wife are prominent members of the social circles of the city. As to the economic and industrial future of west Texas, particularly in Howard county, Judge Littler is a firm believer and has shown his faith in practical fashion by investing most of his money in Howard county lands, and hopes to increase his holdings within a few years.

Wade H. Walker, M. D. In the medical circles of Wichita Falls probably no member has done more for the preservation of the public health and has enjoyed a more satisfactory practice than Dr. Wade H. Walker. His services some ten years ago, during the smallpox epidemic in this city will long be remembered grate-children in this city win long be remembered gratefully by his fellow citizens.

Dr. Wade H. Walker was born near Richmond, Kentucky, December 1, 1875, the second in a family of children born to Daniel B. and Tabitha (Burnside) Walker. Both the father and mother were natives of the same state, and the father was a farmer and stock raiser in Kentucky, and later in Texas. During Met Civil war, though very young, he served as a home guard in the protection of the women and children from molestation by the guerrillas and outlaws that infested that section of the country during the war times. He assisted in the support of his widowed mother, and after moving to Texas in 1891, he continued his active career for some years, and finally moved to Wichita Falls, where his son Dr. Walker provided a home for him and his wife, who are still living at the age of seventy-six years, and the mother at the age of seventy. The mother was reared and received her early education at Georgetown, Kentucky. The other four sons and two daughters of the family are: Mrs. R. P. Fox, of Fort Worth; Dave V. Walker of Wichita Falls; Bates D. Walker, of Claude, Texas; Mrs. Susan B. Sheppard of Wichita Falls; Mark D. Walker of Wichita Falls; and James D. Walker of Wichita Falls.

Dr. Walker as a boy attended the Elliot Institute in Kentucky, and also a business course in the Draughon's Business College of Nashville, Tenn., finishing that portion of his education at the age of sixteen years. He had to work for all he got in his early days, and between the intervals of earning his way, took up and advanced himself in the study of medicine. He finally began practice on a certificate in Wichita Falls, in 1898. He entered the Medical Department of Fort Worth University in Fort Worth, Texas, in 1897, and was grad-uated M. D. in 1900. His ambition has always been to keep abreast of all advances in the science and practice of medicine and surgery, and for this reason he has studied constantly and availed himself of the best opportunities since his graduation from medical college. In 1909 he was at the Mayo Clinic and Hospital at Rochester, Minnesota, also attended the Clinic in 1912, and took a course in the Postgraduate School and Hospital of Chicago in 1903 and another one in 1905. His first practice was at Wichita Falls, after which he spent one year in Fort Worth, and since 1901 has continued to be identified with the profession in Wichita Falls. He is considered one of the ablest physicians and surgeons of this city. He was first associated with Drs. Burnside and Coons, until Dr. Coons drew out of the firm and in 1911 Dr. Everitt Jones of Galveston became a member of the firm, which is now Burnside, Walker & Jones, Physicians and Surgeons. Dr. Walker is local surgeon for the Fort Worth & Denver City Railway, having held that post since 1901, and is local surgeon for the Wichita Valley Railway, is medical examiner for several of the old-line life insurance companies of Wichita Falls, and for several of the fraternal orders. In 1901 occurred an outbreak of smallpox in Wichita Falls. Most of the physicians in the city refused to administer their services to the victims, and Dr. Walker practically took charge of the situation, and handled it in an admirable fashion, during the course of the epidemic treating successfully some two hundred patients,

Dr. Walker is a member of the Wichita County, the Pan-Handle, and the Northwest Texas Medical Societies, being president of the last named at one time, also belongs to the State Medical Society and the Southern and the American Medical Association. His fraternal affiliations include membership in the Masonic Order, Wood-men of the World, Modern Woodmen of America, the Modern Order of Pretorians, the Knights and Ladies of Honor, and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. His politics is Democratic. Since he was twelve years old he has attended and been a member of the Presbyterian church, and is now deacon in the church at Wichita Falls.

In Tulsa, Oklahoma, June 3, 1908, Dr. Walker married Miss Mary Esther Howard, a daughter of John and Mary Ellen Howard, her father having formerly been well known in real estate circles in Tulsa. Both her parents are now deceased. The two children born to their marriage are: John Wade, born November, 1907, and died in May, 1908; and Mary Janette Walker, born in December, 1911, at Wichita Falls. Dr. Walker owns some valuable real estate in Wichita Falls, has one of the beautiful homes of the city, and has deservedly pros-

JAMES WILLIAM LOWBER, Ph. D., Sc. D., F. R. G. S., F. R. A. S., etc., a resident of Texas since 1888, and for many years pastor of the Central Christian Church of Austin, Dr. J. W. Lowber is one of the most distinguished churchmen in Texas, and few men in the ministry of today have so fully realized the opportunities of their great profession, and have brought to it greater talent and accomplishments as scholars, teachers, pulpit orators or church builders. A sympathetic account of the career of Dr. Lowber was written several years ago by Dr. R. J. Briggs, pastor of the First Congregational Church of Austin, and with some additions to bring the article down to date, the well phrased and interesting biography by Dr. Briggs is published in full as an appropriate narrative of the life and services of one whose place in Texas history can not be gainsaid:

Dr. Lowber was born in Nelson county, Kentucky. His early years were spent on a farm, face to face with nature, and in the midst of those healthful rural pursuits out of which has arisen much of the brain and brawn of our country. He early developed the faculty of observation and power of analysis, and a sensitiveness to all the objects in the world about him, which has been his distinguishing characteristics in the busy and successful career of his subsequent manhood. Blessed with a native intellect, acute and vigorous, and burning with a passion for knowledge, he took to books as the bee takes to the flowers. The difficulties which environed his youth were transferred into the spurs of his progress, just as the head wind to the Atlantic liner gives new power to the engine by furnishing a bet-ter draught to the furnace. He soon mastered the course of instruction in the ordinary country schools of the time, and plunged into wider fields at his own instance and of his own choosing. Books of life, of art, of science, of philosophy and of religion were eagerly sought and absorbed, his passion for knowledge being the kindling flame of his never-flagging energy. When he entered college-the entire expense of which was met by himself in a most manly way, by manual labor, by teaching and preaching—so rapid was his progress and so accurate and thorough were his acquirements, that on entering the Junior class, by recommendation of the Professor of Greek, who pronounced him the most thorough Greek scholar among the students of the university, he was appointed tutor of the Greek class. With a passion for knowledge that deepened and widened by repletion, a faculty for detail and thoroughness which left no nook or cranny in the temple of any science unexplored, he laid the foundation for the clear, consistent, vigorous and comprehensive thinking of his after life. His scholastic attainments are somewhat amazing in this age of specialism, when the thorough mastery of one science or art is regarded as the work of a lifetime. He is more or less familiar with seventeen dif-ferent languages, some of which he speaks with great accuracy and fluency. He holds certificates of graduation from five universities and diplomas in the degrees of A. B., A. M., Sc. D., Ph. D. and LL.D., all of which came, not as honorary degrees in recognition of his attainments and his distinguished services as educator, preacher and author, but as the guerdon of his own toil, and his persistent determination to know the meaning and relation of things in the wonderful universe in which God had placed him.

As a preacher, Dr. Lowber has been eminently successful both as pastor and evangelist. He has been a church-builder, both as to the creation of commoditions and elegant church structures, and in organizing, enlarging and compacting into permanence the congregations that worshiped within them. For some years be was pastor of the Christian church in Scranton, Pennsylvania, at which time he was also president of the Pennsylvania Christian Conference. He served most acceptably and successfully the First Christian Church of Paducah, Kentucky, and the First Christian Church of Paducah, Kentucky, and the First Christian Church of Prott Worth, Texas. In this latter relation he continued for more than five years, during which time he built upon of the strongest and most flourishing Christian membership numbered less than two hundred; when he concluded them, a beautiful church building had been erected at a cost of about thirty thousand dollars, the membership had increased to nearly eight hundred, and in addition there were two successful missions in operation.

In 1893 the American Christian Missionary Society invited Dr. Lowber to take charge of its mission in Galveston. He began his work in Galveston with but little more than a dozen members, his capital being his faith in God, his own personal energy, and the pledge of the society to stand by him. In two years he had built a central place of worship at a cost of about eight thousand dollars, and had gathered and organized a membership of one bundred and twenty-five. The officers of the American Board complimented Dr. Lowber very highly upon this work, pronouncing it the "most quickly developed work ever undertaken by the society." and "a star in the crown of the American Board."

In 1896 the Central Christian church in Austin invited Dr. Lowber to become its pastor. This invitation was seconded by a number of the leading Christian preachers of the state. It was the worthy ambition of the Christian church in Texas to build up a strong and growing organization in the capital city, the center of government and of learning in the state. For such work Dr. Lowber was regarded as being specially equipped. With the consent of the missionary board to release him, and after he had raised the last dollar of indebtedness on the church he had built in Galveston, he accepted the call. He began his labors in Austin in March, 1872, and the whole machinery of church life and activity, taking on new power and enthusissm, moved forward in such rapid and substantial progress, that in April, 1899, what had been considered an impossible undertaking, became a stately consummation before the eyes of the people—one of the bandsomest and most commodious stone church buildings in the city, and even in the state, was dedicated.

As a preacher, Dr. Lowber is luminous and instructive, and not without a good degree of evangelical pungency and fervor. His style is terse and clear, possessing the elegance of simple and dignified English, without any attempt at ornate coloring or that surface glitter which can in nowise enhance the intrinsic lustre of truth, or emphasize the potency of great thoughts. He seizes his subject with an acute and comprehensive analysis which masters it in all its relations from the ultimate ramifications of its roots to the flowering out of its topmost branches. He can open a luminous pathway through the confused conceptions of a text, or the tangled undergrowth of a continent of speculation, as few men can. No one can sit beneath his ministry and remain unenlightened, or fail to see that truth is supreme and has the profoundest love and reference of the preacher. That great statesman, the late John H. Reagan, said: "I go to hear Dr. Lowber for two reasons: First, I can hear him. Second, I hear something when I go, ' Elder T. W. Caskey, who was a frequent attendant upon Dr. Lowber's ministry, both in Fort Worth and in Galveston, said: "I think I have heard some better sermons than I ever heard Dr. J. W. Lowber preach, but, taking his sermons as a whole, he is the best preacher I ever heard. He never preaches a poor sermon." There are thousands of others who would corroborate this witness as true, and who cherish both admiration and love for this consecrated and energetic and able minister of Jesus Christ.

Dr. Lowber has also been distinguished and very useful as an educator. In 1893, he was elected chancellor of Add-Ran University, and held this position most acceptably and with increasing popularity for five years, though at the same time engaged in active pastoral work. While chancellor at the university he conducted a post-graduate department, and among the students who pursued the courses under his direction and instruction were graduates from Oxford, England; Glasgow, Scotland; Columbia University; the University of Indianapolis; Drake University, and other leading institutions. He has devoted fully twenty years of his life as teacher in the classroom, from the public schools to the university. In all these relations he was distinguished by the same mastery of his subject, lucid exposition, reverent appreciation of truth, and conscientious devotion to his work which have distinguished and made eminent his ministry. When the chancellorship of Texas Christian University was abolished, Dr. Lowber was offered the presidency. He had also been tendered the presidency of several other

In 1880 Dr. Lowber delivered a course of lectures in Richmond. Virginia, which were so popular, and evinced such a profound and critical mastery of Biblied literature, that Colonel Carey and Pastor J. Z. Tyler, of the Seventh Street Christian Church, offered to raise the money necessary for his maintenance if he would establish a Bible school in connection with the University of Virginia, in harmony with Thomas Jefferson's views. Afterwards he received a formal proposition from the church at Charlotteswille and the Disciples of Virginia to establish the Bible school, and accept, in connection with it, the pastorate of the church of Charlotteswille and the Disciples of Virginia to establish the Bible school, and accept, in connection with type the properties of the reagance of the was compelled to decline because of other engagements. However, he became so interested in such work that when he removed to Austin he began a course of lectures specially designed for the students of the university, which he continued until the establishment of the present Bible Chair, which was mainly due to his initiative and personal influence. For many years Dr. Lowber has lectured regularly at the Texas Christian University, on scientific, philosophic and religious subjects, and his coming is always an event in the student life of the university.

As a lecturer Dr. Lowber is characterized by luminousness of arrangement, scholarly method, consecutiveness of argument, felicity of illustration, and unity and sympathy in the completed product. Things that are huddled and confused in the students' minds, as they listen to him, hasten to fall into their right relations, and harmoniously adjust themselves to right laws and principles as soon as they feel the disposing touch of his organizing mind.

It is undeniably as an author that Dr. Lowber is most widely known, for through his books he has stood upon a coign of vantage from which he has reached thousands who never heard his voice, and it is by his books that he shall speak long after his voice has been silenced in death. Dr. Lowber is a voluminous writer on subjects of art, poetry, philosophy, science, history, morals and religion, and his books have received favorable notice and comment, not only in America, but also in England and on the continent of Europe, "The Struggles and and on the continent of Europe. "The Struggles and Triumph of the Truth," "The Devil in Modern Society," "The Who and What of the Disciples of Christ," "Cultura," and "Macrocosmus" are among his more notable works. (Since this written Dr. Lowber's latest book, "Thought and Religion," or "Contributions of Philosophy and Theology," has been published simultaneously in Boston and in London.) In all his books, treating of a wide range of subjects, he evinces a perfect mastery of his subject. His analyzing intellect leaves no phase of it unilluminated, and his clear and cogent reasoning carries with it the force of conviction to the mind of the reader. While discussing so vast a range of subjects, and subjects upon which there is so wide and manifest a diversity of opinion, he is never warped by prejudice, nor made narrow by partisanism. If, when treating of great social evils, some righteous indignation burns through his terse and compact sentences against the moral apathy of society, in the presence of such inexcusable wrongs, they are never degraded by any tone or color of moral malignity. Indeed, in reading Dr. or color of moral manging. Indeed, in reading Dr. Lowher's books, one would judge that in his formative period one of the mightiest masters who exercised his great influence in forming his method of thought, was Cousin. In all his books we encounter a passion for general principles and that eclecticism which seeks to do justice to every philosophic thinker by placing his leading thought into its right relations with the results of the whole philosophic world. His effort is to interpret rather than denounce opinions which are at variance with his own, feeling that opinions will stand or fall as they are, or are not, rooted in truth of things. One has but to read his books to see that he regards the simple revelation of the truth as the one sufficient and effectual exposure and denunciation of error. It is the blazing shield of Prince Arthur, that was only to be unveiled to strike blindness to the eyes and terror to the hearts of all the Orgoglios and Duessas of evil. Some of his books have reached the seventh edition, and there is vet no appearance of any decrease in the demand for them.

Dr. Lowher's varied and accurate scholarship, and the merit of his contributions to different departments of science and literature, have been recognized and highly commended, not only in his own country, but alroad. A. Wilford Hall, who was an able and original writer on scientific and philosophic themes, and so long editor of the Microcosm, thus speaks of Dr. Lowber as one of his valued centributors: "He became an early contributor to the Microcosm, and his terse and elegantly written, philosophic papers we are proud to point to still, as among the finest specimens of logical reasoning to be found in those volumes,"

In 1896, Dr. Lowber was elected a Fellow of the Royal Geographical Society, and in the same year was elected a Fellow of the Royal Educational Institute of Scotland. In 1897 he received the degree of Doctor of Political Science, with the highest honors, from the University of Wooster, Ohio. He is also a Doctor of Philosophy of Syracuse University, New York. He was a member of the Congress of Arts and Sciences which met in connection with the Universal Exposition in St. Louis, Missouri, in 1904. In 1905 he was elected a member of the Royal Societies Club of London, England. This is the most noted literary and scientific club in the world. (Dr. Lowber in July, 1913, was elected for membership in the Authors Club of London, England.) In 1906 he was made a Fellow of the American Association for the Advancement of Science. During the same year he was elected a member of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland. In March of the same year he was elected a member of the Italian Mathematical Society. In November of the same year he received the diploma of the Astronomical Society of France. In 1907 he was made a Fellow of the Society of Antiquarians of Scotland, a society established by royal charter, and one of the oldest and most noted in the world. In 1908, at the annual meeting of the Royal Scottish Geographical Society, out of fifty new members elected, Dr. Lowber was one of only four who were awarded the diploma of Fellow. This diploma is considered of equal value to Doctor of Science in any one of the great universities. Dr. Lowber is also a Fellow of the Royal Astronomical Society and a member of the Royal Society of Arts in London. (Dr. Lowber is a life member of Hill City Lodge, A. F. & A. M.; is Ex-prelate of the Knights Templar; a thirty-second degree Scottish rites Mason, and a member of Ben Hur Temple, A. A. O. N. M. S. He is an Ex-chief Patriarch of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, a Past chancellor of the Knights of Pythias, and an ex-Chaplain and Life member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of

Thus the honors of his own and of other lands have rained upon this accomplished man of letters, and consistent champion of the truth, almost "as thick as leaves in Valombrosa," These are commanding testimonials to the merit of his works, and to his worth as a man, and a sufficient guarantee that his work shall live after him. Dr. Lowber wears this vast and glittering accumulation of honors with all the guilelessness of a child, and no one could ever suspect, on encountering him in the daily and devoted discharge of his pastoral duties in Austin, that his name is mentioned admiringly in the great literary and scientific societies over half the civilized world. But it is here that we discover the chief attraction of the man. The man is ever greater than his work. Character is the culminating dignity and glory of human life. And Dr. Lowber has so long looked into the mirror of the Master that he has caught the same image, and grown into it from glory to glory, as by the spirit of the Lord. Every attribute and faculty of the man, every honor and distinction which have come to him by the just and admiring recognition of his fellows, have all been woven into a votive wreath, and hung upon the cross of Christ. He is first of all a Christian man, a devoted disciple of Jesus Christ, exclaiming, as Paul did: "I count all things loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ

my Lord."

In his book "The Struggles and Triumphs of the Truth," is found the following dedication by the author: "To my wife, Maggie P. Lowber, who sympathizes with and assists me in all my literary work." And opposite the title page of that same book appear the likenesses of Mrs. Lowber and Dr. Lowber. There is a fitness in this association which finds its explanation in the ancient law: "It is not good for man to be alone. I will make a helpmate for him." She has been his right hand in all his vast and diversified labors. She has sat by his side far into the small hours of the night, reading aloud from pondrous volumes of art, literature, philosophy and science, pouring their varied grist into the ever-waiting and capacious hopper of his intellect, to be ground out into fresh products of evolution and of beauty, until she has become almost as learned as her distinguished husband. Though she shares not the fame of his books in the world's eyes, yet she is vitally interwoven with them all, so much so that had Mrs. Lowber never been, perhaps the books should not have been. She has been of vital help to him also in his pastoral work, and on the lecture platform has won more plaudits by her graceful and animated elocution than the Doctor has by his lectures, so brimming with facts and useful knowledge, and so inspiring in their appeal to all that is best and noblest in humanity. (Mrs. Lowber's maiden name was Maggie Pleasant DeBaun, and she was born in Kentucky. She received the degree of Master of Arts from the Texas Christian University while Dr. Lowber was chancellor of that institution, and has taken post-graduate work in the University of Texas, being also a graduate from the Texas School of Oratory.)

In 1907, these two, Dr. and Mrs. Lowber, made an extensive tour through Europe, visiting nearly all the leading countries and cities of Great Britain and the Continent. They were both eminently fitted, by their wide and varied reading, to enjoy and profit to the full by the great privileges and opportunities of such a trip. They returned in the fall to resume their work in the Central Christian Church, where they are both honored and beloved, and where they have accomplished a work that shall abide the test of the last day.

Although Dr. Lowber has taught from the common school to the presidency of a college and chancellor of a university, and has been a pastor more than thirty years, he was never a candidate for any position in his The colleges and churches have sought him, and not be them. Thus far he has added to the church (up to the close of 1913) 12,437 persons, more than one-half of whom were by baptism or restoration. Several years ago he started a social reform movement, which has met with encouraging success. More than thirty thousand persons have accepted his social reform pledge (up to the close of 1913), and resolved to live higher social and spiritual lives. He is now a lecturer at different colleges and universities.

OTTO STEHLIK. Mr. Stehlik is one of Wichita Falls progressive and energetic business men. He started out in life a poor boy, and then went into the business world without any capital. Since then through his energy he has become one of the leading real estate brokers of Wichita Falls, and is very loyal and energetic in behalf of every movement for the betterment and improvement of this splendid commercial center of North Texas,

Otto Stehlik was born at West, McLennan county, Texas, December 26, 1881. He belongs to a family of Bohemian-Americans, a class of people who are noted for their sturdiness, industry, and strong mental char-acteristics. Joseph Stehlik, his father, was born in Moravia, Austria, and came to America at the age of nineteen years settling in Colorado county, Texas. He married Miss Theresa Marek, who was born in Bohemia, was twelve years old when her parents came to Texas, in which state she was educated and married. Her death occurred in 1895 at the age of forty-two years. The father was engaged in stock raising in Colorado county, later moved to McLennan county, which was his home until 1911, and now resides in Wichita Falls at the age of sixty, being retired from business. Of the three chil-dren, Otto was the second. He attended school in Mc-Lennan county, but when a boy left his books in order to take up the practical work of life, and filled various minor places of responsibility until 1906. He came to Wichita Falls in that year and established an office in the real estate, oil, and cotton business, and by his square methods of doing business has built up a large trade, and is considered one of the best men in his line in the county.

He has taken an active part in Democratic politics, and has served as delegate to the state convention. Fraternally he is a Knight Templar Mason and a Shriner, and also affiliated with the Benevolent and Progressive Order of Elks. He is a member of the Wichita Falls Commercial Club, and his church is the Presbyterian.

In Wichita Falls, March, 1908, Mr. Stehlik married Miss Johnnie Berry, whose father was a farmer and now resides at Fort Worth. The four children of Mr. and Mrs. Stehlik are: Melba Ruth, born at Wichita Falls, January 15, 1909; Otto and Williard, twins, born August 28, 1910; and Thelma May, born March 6, 1913, Wichita Falls being the birthplace of all the children. Mr. Stehlik is very fond of all outdoor pursuits, and is a man whose career with its great promise of success is still largely before him.

EDGAR P. HANEY. One of the best managed and most influential newspapers of North Texas is the Wichita Searchlight, the founder of which is Edgar P. Haney, who has had an active career in journalism and in educational work during the past ten years. Mr. Haney is a young man a little more than thirty, and yet has accomplished many things that stamp him as a man of ability and worthy achievements.

Edgar P. Haney was born at Prospect, in Clay county, Texas, February 3, 1882. His parents were Wallace W and Candace Myria Haney, both of whom were reared in Tennessee, and were among the pioneer settlers of Clay county. Mr. Haney attended the local schools of north Texas, and in May, 1902, was graduated from the Oakland high school at Oakland, Oklahoma. For several consecutive summers he attended summer normals and his first professional experience was in teaching. He spent five years as superintendent of schools at Byers, Texas. During the school sessions of 1907-'08-'09, Mr. Haney was a student in the University of Texas. In the meantime on October 13, 1905, he had established at Wichita Falls the Searchlight and is now president and general manager of the Searchlight Publishing Company, printers and publishers.

Whle his work as a publisher and as teacher has absorbed much of his time, Mr. Hancy has also taken a prominent part in public affairs, particularly in state legislation. He represented the One Hundredth District two terms in the lower house of the legislature, being first elected in 1910, and re-elected in 1912. At Austin, Mr. Haney was chairman of the committee on education during the thirty-second legislature, and during the thirty-third session was chairman of constitutional amendments. To his credit must be assigned the authorship of the text book law, the rural high school law, and the bill raising the scholastic age. All of these are progressive measures increasing the efficiency and scope of Texas educational system. In politics Mr. Haney is what is called a Progressive Democrat. He has membership in the Texas Press Association, and fraternally has been a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows since 1904, having served as district deputy from 1908-1909. He is also affiliated with the Woodmen of the World, the Modern Woodmen of America, and the Knights of Pythias. Mr. Haney and family worship in the Methodist Episcopal Church south,

At his native town of Prospect in Clay county, on June 25, 1902. Mr. Haney married a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Blalack, of Prospect, her parents having been pioneers of Clay county. Mr. and Mrs. Haney have known each other since infancy, were reared in the same neighborhood and attended the same local school. Their three children are: Leo Draper Haney, aged ten;

Gladys Fae Haney, age six; and Mary Louise Haney, age two.

JOSEPH E. DANIEL, M. D. A physician and surgeon Wichita Falls, Dr. Daniel is a native Texan, was reared in the northeastern part of the state, and has been actively identified with his profession for more than ten vears.

Joseph E. Daniel was born in Red River country, Texas, May 31, 1875, a son of W. C. and Mary (Parker) Daniel. At Clarksville Texas, resides his parents, his father at the age of seventy-eight and his mother at the age of seventy-three, both bale and hearty old people, who have well carried the responsibilities of life, and have been blessed with a large family. They had fifteen children, of whom the doctor was one of twins, and the tenth in order of birth. The father and mother were both born in Georgia, and after the Civil war moved to Texas and located in Red River country. That was before the first railroad line was built through that section of the state; and stock raiser. During the Civil war he enlisted in the Seventeenth Louisiana Regiment, served from the beginning to the end, and was never wounded. He fought at Shiloh, was at the Siege of Vicksburg, and participated in many other engagements of that long and bloody war.

Dr. Daniel was reared in Red River county, attended the local schools, and then lived at home and by hard work obtained part of the means which enabled him to complete his preparation for his profession. He'entered the Memphis Medical College, where he was graduated the Memphis Medical College, where he was graduated work at New Orleans in 1903, and in 1907. His first practice was in his home county of Red River, where he remained for five years. He then moved to Olney, where he spent another five years and built up an excellent business. In 1910 be came to Wichita Falls, and has smee come into favor of a great many residents of this vicinity. He has membership in the Wichita County Medical Society and the State Medical Society. His fraternal affiliations are with the Knights of Pythias, the Independent Order Odd Fellows, and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. His church is the Methodist Episcopal South, and in politics he is a Democrat. Besides his private practice Dr. Daniel serves the Wichita Southern Life Insurance Company as its medical director.

At Ohey, Texas, December 19, 1909, Dr. Daniel married Miss Estella Campbell, a daughter of W. T. and Frances (Wolf) Campbell. The parents of Mrs. Daniel still live at Ohey, and were formerly residents of Lamar county.

CLIFFORD BRAIN, Although Clifford Braly is one of the younger attorneys in Dalhart, Texas, he is one of the most successful and popular, not only in Dalhart, but also in this section of the state. A professional man who has started out a poor boy in life must always be credited with an unusual amount of courage and perseverance, for the way of the student who would become a lawyer or a doctor is long and wearisome, and what is perhaps of more importance, expensive. That clifford Braly won his struggle by his own efforts, is only another way of saying that he has the qualities necessary to success. A hard and close student, a brilliant lawyer, and a conscientious business man, Mr. Braly has made a high place for bimself in Dalhart.

Clifford Braly is a native of Texas, having been born in Milam county, on the 12th of July, 1881. His father W. T. Braly came to Texas in 1880, when the state was just beginning to attract attention. He is a farmer and is living in Milam county, Texas, having reached the age of fifty-six. He married Mary Louise Frierson, who was born in Lee county, Mississippi, he himself also being a native of that state. Mrs. Braly is now aged fifty and lives with her husband in Milam county. Of the six children born to this union Clifford Braly was the eldest child.

When the lad was old enough be was sent to the common schools of Milana county, and after completing the work offered in their curriculum, he left school temporarily, and entered the attorney general's oldered at Austin. Here he remained for five years and during this time he studied law. At the end of this period he matriculated in the law department of the University of Virginia, where he was a student for one year. He then returned to Austin, this being in 1965, and entered the land office, serving here for several months. He next entered the treasury department and served under state treasurer Robbins and remained here from the fall of 1905 to June, 1906. In 1905 he entered the University of Texas attending lectures as many hours as possible when not on duty in the State Treasurer's office. After finishing his examination in June, he was nominated for the state-legislature to which he was elected during that year 1906.

He served in this thirtieth legislature which convened in July, 1907, as the flotorial representative from Milam and Robertson counties for one term. In the fall of 1907, he came to Amarillo, Texas, and began the practice of law. He was thus engaged until 1908, during the summer which year he removed to Dalhart, and there he has been living ever since. He has built up a flourishing practice and has won many friends since coming to this section. In connection with a general law practice, Mr. Braly together with his associate, W. B. Chauneey, are the local attorneys for the Fort Worth and Denver City Railway Company for Dallam and Hartley counties. He has interested himself in business matters to the extent of being vice-president of the Rowe Hardware Company, one of the important firms of Dalhart.

In polities Mr. Braly is a Democrat and has always taken a keen interest in the welfare of his party. He is a member of the national college fraternity, Sigma Alpha Epsilon, and belongs to the Arrowhead Club at the State University. He is also a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks and the Knights of Pythias.

On the 14th of June, 1910, Mr. Braly was married to Aliss Mabelle Allison Considine, at Amarillo, Texas. Mrs. Braly is a daughter of Thomas J. and Angela Considine, who are living in Amarillo, where Mr. Considine is director of the United States Weather Bureau. Two sons, Clifford Braly, Jr., and Thomas Considine have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Braly, the elder born on the 16th of May, 1911, in Dalhart, and the younger October 12, 1913.

Harry Pokter Noake. In that group of business men who might be accounted the founders and upbuilders of El Paso's commercial prosperity during the last thirty years, the late Harry Porter Noake had a conscience mark. Mr. Noake came to this city a quarter of a century ago, at an early period in its modern progress, and established here a manufacturing plant, which under his supervision and active control became one of the largest and most prosperous of the kind in the southwest, and at which he continued to be the head until his death.

Harry Porter Noake, whose death occurred at his home in El Paso October 8, 1911, was born at St. Thomas, Camada, May 13, 1853. The family moved to near Cleveland when he was a boy, and in that city he grew up and attained his education. At an early age he was apprenticed to learn the earliage manufacturing rade, and became thoroughly skilled in that work. After a considerable experience in his regular line of manufacturing, Mr. Noake came to El Paso in 1888, and in this young western city established the H. P. Noake Carriage Manufacturing. That industry absorbed the greater part of his time and energy for more than twenty years and its success was largely a monument to his ability as a business builder.

In Socorro, New Mexico, on July 31, 1884, Mr. Noake married Miss Elvenie McGalliard, a daughter of H. D. and Carrie (Zeigler) McGalliard. Her father was born in Franklin, Warren county, Obio, in June, 1837, and her mother is a native of Gettysburg, Pennsylvania, but they were married at Troy, Ohio. The mother and father are still living, making their home in El Paso. The one child of Mr. and Mrs. Noake is now Mrs. Carrie Adine Stafford, wife of T. J. Stafford of El Paso, where he is engaged in the banking business. The late Mr. Noake was affiliated with the Masonic Order through the thirtytwo degrees of Scottish Rite and York Rite, and the various subordinate branches, and was also a member of the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks. In politics he always maintained an independent attitude. A branch of his retail and wholesale business was maintained in Chihuahua, Mexico. At the time of his death, Mr. Noake had become one of the wealthy men of the city. and left his family in very comfortable circumstances. By his large business operations he had become well known over a wide extensive country throughout the southwest, and while admired for his business success he was likewise esteemed for the thorough integrity which accompanied and characterized all of his transactions and relations with the business world, Elmore Patrick Greenwood. A degree of success in business such as most men attain only at the high tide of their career has been vouchsafed to Mr. Greenwood before completing his thirties. He began to lay the foundation of success when a boy, borrowing money in order to complete his schooling, and working bard for every stage of advancement. His steady persistence has won him a place among the representative business men of North Texas, with the best part of his life before him in which to magnify his success. Mr. Greenwood is now active vice president and general manager of the Wichita Southern Life Insurance Company, and is well known among insurance circles throughout the southwest.

Elmore Patrick Greenwood was born at Cassville, in Barry county, Missouri, August 4, 1875, and is of Scotch-Irish ancestry. His father, John F. Greenwood, was born in Bentonville, Arkansas, and during the Civil war moved to Missouri. He was a Confederate during the war, and was a son of a distinguished Arkansas citizen. Grandfather Alfred B. Greenwood was for eight years a representative in congress from the northern district of Arkansas, and during President Buchanan's administration served as commissioner of Indian affairs. F. Greenwood, was a blacksmith by trade, but followed the lumber business for many years, and in 1877 came to Texas, settling in Red River county, where he still has his home. He is a Democrat in politics. The maiden name of his wife was Miss Florence Wright, who was born in Lynchburg, Virginia, and who died in Red River county at the age of forty-seven, in February, 1896. There were eleven children, of whom Elmore P. was the fourth.

As a boy he spent all his years in Red River county. grew up in the country, attended the common schools, and later secured the means to complete his education in a high school. At the age of eighteen he started out for himself, qualifying for teaching, and practiced that profession with success and ability in Hopkins county for seven years. During that time he took up the study of law for two years, but never entered the profession, which did not prove thoroughly tasteful to him. From teaching he entered the life insurance field as a country solicitor. He first wrote business for the Equitable Life of New York. He began in life insurance in 1903, and from the beginning showed exceptional adaptability and successful powers in that line. From a country solicitor he went ahead, was soon known as one of the largest business getters in Texas, and eventually became the chief spirit in the organization of the Wichita Southern Life Insurance Company, of which he has since been active vice president and general manager. He devoted all his time and attention to this company, and its record is one of which both he and the entire city of Wichita Falls may well be proud.

Mr. Greenwood is a Democrat in politics, and when twenty years old, and while teaching school, served a term as justice of the peace in Hopkins county. He resigned from the office before the expiration of his term. Fraternally he is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias Lodge at Sulphur Springs, with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows at Sulphur Springs. He is also an influential member of the Chamber of Commerce, and is on the board of stewards of the Methodist Church South in Wichita Falls

November 12, 1899, at Pine Forest, in Hopkins county, he married Miss Edna E. Minter, a native of Texas, and a daughter of R. A. and Susan E. Minter, who came from Georgia, and were among the early settlers of Hopkins county. The three children born to Mr. and Mrs. Greenwood are: Ruby Ethel, born December 31, 1900, at Pine Forest; Patrick Minter, born October 4, 1906, in Sulphur Springs; and Elizabeth, born August 10, 1908, at Sulphur Springs.

JAMES C. A. GUEST, M. D. With professional connections of the highest order, Dr. Guest, since 1906, has become one of the leading physicians and surgeons of Wichita Falls. His ability and experience are backed by a talent for making one's services count for the most profitable, so that his success has never been a matter

James C. A. Guest was born in the state of Texas at Kingston, December 13, 1873, He is a son of Joseph J. and Mary T. (Williams) Guest, the father a native of Texas, and the son of a pioneer, and the mother a native of Arkausas. The father is a lumber dealer, and a successful man, and now has his home at Haskell, is a Democrat in politics, and is a member of the Methodist Church South. The mother is also still living. The oldchildren, Dr. James C. A. Guest received his early education in the public schools of Celeste, and also attended high school, and in 1903 was graduated M. D. from the Memphis Hospital Medical College. Immediately on graduating he began practicing at Lingleville, Texas, where he was in practice for three years, and in the fall of 1906 moved to Wichita Falls where he has since enjoyed a large general practice. In 1910, he took post graduate work in the New Orleans Polyclinic. He is a member of the Wichita County Medical Society, the Texas State Medical Society, and is examiner for a number of insurance companies, in-cluding the Amicable of Waco, the Guarantee Life of Houston, the Great Southern Insurance Company, the San Antonio Life Insurance Company, and is also examiner for the Woodmen and the Woodmen's Circle, and for the Wichita Southern Life Insurance Company. Fraternally the doctor is well known as a member of Masonry, and has taken all the degrees of the York Rite including the Mystic Shrine, belongs to the Eastern Star, the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Knights of Pythias, the Woodmen of the World, and the Knights and Ladies of Honor. His connections with social and official activities comprise also membership in the local Chamber of Commerce. He is a steward and has served during the past year as chairman of the Board of Stewards of the Methodist Episcopal Church South at Wichita Falls.

At Sulphur Springs, Texas, June 28, 1897, Dr. Guest-married Miss Minnie May Sweeton. Mrs. Guest was born in Tennessee, but was reared and educated in Texas, her father being Rev. J. M. Sweeton. Their one son James Wilbur, was born in Wichita Falls, February 3, 1913. Dr. Guest owns a comfortable home at 1602 Tenth Street, and his offices are in the Kemp-Kell Building.

REV. CONSTANTINE MARTIN BEYER, paster of St. Paul's Lutheran Church, Wichita Falls, Texas, was born August Launerin Cauren, Wichia Falis, Icaas, wis norn August 24, 1882, at Altenburg, Perry county, Missouri, son of George M. and Sarah (Kramer) Beyer, the former a native of Bavaria and the latter of Saxony. George M. Beyer was brought to America by his parents about 1851, when about eight months of age, and was reared and educated at Fort Wayne, Indiana, where his parents settled. His whole life has been devoted to the work of teaching. For forty-three years he was a parochial school teacher at Altenburg, the cradle of the Missouri Synod of the Lutheran Church, and the past ten years he has been retired, still living at Altenburg. wife was about one year old when she came to America. with her parents, their settlement being at Altenburg, where she was reared and married and where she is still living. They became the parents of twelve children, of whom Constantine M. was the eleventh born and is one of the nine now living.

Constantine M. Beyer received his primary education in the parochial school, under his father's instruction, and remained at Altenburg until he was fifteen. At that age he was sent to Concordia College at Fort Wayne, Indiana, where he spent six years, and following which term he took a theological course at Concordia Seminary, St. Louis, Missouri. He graduated at the last named institution in the spring of 1906, and in September of that year he entered the ministry and took charge of the mission field extending from Big Spring to Abilene, Texas. After five years of efficient work there, he was transferred to his present charge at Wichita Falls. He is the fourth pastor of this church, which now has a membership of 145, and which under his pastorate is in a flourishing condition.

Mr. Beyer is an aggressive worker and exerts an influence for good that touches alike the old and the young people of his own congregation and also is felt outside his own immediate charge. Ardent sincere earnestness characterizes all his work. He resides at 1411 Eleventh street, Wichita Falls, and is enthusiastic over the future outlook for this city. Mr. Beyer is unmarried.

G. C. Davis. All his life G. C. Davis has spent in Texas, where he was born in Robertson county, on December 31, 1884, and in consideration of his early advantages, or the lack of them, it must be conceded that he has made an exceptional use of such opportunities as came knocking at his door. He is today, by common consent, regarded as the leading real estate operator in these parts, and he is known to be a genuine builder and booster, sparing no efforts to further the progress of his town and county. He was only twenty-two years of age when he first identified himself with real estate activities in Byers. Having been up to that time occupied in the operation of his mother's stock farm in Archer county, the young man proved that he had within him qualities that ever make for success, and he has forged rapidly ahead in the years that have passed. G. C. Davis is the son of John E. and Mollie (Simmons) Davis, both natives of the state of Georgia. In 1882 the father came to Texas, and all his life he was engaged in farming. He died in 1899, when he was only fifty-one years old, and is buried in Archer county. He met and married his wife in Georgia, and she died in July, 1911, aged about sixty-eight years. She was a lifelong member of the Primitive Baptist church and was a devout churchwoman and a genuine Christian character. Seven children were born to John and Mollie Davis, and of that number G. C. is the youngest.

The public schools of his native community afforded to G. C. Davis such education as he received, and he did not extend his attendance thereon beyond the age of seventeen years. From then until he was twentytwo years of age he remained at home and busied himself with the care of his mother's stock farm after the death of his father in 1899, and in 1906, he came to Byers, here becoming identified with the real estate business in which he has since continued with much success. In addition to that department of his business, Mr. Davis also operates throughout the county as an insurance man.

Mr. Davis is the owner of some exceptionally valuable farm lands in and about the county, and is everywhere recognized as one of the most enterprising and successtul young men of the county. Not merely as a coming man, but as one who has already arrived.

A Democrat, as any man should be who writes the initial "C" after the Christiau name of Grover, he gives his moral support to the principles of the party, but is not active in the party ranks save as a voter. He is a member of the Commercial Club, and is especially interested and active in any movement planned to further the best interests of Byers, and with a view to aiding in its growth and prosperity. He and his wife are members at the Methodist Episcopal church.

Mr. Davis was married in Wichita Falls, Texas, on June 15, 1907, to Miss Hattie King, the daughter of I. C. King and his wife, residents of Denton, and of an old Pioneer Texas family. They have had two children Edwin Q., now deceased, and Lucile.

Mr. and Mrs. Davis have an excellent social standing in Byers, where they have a host of good friends who love them for their many excellent traits, and they participate in the representative social activities of the community.

JOHN C. WATTS. In the sudden and tragic death on Sunday morning, July 7, 1912, of John C. Watts, Texarkana lost one of its best loved citizens. Mr. Watts, while prominent and successful in business and civic affairs, was best known to his fellow citizens for the sterling integrity and intrinsic beauty of his character. After his death many were heard to remark that "he was the best man in Texarkana." He possessed to a peculiar degree the very attributes of a good man in the general estimation. He was generous to a fault; his kindness was conspicuous on every occasion; he was never known to hold a grudge. Among all classes of citizenship he was held in affection. The colored people of Texarkana not only respected him, but would do anything in order to serve him and gain his commenda-tion. On the morning of his death Mr. Watts had just placed upon a train his daughter Lizzie who was starting on a visit. As he stepped from the train he was struck and run over by a locomotive in the Cotton Belt yards and was instantly killed. The circumstances of the event were especially grievous to his wife and children, and as a matter of fact, to the entire citizenship of Texarkana.

The late John C. Watts was born in Lowndes county, Alabama, July 22, 1846. He came to Arkansas as a boy with his father who located in Nevada county where he was reared and where he lived until he came to Texarkana on the Texas side, in 1884. He was a very young boy at the beginning of the Civil war and yet he enlisted and gave loyal service as a Confederate soldier, during a part of the long period of hostilities. From the time of his arrival in Texarkana until his death he took a very prominent part in the varied affairs of the city. For several years he was a member of the school board, being president for some time. He was an alderman and at one time city treasurer and a member of the board of equalization. A short time previous to his death he had interested himself as the leading spirit in the organization of the Watts Gin Company, a local enterprise which is the largest plant of its kind in Northeast Texas. Mr. Watts had purchased the equipment and machinery for the gin and was very much interested in its installation. Since his death the gin has been put in operation on West Nineteenth street.

Mr. Watts' residence was the old Eli Moores residence, adjoining the city on the northwest, and for many years he was engaged in farming operations on that estate. The J. C. Watts Addition and the Westmoreland Addition were original parts of the Moores estate. On the 13th of February, 1884, Mr. Watts was united in marriage with Miss Nannie H. Moores, who was born on the old Moores place, which has been her lifelong home, and she with their eight children survive her lamented husband. The names of the children are as follows: Eli M; Lizzie E; John C; Thomas J.; David M; Minerva J.; Moroce and Nannie M.

REBUS R. McANELLY. The name of McAnelly is one than which there is none better known in the history of Texas, and the family has furnished to the Lone Star state men who have been prominent in military and eivil life, in public affairs, in business and in agriculture. Lacking five years, a full century has passed since the founder of the family located here, and during this time those bearing the name have been men of substantiality, progressiveness, courage and public spirit, who have done much to contribute to the advancement of their various communities. A worthy representative of this old Texas family is found in the person of Redus R. McAnelly, of Waco, an energetic and enterprising young business man, who is dealing extensively in real estate and builders' supplies.

Mr. McAnelly was born at Medina, Bandera county, Texas, September 29, 1883, and is a son of Pleasant E. and Mary J. (Redus) McAnelly. His grandfather, Pleas-ant E. McAnelly, was a native of Ireland, who emigrated to the United States in 1820, and located at once in Texas, where he became famous during the days of the Mexican revolution and was also widely known as an Indian fighter. He subsequently turned his attention to ranching, accumulated a handsome property, and at the time of his death, in 1892, when eighty-seven years of age, was one of the substantial men of his community, Pleasant E. McAnelly, son of the founder of the family, was born at Port Lavaca, Calhoun county, Texas, in 1845, and for years was associated with his father in ranching. At the time of the grandfather's death he secured the home ranch, known as the P. M. Ranch, a tract of 4,500 acres located in Medina county, on which he has continued to raise stock, his product now being 1,000 head of cattle, 800 goats and 250 hogs annually. His first home here was a little log cabin, 11x14 feet, lined with deer skins, but about the year 1878 this was replaced by a residence costing $8,000. This is one of the finest homes in Medina county, but Mr. McAnelly still keeps the logs of which his first little home was constructed, as a matter of sentiment and a memento of the old Texas days now gone. Mr. McAnelly was one of the organizers of the commission gathered to stop wire-cutting, and was foreman of the Grand Jury which sent the first crowd of wire-cutters, fourteen in number, to the penitentiary. As a result his life was in constant danger for a number of years thereafter. He is one of the progressive, solid men of his county, ever ready to assist in any movement which promises the advancement of his section, and has won a firm place in the regard and confidence of his fellow citizens. He married Mary J. Redus, who was born in 1859, in Medina county, on the ranch adjoining that on which her busband was born, and she passed away in 1907, having been the mother of eight children, namely: Ernest E., Redus R., Wayman W., Eldo A., Homer C., Gladden C., Paul D. and Stanley M., of whom H. C. is deceased.

Redus R. McAnelly received his early education in the public and high schools of his native locality, and this was supplemented by a course at the University of Chicago, from which institution he was graduated at the age of twenty-three years. At that time he adopted the profession of educator, and for seven years taught in the public schools in various parts of Texas, at the end of which period he laid aside the cap and gown to enter the business arena, as a dealer in builders' sup-plies and real estate. He has been located in Waco since 1913, and now maintains offices at No. 514 Amicable Building. Mr. McAnelly was a successful teacher, and he has been no less a successful business man. He has a thorough knowledge of realty values, is shrewd and farseeing in his transactions, and wins the confidence of those with whom he has transactions through his thoroughly honorable methods. He has large holdings in realty, which include a residence at No. 1709 Columbus street, a residence and building block at Devine, Texas, four vacant lots at San Antonio, five vacant lots at Houston and one lot at Corpus Christi. His hobby may be said to be trading. Mr. McAnelly is fond of all outdoor sports, like most virile Texans, and is an enthusiastic motorist, frequently taking long trips with his family. He is a member of the Young Men's Business League, and misses no opportunity of advancing the commercial and industrial interests of his adopted city. In politics he is a Democrat, but public life has held out no attractions to him. With his family, he attends the Methodist church, and has been liberal in his support of its movements. During his residence in Waco he has formed a wide acquaintance, and his friendships are numerous both in business and social circles.

On August 17, 1911, at Waco, Mr. McAnelly was united in marriage with Miss Ada Coleman, daughter of Mrs. A. P. Coleman, and one son has come to this union: Redus Rolaud. Mr. McAnelly's unde, Capit Charles McAnelly, is well remembered as a captain of Rangers, and became very prominent during the early days of the activities of that famous organization.

Daniel C. Bellows, postmaster of Seymour, Texas, has held this important position for a number of years, and during his period of service he has given the utmost satisfaction to both the public and the government. Mr. Bellows was born in Texas and has spent practically all of his life in the state, in consequence of which he has that love for his state which native Texans always seem to possess, and is always active in every movement that has the improvement and advancement of his state as its end.

Mr. Bellows was born in Lavaca county, Texas, on the 22nd of November, 1854, the son of Daniel C. Bellows, senior. The latter was born and reared in Ohio afterwards moving to Louisiana where he lived for a time. He later moved to Texas where he lived for many years. For over thirty-five years he taught school in this state, being a very highly educated man, of varied training, some of the subjects in which he was especially learned being, law medicine and phrenology. He was highly respected and universally liked and his devotion to his family and friends was often commented upon. He died in 1880 at the age of sixty-five and is buried in Crockett county. He married after he came to Texas to live, his wife being Miss Henrietta Berry, a native of Texas. She and her husband were both active members of the Christian church. Eight children were born to Daniel C. Bellows, Sr. and his wife of whom Daniel C. Bellows, Jr., was the next to the elect child and the eldest son.

Daniel C. Bellows received his elementary education in the public schools of Texas and Louisiana, his parents moving to Louisiana when he was a small hoy. They only lived two years in the latter state and he completed his education in his native state. He was fifteen years for age when he had to leave school and go to work. He began life on the farm and for thirty years followed farming. He later went into the stock raising business and followed this for a few years. It was in 1906 that he was appointed postmaster of Seymour and he has since been re-appointed, now serving in his second term.

Mr. Bellows is a member of the Republican party and takes a keen interest in polities, chiefly concerning himself, however, with national affairs.

In religious matters Mr. Bellows is a member of the Baptist church and in the fraternal world he is a member of the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons. He is fond of out door life and his special joy is to listen to a good public speaker, and the speaker must be good indeed to satisfy Mr. Bellows.

On the 14th of January, 1875, Mr. Bellows was married at West, McLennan county, Texas, to Miss Juda Claia Bennett, a daughter of Walter and Mary Bennett, of McLennan county. Seven children, five sons and two daughters, have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Bellows. The eldest, Oscar, is a traveling man. Daniel Short, who is married, resides in Fort Worth, where he is in the commission business. Lem is married and resides in Seymour. Roy Robertson lives in Fort Worth and is also engaged in the commission business. Mary Henrietta, Martha and Dwight are all living at home.

DR. WILLIAM M. TAYLOR. A man who has the real liking and respect of the citizens of Goree, Texas, and the surrounding country, not only on account of his professional ability but also because of his personal charfessional ability but also because of his personal char-acteristics, is Dr. William M. Taylor, a physician and surgeon of the above mentioned place. Dr. Taylor is one of the most successful medical practitioners in this section of the state but unlike so many of his busy profession, he finds time to interest himself in matters of interest to the people about him. He is a public spirited and broad minded man and is one of the active workers toward the improvement and upbuilding of this part of Texas.

Dr. Taylor was born in Rock Mills, Alabama, on the 28th of July, 1877, but he was reared under the influences of a city, for when he was only four years of age his parents moved to Atlanta, Georgia, where he grew to manhood. He attended the public schools of Atlanta, and after leaving school followed various occupations until he was twenty-one years of age. He then entered the Georgia College of Eclectic Medicine and Surgery at Atlanta. He was graduated from this in-Surgery at Atlanta. He was graduated from fins in-stitution in 1902 and began practice immediately in Newton county, Georgia. After practicing in this county for four years the doctor came to Goree and established a practice here. He now has a large practice and is one of the prominent men of his profession in this part of the state.

Very often physicians of good practical ability lack the mental power necessary to grasp the theoretical side of their work, and vice versa, and in both cases the man so hampered has little chance of success. Dr. Taylor is not only a physician of the common sense school but he is also a brilliant scholar as was shown during his college days when as a student he held the chair of materia medica at his alma mater for a year.

Dr. Taylor is a member of the Baptist church, and in politics he belongs to the Democratic party, but he takes little active part in political affairs. He is a member of the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons, belong-He is a meming to the Blue Lodge, the Chapter and the Council, and he is at present Master of the Blue Lodge in Goree. He is also a member of the Woodmen of the World. He has always been an active member of the Commercial Club, having been one of the board of directors at one time. He is also deeply interested in the advancement of education in this section and is one of the valuable members of the school board of Goree.

Dr. Taylor was married in Staveville, Georgia, to Miss Gladney Thompson. She died on the 4th of May, 1908. Dr. Taylor married again after the death of his wife, the marriage taking place in Goree, Texas, on the 29th of June, 1909, and the bride being Miss Chloe Malaney, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Malaney of Goree.

Dr. Taylor says that in his opinion Texas is a great state and the best place of which he knows for a young man to come and settle. He thinks that the future shows nothing but sunshine and brightness and that the man who can live in Texas is one of the fortunate ones of this earth.

RALPH S. SHUFFLER. As editor and publisher of the Olney Enterprise, Ralph S. Shuffler is one who knows full well the value of printers' ink, and does what he can to impress that knowledge upon the minds of tentative advertisers. His own advertising is typical of his deep understanding of the subject, and he has done much through the columns of his paper to educate the mind of the public in these matters. He has been identified with newspaper work practically all his life, or since he first undertook the responsibility for his livelihood, and he was variously located in the printing business until 1910 when he came to Olney and estabbusiness until 1310 when he came to one; and established the Enterprise, later consolidating it with the Oracle, another local paper. The Enterprise, since that consolidation, has claimed the best equipped plant in these parts, and is beyond all question one of the most up-to-date establishments of its kind in the county.

Born in Garland, Texas, on October 3, 1888, Ralph S. Shuffler is the son of the Rev. Columbus M. Shuffler, who was born in North Carolina, and was in his earlier days a farmer. Later he became a Methodist minister. He died in 1910 aged fifty-nine years and is buried at Olney. He married Huldah Henderson, a native daughter of Texas, their marriage taking place in this state, and she now makes her home with Mr. Shuffler, of this review. He is one of the two children born to his parents, and is the only one surviving.

Ralph S. Shuffler has lived in Texas all his life thus far and gained his early education in the schools of Texas. He followed his high school course with an advanced course in a Polytechnic school in Fort Worth, and then turned his attention to the printing business, which has claimed him from then until now. He served his apprenticeship in newspaper work on the Comanche Chief, under Sydney J. Thomas, lately of Austin but now deceased. In 1904 Mr. Shuffler established the Plainview News and ran the paper for three years, when he sold out and went to Baird, and there organized a stock company to establish the Callahan County News. which he ran successfully for eighteen months. In April, 1910, he came to Olney, here establishing the Enterprise and in July of the following year he bought the Oracle. another local paper, and the consolidation of the two has resulted in producing one of the best country newspapers in the county. His plant is known to be equipped more excellently than any other in this part of the state, and his paper circulates widely in these parts. According to his sworn statement, his weekly circulation is 1,412 copies exclusive of free copies mailed to advertisers, exchanges, etc. As he himself says in his advertising, it is customary to take a country publisher's statement of circulation "with a grain of salt," but occasionally one circulation willing to offer a sworn statement,—a fact that should properly impress the buying and selling public, and usually does. In addition to his publication of the Enterprise, Mr. Shuffler runs a perfectly equipped job printing plant, and a general job printing business is carried on here.

Mr. Shuffler is a member of the Methodist church and is especially prominent in church circles. Pythian Knight, fraternally speaking, and is Past Chancellor of the local lodge. A Democrat, he takes an active and highly influential part in the political affairs of the county, and though he has never held office, his work has always been of a high order and especially valuable to the party. He is enthusiastic on the subject of baseball, and is manager of the local ball team, while he confesses to a fondness for the game of tennis as well. His particular mission on earth, he claims in his jocular way, is that of advertising the resources and possibilities of West Texas, and he is doing a most worthy work along that line, as many will witness.

On December 24, 1907, Mr. Shuffler was married to Miss Carrie Duke Henderson, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. R. N. Henderson, of Greenwood, Virginia, and they have one child.—Ralph H. Shuffler.

In further mention of the parentage of the subject, it should not be omitted that Rev. Columbus M. Shuffler was a very prominent man in church circles. He was a member and secretary of the Board of Church Extension of the Northwestern Texas Conference, at one time and at the time of his death he was in the service of the church as traveling missionary evangelist of that conference. In northwest Texas, where he did much of his work, he was especially well known and loved. He never took an active part in polities, but what he 4d was in the interests of the Anti-Saloon League, and he campaigned for one year in that enterprise under the direction of Sterling P. Strong. His influence in the state was a most praiseworthy one, and while his son is acting along different lines in his work in the interests of Texas, the results are no less pleasing and worthy of the men who are putting forth valiant efforts in the development and upbuilding of the state.

ELI HARRISON MOORES. Mrs. John C. Watts is a daughter of Texarkana's most eminent pioneer citizen, the first settler in this part of the state. A native of Fairfield district in South Carolina, where he was born in April, 1815, he came with his father, Charles Moores, to Bowie county, Texas, in 1840. That is the year which marked principally the beginning of settlement and development in all the Red River Valley, and not a family was more prominently or closely connected with the early pioneer life and the development in this sec-tion of the state than the Moores. Eli Moores family located on the south of the future city of Texarkana. though it was thirty-three years later before any town development began there. Eli Moores bought the land on which a part of the city now stands and the consideration passed in this transaction was a voke of oxen and a wagon. When the town finally began to extend out over his land a number of years later, Mr. Moores took a very liberal stand in promoting development and especially the establishment of the religious institutions, He donated a large sized lot to every church society which desired to build in the new town. For many years before the war he and his hrother were noted as the largest land owners in east Texas.

Eli H. Moores married Miss Minerva Janes, who also represented a pioneer family in this part of the country, but their settlement was on the Arkansas side. She was born at Fisher Prairie, Arkansas, January 13, 1829, and died in 1867. Mr. Moores died at his home in Texarkana, March 4, 1884. Of the eight by himself and wife all have passed away except Mrs. John C. Watts. The names of the seven now deceased were: Charles H.; William M.; Eli H.; Thomas B.; Sallie B.; Minerva J. and Mary.

Lawson C. Counts. The term self-made, hackneyed though it is, is yet sufficiently expressive of certain things to permit its application to men who have accomplished worthily in the face of heavy odds. It is therefore no misamplication and means exactly what it implies in the case of Lawson C. Counts, who has reached his present position in life as a result of his own efforts, unaided and unsupported by others. Today he takes his place among the more successful lawyers of the district, and since he came to Oincy in 1909 he has enjoyed a particularly liberal clientels and gained the good will and regard of the entire community. Born in Madisson county, Arkansas, on October 6, 1871, Lawson C. Counts is a son of George Washington and Clara (Jeffries) Counts.

Lawson Counts gained his education under somewhat adverse circumstances, the public schools of Arkansas affording him his early training, and he was fortunate enough to continue with his high school course to completion. His dream of a college training, however, was made possible only by his own activities, and he himself earned the money in teaching school that supplied his professional training. He was twenty-one years old when he first came to Texas, having been engaged in school teaching for three terms prior to that, and settling in Collin county, this state, he again applied himting in conin county, this state, he again applied himself to pedagogic work, for which he possessed a singular aptitude, and indeed, the only work for which he was fitted. He continued thus for six years, spending his annual summer vacation delving into the study of law in the various law schools of the state, and supplementing his summer training with judicious reading during the school year. It was in this manner that he laboriously gained his admission to practice in the state of Texas, and when after six years of alternate teaching and studying in Collin county, he moved to Ochil-tree, he engaged in the practice of law and there established for three years. During this time he further supplemented his law studies by attendance at the Lebauon Law School for a year. He then went to Shamrock, in Wheeler county, continuing in practice there for a year, and in 1909 came to Olney, where he established himself in a general practice that grows with each succeeding season. He has taken his proper place in the political activities of the place as a Demo-erat, and as the representative of that party he was in 1910 appointed to the office of city attorney, wherein he gave excellent service.

Mr. Counts was married in Collin county, Texas, on June 22, 1898, to May Millican, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. F. M. Millican, one of the old pioneer families of Collin county, where they have a host of good friends and where they are widely and favorably known. Five children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Counts, as follows: Austin, Velman, Alton, Lona May and Lasena. Mr. Counts is fraternally identified by his connection

Mr. Counts is fraternally identified by his connection with the Knights of Pythias, in which he has held office at times, and he and his wife take a leading part in the best social activities of their town. In the matter of religion, both he and his wife rac interested in Christian Science. On the counts is especially enthusiastic incomparison of the country of th

JAMES E. MURRIE. If James E. Murrie would tell the story of his struggles to succeed the tale would prove fully as interesting as any of the stories with which we attempt to arouse the ambitions of the younger generation. Now the president of one of the most prosperous hanking bouses of Seymour, Texas, Mr. Murrie was thrown on his own resources at the early age of thirteen, and was not only his own support but also the head of a family. Courage and strength of character carried him over many obstacles that would have downed a weaker man and his honesty and uprightness won friends for him on every side.

James E. Murrie was born in Quitman, Texas, on the 12th of February, 1856, and has spent all of his life in his native state. His father, Robert S. Murrie, was born in North Carolina, but came to Texas hefore he was twenty. Here he followed farming and stock raising, and also conducted a saddlery and harness making business. He was an expert saddle maker and had the Civil war not intervened his family would not have had to face hard times in all probability. He enlisted in the Confederate service, however, and after two years he died in the service, his death taking place on December 31, 1862, when he was but thirty-one years of age. He married Miss Rebecca Martin, who was a native of Texas, and their marriage took place in this state. She died on the 25th of February, 1893, at the age of sixty. Miss. Murrie was a member of the Methodist church and her husband was a member of the Presbyterian. They had five children and of these James E. Murrie was the eldest. His maternal grandfather was with General Houston in the battle of San Jaeinto and his mother's uncle, whose name was Robbins, was also there and was one of the men who captured Santa Anna.

James E. Murrie received his early education in a private school, and in fact, this was all the education he had, for circumstances forced him to become a wage earner early in life. He has, however, been a great reader and a natural student, and is today a man of culture and education. His father died when he was six years old and at the age of thirteen he took the responsibility of the family upon his young shoulders and started out to earn a living for himself and to aid in the support of his mother and the younger children. He lived at home and worked at anything he could find to do, taking his share in the work of the ranch as soon as he was old enough. At the age of seventeen he left the home ranch and went to work in a cotton gin. He spent the next four years working in the gin during the winter and on the farm in the summer. Then he went to Mineola, Texas, where he began clerking in a store. After seven years of this work, during which he saved his money in the hope that he could start in business for himself, he found himself with enough capital to open a grocery store in Mineola. His grocery business grew and prospered to such an extent that at the end of four years he determined to go into the business on a larger scale and so moved to Seymour where be continued in this business. Fortune, which in this case was hard work and close attention to business, again favored him and his store became one of the leading establishments of this kind in Seymour. After twenty-three years he sold out his business and organized the First Guaranty State Bank. He was elected its president and has been its active head since that time.

Mr. Murrie is a member of the Democratic party but takes no active interest in political questions. He are prominent in the fraternal world, being a member of the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons and of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. In religious matters he is a member of the Bautist church.

Mr. Murrie was married at Fort Griffin, Texas, on the Zish of February, 1883, to Miss Margaret Gregg, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joe Gregg, of Fort Griffin, Mrs. Murrie died on the 2nd of January, 1891, and is buried in Mincola. She was a member of the Methodist buried and Miscola. She was a member of the Methodist March, 1993, Mr. Murrie was married again, his wife being Miss Salome Hargrave, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. H. Hargrave, of Sulphur Bluff, Texas, where the marriage took place. Two children have been born of this union, namely, NG II and Rebecea.

DR. HTGH C. McKINNEY. Though comparatively young in practice, having finished his medical training as lately as 1908. Dr. Hugh C. McKinney is nevertheless regarded as one of the leading physicians of Young county, and one whose future is especially bright. He has applied himself to the duties of his profession in the same ardent and energetic manner that characterized his work during his college career, and it is the men of his ambitious tendencies and combined skill who are inevitably ordained to success in their chosen fields of activity.

Born in Milam. Milam county, Texas, on March 3, 1886, Dr. Hugh C. McKinney is the son of J. M. and Sarah James (McIntyre) McKinney. The father was born in Alabama, and the mother was born in Chapple Hill, Washington county, Texas. When J. M. McKinney was sixteen years of age he made his way alone to Milam county, Texas, and there settled down to farm life. In the years that passed he became well and prominently known in his community and district, and in public life he played a prominent part. For six years he was the representative of the Eleventh Senatorial District, comprising Milam, McLennan and Falls counties, Texas, and he rendered a service in that important capacity that would be sufficient honor for any one individual during his career. He was prominent as a farmer and stockman in Milam county all his days, and he died there on Pebruary 17, 1912, aged seventy years. He was a veteran of the Civil war, and served first with General Hood's brigade, later with the Seventeenth Texas Infantry. He passed through the long period of the war, receiving only one slight wound that incapacitated him for service for a short time, but otherwise experiencing all the horrors of war.

The mother, who still lives in Milam county, was born in Chapple Hill, Texas, in 1843, and spent the best necessary to the parents, and spent the best years of her life in Milam county, where she went to reside upon her marriage. Six daughters and two sons were born to the parents, of which goodly number sons were born to the parents, or which goodly altimote the subject was the youngest born. He received good educational advantages as a boy, and early made his choice of a profession. His literary training was gained in Milam county, and the first year of his medical training in Galveston, in the Medical Department of the State University. He attended the University at Fort Worth for three years, being graduated in 1908 with the degree of Doctor of Medicine. He initiated the practice of his profession in Milam county, remaining there for three years, after which he came to Olney in Young county, and has here been active in his profession, and very successful from every point of view. He has an ever growing and lucrative practice, and has the confidence and high regard of the public, while the medical pro-fession of the county and district regard him as one of the most successful and coming young physicians in Young county. He is a member of the Milam County Medical Society and the State Medical Society as well. Fraternally he is connected with the Masons, as a member of the Chapter, the Council and the Royal Arch Masons. He is also a member of the Woodmen of the World, Politically, Dr. McKinney is a Democrat, but the demands of his profession are such as to preclude the possibility of his taking more than a good citizen's part in the political activities of the district, even were he so disposed in his inclinations.

On December 29, 1909, Dr. McKinney was married to Miss Ruby Elliston, of Temple, Texas, the daughter of J. T. Elliston and his wife,—a well known and highly estemend family of that place. One child has been born to them,—James Elliston McKinney, born in Milam country, on November 29, 1911.

ARRA A. CCOPER. One of the most estimable and ponular young men of this city is found in the person of Arba A. Cooper, postmaster of Olnev since 1910, and prior to that engaged for something like eight years in educational work, in Clay. Boyson and Young counties, Of a strady type, he has done excellent work and most conscientions, in his teaching experience, and when he bromet the duties of the nostmastership of Olney, be brought to his new position the same qualities of stradifastness and integrity that made him a successful and desirable teacher. His place in the community is a most desirable one, and he has a host of excellent friends in the various communities with which he has been identified in former years.

Born in Jackshoro, Texas, on July 22, 1882, Arba A. Cooper is a son of C. C. and Mary (Staats) Cooper, both natives of Illinois, who came to Texas soon after their marriage, locating in Jacksboro in 1880. There the father identified himself with agricultural activities, and continued to be so occupied. He is now living at Jermyn, in Jack country, at the age of fifty-nine, and his faithful wife, who was born in Illinois in 1863, still shares his fortunes. They became the parents of nice hildren, of which Mr. Cooper of this review was the eldest Arba Cooper attended the schools in Jacksboro and was eventually graduated from the high school of that place. His graduation came in 1902, and soon thereafter he identified himself with teaching work, in which he continued to be active for the following eight years. He taught for three years in Clay county, three years at Bryson in Jack county, and a little more than a year in Young county. In 1910, he received the appointment to the office of postmaster of Olney, and he assumed the duties of that office in March, 1910, since which time he has faithfully discharged the duties of the office. He is a Republican in his political faith, and has performed the duties of citizenship wherever he has found himself ever since be attained man's estate. Fraternally, he has membership in the Maccabecs, but has no other social affiliations of that nature.

In December, 1904, Mr. Cooper was married to Sarah Manton, of Bellevue, Texas. She is a daughter of W. J. and Lucy (Manton) Manton, the mother being now deceased. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Cooper: Mary Katherine, born in Bryson, Texas, on July 3, 1907; Robert Manton, also born in Bryson, in 1909; and William Cooper, born in Onley in 1919.

The family takes its place among the best people of Olney, and they enjoy the genuine regard of a wide circle of friends in those localities where they have been known formerly. Mr. Cooper is euthusiastic in his opinion of his adopted state and looks for greater developments than have been yet planned for the great commonwealth of the southwest.

HON, FRANK S. ROBERTS. The average man is seldom brought face to face with the stern realities of life before he has reached years of near maturity. He is generally given the opportunity to make a choice of occupations -allowed to follow his natural inclinations insofar as untoward circumstances do not prevent. Showing an early predilection for one of the learned professions, for one of the various fields open in the marts of trade and commerce, or for the hazardous activities of the political arena, he may be given the chance to develop his talents in his chosen line, and his success or failure rests upon the manner in which he exercises and directs his inherent gifts. It is not the average man, however, who always reaches the highest goal. The records of history and biography distinctly show that many of the men who have achieved distinction, who have grasped the great things of life, the men to whom men have looked, have had their start in comparative obscurity. It would seem that the mere necessity of self support and self protection, which really mean self reliance, develops indwelling power which would probably, under other circumstances, have lain dormant. The man who takes upon bimself the responsibilities of manhood when still in the days of his youth, who bends his every energy toward the accomplishment of those things which chance or inclination has placed before him, and who finally triumphs over all and finds the fruits of victory sweet, is far above the medial individual.

Hon, Frank S. Roberts, Judge of the Twenty-second Judicial District Court, of Lockhart, Fexas, is far from being an average man; his present high position among the judiciary of Texas could not have been attained had he possessed only mediocre talents and ordinary ambitions. When he decided upon a career in the law, he found it necessary that he gain his own education, and in the attainment of his ends he was willing to labor in any honorable capacity, no matter how humble. At all times, in whatever field of endeavor he has found himself, he has continued to be an energetic, forcible and industrious worker, and his career has finally been crowned by the esteem of his fellow men and an enviable position in the calling to which he has so devotedly given his life.

As in the wars the bravest fight, so in the emigration to new sections the bravest travel, and it is for this reason that the great Southwest country has produced so many stalwart, tearless men. Among the pioneers to Texas in 1851 came David Powell Roberts, the grand-father of Judge Roberts. He had been a planter in Mississippi, and on coming to the Lone Star state he settled on Walnut Creek, in Caldwell county, there establishing himself upon a ranch, which he operated until his death. During the war between the states he enlisted in a Texas regiment, and saw active service with the Confederate army along the Gulf. Elias Keeton Roberts, the father of Judge Roberts, was born in Mississippi in 1848, and was a child of three years when he accompanied his parents to Texas. He was educated in the country schools of Caldwell county, adopted the medical profession, completed his studies at Tulane University medical school, at New Orleans, Louisiana, and for many years was a country doctor in Caldwell and Blanco counties. He retired from active practice some ten years ago, and is now living quietly at San Antonio. He married Melvina Sheppard, who was born in Blanco county, Texas, where her mother was also born, her father being a native of Ireland who came to Texas during the days of the Republic. She still survives and resides at San Antonio.

Frank S. Roberts was born November 20, 1877, in Caldwell county, Texas, and early in life evinced that determination of doing and succeeding in his doing that has characterized him through all his undertakings. He was reared on a farm and received his early education in the country school, this being followed by a course at the Lockhart High school, where he was graduated in 1896, although the last year of his term was only made possible by his working his own way. He obtained the position of janitor that year, at a salary of ten dollars per month, and was thus able to complete his course. Following this, he taught school in Wilson county for two years, saving his money with the intention of taking a course at the University of Texas, but unforeseen circumstances found him at San Antonio in 1898, when the Spanish-American War broke out, and he enlisted in the Rough Riders. He presented himself in person to Lieut-Col. Theodore Roosevelt, who assigned him and made him a member of Troop B. Mr. Roberts departed with the regiment to Tampa, Florida, and while in marching order, ready to embark on the transport, to go to Cuba, he was suddenly stricken in the ranks with a fever which developed into measles and later into typhoid, so he could not accompany his regiment to Cuba, much to his disappointment. He remained in the hospital until August, and was then removed to Washington Barracks Hospital, and rejoined his regiment, when it returned, at Montauk Point, Long Island, and was mustered out of the service in October, 1898.

Mr. Roberts then went to Danville, Indiana, with the determination of securing the education so much desired, and there would be a first of the first of the securing the first of the securing law and graduating in August 100 with the degree of Bachelor of Aras and the degree of Bachelor of the securing the securing in the securing in

In 1906 he again took up private practice, but in March, 1908, was appointed by Governor Campbell district attorney of the Twenty-second Judicial District, to complete the unexpired term of James L. Storey. In November, 1910, he was elected to that office for the term of two years, but resigned November 1, 1911. As county attorney and later as district attorney he displayed such a deep and accurate knowledge of the law, that he was considered eminently capable of occupying the bench of the Twenty-second Judicial District, which had previously been occupied by two of the most distinguished jurists of the state, Judges L. W. Moore and H. Teichmueller, and on November 1, 1911, he was appointed by acting Governor Davidson to that office, to succeed Judge Moore, who had died. In November, 1912, he was elected to that position for the full term of four years, the youngest judge in years of any in the state. As district attorney, during his last year in that office, Judge Roberts did not have a single acquittal, having successfully prosecuted every case tried before a jury. In his judicial capacity he has shown himself absolutely impartial in his decisions, weighing carefully both sides and deciding fairly to all interests. One of the rules of his life and which has characterized his work on the bench is as follows: "In all questions he seeks first to determine from the facts upon which side is justice, then to discover and announce the rule that is or ought to be the law to obtain it." He is truly a man of the people, knowing full well of his own experience what it is to fight single-handed against obstacles. Fraternally, Judge Roberts is past master of Lockhart Lodge No. 690, A. F. & A. M., a member of Lockhart Chapter No. 208, R. A. M., and Past Thrice Illustrious master of Lockhart Council, No. 11, R. & S. M.; and also holds membership in Lockhart Lodge No. 52, Woodmen of the World, and Germania Lodge No. 15, Sons of Herman.

Judge Roberts was married in 1899 to Miss Alice Thomas, daughter of W. P. and Elizabeth M. Thomas and the mother is now a resident of Whittier, California One son has been born to this union, George C. Mrs. Roberts' mother was the widow of Henry Swain, who died in Libby Prison. She also lost two brothers during the Civil War, they having been soldiers in the Northern army. She married William Pilton Thomas, a native of Bristol, England, who died. He was a Soldier of Fortune who fought with Garibaddi in Italy, and who came to the United States after the Civil war. Mrs. Thomas was a Pickering of the old Quaker stock, whose ancestors came over the ocean in the Mayflower, this family taking a prominent part in the wind.

From the earliest times the Roberts family has always been pushing toward the frontier. Of Welsh stock, it was founded by a pioneer settler of the Virginia Colony, who was killed by the Indians while engaged in diagring ginseng roots for fever patients. The great-grandfather of Judge Roberts was Nathan Roberts, a Baptist preacher in Alabama and Mississippi, and from him have descended men who have formed the advance guard of American civilization in the great Southwest. A worthy representative of this family, Judge Roberts is upholding its best traditions, and if the past may be taken as a criterion of the future he has still far to go in the making of the history of his native state.

LYCURGUS W. PORTER. A resident of Texas since 1872, Lycurgus W. Porter has in the passing years experienced a variety of life in the great southwestern commonwealth. Parming and the eartle business in its various aspects occupied a good many years, and it was in 1910 that he first identified himself with life in Petrolia, when he established himself in the livery business. He retired from business, however, in 1913, and has since lived retired from active business pursuits. He devotes practically all his time to his administration of the office of mayor, to which he was elected in the spring of 1913, and in which he has already demonstrated his fitness for public service of that order. He has long been one to give considerable attention to the matter of civic life in his locality, and at one time, while a resident of Baylor county, he was overseer of highways for ten years, as a result of which many miles of good roads in the county are directly accredited to him.

Mr. Porter is a native of Missouri, his birth occurring in that state on June 10, 1851, and he is a son of Ezekiel H. and Mandina H. Porter. They were native Kentekians, and for years the father was identified with farming in Missouri. He was a successful and prospersous farmer and a man of some position in his community, both he and his wife being devout church-people. The father is buried in Texas, while the mother died in Missouri and is there buried.

Up to the time when he was twenty-one years of age Lycurgus W. Porter obediently remained on the home farm, where he was his father's main assistant. His schooling was not elaborate in its scope and nature, being confined to the country schools of the community where he was reared, and when he reached his legal majority he answered the call of the world to young manhood, and set out upon his own responsibility. He came to Texas in 1872 and went to work on the cattle ranges of the state, that field offering a sure employment to young and inexperienced men. For ten years he continued in the cattle business, and in those years he drove cattle through numerous states, including Kansas and Nebraska. He prospered in his work, and in 1882 he bought a farm in Baylor county, Texas, and he carried on a successful farming enterprise until 1907. He then went to Belleview and bought a farm and operated there until 1910, when he sold it, and came to Petrolia. He operated on a generous plan, and his profits were unfailing with each season. He finally disposed of his farming interests and in 1910 chose the town of Petrolia as a suitable location for the enterprise he had in mind, and in that year he established the livery business in which he was so successful and which he has now relegated to his son's sole charge and supervision, himself having retired from all business activities. In the years that he devoted to business Mr. Porter amassed considerable wealth, and he is regarded as one of the financially stable men of the city and county.

The status of the man in his recently chosen community is that of a leader in every worthy enterprise that is inangurated within the limits of the city. He is quite generally known as the Peacemaker of Petrolia, and he is the friend of all, and all are his friends. The people bring him their problems of life and seek his advice on matters of moment to them, and no man in the community has a greater following among all classes than he. He has made good, in common parlance, in everything he has undertaken. In his ranching and farming business, he was undeniably successful, as success is measured by the amassing of property. In his public eareer he has given excellent service in every office the people have called him to, and now, when he has retired from business life and is giving his sole attention to the administration of his office of mayor of Petrolia, he has the esteem and confidence of all.

For nearly forty years a member of the Methodist Episcopal chuch, Mr. Porter is one of the active churchmen of the community. His family also have membership in that body.

On Christmas Day, in 1881, Mr. Porter was married in Baylor county, Texas, where he long made his home, to Miss Mary N. Moon, the daughter of R. J. Moon, formerly of Alabama. To them were born eight children four sons and four daughters—named as follows: Rolla, deceased; Harley L.; Attrice B.; Jola; Lawrence; Verda; Boyd and Cleta.

The family have a leading social position in Petrolia, and have a host of genuine friends in the city and county.

FRANCIS CATES FORD, M. D. It is now thirty years since Dr. Ford began his practice at Nacogdoches. His career as a member of the Texas Medical profession is even longer, since he earned his degree and began practice in the state in 1873. In his profession he has been known as a man always apace with the progress of his great science, and by post-graduate work and private study, has never suffered severely from competition by younger men. Both his family and his personal record are interesting subjects for biographical mention, Francis Cates Ford was born in Newton county, Texas, September 17, 1849. The forefathers were descended from the Stuarts of Scotland, came over the ocean and founded a home among the American Indians, and as early settlers of South Carolina joined the fighting forces under General Marion, and lent their aid in effecting in-dependence for the colonies. The grandfather of Dr. Ford was John Ford, a South Carolina planter and slave holder, who subsequently moved to Hinds county, Mississippi, where he died. His children were: Joseph and Samuel, who were long identified with the profession of law at Shreveport, Louisiana; Washington, who died in Mississippi; Catherine, who married Mr. Wommack and died at Shreveport; and Sarah, who became the wife of Rev. Thomas Griffin, the latter having been a prominent factor in the separation of the Methodist church into Northern and Southern branches, and was one of the fathers of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Rev. David Ford, the father of Dr. Ford, was a Methodist minister, was born in the Marion district of South Carolina in 1806, and came to Texas in the early forties while the Republic was still in existence. He had a liberal education, and it is believed that he was a student at Princeton College, since he met his wife there. Though a regular preacher of the gospel, be devoted himself to farming, and had a household of slaves until the war set them free. Though too old and physically infirm to go to the front, during the war he was quartermaster in his district, and did a fine service in relieving hunger and distress, and in handling the mail as postmaster at Burkville, where he lived. He furnished four sons to the Confederate army, two of them with the First Texas infederate army, two of them with the First Vecase in the First Texas Cavalry. His son, John, in the Virginian army, was captured with twenty-three comrades, while fighting a regiment of Federals, after killing more than two hundred of the enemy, and suffering capture only because ammunition ran out. The bravery and resolution of these Confederates caused their captors to desire their parole, but instead they were sent to Camp Chase, Ohio, where John Ford died, and his body was buried there. Rev. David Ford married Miss Maria Van Dyke Hamilton, who died at Nacogdoches in 1897. Rev. David Ford died at Burkville, Texas, in 1874. His children were Thomas W., of Houston; Mrs. Catherine Nation of Newton county, Texas: Mrs. Ellen Cates, died near Shreveport, Louisiana; Addie, who married William Norvel, and died at Burkville; John D., who was the soldier above mentioned; Henry Harrison, who died at Orange; William Hamilton, who died in Beaumont; and Dr. Fran-

Burkville was the early home of Dr. Ford, and be received his education both under private instructions and in the public schools. Though a boy just entering his teens, when the war broke out, he was old enough to give much assistance to his father, in the conduct of the quartermaster's business, and in handling the Burkville postoffice. That experience proved valuable to him in later life, as an early training in routine of business. About 1870 he took up the study of medicine in Mobile. Alabama, where he was graduated in 1873. Returning home, he practiced at Burkville a few years, and then interrupted his practice for another period of study, entering Tulane University at New Orleans, where he was graduated in 1880. From that time until 1883, Dr. Ford was located at Jasper, and since then has had his home and his office in Nacogdoches. His professional efficiency has been increased by several courses in postgraduate work at different times, and he has identified himself with professional affairs as a member of the County and State Medical Societies and National Association.

Dr. Ford has a noteworthy military record. His experience in that direction began in 1887, when he joined the Nacogdoches company of the Texas National Guards, and finally retired after having served as chief surgeon and medical director. At the outbreak of the Spanish-American War, Dr. Ford was commissioned by President McKinley as brigade surgeon and assigned to the Second Brigade of the First Division of the 7th Army corps. His actual service, however, was as division surgeon of 1st Division, 7th corps, on staff of General J. Warren Keifer's command of General Fitzhugh Lee's corps. He went to Cuba with his command, and aided in establishing Camp Columbia, near Havana, and helped to clean up the capital and make it a sanitary place, after the Spanish troops had left. Dr. Ford left the island in April, 1899, and was discharged by general order of the war department soon after that date.

In early years Dr. Ford did considerable service as an active Democrat, representing his home district as delegate to various state conventions. He was a delegate when Governor Ross was nominated, and again in 1890 when Governor Hogg received his first call from the Texas democracy. Outside of his profession, and his careful attention to the large clientage in and about Nacogdoches, with several other citizens he assisted in constructing the original water works plant at Nacogdoches, now one of the best in the state. Dr. Ford affiliates with the Blue Lodge and Chapter of Masonry, with the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks, the Knights of Pythias, and the Woodmen of the World, and his church is the Episcopal.

Dr. Ford in May, 1876, at Shreveport, married Miss Fannie Cates, a daughter of Wesley Cates. She died in Burkville in 1879, leaving a son, Francis C., a druggist of Nacogdoches. At Nacogdoches, in June, 1898, Dr. or Nacognotenes. At Nacognotenes, in June, 1888, 181.
Ford married Miss Jane Thompson, whose father was Judge Thompson, marine judge in New York City. The doctor has no children by his second marriage.

ED HENDRICKS, senior member of the mercantile firm of Hendricks and Anderson, of Cooper, Texas, is a representative of one of the ante bellum families of the Lone Star state.

John Pierson Hendricks, the father of Ed Hendricks, eame from Springfield, Missouri, to Texas some time in the 50's. He was a native of Kentucky, born in 1834, and went from there to Missouri when a child, where, in Greene county, he was reared and educated, his educational advantages, however, being limited. At that date St. Louis was the farthest west railroad point, and the Hendricks family made the journey to Texas in true pioneer fashion, namely, by wagon. Their destination was Biardstown community in Lamar county, where John P. Hendricks became a leading factor in the agricultural and stock industry, and also in the gin and mill business of that place. John P. Hendricks was a son of Isaac Hendricks, who also came to Texas. Isaac Hendricks' father was William Hendricks, who lived and died at Baltimore, Maryland. He was the progenitor of various branches of the family that are scattered throughout the South. Isaac Hendricks married Hamsy Webster, and their children were John P., Shadrick, Meshack, Marshall; Mary J., who has been twice married, first to Kirk Johnson and after his death to John Evans; Elzora, wife of James Dillard, of Oregon, and Artemissa, wife of Benjamin Jackson, of Oklahoma. John P. Hendricks died in 1907. He maintained a strong interest in democratic politics, and was a man of Southern prejudices and practices, but he took no part in the effort to establish the Confederate States. His widow, Serena (Smith) Hendricks, is still a resident of Cooper, Texas. Of their children, we record that Robert, born in 1862, married Miss Lillie Duncan, and is with the Hendricks-Anderson firm of Cooper; Gay, of Paris, Texas, married May Jackson; Ed, whose name introduces this review, was the next in order of birth, and the youngest, Gertrude, is the wife of Neal Duncan, of Paris, Texas. Ed Hendricks was born November 13, 1873, at Biardstown, Lamar county, and spent the first sixteen years of life on his father's farm. In addition to a common school education, he had the advantage of a course in a business college, and when he was seventeen he entered upon his business career. His chief training has been in the broad school of experience, where he has rounded out a character typical of the prosperous, genial Southerner, on good terms with himself and everybody around him. He earned his first money as an employe of the mill and gin at Biardstown, and subsequently he ran a confectionery stand at that place. On coming to Delta county, he found employment as clerk for S. C. Ratliff in the old town of Charleston, at $16.00 a month, and there familiarized himself with all the details of the business and developed into a successful salesman and merchant. His ambition was to have a business of his own, and when he had accumulated a small capital he put in a stock of groceries and dry goods at Charleston, and thus opened up an independent career. His first capital amounted to only $425, but he met with success from the very start, and subsequently doubled and trebled his stock. fourteen years spent at Charleton, he was ready for a wider field of activity. At that time his cash on hand and stock in trade were in marked contrast with the few dollars he had put into the business.

On coming to Cooper in 1910, Mr. Hendricks embarked in the grocery business in his own brick house, just off the main square of the town. The following year he joined Carter Anderson in the purchase of the business of Cooper Bros., and under the firm name of Hendricks & Anderson is now identified with a mercantile business that is at the head in its line in Delta countv. Mr. Henderson is one of the directors of the First National Bank of Cooper, vice president of the Home Relief Insurance Company, and president of the Delta Retail Merchants' Association. Also, he is a member of the Cooper Board of Trade.

While a resident of Charleston, Mr. Hendricks was married to Miss Nina Akard, daughter of Henry Akard and wife, nee Terrell. The Akards, as the name suggests, are of German origin, and Henry Akard is one of the merchants of Charleston. Mr. and Mrs. Hendricks are the parents of six children, namely: Gertrude, Bessie, Noland, Earl, Gordon and Lucile.

Mr. Hendricks' social interests include membership in the A. F. and A. M. and the I. O. O. F.

DAVID K. RENFRO. Brownwood, Texas, has among its honored retired citizens many men to whom it owes much, men of the highest type of responsible citizenship. They have been useful to the community through their activities in business, their public services and their professional achievements, and now, having stepped somewhat aside from the busy paths that their descendants still creditably occupy, are entitled to the consideration and respect which they universally receive. Standing prominent among this class of citizens may be mentioned David K. Renfro, who for years was engaged in farming and as a druggist. He was born March 16, 1840, in Sabine county, Texas, and is a son of David and Martha (Dixon) Renfro.

The Renfro family is of Scotch descent, and many of the name are to be found in the State of Missouri. from whence came David Renfro to Texa; in 1822. He was an early pioneer, farmer, stock raiser and slave owner, and continued in active operations up to the time of his death, which occurred April 13, 1865, the day of General Lee's surrender at Appomattox. During the early days of the Texas frontier, he was couof the Home Guards, an organization for the protection of the early settlers against the Indians and Mexican desperadoes. Five sons and one daughter were born to David and Martha (Dixon) Renfro, and of these David K. was the next to the youngest.

David K. Renfro secured his education in the private schools of early Texas, and proved a diligent scholar, making the most of his somewhat limited opportunities. His first business was in freighting with ox-teams and mule-teams from Grandoco, Louisiana, to various points in Texas, and while thus engaged hauled large loads of merchandise from fifty to ninety miles. Mr. Renfro continued to be thus engaged until 1861, when the outbreak of the war between the North and the South caused him to lay aside his private interests to join the ranks of the Confederate army, and he accordingly enlisted in the First Texas Infantry, Hood's Brigade, First Division, under Generals Longstreet and Lee. Serving throughout the war, Mr. Renfro participated in fifty-one engagements, and made an excellent record for bravery and faithful service. He was discharged at the close of the struggle as orderly sergeant of his command, and upon his return to private life engaged in farming in Sabine county, where he hired twentyfive negroes, cotton being his principal crop. Next he opened a 400-acre farm on the Colorado river, where he was the first to raise cotton in that country. In 1867 he moved to Shelby county, Texas, and continued to farm until 1869, then returning to Sabine county, where in addition to carrying on agricultural pursuits he was the proprietor of a general merchandise business at Milan. Disposing of his interests there in 1873, he came to Brown county, and after spending about seventeen years in farming came to Brownwood and opened a pharmacy. This, like his other ventures, proved a decided success and he continued as proprietor of the drug store until 1905, when he retired, turning over 50% of the business to his sons, who are still conducting it. Although now living a quiet life, he still takes an interest in commercial activities, and is known as one of his community's most substantial men. His business career was one of untiring industry and perseverance, and at all times he well merited the esteem of his business associates and the confidence of all with whom he had transactions.

On October 23, 1867, Mr. Renfro was married in Shelby county, Texas, to Miss Alif A. Tillman, of Scotch descent, daughter of Elijah and Elga (Modlock) Tillman, the former of whom was engaged in farming for many years in Shelby county. Eight children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Renfro, four sons and four daughters, all of whom are living, six being residents of Brownwood, while the oldest son is in business in Forth Worth, and another is a farmer and stockman of Wagner, Oklahoma. All are married.

Mr. and Mrs. Renfro are spending their last days in their comfortable home in Brownwood, surrounded by their many friends. They are faithful members of the Methodist Episcopal church, South. Always a stanch democrat, Mr. Renfro has been active in his support of his party's candidates, while his fraternal connection is with the local lodge of the Masonic order, with the members of which he is decidedly popular.

HEBER STONE. One of the ablest and most useful citizens of Washington county and of the state was the late Heber Stone, who died at his home in Erenham September 22, 1966, Among Texas bankers he held a high place, and the varied activities of his career whether in lusiness or in citizenship were a valuable factor in Washington county for nearly thirty years, Hundreds of people knew his work, his public service, his high character and his great business enterprise, and throughout his continuous business success he was always guided by lofty ideals and dominated at all times by a strong sense of duty.

Heber Stone was born in Louisburg, North Carolina, August 26, 1853, a son of D. C. and Mary (Yarbarough) Stone. The family moved to Texas about 1858, locating at Galveston, D. C. Stone was one of Galveston's most prominent citizens. A successful cotton factor, he had the honor of election as the first president of the Galveston Cotton Exchange, and served as mayor of the city of Galveston in 1877-78. His death occurred in 1884.

The late Heber Stone grew up in Galveston, attended the public schools, finished his literary training in the University of Virginia, and was a student of law in Galveston in the office of General Waul until admitted to the bar in 1875. While his best work was accomplished in fields outside of his profession, the late Heber Stone was a lawyer of large attainments and powers, and for some years did a successful practice. He followed his profession in Galveston, but in 1876 became one of the pioneer members of the Brown county bar, and from that county in 1879 moved to Brenham in Washington county. During his residence in Brown county he served as county attorney one term. On his removal to Brenham Mr. Stone became identified with the banking house of Giddings & Giddings, and remained with that old financial institution for some years. Finally selling his interests there, he devoted himself to his private affairs for several years, but in 1899 organized the private bank which was conducted under his individual name, "Heber Stone." In 1890 his private bank was consolidated with the First National Bank of Brenham, and Mr. Stone acquired controlling interest in that bank and became its president. With the exception of one year he was the chief executive of the First National Bank of Brenham until 1903. From that time until his death most of his time and attention were taken up in the supervision of his extensive land and other investments throughout the state.

To this able business man political honors came, and he might have gained more had he so desired. From 1896 to 1900 he sat in the state senate, and throughout that time served as chairman of the finance committee, a position for which his experience and training well fitted him. While in the senate he also displayed much interest in educational affairs, accepted every opportunity to raise the standards of state education and improve its institutions, particularly the University of Texas. Fraternally the late Mr. Stone belonged to the Masons, and had taken the Knights Templar degree in that order.

In June, 1879, Heber Stone married Miss Louise Giddings, daughter of J. D. Giddings, a sketch of whose family is found in succeeding paragraphs. Mrs. Stone was born in Brenham and still lives at her old home, representing one of the most distinguished families in Washington county and esteemed for her own beautiful personality and social and charitable efforts. To her marriage were born five children, as follows: Giddings Stone, born in 1880, and now joint manager of the estate of his father; Mary, born in 1882, wife of Dr. R. E. Nicholson, a physician and surgeon of Brenham; Heber Stone, Jr., born in 1884, and joint manager with his brother of his father's estate; Albert Stone, born in 1886, a Brenham lawyer; and Louise Stone, born in 1892, and living at home with her mother.

CALVIN DENTON LINDLEY, M. D. Since the year 1906 Archer City, Texas, has known the professional activities of Dr. Calvin Denton Lindley, one of the younger medical men of this section of the state, and a generous measure of patronage is accorded to him in his professional capacity. He is a native product of the state, born in De Leon on December 10, 1578, and is the son of D. and Mrs. Namey (Deaton) Lindley, natives of Georgia and Tennersee, respectively.

Mr. and Mrs. Lindley were married in Tennessee and came to Texas soon thereafter, settling in Cooke county, this state, where the father practiced medicine for years, Burkett, Texas, having been his place of residence for the past quarter century. The mother, who is now in her fifty-fifth year, was reared and educated in her native state of Tennessee. Five children were born to Dr. and Mrs. Lindley, and Calvin Denton Lindley is the third of the number. He was educated in the schools of Coleman county and the University of the South at Sewanee, Tennessee, taking his M. D. degree from the latter insti tution in 1900. Soon after his graduation Dr. Lindley came to Burkett, and for three years was engaged in practice in his old home town. He then went to Pioneer, Texas, for the space of three years, after which he came to Archer City, and here he has since been actively engaged in a constantly growing general practice. In addition to his regular practice, he has the duties of the office of city physician to attend to, and finds himself one of the busiest men of the community.

Dr. Lindley has membership in the County and State Medical Societies, and is a member of the Christian church.

In October, 1899, Dr. Lindley was married at Ardmore, Indian Territory, to Miss Mande Brown, a daughter of John and Mrs. Rebecca (Henry) Brown. The father still lives and makes his home at Rush Springs, Texas. Three children have been born to Dr. and Mrs. Lindley. The eldest, Miss Jewell H., is attending school in Burkett, Texas; Ray, born in 1994, also attends school there; and Harold, who was born in 1907, lives with the parents in Archer City.

Although the early years which Dr. Lindley spent in practice with his father in Burkett were invaluable to him in establishing him and giving him an experience beyond his years, his own efforts have had a great influence in gaining to him the position he now enjoys. He is studious and progressive, and devoted to his profession, and is rightly regarded as one of the coming medical men of the state. Dr. Lindley is especially enthies astic on the subject of the development of Texas, and has an unlimited faith in her future.

Join Perry Alexander. John Perry Alexander has done his full share in the work of advancing Olney in interest and importance in Young county, for he has been the main spring and movement in the work of making his dry goods business to occupy the place of one of the leading concerns of its kind in the county. He came here in 1908, and, together with Terrell Collins, they have evolved a merchandise business that bids fair to outgrow its confines within a brief time. Mr. Alexander has shown himself to be a merchandiser of no slender ability, and Olney has been fortunate in drawing to herself one of his character and capacity.

Eorn on July I, 1883, John Perry Alexander claims Decatur, Wise county, Texas, as his birth place, and John Crockett and Ella (Collom) Alexander as his parents. The father, a native of Mississippi, came to Texas in 1878, and was one of the early pioneers of Wise county. Early in his life he was a school-teacher, but in his more advanced years he devoted himself to stock farming. He is now in the sixty-second year of his age, and is hale and hearty, and yet carrying on his business affairs. His wife and the mother of the subject was born in Wise county and ther reared. She is now forty-nine years of age, and the mother of eleven children.

John Perry Alexander was the first born of the eleven children that came to his parents. He was afforded the privilege of attending the public schools of Wise county as a boy, and at an early age identified himself with the dry goods business, starting in the stores in Decatur and there gaining the experience, for the most part, that has made his later success possible. In 1903 he went to Alvord for five years, where he was similarly occupied and bent upon learning what he could that would be of practical use to him in conducting an independent business, and when he came to Olney in 1908 he felt himself ready to put to use the accumulations of the few years of experience he had behind him. With one Mr. Terrell Collins he engaged in the dry goods business, and while they started in a small way, it is worthy of mention that their establishment, after five years of growth, is one of the leading mercantile stores in Young county. A complete stock of all kinds of dry goods is carried, including men's and women's wearing apparel, and theirs is one of the best patronized stores in the county, and one that bears a highly creditable reputation for honest goods and honorable methods of business.

Mr. Alexander is a member of the Texas Volunteer Guard, and of the Pythian Knights, but has no other fraternal or social relations. He is a Democrat, but not especially active in the party.

On March 9, 1909, Mr. Alexander was married to Miss Susan Jackson, the daughter of John and Mary Jane

Jackson, a well known family in Wise county.

Mr. Alexander is a shining example of the successful young business man who gained his foothold in the business world through the exercise of habits of thrift and integrity, and his success as such is one that is especially pleasing to contemplate.

SELI MELICIN. As county judge of Archer county, Judge Sell Melugin is continuing a record of public service that began in 1908 with his election to the office of county and district elerk. In both postions he has demonstrated a high order of ability and has proven himself a wise choice on the part of the voters of the district. Prior to his public service, Judge Melugin was engaged in school teaching for some five years, and was one of the promising young educators of the county.

Born in Jack county, Texas, on August 22, 1881, Judge Melugin is a son of S. R. and Annie (Beard) Melugin, the father a native son of Texas, born in Fannin, and the mother born in Missouri. In her young days she settled in Fannin, Texas, and she is still living at the age of fifty-two years. The father is a prosperous stock-man, who years ago removed from Fannin county to Jack county, and still later to Archer county, where he now resides, aged fifty-nine years. Four sons and two daughters were born to Mr. and Mrs. Melugin, and the subject was the third in order of birth. He attended the schools of Jack county and finished his training in the high school of Archer City, after which he taught school for five years in Archer county. In 1908 he was elected to the office of county and district clerk, a position he filled with all efficiency until 1912, when he was elected on the Democratic ticket to the office of county judge. Already has he given an excellent account of himself in that office, and he gives promise of a worthy career as a public official. Already he has a wide acquaintance in this section of the state, and he is highly esteemed of all who know him. His success has come thus far as the logical result of his own excellent activities and in acknowledgment of the numerous worthy traits that characterize him among his fellows. Judge Melugin has membership in the Woodmen of the World, but has no other fraternal affiliations.

On January 28, 1906, the Judge was united in marriage with Miss Cordie Moore, of Archer City, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. A. B. Moore, both of whom are yet living, and who came to Texas in their youth with old pioneer families of the state. One child has been born to Judge and Mrs. Melugin—Francis, born December 16, 1908

Walter Jennings Crook, M. D., of Cooper, Texas, holds prestige both as a professional man and as a representative of one of the prominent pioneer families of the State.

Doctor Crook's father, Jere S. Crook, came to Lamar county, Texas, in 1840, with his parents, from Henderson county, Tennessee, the journey being made by wagon across the wilds of Arkansas and into the Texas frontier. Their home was established about six miles southeast of Paris, where Jere S. grew to manhood. He was born in Henderson county, Tennessee, February 22, 1836, and was therefore four years of age at the time of their removal to Texas. His education, begun in the schools near his home, was finished in the old McKenzie College at Clarksville, Texas. The opening of the war of the Rebellion found him in a mood to espouse the cause of the South, and he hecame a lieutenant in a Texas regiment which became a part of Ector's Brigade. Among other engagements of the war in which he participated were those of Murfreesboro and Chickamauga, and when he resumed civil life it was as a farmer in the locality where his boyhood was spent. There he demonstrated his success and won a place among the large farmers of Lamar county. He bore an active part in Democratic politics and was honored with the chairmanship of his county committee. He became a strong Bryan partisan, and his following the cause of a leader of national fame added strength to that cause in Lamar county. Jere S. Crook was a sterling citizen as well as a successful farmer, and manifested an interest in and sympathy for the social and religious side of life. He possessed humaneness to a marked degree and lent his voice and purse to the advancement of righteous work, both in and out of the church. He was a Methodist and was of the counsellors of that body, and his practice was always to entertain strangers at his home without price. His body, like his mind, was quick and active, his carriage erect, his weight 170 pounds, his height 5 feet, 9 inches

Judge John Crook, who led the family into the Texan frontier, survived the period of the Civil war and filled local office here. He was twice married. By his first wife, whose maiden name was Stell, his children were as follows: Jore S.; Lewis, who died in Lamar county; Mollie, wife of W. H. Hancock, of Paris, Texns; Mrs. George Provine, of Paris; Mack, at one time sheriff of Lamar county, is deceased; John T., a farmer near Paris; and Mrs. Susie Krik, of Kansas City, Missouri.

Jere S. Crook also has been twice married. His children are by his second wife, who was formerly Mrs. Mary Jennings. She is a daughter of William Yates. By her first husband, Robert Jennings, her children are: Mrs. Bedford, deceased; Mrs. George T. Coleman, of Paris, Texas. Her children by Mr. Crook are: Mrs. Ed. T. Smith, of New York; John W., eity enginer of Paris; Charles O., a farmer of Lamar county; Dr. Walter J., the immediate subject of this sketch; Stella, wife of John Shultze, of Cooper; Marvin B., of Paris, and Mary, wife of Fred Wynne of Conlin, Texas.

Walter Jennings Crook was born May 11, 1874, and grew up in the community known to the family for many years. He was educated chiefly under the direction of Gowdy and Downey, who conducted splendid schools. After finishing his academic work in Paris, he began preparing himself for his profession by a course of study in medicine in the offices of Doctor Bedford, his brother-in-law, and Doctor Hooks, an able physician of Paris, He matriculated in the University of Texas, and graduated from the medical department, at Galveston, may, 1896. Immediately after his graduation he established himself in the practice of his profession at Cooplession.

I Painter

er, where he has since remained. And since his residence here he has taken hospital work in Chicago, thus fitting himself for greater efficiency in the local field of surgery. His alma mater at Galveston has also furnished him opportunity to do special work, and he is identified with the local, State, and North Texas medical societies, and these connections entitle him to membership in the national association. He is a member of the Association of American Railway Surgeons, and is local surgeon of the Texas Midland Railway Company. He does the offi-cial examining for various insurance companies, including the Southwestern and Southland Life insurance companies of Dallas; the Sam Houston Life, the Aetna, the Hartford, the Pacific Mutual Life, the Kansas City Life, the Great Southern Life, the Equitable of San Antonio, the San Antonio Life, the Fort Worth Life, the Wichita Southern Life, the Reliance Life, the Federal Life, the Union Ceutral Life, etc. And in addition he holds the office of County Health Officer.

Dr. Crook has proved himself a man of business ability as well as of professional skill. He is vice president and a director of the Farmers State Bank of Cooper, and is a stockholder of the Delta National Bauk.

November 18, 1896, Doctor Crook and Miss Tennie C. Wilson were united in marriage at Allen, Collin county, Texas, and they are the parents of two sons: W. Wilson and J. Holson, J. Wilson Crook won first Prize for an essay on Robert E. Lee, in competition as one of the grade pupils of the Cooper schools. Mrs. Crook is a daughter of Joseph S. Wilson and wife, nee Hobson, and one of a family of ten children.

Doctor Crook's family are Methodists and he is, fraternally, identified with the Woodmen and the Masons.

DAVID LUTHER PAINTER. The netive life of this emprising man was connected with the most important period in the development of Gaineaville, from 1873 to September 23, 1911, and is linked with the construction of some of the most important of those public works which stimulated the city's growth and were the bases of its commercial supremacy. A friend of education, morality and good citizenship, a philanthropist whose charities will never be known, a public spirited citizen who placed the interests of his community above his private ambitions, his career and activities entitle his name to be remembered with sentiments of profound veneration among the founders and builders of the city's greatness, David Luther Painter was born at Martinsburg, Virginia, in 1831. His paternal grandfather was a Revolutionary soldier, a native of England, and an early settler of Virginia, where he was one of the first voters of Berkeley county (now West Virginia.) The parents of Mr. Painter were Virginia farming people, and had a family of five children, of whom two still survive: Joseph, living at Asheville, North Carolina, and the youngest, living at Lock Haven, Pennsylvania, in former years a newspaper man and now living retired at the age of eighty-eight years. David L. Painter was reared on his father's farm near Martinsburg, Virginia, and there received his education in the common schools. On attaining his majority, he left the parental roof and went to St. Louis, Missouri, where he secured a position with a car manufacturing concern. He continued with this firm until 1873, in which year he came to Texas and settled in Gainesville. This was prior to the advent of the railroads, but here he established himself in the lumber business, although it was necessary that he haul his product from Dennison. This modest business, started with a small capital, and only the determination and ambition of its proprietor to encourage the thought of its success, grew steadily as the years passed, and eventually assumed gigantic proportions. The management of this great enterprise left him with but little leisure to devote to other channels of trade, but he managed withal to find time to devote to charity and the social amenities. He was in his business relations a man of absolute integrity, but conservative and cautious in his actions and reticent in his habits; especially was he modest in speaking of his own affairs or himself. His habits were simple and domestic; he was a great lover of home, and his bearing was affable and kindly. He had a charitable regard for others, and it was his rule never to speak of a person except to speak well of him. In his continual, unostentatious charities he helped men to help themselves and the full extent of these benevolences will probably never be known. To his own family connections and friends he was ever generous, A lover of outdoor life, he was a large owner of ranching properties, but did not give these his personal atten-tion. He was never a politician, nor did he take an especially active part in public affairs, but he had an intimate knowledge of the history of nearly every man of importance in the country, and was a personal friend of a number of national figures, among them Senator Bailey, who was his neighbor for years. One of Mr. Painter's gifts to the City of Gainesville consisted of the beautiful trees in City Park, which he himself planted and of which he took care until they had grown large enough to contend with the inclemencies of the weather. Although a member of no church, he helped to build nearly every church structure in the city, as well as the first and succeeding public schools. At the time of his death he was serving as a member of the hoard of school trustees. He was a Democrat of the old school, but ever respected the rights and opinions of others, and his friends were found among all political About ten years prior to his death, which occurred September 23, 1911, he retired from business activities, although he continued to hold an interest in the Lindsey National Bank, of which he was a director, and the Waples-Painter Lumber Company, which is still in existence and one of the largest industries of its kind in this section, and in which his widow retains a controlling interest.

On December 12, 1873, Mr. Painter was married to Mrs. Frances (Clark) Elliott, who was born in Mississippi, daughter of Col. William T. Clark, a Mississippi planter who came to Texas in 1858 and engaged in stock raising, which he followed up to the time of his death in 1897. There were seven children in Mr. Clark's family: Frances, who married Mr. Painter; Mary, who became the wife of R. H. Hoffman, of Denton, Texas; Pattie, decessed, who was the wife of Jesse China, of Denton; Luther T., a well-known stockman and banker of Quana, Fexas; W. O., a ranch owner and stockman of Graham, Texas; Eugene W., who is a resident of Arizona; Sidney J., a stockman and banker of Childress county, Texas.

Frances Clark was married (first) to Dr. M. A. Elliott, a native of Tennessee, who graduated from medical college in his native state and then came to Texas, where he followed his profession up to the time of his death, in February, 1870. There were two children born to this union: Imogene, who is now decased, and Pearl, who is the widow of W. H. Stafford, of Supulpa, Oklahoma. Mr. Stafford was the owner of a cotton compress and his widow is now continuing the business with marked success. She has one daughter. Three children were born to the union of Mr. and Mrs. Painter: Fay, who is the wife of L. D. Turner, of Gainesville, and has one son. David, Gladys, who is single and lives at home with her mother; and one child who died in infancy. Mrs. Painter, who is a lady of many accomplishments and who has nunerous friends in church and social circles of Gainesville, resides in her comfortable residence at No. 312 West California street.

HAYWOOD B. LAIN, M. D., is dean of the medical profession of Delta county, Texas. It was in 1868 that he hegan practice here, and for twenty-two years he traveled over the country embraced within its borders and ministered to the frontier settlers dotted here and there, while maintaining his residence at Charleston, then the chief town of the county.

Dector Lain first came into Texas during the progress of the Givil war, refugecing from the dangers of invasion by Federal troops, menacing the State of Arkansas, from which he fled. He had come into the West in 1857, reaching his destination in Madison county, Arkansas, April 7th of that year. He was reared within a few miles of the Tennessee river in Perry county, and he journeyed down that stream to Faducah, Kentucky, thence to Cairo, Illinois, and down to the mouth of the Arkansas Rock. A private conveyance carried him from there to Huntsville, where his uncle, Samuel Sheppard, and other friends from his home county had preceded him.

Doctor Lain was born in Perry county, Tennessee, October 1, 1835. His father, Armstead D. Lain, was a small planter of that county, where he was born in 1813. He subsequently moved into Decatur county and there passed away about 1870. He was aligned, politically, with the Whigs, as was his father-in-law, and possessed the ordinary educational and other qualifications for citizenship. His father was Armstead Lain, a native of Virginia, who came to Tennessee from North Carolina. He was a planter in Wilson county, and died there. Armstead Lain, Jr., married Louisa, daughter of William and Janie (Price) Sheppard, the latter being of Welsh descent. Mrs. Lain was born January 8, 1815. She came to Texas after the death of her husband, and died at Cooper, as Mrs. Whitwell, in November, 1896. Her children were Haywood B., the subject of this sketch; William, who died while a soldier in the Confederate army; Martha, who married and settled in Arkansas and died there; Mrs. Lucy Simmons, of Lamar county, Texas; Samuel, of Sanger, Texas; Douglas, who still resides in Tennessee, and Susan, who was the wife of Charles Harris and who died at Cooper, Texas.

In the matter of longevity this family of Lains has made a record. Back in Tennessee, where the clinic conditions contribute to the development of tall and sinewy men and fair and vigorous women, an uncle and an aunt of Doctor Lain carried their burden of years beyond the century and yielded to the "inevitable" with mental faculties in full activity. Joseph Lain, the uncle, passed beyond his hundredth milestone, and his sister, Miss Ada, reached 109, and passed out in the cedar hills near Lebanon, after having witnessed the greatest era of progress in the bistory of the modern world.

Haywood B. Lain's youth was passed not unlike that of other sons of small planters in Tennessee, and his schooling was not finished until after his removal to Arkansas. His time was divided, when he grew up, among several vocations, clerking and other work such as was found in the little mountain town of Huntsville, and he began the study of medicine in the office of Dr. J. P. Humphrey of Ozark. When the war of the Rebellion came on he was fully prepared for defending the old customs of the South and seemed anxious to array himself in military garb in defense of the State. His company was commanded by Captain Walker and his regiment by Colonel Carroll, both of Franklin county, Arkansas. Military enthusiasm had been stimulated by a sort of free hand in Confederate sentiment, soldiering largely without the enemy's interference for a time and watching new troops in civilian garb and sportsmen's equipment passing by Ozark in boat loads en route to Fort Smith. Colonel Carroll took his regiment beyond the limits of the State and added his force to that facing General Lyon's army near Springfield, Missouri, and in the summer of 1862 the battle of Wilson's Creek was fought, in which our subject was active and where, as he expressed it, he "saw the elephant" and secured all the honors of war necessary to satisfy his craving for a military life. The results of that battle left the Union forces in command of the situation and an invasion of Arkanass felt to be a sure and early event. As a move to avoid further exposing himself as a target for Yan-kee bullets and as a means of saving the personal property of his uncle Sheppard, the young soldier took charge of a caravan of stock and drove them to Texas, reaching Lamar county near the close of the year 1862. Returning to Arkanass, he found his relative ready to transfer his residence to a more southern community, and the Sheppard family and all its portable effects formed be second company, which Doctor Lain accompanied to the Lone Star state. They reached their destination entire the second company in 1863 and stopped in the vicinity of one of the Sulphur Rivers. Here the coming physician and future man-of-affairs combined the practice of medicine and the cattle industry until the re-establishment of peace.

While Doctor Lain had only begun the preparation for his professional work, laid the foundation as it were, yet he was qualified to diagnose and prescribe, and he answered with his assistance whenever called upon. All the while he kept up his medical studies and he yearned for a diploma from some college of medicine. Accordingly, in 1867, he went back to Tennessee and entered the university of Nashville, where he completed the medical course the following year. Then, in possession of the coveted diploma, he returned to Texas and resumed his place in the saddle in front of his pill bags, at this time establishing his home at Charleston, then in Hopkins county, where he continued to reside the next twenty-two years. During this time his practice extended far beyond the present limits of the county, and his faithful "Dobyn" carried him over distances and through weather that would put a modern automobile out of commission. He passed over the site of Cooper before the town was ever dreamed of and he had business or professional relations with nearly all of Delta county's inhabitants prior to 1880. The opportunity being ever present, he prior to 1850. The opportunity being ever present, he engaged in trading, grazing and farming from the early years of his residence, and his contribution to the improvements of rural and urban Delta has been continuous. He has made farms out of the "hog wallows," has enclosed pastures, built homes for tenants, and out of his multifarious transactions in real estate in the country a thousand acres of land is still in his name.

Detter Lain has been a positive factor in the affairs of Cooper from its early history. He moved to the place in 1855, when it contained about 500 inhabitants, and for some years was one of the druggists of the town as well as a practicing physician. He crected the second brick business house here, has built several others since, and his contribution to the residence district of Cooper has been important and conspicuous. His own home, a splendid and commodious house, has added materially to the permanence of the county seat town and the several smaller homes built by him have served to swell the number of domiciles needed in a growing community.

With the prospect of securing a railroad for Cooper, Doctor Lain was named, with James Patteson, Doctor Blackwell, T. T. Garrard and others, as a committee to Secure the right-of-way through Delta county for the Texas Midland Railroad and the construction of the Texas Midland Railroad and the construction of the Poad followed the completion of their work in 1896. He has been president of the First National Bank of Cooper for twenty years, and is one of the directors of the Protestant M. P. Church, which he joined at Charleston, Texas. In national polities he is a Republican, but in local political affairs he acts as an independent. His first you've agiven in support of the whigs.

November 9, 1844, Doctor Lain married at Charleston, Texas, Miss Elizabeth Conditt, daughter of William and Jane (Brown) Conditt, who came to Texas from Kenteky, Mrs. Lain passed away in 1855, leaving three children: Dr. Albert S., of Cooper, who died in September, 1898; Paul H., who lives at Cooper, and Louiss Jane, born March 21, 1874, died November 23, 1895. For his second wife, Doctor Lain married Miss Mary

Hunt, daughter of Benjamin F. and Martha (Baker) Hunt, who came hither from Missouri. Of the Hunt family, only one other member survives-John Hunt of Hopkins county, Texas. The children of this second marriage are Nellie, Floyd, Waldrow, Claud, Ralph and Haywood.

As a Mason, Doctor Lain also has a record, He is believed to be the oldest member of the Masonic Order beheved to be the duest means.

in Delta county and he helped organize the lodge in also helped to organize, and has presided over, a number of lodges in the county.

HENRY L. LEBERMAN. One of the leaders in thought and action in Olney, Texas, is Henry L. Leberman, a wealthy stock man, banker and citizen of this place. All his life, practically, has been devoted to stock-raising, for before he entered into the business on his own responsibility, he was associated with his father who was in the same line of enterprise, and who also was a successful man. Mr. Leberman was born on October 10, 1863, at Nokomis, Illinois, a son of John A. and Bertha Mary (Heck) Leberman, both natives of Germany. They came to America and settled in St. Louis, where they were married, and later settled in Christian county, Illinois, but still later again removing to St. Louis, Missouri. It was not until 1874 that they identified themselves with Texas as settlers in Tarrant county, where the father was engaged as a stockman. He died in Young county, on January 3, 1913, aged seventy-nine years, and the mother died on March 9, 1911, aged sixty-nine. They were the parents of seven children, and of that number the subject was the second born.

Henry L. Leberman was fairly well educated in the schools of Missouri and Illinois, and he finished his schooling in St. Louis. He accompanied the family to Texas, and when he launched out for himself, it was to engage in the cattle business. In 1880 he came to Young county, and he is still largely occupied with his cattle interests hereabout, although he has identified himself with other activities that take some of his time and attention.

In 1905 he acquired an interest in the First National Bank of Olney, among the most prosperous institutions of its kind in the county, and he served as president of the bank from 1906 to 1910, and is again holding the office of president after an interval of non-service.

Mr. Leberman is one who has taken a distinctive interest in matters of educational import, and is giving valuable service as president of the local school board, where he has served since 1901. In that time many valuable additions to the curriculum have come into usage, and it is his aim to bring the system to a status that will compare favorably in efficiency with other school systems of larger cities. Mr. Leberman is a Democrat and a Mason of the Royal Arch degree. He also has membership in the Woodmen of the World and the Knights of Pythias. His church affiliations are with the Christian denomination.

In December, 1893, at Graham, Texas, Mr. Leberman was married to Miss Eleanor Perkins, a daughter of J. W. Perkins and wife, old pioneers to this county who are now deceased. Three children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Leberman, as follows: Marietta, born in 1894; Henry Louis, born September 17, 1896; and Eleanor Leberman, born in 1898.

Mr. Leberman takes his proper place among the leaders in citizenship of the city and county, and performs his full share of civic service, sharing to the uttermost the burdens of civic responsibility.

Dr. George B. Hamilton. One of the promising young medical men of this district and one who is fast advancing in professional importance is Dr. George B. Hamilton, of Olney, Young county, where he has been engaged in practice since his graduation from the University of Fort Worth in 1908. Dr. Hamilton is a product of the Lone Star state, born in Red River county in September, 1878, and he is a son of N. W. and Tennie (Smith) Hamilton, born respectively in Texas and Tennessee.

N. W. Hamilton is a well known cotton ginner and machine man, and he still makes his home in Red River county at the age of sixty-five, where he has passed his entire life, and where he has gained no little prominence in his business. The mother, who came to Texas as a young girl, met and married her husband in Texas. and here also she gained her education. She is now in her sixtieth year, and the mother of eight children, of which goodly number George B. of this review was the first born.

In his boyhood George B. Hamilton attended the schools of Red River county, then entering the University of Nashville and spending three years more in the medical department of Fort Worth University. He was graduated with his degree of M. D. in 1908, and began the practice of his profession in Olney, where he has since been engaged, and where he has experienced a pleasing degree of success. He is a member of the State Medical Society, and the Wichita Falls County and the Young County Medical Societies, in all of which he is one who takes an active and interested part,

Dr. Hamilton is a Democrat in his political faith, but makes no especial demonstration of his adherence, beyond the demands of good citizenship. In the Masonic order he has reached the Royal Arch degree, and in the matter of churchly relations, is a Presbyterian. He is unmarried.

OLIN C. HARRISON. As the owner and publisher of one of the most important newspapers in this section of Texas, Olin C. Harrison, of Seymour, occupies a position of importance in the town and surrounding country. People are strongly influenced by the printed word, often unconsciously and sometimes against their will. When they have faith and confidence in the editor of their favorite sheet, he is in a position of great power and responsibility. This is the case with Mr. Harrison. He is a broad-minded, sincere man, with high standards of thinking and acting and his influence over his readers is always toward better things, in civic, political and social life. That he has a large circulation for his paper is a thing upon which the people of Seymour are to be congratulated as well as Mr. Harrison.

Olin C. Harrison was born in McLennan county, Texas, on the 3rd of October, 1881. His father was Wesley Harrison, who was a native of Arkansas. As a young man he came to Texas where he took up farming as a means of livelihood. This was his occupation during his comparatively short life, for he died at the age of forty-five years. He died in 1899 and is buried in Seymour. His wife was Miss Martha Moore and she was born in Mississippi, later coming to Texas where she and Mr. Harrison were married. She now resides in Seymour and is an active member of the Baptist church, as was her husband. Mr. and Mrs. Harrison had seven children, all boys and of these sons, Olin C. Harrison was the fourth in order of birth. All of these sons, with one exception, live in Seymour. The other son is located in Hereford, Texas,

Olin C. Harrison has spent his entire life in Texas. He received his elementary education from the public schools, attending both grammar and high schools. He schools, attending both grammar and night schools. It then entered Baylor University from which he was graduated in 1904. He then taught school for a year, but school teaching did not appeal to him and so he but sensor teaching did not appear to min and so be accepted a position in a bank at Canyon, Texas. He worked there for nearly a year and then bought the Baylor County Banner. Since taking charge of this paper he has increased the circulation greatly. He has also enlarged the plant, and publishes a paper so altogether desirable in the way the news is handled, in the editorial departments, and typographically, that he has a large circulation, not only in Seymour and Baylor counties, but also in this entire section of Texas and in many of the near-by states. Mr. Harrison's establishment is well equipped for job printing and he has much business of this class. In another year he expects to creet a new building to house his paper in. Through the columns of the Banner he is a tireless advocate of the up-building of Texas in general and Baylor county in particular, and all movements toward civic improvements or advance in any direction find him an ardent supporter.

Mr. Harrison is a member of the Democratic party and has taken an active interest in politics, being one of the original Woodrow Wilson men in Seymour. In religious matters Mr. Harrison is a member of the Baptist church.

In Waco, Texas, on the 18th of September, 1907, Mr. Harrison was married to Miss Marguerite Surratt, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Polk Surratt, of Waco. Her mother lives in Seymour. Mr. Surratt died some years ago. Two children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Harrison, Olin Cedric and Margaret.

Barney W. Fields was born in Henderson county, Tennessee, on the 16th of September, 1875, and is a son of Thomas W. and May Margaret (Sheffield) Fields. Thomas Wright Fields was born near Center Point, Henderson county, Tennessee, on the 14th of June, 1856, and was there reared and educated. He there served nine years in the office of justice of the peace and for several years was associated with the operation of the postoffice in the village of Sardis, that county. In his native county, on the 18th of December, 1874, was solemnized his marriage to Miss May Margaret Sheffield, a representative of one of the sterling families of that county, and they continued to maintain their home in Henderson county until the spring of 1895, when they came to Texas and established their home on a farm in Hunt county, near the village of Celeste. Two years later they removed to another farm, near Salem, this county, where they continued to reside four years, at the expiration of which they established their permanent home in the city of Greenville. Here Mr. Fields became a successful contractor and builder, and in this line of enterprise he erected several of the best residence buildings of the city, besides an appreciable number of business structures of modern type. He gained the inviolable confidence and esteem of the community, was liberal and public-spirited in his civic attitude, and was a zealous supporter of the cause of the Republican party. In April, 1909, he was appointed and commissioned postmaster of Greenville by President Roosevelt, and within his brief administration he gained the unqualified commendation of the community, his regime being cut short by his untimely death on the 12th of December of the same year. He was known as a man of excellent business and executive ability, was animated by the highest principles of integrity and honor and well merited the high regard in which he was uniformly held. He was affiliated with the Masonic fraternity and was a zealous and consistent member of the Baptist Church, as is also his widow, who still maintains her home in Greenville, where she is a popular factor in the social activities of the community. Of the children four sons and daughters survive the honored father.

To the public schools of his native state Barney W. Fields is indebted for his early educational discipline, and in 1891 he was graduated in the Sardis Normal College, at Sardis, Tennessee. He put his scholastic attainments to practical test and utilization by turning his attention to the pedagogic profession, and for several years he was a successful teacher in the schools of Hunt county, Texas, whither he came in 1894, a short time prior to the removal of his parents to this state. For four years he was identified with the government bureau of education in the Philippine Islands, where his service met with high commendation. When his father assumed the office of postmaster at Greenville, Mr. Fields became assistant, and when his father passed away he was made acting postmaster, his experience, though of limited duration, proving sufficient to make him a most efficient head of the local service, with the result that he gained strong support and was made the regular incumbent of the office in May, 1910, through appointment by President Taft. He has shown marked circumspection in the administration of the multifarious affairs of this important office and popular approbation has not been denied, with the result that he is considered a model executive. His term result that he is considered a model executive. His term of office will expire in May, 1914. In politics Mr. Fields is found arrayed as a stanch advocate of the principles and policies of the Republican party.

John McClure. When John McClure passed away in October, 1908. Gainesville lost one of her biggest men, and one who had occupied a prominent place in the community for many previous years. He was one of the well-to-do farming and stock men of the county, and for sixteen years he had served as a member of the board of county commissioners of Cooke county, an office that he continued to fill with increasing ability and to the utmost satisfaction of all from his first incumbency thereof until he was obliged to relinquish all earthly activities.

Born in Marshall, Clark county, Illinois, in 1842, John McClure was the son of Samme and Caroline (Kitchens) McClure, the mother of Tennessee and the father of Kentucky, respectively. The father was sheriff of Clark county for many years. The paternal grandfather was an Indian fighter of note, whose two children were massacred by Indians.

John McClure was reared on the home farm of his parents, there continuing up to the age of twenty years, when he went to Nevada and worked in the mines. He reached the position of an overseer and continued in that work for ten years, then returned home and paid a visit. He returned to Nevada after a short time, and continued there for another period, this one of four years' duration. It was then that he came to Gainesville, and here he established a home of his own, settling on South Denton street, and engaging in the cotton business. He had most of the land now representing the town site of Gainesville for a range for his cattle in those early days, and he prospered most pleasingly in the business. There were no railroads penetrating the country then, and Mr. McClure hauled with mule teams the lumber with which he built his house, from the town of Sherman. He later purchased four hundred acres of land and engaged in farming in genuine earnest, putting three hundred acres of the place under the plow and reducing it to a crop bearing condition. He followed the cattle business until 1888, then moved to Gainesville, where he was shortly after elected county commissioner from Precinct No. 1, and in that capacity he served repeatedly, sixteen years in all. He died in 1908, just as he was about to enter upon another term of service in that capacity.

Barry W Field,

Mr. McClure was practically retired from all business at the time of his death, being devoted then chiefly to the interests of the public, but his private affairs had been set aside some time previous. He was a Democrat, but not politically ambitious, and the only office he ever held was that of commissioner. As to his churchly relations, it may be said that he was a member of the Baptist church, and that his example in life was in every respect consistent with his profession of faith. He was one of the public spirited men of his community, and always manifested a wholesome interest in any activities that pertained to the advancement of the public

Mr. McClure on the 21st of January, 1875, in Paris, Ill., married Miss Louise Snedeker, who was born in Ohio, September 14th, 1846, and was of Pennsylvania and Virginia stock. Both her parents were Ohioans, and the father ended his days in Illinois, where he settled after the Civil war and engaged in farming. He died in April, 1912, having reached the patriarchal age of ninety-one years. Mrs. McClure is one of the eight children of her parents who were named as follows: W. M., deceased; Garrett, a resident of Paris, Illinois; Charlotte, deceased; Louis L., of Paris, Illinois; Jabus, a resident of Astoria, Illinois; Oscar, of Darwin, Illinois; Darthuly, the widow of Clement Forsythe, of Terre Haute, Indiana.

Mr. McClure himself was one of eight children, brief mention of them being made as follows: Mary D., the widow of Wm. Snedeker, the latter a brother of the widow of subject, and now living in La Mesa, California; Wilson is a resident of College, Kansas; Albert, who lives in Gainesville; Susie, the wife of Washington Clapp, of Appleton City, Missouri; Eliza, Cecelia, and Andrew, all deceased.

The marriage of Mr. and Mrs. McClure was solemnized on January 21, 1875, and to them were born three children. Caroline E., the eldest, is unmarried and is engaged in teaching in the public schools at Wichita Falls, Texas. She was educated in the public schools of Gainesville, and finished her training in Oxford, Mississippi, Dunton Normal School, and a special course in Knoxville, Tennessee. Ella Gay was educated in Gainesville, Texas, and remains at home with her mother. Willie O., is the wife of H. M. Buchanan, of Amarillo, Texas.

Mrs. McClure makes her home at No. 709 North Dixon street, Gainesville.

JAMES HARVEY JONES. One of Gainesville's best known and most successful citizens was the late James Harvey Jones, who died in 1908. Mr. Jones had lived in North Texas from the age of two years, was a farmer and stockman, conducted a mercantile business in Gainesville, and was also honored with official position in the county.

James Harvey Jones was born in Lebanon, Missouri, in 1856, and was fifty-two years of age at the time of his death. His parents were Milton and Rhoda (Lizenby) Jones, both natives of Illinois and the father a farmer by occupation. The ten children in the family were: Lucy Ann, deceased; Clora, deceased; Melissa, deceased; Elvira, deceased; Lucinda, widow of MacVining of Gainesville; Leouard, a grocer in Gainesville; Walter, in business at Gainesville; James H .: and Madora, deceased.

In 1858 the parents moved to Texas and bought a farm in Cooke county, where the father was engaged in farming until his death, at the age of sixty-five. His home was near Gainesville, and with the exception of three years spent in Grayson county he had his home in Cooke county until his death. The late James Harvey Jones grew up on his father's farm in Cooke county, attained his preliminary education in the Gainesville public schools, and at the age of sixteen years the management of the home place devolved upon him owing to the death of his father. From that time he was actively identified with farming and the cattle industry. A stroke of paralysis caused him to give up active outdoor work, and he then moved into Gainesville. For five years he was in the grocery business in that city, and during that time built up from small beginnings one of the best establishments of its kind in Cooke county. In 1897 he was elected to the office of tax collector, in which served two terms or four years. After that he once more engaged in farming, managing his business while a resident in Gainesville. His farm comprised two hundred and twenty acres, and he succeeded in making it a profitable enterprise even though an invalid. He had to be rolled about in a chair during the latter period of his life, and it is a tribute to his remarkable energy that he persisted in his close attention to business in spite of the physical handicap.

Mr. Jones was married March 7, 1883, to Miss Nannie T. Howeth, a daughter of Harvey and Susan (Dorsett) Howeth, the mother a native of Texas and the father of Tennessee. Harvey Howeth was a farmer who came to Texas at an early day, buying land and continuing its operation until his death. He lived in Rusk county for some time, but after moved to near Gainesville, which remained his home until his death, in 1897. Mrs. Jones was one of a family of twelve children, namely: Melvina, deceased; John F., deceased; Willia, deceased; Jefferson, a farmer in Oklahoma; Ellen, deceased; Andrew, deceased; Harvey, Jr., of Oklahoma; Susan, wife of John H. Williams of Montague county, Texas; Mrs. Jones; Joseph of Oklohoma; Betty, wife of C. J. Gilliam of Gainesville; and Lula, wife of J. H. McDaniels of Okla-

The ten children born to the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Jones are mentioned as follows: Guy F., of Richardson, Texas, a Methodist minister, and the father of one child, named Richard; Granville, unmarried, and a practicing attorney at Gainesville; Earle, who is the Methodist minister at Greenville, Texas, and has one child, Gertrude; Wade, in the furniture business at Muskogee, Oklahoma, and unmarried; Fay, wife of W. H. Perkins, a railroad clerk at Gainesville; Lee, who is employed on a Gainesville newspaper; Florence, a son, who is now taking a business course in the Gainesville business college; Ruby, in the high school, and two that died in infancy.

The late Mr. Jones was known in his community as a man who spoke out his mind on all matters, and according to what he regarded as right. He was a man of influence, and did his part by all civic and moral movements. He took an active part in the affairs of the local Methodist church, and in politics was a Democrat. The only office he ever sought was that of tax collector, in which he served for two terms. He was particularly foud of his home, and seldom sought diversions outside of his family circle. During his residence at Gainesville he bought and opened an addition to Gainesville, known as the "Burrus addition," now one of the popular residence districts. The family home is at 1305 East California Street, in Gainesville.

NATHANIEL TERRY BOMAR. A pioneer doctor is a figure unadorned and plain in the annals of human activity, but with a character in which the spirit of service makes many more conspicuous actors seem petty and insignificant. It was as an old-time doctor-the kindly, understanding, strong man of helpful skill, whose name is a grateful memory in many a household—that the late Nathaniel Terry Bomar was best known in north Texas during a period of activity extending from pioneer times until a quarter century ago.

Nathaniel Terry Bomar was born in Wilson county, Tennessee, a son of William Johnson and Elizabeth (Terry) Bomar. His father was a Christian minister, and was also a large planter and slave owner in the state of Tennessee. The mother was a descendant of the noted Terry family, one of her ancestors having been "Fighting Joe Terry," of the Revolution, and other members of the Terry family having been noted as soldiers and citizens in Tennessee. Among the ancestors of the late Dr. Bomar was Sir Willam Johnson, of colonial American history. Dr. Bomar was one of a colonial American history. Dr. Bomar was one of a following the terry four times. There were six children by Elizabeth Terry. He grew up on his father's plantation in Tennessee, and from bovhood manifested strong artitude and indus-

and from boyhood manifested strong aptitude and industry as a student. He had ambitions for professional life, and after his preliminary education in the district schools of Tennessee studied in the office of Dr. Sayle in that state. After a thorough course of reading he was given a partnership with his preceptor, and he and Dr. Sayle practiced medicine together for a number of years. Finally, ou account of failing health, Dr. Bomar moved west and located in the pioneer town of Sher-man, Texas, where he resumed his professional work. In 1854 or 1855 he moved from Sherman to Gainesville, which was then on the extreme western frontier. In Gainesville for a number of years he was in the drug business, until the late seventies, but his principal work was in his profession and he was devoted to its duties until his retirement, in 1890. It is remembered of Dr. Bomar that he never refused a call by night or day, or in sunshine or in rain; therefore he had a large prac-tice and was one of the best loved men of his profession in north Texas, but was always a poor collector, and his service was never represented by his material accumulations. He was not only a practitioner, but throughout his life continued to be an ardent student and seeker for knowledge. The death of Dr. Bomar occurred at his home in Gainesville, October 9, 1898. Outside of his profession he might have been much more active in public life than he was. During reconstruction days he was appointed to the office of county judge. In politics he was a Union Democrat at that time, and throughout the struggle between the states espoused the cause of the Union. He served as county judge for a time, but never again could be drawn into political affairs. He was a charter member of the Lodge of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, both at Sherman and at Gainesville, and was very much devoted to this fraternity.

The late Dr. Bomar was married before leaving Tennessee to Miss Amanda Allison, who was born in Tennessee, a daughter of Thomas and Lucretia Allison, the latter a direct descendant of Sir Francis Drake, the lion of the Elizabethian English navy. Nine children were born to the doctor and wife, but only two are now living. the son Edmond and the daughter Miss Douglas.

Edmond Bomar for many years served as president of the Bomar Oil Company of Gainesville, and has been identified with many enterprises, though he is now living retired and merely guarding his investments. Edmond Bomar married Miss Alice L. Gooding, a native of Portland, Maine. She was a daughter of Captain Gooding, who died at sea. Miss Gooding came to Texas and was reared at Bryan, and their marriage occurred in 1878.

Miss Douglas, who is a woman of great capability, both in business and like her father, a thorough student of books, resides with her brother Edmond in Gainesville. For ten years she was identified with school work in the public schools of Gainesville.

During the old days of the Texas frontier Edmond Bomar served as a Texas ranger, and had many adventures as an Indian fighter. He grew up in what was then west Texas, and during his early life was identified with real estate and merchandising lines. He went back to Tennessee for some time, and was in the grocery business at Paris for six years. Finally in Gainesville he organized the Gainesville Cotton Oil Company, of which he became president, and later acquired the controlling interest and changed the name of the concern to the Bomar Oil Company, one of the largest enterprises of the kind in the state, of which he has been at the head. Miss Douglas Bomar resides at 315 South Denton street with Mr. and Mrs. Edmond Bomar.

William Pata Robinson. For the past thirty-five years the family of William Bata Robinson has been identified with Gainesville, where his daughter is Mrs. E. H. Campbell, and his widow has also made her home here for upwards of thirty-five years.

The carcer of William Pata Robinson began in Fayette county, Kentucky, with his birth on the fifteenth of April, 1815. He was a son of Benjamin and Polly (Pata) Robinson, the father a native of Virginia, where the grandfather was a large planter. The father was married in his native state, and then moved to Kentucky. William P. Robinson was one of eight children. He grew up in Kentucky, was educated in the district schools, and was given more than ordinary advantages in schooling and was known for his substantial scholarship. He never attended college, however, and was engaged in farming nearly all his life. In the Mexican war he enlisted in Lancaster, Kentucky, in the first company of the First Regiment of the Company, under Captain Johnson Price. He went south with the troops and participated in the first important battle of the war, at Buena Vista. He went through the war until its close and after his honorable discharge returned to his home in Kentucky, where he was married and where he engaged in farming and stock raising. He was in the cotton business at Jackson, Tennessee, at the time of his death, which occurred November 14, 1862. He was a Union man in his sympathies, but did not serve as a soldier, since his death occurred in the second year of the war. He was never a seeker for office, but a quiet, industrious citizen and a man held in the high esteem in all the relationships of life. He was a devout Christian and a member of the Christian church.

Mr. Robinson was married January 10, 1848, to Miss Clara Anderson, who now lives in Gainesville with her children. She was born in Garrat county, Kentucky, a daughter of Alexander and Polly (Edmondson) Ander-son, both natives of Kentucky. However, their families had come from Virginia, and on both sides were of Scotch-Irish stock. Mrs. Robinson was the only child of her parents. The six children of Mr. Robinson and wife were as follows: Mary E., is the wife of John A. Hamm of Denton, Texas, and has six children. Sallie B., is the wife of James W. Campbell of Cooke county and has two children. Susie A., is the wife of Joseph H. Garnett, an attorney of Gainesville, and has three children. Clara Ella, is the wife of Elias H. Campbell of Gainesville, who served as a soldier in the Confederate war, was for many years a farmer, and also operated a store in Greenville, being now retired. The three children of Elias H. Campbell and wife are Lula, principal of one of the schools in Greenville; Clara, also a teacher, and Mary E., who also follows the educational profession. William B. is now deceased, and left two sons. Lula R., is the wife of Charles H. Paddock, retired, and living in Pasadena, California, and has one

CAPT, JOHN W. VANN. Now chief special agent for the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway Company, with head-quarters at Dallas, Capt. John W. Vann has a notable record in public affairs, both as a civil and criminal officer, covering a long period of years. Whether as executive officer of county and district courts or under the jurisdiction of the federal courts, as special agent of the federal government in different capacities, or as an employe of corporations, Captain Vann has shown both efficiency and courage in every emergency, and he is easily one of the best known officials of justice in the Southwest.

Born in Fayette county, Texas, March 19, 1860, John W. Vann is a son of W. W. and Margaret L. (Bishop) Vann. His father, a native of Tennessee, came to

Mann

Texas in 1854 and became a pioneer settler in Fayette county, but in 1869 moved to Kerr county, taking up his residence in the mountain region northwest of San Antonio. He died in 1908. Airs. Vann, who was born in Illinois, is still living, her home being in Austin.

John W. Vann was reared in Kerr county, Texas, educated in the local schools, and he entered public life when elected a county commissioner of Kerr county. Following that he was deputy sheriff of the county under F. M. Moore, and succeeded that gentleman as sheriff and tax collector, an office which he held continuously for ten years, being elected every two years until his resignation, when he was permitted by the county judge and commissioners to select as his successor J. T. Moore, his cousin, and who is now occupying the position. During that time Captain Vann was president of the Sheriffs' Association of Texas, serving two terms, and he became personally acquainted with every sheriff in the state during that time

The most noteworthy distinctions of his career were gained during his federal service. Captain Vann re-signed the office of sheriff of Kerr county to accept the appointment, in July, 1902, as deputy United States marshal under W. M. Hanson, with headquarters at Galveston. Among the many duties performed by him as deputy marshal special interest attaches to his work in connection with the famous Dodge-Morse divorce case. That was one of the sensational cases which occupied the attention of the papers and the public of the country for many months. It will be recalled that early in December, 1904, Charles F. Dodge was arrested at Houston, Texas, and after a long fight over the extradition was taken to New York and turned over to District Attorney Jerome. During Dodge's residence at Atlanta, Georgia, his wife bad divorced him and had subsequently married C. W. Morse, a New York banker and head of the ice trust, who subsequently came into unenviable publicity as the wrecker of a New York bank. It appears that Morse's uncle, who was strongly opposed to the marriage of his nephew to a divorced woman, had secured the services of Abe Hummel, a noted New York lawyer, to secure an annulment of the marriage. Hummel brought Dodge to New York, induced him to sign an affidavit that the summons in the divorce proceedings had never been served on him, and on that ground the courts annulled the decree of divorce, so that it became a question whether his former wife was Mrs. Dodge-Morse or Mrs. Morse Dodge. Charges of perjury were subsequently brought against Dodge and, with the powerful financial backing of Hummel and his client, Dodge fled to Texas and there made a vigorous fight to prevent extradition and return to New York. It was, of course, in Texas that Captain Vann first became connected with the ease, when he was one of the parties specially designated by Federal Judge Walter T. Burns to convey Dodge to New York and turn him over to District Attorney Jerome. It was to Captain Vann that Dodge made his confession that he had perjured himself in making the false affidavit, and this story he subsequently repeated to Mr. Jerome, and on that officer's recommendation was released. Most people will remember that Abe Hummel, the lawyer who had engineered the entire deal, was subsequently convicted of conspiracy and served a term in the federal penitentiary.

In 1996 Cantain Yann was transferred from Galveston and made chief deputy United States marshal of the western district of Texas, under Eugene Notle, with headquarters at San Antonio. A short time later, however, in July, 1906, President Theodore Roosevelt elevated him from a marshalship to the position of cellector of customs of the Brazos de Santiago district, with headquarters at Brownsville. That district extends along the Rio Grande River from its mouth to a short distance below Laredo. During Captain Yann's term there was practically no military protection along the Mexican border, and it was his duty, assisted by a number of men employed under him, to patrol and protect the border against smugglers and other offenders against law and order. This service brought him into almost daily contact with desperate characters, subjecting him and his men to dangers, and many narrow escapes from death. After a service as collector of customs for about three and a half years, a special appointment from President Roosevelt made him special agent for the department of justice, and he has the distinction of having been the first to be appointed to a position of that kind. In this connection he became identified with one of the best remembered events of the Roosevelt administration. That was the famous "Brownsville Raid," as a result of which President Roosevelt ordered the discharge of the negro troops stationed at Brownsville. It was on Captain Vann's report of that affair that Mr. Roosevelt's action was based, and in the voluminous published record of the Brownsville affair the first and most important document is Captain Vann's report. As special agent for the department of justice Captain Vann's duties included supervision along the Rio Grande as far west as El Paso. He was on the border during the first revolution against the Diaz regime in Mexico, as a result of which Francisco Madero became President of that re-In following up the violators of the nentrality public. laws between the two countries Captain Vann met with many adventurous escapades and was almost constantly within the zone of danger. He was on duty in Juarez, opposite El Paso, when that city was first taken by the revolutionists, and among his most valued mementos are the autographs of a number of the soldiers of fortune who were responsible for the fall of Juarez. About this time Captain Vann was detailed by the United States attorney general to investigate the noted Coppy farm peonage case in Burleson county, Texas, where it was charged that Ward M. Fuller, a young white man of Kansas City, Missouri, and many others had been held m bondage. The result of this prosecution practically wiped out peonage in Texas.

Captain Vann's work in the government official service was of such high order that it attracted the attraction of the corporations, and in July, 1911, he was rered and accepted the position of special agent for the legal department of the Southern Precific Railroad, with headquarters at Houston. Early in 1913 came his appointment to his present position, as chief special agent for the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railway, with jurisdiction extending over Texas and a portion of Okia-homa. Captain Vann is the kind of officer who has always been depended upon to take hold of an especially snotty piece of business with determination, resource-fulness and bravery, and those who have placed their trust in him have never been disappointed.

Captain Vann has four children: Walter W, who is widely known as a civil engineer in the Brownsville country, having built the Harlingen Canal and a number of other large public works; Charles C, Stewart, and Amy, who is the wrife of Judge Lee Wallace, of Kerr country. Captain Vann's wife was formerly Mrs. Maude (Parkins) Sloam, who was born near London, England, but, coming to Texas with her parents, was reared near San Antonio. Captain Vann is a Knight's Templar Mason and a Shriner, holding membership in various lodges in San Antonio and in the Ben Hur Temple at Austin.

H. Joe Isaacs. One of the large and prosperous mercantile enterprises of Amarillo is the Famous Clothing & Fur Company, which is the result of the energetic business enterprise of a young man who located in the city seventeen years ago and who has applied all his energy and talent to making one of the best stores in the Pan Handle.

H. Joe Isaacs was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, Aug. 19, 1875, a son of S. W. and Martha (Myers) Isaacs. His father was born in London, England; came to America when a young man, and located in Cincinnati, Ohio; was for a number of years connected with the P. F. Collier Publishing Company of New York, and his death oc-curred at Trinidad, Colorado, in 1892, at the age of fifty-seven. The mother, who was also born in London, where she was educated and married, died at Trinidad Colorado, June 13, 1912, when seventy-nine years of age. There were nine children in the family, and H.

Joe was the seventh in order of birth,

He attended the public schools of Cincinnati, and from that city moved to St. Louis, where he began his practical career in merchandising as stockkeeper for the I. Harris Wholesale Clothing Manufacturers. After five years of that experience be came to Texas, and in 1896 located in Amarillo and opened a small stock of goods under the name of the Famous Clothing & Fur Company. His brother, S. L. Isaacs, joined him on January 1, 1910, and the brothers have enjoyed special success in their line of enterprise. They have a large trade outside of Amarillo and carry $40,000.00 worth of stock, chiefly in men's furnishing goods. They employ four clerks, and their goods go to supply the clothing of men and boys in every section of the Pan Handle.

Mr. Isaacs is a Democrat, but not active in party politics. He is affiliated with the Benevolent and Protective

Order of Elks at Amarillo,

WILLIAM A. PRICE, M. D. A physician and surgeon who stands high in his profession at Hereford, Dr. Price won the privilege of practicing medicine through his own efforts, working his way and paying his tuition both through literary and professional schools. He was graduated M. D, in the class of 1893 from the Louisville Medical College, at Louisville, Kentucky, and was engaged in practice at Tracy, in Milam county, Texas, from the time of his graduation until 1906. In the latter year he moved to Hereford, where he has built up a large practice, his attendance being called to the most influential families in this region. Dr. Price is examiner for a number of the old-line insurance companes and does a general practice in medicine and surgery. He has membership in the Deaf Smith, Castro and Randall Counties Medical Societies, and also in the State and American Medical Associations.

Dr. William A. Price was born September 11, 1867, in Tishomingo County, Mississippi, and is of Irish descent on his father's side and Dutch on the maternal line. His father was Rev. Joseph L. Price, a native of Mississippi, who devoted the greater part of his active career to the ministry of the Methodist church South. In Coryell county, Texas, he is still remembered for his effective work as one of the early preachers, and he located in this state in 1876, and died at Rockdale in 1892 at the age of fifty-two. During the Civil war he enlisted as a private and fought with General Hood's Brigade, participating in the battle of Corinth and Shiloh and other campaigns, and was never wounded or taken pris-He was a Democrat, though never active in political affairs. The maiden name of his wife was Martha Ann Huff, who was born in Mississippi, where she was married on December 22, 1866. She came to Texas with her husabnd, they making the journey in a wagon drawn by an ox team. She now lives, at the age of sixty-eight years, in Coryell county, having been born in 1845. There were ten children in her family and all are still

Dr. Price, the oldest of the children, was educated in the country schools and at Lampasas College. After leaving the latter institution be earned the means which enabled him to enter Louisville Medical College, at Louisville, Kentucky, where he was graduated as already mentioned. The doctor is a Democrat, though his political activity is confined to casting his ballot. He is affiliated with the Masonie Order through the Royal Arch Chapter and the council of select masters. His church is the Methodist south.

In 1889 Dr. Price was married at Bee House, in Coryell county, to Miss Annie Gardner, a native of Texas, born in Williamson county and a daughter of John P. Gardner, who was also born in this state. Mrs. Price died February 11, 1893, at Louisville, Kentucky, when twenty-two years of age. She was laid to rest at her old home in Coryell county. The two children born of the union were Otho, born at Bee House, Texas, May, 1891, and Annie, born February 4, 1893, only a few days before her mother's death. In 1894, in Milam county, Dr. Price married Miss Nettie Adams, who was born in Missouri, a daughter of Rev. J. M. Adams, who is a minister of the Missionary Baptist church and now resides in Tyler, Texas. By this marriage are two children: Bernadine, born in 1897 at Tracy, Texas, and Gwendoline, born in Hereford, October 10, 1907.

J. ALLEN KYLE, M. D. On the roster of Harris county's able physicians and surgeons is found the name of J. Allen Kyle, M. D., who has gained distinctive preferment in the science of medicine and surgery. The reason is not far to seek. Advancement in the learned professions depends entirely upon merit.

Doctor Kyle was born in Botetourt county, Virginia, February 25, 1871, and is a son of John W. and Penelope (Biggs) Kyle. His father, a planter in Virginia, served with a Virginia regiment in the Confederate army during the war between the States. He came to Texas in 1877, settling among the first settlers of Victoria county prior to the advent of the railroads, and there passed the remainder of his active career in farming and stock raising.

J. Allen Kyle was six years of age when he accompanied his parents to Victoria county, and he was practically reared and educated by his great-uncle, William H. Kyle. The latter, a bachelor, had come to Southern Texas about 1850, and during the Civil war had served as a member of Shannon's Scouts, a company which formed a part of the famous Terry's Texas Rangers. After obtaining his preliminary educational training in the public schools of Victoria county, J. Allen Kyle evidenced an inclination for a medical career, but his father was in moderate circumstances, and it was almost impossible for the youth to secure the pecuniary assistance necessary for a collegiate training. His greatuncle had recognized and admired the young man's ambition, however, and offered him the help needed, and accordingly he enrolled as a student at the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, from which institution he was graduated in 1890 with the degree of Bachelor of Science in agriculture. He then went to New York City and entered upon his medical course in Columbia University, where he received the degree of Doctor of Medicine in 1894, and, following his graduation, was appointed interne at St. Vincent's Hospital, New York City. He there served on the surgical staff in various capacities, first as ambulance surgeon, then junior surgeon, then senior surgeon, and finally house surgeon, and all this within a period of two years. In 1896 he came to Houston, where he began a general practice of medicine and surgery, and here he has continued to the present time, having offices at No. 402 Carter Building. professional career has since been such as to distinguish him as one of the representative physicians and surgeons of Houston. Dr. Kyle has taken an active interest in the work of the various medical organizations, and is a member of the American Medical Association, the Texas State Medical Association, the South Texas Medical Association and the Harris County Medical Society. and is a director of the Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas and medical director of the Southern Benevolent League.

In 1901 Doctor Kyle was married to Miss Mary Stella Carr, a daughter of John O. and Mary Stella (Gallagher) Carr of Houston. One son, William Allen, was born to this union, in 1902. John O. Carr, father of Mrs. Kyle. was born at Charlottesville, Virginia, and received excellent educational advantages, being a graduate of the University of Virginia. During the Civil war he served as captain of a battery of artillery of Virginia troops in the Confederate army, while his wife's father was a major in the Union army, under Gen. Phil Sheridan, his regiment being commanded by Col. Phil Gallagher, one of his brothers.

Dr. and Mrs. Kyle reside in a handsome home at No. 2002 Crawford street. He is widely known in social and zouz Unaword street. He is widely known in social and fraternal circles of the city, belonging to the Oleander Country Club, the Houston Turn Verein, the Houston Light Gunds, the Houston Country Club, the Thalian Club and the Z Z Club, of Houston, and to the local lodges of the Knights of Pythiss and the Benevolent and Protective Order of Elks.

BENJAMIN SCHWEGLER. Until he was thirty-five years of age, Ben Schwegler maintained his home in his birth state, Missouri, coming to Texas in 1903, where he has since continued. From farming, an enterprise that claimed his attention here for five years, he developed an interest in real estate activities, and when Burkburnett was placed on the map of Wichita county, Texas, he was the first to settle here and establish himself in business. He has had an undeniably generous share in the work of promoting and developing the town, and the interest he has felt in the place well qualified him for the office of mayor, to which he was elected recently when the city was incorporated, he being the first to occupy the executive chair of the new city.

Mr. Schwegler was born in Gasconade county, Missouri, on March 27, 1868, and is the son of Joseph and Anna Schwegler, who passed their lives in that state, both dying about twelve years ago. Following the common school education that Mr. Schwegler gained in the schools of Gasconade county, he enjoyed a college course at Warrentown, Missouri, and a commercial course in the Sedalia Business College, in Sedalia, Missouri. He continued on his father's farm until he had reached his legal majority, when he struck out for himself, and going to Kansas City, Missouri, was there identified with mercantile activities for ten years. Four years of that time was spent in the wholesale grocery business, four in Kansas City, and during two years of the time he was in business for himself. In 1903 he sold out and made his way to Texas. He settled in this county immediately upon arriving here, and for five years devoted himself to agricultural activities, coming to Burkburnett in 1907, when the town had its inception, and here engaging in real estate operations. Success has attended his efforts, and he does a general real estate and insurance business here that reaches out into the more remote sections of the county. He also does a considerable business in oil leases and lands, and, though he still owns and operates his farm, he manages it indirectly, through a tenant. The farm, one of the fine ones of these parts, is located five miles from town and is a productive and creditable place.

Mr. Schwegler is one of the leading spirits in Burkburnett, and when the town was recently incorporated his fellow citizens showed their appreciation of his activities by electing him as first mayor of the city. As president of the school board he is rendering a valuable service to the community also, and the fine new building erected under his administration is a distinct credit to the place and might well be regarded with pride by a much larger and older city. A member of the Commercial Club of Burkburnett, he has an active part in the work of promoting the best interests of the town and in carrying out the plans of the club for the growth and progress of business enterprise in the community.

Mr. Schwegler was married in Alma, Missouri, in 1892. to Miss Pauline Giselmann, the daughter of Herman Giselmann, a well-known resident of Alma. Two children have been adopted by them: Ervin and Edna, twins. whose birth occurred on July 23, 1904. The family are members of the Lutheran church, and Mr. Schwegler is a Democrat in his political adherence, his active interest being confined to local rather than state politics.

HON. JAMES G. McDONALD. A native son of the Lone Star state, who has been prominently known both at the bar and on the bench, Judge James G. McDonald is now devoting the greater part of his time to the cultivation of his handsome farm of 855 acres, which is located at the county seat of Anderson, in Grimes county. He is a son of the pioneer, Judge James G. McDonald, who came to Texas in 1851 as a young married man from Carthage, Tennessee, a grandson of Henry Brown McDonald, and a great-grandson of Hugh McDonald, who came from Scotland, settled in North Carolina, and was a conspicuous Revolutionary soldier of General Marion's legion, Henry Brown McDonald, who died at Carthage, nessee, married Miss Mary Crowder, and they became the parents of the following children: Melvina, who married E. C. Rawson, of Waxahachie, Texas; Gen. James G.; Mrs. Page, who spent her life in Smith county, Tennessee; Mrs. McKinley, who also spent her life in that state, where she first married William Danley; Mrs. Young B. Jones, who died in the same state; Dr. Henry Clay, who practiced medicine at Carthage, Tennessee, and died there; Orville, who went to California in 1848, returned home after the war, but went out again in 1867 with a company seeking gold, and was lost to view for-ever; Brown, who was the first man killed in Colonel Parson's Texas Regiment in 1862; William H., who was shot in the head at Chickamauga, but survived until 1890 and died in Hillsboro, Texas. Henry Brown McDonald, the grandfather of Judge McDonald, was married (second) to Mrs. Julia Powell, and they had these children: Mrs. Robinson and Mrs. Waters, of Nashville, Tennes-see; Alice, who died single; David M., a graduate of West Point Academy, who fought against the Ute Indians as a lieutenant and resigned from the army, dying at Carthage, Tennessee.

Gen. James G. McDonald was born in Smith county. Tennessee, September 20, 1824, and, inheriting his father's predilection for the law, studied for that profession. He was a student of Lebanon, Tennessee, where he graduated in law, and there began to practice. He came to Texas by water to Galveston and by stage to Anderson and settled among strangers here, making the law his business from the first in Texas and following it all his life. He was district attorney when his district embraced all the territory to Galveston, Beaumont and the southeast corner of the state, and served both before and Southness corner of the state, and settled both decrease after the war. Among far compers were Peter W. Gray, who was district judge whin the General McDonald was district attorney; Maj. Hannbal H. Boone; Capt. J. C. Hutchison, now of Houston; A. T. McKinney, of Lutslule; Ben Goodrich, Judge Maxey and Judge Baker

In politics General McDonald was always a Democrat, and was chosen to represent his locality in the legislature before the war, and when the Civil war was in progress he was brigadier general of the Texas state troops. Following the close of hostilities, he served as district attorney again and as a member of the Senate. He took an active part in state politics, was frequently with Gen. Sam Houston, with whom he was intimately acquainted and whom he greatly admired, and was also an admirer of Andrew Jackson. He favored the war and was a Secessionist, but his impaired physique made it impossible for him to take the field in active service. In his spiritual relations General McDonald was a Methodist. He was a moral man and was one of those courteous Southern gentlemen of the old school. He read much in law, politics, biography and current literature, and always favored public education, and his fraternal work extended to a membership in the Independent Order of daughter of Charles Davis. She died October 29, 1886, and was followed to the grave by the General March 11, 1903. Mrs. McDonald was a graduate of the National Female College at Nashville, Tennessee, of which Dr. Elliott was president, and she demonstrated her ability in composition as a writer. She was the mother of ten children, eight of whom came to maturity, but only four of whom reared families: Mrs. Mary L. Meecham, wife of W. W. Meecham, of Anderson; Finney, who is a resident of Montgomery, Texas; Mrs. Julia Goodlett, who died at San Bernardino, California; James G., of this review; William L., who is an attorney of New York City; Mrs. P. S. Halleck, a resident of Ann Arbor, Michigan; and Brown, whose home is at Duluth, Minnesota.

Judge James G. McDonald was born at Anderson, Texas, September 11, 1858, and has been a student during the greater part of his life. He was a youth of the rural wilds about Anderson, and laid aside his books with a common school education. He studied law with his father and was admitted to the bar in 1888, before Judge Norman G. Kittrell, and was examined by Colonel Meecham, Frank Brigance and Major H. H. Boone. He engaged in the practice in 1889 alone and has continued to be engaged therein ever since, his career in his profession having been one of consecutive advancement and well merited success, his practice covering the general professional business and his standing among his professional brethren being high.

Judge McDonald has been a Democrat all his life, In 1900 he was in the state convention at Waco, in 1902 was in the Galveston convention, and was one of the strongest supporters of Senator Bailey during the disagreement over that statesman. While a member of the Legislature, Judge McDonald supported Senator Bailey's interests in the legislative investigation that took place, and still regards him as the truest and bravest statesman of them all. He was county attorney from 1890 to 1892, and county judge from 1892 to 1896. In 1899 he aided in organizing the White Man's Union, when the negroes were dominating the policies of the county, and by this method disfranchised the blacks and put the county into the white column. From 1900 to 1904 he again served as county judge, and was then sent to the Thirtieth and Thirty-First Legislatures, where he was known as one of the working members of those dis-tinguished bodies. He served on judiciary committee No. 1 and the committees on education and appropriations, and in the latter session was chairman of the committee on internal improvements. Among the things accomplished by him in the Legislature was the introduction of a bill to pay special veniremen a dollar a day for service, whether they were selected as jurymen or not, whereas, before, they received no pay unless put on the jury. He lined himself up with the interests of public education in the rural schools and worked in harmony with the state superintendent of education in that work. He advocated the law requiring the teaching of agriculture in the common schools. At present Judge McDonald's time and attention are chiefly devoted to his farm. His plantation, which lies against the county seat, has 855 acres of land in cultivation and is given over to the raising of cotton, corn and hay. Judge McDonald is a Mason, belonging to the Blue Lodge, Chapter and Council. He is past noble grand of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and has been a delegate to the Grand Lodge of the state.

On January 20, 1893, Judge McDonald was married to Miss Eleanor Stone, a daughter of Maj, William M. Stone, of Anderson, and a granddaughter of Henry Fantharp. She died January 25, 1903, leaving one daughter, Mary Eleanor, who passed away June 15, 1903.

Henry Fantharp was the very first settler of Anderson and came here from England about 1830. He established a hotel in the little hamlet, and all the emigration through this section in pioneer days passed by his place. General Houston and other prominent Texans made his hotel their stopping place, and he was just one of those frontier characters who would be well remembered. He was a shrewd business man, thrifty, industrious and capable, and accumulated a handsome property in various parts of the state. His family comprised a son and daughter, viz.: John, who left no issue, and Mary, who married Maj. William M. Stone, the father of Mrs. Judge McDonald. The Stone children were as follows: Annie, who married C. L. Kettler and died at Dallas, Texas, leaving no issue; Mrs. McDonald; Julia, who became Mrs. J. T. Yarborough, who now resides in Hong-Kong, China, as Mrs. Desaussure, and has two daughters, Julia and Alice; William M., of Marianna, Florida, and Henry, who died as a youth, Henry Fantharp died in October, 1868, and his wife followed him to the grave in the same week.

JAMES W. STRINGER. Twenty-three years ago James W. Stringer came to Wichita county, Texas, here identifying himself with farming activities, and from then up to the present time he has been a resident of said county and has long been reckoned among the successful men of the community. He extended his interests to the cattle business soon after he located here, and he is still so connected, while he has become identified with other financial and industrial enterprises of the cities of this county, by means of which he has come to occupy a position of no little importance in Wichita Falls,

James W. Stringer is a native of Nevada county, Arkansas, born there on March 21, 1862, and he is a son of Wesley W. and Elmina (Haines) Stringer, both native Georgians. Wesley W. Stringer was a farmer all his life, more or less successful, and his residence in Arkansas began in 1847, when he was just twenty-five years of age. He enlisted with an Arkansas regiment for service in the Confederate army, and served throughout the war, escaping without injury, save for the explosion of a minie ball in his vicinity, which impaired his hearing. He died in Columbia county, Arkansas, when he was sixty-four years of age, and the mother also passed away there, in the fifty-eighth year of life.

James W. Stringer was the eighth-born child in a family of five sons and four daughters. He had his early education, somewhat inclined to meagerness, in the common schools of Nevada county, Arkansas, and up to the age of twenty-one remained at home on the farm. Then, when he felt himself entitled to his freedom by reason of his age, he left home and came to Texas, settling in Bell county in the summer of 1882. He engaged in farming there and was eight years in that district. When Mr. Stringer first came to Texas he spent one year when Mr. Stringer insteame to feats at spent one year attending school, and thus added not a little to his education. In 1890 he came to Wichita County, where he bought a farm. He gradually worked into the cattle business, and, though he has withdrawn to some extent. from his regular farming activities, he is still interested in the cattle business. He has with the passing years come to have an interest in certain oil properties of the state, and he is vice president of the First National Bank of Electra, Texas, as well as a stockholder. He is also a stockholder in the Farmers' State Bank at Burk-burnett and in the First National Bank at Wichita Falls. He has never sought for a place in politics, though he has taken an active part in the Democratic activities of the county and is regarded as one of the stanch members of the party. Fraternally he is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

On November 13, 1890, Mr. Stringer was married in Falls county, Texas, to Miss Sue Gribble, a native of Tennessee and a daughter of Dr. C. Gribble. The mother of Mrs. Stringer died when she was a babe of two years. To Mr. and Mrs. Stringer have been born three sons and three daughters, concerning whom brief mention is made as follows: Lois, the eldest, was born in Wichita county, and she is now the wife of E. W. Marriott of Electra, Texas. The others are Myrtice, Leslie, Icie, James and Hubter, and all are members of the family circle, with the single exception of Miss Myrtice, who is a student in the Texas Christian University, at Fort Worth, now in her third year at that well-known institution. Leslie and Icie are high-school students in Wichita Falls, and the two younger ones are attending the grade schools.

In the fall of 1913 Mr. Stringer established the family home in Wichita Falls, here erecting a handsome home on Grant street opposite Kemp Boulevard, in the finest residence district of the city. The family are popular and prominent in social and other circles of the community and have a host of good friends throughout the county, where they have long been known for their many sterling qualities.

RICHARD H. ALWOOD. A retired resident of Gainesville, Mr. Alwood was one of the pioneers of that city, having located there when it was a small village and still exposed to the Indian raids which made life and property unsafe in north Texas for a number of years after the Civil war, Mr. Alwood has had a great variety of experiences during his career and has possessed that active temperament of the pioneer and the frontiersman.

Richard H. Alwood was born in St. Mary's Parish, in Louisiana, January 10, 1847, a son of John and Eliza (Donald) Alwood, his father a native of Ireland and the mother of Mississippi. The father followed farming as his regular vocation. Richard was the second of the three children, and his brother James and sister Sallie are both deceased.

Richard H. Alwood grew up in Louisiana, received his education in the local schools, and at the age of sixteen, in 1863, enlisted as a soldier of the Confederacy in the Eighth Louisiana Tigers, and later was transferred to the Ninth Louisiana Tigers. He fought from the begin-ning of his enlistment until the close of the war as a private. Following the war he went out to Omaha and became identified with the great transportation business conducted by wagon and team across Nebraska into Nevada. He continued that work until he came to Gainesville, in 1868. Gainesville in that year was a village, possessing two saloons, one church, one blacksmith shop, one hotel, and one mill. Its proximity to the Red River and the border of the Indian territory exposed it to frequent raids from Indians and white outlaws, and on one occasion, while Mr. Alwood was in charge of a freighting train, the Indians stole eight mules from the wagons near Jacksboro. He got the mules back, however, without any fight. On locating at Gainesville, Mr. Alwood was given employment in driving a team for the firm of Cloud & Peary, and continued that work for one year. He then engaged in the livery and feed business, and had that establishment for a year. After that he was at work as a carpenter, and then engaged in the retail meat business, and conducted a shop in Gainesville until he retired, in July, 1912. In the meantime he had been extensively interested in cattle dealing, and bought and sold a large number of stock at different times. Mr. Alwood now has a nice little farm of fifty acres near Gainesville, and makes this place his hobby and recreation, giving all his attention to its management.

Mr. Alwood was married in 1871 to Miss Margaret Dials, a native of Kentucky and a daughter of Jacob K. Dials. Mr. Dials came from Kentucky to Missonri, and then to Dallas, Texas, in 1859, later moving to Gainesville, where his death occurred in 1876. Mr. and Mrs. Alwood had three children: Jimmie Florence, who died at the age of five years; one that died in infancy; and Maude L. is the wife of Jacob B. Feltz of Gainseville, a traveling salesman, and they have one child, Alwood.

Mr. Alwood is a Democrat without any desire for official honors. He is an active member of the Methodist church and is well known in Masonic circles. He has served as junior warden of the Blue Lodge, is also a Royal Arch Mason, and has been Master of the Second Veil, and at present is principal sojourner in the local lodge. Mr. Alwood and family reside at 1304 East California Street.

JOHN W. PHILPOTT. In making a study of the careers and characters of men of prominence the contemporary biographer is naturally led to inquire into the secrets of their successes and the motives which have prompted their actions. It is almost invariably found that success is a matter of the application of experience and sound judgment at the right time and in the right manner. In almost every instance the successful men of any profession or line of business have obtained their positions through persistent individual effort. The career of John W. Philpott, proprietor of the J. W. Philpott grain elevator at Miami, Roberts county, is no exception to this rule, for but a few short years ago he arrived in Texas without capital or resources and through his own ability and perseverance has steadily risen to a position where he is recognized as one of the leading business men of his community. Mr. Philpott was born in Coffee county, Tennessee, September 25, 1875, the fourth in order of birth of the thirteen children of John and Ruth Naomi (Tony) Philpott.

John Philpott was born May 3, 1836, in Tennessee, and in that state was educated, reared and married. He became a well-known merchant in Coffee county, retiring from mercantile pursuits a few years before removing to Shelbyville, in Bedford county, Tennessee. In 1894 he came to Texas and located in Fannin county, where he became largely interested in farming, but has since sold most of his land, although he recently bought a farm near Canfield, Arkansas. He was married in Coffee county, Tennessee, to Ruth Naomi Tony, who was born in Illinois and educated in Tennessee, and she passed away in the latter state just prior to the family's removal to the Lone Star state.

John W. Philpott secured his education in the public schools of Shelbyville, Tennessee, and was twenty-one years of age when he came to Fannin county, there eutering upon his career as a grower of cotton, wheat and corn. He continued in Fanniu county for six years, and then removed to Cooke county, where for four years he was interested in wheat farming and cattle raising. He subsequently disposed of his interests in that locality and came to Miami, embarking in operations in farming and wheat shipping in Roberts county until the establishment of the J. W. Philpott Grain Elevator, in 1911, since which time he has devoted his entire time to this business. The rise of Mr. Philpott has been steady and rapid, as will be shown by comparing the young man who arrived in Texas with a capital of $10.05 with the substantial man of business who in 1912 shipped 175 cars of grain, representing $100,000, to Galveston and the eastern markets. He owns 960 acres of land, of which he has 750 acres sown with wheat, and he also owns lots at Pampa, property at Greenwade, eight lots in Miami, and a comfortable residence. His career has been one of great activity and uncommon success, due to the exercise of good judgment and the exhibition under all circumstances of the strictest integrity. He has shown unbounded faith in Texas, and in numerous ways has been influential in forwarding its interests. Primarily a business man, with onerous duties to claim his time and attentiou, he has not been indifferent to the responsibilities which a community expects its prominent men to assume, and has served faithfully and conscientiously as school director and road overseer. His political tendencies make him a Democrat, while his religious connection is with the Baptist church.

Mr. Philpott was married December 14, 1897, in Fannin county, Texas, to Miss Nora Lyons, a daughter of David Lyons of that county. Five children have been born of this union: Ruth N., born in Fannin county December 23, 1899; James W., born in Cooke county, Texas, January 4, 1904; Flora May, born in Cooke county, May 28, 1905; George Arthur, born in Gray county, Texas, September 6, 1907; and Charlie Kint, born November 25, 1912, at Miami. The three older children are attending public school at Miami.

LEWIS RANDOLPH BRYAN. A former president of the Texas State Bar Association, Mr. Bryan was admitted to the bar of this state in April, 1880, at Brenham and has had a varied experience as a practicing lawyer. For the past thirteen years he has been identified with the Houston bar, one of the leaders in the profession and one of the citizens who stand high in social and public life.

The Bryan family represented by this Houston lawyer is one of the oldest and most prominent in the history of the state. His father was Moses Austin Bryan, whose name represents to students of Texas some of the most eminent personalities and events connected with the early growth and development of this commonwealth. Moses Austin Bryan was a native of Missouri and a nephew of Stephen F. Austin, the father of Texas. He came to Texas in 1831, a number of years after the Austins had undertaken their settlement and colonization enterprises, and became the private secretary of the real head of American affairs in this Mexican province. He accompanied Mr. Austin on one or more of his journeys into Mexico and was closely associated with the events and major personalities which led up to the separation of Texas from Mexico by the Revolution of 1835-36. At the final battle of San Jacinto, which resulted in the triumph of Texas over Mexico, Moses Austin Bryan was first sergeant in Mosely Baker's company in the regiment commanded by General Burleson, the grandfather of Postmaster General A. S. Burleson. He was also a close personal friend of Col. Frank Johnson, whose historical manuscripts are published as the chief features of his

Lewis Randolph Bryan was born in Brazoria county, Texas, October 2, 1858. The maiden name of his mother was Cora Lewis, daughter of Colonel Ira R. Lewis, a member of the consultation committee in 1835. Mr Bryan attained his early education at Independence, in Washington County, Texas, and was sent to Baylor University, then at Independence, where he was graduated from a classical course with the degree of B. S. in 1877. He studied law in the office of Shepard & Garrett, a firm composed of Seth Shepard, now Chief Justice, Court of composed of Sea Suepara, now Chief Justice. Court of Appeals of District of Columbia, and C. C. Garrett, afterwards Chief Justice of Court of Appeals, First Supreme Judicial District of Texas, and also studied under Honorable John Sayles and Honorable Jas, E. Shepard, who gave lectures at Brenham in 1879 and 1880. Admitted to the bar on the 9th of April, 1880, he began practice at once in the old town of La Grange with Honorable J. W. Hill, now of San Angelo, Texas, where he remained until September, 1882, at which date he moved to Brenham and entered into partnership with W. W. Searcy, now president of the Texas State Bar Association, with whom he continued until 1888, and then was associated with J. D. Campbell, now of Beaumont, Texas. From 1890, or more than ten years, he was established in practice in Brazoria county. On the first of January, 1901, Mr. Bryan moved his home to Houston, and he enjoys a large practice in this city. His offices are in the Commercial Bank Building. His success in law has also brought him into active connection with business affairs, and he is now president of the Colonial Land & Loan Company of Houston, and is Secretary and Treasurer of the Houston Home Company. Mr. Bryan was elected on July 3, 1902, President of the Texas State Bar Association, and held that office during the succeeding year. He is prominent in his profession and known among the fraternity from the south to the north boundaries of this great state. During the year 1911 he also served as president of the Harris County Bar Association. Representing a pioneer family himself, Mr. Bryan was married on October 15, 1891, to Miss Martha J. Shepard, who, on her side, is also descended from one of the families which have been identified with Texas since the Republic era and with the early history of the nation and of the state of Kentucky. Her father was Col. Chauncey B. Shepard, who took up his residence in the Republic in 1837, only one year after the winning of independence. He was for many years a well-known resident of Brenhau, Texas. Mrs. Bryan is also a Colonial Dame and a Daughter of American Revolution through both her Shepard ancestors and through her mother's family, viz., the well-known Andrews family of Kentucky. The three children of Mr. and Mrs. Bryan are Lewis Randolph, Jr., who is a graduate of the law department of the University of Texas and is now associated with his father in the practice of law; Mary Shepard, a student in the University of Texas in the class of 1915; and Cora Louise, now at Sweet Briar College, Virginia. The Bryan home is at 802 Dennis Avenue, in Houston.

Capt. James M. Lee. After a career of varied eventfulness, beginning in the days of his early manhood, when he fought as a Confederate soldier, Captain Lee is now enjoyining the peace and contentment of retired life in Gainesville, where he is surrounded by his family and His many friends.

James M. Lee was born in Rockbridge, Virginia, August 16, 1837, a son of Alexander and Sallie (Lee) Lee, the father having been a farmer and stock man of Virginia. The eight children of the family are all now deceased with the exception of Captain Lee at Gainesville. Both parents were natives of Virginia, and the father was a first cousin of Gen. Robert E. and Gen. Fitzhugh Lee, both famous in the military annals of our nation.

James M. Lee grew up in Virginia, where he was edueated in the local and private schools, and when nineteen years of age came to Missouri, after the death of his parents. He began his career without capital, and his first work in Missouri was on a farm for wages. He then for two years farmed with his consin, Richard Lee. He was living in Missouri when the war broke out and enlisted in Company E, in Elliott's Regiment, in Shelby's brigade, under General Price, and went through the war, most of his service being in the states of Missouri and Arkansas, and the Mississippi Valley. He was a private at his enlistment, but later became quartermaster in his regiment, and came out of the army with the rank of captain. He saw a great deal of active service and, though his hat was shot through, he was never wounded. In 1874 Captain Lee moved to Texas, locating at Whitesboro, where he was engaged in farming and also conducted a hotel and livery business. For a number of years he was a well-known cattle raiser in that vicinity, and continued active in his varied occupations until 1905, in which year he retired. At the present time Captain Lee is the owner of 1,280 acres of land in the Pecos River Valley, in southwest Texas. He has been successful as a business man and has always enjoyed the outdoor life and work of farming, and now as a diversion manages and works a small place near Gainesville. He is a Democrat, but has never been active in party affairs. Since 1863 Captain Lee has been affiliated with the Masonic Order and is one of the most popular members of the local lodge in Gainesville. His home is at 709 South Denton street, in Gainesville.

In January, 1867, Captain Lee married Miss Bettie Early. She also is related to a military family, her father, John Early, having been a relative of the famous General Early of the Confederate army. Mrs. Lee was one of three children, the others being Mrs. Eichler of Butler, Missouri, and Mrs. Lucy Gillespie, deceased. Mr. and Mrs. Lee have three children: Elizabeth, the widow of Percy Darwin; John Early, a manufacturer and business man of Dallas, Texas, and the father of one child; and Charles H., a cotton broker in Dallas, and has two children. Mrs. Elizabeth Darwin, who resides with her father, is very prominent in civic and social affairs in Gainesville, and is well known for her work throughout the state. She is chairman of the Civic Improvement Committee of the XLI Club, and in that capacity has done some notable work in the line of civic improvement. Her accomplishments came within half a point of gaining the first prize offered by a Texas magazine for plans and actual work accomplished in civic improvement. As chairman of the committee of the XLI Club she had charge of all the work connected with the cleaning up of the City of Gainesville, and local citizens give her much credit for her leadership in a campaign for wholesome and sanitary conditions in the town. During the past year, due largely to her influence, more trees and flowers have been planted along the streets and about the homes of Gainesville people than were set out in any previous period of five years. Because of excellent results obtained in the betterment of pure food conditions, she has been appointed assistant to the Food aud Drug Commission of Texas, the first woman ever appointed on such a commission. Mrs. Darwin is vice president of the District Federation of Women's Clubs and has held membership in the XLI Club for the past seventeen years.

WILLIAM L. MEADERS. After many years of successful and extensive connection with the cattle and live stock business in this state William L. Meaders in 1907 established himself in business with his brother in Olney under the firm name of the Meaders Brothers' Hardware Company, today one of the most prominent and prosperous firms of its kind in this section of the state. this, as in his other enterprises, success has attended the efforts of Mr. Meaders, and in Olney, as in other towns with which he has been variously identified, Mr. Meaders has taken his place among the leading men of the community. That he has gained a measure of success in his business life is due entirely to the qualities that dominate the man, for he started out with few advantages and no capital, but his determination and energy stood him in excellent stead in their place, with the result that he is today independent.

Born in Berry county, Missouri, on March 20, 1862, William L. Meadors is a son of Eleck A. and Mary (Weathers) Meaders, natives of Kentucky and of Indiana, respectively. Both beeame identified with the life of Missouri at an early period in their existence, and did not remove to Texas until the autumn of 1877, when they settled at Breckenridge, in Stephens county, there taking up farming and stock raising, in which enterprise they continued until the end of their lives. The father deal in November, 1901, aged acventy-three, and the mother passed away in June, 1907, aged seventy. The father was active in the Civil war as a participant The father was active in the Civil war as a participant timed service in the Southern Division of the Confeate army. The mother was educated in private schools in Missouri, and she met and married her bushond in Missouri, Four children were born to them, as follows: J. B. Meaders, engaged with his brother William L. of this review; Mrs. Edna Pyles, living in Frederick, Oklahoma; John A. Meaders, living at Breckenridge.

William L. Meaders attended the country schools of Berry county as a boy, and when he left school he interested himself in stock raising and farming. Coming to Texas in 1877, he devoted himself to the business on a large scale, continuing in Stephens, county in that business from Jamnary, 1878, to August, 1907, in the latter year removing to Young county and settling at Oincy, where he has since been engaged in business. When Mr. Meaders joined his brother in the establishment of their present hardware business in Olney, he did so on a small scale, the business being by no means an extensive one, but one that was well established and which grew in strength and scope with each succeeding season. An immense stock of goods and largely increased show rooms mark the difference between the present concern and that which they brought into life six years ago, and the business is recognized as one of the leading hardware, wagon and implement houses in this section of the state today.

Mr. Meaders, while a resident of Stephens country, was for five years county commissioner of that country, serving on the Democratic ticket, which party he has long been a stanch adherent of. He is a citizen of many excellent qualities, and has a deal of civic pride and a progressive spirit that make him a desirable addition to any community. Fraternally, he has membership in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, being a charter member of the Stephens county lodge, in which he has passed all chairs. He is a member of the Presbyterian church.

On December 20, 1888, Mr. Meaders was married to Miss Annie Veale, of Breckenridge, the daughter of Carroll and Amanda (Arel) Veale, the mother being still alive and a resident of Hill county, Texas. Seven children have been born to Mr. and Mrs. Meaders: Charles Meaders, the eldest, was born in 1889 in Stephens county. He married Mary Mateson on November 27th and resides in Young county. Leona Meaders is deceased. James, living at home, was born in 1894. Irene, born in 1896, is attending high school. Willie, Mary and Eleck, the three youngest, were born in 1900, 1902 and 1904, respectively.

The Meaders family is one that enjoys a leading place in the best social activities of Olmey, where they are well known and highly esteemed for their many excellent qualities, and where they display a proper interest in the welfare of the community as a whole.

WILLIAM W. COFFMAN. Among the younger business men of Gore, Texas, William W. Coffman has been very successful. As vice president of the First National Bank he occupies a position of importance in the financial world and has the confidence and respect of the older business men of the town. Mr. Coffman is a native of the state of Texas and consequently is never sparing in his efforts to improve conditions and build up that section of the state in which he makes his home.

William W. Coffman was born in Young county, Texas, on the 4th of August, 1877, the son of Albert W. Coffman. The latter was born in Arkansas, but came to Texas as a boy and has lived in Texas all his life since that time. He now resides in Knox county, where he follows farming for a livelihood. He married Miss Maggie Thomas after coming to Texas. Mrs. Coffman is a native of Tennessee and she is an active member of the Methodist church.

Of the five children of his parents, William W. Coffman was the third in order of birth. He grow to manhood in Texas, receiving his education in the public schools of the state. At the age of nineteen, having completed the high school work, he went to work. At first he remained on the farm with his father and then he left home and went to farming on his own account. He followed this occupation for ten years and made a success of it, for he accumulated enough money to assist in the organization of the bank of which he is now one of the officials. He has been vice president and active head of the First National Bank ever since its establishment.

Both Mr. Coffman and his wife are members of the Methodist church. He is a member of the Democratic party in his political affiliations and has been active in behalf of his party. His interest in educational affairs led to his election as a member of the school board, upon which he served for some time. In the fraternal world he is a member of the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons and of the Woordmen of the World.

He is a member of the Commercial Club and was president of this organization at one time.

Mr. Coffman was married in Young county, Texas, on the 25th of November, 1898, to Mis Tessie Stone, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. P. P. Stone, of Young county. They have become the parents of six children, three boys and three girls, as follows: Floyd, William, Lois, Neva. Josie and Walter.

A. F. McLaughlin. For ten years prior to the advent of A. F. McLaughlin into Archer City, where he established one of the finest dry goods stores here, he was located at Bartlett, in Williamson county, Texas, where for ten years he conducted successfully a greecy business. He first came here in 1910, and though the time of his residence here has been brief, he has made a most excellent start in his business and bids fair to realize even greater success from his venture into business in this community.

Born in South Carolina, in Darlington county, in June, 1858, A. F. McLanghin is the son of Archibald and Frances Susan (Ewing) McLaughin, both natives of South Carolina, where they passed their lives. The father was a planter and a school teacher in his younger days, and when he died in February, 1871, he was sixty years of age, his natal day having been August 1, 1811. The mother received her education in her native state, and there married Archibald McLaughlin. She died on June 8, 1858, aged eighteen years, leaving an infant son, A. F. McLaughlin, of this review.

In his boyhood days Mr. McLaughlin attended the schools of the district wherein he was reared in South Carolina, and when he came to an age where he felt some responsibility, he identified himself with the business of agriculture, with which he had gained no slight nequaintance at home. He first saw Texas on November 16, 1875, and located at Georgetown, in Williamson county, there remaining engaged in farming activities for twenty-six years. He moved to Bartlett, in Williamson county then, and for ten years thereafter was engaged in the grocery business in that place, where he propered and gained sufficient insight into business methods that he felt embodemed to launch out into the dry goods business. He chose as a suitable location Archer City, and, coming here in 1910, he opened up one of the finest general dry goods stores that the city has ever known. He has prospered in this last venture and has a reputation for business veracity and acumen that is alike the envy and the pride of the committee.

A Democrat in his political faith, Mr. McLaughlin had given stanch adherence to the party all his days, and such service as he has been able to render has been done cheerfully. He takes a genuine interest in the educational affairs of the town and county that cannot fail to bear good fruit. He has made his own way in business, unaided by any outside forces or influences whatsoever, and a generous measure of credit for his accomplishments should be and is accorded to him.

 her, 1897, is at school. Homer Charles, born December 8, 1899, is also attending high school. Ermond Simpson, born in 1900 in Williamson county, is in the grade schools of Archer City, as is also Maurice Twing, the youngest of the ten, born in 1901 at the family home in Williamson county.

Mr. McLaughlin is prominent and popular with the general public and has membership in the Independent Order of Odd Fellows in Archer City, though he maintains no other fraternal relations. He comes out stancily in his allegiance to the Lone Star state, calling it the finest state in the Union, and unhesitatingly states that he can produce the evidence to back his statement, should there be those who question his judgment.

THOMAS WILLIAM McGraw. Beginning in the cetton field as a picker, Thomas William McGraw, of Munday, Texas, as a celevel the place where he is regarded as one of the state of

Thomas William McGraw was born in Hunt county, Texas, on the 10th day of July, 1876. His father, John McGraw, was born in Ireland. He came to Texas in 1870 and has lived in this state ever since. He now resides in Collin county, and ever since coming to the state has been engaged in farming. After coming to Texas he met and married Miss Mary Easter Rice. Both Mr. and Mrs. McGraw are communicants of the Roman Catholic Church. There were eleven children born to Mr. and Mrs. McGraw for whom Thomas W. McGraw is the next to the eldest. His older brother, John McGraw, is associated with him in the business and is treasurer of the company.

In the company.

It is the company was sent to the public schools of his home W. Mostraw was sent to the public schools of his home W. Mostraw was he was old enough to go to school. He remained at home, attending school and adingh his father with the work of the farm until he was nineteen years of age. He then started out for himself and his first position was picking cotton. For about two years he was engaged in general farming, picking cotton when there was nothing better to do. He then began to farm for himself and for about five years was thus capaged. He never cared for the agricultural life, and when an opportunity came to him to go to work in a store in Munday he accepted it gladly. He worked in this store for about three years and the Knox County lelevator Company was organized and Mr. McGraw was made president and general manager. The success of this company has been largely due to success the success of the company. It handles grain, feed, ice and coal, and does an extensive wholesale and retail basiness. The company also handles cattle, feeding and shirping many head her year.

Mr. McGraw is a member of the Democratic party, but takes no interest in politics other than to east his vote for the man whom he considers best fitted to hold office. He was reared in the Roman Catholic Church, but is a believer in other denominations and gives his support impartially to all. In fraternal affairs he is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows.

Mr. McGraw married Miss Agnes Lou Nesbitt at Wyle, Fexas, on the 7th of November, 1899, Mrs. McGraw being a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. W. Nesbitt, of Wyle, Texas. Mr. and Mrs. McGraw have bad six children born to them, namely: Hattle Mary, John George. Lou Ethel, Thomas Garnett, Roy Paul and Minnie Rose.

COLUMBUS S. WHITESIDE. The present mayor of Seymour, Texas, Columbus S. Whiteside, combines in his person the practical qualities of the business man with the qualities that make a man a social favorite. Mr. Whiteside, although not a native of the state of Texas, is as enthusiastic over her future and ambitions for core, welfare of the state and her people as any native Texan. A keen business man, a natural executive, with an honest and fearless character, his success and popularity may be easily explained.

Columbus S. Whiteside was born in White Plains, Alabama, on the 16th of November, 1861. He grew up ir his native town and attended the public schools. When he was shout twenty-eight years of age he left Alabama and came to Texas. Locating in Baylor county, he first took up farming. After several years in this occupation he came to Seymour and started a dry goods store, After conducting this more or less successfully for eight or ten years, Mr. Whiteside concluded to take up outdoor life again. He consequently went to El Paso county, Texas, and went into the ranching busnness, After a few years of this life he returned to Seymour and bought out the proprietor of his present business. This was in the fall of 1912 and he has already increased the business. He handles feed and fuel and does an extensive retail business.

Mr. Whiteside is a member of the Democratic party and has always been active in politics. He was elected mayor of Seymour during his first period of residence here, being the second mayor of the city. Upon his return to his old home the citizens lost no time in again electing him to the office, and he is now serving his second term. He has been a member of the school board for several years. In religious matters Mr. White-side is a member of the Methodist Church. He says that in his opinion Texas has more opportunities and resources than any other state, and that she is always ready with a welcome to any honest man who wishes to make a home.

Mr. Whiteside was married in White Plains, Alabama, on the 23d of December, 1881, to Miss Carrie Borden, a daughter of Lieut, and Mrs. Joseph Borden, of that place. Mr. and Mrs. Whiteside have nine children, as follows: Hoyt; Thomas; Lizzie, who married George Shupee and lives in San Antonio; Guy and Roy, who are twins; Whit, Carrie, Nevada and Hobson.

ROBERT R. NEYLAND. The senior member of the representative law firm of Neyland & Neyland, in which his coadjutor is his younger brother, Mayo Neyland, is known as one of the leading members of the bar of Hunt county and is engaged in the practice of his profession in the City of Greenville, the judicial center of the county and one of the most thriving commercial and in-dustrial centers of northern Texas. Mr. Neyland is a native of the Lone Star state and a scion of one of its well-known and highly honored pioneer families, and in character and achievement he has given further prestige to the name which he bears. He has been actively engaged in the practice of his profession at Greenville for thirty years and has witnessed and assisted in the development of the place from the status of a mere village into a prosperous and progressive city of many advantages and attractions. From the statements already made, it becomes patent that there is all of consistency in according special recognition to Mr. Ney-land in this history of the state which has ever been his home and in which he has found ample opportunity for worthy achievement.

Mr. Neyland was born at Woodville, Tyler county, Texas, on the 25th of October, 1859, and is a son of Lieut.-Col. Robert R. and Emily (Wells) Neyland, the former of whom was born near Washington, District of Columbia, in 1832, and the latter of whom was born in Washington, District of Columbia, a daughter of James M. Wells, who was graduated in the United States Military Academy, at West Point, and who thereafter served as an army officer in Texas and other parts of Vol. IY-15 the Southwest. He was territorial judge of New Mexica at the time of the inception of the Civil war and resigned this office to tender his services in defense of the cause of the Confederacy, but his death occurred before the great conflict had passed its incipient stage. Mrs. Emily (Wells) Neyland was, in the maternal line, a granddaughter of John Porbes, who was a distinguished Texas pioneer and who served as an officer in the army of General Houston, under whom he participated in the battle of San Jacinto, as well as other engagements.

Col. Robert R. Neyland was reared and educated in Texas and was a scion of the stanchest of Southern stock, his father, Dr. Williams Neyland, having been born in Mississippi and having become a successful planter in the state of Louisiana, where he maintained his home until 1840, when he removed with his family to the Republic of Texas, of which Gen. Sam Houston was then president. He became one of the pioneer settlers of Jasper county and there passed the residue of his life, his attention having here been given to agri-In the his attention having here over given to agri-cultural pursuits and stock-growing. Col. Robert R. Neyland was a lad of about eight years at the time of the family removal to Texas and his early experiences were gained under the conditions and influences of the pioneer epoch in the history of this state. He became a successful lawyer in Tyler county and was one of the honored and influential citizens of that section of the state. He went forth as a valiant soldier and officer in the Confederate service when the Civil war was pre-cipitated upon the nation, and he served as lieutenantcolonel in a Texas regiment until his death, which occurred in 1862, at Shreveport, Louisiana, where his regiment was then stationed, and his mortal remains were laid to rest with full military honors at Shelbyville, Texas. His brother, Col. William M. Neyland, was Vinc, reass. The bottom, co., variant at a section, and lieutenant-colonel of another regiment in the same brigade, and another brother, the late Dr. A. Carroll Neyland, served in the army of Gen. Robert E. Lee in northern Virginia; after the war he went to the island of Jamaica, became a British subject and attained to precedence as one of the wealthiest and most influential citizens of Jamaica, where he continued to reside until his death in 1906.

After the death of her honored husband, Mrs. Emily (Wells) Neyland removed with her family to Jasper county, where she lived until 1870. She lived at Galveston and Houston from 1870 to 1873, went thence to Washington, District of Columbia; there she resided until 1891, since which time she has lived at Greenfield. She is one of the notbe pioneer women of the state and one who is loved by all who came within the sphere of her gracious influence.

Robert R. Neyland, whose mame initiates this review, received his rudimentary education in the primitive pioneer schools of Jasper county, having because of three years at the time of the removal of the family to the latter county. In 1872 he was sent to Kingston Province of Ontario, Canada, where he entercape the continued his studies until he had completed the four years' curriculum, his expenses during this time having been defrayed through the generosity of his unele, Dr. A. Carroll Neyland, of whom mention is made in a preceding paragraph, and whose wish it was that the nephew attend a school on English territory, owing to his own allegiance to the British crown.

After his return to his native state, Mr. Neyland, now well fortified in academic lines, began reading law under the effective preceptorship of his kinsman, Judge Payton F. Edwards, a leading member of the bar of Nacogdoches, the capital of the county of the same name, He was admitted to the bar in 1830, shortly after attaining to his legal majority, but, desirous of fortifying himself still further, he devoted about two years to further study, under the preceptorship of Judge Thomas J. Brown, of Sherman, who later served with distinction on the bench of the Supreme Court of the state and is now its chief justice.

In 1882 Mr. Neyland established his permanent home at Greenville, where he has since continued in the active practice of his profession and where he has long been known as one of the strong, successful and essentially representative members of the bar of Hunt county. He has been concerned in much of the important litigation in the courts in this section of the state and has presented numerous causes in the Teans supreme court and in the federal courts of the state. His brother Mayo has been associated with him in practice since 1891, under the firm name of Neyland & Neyland, and they control a large and substantial law business of general order.

In politics Mr. Neyland accords unwavering allegiance to the Democratic party and, while be has considered his profession well worthy of his undivided attention and has thus had no predilection for political office, he has given yeoman service in behalf of the party cause. He is affiliated with the Masonic fraternity and both he and his wife are realous communicants of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in which they are leading members of the parish of the church in their home city.

The year 1889 marked the solemnization of the mariage of Mr. Neyland to Miss Pauline Lewis, who was born and reared in Harrison county, this state, and who is a daughter of the late Dr. Howell Lewis, a representative pioneer of that county. Mr. and Mrs. Neyland have two sons and one daughter, Robert R., Jr., Carroll, and Mayo W., Jr., the latter two remaining at the paternal home and the elder son, Robert R., Jr., being a cadet in the United States Military Academy at West Point, in which he is a member of the class of 1916. In the competitive examination for appointment to West Point he was the only one of the fourteen applicants who passed the required examination.

SHILOH GORMAN. Among the influential and prosperious business men of Seymour, Texas, shiloh Gorman holds a leading place. A man of long experience in the business world, of fine executive qualities, and a man who is popular both socially and among his business associates, Mr. Gorman is quite naturally a leader. He is one of the officials and is general manager of one of the largest industrial enterprises in Seymour, and it is largely owing to his energy and ability that this concern is the highly successful institution which it has become.

Shiloh Gorman was born in Upshur county, Texas, on the 27th of July, 1856. He is a son of Charles B. Gorman, who was born in Georgia, but came to Texas with his parents when he was a boy. Charles B. Gorman took up farming as a young man and has followed this occupation all of his life. He enlisted in the Confederate army with the outbreak of the Civil war and served through the long four years in one of the Texas regiments. He was in more a work of the confederate army with the outbreak of the Civil war and crippled hand as the result of this wound. Mr. Gorman has always been active politically, being a member of the Democratic party. In religious matters he is a member of the Baptist church. He married Miss Fannie Jones, who was born in Texas. Mr. Gorman is now living in Wood county, but his wife died in 1904, at the age of sixty, and is buried in Winnsboro, Texas.

Of the seven children who were born to Charles B. Gorman and his wife, Shibo Gorman, was the fourth in order of birth. He received his early education in the public schools of Texas, and, after completing his work in the public schools, he worked on the farm until be was eighteen years of age. He then went to Bowling Green, Kentucky, where he took a commercial course in a business college. Upon completing this course he returned to Texas and for three years followed railroading. He then came to the western part of the state, where he engaged in farming and ranching. He made a success, but decided that he preferred a different kind of work. Therefore he came to Seymour and took charge of the Mayfield Lumber Company's lumber yard. After eighteen months of this work he opened a dry goods store, which he conducted very successfully for about six store, which he conquered very success, but years. He then went into the furniture business, but only continued in this line for six months or so. next move was to go into business with the West Texas Supply Company, and he was in this concern for several years. After selling his interest in this business he determined to go to ranching again, and for four years managed a ranch near Seymour. At the end of this year three seasons found him working in the cotton business and then he opened a drug store cotton business and then he opened a drug store in Seymour. Two years later the company in which Mr. Gorman is interested at present was formed, and Mr. Gorman was elected secretary Tormen, and Mr. Corinan was elected secretary and treasurer, as well as being made general manager. This company purchased the Seymour Mill, Elevator and Light Company's plant and is now known by this name. It is one of the largest and most important institutions in town, bringing into Seymour a large volume of business. The company operates extensively throughout the state, doing both a wholesale and retail business. They do a grain and milling business and also operate the electric light plant in Seymour. Mr. Gorman has not spared himself in the effort to place this concern on a substantial foundation and make it a paying proposi-tion, and his success has been most marked. The varied experience which he has had in the business world has given him a clear insight into business methods, and his knowledge of men and affairs makes him an influential figure in business circles.

In political matters Mr. Gorman is a member of the Democratic party, but he is content to cast his vote the Democratic party, but he is content to cast his vote the polls and let others manipulate the party's affairs, et he is a member of no church, but is strongly included toward the Baptist faith. In the fraternal world Mr. Gorman is a member of the Knights of Pythias and of the Woodmen of the World. He is a lover of the outdoor sports and in particular of baseball, having been a player himself at one time,

Mr. Gorman was married in Seymour, Texas, on the Tith of February, 1902, to Miss Fannie McKeeban, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. R. R. McKeeban of Explor county, Texas. Mr. and Mrs. Gorman have become the parents of three children, two boys and a girl, namely, Wallace, Hazel and Shihol, Jr.

Dr. JEFFRRSON DAVIS RATLIFF. As a successful physician, Dr. Jefferson Davis Ratliff is well known in Seymour, Texas, and the surrounding country. From his boyhood he was filled with the desire to study medicine and his medical training was purchased at the expense of much self-sacrifice. The quiet determination to succeed, and the fighting qualities which Dr. Ratliff showed during his struggle for an education area again in evidence when he has a dangerous! Dr. Ratliff was born in Paris, Texas, on the 25th of September, 1861, the son of Robert Ratliff. The latter, who was born in Alzhama, came to Texas in 1856, where he became a farmer, and as a farmer spent the remainder of his life. He died in 1885 at the age seventy-two. He married Miss Pamela Craft, who was a native of Kentucky. Mrs. Ratliff came to Texas in 1844 and they were married in the latter state. She is now living and makes her home in Paris. Texas, being seventy-eight years of age. She is a member of the Baptist church, as was her husband. Eleven children were born to Robert Ratliff and his wife, of whom the Doctor was the second child and the oldest son.

Dr. Ratliff's elementary education was obtained in the public schools of Texas, and, after completing the course of instruction provided by the state, he went to work on the farm with the intention of going to college later. He carefully saved his earnings and was at last enabled to matriculate at the Aiken Institute, at Paris, Texas. After leaving college he taught school for four years and then, taking the money thus earned, he entered the Louisville Medical College, at Louisville, Kentucky.

At the end of his course in the above institution he received a certificate which enabled him to practice, and he practiced for several years. He then entered the College of Physicians and Surgeons at St. Louis, Missouri, and was graduated from this institution with the class of 1901. After being made a full-fledged physician, he returned to Texas and began to practice at Klondike. Several years were spent in this place and then, in 1908, he came to Seymour, where he has been engaged in practice ever since. He is one of the prosperous men of this city and has attained his professional success entirely through his own merits as a physician. not through the influence of others.

Dr. Ratliff is a member of the Democratic party, but takes no active share in politics. Both he and his wife are members of the Christian church. In fraternal affairs he is a member of the Independent Order of Odd Fellows and of the Woodmen of the World, as well as of the Ladies' branch of the Woodmen's Circle. Dr. Ratliff owns his own motor car and automobiling is one of his chief diversions.

At Paris, Texas, in 1888, on the 29th of January, Dr. Ratliff was married to Miss Bettie Stephenson, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. G. A. Stephenson, of Paris, Fonr children, three sons and one daughter, have been born to Dr. Ratliff and his wife. Roy, the eldest, resides at Burleson, Texas, where he is in the employ of the Missouri, Kansas & Texas Railroad Company. Lavada is a teacher and a student. Robert T. and Add G. are both at home.

ATANACIO VIDAURRI. Along the southern border of Texas there are descendants of old Spanish settlers who were the pioneers in the development of the resources of that section of the country. Atanacio Vidaurri was born at Laredo, May 3, 1833, and died in that city, December 24, 1885. He was a son of Rafael and Lorenza Gil de Vidaurri. His father was robbed and killed by the Indians while on his way to Chihuahua, Mexico, in 1845, From that time forward Atanacio was compelled not only to support himself, but also to contribute to the support of his mother and sisters. Although of tender age, he assumed the responsibility, and with an energy and ability rarely displayed in one so young, he bent himself to his task, becoming in time an influential citizen. On July 10, 1857, he married Miss Ygnacio, daughter of Juan Francisco and Ynocente (Benavilles) de Farias, of the Hacienda de Guadalupe, Mexico. The widow, with seven of her children, survives. These children are Defina, Estaban, Margarita, Atanacio L., Manuela, Nieves and Jose. Immediately after his marriage, Mr. Videuri engaged in farming, ranching, cattle raising, etc., in Webb county, Texas. At the beginning of the Civil war he enlisted in the Confederate army and was made second lieutenant in the famous company of rangers commanded by Captain (afterward Colonel) Benavides. This company was engaged in protecting the border along the Rio Grande against incursions of Mexican banditti, and so well did it discharge this duty that it was frequently complimented by the state government of Texas and the Confederate military authorities. The men who formed this command were noted for their bravery and their unselfish devotion to the Southern cause, and, though they were denied the opportunity of winning laurels on the historic battlefields of the great internecine conflict, they never faltered in the performance of the work assigned to them. During the war the business interests of Mr. Vidaurri suffered to such an extent that at the close of hostilities he was compelled to begin anew the work of rebuilding his shattered fortunes. To add to the trouble of the people of southwestern Texas during the years immediately following the war, the Indians were constantly committing depredations, and Mr. Vidaurri was frequently called out with his neighbors to suppress these uprisings. In one of the fights with the Indians in 1866 he was wounded. Amid all these difficulties he never lost courage, but applied himself to his work with renewed energy, and in a few years accumulated a comfortable fortune to leave to his family, to which he was always devoted. In politics Mr. Vidaurri was an uncompromising Democrat. He Mr. Vigauri was an uncompromising Democrat, the served several terms in the Laredo city council, being elected the first time in 1872. In 1877 he was elected mayor of the city and filled that office with signal ability, and for a number of years preceding his death he was one of the county commissioners of Webb county. He was a member of the Catholic Church; his public and private life were exemplary and without reproach; as a citizen he was public spirited and his successful management of his large business enterprises bears testimony to his great executive ability and good judgment. Atanacio L. Vidaurri, one of the surviving children, was born and reared in Laredo. He was educated in Spanish at Monterey, Mexico, and his education in the English branches was acquired at Galveston, Texas. Equipping himself as a bookkeeper and expert accountant, he has been for a number of years associated with the Laredo banks in that capacity—first with the Milmo National Bank, and later with the Laredo National Bank, Fraternally, he is a member of Laredo Lodge, Benevolent ternally, he is a memoer of Lareno Longe, benevoient and Protective Order of Elks, and of the Knights of Columbus. His wife, prior to her marriage, was Miss Aurelia Elizondo, of Saltillo, Mexico.

CHARLES H. RAGUET. Col. Henry Raguet was born February 1I, 1796, in Bucks county, Pennsylvania. Hewas the son of James Michael and Ann (Wynkoop) Raguet. The mother, who was a native of Bucks county also, was born in 1755 and died in 1815, and the father was a native son of France. He was a member of Na-poleon's staff, and, after the banishment of Napoleon to St. Helena, he started to America with his twobrothers, Paul and Claudius Raguet, the latter of whom was drowned during the voyage. Paul and James arrived in 1775 in Virginia, where Paul was killed by Indians, and James Raguet later settled in Bucks county. Pennsylvania. Henry Raguet, the son of James M., was reared in Bucks county, and when a young man he removed to Ohio, locating first in Steubenville, where he lived for a year, engaging then in the mercantile business in Cincinnati. In 1831, after selling his business in that city, Henry Raguet journeyed by steamboat and horseback to New Orleaus, Louisiana, at which place he had the honor of making the acquaintance of Sam Houston, who told Raguet of the wonders of Coahuila and Texas, in the Republic of Mexico. At the same time, through the introduction of Houston, he met Col. John Durst, and, being invited and urged by both, Colonel Raguet traveled with them from New Orleans up the Red River to where Nacogdoches now stands, from which point the three went on horseback to Durst's home, on the Angelina River, in Nacogdoches county, where the party was royally entertained. After looking over Texas as well as he could on horseback and afoot, Colonel Raguet decided to purchase land in and around Nacog-doches, and in 1832 removed permanently to that place with his wife, who was Marcia Ann (Towers) Raguet, and the following children: Anna, Conde, Henry W., Augusta, Mary and Charles M. Raguet. In that year, 1832, he embarked in the general merchandise business at Nacogdoches. He was the first merchant in Texas to sell goods by the American yard of thirty-six inchesinstead of the Mexican vard of thirty-three inches. He continued successfully in this business until he was succeeded, in or about 1852, by his sons, C. and H. W. Raguet.

An interesting incident, showing the friendship that existed between Sam Houston and the Raguet family occurred a few weeks before the battle of San Jacinto, by which Texas won her independence. Houston was a guest at Colonel Raguet's home, in Nacogdoches, and while sitting with his back toward the front door of the Mrs. Anna Irion, and Colonel Raguet, who later became Mrs. Anna Irion, and Colonel Raguet, his host, he was approached from behind by a Mexican, who suddenly slipped in at the open door and who, with upraised dagger, attempted to assassinate Houston, but he was frustrated in the attempt by Anna Raguet, who sprang at the Mexican and seized the knife, thereby saving the life of the famous general. Later, and a few days prior to the battle of San Jacinto, on April 21, 1836, General Houston came through Nacogdoches again, and once more was a guest in the Raguet home. On this visit he remarked to Miss Anna Raguet that if he had her good wishes he would defeat the Mexicans in the coming battle. Upon departing the next morning, Miss Raguet tied upon Houston the sash she had made for him the previous evening and placed his sword within it. He told her that if his expected battle with the Mexicans was successful, he would return the sword and sash to her as a souvenir in acknowledgment of her good will and wishes. General Houston won the battle, it is true, but for some unknown reason the sash and sword went to others.

Bolls, the Cherokee Indian chief, had no better friend in Texas than Col. Henry Raguet, and for this reason he was urged to by General Houston, Colonel Rusk and other prominent Texans, to stay at home and control the Indian situation. It was on this account only that Colonel Raguet did not participate in the battle of San Jacinto.

Colonel Raguet was not a secessionist and he strongly opposed that policy, but it is a noteworthy fact that the first secession flag to be blown by the breeze in Texas was raised over the store owned by C., H. W. and C. M. Raguet in Nacogdoches. The flag was made the night before by Mrs. Henry Raguet and Miss Mary Raguet. When the flag was hoisted a number of citizens protested and said the flag must come down; but the three brothers, assisted by their father, though he was not a secessionist, guarded the flag for two days and nights with double-barreled shotguns.

Col. Henry Raguet died at Marshall, Texas, December 8, 1877. As stated in the foregoing, he had been succeeded in business in about 1852 by his sons, C. and H. W., who later were joined by their younger brother, Charles M., with the firm name of C. and H. W. Raguet & Company. These three brothers all rendered distinguished service to the Confederacy during the Civil war. They enlisted at Nacogdoches at the beginning of the war as privates in Gen. Tom Green's brigade and took part in the famous expedition to New Mexico under General Sibley. Conde Raguet was elected captain, later made major, and finally rose to the rank of colonel of cavalry; Henry W. Raguet was promoted to a first lieutenancy, then to captain, and then major of infantry and cavalry, and was noted as a brave and dashing soldier. He was killed in action at the battle of Glorietta, New Mexico, on March 28, 1862. Charles M. Raguet was first assigned as a private in Teel's battery; at the beginning of the New Mexico expedition he was promoted to first lieu-tenant and commanded Teel's battery during every engagement in the New Mexico campaign. Later he was in service in Louisiana in the campaign against General Banks. On account of being at home on sick leave, resulting from an attack of measles, he did not participate in the battle of Mansfield, but for valuable services he was promoted to the rank of major of the First Vir ginia Cavalry, Lee's army, and was on his way to fill this assignment when the surrender took place at Ap-pomattox. Among his other services he had participated in both of the battles of Galveston.

A sad misfortune happened to the family in 1868, when, on December 8th of that year, Col, Conde Raguet and his sister Mary were drowned in the Ohio River in the collision of two steamboats, the America and the United States, at Ray's Landing, about two miles above Warsaw, on the Indiana side.

Maj. Henry W. Raguet was the first fiscal agent of the Republic of Texas, serving as such under President Sam Houston. He drove alone through the new republic and collected tax money in an open wagon, which he handled without a guard.

After the war, Maj. Charles M. Raguet settled in Nacogdoches again, and, after straightening out the estates of his two brothers, he engaged in the drug and general mercantile business, which he conducted until 1872. In that year he removed to Marshall and there formed a partnership with Mr. E. J. Fry in the banking business, with the firm name of Raguet & Fry. After being engaged in this business successfully for eight years, he retired from the firm, disposing of his interest in the business to Mr. Fry. Thereafter he engaged in the general land business, which he continued in up to the time of his death, which occurred on November 11. 1903. He is survived by Mrs. Raguet and their son, Charles H. Raguet. Maj. Charles M. Raguet was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, September 22, 1832, and as in that year the family came to Nacogdoches, it will be seen that practically his entire life was spent in Texas.

Mrs. Charles M. Raguet was, prior to her marriage, Miss Isabel Edwards; she was born in Nacogdoches and married Major Raguet on April 21, 1870. She is a daughter of the late Hayden H. Edwards and grand-daughter of Col. Hayden Edwards, who was the founder of the Edwards Colony in the Mexican state of Coahuila and Texas, to which county he came in 1825. This is another distinguished family of Texas, only a brief sketch of which is given here, as an account of the Edwards Colony is given in the general historical section of this work. Col. Hayden Edwards and his son, Hayden Harrison Edwards, were both born in Virginia. former married Miss Susan Beall of Maryland, while the wife of the latter was Miss Sarah M. Forbes, who was born in Cincinnati, Ohio, the daughter of John and Emily (Scisson) Forbes, who came from Hartford, Connecticut. Col. Hayden Edwards died at Nacogdoches, Texas, on August 14, 1849. Hayden Harrison Edwards died at Cincinnati, Ohio, in August, 1865. The latter, who was always known as General Edwards, in or about the year 1859, with his associates, started the first railroad in Texas. It started at the old town of Sabine Pass and extended to Beaumont; the roadbed was graded between those points and the ties and rails laid, but the outbreak of the Civil war caused the work to be abandoned before it was fully completed.

Charles H. Raguet, son of Maj. Charles M. and Isabel (Edwards) Raguet, was born in Marshall. Texas, January 27, 1875. He received his education in local private schools and in the University of the South at Sewanee, Tennessee, and Kenyon College, in Cambria, Ohio He was associated with his father, directly and indirectly, for twelve years before the death of the latter, and succeeded Major Raguet in business. On November 12, 1903, Mr. James F. Gregg, who had also been associated with Major Raguet, became a partner, and the firm then with Major raguet, became a partner, and the firm them took its present bame of Raguet & Gregg, general insurance and land agents. This business in reality was originally established in 1832 by Hayden H. Edwards, grandfather of Mr. Raguet, and Nathaniel Emory, in Nacogdoches, and re-established by Charles M. Raguet at Marshall, Texas, in February, 1895.

Charles H. Raguet was married in San Autonio April 19, 1910, to Miss Harriette Rouse Gallagher of that city, daughter of John Francis and Harriette (Head) Gallagher.

Mr. Raguet enlisted in 1897 as a private in Company D, Third Texas Volunteer Guard (Texas National Guard under the "Dick" hill after July, 1993). He served as an enlisted man, corporal and sergeaut, up to May 23, 1990, at which time he was promoted to the rank of first lieutenant and battalion adjintant. He served in that rank until April 19, 1910, when he was promoted to his present rank of captain and assigned as quartermaster of the Third Regiment of the Texas National Guard.

E.B. Black

E. B. Black. The career of one of the most successful of the Texas Panhandle, and a popular and prominent citizen of Hereford, is briefly sketched in the following paragraphs:

E. B. Black was born in Russell county, Alabama, October 13, 1866, and is a son of Capt. C. B. Black by a second marriage, his mother being Miss Fannie Johnston of Putnam county, Georgia. His father came originally from Virginia to Harris county, Georgia, where he lived several years, later moving to Russell county, Alabama, where he permanently located. At the outbreak of hostilities between the North and South, Captain Black espoused the Southern cause, joined the Confederate army, organized a company of infantry and was appointed their captain, and was wounded in battle. He was a prominent planter and a man of considerable influence in his community. His death occurred in 1873, when sixty-flow years of age, his wife having passed away in 1867 at the age of forty-fice. They were the parents of seven children, of whom E. B. Black was the

Being orphaned at an early age, his schooling was much negleted and his opportunities for acquiring knowledge or making advancement along educational lines were very limited. His success in life is not due to his entry advantages, but is the result of indomitable will power and determination to succeed in spite of obstacles.

Mr. Black came to Texas in 1882 and eventually settled in Cleburne, where for fifteen years he worked in the dry goods business. In 1901 he moved to Hereford, where he established his present business. He carries a full line of modern first-class furniture and household supplies and has built up an excellent trade in Hereford and surrounding country, his business having developed from an humble beginning to one of large proportions. In addition to his furniture business he also carries a full line of undertakers' supplies. To a great degree good judgment, business faculty, a high sense of honor and a just appreciation of the rights of others.

On July 39, 1891, E. B. Black was married at Cleburne, Texas, to Carrie English, and to this union have been born four children: Nellie Dee, born July 17, 1892, and married December 30, 1912, to Mr. William Jesse Stanford; James English, born February 8, 1896; Frances Elizabeth, born December 23, 1899, and William Alexander, born July 19, 1904.

Mr. Elack has become prominent in fraternal circles, is a member of the local lodges of the Masons, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Knights of Pythias, the Modern Woodmen of America and the Woodmen of the World, and in the Masonic fraternity passed all the chairs in his lodge and is a member of the Royal Arch Chapter. In polities a Democrat, he has not sought public office, but is discharging the duties of citizenship by serving as a member of the Hereford school board.

With his family he attends the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, of which he and all his family are members. When he eame to Hereford the town was two years old. He organized the Methodist Sunday School and became its superintendent, which relation he still sustains. This Sunday School has the distinction of being one of the best in the Texas Panhandle. As one who has met with success and distinction, he is ever who has not the his confidence in Hereford and its people, and that his confidence in Hereford and its people, and the many law of the succession of the confidence must be successful.

PAUL C. MURPIEF, M. D. Numbered among the younger moubers of the Texas medical fraterny as found Dr. Paul C. Murphey, who is rapidly rising in the chosen calling by reason of his ability. Although he has been engaged in practice at Waco' only since 1912, he is already in the enjoyment of a good professional business, and the successes of the past may be generally taken as a criterion of the future.

Dr. Murphey is a native son of Texas, his birth having occurred at Athens, this state, December 4, 1888. His father, James Lee Murphy, was born in Anderson county, Texas, in 1854, and for many years was engaged in the cattle business, heing known as one of the largest horse owners of his section of the state. Dr. Murphey's mother bore the maiden name of Annie E. Coleman and was born in Henderson county, Texas, in 1865. She still survives the father, whose death occurred in 1909. There were three children in the family Paul C., of this review; Hubbard L. and Julia. The early education of Dr. Murphey was secured in the public schools of Athens, this being supplemented by a course in Itaska High School. Following this, he spent two terms in the Baylor University, and then, having decided upon a medical eareer, he entered Fort Worth Medical College, from which he was graduated with the degree of Doctor of Medicine in 1911. A natural athlete, during his college career Dr. Murphey won honors for his college in various lines of athletics and was a star player on the football, baseball and basketball teams. Upon his graduation, Dr. Murphey became house surgeon at the Provident Sanatarium, at Waco, where he obtained valuable experience during the one year he acted in that capacity, and in 1912 entered general practice at Waco, It is seldom that a young physician just entering upon his career meets with the almost instantaneous success that rewarded Dr. Murphey's efforts, but from the start he has been successful. He has built up a lucrative practice among the city's most representative people. and is now recognized by his fellow practitioners as a physician of ability and one who respects the highest ethics of his honored calling. He is a member of the McLennan County Medical Society, the Texas State Medical Society and the Central Texas Medical Society, and through his membership therein keeps fully abreast of the numerous advancements constantly being made in the field of medicine. He has never ceased being a student, and is entirely devoted to his calling, although he finds time to enjoy social events and is popular with a wide circle of friends. For a short time be served as first sergeant of the Hospital Corps of the Texas National Guard at Dallas, and during the season of 1913 looked after the injuries sustained by 'he members of the Waco Baseball Club. He has continued to be fond of all kinds of outdoor sports, and during his vacations generally goes on hunting and fishing trips. In politics he is a Democrat. He is a member of the Baptist church. Dr. Murphey owns his own residence at No. 1915 Sauger avenue. His office is located at No. 1108 Amicable building.

On November 6, 1912, Dr. Murphey was married at Waco to Miss Cora Lilly, daughter of George W. Lilly, who was for eight years sheriff of McLeman county, and is now engaged in the furniture business at Fifth and Washington streets, Waco.

HON. WILLIAM MESCER KEY. When the Court of Civil Appeals, in the Third Supreme Judicial District, was constituted in 1892, among the various candidates William M. Key was foremost both in qualifications and in popular estimation the most logical choice for one of the three seats in the court. He had served as country judge of Williamson country and district judge of Travis and Williamson country, and district judge of Travis and the Court of Civil Appeals leaves no doubt as to the admirable efficiency and wisdom with which he exercises his office. Judge Key was at one time a merchant, found himself in a sphere unsuited to his disposition and abilities, gained admission to the bar at the age of twenty-fire, and has won secure honors in Texas judicial history. The most distinctive feature of his public career has been his unwillingness to put himself forward as an aggressive candidate for position. It has always heen a case of the office seeking the man.

Born in Oglethorpe county, Georgia, October 29, 1850, Judge Key is a son of Jasper N. and Mary (Howard, Key. Both parents were born in Georgia. The father, who was a minister of the Baptist church, came to Texas with his family in 1853, settled in Gonzales county, where be combined his profession as a minister of the gospel with the cultivation of the land, During the period of the Civil war he saw service in Colonel Cook's regiment of artillery. He lived a long and useful life and died in 1901, while the mother of

Judge Key passed away in 1867,

The circumstances of the family were such and the hard conditions incident to the war period also interfered with the early opportunities and advantages afforded Judge Key. His cincation was largely self-applied, and the time which modern boys put in in attendance at school was spent by him in work on the farm. He attended private schools to some extent, but remained at home until the death of his mother in 1867. After one year in school he was clerk in stores for two r three years, and then engaged in merchandising on his own account. That proved uncongenial, and he came to Austin and took up the study of law in the office of John F. Jones. Admitted to the bar in 1875, he moved to Georgetown, where he opened his office and soon gained rank as a leading lawyer. His home was at Georgetown until 1889.

His judicial career began in 1885, when a vacancy occurred in the office of county judge of Williamson county. Without any solicitation on his own part, he received appointment to fill the vacancy, and later was elected without opposition. He administered the office until September, 1888, and then once more the appointive call was exercised to place him in the office or judge of the bistrict court of Williamson and Trace counties. In November, 1888, he was regularly elected to the District bench for the term of four years, beginning January 1, 1889. In 1892, when the Court of Civil Appeals, in the Third Supreme Judicial District, was organized, he was elected an associate justice of the court, and remained an associate until February, 1910, when, on the death of Chief Justice Fisher, he succeeded him as chief of the court and has presided over its sessions with a dignity and ability which have done much to unhold the fine record of that branch of Texas indiciary.

uphold the fine record of that branch of Texas judiciarry while Judge Key is a Democrat in politics, behave while Judge Key is a Democrat in politics, behave while Judge Key is a Democratic politics, behave while Judge Key is a Democratic politics, and the Judge Key His appointments and elections to the various positions above enumerated have come practically without opposition. There were eight candidates for the Court of Girll Appeals when it was organized, and from the first there was no thought that he would not be one of those chosen to constitute the court. Judge Key served two terms as master of San Gabriel Lodge No. S9, A. F. & A. M., and also belongs to the Royal Arch Chapter. He has membership in the Methodist Episcopal church, South.

In December, 1876, Judge Key married Miss Izora Scott, a daughter of Samuel A. and Mary Scott, of Georgetown, Texas. The Scott family came to Texas in 1835, 8. A. Scott finally settling on the western frontier in Williamson county, where he became a stock raiser and planter. Some years later he entered the ranks of the Confederate army, made a record as a soldier, and in his community was always looked up to and respected, He died in 1908 and his wife had passed away about 1867. Mrs. Key has twice been president of the American History Club of Austin. Their four children are as follows: Mary, who married Thomas P. Whitis and lives at Plain View, Texas; Scott W. Key, who has gained a successful position as a lawyer at Haskell, is married and has four children; Howard W. Key, an electrical engineer at Atlanta, Georgia, and connected with the General Electric Company; Samuel N. Key, who graduated from the medical department of the University of Texas and is now a specialist on the eye, ear, nose and throat in Austin, Texas. Each of the sons has won success in his distinct vocation, and Mr. and Mrs. Key have cause to congratulate themselves upon their fine family. The Key home at Austin is at 212 West Twenty-seventh street.

HON. W. R. PERKINS. It would seem an anachronism to designate the Hon. W. R. Perkins, "the father of Jim Wells county," for his life span includes little more than a score and a half of years, but to him the county must give credit for its existence, his faithful labors in the State Legislature and among the citizens of this section having brought about the movement which culminated May 9, 1911, in the forming of this new county. At that time his fellow citizens gave evidence of their appreciation of his efforts by electing him the first county judge, a position he has continued to fill with dignity and efficiency, and in addition thereto he is exofficio county superintendent of schools. His career since coming to Alice, in 1905, has been one of great activity and high achievement, and in public, professional and social life he is recognized as one of the leaders of the younger generation. Mr. Perkins was born in 1881, in Holmes county, Mississippi, and is a son of the Rev. C. W. Perkins. His father, also a native of that county, was for many years a minister of the Methodist church there, but in 1893 came to Texas and took charge of a church of the Methodist denomination in Sau Antonio, but has now retired.

W. R. Perkins received his early education in the public schools of his native county, and was twelve years of age when he accompanied his parents to Texas, where he resumed his studies in Southwestern University, Georgetown. Followinig his graduation from that institution, he entered Sam Houston Normal School, at Huntsville, and on leaving that school in 1901 en-tered upon the study of law. After two years spent in the law department of the University of Texas, at Austin, he was admitted to the bar in that city in 1905, and at once came to Alice, which city has since been his field of activity. Immediately upon locating here, Mr. Perkins identified himself with matters of a public nature, enterinig actively into political affairs, with the result that in 1909 he was sent to the Thirty-first Legislature. He had organized the voters of this section for the purpose of forming the new county of Jim Wells from the western portion of Nueces county, and the greater part of his attention while in the Legislature was devoted to having his bill passed. Mr. Perkins was elected the first county judge of Jim Wells county, May 9, 1911, and in November, 1912, was re-elected to succeed himself for the regular term. In the administration of the affairs of his office he has shown the highest degree of impartiality and executive ability. He has commanded the respect of his co-workers and fellow citizens, creating the impression that he is a man of convictions and judgment, one who can voice his sentiments before a body politic when the occasion arises. Perhaps the greatest factor in his success is his reliability. The people always know that he is one of them, and is with them on all questions pertaining to their welfare, and they have long since become convinced that his policy is safe and sure as it is broad, generous and progressive. It is to such citizens that the county must look for its future greatness, and a community is indeed fortunate which possesses men of this caliber.

Mr. Perkius was married to Miss Edith Williams, who was born and reared at San Marcos, Texas, and to this union there have been born three daughters, namely:

Dorothy, Lucile and Eulalie.

ARTHUR G. BROCKE is an able and distinguished member of the bar of Panola county and a member of the firm of Brooke & Woolworth, of Carthage, whose great success in the winning of criminal cases has won them wide distinction throughout the Southwest. He comes of a distinguished family, being a great-grandson of the Rev. Francis Brooke, an Episcopal clergyman of the diocese of Chesterfield, Virginia, and of English birth, who married Lady Mary Cobb. Their son, Dudley Brooke, was the father of Judge John C. Brooke, a prominent citizen and jurist of pioneer days in Texas.

Judge John C. Brooke was born in Virginia, in 1798, and moved with his parents to Robertson county, Tenessee, as a youth. He was given excellent educational advantages, and was admitted to the bar in Tennessee, but did not immediately enter upon the practice of his profession. When he decided to come to the Southwest, he stopped in Sabine Parish, Louisiana, where he spent some time in the cultivation of his three large plantations before continuing on his way to the Lone Star state. He owned a large number of negroes, having about one hundred at the outbreak of the Civil war, these being subsequently freed. Upon the question of the disruption of the Union he agreed with Gen. Sam Houston in opposing secession, although he was too old at that time to take any active part in the war between the North and the South. During the days of the Republic, Judge Brooke occupied the bench at San Augustine, and subsequently became chief justice of San Augustine county. A man of scholarly tastes, in finishing his education he did a great deal of travel, and visited various foreign capitals. His literary turn made him acquainted with the poets and authors, and he could quote "the lines" of favorite authors for hours. Judge Brooke was dignified and proud, was always well dressed-the best dressed man in Texas during his day, it was said-aud was a genial, polished, courtly and knightly gentleman. In Texas politics he was a colleague of Colonel Blount, of Nacogdoches, and John H. Brooks, wheel-horses here in public affairs. His career was one of constant activity and exciting experiences from the time when he ran away prior to attaining his majority, riding a horse with a slave boy behind him, and is said to have never again made his father's house his home. He married his first wife in Columbia, Tennessee, and had a son, Albert, who died in San Augustine, Texas, without issue. His second wife was Catherine Norvell, a daughter of Lipscomb Norvell, who was born in New York state, but came to Texas from Kentucky. Mrs. Brooke was born in Kentucky in 1821, and her father was an old hunter who wandered out to Texas and located at the confluence of three rivers in Sabine county and lived out his life there. He died in 1882, at the age of eighty-four years. Mrs. Brooke died at Center, Texas, in 1896, Judge Brooke having passed away in 1879, in Jasper county. He spent his last years in farming and moved from his Sabine county plantation to Jasper county just a short time prior to his death. The children born to Judge Brooke and his wife were: Wil-liam Dudley, who died leaving a family of children; Oc-tavine, who married Judge W. H. Ford and died at Beaumont, Texas, and Arthur G.

Arthur G. Brooke, of this review, was born in Sabine county, Texas, June 20, 1863. He prepared himself for life as a student in Southeastern College, at Jasper, Texas: attended the Agricultural and Mechanical College, Texas and graduated in law at Cumberland University, Lebanon, Texas, in 1885. He located first in Orange, subsequently moved to Jasper, and then to Center and Carthage, coming to his present locality in 1896. He was a caudidate for district attorney early in his career as a lawyer, but was defeated and never became a candidate for another office. However, he has been a leader among his county people in politics, is a stalwart Demoerat, and was chairman of the Panol County Central Committee for several years. Mr. Brooke tried his first lawsuit in Jasper county before Justice of the Peace Ralls, the suit involving the possession of personal property, a bull. The justice told Mr. Brooke that he (the justice) knew all about the case and that it would not be necessary for him to have a jury, as he could render a verdict in his client's favor. When the case was tried, however, the justice promptly rendered a verdict for the other man. Mr. Brooke brought suit in the district court against the justice and his official bondsmen for $5,000, which frightened them to such an extent that they lost no time in compromising the matter to the entire satisfaction of Mr. Brooke's client.

Among the many cases of the legal firm of Brooke & Woolworth which have attracted attention, one of the most interesting is that of Dulaney vs. Brooke. suit grew out of the refusal of Mr. Brooke as chairman of the Democratic County Committee to certify Du-laney's name as a candidate for district clerk of Panola county. Mr. Brooke took the ground that under the law the population of the county did not justify the election of both a county clerk and a district clerk. The case went to the Supreme Court and resulted in a finding against the contention of Mr. Brooke, and this case has served as a precedent in several subsequent cases. The fame of the firm of Brooke & Woolworth has spread, not alone over Panola county, but into adjoining communities. On a number of occasions this firm has taken what have been considered "forlorn hopes" and brought them to a successful issue. Mr. Brooke's management of evidence before a jury, his tact, and his unusual powers of pleading have frequently come to notice, and have contributed to an unusually high standing in the Texas har. He is a stockholder in the Timpson & Henderson Railway Company, of which his firm is the legal representative in all suits. He has taken an interest in fraternal work, belonging to the Woodmen of the World, the Independent Order of Odd Fellows, the Improved Order of Red Men and the Knights of Pythias, and in all of these is highly esteemed, and in the last named has been a representative to the Grand Lodge of the

On August 6, 1884, while a resident of Jasper country, Teans, Mr. Brooke was united in marriage with Miss Alice Cheatham, daughter of Col. James Cheatham, at pioneer Texan and a cousin of the Confederate General Cheatham. The children born to this union are: John C, who took law in the University of Texas, had his disabilities removed so as to enter the practice before he came of age, and is now country attorney of Brewster country, Texas; Kate, Sybil, Beulah and Hazel.

JOHN T. DUNCAN. Recently president of the Texas State Bar Association, John T. Duncan has practiced law in Texas for more than thirty-five years, and is one of the distinguished men in his profession. His home throughout his practice has been at LaGrange and he has identified himself with numerous public activities outside the immediate limits of his work as a lawyer.

Mr. Duncan represents two of the old American families in Texas, and the Duncan family, of Seotich descent, was founded in Virginia before the war of the American Revolution. The great-frandfather of John T. Duncan, Coleman Duncan, moved from Loudon county, Virginia, to Nelson county, Kentueky, in 1792, and was the ancestor of the branch of the family now found in Texas, John T. Duncan was born in Washington county. Texas, one of the oldest seats of American colonization, in 1854. His parents were George J. and Elizabeth (Dallas) Duncan. The father, who was born in 1810 near Louisville, Kentueky, came to Texas in 1839, during the era of the Republic, settling in Washington county, where he was a farmer. In 1851 he was married and continued to make his home in Washington county until 1880, when he moved to Milam county and lived there until his death in 1893. Soon after coming to Texas he enlisted for service in one of the campaigns against Mexico following the winning of independence in 1836, and in 1840 was a member of the Summervelle expedition and went as far as Laredo, suffering many hard-ships in that campaign. Elizabeth Dallas, mother of Mr. Duncan, was born in Kentucky in 1829 and died in 1906. Her parents were natives of Pennsylvania, moved from that state to Kentucky, and came to Texas in 1833, three years before the winning of independence from Mexico. They settled near the old town of Inde-pendence, in Washington county, and her father died in 1834, leaving the children to the care of the widowed mother, and a short time later the entire family had to flee before the advance of Santa Anna in the famous

"Runaway Scrape" preceding the battle of San Jacinto.

John T. Duncan was educated at the Baylor University when that institution was located at Independence, graduating in 1877. Immediately following his graduation he moved to LaGrange and entered the law office of Timmons & Brown, completed his law studies with that well-known firm of lawyers, and was admitted to the bar in June, 1878. His first practice was in partnership with R. J. Andrews, which continued until the death of Mr. Andrews in 1881. In about 1882 he formed a partnership with Paul Meerscheidt, and the firm was then known as Duncan & Meerscheidt. On January 1, 1885, L. W. Moore became a member of the firm, the name then becoming Moore, Duncan & Meerscheidt, but the latter withdrew in 1889, after which the firm continued as Moore & Duncan until June, 1897, when it was succeeded by the firm of Robson & Duncan, his partner being W. S. Robson. In 1903 their relations were dissolved, and on June 1st of that year Jake Wolters became his partner under the name Dunean & Wolters. Since June 1, 1905, Mr. Dunean bas continued his practice alone. While he has looked after the interests of a large number of individual clients, and has practiced in all the courts, a considerable share of his business for a number of years has come as local attorney for the San Antonio & Aransas Pass Railroad Company.

Mr. Duncan in 1878 was appointed mayor of LaGrange, later elected to the office, and since the conclusion of his last term in 1882 has never sought any other public honor. He became one of the charter members of the Intercoastal Canal Company, organized at Victoria, Texas, in 1906, with the object of completing the Coastal Canal which has long been a project and a successful completion of which will undoubtedly bring about a great benefit to all the commercial interests of the state. At the Galveston meeting in July, 1912, Mr. Duncan was elected president of the Texas State Bar Association, and held that important honor one year, and until July 1, 1913.

On January 11, 1881, Mr. Dunean married Miss Genelle Harris, daughter of Ben T. Harris, of Below ville, Texas. Her father was a lawyer by profession, came from Mississippi to Texas during the early '50s, was a member of a Texas regiment during the war, and died in 1882 in his fifty-second year. Mr. Duncan and wife have three children: Josephine, who married Leonard H. Dyer, a lawyer of New York City; Frankie, who lives at home, and Douglas Duncan, a lawyer at Belleville, and married. Mr. Duncan and family reside in a fine residence in LaGrange. Whether as a lawyer or a private gentleman, Mr. Duncan has long been es teemed for his broadmindedness, his affability, and a kindly and helpful intercourse with his fellow-men which has enabled him to perform much service not classified as professional work, but none the less useful in any community.

Around Fort Davis probably CHARLES MULHERN. lingers more of the old memories and associations of the frontier than about any of the former centers of military activity. Among the prosperous citizenship of the town and surrounding country will be found men whose character and activities serve to keep alive these asso-ciations, and of these the best beloved and most conspicuous is the venerable banker and business man of Fort Davis, Charles Mulhern. His career has been a noteworthy one in many particulars and especially from the fact that he was for thirty years connected with the regular army of the United States.

Charles Mulhern was born in Ireland, September 14, 1832, and spent the first twenty years of his life in his native land, where he attained his education in the national schools, his real battle with the world beginning when he left Ireland and came to the United States. He first located in Atlanta, Georgia, where he remained for about three years, and during that time attended school. From Atlanta he went to Montgomery, Ala-bama, where he began an apprenticeship with John G. Dama, where he began an apprenticeship with John with Winter's Iron Works, but after four months in this occupation started back to Atlanta. On his way thither he stopped at Columbus, Georgia, and while there followed some inclination or inducement and enlisted in the First United States Cavalry. In this same regiment and company he saw service for eighteen years throughout the Civil war period and through the many Indian campaigns both before and after the war. The regiment was stationed in many parts of the United States, but particularly in the West, and Mr. Mulhern's own record may be read in the official account of this regiment during the eighteen years of his service therewith. In 1873 he was promoted to ordnance sergeant in the army, and continued to occupy that office until July 5, 1885, at which time he retired after a long and honorable service of thirty years. When he retired from the army his family was living at Fort Davis, at which post he had himself been stationed during a portion of his army career. He returned to Fort Davis and has made it his home ever since. During many years he followed the general live stock and cattle business, but in 1910 sold out his eattle, though he still retains his old ranch in this vicinity. On October 31, 1911, Mr. Mulhern organized the Fort Davis State Bank and has been its president to this time. The Fort Davis State Bank is one of the strong younger institutions of West Texas, does a general banking business, and deals in foreign and domestic exchange and the other branches of banking. The bank has recently been moved into new and larger quarters, a building designed and erected for its exclusive use.

In its varied service and in its material acquisitions, the career of Mr. Mulhern has been one of unusual accomplishments. Equally noteworthy was his long and happy married life. It is given to few men to enjoy so rarely felicitous a companionship as that which existed between Mr. and Mrs. Mulhern for a period of more than half a century. At St. Louis, Missouri, on September 20, 1860, he married Mis Eva Phifer, who was formerly from Switzerland. In 1910 they celebrated their golden wedding anniversary, and their conjourned their golden wedding anniversary, and their companionship continued on until March 27, 1912, when Mrs. Mulern passed away at the age of seventy-seven. Her remains now rest in the cemetery at Fort Davis. She was long connected with the Preshyterian church. Of their eight children, three daughters and five sons, five are now deceased, and the three others are as follows: John L., who is married and lives in Arizona; Robert D., now married and a resident of New Mexico, and Louisa Evelina, the wife of James I. Edward of Fort Davis. Mr. Mulhern favors and supports all churches, but has affiliated with no particular denomination. He is a prominent Mason, having taken thirty-two degrees of the Scottish Rite, and belongs to the Blue Lodge and the Knights Templar Commandery of the York Rite, and also the Mystic Shrine. He has taken all the degrees in Odd Fellowship. Mr. Mulhern is a member of the Grand Army of the Republic, belongs to the Fort Davis Commercial Club and is a Republican, though not active in party affairs. For several years he served as county commissioner of Jeff Davis county. Mr. Mulhern finds much of his recreation in driving about the hills and valleys in this section of the state, and by reason of his long residence is probably as familiar with the resources of Jeff Davis county as any other resident. He is an active advocate of every movement and enterprise for the improvement and advancement of his home community, and by reason of this public spirit, as also for his long and eventful career, no citizen of the county enjoys more respect and more true admiration than Charles Mulhern.

JUNG JACOB P. WEATHERBY. For more than twenty years a resident of Fort Davis, Judge Weatherby early became identified with the public life of this section and his recognized ability as a business man and his fidelity to the public welfare won him election to the office or county judge. As county judge he is also ex-officio superintendent of the public schools of Jeff Davis county. The responsibilities of these two offices are sufficiently great to require the best abilities possessed by any man, and it has been true of Judge Weatherby, as his long continuance in office will testify, that he has the welfare of the county and its citiens. In addition to his official career, Judge Weatherby is prominent in local business affairs, and is executive head of the Union Trading Company, and has various other holdings and interests in this vicinity.

Jacob P. Weatherby was born in Bexar county, Texas, April 17, 1859. His father was William A. Weatherby, a native of New York state, who came to Texas as a young man and followed the stock business in this state, and was also active in political affairs. He died in 1893 at the age of sixty-four. The maiden hame of his wife was Emily Huffstutler, who was born in Louisiana, and they were married in Texas. She was a devout member of the Christian church, and her death occurred in 1896 at the age of sixty-one. Of the nine children in the family, Jacob was the third.

His early education was attained in the public schools of this state, and as his father was in the stock business in central Texas, he had his occupation cut out for him from the beginning, and from boyhood was trained in the various activities of stock raising. He remained with his father until he was thirty-three years of age, and then came out to Fort Davis, where he spent a year or so in the stock industry. In 1894 he was elected to his first term as county judge, and by repeated elec-tions has held this office without a break from that time to the present. In 1908 Judge Weatherby took a prominent part in the organization of the Union Trading Company, and has been its active head ever since, being secretary treasurer and general manager of this concern, which is one of the largest mercantile organizations in Jeff Davis county. The company have a large store in Fort Davis and carries a full line of general merchandise, divided into several departments, and does both a wholesale and a retail business. The business furnishes employment to a number of persons.

At Fort Davis, May 15, 1895, Mr. Weatherby married Miss Lovey Chadborn, daughter of J. R. Chadborn of Fort Davis. They are the parents of five children, three daughters and two sons, namely, Early, Joseph, Lela, Dorothy and Jessie.

Judge Weatherby inclines toward the Presbyterian faith, while his wife is one of the very active members in the church of that denomination in Fort Davis, Fraternally he is a prominent York Rite Mason, being affiliated with the degrees from the Blue Lodge to the Commandery, and has filled all the chairs in the Blue Lodge. He is also a member of the Odd Fellows. His polities is Republican, and he has been for many years active in that party organization.

Among his diversions baseball is conspicuous and he also enjoys good entertainments in the theatrical line. Though a resident of Texas all his life, and with no basis for comparison with other states, it is the opinion of Judge Weatherby that as a place for a man to settle and make a home, Texas is good enough for any one. He has himself been very successful and influential, and it has always been his aim to promote the general progress of his community while forwarding his own prosperity.

LESLIE WAGGENER, eldest son of Stokley T. and Elizabeth (Ross) Waggener, was born September 11, 1841, in Trenton, Kentucky, but spent the larger part of his life in the neighboring town of Russellville, where he graduated from Bethel College before entering Harvard. He graduated from Harvard with the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1861, and soon after returning home enlisted in the Confederate Army.

He was a member of the famous "Orphan Brigade" with General John C. Breckenridge as commander. He was shot through the body at Shiloh and reported among those who were mortally wounded, but his life was saved by the faithful and devoted care of a family servant whom he had with him. After a number of months he recovered sufficiently to rejion his command and was present in the many battles in which it took part, being slightly wounded at Chickamanga. He took part in the one hundred days' march and fight from Dalton to Atlanta, Georgia. The brigade left Dalton May 7, 1864, with one thousand one hundred and forty men and reached Atlanta one hundred days later with two hundred and forty; there being only forty in the entire command free from a bullet mark.

After the surrender under General Joseph E. Johnston in May, 1865, he returned to his home in Kentucky, expecting to prepare himself for the practice of law. Changed conditions making this impossible, he accepted in 1866 the position of principal of the preparatory department of Bethel College.

On June 27, 1867, he was married to Miss Fannie Pendleton, daughter of Dr. J. M. Pendleton and Mrs. Catherine (Garnett) Pendleton. Dr. Pendleton was a prominent minister of the Baptist church, author of a number of books, and lived the greater part of his life in Kentucky.

In 1870 Dr. Waggener was placed at the head of the newly established school of English at Bethel College, and in 1873 succeeded Dr. Noah K. Davis, as chairmen of the faculty, Dr. Pavis having been called to the University of Virginia. He was made president of the college in 1876, and held that position until the first of 1883, when he resigned to accept the position of Professor of English and History in the first faculty of the University of Texas. A year later he was made chairman of the faculty, and was elected to this position each year for ten years. During the last year of his life he served as president. His death occurred at Maniton, Colorado, August 19, 1896.

Dr. Waggener was one of the most widely known and successful ductators in Kentucky, and nearly every fown or hamlet in that state has one or more successful professional or business men who are indebted to him for their education. The late Dr. Noah K. Davis of the University of Virginia, who knew him intimately during the time Dr. Waggener was connected with Bethel College, and was his life long friend, writes of him as follows:

""(As a soldier he was patriotic, brave, devoted to duty and ever in the front. As a teacher he wis diligent, faithful and successful. To his professorship herought geneous culture broad scholarship, thorough acquaintance with English literature, a critical knowledge of languages, and an enthusiasm that awoke a lively response in his pupils. As a president he displayed fine executive abilities and disciplinary skill, feeling a deep interest in the welfare of every student, and impressing upon all his own high standard of personal honor. As a friend he was faithful and true; as a husband and father he was teuderly sympathetic and affectionate."

The best work of his life, that of his maturer years, was done in the University of Texas. Of this work there can be no better judges than those with whom he was closely associated, those who knew something of the difficulties that he met and overcame during those first hard years when the State University was young and its future uncertain.

The following, taken from the report of a committee of the faculty, composed of Dr. Morgan Callaway, Dr. David F. Houston, and Hon. R. L. Batts, gives some idea of his work as a teacher, a writer, and the executive head of the university. "When he first came to the University of Texas, Dr. Waggener was professor of history as well as of English literature. And, although this continued but a few years, it lasted long enough to give Dr. Waggener an unusually wide knowledge of history, a knowledge that enhanced his mastery over English literature, in which latter subject, of course, he did his chief work. While deeply read in English literature as a whole, Dr. Waggener was in a very special sense a profound student of Burke, Ruskin and Carlyle among the prose writers, and of Shakespeare, Milton, Browning and Tennyson among the poets. Each year he gave a course of lectures on two or more of these his favorites, and his hearers were always enthusiastic in their commendation. He left a set of lectures upon these and other authors that, had he lived, he would doubtless have revised and published.

"Despite the pressing duties of his dual position as professor and chairman, Dr. Waggener managed to publish a number of lectures and addresses. But excellent as these works are in their way, they do not ade-quately represent the powers of their author, who was forced to give to the chairmanship almost as many hours as to the professorship. But great as were Dr. Waggener's services as professor of English, they were overtopped, the committee thinks, by his services as chairman of the faculty, an office that, with the excep-tion of one year, he held for the last eleven years of his life. The position was peculiarly difficult, owing to the fact that the holder was vested with responsibility without corresponding authority. Another draw-back was this: the chairman was elected annually; and although Dr. Waggener was chosen for ten successive years, he could not foresee that such would be the ease, and if he could have foreseen it, he had not the authority definitely to plan for the future. Presiding over faculty meetings, delivering addresses, caring for the discipline of the institution, conducting the correspondence, preparing reports for the board of regents, responding to special calls for information and for suggestions concerning the policy of the university—all these duties made heavy demands upon him. but demands that were always promptly met. When Dr. Wag-gener was first elected chairman the university was in its infancy, and naturally his mind was occupied with questions of organization. Among the specific measures with which Dr. Waggener was especially identified, and which have greatly contributed to the upbuilding of the university, may be mentioned the following: The abandonment of the practice of diverting five thousand dollars from the university fund for the support of the State Agricultural and Mechanical College; the payment by the state of one hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars to the university in settlement of a long standing indebtedness; the appropriation of a portion of the general revenue to the support of the university; the appropriation of a part of the indemnity fund received from the United States to the construction of the university buildings, the constitution inhibiting appropriations from the general revenue for this purpose; the substitution of the presidency for the chairmanship; the turning over the management of the university lands to the board of regents; the establishment of the system of affiliated bigh schools; and the enlargment of the academic faculty.

"Highly intellectual was the cast of his mind. He was ever thoughtful, and could always give a reason for the faith that was in bim. He had definite aims and expressed them forcibly. Few writers have been blessed with a clearer style; few have pressed their measures with equal persistency; and fewer still have been so successful in having their measures enacted into

"As to traits of his character, one must have been impressed with Dr. Waggener's remarkable self-control. Amid the many vexations of his executive duties he held himself well in hand-a result at once of his strong common sense and his high ideal of justice. He was cooperative, too, with colleagues, regents, and all who had at heart the interests of the public schools. As often as possible he attended conventions, wrote for the journals, and delivered addresses. One of his colleagues, that knew Dr. Waggener most intimately, writes; 'His modesty seems one of his finest traits, and the finer because of his worth in so many ways. His daily life was an embodiment of the high principles and pure virtue inculcated by the religion that he professed. No wonder, then, that, when he felt himself in the valley of the shadow, he talked as deliberately and trustfully as if in the high noon of his strength; for in the words of his favorite author, he was

" "One who never turned his back but marched breast forward.

Never dreamed, though right were worsted, wrong would triumph,

Held we fall to rise, are baffled to fight better, Sleep to wake,",

JOHN P. KNUDSEN. Among the successful men of Gainesville, Texas, and of this vicinity may be mentioned the name of John P. Knudsen. Coming to this country as a young man, a stranger in a strange land, with little money and no prospects, undeterred by the unfamiliar conditions, Mr. Knudsen set to work to make his fortune. He has worked hard all of his life, and wherever he has been he has added to the value of the country, for he is constructive and has owned and improved many farms in different parts of the country. now retired and holds a position of respect in Gaines-

John P. Knudsen was born in Denmark in 1850, the son of Knud Nelson and Andrea Dorothea (Yepesen), Knudsen. Both of his parents lived all of their lives in Denmark and died there. They were the parents of eleven children and his father was a miller and farmer. Mr. Knudsen is the only member of the family who lives in Texas.

Growing up in Denmark on his father's farm, young John Knudsen was always animated by the desire to go to America. He, however, attended school and worked on the farm until he was twenty-one years of age, when he left his home and his family and came to New York. He stayed there for a time and then went to Fairfield, Connecticut, where he worked at various things for two months. He next came to Texas and settled in Galveston, where he worked on a compress for a short time. He next came to Van Alstyne and entered the employment of the railroad company here. After a time he rented a farm near by and for a few years was engaged in farming. He saved his money carefully and, heing successful, he was able soon to buy a farm in in the success. He operated this farm, which consisted of 160 acres, for six years, then sold this place and came to Cooke county, where he bought a farm near Gainesville. He did not live on this farm very long, but sold it and bought another, where he lived for twelve years. He improved all of these places, greatly enhancing their value, and, after selling the last men-tioned place, he bought, improved and sold a number of other farms. He has now retired from all active business, except for buying and selling a little stock occasionally. He is the owner of 600 acres of good farm land and also owns three houses and lots in Gainesville, two of which he rents at a good price. In politics Mr. Knudsen is a Democrat.

Mr. Knudsen has been twice married, his first wife being Sarah Arder, of the state of Missouri. They were married in 1882 and eight children were born of the union, namely: William, of Hardman county, Texas; Andrea, wife of Edward Robinson, of Gainesville, Texas; Thomas, who is dead; John, of Olkahoma, and Robert, James, Albert and Walker all of whom live in the latter state. In 1990 Mr. Knudsen was married for the second time, his wife being Miss Elsie Smith, who was born in Tennessee, a daughter of Chris Smith. Both of her parents were natives of Tennessee and both are dead. No children have been born of this marriage.

EUGENE C. GORDON, M. D. A physician and surgeon whose practice in different sections of Texas has been continuous for thirty years, Dr. Gordon is nor a resident of Columbus, is regarded as the leading surgeon and one of the ablest general practitioners in Colorado county, and is a man of exceptional capabilities and prominence both in his profession and in his civic affairs.

Dr. Eugene C. Gordon was born in what was then Tishomingo county, Mississippi, August 18, 1861. His parents were Dr. John and Mary (Henderson) Gordon, the former a native of Caswell county, North Carolina, and the latter of the vicinity of Huntington, Tennessee. The mother's family was especially prominent in the ministry of the Presbyterian faith. Ramsey Henderson, the maternal grandfather, was active as a preacher in Tennessee, and the son of Dr. Robert Henderson of Murfreesboro, Tennessee, one of the noted divines of his time. This branch of the Henderson family is probably related to J. Pinckney Henderson, who was the first governor of the state of Texas. The Hendersons moved to Tennessee at an early time, and during the early fifties settled in Tishomingo near the Mississippi where Ramsey Henderson had charge of the church. It was in that locality that John Gordon and Mary Henderson met and were married. Grandfather Gordon was a school teacher and educator. Dr. John Gordon moved with his family to Milam county, Texas, in 1878, and practiced his profession there for some years, later moving to Lorena in McLennan county, where he remained in active practice until his death. The mother is still living at Lorena. The late Dr. John Gordon both professionally, and in his character ranked far above the ordinary men of his day. His medical education was received at Jefferson Medical College in Philadelphia, and he was always a great reader and thinker, possessed a very sturdy character, and was a man of strong influence in every community of his residence. Though he graduated from one of the best medical schools in the country, he had practically educated him-self during his early life. During his residence in Mis-sissippi, he took an active interest in Democratic politics and in all public affairs. He served as chairman of the county committee for more than four years and was candidate for both state senator and representative, but was defeated owing to a peculiar local condition relative to a division of the county into three counties. During the era of reconstruction he was a power for law and order and the establishment of peaceful industries in his state. During the war he went into the southern army as surgeon, and was later detached from duty and commissioned to remain at home where his services were greatly needed. His house became a hospital, in which were many sick and wounded soldiers, both of the north and south. One of his brothers served as a private in the Tennessee army.

Dr. Eugene C. Gordon is one of six children. Johnnie died in young manhood. A. M. Gordon is a druggist at Eddy, Texas; Dr. R. A.; and Preston Gordon live in Lovena; Mrs. W. D. Whitset is the wife of a lumberman at Victoria. As a boy Dr. Gordon attended school in Corinth, Mississippi. His medical studies were begun under his father's direction, after which he took a course of lectures in a Missouri medical college at St. Louis, an institution which is part of Washington University. He then went away to his father's old school, the Jefferson Medical College at Philadelphia, where he was graduated M. D. in 1882. His first practice was in Free Stone county, and after two years he moved to Rockdale, and later to Falls county, where he acquired a large practice and remained twenty-four years, part of the time at Lott, and the rest at Duraugo. For three years he was at Brownwood in west Texas, for the purpose of recovering his health. After that he removed to Columbus, and now enjoys a large practive in this city and in Colorado county. Dr. Gordon believes in keeping up with the time in his profession. He has taken six post-graduate courses since leaving college thirty years ago, and in equipment may well stand by any of the modern practitioners of medicine. Five of his postgraduate courses were taken at Tulane University in New Orleans, and recently he completed a hospital course in New York and Philadelphia. Dr. Gordon has one of the best equipped offices, and one of the best professional libraries in Colorado county. While he has a general practice he specializes in gynecology and surgery. He has membership in the Colorado county, the Texas state and the district Medical Society and while a resident of Brown county was secretary of the County Society. Outside of his profession, Dr. Gordon takes much in-

Outside of his profession, Dr. Gordon takes much interest in educational affairs, and is well informed on civic and social matters. He served on the Falls county school board for six years as secretary, was a member of the Board of Aldermen at Lott, and on the board of examiners for pharmacy two years. In 1885, Dr. Gordon was united in marriage with Miss Rilla White of Missispipi, a daughter of I. N. White, a soldier of the Confederacy, Mrs. Gordon's mother is now living at Temple, Texas, at the age of eighty-five. The two daughters of Dr. Gordon and wife are: Mrs. James H. Wooten of Columbus, and Miss Mary Gordon. All the family worship in the Presbyterian church, Mrs. Gordon has membership in the Shropshire-Upton Chapter of the United Daughters of the Confederacy. Fraternally Dr. Gordon is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias and the Woodmen of the World, being medical examiner for both orders.

I. M. PUTNAM. The two largest cities of the states of Otlahom and Texas have many reasons to be grateful to I. M. Putnam for his work and his influence as a citizen and community developer. For a number of years Mr. Putnam was one of the leading public men and business executives of Oklahoma and Oklahoma City, and though now devoling most of his time and energy to the development of properties at San Antonio and in Southwestern Texas, still retains large and important interests in the former state.

While living in Oblahoma City, Mr. Putnam in 1905 bought the Hot Wells Hotel and the surrounding grounds, consisting of thirty acres, adjoining the city of San Antonio on the south. He associated with himself others, and since 1905 they have purchased additional land surrounding the original botel site, and now have 1,000 acres, extending from the fair grounds on the north to the state's property on the south, and from the San Jose Mission on the west to the Goljad road on the east. This is a magnificent property any one who has ever visited San Antonio will understand, and it is chiefly due to the farsighted and original plans of Mr. Putnam that its development has been undertaken on a scale which will prove extremely profit able to the entire city as well as to himself and associates. Since 1911 he has spent most of his time in the San Antonio section and with the Hot Wells project, and the development of tributary territory about San Antonio have both received a large share of his business energy and attention. Mr. Putnam, in pursuance of his typical manner of handling real estate property, has waited since 1995 for an opportune time to bring the Hot Wells Hotel and surrounding land before the public. With unbounded faith in the future of San Antonio as a business center and climatic resort, Mr. Putnam awaited necessary developments on the part of the city in the building of paved streets, sewers, sidewalks, and other facilities. San Antonio has done much along those lines in recent years, and in 1913 approved issues or bonds or necessary developments of the complete system of public improvements that will enable San Antonio to measure up to its reputation and its splendid opportunities as a great resort and business center of the southwest.

Following this enterprise on the part of the city as a whole, Mr. Putnam in 1914 brought his own project onto the stage of public attention. The thousand acres of land surrounding the Hot Wells Hotel is now being subdivided into beautiful resident districts, with streats and driveways from one hundred to one hundred and fifty feet in width, a number of them boulevarded with parking in the centers, and the park areas being planted with palms. All modern improvements are being in stalled. The plans of the owners contemplate making the property equal in beet owners contemplate making the property equal in beet of california and other famous resort centers, and many people who prefer the climate of Southwest Texas to that of California and Florida will thus find here opportunities of residence suitable to their tastes and means.

Mr. Putnam, aside from the enterprise at the Hot Wells district, has for several years been directing his energies toward the making of San Antonio a great resort center, occupying a relative position in this respect to Los Angeles, in California. San Antonio has somewhat the same geographical position as is enjoyed by Los Angeles. To the northwest of San Antonio are situated the magnificent and healthful Guadalupe mountains, with their many beautiful mountain streams, within only one to three hours' ride by rail or automobile, while to the southeast are the resorts and attractions of the Texas Gulf coast, only a half day's ride away. Thus San Antonio, besides its own unrivaled attractions, offers a variety of climate and advantages suitable to all tastes, giving every variety desired from the mountains to the sea. Mr. Putnam and associates are owners of Mt. Alamo and some other points of interest in the Guadaloupe mountains. The San Antonio and Fredericksburg Railroad was recently constructed so as to give Fredericksburg, one of the old centers of population and trade, an outlet by railway to the rest of the world, and, by means of a tunnel over nine hundred feet in length through the main ridge of the mountains, this railroad has become not only one of the railway engineering enterprise. It is the only tunnel of any note in the entire state. Near the tunnel is the townsite of Mt. Alamo, located on one of the highest points of the Guadaloupe mountain range. This is being improved as a mountain resort for Texas people. and with the completion of railway facilities it will become accessible to business men in practically every part of the state. One feature of the townsite is that every possible means have been taken to safeguard it for the purposes of a resort for people seeking a healthful location and normal recreation, while at the same time restricting it against occupancy by tubercular patients, whose presence would endanger and detract from the value of the Mt. Alamo resort for the average visitor.

Israel Mercer Putnam was born on a farm in Early county, Georgia, December 29, 1873, a son of Jesse Mercer and Zenia (Lofton) Putnam. On his father's side he is descended from the Putnams of Revolutionary war fame. About 1800 his great-grandfather, Israel Henry Putnam, moved from Massachusetts to Georgia, and established a plantation in what is now Putnam county and on which in 1810 was born James Madison Putnam, grandfather of I. M. Putnam. Mr. Putnam has won his success by vigilant cognizance of opportunities and by exceptional energy in his important field of business activity. Until he was fifteen he lived mostly on a farm and grew up in Early, Calhoun, Miller, Pike and Coweta counties of Georgia, his native state, meanwhile attending a school conducted in a one-room build-ing typical of the public school system of the rural and small town districts throughout the country at that time. Left an orphan at the age of eleven, he had to make his own way and pay for his own education, except when assisted by relatives. When fifteen he began work in an insurance office at Chattanooga, Tennessee, and a year later became a news agent, working on trains. After two years of varied employment, he re-turned to the office of his cousin, L. D. Drewry, at Chattanooga, and for the latter's assistance then and at various other times Mr. Putnam owes much of his subsequent success. He used all the intervals of his leisure time to perfect himself in his preparation for life, and finally in 1899 was graduated from Vanderbilt University, at Nashville, Tennessee. After a year spent in newspaper work, Mr. Putnam took up the study of law in the University of Georgia, and graduated with his degree LL. B. in June, 1901.

Fresh from college, and with the ink on his legal diploma hardly dry, Mr. Putnam went to Oklahoma City, where he arrived July 4, 1901. He had practically no capital, and it was his most sanguine anticipation to reach success through the avenue of legal practice. The eight or ten succeeding years were a time of remarkable development and growth in Oklahoma City, and it was only natural that some of the citizens should keep pace with or lead in the general progress, and thus reach unusual individual success in business affairs. Mr. Putnam was the example of a young man whose rapid rise to business distinction at Oklahoma City was noteworthy even among a multitude of similar successes. With proper appreciation of the coming greatness of Okla-homa City, he invested the first fee from his cases in town lots, and by rapid reinvestment and sale had in a few years become one of the leading individual real estate operators in Oklahoma and Texas. The plan on which his operations were conducted in Oklahoma City consisted of the buying of acreage property, subdividing it into lots, and promoting the sale by making the entire subdivision a distinctive and unusually attractive residence section. That plan was followed out in repeated cases, and some of the finest residence districts of Oklacases, and some of the linest restriction of the distriction of these residence additions are Putnam's enterprise. Some of these residence additions are Putnam Heights, Military Park, Epworth View, part of University Addition and other sections, mostly in the nortwest part of Oklahoma City, now consisting of a well-built-up residence. dence section over two miles long, all on property subdivided and developed by him.

A matter of special has the inconnection with Mr.

Putnam's career was him prominent connection with Mr.

Putnam's career was him prominent connection with the famous capitol was him prominent connection with the famous capitol that during the long campaign involving the standard that during the long campaign involving the state of the converse of the control of the control the free capitol. This proposition was presented to the voters of the state of Oklahoma, and the removal of the capitol and the acceptance of the bonus were carried by an overwhelming majority. Later, however, other interests in Oklahoma City organized a similar movement to have the capitol located in another part of the eity, and, as they claimed, nearer the business center. By working on the fears and prejudices of business men who feared that Mr. Putnam's proposition would bring about a change in the location of the business center, these interests succeeded in bringing before the State Legislature and having passed by that body a new capitol location plan, which repudiated and abandoned Mr. Putnam's plan. It is unnecessary to review the details of the story, but the end was that the entire plan fell through, the promoters of the second project were unable to fulfill their promises, and to their big failure and the loss of confidence resulting from it is attributed generally the greater share of the slump in realty values that began in Oklahoma City in 1911, and which swept away the accumulations of a vast number of the people of that city and section. In conclusion it may be stated that Oklahoma still has no free capitol building as a result, and is now confronted with the enormous expense of the construction of a capitol at the state's expense. In Mr. Putnam's real estate operations it has always been his policy to buy land years in advance of its development if necessary, and to await the proper time for placing it on the market, after making all improvements and giving his purchasers property that is valuable and which can always be sold for more than they paid for it. This was invariably the rule of his operations in Oklahoma City, and the same can be said of his activities in Southwest Texas. For his success in business Mr. Putnam owes his accomplishment to his individual initiative and business enterprise. He appears to be a natural leader in business affairs. Along with his success be has been generous and has made large land and cash donations to worthy causes. He acquired extensive interests in farm lands, developed much of his land both for the profit that would come from them and also as an example to others and a demonstration of the possibilities of agriculture. He also took a prominent part in the good roads movement and was closely identified with the various civic and public organizations. In September, 1907, Mr. Putnam was elected on the Democratic ticket as a representative to the first state legislature of Oklahoma, and was re-elected to the second legislature, being a most energetic worker in the body of lawmakers upon whom devolved the initial work of legislation in that state. He retired from the legislature as soon as the governor and state capitol commission ratified the vote of the people of the state and officially located the state capitol on the lands he controlled, and was not in the legislature which met in December, 1910, and changed the location from his

HON. JAMES DUBOSE WALTHALL. As one of the most brilliant members of the bar of Texas, James DuBose Walthall, of San Antonio, bears a name which is known and honored throughout the state and the South. His services were especially appreciated and made for him his state-wide reputation in the office of attorney general.

Of a distinguished Southern family, Mr. Walthall by his own ability and achievements has added to the luster of an honored name. James DuBose Walthall was born at Marion, Alabama, in 1876, a son of Thomas Nas John at Mitriol, Aladama, in 1970, a son of nomas J. and Alice (DuBose) Walthall. His father, who died at San Antonio in 1912, after a residence of several years in that city, was a native of Alabama and a son of Col. L. N. Walthall, a gallant officer in the Confederate army from that state. A cousin of Thomas J. Walthall was the late Gen. E. C. Walthall, of Mississippi, who reached the rank of major general in the Confederate army, and after the war was sent by Mississippi to the United States Senate. Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, once paid General Walthall the tribute that he was the most efficient and best equipped senator in the Senate of the United States. Mrs. Thomas J. Walthall, who is still living in San Antonio, and who was born in Alabama, is descended from French Huguenot stock which settled in South Carolina a number of generations ago. Her distinguished lineage includes many illustrious characters of the South. Among her cousins were the late Gen. John B. Gordon, of Georgia, Coursin were the face Gen. John D. Gordon, of Georgia, the late Dudley DuBose, United States senator from Georgia; George Dargan and J. L. S. Irby, both of whom represented South Carolina in the United States Senate; a second cousin was the late Robert Toombs, one of the most brilliant of Georgia's public men; while a great-uncle of Mrs. Walthall was senator Thomas H. Benton, who represented Missouri for thirty consecutive years in the United States senate, and ranked along with his great contemporaries including such men as Daniel Webster and Henry Clay.

James DuBose Walthall attended school in the Marion Academy at Marion, a town that for several generations has been an educational center in Alabama. Coming to Texas when a youth, practically his entire career has been spent in this state, with his home at San Antonio. Though of an old and influential family, Mr. Walthall has shown the independent spirit of achievement, and paid his own way through the University of Texas, of which he was a student for three years until graduating from the law department in 1903 with the highest honors and with the degree LL. B. On his return to San Antonio Mr. Walthall became associated with the distinguished law firm of Denman, Franklin & McGown, and his ability soon gained him distinction in his profession. After four years, in October, 1907, Mr. Walthall was appointed fifth assistant attorney general of the state under Attorney General Davidson. Subsequently he was promoted to third assistant attorney general, and still later first assistant, a position he held for two years. During a considerable portion of that two years he was acting as attorney general in the absence of the chief in the office. In the latter part of July, 1912, Governor Colquitt appointed Mr. Walthall attorney general to fill out the unexpired term of Jewel P. Lightfoot, and he filled the office until the expiration of the regular term, on January 1, 1914. In January, 1913, Mr. Walthall returned to San Antonio, and has since been actively engaged in the practice of law as a member of the firm of Terrell, Walthall & Terrell, whose position in the state bar is one of enviable leadership and prestige. In that association Mr. Walthall is engaged in a large general practice and represents a number of the largest corporations, commercial houses and banks in Sau Antonio and Southwest Texas.

It is only appropriate that some attention should be paid to Mr. Walthall's record while serving the people of Texas in the Attorney General's office. While assistant attorney general Mr. Walthall was vigorous in the enforcement of the law and represented the state in much important litigation. It was his forceful presentation and skillful defense which won for the state the first case to go before the supreme court involving the constitutionality of Baskin-McGregor liquor bill. also appeared and won a number of victories in suits of the railroad commission against the railroads and represented the railroad commission in the case against the fourteen principal Texas lines before the Interstate Commerce Commission, in what was generally known as the Southwestern Rate Case, involving interstate rates into and out of Texas. Some of his most important work in behalf of the state was accomplished in the handling of the intangible tax cases, about fifteen in number, in which the validity of the intangible tax statute was sustained. Even more noteworthy was the Southwestern oil case, as it was popularly known, or better described as the Gross Receipts tax case, involving the entire gross receipts tax system of the state. The statute was fully sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States, though the oil company was represented by several of the ablest corporation lawyers of the state. Mr. Walthall represented Texas in the ease of Gaar-Scott & Co. vs. Secretary of State, in the Supreme Court of the United States, and successfully defended the entire franchise tax system of the state as applied to foreign corporations. Another federal suit in which he was the leading counsel was that with the state of Louisiana involving a boundary question between the two states. Among other causes in which Mr. Walthall appeared before the United States Supreme Court the case of Marcellus Thomas vs. The State of Texas brought him some particularly flattering distinction. This was a case involving the matter of race discrimination and the right of negroes charged with crime to have members of their own race on the grand and petit juries indicting and trying them. Chief Justice Fuller himself rendered the opin-ion in the court of final resort, and that opinion has been characterized by writers and lawyers in reviewing the life of that jurist as one of his greatest decisions. A high compliment was paid to Mr. Walthall's brief in that case, since Judge Fuller's opinion included a large portion of the brief in the exact words in which Mr. Walthall had presented it to the court.

Besides this splendid record before the courts, Mr. Walthall was many times called upon to give counsed to the governor and heads of departments on difficult and important questions. Again and again the legislature acted upon advice coming from the office of the attorney general and prepared by Mr. Walthall. He attorney general and prepared invalid by the courts. As Mr. Walthall is still young in years, it is not unreasonable to anticipate that he will long have a position among the most distinguished lawyers of Texas.

WILLIAM SCHEETZ. Those individuals who have given of their energy, skill and enthusiasm in the building up of a community are benefactors of humanity, and their names cannot be held in too high esteem. In every undertaking there must be a logical beginning, and the man who lays the foundation of what afterwards may become a flourishing city must deserve more honor than those who follow after him and reap the benefits of his progressive enterprise. In Gundalupe county, the enterprise of the Schertz fanally, and an amenorial to the enterprise of the Schertz fanally, and alove named war. William Schertz, whose home is dead of the control of the scherts of the scherts and farmers and farmers in that part of the state, and represents one of the splendid pioneer families of Southwestern Texas.

William Schertz was born on his father's farm on the Cibolo at what is now the town of Schertz in Guadalupe county in 1870, a son of Schastian and Elizabeth (Rittiman) Schertz, Both sides of the family have an interesting history. Schastian Schertz was born in Alsae-Corraine, came to Texas in 1843, two years later joined the Castro and Solms-Braunfels colonies which arrived in the Republic that year as the advance guard of the great German colonization movement in Texas. Mr. Schertz spent his first two years in San Antonio, lived for a time at New Braunfels, and then on a farm on the Clobol Rive in the sor and the county of the Correct of the County of leading man of enterprise in that section. With the building of the Southern Pacific railroad in 1876 the Schertz cotton gin became the nucleus for a little settlement, and hoth a railroad station and a postoffice vaestablished. Selastian Schertz lived there until his death in 1889.

Elizabeth (Rittiman) Schertz was also born in Alsace-Lorraine, but came to this country with the Castro colony. Her brother, John Rittiman, who died at his house in Schertz, in the spring of 1913, was bed at his Alsace, came to Texas in 1845 with the Castro colony, and first located at D'Haus in Medina county. He experienced all the dangers and hardships of pioneer and frontier life, coming often in contact with the Indians as well as with the hard usage of primitive pioneering. His family subsequently moved to the Cibolo river in Guadalupe country, and in 1861 John Rittiman enlisted with the Third regiment of Texas Infantry and spent about four years in the Confederate army, his service being chiefly in this state. After the war he lived for a great many years in Comal country, but in 1903 established his home at Schertz. Mrs. Elizabeth Schertz, who is still living, became the mother of five sons and one dangher, William, Adolph, Martin, Henry, Ferdinand and Augusta. All these are still living at Schertz except Henry, whose home is in California, and William, whose home is now in San Antonio.

William Schertz, starting in as a young man in the mercantile business on his home place, did more than anything else to establish the commercial center of Schertz, and his store was the first business activity there except the cotton gin, which his father had estab-lished in 1870. From 1892, when he opened his stock of goods for the trade, William Schertz continued prosperously in the mercantile business until November prosperously in the mereantile business until November 1, 1907, a period of fifteen years. He then sold out to a company composed of his clerks, who are still continuing the business under the name of the Schertz Mereantile Company. After keeping his residence at Schertz until July, 1909, Mr. Schertz moved his home to San Antonio. In the spring of 1913 he disposed of all his remaining interests at the old town, and is now devoting his time to his extensive land and farm interests and is one of the largest owners of farm land in Southwest Texas. During his residence at Schertz Mr. Schertz also held the office of postmaster. His landed possessions are situated in Bexar, Runnells, Frio, Atascosa, Caldwell, Dimmitt, Gonzales and other counties, including a farm at Mission in the lower Rio Grande Valley. Mr. Schertz was reared on a farm, was a farmer until taking up mercantile activities, and since selling his store has gone back to his old occupation and is one of the best managers of the resources of the soil in this section of the state. His farming opera-tions are conducted largely through tenants and from his headquarters in San Antonio he is able to keep in close touch with his properties by frequent visits in almost every direction from that city. While William Schertz has withdrawn from the business activities of the town where he was reared, other members of the family still keep up the prestige of the name as leading business men. For a number of years the cotton gin established by the father was carried on by Adolph and Martin Schertz, but Martin has since retired from the firm, and Adolph is sole proprietor of the gin and also occupies the old homestead farm in the vicinity.

Mr. William Schertz, whose home is at 329 W. Craig Place in San Antonio, married Miss Bertha Willenhrock, who was horn in Bexar county just across the line from the Schertz place in Guaddupe county. They have a young son, Edgar Schertz, born in 1901.

EDWARD P. MANGUM. The native sons of the Lone Star state have ably carried forward the progressive, civic and industrial activities to which original impetus was given by prior generations, and have well upheld the prestige of the commonwealth through their sterling services. Such an one is he whose name initiates this paragraph, for he is one of the representative young agriculturists and stock-growers of Hunt county and is a citizen who commands secure vantage-ground in popular confidence and esteem, as is vouchsafed by the fact that he is now serving his second term as representative for Hunt county in the state legislature, in which his record has been marked by discrimination, loyalty and efficiency.

Mr. Mangum was born in Delta county, Texas, on the 5th of October, 1879, and is a son of William E. and Delina James (Murray) Mangum, the former of whom was born in the state of Mississippi and the latter in Illinois, though she was reared in Texas, to which state her parents removed when she was a child. William E. Mangum served as a valiant soldier of the Confederacy in the Civil war, as a member of a Mississippi regiment, and participated in important engagements marking the progress of the great conflict between the North and the South. About the time of the close of the war he came to Texas and obtained a tract of land in Delta county, and soon after moved to Hunt county, where he has developed a large and valuable farm and where he has been specially successful in his operations as an agriculturist and stock-grower. He has contributed in generous measure to the civic and industrial progress of the county and has been a citizen of prominence and influence in connection with public affairs of a local order, the while his sterling character has gained and re-tained to him the confidence and high regard of all who know him. He is a stalwart in the camp of the Demoeratic party; both he and his wife hold membership in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and he manifests his continued interest in his old comrades in arms by retaining affiliation with the United Confederate Veterans' Association. He has now virtually retired from the more onerous duties which long engrossed his attention, and he and his wife now reside in an attractive home in the little city of Commerce, Hunt county, about three miles distant from the old homestead farm, in Delta county.

Hon. Edward P. Mangum gained his early experience in connection with the work of the homestead farm just mentioned and his preliminary educational advantages were those afforded in the excellent public schools of Commerce, Hunt county, in which place he continued to reside until his removal to Greenville, the judicial center of the county, where he established his home in June, 1912. His educational training was most effectively supplemented by a course in the celebrated Vanderbilt University, in the City of Nashville, Tennessee, in which institution he was a student for part of two terms, 1901-03, and in which he specialized in philosophy and political economy - a line of study that has proved of marked value to him in his service as a member of the legislature of his native state. Prior to entering this university he was for a time a student in the East Texas

Normal College, at Commerce.

Mr. Mangum took the following degrees at East Texas Normal College: B. S., B. A. and A. M. He taught philosophy and literature in the institution for three years and is very proud of the record he made there and of the school. He was one of the voungest teachers of the above branches in the state.

From his youth to the present time Mr. Mangum has taken a lively and intelligent interest in political and economic affairs and has been unwavering in his allegiance to the Democratic party, in whose cause he has given yeoman service. In 1910 he was elected a representative of Hunt county in the lower house of the state legislature, and he proved a valuable working member of that body during the Thirty-second general assembly, with the result that in November, 1912, he was reelected by a most gratifying majority, the result at the polls attesting not only his personal popularity, but also the public estimate placed upon his services in the legislature. In the Thirty-second assembly he was chairman of the committee on commerce and manufactures, vice-chairman of the committee on state affairs, and a member of other important house committees. As a legislator he has been specially alert and enthusiastic in the furtherance of educational work and his interest in the same has been shown by his private advocacy of progressive policies in the maintenance of the public schools and higher institutions of learning in the state.

Mr. Mangum is the owner of three valuable farms of 500 acres, stuated some distance from the City of Commerce, and devoted specially to the raising of fine horses. To this estate he gives a careful supervision and he takes pride in being numbered among the progressive agriculturists and stock-growers of his native commonwealth. He and his wife are popular factors in the representative social activities of Greenville and both are zealous members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

On the 4th of June, 1912, was solemnized the mariage of Mr. Mangum to Miss Clara E. Perkins, daughter of Judge George S. and Mary (Ganes) Perkins, of Greenville, the father a leading lawyer and jurist of northern Texas.

DR. AMOS GRAVES, SR. For thirty-five years, or, until his death in 1912, Dr. Amos Graves, Sr., was regarded as a foremost member of his profession in San Antonio, and as a physician and surgeon not only had the large practice which is the object of every doctor's ambition, but enjoyed some of the finer distinctions and honors.

Dr. Amos Graves, Sr., was born in North Mississippi in 1842. As a young man he served with distinction as a Confederate soldier throughout the war under Gen. Nathan Bedford Forrest, having followed that dashing cavalryman in many of his brilliant campaigns. At the close of the war he entered the medical department of the University of Virginia, was a student there two years, and finished his preparation for medicine in the department of the University of Louisiana (now Tulane University) graduating M. D. in 1868. His first choice of location was at Lexington, Missouri, where he practiced with growing success until 1876, when on account of failing health brought on by hard work as a general practioner, he removed to Texas, locating on a ranch in Frio county. Two years of open door life, employed in looking after his interests as a sheep raiser, with some incidental practice in medicine and surgery, fully restored him to health, and in 1878 he located permanently in San Antonio. He soon rose to the highest rank in the local medical fraternity, and until almost the time of his death was constantly engaged in a busy practice. He had the generosity and the humanity of the true physician, and a large part of his work was performed without remuneration. For twenty years. Dr. Graves, Sr., was medical director for the San Antonio and Arkansas Pass railroad, and from 1888 to 1902 was medical director of G. H. & S. A. Railroad.

Outside of his profession the senior Dr. Graves made some highly successful ventures in business affairs. It was he who promoted and built the San Antonio Union Stock Yards, and also the packing houses now known as the Union Meat Company. Of the latter concern he was for a long time sole owner, but finally disposed of the Union Meat Co, and a one-half interest in the Union Stock Yards. He was one of the charter members of the San Antonio Club, and had a prominent part in various other civic and social organizations, also was a member of the county and state medical societies and the American Medical Association. An esteemed and representative citizen of San Antonio, his death after a short illness closed a career of great usefulness,

Dr. Amos Graves, Sr., was married at Lexington,

Missouri, in 1869, to Miss Georgia Riley Smith, who was born in Missouri and died January 16, 1914, at the age of sixty-five. There are three children: Dr. Amos Graves Jr., born in 1870; Miss Jane Smithie Graves; and Olive, wife of Major George Martin of the U. S. A.

Dr. Amos Graves, Jr., whose birthplace was Lexington, Missouri, spent his boyhood and youth at San Antonio, attended the public schools, and is a graduate in medicine from the University of Pennsylvania, having been a member of the class of 1892. For the past twenty-two years he has enjoyed a large and general practice as a physician and surgeon at San Antonio, and his offices are in the Moore building.

HOMER EADS. The training school of railroad system and discipline is constantly graduating men of exceptional executive power into other fields of commercial arfairs. It was from an eventful career in the railway service that Homer Eads, after resigning from the position of superintendent of the International and Great Northern Railway in the fall of 1911, turned his experience and broad ability to insurance. Mr. Eads is now president and active head of the Southwestern Casualty Insurance Company of San Autonio.

It should be said that it was the hardest task of his life to quit the railroad, with which he had been connected for more than thirty years. His high position in the railroad world was won entirely through his own efforts. A capacity for hard work and a determination to succeed took him from office boy to superintendent, and in that time he not only mastered the art of running a railroad and managing men, but has always been successful in winning the admiration of his subordinates through his business ability and their friendship through the charm of his personalty. Beginning as an office boy at the age of nine, he became an expert telegrapher and dispatcher, was promoted through various positions to that of superintendent of the San Antonio Division, extending from Palestine to Laredo, four hundred and twenty-five miles, the longest and most important rail-road division in Texas. At the time of his resignation he received letters from Judge T. J. Freeman, then president of the road, and from all other officials and ex-officials of the company, all of them warm personal friends, many of them of long years standing. These letters express the sincere regret of the writers at Mr. Eads' resignation and contains words of the highest commendation for his ability and the unswerving fidelity and rectitude of his career as a railroad official. For the two years immediately preceding his resignation, there had not been a main line derailment on his division, a record practically unheard of in the history of railroad operation. It should also be stated that Mr. Eads never asked for a promotion or an increase in salary, these favors always came to him voluntarily from the higher officials. There was every reason why Mr. Eads could have gone much higher in railroad circles, but he had achieved the highest position possible that would permit him to live in his home city, San Antonio. He did not care to leave the Alamo city on account of the long years of association, both on the part of him-self and his family, with the business and social affairs of that community, the numerous and lasting friendships formed, to say nothing of the property interests which he had acquired and which he did not care to

"Homer Eads was born in Sumter county, Alabama, a son of Thomas and Clementine (Hight) Eads, who brought his family from Alabama to Texas in 1861, when the subject of this sketch was three months old, locating first at what was then the important river town of Port Sullivan on the Brazos in Milam county, but afterwards going to Caldwell in Burleson county. The father was a teacher by profession, and followed that calling a number of years in this state, dying at Bryan about forty years ago.

Henrer Ends began his railway career as a messenger at Hearne in the office of H. M. Hoxie, who for many years charged the found railway interests in the Southwest. At that time Henrich was the southwest at the same of the foundation of the found

During the first fifteen years of his experience in railroading, his superiors had found that Mr. Eads could be depended upon, and possessed not only the ability to obey without question, but in a case where orders were vague or lacking entirely, had the courage to go ahead on his own responsibility and do the work or get the business. In 1887 he first became a resident of San Antonio, having been transferred to that city as commercial agent, with the later addition of general live stock agent. Mr. Eads has made his home in San Antonio since that time with the exception of about two years when he was called to Palestine to assume charge of the car service department with the title of assistant to the general manager and superintendent of car service. Not being satisfied to live in Palestine, at his own request he was transferred again to San Antonio. and given the title of assistant general freight agent in charge of commercial freight and live stock with headquarters at San Antonio. This position brought him very closely in touch with the great live-stock inter-ests of Southwestern Texas, and during the following years he exerted every effort to perfect conditions for the transportation of live stock, and is said to have been as much a part of the live stock interests in Southwestern Texas as any other one man. During his management International & Great Northern originated more live-stock shipments than any other road in the state.

In February, 1907, Mr. Eads was promoted from assistant general freight agent and general live stock agent to the office of superintendent of the San Antonio Division of the I. & G. N., which gave him charge of the four hundred and twenty-five miles of track from Palestine to Laredo. This was one of the heaviest and most important divisions of the Texas railroad, and during the following four years Mr. Eads occupied a correspondingly increased place of influence in Southwest Texas affairs. In the many years of continued service with the International & Great Northern, Mr. Eads had filled many positions, telegraph operator, station agent, train dispatcher, commercial agent, assistant general freight agent and superintendent of car service, assistant to the general manager, and later superintendent of the proper division of the road.

In 1911 the Southwestern Case Mry Insurance Company of San Antionio was organized and Mr. Eads was offered the presidency and general managership of the company, and on the reasons which have already been to accept out of or the reasons which have already been to accept and also because of his confidence that the company had a great future. Though the company began business at the close of the year 1911, it has since made remarkable strides, and in the insurance in force, the surplus to policy holders and in the general strength and resources of the company organization it stands as one of the best companies occupying the insurance field of the Southwest. Mr. Eads is also president of the Home Insurance Association of San Antonio and is vice president of the Southern Surety Casualty Conference.

The career of Homer Eads has not been one altogether of business achievements. San Antonio has no more enthusiastic or persistent worker for the welfare of the city, and while devoted to the growth and grow-ing prestige of the Texas metropolis, he has worked untiringly for the development of every section about San Antonio. In his position as a railway official he had many opportunities to favor San Antonio, and never neglected one and many times originated plans which would further advertise the city to the world and would be the means of bringing about improvements commer-cially and municipally. He was instrumental in getting two conventions of the Texas Cattle Growers Association held in San Antonio. The San Antonio Fair Association numbers him as one of its organizers and a prominent official, and for some time he had charge of the Mexican features of the fair, in 1905 having gone to the city of Mexico as chairman of a committee to extend an invitation to President Diaz to participate in the fair and make an exhibit. He has also been prominently identified with Carnival Association, the Casino Association, and many other civic and social bodies. It was Mr. Eads who helped to bring the Hot Sulphur Wells south of San Antonio into notice as a resort and sanitarium. For eight years he served as member of the board of managers of the Southwest Insane Asylum, located near San Antonio, and devoted much time to bringing that institution to its model conditions as a public philanthropy. In 1906 he was appointed a member of the executive committee in charge of the Chapel and Library building presented to the military post of Fort Sam Houston of San Antonio by the residents of that city, and was one of the leaders in the campaign for the raising of twenty-five thousand dollars necessary to complete that enterprise. Mr. Eads has done much valuable work in connection with the associated charities of San Antonio, was chairman of the finance committee two years, and on January 1, 1914, was unanimously elected president of the associated charities, filling the place voluntarily vacated by Dr. Frank Paschal. Prominent in Masonic circles, Mr. Eads is a Knights Templar in the York Rite and has taken thirtytwo degrees of the Scottish Rite, and also affiliates with the Woodmen of the World and the Independent Order of Odd Fellows. He belongs to the Travis Club and the Chamber of Commerce of San Antonio. Mr. Eads has one of the beautiful homes in San Antonio, and his wife is an active leader in social circles. He has two sons and a charming daughter, Miss Helen G. Eads.

HOMER T. WILSON, J.R., M. D. This is a name with prominent associations in Texas. The senior is Rev. Dr. Homer T. Wilson, noted as a minister and lecturer and one of the most prominent platform orators and public speakers in the country. The junior of the name is a young physician and surgeon of San Antonio.

Rev. Dr. Homer T. Wilson was born at Bardstown, Kentucky, March 29, 1850, was reared in that locality, and was educated in the University of Kentucky at Lexington, the university then being known as Transylvania University. In that institution he prepared for the ministry, and on leaving college began his active work as a preacher and paster of the Christian denomination and occupied a number of important positions in the church in Kentucky. Since 1895 his home has been in Texas, and be became especially well known at Fort Worth, where he was for some time pastor of the First Christian church of the city became its posator. Since 1901 Dr. Wilson has lived in San Antonio, having moved to that city to take-charge of the Central Christian church. That was a flourishing congregation and enjoyed his services as its pastor until 1905. Dr. Wilson then retired from active church work as a minister in order to eater upon what must be regarded as a larger career on the lecture platform. His work as Chautaugua and Lyceum lecturer has brought him a fame tangua and Lyceum lecturer has brought him a fame and popularity in every section of the United States, and it would be impossible to estimate the ynholeum influence which emanates from a man of his power and ability. A fine orator, possessed of a magnetic presence, a master of beautiful English, Rev. Dr. Wilson has chosen for the subject of most of his lectures moral and religious themes, and the titles of his best known addresses are: "America's Uncrowned Queen," "The Christ of History," "The Man of Galilee," "Sparks from the Anvil," "If We But Knew" and "Sculptors of Life." His work has brought him a wide circle of friends and acquaintances throughout the United States, and he is particularly popular with the traveling man. Dr. Wilson is now and has been for several years National Chaplain of the Travelers Protective Association of the United States.

Rev. Dr. Wilson married Annie Fitzgerald, and both have their home in San Antonio. Their seven children are as follows: Dr. Homer T. Wilson, Jr., physician and surgeon at San Antonio; Edwin Barrett Wilson, who at this writing is a medical student in the University of Pennsylvania; Florence, wife of Talbot O. Bateman, well known as an arrist and cartoonist with the "Dallas Morning News;" Annie, wife of Alfred Dieckmann of San Antonio; Lucile, widow of Victor Hugo of San Antonio; Corinne, wife of Dr. A. L. Curry, of San Antonio; Lucile, widow of Victor Hugo of San Antonio; Corinne, wife of Dr. France. C. Beall of Fort Worth.

Dr. Homer T. Wilson, Jr., who was born at Harrodsburg, Kentucky, has enjoyed the bighest of educational advantages in preparation for the practice of his profession, which he began in San Antonio in 1912 and which has already brought him unusual success. He attended the high school at San Antonio, graduating from that school, and finished his studies in the University of Virginia at Charlottesville in 1906. His medical education was acquired in the University of Pennsylvania at Philadelphia. By competitive examination after graduation he was appointed on the staff of Bellevue Hospital in New York City, which position he held for two years.

Dr. Wilson has membership in the County and State Medical Societies and the American Medical Association.

CAPAIN TITUS CARE WESTEROOK. One of the strong and noble characters of Robertson county was the late Captain Titus Carr Westbrook, who here maintained his home for forty years and who represented Texas as one of the valiant soldiers and officers of the Confederacy in the Civil war. He came to the Lone Star state as a youth and here he achieved noteworthy success as well as inviolable place in the confidence and esteem of all who knew him. He died at his home in the city of Hearne, Robertson county, on the 17th of September, 1598, and his memory is revered in the community that long represented him home and the stage of his productive activities.

and a with Westbrook came to Robertson county in 1859, in company with his mother and stepfather, the latter having been Levis Whitfield Carr, who established his residence on lands in the rich alluvial bottoms of the Brazos river, near Hearne. Captain Westbrook was born at West Point, Clay county, Mississippi, on the 1st of October, 1842, and was a son of Meses L. and Sidney (Carr) Westbrook. Moses L. Westbrook was born in Greene county, North Carolina, in 1812, and he passed the closing years of his life in the state of Mississippi. Of his children Charles A. eame to Texas and was a resident of Lorena, McLennan county, at the time of his death; Captain Titus C., subject of this memoir, was the next in order of birth; and Moses L. is a resident of the city of Waco, Texas. After the death of her first husband Mrs. Sidney (Carr) Westbrook became the wife of Lewis W. Carr, and they became the parents of one daughter, Sidney, who is the widow of Beverly Beckhom and who resides at Hearne. Robertson county.

immigrated from England and settled in the South prior to the war of the Revolution. The widow of Captain Titus C. Westbrook likewise is a representative of the Carr family and her husband was of distant with ship. Her paternal ancestor who first eame from England to America settled in Nansemon county, Virgini, whence his descendants later removed to Greene county, North Carolina.

Captain Westbrook gained his early educational discipline in his native state and supplemented this by attenting the military school at Frankfort, Kentucky, an institution in which he was graduated in 1859, the year that marked his arrival in Texas. When the Civil war was precipitated on a divided nation he was moved by definite patriotism and by loyalty to the cause of the Confederacy, with the result that, in the spring of 1862, he enlisted in Company B, Fifteenth Texas Regiment, commanded by Colonel Speight, M. D. Herring having been captain of Company B. Mr. Westbrook was commissioned lieutenant of his company, and his regiment, in the earlier period of its service, was sta-tioned in turn on Galveston Island and at Camp Speight, at Millican, Texas. It was thereafter ordered to Arkansas, where it was stationed at Camp Daniels until the summer or early autumn of 1862, and in October of that year he proceeded to the city of Little Rock, where it remained until just before the fall of Arkansas Post. It was then ordered to Fort Smith, Arkansas, from which point it next proceeded, under orders, to Camp Kiamish, Indian Territroy. In 1863 the Fifteenth Texas, with its associate troops, was ordered to Louisiana and to join the command of General Taylor in repelling the advance of General Banks. The brigade was commanded by General J. W. Speight, Sr., General King and General Polignac, and it partici-pated in the engagements at Fordoche Bayou Road, Bayou Bourdeau, Mansfield, Pleasant Hill, Marksville, and Yellow Bayou, besides taking part in other engagements, of minor order, in that campaign. Captain Westbrook was slightly wounded at the battle of Mansfield, and he continued with his command until the close of the war. He was mustered out at Houston, Texas, with the rank of captain, and was acting adjutant of his brigade at the time of the final surrender of the Confederate forces, his record having been marked by ntmost gallantry and by much ability as an officer. His friend and comrade, Dr. Wallace, of Waco, paid to Captain Westbrook's memory the following tribute to his status as a man and a soldier: "In camp he was modest and unassuming, kind and jovial; in the thickest and hottest of the raging battle he was cooler than most men on dress parade. Prompt to act and utterly fearless, he enjoyed the respect and confidence of his men and superior officers. Knowing him as I did, I can truthfully say that he was a friend as true and tried as Damascus steel; as a soldier and patriot, as brave and devoted as any man that were the gray.

In the climateric period leading up to the war between the States Captain Westbrook was an ardent supporter of the cause of his loved Southland, and he believed thoroughly in its institutions, under the influence of which he had been reared, as his had been a slave-holding family and his original flancial resources were derived from the sale of the negroes and other assets of the family estate after the death of his father. His entire life was one of impregnable integrity and his devotion to principle was as insistent as was his courage in defending his convictions and opinions, his nature having been essentially positive, though marked by the gentleness and consideration that typified fine breeding and the lack of bigotry and intolerance.

After the close of his long and gallant military career Captain Westbrook returned to Mississippi, where he collected what he could of his portion of his father's estate, which had suffered from the ravages of the war, his guardian having also loaned much of the money of the estate. The funds which he received he invested in land in the Brazos river bottoms of Robertson county, Texas, where he became associated with his stepfather to a large extent in development and reclamation work, as much of his land was entirely unimproved. He became a successful cotton-grower, and with the passing years large and worthy success attended his earnest and well ordered endeavors. He had admirable executive and initiative ability and mature judgment, and he gained rank among the wealthy and representative agriculturists of the Lone Star state. He was one of the early farmers to employ convict labor in Texas, and it was a source of enduring satisfaction to him that he was able to show kindness and consideration to the unfortunate men in his employ, for his humane spirit was always in evi-dence and showed itself in both words and deeds. His military education and service made him a stickler for system and order, and the officials of the penitentiary system in Texas declared that Captain Westbrook's plantation was the best ordered and managed from the head of the Brazos river to its mouth, The Captain was most liberal and public-spirited as a citizen and he contributed much to the development and progress of central Texas, along both civic and material lines. He was the acknowledged leader in effecting the construction of the Hearne & Brazos Valley Railroad, and was president of the company at the time of his death.

In politics Captain Westbrook never wavered in his allegiance to the Democratic party, and he was an effective exponent of its principles. His high civic ideals caused him to take an active part in electing good men to public office and to support all measures making for effective government, both state and national. He was a frequent delegate to the state and county conventions of his party in Texas and was more than once importuned to become a candidate for the legislature, but he invariably declined to consider such overtures with favor, as he preferred to devote himself to his personal affairs and to enjoy the associations of his ideal home.

On the 4th of December, 1878, was soleumized the marriage of Captain Westbrook to Mrs. Jennie (Carr) Randle, widow of Edward Thomas Randle. They had no children, but the Captain accorded the highest paternal solicitude to the only child of his wife by her previous marriage, this child having been Mary Randle, who became the wife of Monroe Miller and who died in 1895, at Austin, Texas. She is survived by three children, all of whom reside at Hearne, Robertson county—Monroe, Nelleen, and Randle Westbrook. The elder son chose as his wife Miss Hazel Wood.

husband and still resides in Hearne, where she presides most graciously as chatelaine of her beautiful home. She is a woman of distinctive culture and literary talent and is a most popular figure in the social circles of her home community, as well as in the organization of the Daughters of the Confederacy, in which she has been president of T. N. Waul Chapter since its organization, in 1903, besides which she is vice president of the Texas State division of the same noble fraternal order. Mrs. Westbrook is a daughter of Allen and Elizabeth (Wooten) Carr, her father having been born in Greene county, North Carolina, in January, 1807, and having removed soon after his marriage to Loundes now Clay county, Mississippi, where he became a successful planter. In 1858 Mr. Carr came with his family to Texas, and he brought with him 100 slaves. He settled near the old town of Washington, in Washington county, and there he continued extensively engaged in agricultural operations until just before the outbreak of the Civil war, when he sold all of his slaves with the exception of a few house servants. He died before the close of the war and his remains were laid to rest on his old homestead place, in Burleson county. His wife died in Mississippi, in 1857. Concerning their children the following brief data are available. Robert, the eldest of the number, was in California at the inception of the Civil war, but he forthwith returned to the East, after the battle of Bull Run. At St. Louis, Missouri, he gave such strenuous statement of his loyalty to the South that he was imprisoned by the Federal authorities. After his release he raised a company in Arkansas, and after a few months' service with this command he came to Texas, where he became a member of the regiment commanded by Colonel John S. Ford. With this regiment he served until the close of the war. He passed the closing years of his life at Hearne, Robertson county, having previously lived for many years at Bryan, Brazos county, where he was an influential citizen and public official. He married Mary Fahrenholt and is survived by two daughters. Martha Carr passed her life in Mississippi, where she became the wife of William McMillan, of Aberdeen. Elizabeth Carr be-came the wife of Thomas Miller and died at Houston, Texas. Titus Carr, who died at Bryan, this state, was a soldier of the Second Texas Regiment in the Civil war. Mrs. Westbrook was the next in order of birth, Allen B. Carr likewise served as a member of the Second Texas Regiment in the war between the States, and was orderly to Colonel William P. Rogers at Shiloh, at the time of the historic capture of the Robinett battery. He became a prosperous agriculturist of Texas and died at Bryan, Brazos county, where he had served twenty-two years as city secretary. He left a number of children. William Wooten Carr, who was for many years in the mail service in Texas, married Miss Turner, and died at Fort Worth, in 1885, leaving one son.

FRANK L. CARROLL. On June 20, 1906, death removed from the circle of his family, friends and associates in Texas one of the most forceful figures that southwestern lumbering and business enterprise had known during the preceding forty years. In the development of the great lumber resources of the southwest the late Frank L. Carroll was so conspicuous that his name became synonymous with the lumber industry, and for many years he was active head of some of the largest lumber organizations. By reason of his success in business he was in a position to exert a large influence in public affairs and to contribute generously to the growth and betterment of institutious and the state. The shrine of his memory will always be at Baylor University, in Waco, to which splendid college he was one of the most liberal donors. Many tributes were paid to him at his passing, but aside from the practical achievements of his career, the best words were said when his was char-acterized as "a well rounded life," and when he was proclaimed a "Texas lumber man who tempered his business life with Christian principles.'

The ordinary facts of biography can be briefly stated. Frank L. Carroll was born in Dallas county. Alabama, May 25, 1831. He grew up there, was educated in the common schools, had a wholesome training and the influences of a good home, and in 1848, at the age of seventeen, moved with his parents and sisters and brothers to Mansfield, Louisiana. Five years later Mr. Carroll, and his brother, Joseph A. Carroll, and the time of the control of the dependent of the control of the contro

A loyal Southerner, when the war came on he entered the Second Louisiana Cavalty and made a record as an efficient and faithful soldier. Soon after the close of the war he transferred his lumber interests to Texas. In 1868, locating at Beaumont, which was then just coming into prominence as a lumber manufacturing center, he became associated with James M. Long, establishing the old Long shingle and sawmill. Subsequently Mr. Carroll engaged in business with Capitain W. A. Fletcher, and they erected a plant at Village

Mills, also in the Beaumont district. After conducting operations together for some years, Captain Fletcher organized the Texas Tram & Lumber Company, while Mr. Carroll organized the Beaumont Lumber Company, the Beaumont Lumber Company, which became one of the largest constituent factors in the Kirly Lumber Company in 1900, was a business organization that for years represented the aeme of Texas humbering and was the late Mr. Carroll's greatest achievement in that business. After he had sold out to the Kirby Company in 1900, he joined with his son, George W. Carroll, and J. N. Gilbert and established the Nona Mills Company, Ltd., operating mills at Leesville, Louisiana, and with the main office in Beaumont. Mr. Carroll was president of that company and also president of the Nona Mills Company of Texas, which had a mill at Odelia, Texas, Mr. Carroll was also vice president of the Nona Mills Company and also resident of the Nash Robinson Lumber Company, bad large interests in timber lands and other lumber organizations, and was a director in the Citizen National Bank of Waco.

The late Mr. Carroll had his residence in Waco from 1882 until his death. On December 22, 1833, in Louisiana, Frank L. Carroll married Sarah J. Long. Besides Mrs. Carroll he was survived by six children: George W. Carroll, M. W. Carroll, W. M. Carroll, E. E. Carroll, Mrs. J. Frank Keith, of Beaumont, and Mrs. Minnie King, of Waco.

The philanthropies of the late Frank L. Carroll were widespread, and the influence of his splendid life through its character and through its practical achievements could not be estimated in any brief article. While the help which he extended to individuals has no record except in the hearts of the recipients, his contributions to Baylor University at Waco are well known, and he was one of the most important factors in the upbuilding and development of that institution of higher education. For a number of years he served as treasurer of the university, and one of his gifts provided one hundred thousand dollars to be used in the erection of a memorial hall. From the university circles and from many business associates throughout the South came heartfelt tributes of respect and admiration for the career and personality of this great lumberman, and it would be difficult to quote in sufficient measure to indicate the strength and symmetry of his character. From a memorial address delivered by a member of the Baylor University faculty a few sentences will be taken: "In this state, among our own people, the people of the Baptist state convention particularly, the name of F. L. Carroll is a household word. You know him well, most of you—a man of simple life and few words, quiet, unobtrusive, modest, never advertising himself as men are wout to, no orator, never posing as leader of the people, a cham-pion of their virtues or an advocate of their cause never posing as anything, indeed, claiming nothing, boasting nothing, simply living a frugal life; a hard worker, thrifty, with few wants; standinig in the rank and file of men, asking no quarter and giving none; with the love and the pursuit of right, and a prophet's wrath against wrong; his life devoid alike to the outer world, of tragic or touching incident; no learned titles to his name, a plain commoner - what claim has he to a day like this in the courts of the people, singled out as one among ten, ay, ten times ten thousand? While his ample wealth would not classify him among millionaires, and while his vocation and activities would not enroll him among statesmen or generals or inventors, or his learning among technical scholars, yet he has well earned in its rarest sense that prefix 'great' in the amplitude of his life, in those qualities that make millionaire and statesman and general inventor and scholar both respectable and efficient, and add wealth and worth and body and magnitude to fame—the qualities of plain living and homely houesty and everyday reliableness. *

"His message for us today and for all time to come

is bodied forth in the total veracity of his life and in his wide and wise generosity. Honest, every inch of him, never a tainted dollar touched his hands but was sanctified anew; genuine to the core, sincere - I do not use these words lightly - honest, sincere, no sham-man, but God's modest, highborn gentleman. such veracity and such honesty as clarify the fogs and glooms of time, with the widest sanities of business and religion and their unfailing practice he measured up to the highest standards set for men, and we cannot else the nignest standards set for men, and we cannot else but love him well and hold his memory; and, speaking for the faculty, in this building which is a perpetual memorial to his name, we honor him as a man, as a Christian gentleman, as a neighbor, as a citizen, as a benefactor, as a patron of learning, as an example and an inspiration. We honor bim for the total veracity of his life, for this building whose grateful service shall fill the future with its helpful memories; but a greater building and a wider ministry than this he has left us, the building, the ministry, and the memory of his noble

The career of the late Mr. Carroll was remarkable not only in the brilliant success which he attained, but in the fact that it was won not by speculation but by rare business foresight and acumen, the ability to forecast the value of projected enterprises. He never failed in any of his business ventures, for the sufficient reason that, guided by integrity of purpose, he never engaged in any project that was not honorable and for which there was not a legitimate demand. His business career was a series of unbroken successes, hecause his judgment was unerring, bis energy unfailing and his will indomitable.

The four dominant principles of his life were said to have been individuality, ruth, honesty, will. But above all he acquired the supreme attribute of character—the vital force that underlies all worthy accomplishments, that commands honor and affection, that is the basis of all enduring greatness, that lives on when the earthly tabernacle is dissolved. Men trusted the late Mr. F. L. Carroll, believed in him, honored him. "It is necessary that a man be true—not that he live."

FREDERICK H. KINGSBURY. Prederick H. Kingsbury has served eight years as assistant county attorney of McLennan county, having given service under five successive incumbents of the county office, his principal at the present time being John McNamara. His official duties keep him at Waco, the county seat, and that city has been his home since hoyhood.

Mr. Kingsbury was born in Oxford, Grawille county, North Carolina; on December 2, 1863, and is a son of Russell H. and Elizabeth L. (Gilliam) Kingsbury. The father, who was born in Clyde, New York, in 1813, came to Texas in 1871, settling in Waco, and was engaged in merchandising for a number of years until his death in 1890. The mother was born in South Hampton county, Virginia, in 1826 and died in 1908. They were the parents of nine children: Henry P., Williams G., Katherine S., Russell H., Charles F., Percy C., Elizabeth L., Frederick H. and Bettie C. Kingsbury.

Frederick H. Kingsbury was educated in private schools and in the Waco University, now Baylor University, up to the age of fourteen years. At that early age he went on a ranch, spent eight years in that way, and after his return to Waco read law with Jadge L. C. Alexander. Admitted to the bar in 1886 when twenty-three years of age, his success has been one of steady and consistent growth from that time until the present. His private practice is carried on in the state and Federal courts, and is along general lines, while he has long served as assistant county attorney, the county attorneys under whom he has acted having been successively T. A. Blair, J. W. Taylor, Pat M. Neff, C. F. Thomas and John McNamara. Mr. Kingsbury was for seven years a member of the Waco Life Guards and is a member of the Young Mens' Business League of

On April 19 1899, Mr. Kingsbury married Miss Octavia H. Phillips, adupther of J. L. Phillips, a Baptist minister of Waco. They have no children. Mr. Kingsbury is a member of the Episcopal church and is a Democrat in politics. He owns a nice residence in Waco, and it is at home that he finds his principal recreation, gardening being a favorite pastime with him and one in which he is especially successful.

MISS MAID J. ALLEN. It would be impossible for the biographer to write a better appreciation of the life and services of Miss Maid J. Allen, of Georgetown, than those which have appeared from time to time in the leading newspapers and periodicals of Texas. One of the most brilliant women of her day, her personality has been impressed upon the people not alone in the line of newspaper work, but in the various activities of life which make for moral educational and religious advancement. Editors and writers throughout the state have been unanimous in their admiration of her genius and achievements, and it may not, therefore, be inappriate to quote from their various notices in placing a review of her career before the public. A short pre-liminary sketch, however, will cover several salient points not mentioned elsewhere.

Miss Allen is a granddaughter of Elisha Allen who was of a line of patriotic ancestors, a Texas pioneer, one of the first settlers of Williamson county, and one of the gallant band under Gen. Sam Houston, who on the battlefield of San Jacinto, April 21, 1836, won for the Republic of Texas her independence. His brothers, Peter and Nathaniel Allen, were soldiers of the War of 1812 and his kinsmen rendered valiant service in the Confederate army during the Civil war. Miss Allen is a daughter of George A. and Susan (Roberson) Allen. She was given excellent educational advantages, and began newspaper work in 1901, at Bartlett, Texas, where she remained three years. At that time she took up work with the Knights of Pythias, as referred to in a subsequent article, and after continuing thus engaged for a year went to Granger and established the Granger News, of which she was editor and owner about two At that time she purchased the Commerce Commercial, at Commerce, Texas, which she edited for five mercial, at Commerce, 1eass, which she edited to hee years, and since severing her connection therewith, in June, 1913, has devoted herself principally to special edition work, although her name is frequently found over poetry, articles and stories appearing in the leading magazines and newspapers of the country. She is a Daughter of the Texas Republic, a Daughter of the Confederacy, a member of the State Press Association and the Pythian Sisters, a charter member of Granger Rebekah Lodge, and a member of various literary and social clubs. She was a delegate to the National Editorial Association, at Chicago, in 1912, and has served as essayist of the Texas Press Association and been honored in every possible way by the Central Texas Press Association, of which she was president for three years. In 1907 the largest meeting of the association ever held gathered at her home town of Granger. Miss Allen has been a member of the State Historical Association since 1907. Her religious connection is with the Christian church.

The following letter, one of hundreds received by Miss Allen in a like vein, came to her from Prof. J. C. chilton, of Hill's Business College, Waco: "On retiring from the Bartlett News as editor-in-chief, please, as an old subscriber, allow me to say that the Bartlett News under your management has been a welcome visitor to me every week for the past three years, and that I have always considered it one of the nicest, neatest eleanest and newsiest little papers published in the great state of Texas. You certainly have done a good part by Bartlett. I know not what you may have in view for the future but do know that you will make a success of any line of work that you may take up."

of any line of work that you may take up."

The following from the San Autonio Express, voices the opinion of Texas newspapers in general: "MissAllen is a fine example of the eapable woman in bissness. She runs a newspaper and runs it capitally, having the full confidence of her fellow-critzens and her fellow-craftsmen of the Central Texas Press Association, of which she is president, and who have never failed to honor her when opportunity offered."

At the time of Miss Allen's removal to Granger, the Belton News commented as follows: "Miss M. J. Allen, former editor of the Bartlett News, is now in Granger making arrangements to put in a paper at that place. Miss Allen is a successful newspaper woman and since she sold the News has been connected with the Texas Pythian Banner-Knight, and the Texas Railway and Industrial Journal of Fort Worth, and if she handles her Granger property as she did her Bartlett paper the people of Granger may well congratulate themselves on receiving such a wide-awake and energetic newspaper woman." At the same time the Pythian Banner-Knight said editorially: "The Banner-Knight can testify to all the News says of Miss Allen. She does not know the word 'Fail.' It is not in her vocabulary, Energy and push with business qualities rarely found in her sex will warrant us in saying in advance that the Granger News will be a success." Further comment was made by the Temple Tribune, as follows: "An item of interest to the many friends of Miss Allen, who has been traveling for the Banner-Knight is that she has purchased the Granger Times and will conduct that paper, changing its names to the News. Miss Allen has worked out a problem without saying much about it. She went into a newspaper office at Bartlett, 'sticking type,' and finally acquired the property, greatly improved it, and sold it out at a good figure. She now takes hold of a fine paying business at Granger and it is safe to say that she will improve it and will make about as much money as the ordinary mercantile enter-With all these things accomplished, Miss Allen has not grown old, nor has she lost her good looks nor her womanly graces. Some women can do things.'

The Farm and Ramch, of Dallas, Texas, in its issue of April 2, 1904, speaks as follows: "Miss Allen is a successful newspaper woman, owning and editing and publishing the Bartlett News. Poems and sketches from her pen have appeared from time to time in the Household. The News is one of the best papers of its class in the state and enjoys the hearty support of large portions of surrounding counties of Bell, Williamson and Milan, Miss Allen is a Texas product, her grandfather, Elisha Allen, having settled in Bell county many years prior to the Civil War. Early thrown upon her own resources by the death of both parents through her tact, energy and mental ability she has made herself mistress of her chosen calling. Though timid and retiring in her nature, she has won for herself many friends, and a host of rotrons, as is proven by the number of pleased subscribers of the News."

The following extract is taken from the McGregor Mirror: "Miss Allen is a bright, talented lady, one whom it is an honor to know. She is capable in business and versatile with the pen. For the past year she has been president of the Central Texas Press Association, a position she fills with credit to the organization."

In commenting on the foregoing, the Temple Mirror said: "To all of which the Mirror can say 'amen.' Miss Allen is one of the two lady publishers who are members of the T. P. A. She is president of the C. T. P. A. embracing some twelve counties, has been president of the Bell County Press Association, where she learned the art of the preservation of all arts, and since the death of her parents many years ago has been the means of the only support of a large family of brothers and sisters left to her care to educate and clothe. She was for several months the traveling representative for the Gresham Printing Company, publishers of the Texas Pythian Banner-Knight; it was here that her true with was discovered as a gracious lady, a painstaking representative, since which time, four years ago, Miss Allen has been at every Grand Lodge convention for that paper. She numbers her friends by the thousands, both in and out of the order of the Knights of Pythias. Such a lady deserves the best the world can give.

The appreciation that follows appeared in the Fort Worth Record: "Miss Maid J. Allen is one of the young women of Texas who has made a notable success in life by reason of her lovable traits of character, her devotion to her duty and her firmness of resolve when she determined to accomplish a given object. And, above all, she has retained her delightfully ferninne demeanor, demonstrating that any woman can be of great importance in this world and do a noble work for the public without losing her feminine charm. Miss Allen has the love and esteem of every member of the profession in Texas. She has made a notable success of the Granger News, all of which she rightly deserves, and nowhere are she and her efforts honored more than in the town in which her loth has been cast."

In closing this all too brief and woefully inadequate review of one of the foremost women of Texas, a few excerpts will be taken from a number of press notices which appeared at the time of her connection with the Commerce Commercial.

"Miss Maid J. Allen, one of the madame editors of the Texas Press Association, and an experienced newspaper woman has purchased the Commerce Commercial and will henceforth pilot that sheet over the journalistic sea. We welcome Miss Allen to this section of the Lord's vineyard and wish her success."—Ladonia News. "Miss Maid J. Allen one of the popular and successful Madam editors of the state, has assumed charge of the Commerce Commercial and will be its editor and publisher. Miss Allen is a charming editor and successful publisher, and we are indeed glad to see her return to the fold of newspaperdom."—Mineola Monitor. "Miss Maid J. Allen has, we understand, purchased the Commerce Commercial and will have charge of that paper in the future. Miss Maid is one of the best newspaper women in the whole state, and is extended a hearty welcome to the press of North Texas. She is a member of the State Press Association, and is well known to the press gang as a most excellent young lady."Honey Grove Citizen. "The Tribune is gratified to learn that Miss Maid J. Allen, erstwhile of the Granger News and for a year president of the Central Texas Press Association, will again be a 'newspaper woman' -and that she is in the best sense of the term. She has purchased an interest in and will be editor of the Commercial at Commerce, Hunt county. Miss Allen has a host of friends, true friends, among the newspaper folk of this state. She has been creditably successful as an editor and published and her personality is engaging and interesting. A brave, capable woman is Miss Allen, and in our opinion the community that commands her presence and influence as the head of its newspaper is to be congratulated. Success to you, Miss Allen. "—Waco Tribune. Allen.

John A. Cooper. In 1910 the electorate of Titus county chose for the office of sheriff one of the citizens of the county who had spent all his life here and who had long been known as a successful young farmer and a public spirited and progressive citizen. Mr. Cooper brought to the discharge of his duties in the important office of sheriff a degree of efficiency and fidelity such as had made his conduct of the affairs a standard which his successors may well strive to attain.

John A. Cooper was born near Argo, in the northeast part of Titus county, Texas, August 19, 1870. His parents were William and Beatrice K. (Flippin) Cooper. The father, who was a native of Tennessee, came to Titus county, Texas, the same year this county was organized, in 1846, and became a pioneer settler in the wilderness region which then comprised most of northeastern Texas. As a farmer he spent the remainder of his life in the county, and was a citizen whose integrity and character were never questioned, and who always enjoyed to the fullest the esteem of his neighbors.

The present sheriff of Titus county was born and reared on a farm and with a fair education obtained in the public schools at an early age applied himself with characteristic industry to the business of farming, following the industry actively until he was thirty years of age. His public career began as constable, a position which he held for four years. In 1910 occurred his first election to the office of sheriff, and in 1912 he was re-elected. Mr. Cooper is one of the most popular citizens of the county, and his record has been very gratifying to his numerous friends. Since taking the office of sheriff his home has been at the county seat, Mount Pleasant. He owns a good farm in the county, and is a substantial man of affairs as well as prominent in political life.

Mr. Cooper has been three times married. His present wife, whose maiden name was Miss Minnie Gray, a daughter of R. J. Gray, county commissioner of the fourth precinct of Titus county for a number of years, was born in this county. The six children comprising the family of Mr. and Mrs. Cooper are named as follows: Mrs. Kinnie Luke; Jessie, who on the 9th of February, 1914, married Sam Wilson a son of W. F. merchant of Mount Pleasant and also one of Wilson, a the wealthiest farmers in this section of the state; and Lorine, Annie, John Edward and Lester Lee.

J. Amos Fleming, president of the Citizens Guaranty State Bank of Lindale, has for many years been actively identified with the sawmilling interests of East Texas,

Mr. Fleming was born in Smith county, Texas, July 15, 1870, and his education,-except that which he obtained at country school during the winter months— has been received through the channels of business. He remained on the farm until he had passed his majority, when he turned his attention to sawmilling, at first on a small scale in Smith county. Afterward he moved into Wood county, where he laid the foundation for his subsequent business success. To detail the movements by which the smile of Fortune was attracted to him would add little more than personal or family interest to the narrative, so we forhear and give only the salient facts of Mr. Fleming's rather brief career.

Mr. Fleming engaged in the banking business in Lindale as the successor of W. E. Stewart in the First National Bank, which institution was liquidated and National Bank, which institution as Additional State Bank, with a capital of $20,000. This reorganization was effected in February, 1912, and Mr. Fleming was made president; T. J. Morris vice president; W. R. Ward president; T. J. Morris vice president; W. R. Ward, cashier. Other enterprises with which Mr. Fleming is connected are the Lindale Canning Company and the Farmers Canning Company, in both of which he is a stockholder; and he has large fruit growing and stock interests. Also he is largely interested in cotton growing, and is a stockholder in the Lindale General Com-

of Mr. Fleming's parentage, we record that the late Amos M. Fleming, who died near Lindale in 1892, was Amos an Frening, who died near Limitate In 1822, was his father. Amos M. Fleming was born at Milton, Flordia, in 1826. At the age of twenty years he came to Texas, and in Smith county this State he passed the rest of his life as a farmer. In the war between the States he served as a Confederate soldier. He married in Smith county Miss Aran Chambers, who survived him a number of years. She died in February, 1912. Their children are: J. Amos, the subject of this sketch; Jesse L. of Lindale, Texas; Julia, wife of James Thedford, of Palestine Texas and Ida who died unmarried. Amos M. Fleming had been previously married to Nancy Chambless and the children of his first wife are Maude, wife of Caleb Simmons, of Texas; "Sis," widow of William Heghey, of Smith county, Texas; Columbus and Sula, of the same county, the latter being the wife of John Bowman; Aden, deceased; Milton of Smith county; Gus, of Rusk county; and Mattie, wife of Lon Franks, of Oklahoma.

In February, 1891, J. Amos Fleming married Miss Dora Perryman, daughter of James Perryman, a prominent citizen and fatmer of Lindale. Seven children have been given to them, namely: Elmer, Esther, Amos, Eva, Ora, Pauline and J. W. all of whom are

Amos, Eva, Ora, Pauline and J. W. all of whom are living except Eva, who died in childhood. Mr. Fleming's fraternal relations are confined to a membership in the Woodmen of the World; politically, he is a Democrat, and his religious faith is that set out in the creed of the Baptist church, of which he is a member. His identity with Lindale has been marked with many activities, all of which have contributed to the material growth and welfare of the town. He has erected four of its several blocks of new brick business houses, and his support is always given to any move-ment tending toward betterment. While his own advantages for schooling were limited, he is a progressive on school matters and is a member of the school management of the town.

AUGUSTINE HAIDUSEK, a native of Moravia, was a member of the first colony of that nationality to settle in Texas west of the Colorado river. It is a distinction generally accorded to Augustine Haidusek that he is the most prominent Bohemian in the state of Texas. Early in his career a Confederate soldier, a member of the Texas bar over forty years, now president of the First National Bank of La Grange, and editor and proprietor of The Svoboda, the most influential journal published in that language in Texas. Mr. Haidusek's attainments and services in behalf of his people and his thorough American spirit are scarcely to be appreciated from the following brief recital of his career.

Augustine Haidusek was born in September, 1846, at Missi, a village in the northeastern part of Moravia. His parents were Valentine and Veronika (Kladiva) Haidusek, and the mother died in 1847, leaving three children: Theresa, who married Joseph Lebeda; John, who died at Brownsville, Texas, February 14, 1863, while serving as a member of Captain Alexander's company of Texas troops during the war; and Augustine, the youngest. In 1848 the father married Mary Broz, and in September, 1856, when Augustine was just ten years of age, all the family left the old country for Texas, arriving at Houston in November of that year, and from that city they traveled west by ox wagon to La Grange. Two weeks later they settled at East Navidad (now Dubina. Fayette county), with six other Bohemian families. These were the first Bohemians that settled west of the Colorado river. Incidentally it may be noted that Fayette county is one of the chief centers of Bohemian population in Texas. According to the last census, of a total population of about thirty thousand, the county had about twenty-five hundred inhabitants born in Austria, and nearly four thousand native Americans of Austrian parentage on both sides. Subsequently the father moved on a farm four miles west of Schulenberg, where he died December 23, 1867.

Angustine Haidnsek had but little schooling as a boy, and his knowledge of the English language was very meagre until the beginning of the Civil war. About that time he attended a school taught by a man named Black, In 1863, at the age of seventeen, he went with a drove of beeves to Louisiana, swam the cattle across the Mississippi river at Port Hudson and they were sold to the Confederate Government. On his return home he enlisted in Company F of the Bates Regiment, was stationed at

A. Haidusek

Velasco on the Gulf coast and continued in service until June 6, I865, when he returned home and helped his father put in a crop.

The year 1866 was spent in farming and in attending a school taught by old man Mays below Weimar. During 1867 he clerked for G. W. White in La Grange several months, then returned home and spent the fall in cutting and splitting four thousand post-oak rails for George Morysak, and put the evenings to good advantage by studying the English language by the light of the fire. The year 1868 was a continuation of his farming experience, though he also taught a term of school in the summer. Difficulties and disadvantageous circumstances seem to act only as a spur to the efforts of some men, and while he undoubtedly has possessed exceptional native endowments of intellect and character, Mr. Haidusek during his early career overcame obstacles which would have disheartened a man of ordinary determination. In 1869 he settled at LaGrange, read law in the office of Jarmon & Cross, and was admitted to the bar on December 22, 1870. He claims distinction to have been the first Bohemian to practice law in the United States.

During the following Congressional campaign between John Hancock of Austin and Degner of San Antonio and between Giddings of Brenham and Clark of Galveston, he took an active part supporting the Democratic candidates who were elected. During 1872 Mr. Haidusek taught school at Ross Prairie, near Payetteville. He was elected chairman of the Fayette County Democratic Exceptive Committee in 1874, and in the following year was elected mayor of La Grange, defeating A. H. Brandt, and was re-elected in 1877, defeating P. Y. McAshan. His election to this office gave him another premier distinction, since he was the first Rohemian mayor elected in the United States. In 1878 the Hon, J. C. Stielh defeated him in his race for the office of county judge.

In 1880 Mr. Haidusek was elected representative to the Texas state legislature from the counties of Favette and Lee, defeating John L. Smith by over two thousand majority. His work was notable in the legislature. It included the introduction of two amendments for the state constitution. One was to amend the immigration clause so as to authorize the dissemination in foreign countries of facts as to the revenues, resources and benefits of Texas; the other was to authorize the investment of the permanent school fund in county bonds and similar securities. Both propositions were defeated. He opposed the amendment to the constitution, proposing that voters should be required to pay their poll tax before being permitted to vote. This amendment was introduced by C. L. Wurzbach of San Antonio. Mr. Haidusek secured the amendment of the law compelling county convicts to work public roads.

When, in 1882, Mr. Haidusek was urged by some of his friends to make the race as an independent candidate for the office of Congressman, he replied in an open elter that he was a Democrat for principles and not for office—that he proposed to stand by the Democracy heenuse that vart in 1856, when know, mothinisism and rampant, had stood by the foreigners.

Favete county has among many other things reason to be grateful to Mr. Haidusek for his work thirty years ago as county judge. He was elected to that office in 1884, defeating the Hon. J. C. Stiehl, and continued to administer the fiscal affairs of the county for six years. His administration was notable for his work in improving the public schools, and especially in raising the standards of the local teachers. As Fayette county was chiefly populated by Germans and Bohemians, he found that the local schools employed either the Bohemian or the standards of the local teachers. As Fayette county was chiefly populated by Germans and Bohemians, he found that the local schools employed either the Bohemian or books and the English language and tracked by judge he required the school trustees to employ teachers qualified to teach the English language and urged all the teachers to make English the language of the school room. At the time this was a daring step, and for it he was pronounced a renegade by nearly all the Bohemian papers of the United States, particularly by the Slovan, a Bohemian weekly published and edited by Joseph Cada at La Grange. His stand in favor of English language incensed the people of his nationality throughout Texas, and indignation meetings were held condemning his efforts to make English the official language of the school room in Bohemian localities. At that time there was practically no organ for the expression and publicity of his views on the matter, and the friends of Judge Haidusek therefore started another Bohemian paper, the Svoboda, which was owned by a joint stock company comprising about fifty members. The company secured the services of a man from New York City to perfect the paper. The Svoboda was started in December, 1885, and by 1887 had about four hundred subscribers with an indebtedness of twenty-four hundred dollars. The New York editor, Mr. Chudoba, was discharged, and Judge Haidusek took charge of the paper. Under his management the number of subscribers inereased rapidly, the debt was paid off in two years, and in 1890 he became sole owner of the journal. Since then he has devoted pearly all his time to its management and has made it one of the best paying papers of its class in the entire country. Its circulation in 1914 reached to about five thousand copies and its subscribers are found in one hundred counties of Texas, besides in other states and in Europe. While it is a Bohemian paper, its sentiment is thoroughly American, and its policy and editorial control have always reflected the sterling American spirit and democracy which are so deeply characteristic of its proprietor. Besides his work in connection with the schools, Judge Haidusek as county judge inaugurated the improvements by which public roads were graded and macadamized, and nineteen iron bridges were built and the bridge spanning the Colorado river was bought by the county. Another thing that made his administration notable was the letting of the contract for the building of the present court house at La Grange, and the foundation was laid before he left. office.

In the split in the Democratic party in 1802, when the Hogg and Chark factions were at war, Mr. Haidusek esponsed the cause of Clark. Although an advocate of the gold standard, he supported Dynan in all his campaigns for the presidency similar for the presidency similar for the presidency similar for the Congressional fight between R. B. Hawley, the Republican nominee, and W. S. Robson, the Democrat, he supported Hawley, and it is said that on this account Robson was defeated.

On January 14, 1896, when the First National Bank of La Grange was found to be in a bad financial condition, Judge Haidusek was elected president of the bank, and has since brought its affairs to a most substantial condition and has made the bank one of the strongest, considering its capital, in the state. During his administration the stockholders have received in dividends more than their original investment. He is yet the president of said bank. In 1905 he was appointed by Governor Lanham as one of the directors of Agricultural and Mechanical College of Texas, in which capacity he served until 1911.

Judge Haidusek affiliates with the Knights of Honor, the Ancient Order of United Workmen, is an hougrary member of the C. S. P. S., a Bohemian order similar in organization and purposes to the Knight of Honor. He and his family are all members of the of Honor. He and his family are all members of Becket, and Sagnet of John and Catherine Becket, of Ross Prairie. Sagnet of John and Catherine Becket, of Ross Prairie. Sagnet born neur Belleville, in Austin county, in unce. Sagnet Derme, who married Fampy Mosig, Coorge, who was follows: Jerome, who married Fampy Mosig, Coorge, who the Hardy and law departments, took post-graduate work in Harvard University, is now a successful lawyer at Seymour. Baylor county, Texas, and in 1904 was a presidential elector on the Democratic ticket; Vlasta, married Joseph Koss.

As this brief sketch indicates, Judge Haidusek is a man of unusual force and determination, is broadminded, thoroughly democratic in his nature, and few citizens of Texas in his time have accomplished more and made their activities more fruitful for the general welfare of community and state. While subjected to severe criticism for his course in the matter of education thirty years ago, Judge Haidusek has long since outlived that brief unpopularity, and many of those who opposed him then are now as strongly convinced of the justice and the necessity of his course as he himself.

SAMUEL W. LAW. To become the directing head of an institution which adds prestige to a locality and provides employment for many of its worker requires the possession of much more than ordinary ability and strength of purpose. The men who during their active careers have directed their strength and capability toward the upbuilding of these enterprises have not alone gained prominence for themselves, but have contributed materially to the welfare of the section in which their labors have been prosecuted. Samuel W. Law has gained the right to be included in this class of helpful citizens, for as the head of the Law-Sprinkle Mercantile Company he has brought recognition to Cameron in its commercial circles, and has demonstrated his ability to cope with the keen competition of modern trade and commerce in such a fashion as to make him one of the leaders in his line in this part of the state.

Mr. Law was born in Elmore county, Alabama, November 14, 1866, and is a son of Charles W. and Sophina (Batchelor) Law. His father was born in Alabama, May 25, 1842, and was there engaged in farming until coming to Texas in 1873, and for several years thereafter moved around from place to place looking for a suitable location and visiting various points in Wash-ington, Brazos and Limestone counties. Finally, in 1886, he came to Milam county, and here he still resides, his home being at Adhall. Mrs. Law, also a native of Ala-bama, was born in September, 1849, and died in July, 1898, having been the mother of eleven children: Samuel W., Thomas, Texana, Mamie, Addie, Charles, George, Asa, Clyde, Ida and James of whom Thomas, Ida and James are now deceased.

Samuel W. Law was a lad of six years when he accompanied his parents to Texas, and his education was secured in the country schools of Washington, Brazos and Limestone counties. He worked on his father's farm from the time he was sixteen until he was twentytwo years old, and at the latter age embarked upon a career of his own, renting thirty acres of land in Milam county. There he continued to carry on agricultural pursuits until 1900, principally at or near Adhall, and then took charge of a farm, cotton gin and general store. In 1906 he took charge of the store as owner, and continued to conduct it until 1912, when he moved to Cameron and purchased a two-thirds interest in the Gaston-Sprinkle Mercantile Company, the present style of which is the Law-Sprinkle Mercantile Company, of on which is the LawSprinner hereasthe company, on which he has been the president to the present time. This venture has proved a decided success, and now earries a thoroughly up-to-date stock of groceries and hardware, valued at $25,000. The business is incorporated for $30,000, fully paid up. An extensive trade is attracted from all over the surrounding territory and the business is enjoying a consistent and healthy growth, due in large part to the able manner in which Mr. Law is managing its affairs. Mr. Law is possessed of a mind fertile in resources, means and expedients. He leads a rational life, works hard, and has a friendly feeling for others and an understanding of life's complexities that assists him greatly in his dealing with his fellow-men. He has not put "all his eggs in one basket," for various other enterprises have had the benefit of his sagacity, his judgment and his energetic aggressiveness, and at this time he has holdings in the Cameron State Bank, the Robert McLean Company of Cameron, the Amicable Life Insurance Company and the Southern Union Life Insurance Company. In addition to his residence at Cameron, he owns 140 acres of improved farming land in Milam county and three val-uable vacant lots in the city of Houston. When he can spare the time from the numerous duties of his large business, he devotes his attention to farming and stockraising, of which he has made a hobby. He seldom finds time for a vacation, but was formerly fond of hunting.

Mr. Law was married (first) in 1891 to Miss Lon Docky, who died in 1900, having been the mother of five children: Thomas, who is a clerk in his father's office; Ollie, who is deceased; Roy, who is clerk for his father; and Ludie and Truely, attending school. On November 11, 1900, Mr. Law was married (second) to Mrs. Eddie Denson, daughter of R. F. Gregg, a well-known resident of Milam county. Mr. and Mrs. Law have had no children, but by her former marriage she was the mother of one child: W. B. Denson. Mr. Law is a consistent member of the Baptist church, and Mrs. Law is a member of the Christian church. In politics a Democrat, Mr. Law has taken some interest in the success of his party, and has served as deputy sheriff under three sheriffs of Milam county. While primarily a domestic man, with a love for the surroundings of his home, he is not indifferent to the pleasures of companiouship with his fellows.
For fourteen years Mr. Law served in the capacity of postmaster of Adhall, to the management of which office he gave the same conscientious attention that has characterized his activities in his private enterprises. Few citizens have strived more earnestly for the betterment of their communities, and none are held in greater general esteem.

HUMPHREY HUGH JACKSON. For twenty-five years a lawyer, and a former county judge of Chambers county, Mr. Jackson represents two of the very oldest families in southeastern Texas, and there are few American families in any section of the State whose settlement dates back to an earlier time. Humphrey Hugh Jackson came with Austin in the year 1823, and James Taylor White in the year 1826, when Austin undertook to lead his first band of American settlers into this region.

Humphrey Hugh Jackson was born at Double Bayon, Chambers county, in 1864. His parents were James and Sarah (White) Jackson, the former of whom died in 1895. The mother is still living at her old home at Double Bayou, where practically all her life has been Her father, James Taylor White, grandfather of H. H. Jackson, was born in Louisiana, and came to Texas in 1826 locating in what is now Chambers county, but which at that time was a part of the unbroken wilderness of the Gulf coast, and only nominally under the jurisdiction and in the possession of the Spanish-Mexican government. James T. White estab-Spanish-Mexican government. James 1. White estab-lished a home on Turtle (or White's) Bayou, where his family have lived ever since that early day. James Jackson the father of H. H. Jackson was born in Veromession the lattice of H. H. decision was born in Vermillionville, Louisiana, but nearly all his life he lived on Double Bayou in Chambers county. Grandfather Humphrey Jackson, who was a native of Belfast, Ireland, and came to America with two brothers Henry and Alexander in 1808, settled in Lousiana, near Berwick's Bay, where Humphrey Jackson was married in 1810. He was a member of Andrew Jackson's army in the battle of New Orleans, Louisiana, and in 1823 crossed over into the Province of Texas. His settlement was in the heart of an unbroken wilderness in what is now Liberty county. Later he moved to Crosby, in what is now Harris county, and in 1823 the Mexican govern-ment granted him a headright, allowing him the possession of the usual amount of land for stock raising and farming purposes. He lived there following his regular vocation until his death in 1834. He was killed by the falling of a limb of a tree. About the time of his death, his three sons, including the late James Jackson, moved to Double Bayou, in 1840 what is now Chambers county. Both the White and Jackson families have been among the largest land and cattle owners in Chambers county. John H. Jackson, a cousin of H. H. Jackson, in 1913 sold thirty-one thousand acres of his land to a syndicate that will colonize it with small farmers.

Humphrey Hugh Jackson was educated by private tutors and in Soule College at Chapel Hill in Washington county. His student days in Soule College were during the years I884-1885-1886. His law studies were carried on under his cousin, Hugh Jackson, at Wallisville, then the county seat of Chambers county. At Wallisville he was admitted to the bar in 1888, and his practice as one of the leading lawyers of the county has been continuous since that year. In 1909 Mr. Jackson was appointed county judge of Chambers county, was elected in 1910, and reelected so that his service continued until the close of 1912. Chambers county has never had a more efficient administrator of its fiscal affairs than Judge Jackson. During his term as judge and under his efficient administration, notable improvements were instituted. These include the splendid sixty thousand dollar courthouse at Anahuac. Anahuae, the historic old town which figured in the time of the Revolution and was one of the most important centers in South Texas during pioneer times, has in recent years been made the county seat instead of Wallisville, and is now once more taking its place so well justified by its early historic reputation. Besides the court house there were built under Judge Jackson many miles of good roads, and these and other improvements have helped to place Chambers county among the class of most progressive localities in south Texas. Judge Jackson has lived at Analuac since 1909, and has a beautiful home overlooking Galveston Bay. Besides his law practice he does a large business in real estate and abstracts, hav-ing his offices in the Chambers County State Bank building. Like his ancestors, he is also interested in the cattle business, and he and his brother Claude have a stock ranch at Double Bayou.

At Chapel Hill, Texas, Mr. Jackson married Miss Emma Toland, who was born at Chappel Hill, a daughter of the late Dr. A. W. and Mary (Atkinson) Toland. Her mother was a daughter of the late Col. Atkinson, who commanded a regiment from Texas during the war between the states. Dr. Toland was a native of Mississippi, and both he and Col. Atkinson were among the old settlers of the historic town of Chapel Hill of Washington county.

WILLIAM OSBIN RAWLINS. President of the Dallas Linotyping Company, William Osbin Rawlins learned the printer's trade at Dallas more than twenty years ago, and established the present business in 1905. He operates it as a general commercial linotyping business, having a battery of linotype machines and other equipment for prompt and efficient service in typesetting.

Mr. Rawlins, though be was born at Bloomington, Indiana, in 1874, represents some of the very earliest pioneer stock in Dallas county, Texas. His parents, both now living in Dallas, are William K. and Sarah (Anderson) Rawlins. The parents moved from Bloomington, Indiana, to Lancaster, in Dallas county, in 1879, Various members of the Rawlins family had lived Lancaster and vicinity since 1843, and were among the very first white people to locate in what is now Dallas county, then a territory included within the jurisdiction of Nacogdoches.

Some interesting genealogical and pioneer annals are connected with the Rawlins family name. James Mason Rawlins, from whom W. O. Rawlins is descended, came from England with two brothers, previous to the Revolutionary war. During that war he took the side of the mother country, while his brothers were colonial sympathizers. James Mason Rawlins was captured as a Tory, but managed to escape, and while returning to England is supposed to have perished at sea. His son, James Rawlins, moved to North Carolina, where William Rawlins, was born, and finally located in Illinois. William Rawlins, was born, and finally located in Illinois. William Rawlins, was the Younger of the family name in Texas, having located in this state in the early forties. He and the company of which he tearly forties. He and the company of which he tracts of land in the vicinity of Lancaster, and all bett materials of land in the vicinity of Lancaster, and all bett materials and the company of which he tracked in the family who attained wide prominence during his lifetime was Rev. John M. Rawlins, known far and wide in Dallas county as "Blacksmith John, the Minister," who was not only a pioneer and skilled blacksmith, but a man of deep religious convictions and a leader in all public matters.

William Osbin Rawlins was reared on the home farm near Laneaster, educated in country schools, and in 1891 when seventeen years of age, moved to Dullas, He learned the printer's trade in the office of Mr. L. Blaylock, publisher of the Texas Christian Advocate. For several years he was employed as a printer in the Advocate office and other offices at Dullas. Outside of his business Mr. Rawlins takes most interest in fraternal affairs in connection with the Masonic order, in which he enjoys a high standing. He is a thirty-second degree Mason and a member of the Dullas Consistory. Dullas Lodge honors him as a past master, and he holds the chair of King in the Royal Arch Chapter. He is a member of the Grand Lodge of the State and is District Deputy Grand Master for Dullas and vicinity. In April, 1914, he was elected a member of the Board of Education.

ALLEN D. Hooks. Of the officials who are upholding the governmental prestige and civic prosperity of Milam county none has shown greater discrimination and fidelity or commands a higher degree of popular confidence than the present sheriff, who has been a resident of Texas since his boyhood days and who is one of the loyal and progressive citizens of Cameron.

Allen Duncan Hooks, who was elected sheriff of Milam county in 1910, claims the state of Temessee as the place of his nativity. He was born at Saltillo, Hardin county, on the 13th of September, 1872, and thus was a lad of about ten years at the time of his parents' removal to Texas, in 1882. He is a son of James M. and Frances (Hall) Hooks, both natives of Temessee, where the former was born in the year 1824 and the latter, in Henderson county, in 1838. Upon coming to Texas the parents established their residence at Cameron, the judicial center of Milam county, and here the father devoted his attention to mercantile pursuits during the residue of this active business career. He was a galant soldier of the Corfederacy in the Civil later years he perpetuated the more removed and in later years he perpetuated the more gramma and in 1897, respected by all who knew him, his wife having passed to the life eternal in the preceding year. They are survived by fire children,—Charles, Isaac, Frank, Allen D., and James M.

Sheriff Hooks acquired his early education in the schools of his native state and after the family removal to Cameron, Texas, he here attended the public schools until he had attained to the age of fourteen years. He then became clerk in a grocery store, in which capacity he continued his service four years, and for the ensuing eight years he was salesman in a hardware establishment in Cameron. The following six years found him in active and efficient service as city marshal of Cameron, and he resigned this position to assume that of county sheriff, to which he was first elected in 1910. His administration was so satisfactory to the public that he was re-elected in 1912, and he is a candidate for a third term, in the election of the autumn of 1914. He is a popular member of the Texas Sheriffs' Association, is a stockholder of the Cameron Weekly Herald, his political allegiance is given unreservedly to the Democratic party, he is affiliated with the Knights of Pythias and the Pretorians, and both he and his wife hold membership in the Methodist Episcopal church, South. As city marshal and as sheriff Mr. Hooks has shown the greatest circumspection and tolerance, and he has never yet heen compelled to use weapons in making an arrest, as he has gained the good will of even malefactors, the while he has had the fullest confidence and esteem of the general public. His record as an officer is one of which he may well be proud.

On the 21st of September, 1992, Mr. Hooks wedded Miss Ida Hobbs, daughter of E. P. Hobbs, a well known business man of Temple, Bell county, and they have an adopted daughter, Lucile Hobbs.

JUDSON H. WOOD. A lawyer of Sherman, Texas. Was born on a farm in Rusk county, Texas, March 22, 1858. He was educated in the common schools of the country. At the age of eighteen he secured employment as a teacher, for the purpose of acquiring the necessary means to take a college course. He entered the law department of the University of Virginia in 1881, and graduated with the class of 1882 with the degree of B. L. He returned to his native county, and again taught school for a few months for the purpose of liquidating obligations incurred in completing his course at the university, In 1883 he begun the practice of law at Henderson, the county seat of Rusk county. From 1886 to 1890 he served as county judge of that county, refusing re-election for the purpose of changing his location. he removed to Sherman, where he has since resided. In 1894 he was appointed county judge of Grayson county to fill a vacancy, and was twice re-elected, voluntarily retiring from office in 1898. Since that time he has devoted his attention exclusively to the practice of law, refusing all official preferment. He is now a member of the firm of Wolfe, Wood & Haven, a firm composed of J. A. L. Wolfe and J. H. Wood, of Sherman, and James P. Haven, of Denison, with offices at Sherman and Denison. The firm does a general practice in the state and United States courts, and has a large and lucrative business, extending over the state of Texas and adjoining states. He has made a success of his profession and his ability is highly regarded by the lawyers and judges with whom he has come in contact. His name, as well as that of the firm, appears in the judicial reports of the country in many important cases.

On October 19, 1887, he married Miss Frances Jones, daughter of the late Colonel James H. Jones, of Henderson, Texas. They have two promising sons. The older, Judson H. Wood, Jr., was born January 21, 1891, and is now engaged with a wholesale groeery house at Tulsa, Oklahoma. The younger, James Ralph Wood, was born April 9, 1896, and is at present a student at the State University of Texas, preparing himself to enter the legal profession.

HERSHEL L. LACKEY. For more than sixty years a resident of Texas, and nearly half of this time identified with that section of west Texas about the present county seat town of Alpine, Mr. Lackey is in all respects a pioneer, and combines in his character and activities the best qualities of the old time Texan. He has known in his experience the life of ante-bellum days in this state and afterwards came west in time to participate in the full scope of the varied activities which have marked the development of western Texas.

There are probably none in Brewster county who do not know and esteem this splendid old citizen. Hershel

L. Lackey was born in Tennessee on February 2, 1842. His father was Robert Lackey, a native of Tennessee, who died when his son Hershel was two years old. The maiden name of the mother was Martha Keating, who moved to Mississippi when her Hershel was three years old, and then in 1850 came to Texas, where she spent the ond, and then in 1850 came to Texas, where she spent the remainder of her life. Her death occurred when she was eighty-eight years of age, and she was a very devout member of the Cumberland Presbyterian church,

Having resided in Texas since 1850 when he was eight years of age Hershel L. Lackey attained all his education by private schooling during the decade before the war. He left school at the beginning of the war in order to become a soldier in the Confederate ranks, and served from the beginning to the end of that great struggle. He was with the southern army in a number of the campaigns, on both sides of the Mississippi River and gave a good account of himself as a faithful and efficient soldier. When peace was declared and he again reached home he took up the work of the home farm, which he followed for eight years, and then engaged in the stock and cattle business for himself, an occupation which he has followed for forty years or more. He first came to Alpine in 1883, and now owns one of the largest and most profitable ranches in all this section, located about fifty-six miles from Alpine. In 1865 Mr. Lackey was married in Goliad county to Miss Annie Hord, daughter of Rev. Jesse Hord of Goliad county. Lackey and wife are members of the Methodist church, he is an influential worker in the Alpine Commercial Club, and is a Democratic voter, though in practical polities has never interested himself to any extent. During the many consecutive years of his attention to business he has built up a splendid success and is regarded as one of the most prosperous men in Brewster county. Of his diversions it will suffice to say that he is a lover of fine horses and has been all his life. He is also equally fond of good books and spends much of his later leisure in reading, and particularly along lines which broaden his viewpoints of the world's affairs. As to Texas Mr. Lackey is convinced from his individual experience that there is no finer place in the world and its opportunities are beyond computation. Mr. Lackey owns and lives in one of the most beautiful homes of Alpine.

WILLIAM F. McGAUGHY. In the development and improvement of west Texas Mr. McGaughy now a resident of Alpine, in Brewster county, has always supplied the important elements of individual enthusiasm and enterprise. He spent practically all his active career in different portions of West Texas, he has had unusual opportunities for judging the country and his loyalty to this section of the state is therefore grounds for confidence to newcomers in this region. Mr. McGaughy is head of a prospering real estate firm and live stock commission business at Alpine, where he has resided for several years and for a number of years was a county official in Nolan county.

William F. McGaughy was born in Moulton, Alabama, September 6, 1864, and when he was a small child his parents moved to west Tennessee, and when he was eight years of age they came to Texas in 1872 and he has been a resident in this state ever since. His early education was obtained in the public schools of Hood county, and he also studied for a time in that well remembered institution, the Add-Ran College at Thorp Springs. After leaving college at the age of twenty he moved into Brown county, and was in the cattle business for four years, after which he moved his stock out to Nolan county, which continued to be his home until 1909. Cattle ranching was his regular business in that vicinity, but official duties also occupied much of his time. In 1899 the commissioner court appointed him sheriff to serve out an unexpired term and after that he was elected to the office for three consecutive terms, finally refusing to accept any more nominations or elections to office. His deputy in his office was elected his successor. After long and active connection with busi-ness and industrial affairs at Sweetwater, Mr. Mc-Gaughy on March 1, 1909, sold out his interests in that vicinity and moved to Alpine, where he established his office in general real estate and live stock commission business. His operations include a large territory, about Alpine and his high standing and well known business integrity have commanded a generous prosperity.

In Nolan county on November 16, 1887, Mr. Mc-Gaughy married Miss Allie Robertson, a daughter of Dr. Robertson, formerly of Hood county, Texas. Her Dr. Robertson, formerly of Hood county, Iexas. Her father was born and reared in Texas, and Mrs. McGaughy was a schoolmate with her husband while growing up in Hood county. The two children of Mr. and Mrs. McGaughy are Iven W. who is in the stock business in Brewster county; and Felix P. a graduate of the Alpine high school. The family worship in the Christian church, and fraternally Mr. McGaughy is affiliated with the Woodmen of the World. He is also an active member of the Alpine Commercial Club, belonging to its executive committee. Throughout his active career in Texas he has been one of the leading Democrats in his county, and gives much interest to political matters. At the present time he is secretary of the Alpine school board, and has always interested himself in educational affairs, having been a member of the committee which erected one of the fine school buildings of Sweetwater. At the present time he is serving as a county commissioner of Brewster county, and in this office has paid particular attention to the good road movement in this vicinity.

The parents of Mr. McGaughy were Dr. John B. and Ellen McGaughy, the father being still alive and a resident at Stephensville. The mother, whose maiden name was Ellen Stephenson died in 1904 at the age of sixty-six. She was a devout member of the Presbyterian church. Dr. McGaughy is a native of Alabama, where he spent his boyhood and youth, studied medicine in west Tennessee, where he was engaged in the practice of his profession, until coming to Texas and from 1884 for many years was engaged in practice at Brownwood.

in Brown county.

Mr. McGaughy owns an automobile, but he still prefers the old horse as the most pleasurable means of getting over the country. He enjoys working among cattle, and is a real type of the west Texan, fond of outdoor life of all kinds, and at the same time taking pleasure in the artistic side of life, being fond of music, the theatre and of other diversions. He believes that nowhere in the country are there greater opportunities for legitimate business enterprise than in west Texas.

DR. JAMES C. DURRUM, long a resident of Clarksville and well known throughout this section of the state and well known intrologoust mis section of the state in his capacity of physician, was born at Jefferson, Texas, on September 6, 1860, and is the son of Dr. James C. Durrum, Sr., a native of North Carolina, born there in 1821, and a graduate in medicine from the old University of Kentucky.

The senior Dr. Durrum was a country doctor, the owner of slave property and productive farms, and he passed a rather uneventful life in the course of his professional career. He was a Southern sympathizer and though he did not participate in the active warfare, five of his sons participated in it, and two of them fell in battle. Dr. Durrum married Sarah McCraw and died in 1875, ten years prior to the death of his wife. Their children were as follows: Oscar, who was killed in the battle of Mansfield, Georgia; William, who served with the Army of Northern Virginia, and was presented with a medal by General Lee for the ladies of Riehmond, as the model private soldier of the South-ern army, was later engaged in farming in Marion county, and was accidentally killed in 1903, leaving three children; Samuel, is another of the soldier sons, passed his life quietly on the farm after the war, and died without issue; John Jacob was killed at the battle of Chickamauga; Silas, a farmer of Smithland, Texas, was another of the five soldiers; Robert died in young manhood; Mrs. T. H. Stalsup, of Jefferson, Texas, and James C., who was the youngest of the family.

James C. Durrum took up the study of medicine after he had possessed himself of a common school education in the country district where he was reared. His ambition for a profession did not make itself felt as a dominant factor until after he had reached his majority at home on the farm, but it was sufficiently strong to carry him forward to his entrance in the Kentucky School of Medicine at Louisville. He finished his course there in 1885 and established himself in Clarksville soon thereafter. During the course of his earlier practice Dr. Durrum absented himself in order to make possible further professional investigation and study, and he returned with a diploma from the New York Polyclinic in 1892. Since that time he has devoted himself to his practice and his farms, and he has gained a name as a physician as well as in his capacity of farmer

Dr. Durrum has been twice married. He married his first wife in Covington, Tennessee, in April, 1886, she being Miss Lizzie Menefee, who died in Clarksville, in 1901. They were the parents of two daughters, Mabel Gray, the wife of H. M. Lassister, of Clarksville, and Miss Edith, now a student in Newcomb college, New Orleans, Louisiana. In December, 1911, Dr. Durrum married Miss Lodiska Lattimer, a daughter of L. R. Lattimer of this city, whose wife was formerly Isabella, daughter of Col. DeMorse, founder and editor of the Clarksville Standard, the first paper published here and once a candidate for the office of Governor of the state.

JUDGE GEORGE MORRISON is the county judge of Red River county, and he was born while his father was located as a pioneer of the Republic of Texas, the year 1869 marking his advent into life. He is the son of James Morrison, who came to Texas in 1838 as a young man of thirty years and entered the ranging service of the Republic. With his command he covered the country engaged in Indian fighting and scouting along the Rio Grande, and he participated in many of the events that mark the bloody annals of Texas' history. He was born in New York City, in 1808, and as a youth he had ever been strongly attracted by the call of the sea. He spent many years upon the Atlantic, the Mediterranean sea, and other arms of that intercon-Meuterfanean see, and other arms of that intercon-tinental body of water, and he quit the life of a sailor as a Captain's mate at New Orleans, to become a "land-lubber" on the semi-arid plains of the Republic of Texas. With the passage of time, having stated his desire for experiences as a ranger, he returned to Louisiana for an indefinite stay, and was then lost to this section of the country for several years. Prior to his return to Louisiana, Mr. Morrison had loaned all his surplus eash to a friend in need in Texas, and when he returned, he was so fortunate as to be able to locate that individual, who acknowledged his obligation and offered Mr. Morrison land at one dollar an acre in payment of the entire debt. Mr. Morrison accepted the offer, and straightway settled on the land he had thus acquired. He later married Minerva Wood, whose father, John Wood, came to Texas from South Carolina, in which state Mrs. Morrison was born. Mr. Morrison lived quietly, comfortably and prosperously as a stock-farmer until his death in 1883. Few men in private life had more thrilling experiences than he, and in his reminiscent moments he was an excellent entertainer of a group of home folks or others, who always delighted in finding him in a humor that prompted him to live again the experiences of his earlier days in tales of adventure and conquest, both concerning his life upon the seas and upon the fields of Texas in the early days. He was a man unskilled in books, it is true, but he was wisen from observation and experience, and he knew hunger from observation and experience, and he knew hunger from observation and experience and he knew hunger from observation and experience to a large body I land in Red River county during his later years and when he died in 183 he was independent financially. He was a member of the Methodist church, and a consistent Christian life. James and Minerra (Wood) Morrison had three children, namely James; Gorge of this review, and Mrs. Maggie Hamilton, of Bogata, Texas, the first named being now deceased. Judge Morrison received a high school education in Paris and the Honey Grove schools, and when he quitted school held a first grade certificate to teach in the public schools. He taught in the country districts for a few terms and then entered politics in 1894 as a candidate for the office of District Clerk. He was elected and succeeded Judge Kennedy in the office, and for four years he served in that capacity. During that time he prepared himself for the practice of law, and in 1896 he was admitted to the bar of the state. He had scarcely established himself in practice before a vacancy occurred in the office he had but recently vacated, and he was appointed to fill out the unexpired term of R. B. Epperson. He was elected to succeed himself and resigned from the office in 1901 with the intention and resigned from the office of formation in the abstract and title business, in connection with his regular law practice, and he is still actively engaged in that work. In November, 1910, he was elected to the office of country judge, his re-eleche was elected to the office of comty judge, his re-elec-tion to the office following in November, 1912. All of his political activity has been within the ranks of the dominant party of Red River county, and beyond his own candidacy, he has had no connection with politics. In March, 1894, Judge Morrison was married to Miss Ida Work, a daughter of R. J. Work. She died in 1895 and in 1898 he married Miss Bessie Dean, a daughter of Mrs. Alexander Roger, of Camden, Arkansas. In the household of the judge is an adopted daughter, Marguerite, who completes the trio of their domestic life Masonry and Oddfellowship have appealed to the fraternal instincts of Judge Morrison, and he is connected with the Blue Lodge and Chapter of the former order.

A. RALPH NICHOLSON. Within the pages of this work will be found specific mention of a goodly percentage of the representative members of the bar of Hunt county, and to such consideration Mr. Nicholson is specially entitled. He is engaged in the successful practice of his profession in Greenville and his progressive actitude and civic loyalty are shown in his liberality in the support of the important project of the Greenville & Whiteright Northern Traction Company, of which corporation he is president and general manager, and in the financing of which he was the dominating figure. He is a young man of distinctive initiative and administrative ability and northeastern Texas, even as he is one of the most popular of his nature county.

Mr. Nicholson was born at Greenville, his present home, on the 4th of May, 1884, and is a son of the late John I. Nicholson, who was a resident of Greenville for more than half a century and who was one of the most honored and infinential citizens of Hunt county at the time of his death, which occurred in 1910. He was a representative of one of the sterling pioneer families of northern Texas and the major part of his active career was devoted to practice of law, in connection with which he attained to a large measure of success. His wife, whose maiden name was Ella Cushman, still maintains her home in Greenville, and of the children four sons and one daughter survive the honored father.

He whose name initiates this article gained his early educational discipline in the public schools of his native city. As an expert stenographer he held the position of court reporter of Hunt county for three years, and his experience in this line doubtless quickened his ambition to enter the legal profession. He studied law under effective private preceptorship and was admitted to the bar in 1904, since which time he has continued in the active and successful practice of his profession in Greenville.

The work of his profession has not absorbed the entire attention of Mr. Nicholson, as his progressive ideas and well directed ambition have prompted him to effective enterprise in connection with street and interurban electric railway promotion and construction. His courage in the face of obstacles has been undaunted and he has pressed forward to the accomplishment of large and important undertakings in this field of semi-public euterprise. He was one of the foremost in bringing about the installation of the present street railway system in Greenville, and he originated the plan of constructing the electric line between this city and Mineral Heights. a suburb of Greenville. He effected the construction of this line and the same was placed in operation in May, 1913-a valuable contribution to public utility service in Hunt county. The line is a part of the properties con-trolled by the Greenville & Whiteright Northern Traction Company, which was organized by Mr. Nicholson and which gained the required financial support through his efforts. He is president and general manager of the company, which is incorporated under the laws of the state, and the main line of the system extends from state, and the main line of the system extends from Greenville a distance of thirty miles, in a northwest direction, through Hunt and Collin counties. Its ter-minus in the latter county is in the village of Anna, where connection is made with the line of the Dallas and Sherman interurban line. The line of the Northern Traction Company was completed in the early part of the year 1913 and the system is one of inestimable benefit to the section of country which it traverses, as well as to the city of Greenville, in furthering the latter's precedence as an industrial and commercial center. The line passes through one of the most opulent agricultural districts of Texas, and its equipment in all particulars is of the best modern type, and the ears are operated by most improved type of motors. Great credit is due to Mr. Nicholson for his splendid achievement in this connection, especially in view of the fact that he undertook the great project with no previous experience in such work or in the obtaining of necessary capitalistic reinforcement. He has shown remarkable sagacity as a financier and executive, has boldly faced and surmounted seemingly insuperable obstacles, and, though not yet thirty years of age, he has made a record that would be creditable to a man of wide and mature experience in this field of enterprise. He gave his personal supervision to all details of progressive work, from the obtaining of the right of way, the raising of funds and the employing of contractors, to the buying of the equipment for the road. Further honor is due to him by reason of the circumstances that in achieving this noteworthy work he carried the road to completion without the issuing of an iota of watered stock or the placing of fictitious valuations. Every share of stock sold was placed at its par value, without commission to intermediate agents, and only a minimum bond issue was required. Cash was paid for the greater part of construction work and equipment, and thus the company has initiated its practical operations under the most favorable conditions. The road has been effective in increasing values of land throughout the sections it traverses and it affords to the residents of these districts most valuable facilities, as may well be understood.

Mr. Nicholson was married June 15, 1904, to Hattie ar nicholson

Castleberry, of Greenville, daughter of James W. Castleberry and Johanna Castleberry of this city. They have three children: Ethel Mac, Martha Virginia and Ralph Castleberry.

From the foregoing statements it may readily be understood that Mr. Nicholson is numbered among the most loyal and progressive young men of the county and state that have ever represented his home and of whose varied advantages and attractions he is deeply appreciative. In his personal popularity he sets at naught any application of the Scriptural aphorism that "a prophet is not without homer save in his own country," and he is not only an able lawyer but also a veritable "captain of industry" in northern Texas.

ROBERT C. GRAYES. Since the closing year of the Civil war Robert C. Graves has been a resident of Red River county, and of Clarksville since 1880. After twenty years spent as a cotton grower, he took his place in the county as a candidate for public office, and since 1881 he has held various offices in the administration of the business of the county. He served the public well in the years of his activity as an office the public well in the years of his activity as an office of the public will be a supported by the country interests and took up his abode in Clarksville, here devoting himself to surveying and the study of the subject in its more recent phases.

Born at Perryville, Tennessee, on September 4, 1845, Robert C. Graves is a son of Wiley Graves and his wife, Sarah (Graham) Graves. Wiley Graves left Tennessee, his native state in 1847, settling in Cass county, Texas, and there passed the remainder of his life. He was born at Perryville, Tennessee, in 1811, where he obtained what slight education he came to possess, and passed his life as a plain citizen of the rural type. He died in 1868. He manifested some skepticism toward orthodox Christianity in early and middle life, but later drifted away from Universalism toward the doctrine of immersion and other tenets of the Baptist faith prior to his death. He was the son of George Graves, who was born in Scotland, and who spent his later years in Tennessee. He had sons named Benjamin, John, Archibald, Hiram and Wiley. latter married Sarah Graham, as has been mentioned previously, she being the daughter of a Tennessee farmer of Irish birth. She was born in 1809 and died in 1875. To them were born four children. George W. died in Red River county, leaving a family; Sarah married W. H. H. Story and died in Franklin county, Texas; Tennessee became the wife of Medford Story and died in Red River county; and Robert C., the subject of this review, who is older than the sisters,

Robert C. Graves attended school in Linden, Texas, and finished his education after the war. He was enthusiastic in his support of the southern cause, and joined the army of the Confederate States of America in June, 1861, enlisting in the Lone Star Company, at Jefferson, Texas. Captain Cameron and his company served the first sixteen months of the war with the Ninth Kentucky Infantry under Col. Hunt, and was in Breckenridge's old brigade. For twelve mouths before the Ninth Kentucky was reorganized Mr. Graves commanded his company as orderly sergeant. When the reorganization took place at Tupelo, Tennessee, the "Lone Star" company was assigned to the Thirtysecond Texas commanded by Col. Andrews and placed in General Ector's brigade, Mr. Graves took part in the engagements at Shiloh, Murfreesboro, the first battle before Vicksburg, Hartsville, Baton Rouge, the Battle of Jackson, Mississippi, and at Chickamauga, where, on the 19th of September, 1863, a shot tore away his right arm, which was amputated on the battlefield at Chickamauga Springs; he was then sent to the hospital at Noonan, Georgia. His part of the war was over then, and the young man returned home and gave his attention to the strengthening of his unfinished education,

He was still under age when he came to Red River county, and here took up work as a school-teacher, or, it might be said, as a student, who by that means endeavored to gather up the loose ends of the neglected threads of a common school education. Whatever his object, he applied himself vigorously to the task in hand, and it may well be imagined that the future of the young soldier, mutilated in body and unfitted for the business of life by an insufficient school training, was anything but a bright one when he established him-self in the vicinity of Clarksville. Notwithstanding the discouraging elements with which he seemed to be environed, he still had within him the possibilities of success, for he had lost neither faith nor hope in himself. He had been schooled to the work of the farm in the days when the land was at peace, and when the alarm of war no longer sounded, he quite naturally turned his attention to farm life once more. So it was that he gave himself to the business of cotton growing in Red River county, and for practically twenty years continued prosperously in the work. Those years had been sufficient to establish him in the confidence of his fellows, and when he offered his services for the office of tax assessor of the county in 1881, his candidacy was favorably received and he was elected to the office. He filled the berth for four years and acquitted himself so creditably that he found himself well estab-lished in the good will of the people, so that when he aspired to further public service as tax collector of the county at the hands of the Democratic party, he was again elected, and he administered the affairs of the office for six years, when he relinquished all claims to further recognition in the realm of public service.

Unlike many a good man who has filled office and given admirable service, the fascination for it failed to absorb Mr. Graves so as to unfit him for further effective work on his farm, and he resumed his old place in the farming industry in 1891, continuing there until 1910, when he sold his place and took up his residence in Clarksville. Here he has found opportunity to apply the principles of surveying which had lain dormat within him almost entirely since the war, and to give expression in tangible form of the knowledge of land surveys and ownerships gained while he assessed and collected taxes in the country twenty gerars ago.

collected taxes in the county twenty years ago.
On February 14, 1867, Mr. Graves married Miss Amelia Fleming, a daughter of Perry Fleming, early settlers in Texas from the state of Georgia. The other Fleming children were Mrs. Mary Stone, now deceased; Thomas, of Red River county; Major, a sobriquet, but was never known by his Christian name, who died in the Confederate service; and James, who passed away in later years. The issue of Mr. and Mrs. Graves are: Morgan, who is cashier of the Red River National Bank, and who married Miss Hallie Dick; Clovis, who is a member of the Marable Hardware Company, of Clarksville, who married Miss Vada Sivly; Patrick, a merchant of Clarksville, who married Miss Jim Johnson; Stella, the wife of Elmo McClinton, a member of Marable Hardware Company, at Clarksville; Delia, who married Brit Dickson, who is in the grocery business at Clarksville; and Cleveland, who is Mrs. Ollie Doak, of Clarksville, Texas, and her husband is in the dry goods business, with The Doak Dry Goods Store. All the various members of this family have come to occupy, places of prominence in their various communities, and they constitute a group of which their parents may well be proud. Mr. and Mrs. Graves themselves take a high place in the best circles of Clarksville, where they are esteemed for their many splendid qualities of heart and mind by many who have known them through long years of intimacy.

W. D. WAKEER. Dalhart is not least among those centers of trade and population which typify the splendid prosperity of the Panhandle, and its developments in many ways to the efforts of one man, W. D. Wagner, He started out in life with no money and with no prospects, nothing but energy and a tremendous determination to succeed. For what he has done, and for what he is, he is now admired and respected and has a solid position in his community.

W. D. Wagner was born May 28, 1864, in Houston county, Texas, and is therefore a Texan by birth as well as by inclination. His parents were Francis Henry Wagner and Cynthia M. (Pritchard) Wagner. The former was born in Charleston, South Carolina, in 1820, · and grew up in that old aristocratic center of southern culture. When he came of age he became a large slave holder and planter in his native state, but seeing the opportunities in the new country in the southwest, came to Texas and settled in Houston county in 1857. In the struggle between the north and south he was one of the first to offer his services to the Confederate government and throughout the four long years of the war he took an active part. The privations and dangers of those years proved too much for him, and he returned to his home at the end of the war with his health impaired so seriously that he never fully recovered his strength. After freeing his slaves and selling his plantation in Houston county, he removed to Crockett and lived there until his death in 1878. He married Cynthia M. Pritchard. Without a murmur at the sacrifices which she had to make and the dangerous and lonely existence which she would have to live on the Texas frontier, this courageous young woman came with her husband to his new home in Texas, and proved herself of the same metal as her pioneer ancestors, who had helped their husbands build their log cabins east of the Alleghanies. She died in Crockett at the age of forty in 1870. Six children were born of this union, five boys and one girl, and of these W. D. Wagner was the fourth.

The education of Mr. Wagner was secured in the public and later in the private schools of Houston county. He was just six years old when his mother died and the death of his father left him an orphan at the age of fourteen. Two years later, in December, 1880, he set out to make his own way in the world. Reaching El Paso, with the courage and hope of youth, he applied for a position on the El Paso Times, then the leading newspaper of the southwest. Work was given him in the mailing department. Other positions came to him on that paper, each change being in the nature of a promotion, until after three years, having a thorough knowledge of many phases of newspaper work, he returned home. In Crockett he was in the newspaper business, and later established and conducted for several years a paper at Groveton. In January, 1890, Mr. Wagner moved to Hardeman county, and from that section in 1901 came to the Dalhart in search of better pasturage. There he took charge of the townsite of Dalhart, succeeded in getting people to buy lots and interested them in locating in Dalhart and the surrounding country. Since this start he has gone into the real estate business in earnest, making a study of conditions in various sections of the country, and visiting a number of farming communities in Iowa, Missouri, Kansas and other states, from which he has drawn of the hest to build up this section. He has not only brought farmers, but also business men, with money to invest. From the small beginning with which Mr. Wagner started, he has seen Dalhart grow to a town of almost metropolitan proportions. With two railroads intersecting at this point, and with the prosperous farming and cattle-raising country tributary to it, the town bids fair to become one of the large cities of Texas, when the country reaches its normal development. The two railroads, the Rock Island and the Fort Worth and Denver City, both have direct connections with all trans-continental and northern and southern lines. Dalhart also has the business that always centers in a county seat, for it holds that relation to Dallam county.

Mr. Wagner has naturally beld many important positions in Dalhart business life. He was one of the organizers of the County Fair Association at Dalhart, and was instrumental in securing the establishment of the government experimental farm located near Dalhart, He was elected mayor in 1906, serving until 1910, and during his administration great strides in the improving and modernizing of the city were taken. One of the best sever systems of the state was constructed, sidewalks and streets were made, and many other improvements were added. He was the universal choice was made to the construction of the construction of the Wagner is a member of the Bemevolet and Protective Order of Elks, and was the first exalted ruler of the lodge in Dalhart.

in Quitman, Texas, on November 12, 1866, Mr. Wagner married Mrs. Ida L. Setzer, a daughter of D. T. and Mary Lipscomb. Her father is now deceased, but her mother is still living with her son in Quitman at the age of eighty. Mr. and Mrs. Wagner have one child, Julia Wagner, born in 1898 in Quanah and who died at the age of three and a half vears at Kirksville.

Missouri, in 1902.

Though a man of accomplishment, Mr. Wagner is as unassuming and as lacking in conceit as the simplest farmer, of a genial and kindly disposition he is always ready to do a favor for any one, and the energy and perseverance with which he has built a town out of the wilderness make him a power for good in this section. He can probably number more sincere friends than some of those men whose names may so often be found on the front pages or in the political columns of the newspapers, for his friends are the kind that last through every success or failure.

JUDGE HARVIN W. MOORE. No kindlier or more benign spirit ever found place in mortal tenement than that which represented the noble personality of Judge Harvin W. Moore, who labored with all of zeal and devotion in aiding and uplifting his fellow men. He was a clergyman of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, and after retiring from regular pastoral work he continued to labor with utmost consecration and earnestness as a local preacher. He had a high sense of personal stewardship, was tolerant and kindly in his judgment, as he well understood the well-springs of human thought and motive, and though he was a man of high intellectual attainments and broad views he was entirely free from bigotry and selfish conceptions concerning his fellow men and his general relations with a workaday world. He endeared himself to all who came within the sphere of his gracious influence and when, at his home in the city of Crockett, Houston county, Texas, he was summoned to eternal life, on the 7th of February, 1912, there were thousands to mourn his loss with a deep sense of personal bereavement. Virile and independent, industrious and possessed of excellent business acumen, stern in his ideas of personal rectitude, and yet endowed with the rarest sweetness of soul, he was a man among men and the world was made better through his having lived.

Judge Moore was a scion of sturdy Scotch-Irish and Pennsylvania Dutch stock and a representative of a family that was early founded in the southern part of our great national domain, so that he was essentially a product of the fine old south, even as he ever exemplified the courly and gracious charm that typified the old regime. His paternal grandmother bore the maiden name of Jackson and was a representative of the same family that produced the gallant and honored Confederate officer and martyr, General "Stonewall" Jackson, Judge Moore was horn at Athens, the judicial center of Limestone county, Alabama, on the 2d of May, 1832, and was reared in a Christian home whose environment and associations were most refined and benignant, the while he was afforded excellent educational advantages, as gauged by the standards of the locality and period. At the early age of sixteen years he united with the Methodist Episcopal church, South, and his entire life thereafter was one of deep consecration to the faith which he professed and to good works.

At the age of seventeen years Judge Moore severed the ties that bound him to the parental home and set forth to make his own way in the world. For some time he was employed on a ferry-boat on the Mississippi river, and he continued to be identified with navigation interests on the "Father of Waters" for several years. In 1854 he came to Texas and made Burnet county his destination. A young man of excellent education, he there found ready demand for his services as a representative of the pedagogic profession, to which he devoted his attention for two years, as a successful and popular teacher in the pioneer schools. He also performed other duties demanding high mental equipment. In 1859, moved by an earnest desire to serve his fellowmen and forward the work in the harvest of the Divine Master, he entered the ministry of the Methodist Episcopal church, South, and he continued his active and fruitful labors as a pastor for nine years, within which he held charges in turn at Paris, Liberty, San Augustine, Palestine and Crockett, in which last mentioned city he continues to serve as a local preacher until the close of his life, his interposition being in demand in the hours of joy and sorrow—at baptisms, weddings and funerals, and also in temporarily supplying vacant pastorates.

With a mind of exceptional virility and rare powers of absorption and assimilation, Judge Moore showed the versatility of his genius by preparing himself, with characteristic thoroughness, for the legal profession. He studied under the able preceptorship of Judge L. W. Cooper, at that time one of the leading members of the Houston county bar, and later he married the daughter of his honored instructor. He was admitted to the bar in 1865 and soon gained secure prestige as one of the leading members of the bar of this section of the state, with great ability and resourcefulness as a trial lawyer. He continued in the active and successful practie of law for many years and a few years prior to his death he retired from his profession to give his attention to the supervision of his various real-estate and capitalistic interests, which represented the con-crete results of his earnest and honorable endeavors, While ever generous and charitable, he was thrifty and circumspect in business affairs, and he thus amassed an appreciable fortune in Texas lands and other properties. At the time of his death he owned several thousand acres of land, in Houston, Haskell, Robertson and other Texas counties, besides one of the largest and finest residence properties in Crockett, where he maintained his home until the close of his life,

At the time of the Civil war Judge Moore went to the front as an independent soldier, and he served as chaplain of his company in a Texas regiment of the Confederate service during virtually the entire period of the war, his command having been on duty principally in Texas and Arkansas. He was affiliated with the Masonic fraternity for many years prior to his demise, and, like all other close observers of the teachings of the time-honored fraternity, he believed that a good Mason must necessarily be a good Christian. He was well fortified in his opinions concerning matters of economic and governmental policy and was an efficient and zealous exponent of the principles of the Republican party, to which he ever gave unfaltering alle-

In 1867 was solemnized the marriage of Judge Moore to Miss Georgia Cooper, who was born in Georgia and who was a daughter of Judge L. W. Cooper. Her father came to Texas in an early day and was for many years a power in the courts of Houston and other counties of the eastern part of the state, besides which he attained to high reputation as a jurist. Of the five children of this union three are living.

LEROY L. MOORE, the fifth in order of birth of the five children of the honored subject of this memoir, was born in the fine old homestead in Crockett, on the 26th of November, 1884, and in his character and achievement as a representative young man of his native county, he has fully upheld the prestige of the name which he He availed himself fully of the advantages of the public schools of his native city and thereafter completed a three years' course in each of the following named institutions-Alexander Collegiate Institute, at Jacksonville, Texas; the Southwestern University, at Georgetown, this state, and the law department of the University of Texas, at Austin. He was graduated in each of these institutions and received his degrees of B. A. from the S. W. U. in 1907 and Bachelor of Laws from the state university in 1910. Upon his graduation in the law department he was honored by being elected to the position of quiz-master in that department, but the impaired health of his father necessitated his returning home after retaining this office one month. Since the death of his father he has given the major part of his time and attention to supervising the affairs of the large family estate and has also been identified with several private enterprises. His inten-tion is to enter actively upon the practice of law in the near future, and to fortify himself more fully for his chosen profession he will complete a post-graduate course in the law department of historic old Harvard University.

Like his father, Mr. Moore is a most zealous churchman and he is a valued and influential worker in the local parish of the Methodist Episcopal church, South. Besides being a member of the board of church connections he has entered upon his fourth term of service as superintendent of this Sunday school, in which de-partment of church activity he has accomplished a most fruitful work. He is an uncompromising adherent of the Democratic party and is identified with representative social organizations in his native city, where his circle of friends is coincident with that of his acquaintances and where he still permits his name to remain engrossed on the roster of eligible bachelors. His only sister, Mrs. Ruby DeCuir, is the wife of Mr. A. M. DeCuir, a prominent druggist and representative business man of Crockett; and his brother, Dr. Harvin C. Moore, is engaged in the practice of his profession in the city of Houston, as a specialist in the treatment of genito-urninary diseases, besides which he has the dis-tinction of being at the present time president of the Harris County Medical Society. Mr. L. L. Moore is a zealous member of the local chapter of I. O. O. F., No. 901, of Crockett, Texas.

Dr. Frank Charles Floeckinger, When Dr. Frank Charles Floeckinger came from his native Germany to America in 1896, he made his first location in Galveston, where he established himself in general practice and continued for four years. In 1900, however, he moved to Taylor, Texas, and here he has since continued to be professionally engaged, although he has withdrawn largely from general practice and confines himself almost exclusively to surgery and gynecology. In the years of his practice here he has become distinguished for his accomplishments which are of an especially praiseworthy nature and the profession has honored him in various ways. He conducts a ten-room private hospital or sanitarium in Taylor, which, though small, is excellently equipped and most modern in its appointments.

The doctor was born at Innsbruch, Austria, in 1870, and received his education in the excellent schools of his native land. Five years in the public schools were followed by eight years of rigorous training in the German lowed by eight years of rigorous training in the German Gymnasium, comparing creditably with our best high sehools, and when he had here prepared himself for higher studies he entered the Medical University of Innsbruch, later attending the University of Garaz and being graduated from the latter named place in 185, when he received his medical degree. He then became assistant surgeon for the Italian Lloyd Steamship Company at Trieste, and the following year came to America, locating at Galveston in 1896, as has been stated in a previous paragraph.

Dr. Floeckinger's advancement has been rapid and justified for he has given his best energies and talents to his work at all times. In 1903 he was appointed assistant surgeon of the Second Infantry, Texas National Guard, with the rank of First Lieutenant, and on June 24, 1904, was appointed to his present post of Captain and Assistant Surgeon, Medical Corps of the National Gnard of Texas. In 1909 Dr. Floeckinger represented San Antonio as a delegate to the Conference of Naval and Military Surgeons of the United States, before which body he read a brilliant paper on "Compound Fractures." He is a member of the County, State and American Medical Associations, and active in all three organizations.

Dr. Floeckinger married Miss Hilda von Roggen-bracke, who was born and reared at Comfort, Texas. Mrs. Floeckinger is a graduate nurse and in her position as matron of her husband's hospital conducts the training school for nurses at the hospital.

COL. ANDREW TODD MCKINNEY. The state of Texas has reason for grateful remembrance to the name of McKinney, which has been identified with pioneer educational work, the institution and promulgation of religion and morality, and with public life in many directions. Andrew Todd McKinney is the veteran representative of the family, and has lived at Huntsville, and claims that place as his home since 1850, with the exception of some nine years spent in Mississippi, and other brief intervals while he was away at college or away at war.

Andrew Todd McKinnev was born in Illinois, March 18, 1838. His grandfather Samuel McKinney was born in County Antrim, Ireland, and soon after his marriage to Margaret Findley came to the United States and to margaret Findley came to the United States and settled in Hawkins county, Tennessee, a state which also honored the name. There was a large family born to the grandparents. One of them was Judge McKinney of the Tennessee Supreme Court. Another was Dr. McKinney, a prominent physician of Tennessee, One of the daughters Elizabeth, married a Wilson, another married a Rafter, and still another married a Murphy. Grandfather McKinney came to the United States about the year 1800, and died in Rogersville, Tennessee.

Dr. Samuel McKinney, father of the Huntsville lawyer, was born in Hawkins county, Tennessee, in 1807, was educated in the University of Pennsylvania, where he graduated in 1832, and spent all his active career in educational and religious work. For a time he was a temporary resident as a missionary in the state of Illinois. His church was the Presbyteriau, and after being licensed to preach he went out west and did a great deal of missionizing along the frontier. In 1836 he was married in Illinois to Miss Nancy W. Todd, whose father, Dr. Andrew Todd came from Chester county, South Carolina, and practiced medicine at St. Louis until his death. Dr. Samuel McKinney will always have a prominent place in educational history in Texas as the founder of Austin College at Huntsville which institution was subsequently moved to Sherman. Dr. McKinnev did his last educational work in Huntsville at Austin College and died in that city in 1879. Along with his teaching he was active in the Presbyterian ministry, and had charge at one time of the Huntsville church, and did more or less pastoral work in outside churches. He took a decided stand in opposition to secret societies. His wife died September 10, 1878, leaving the following children: Andrew T.; Mrs. Margaret Davis, who died at San Augustine, Texas; Eleanor, who married Judge Benton Randolph of Huntsville, and died there; Mrs. Cornelia Smedes, a widow, living at Boulder, Colorado; and Dr. R. A. McKinney of LaGrange, Texas. Dr. Samuel McKinney after the death of his first wife married Mrs. E. L. Copes, who soon afterwards died.

Andrew Todd McKinney was twelve years old when his father came to Texas, and he grew up in this state, was educated in Austin College at Huntsville, and was was endanded in Adustin Contege at Infinity in the was subsequently sent east and graduated from Princeton University in 1858. His studies for the law were pursued at Knoxville, Tennessee, where he was under the supervision of Judge Robert J. McKinney, previously referred to. Mr. McKinney was admitted to the bar at Knoxville, and began practice at Huntsville, in January, 1866. Previously he had read law at New Orleans, had taught schools at Centerville, and assisted his father in educational work in Ascension Parish in Lousiana. During the war he served a short time with a Lousiana regiment. During his law practice at Huntsville, Col. McKinney was a member of the firm of McKinney & Hume, then Randolph & McKinney, McKinney & Leigh, and finally McKinney & Hill. He was one of the counsel in the famous Gaiza Eleven-League Grant litigation. That is one of the most famous land cases in Texas legal annals, and was in the courts for seven years. Colonel McKinney represented Mr. McMannus, the defendant in the case, and the McMannus contention was sustained.

Colonel McKinney comes of an old Democratic family and for many years was a factor in campaign work in Texas. He was a member of the Hogg-Clark car-shed convention at Houston in 1892, and one of the able sup-porters of Governor Hogg. His public career, began with his service in the constitutional convention of 1875. He was a member of the eighteenth, nineteenth, twenty-second and twenty-fourth, the twenty-ninth, thirtieth, thirty-first, and thirty-second legislatures. While in the legislature he was chairman of the International and Great Northern Investigating Company, one of the committee appointed to investigate the pentitentiary, a member of the committee of education in the eighteenth session, when a bill was passed for the partial endowment of the university, by a grant of one million acres of the public domain. For some time he was a memof the public domain. For some time he was a mem-ber of the hoard of regents of the University. He was president of the local board of directors of the Sam Houston Normal school before the merging of the various boards. Colonel McKinney in 1875 was Grand Master of the Texas Odd Fellows, and belongs to the several bodies of Masonry, having membership in the Ben Hur Temple of the Mystic Shrine at Austin. He is an active Presbyterian, and has served his church in various official capacities.

On September 6, 1882, Colonel McKinney married
Miss Mary L. Hill, a daughter of Col. John Hill of San Jacinto county a pioneer Texas family, coming here from Alabama. Mrs. McKinney died July 2, 1912. Their children are: Miss Mary Cornelia, Sanuel, John Hill, and Andrew T., Jr.

HON. WILLIAM OWEN MURRAY. Many years of conscientious public service have made the name of Senator William Owen Murray one of the most familiar in public life of Texas. Mr. Murray is now chairman of the state prison commission, having been appointed and taking office in September, 1913. This is an office involving the most taxing and onerous duties, and their performance in an intelligence and disinterested manner is one of the highest contributions which any citizen can render to his home state. Senator Murray succeeded Chairman Cabbell. Mr. Murray has been identified with public affairs in Texas for many years, and came to Huntsville from Floresville, Wilson county, where his home has been since October 20, 1880.

William Owen Murray was born in Morgan county, Missouri, October 22, 1857, and was two years of age when the family moved to Texas in 1859. He grew up in Wilson county, received a common school education and continued the traditions of the family as a farming class. He began his business career as a clerk in LaVernia in Wilson county, then entered the county elerk's office in Floresville, and after three years went into business as a merchant there and continued therein until 1907. In the meantime he had branched out and established a general mercantile house in Fairview, and another business in Runge, Carnes County, Texas. As his interests expanded he invested in farms, ranches and banks, and among other affairs is a stockholder and director in the First National Bank of Floresville, and president of the Floresville

Oil and Manufacturing Company.

However, it is with his political career that this sketch is most concerned, and his public service has been one of much eventfulness and prominence. Soon after acquiring the franchise, he became interested in practical politics, and the first state convention he attended enrolled bim as one of its youngest delegates. He helped to nominate Governors Sayres, Lanham, and Colquitt. His first official place was as alderman at Floresville, and in 1898 he represented his district in the Twenty-Sixth Legislature, and was vice chairman and then chairman of the appropriation committee of the house. He continued to sit in the lower house of the legislature during the twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, twenty-eight, twenty-ninth, and he was then elected to the senate and served in the thirtieth, thirty-first, thirtysecond, and thirty-third senates, until he resigned in August, 1913. His purpose in going to the legislature was to see that the school land legislation was properly enacted. He secured the passage of the Murray bill through the house in the twenty-eighth session, but the bill did not become a law until the twenty-ninth legislature. In the senate he represented the twenty-second district, embracing thirteen counties. His special work in the senate was to defeat iniquituous and trivial legislation, and he made a record in that capacity. served as chairman of the committee on land and land office and in many ways made himself a leader of Austin and as one of the ablest of the states' legislators. Senator Murray left the senate with the expectation of being entirely rid of politics, but consented to serve on the state prison commission solely from a conscientious sense of public duty and as a compliment to his friend Governor Colquitt.

Senator Murray is a son of Asa W. Murray. The father, who was born in 1832 in Wilmington, North Carolina, was the son of Owen Murray, a planter. The Murrays in South Carolina were of the slave-holding class, were of Scotch stock, and some of the colonial ancestors were identified with the famous Mecklenburg declaration of independence. Asa W. Murray began his career as a merchant in Morgan county, Missouri, and on moving to Texas engaged in farming in Wilson county. Later he went into the Confederate army as a private, and was in the Trans-Mississippi Department throughout the war, and escaped without wounds or capture. Following his return from the army he took up farming, and was elected and served as sheriff and collector of his county, and on leaving office established a furniture store at Floresville, where he spent the remaining years of his active life. Mr. Asa W. Murray married Miss Annie Mobley, a daughter of William Mobley, who was an early settler in Morgan county, and a Baptist minister. Mrs. Murray, who died in Floresville in 1890, had children as follows: Senator W. O.; James S., of Wilson county; Mrs. Annie Boehmer of Eagle Pass; Mrs. Sue Ezell of Floresville; Albert C. of Lordburg, New Mexico; Nettie, wife of O. A. McCracken of Floresville; Asa B., of Floresville.

The Murray family have always been identified with the Presbyterian church. Senator Murray is affiliated with the Lodge and Chapter of the Masonic Order and with the Knights of Pythias. He was married in Floresville, October 10, 1883, to Miss Ella Peacock, one of four daughters of Thomas and Salima (Steele) Peacock, who came from Shelby county, Tenuessee. The children of Senator Murray are: Mattie S., Ida May, William O., Jr., and DeWitt. Mattie and Ida May graduating from the University two and three years ago, Wm. O., Jr., graduates in June of this year and DeWitt will graduate June, 1915.

James Goree Ashford. For twenty-five years a merchant, banker, prominent business man and leader in public affairs, James Goree Ashford has probably been as closely identified with Huntsville and vicinity, as any other individual, and has been an important factor in commercial and civic life of that vicinity.

James Goree Ashford, who came to Huntsville as a young man from Grimes county, where he grew up, was born in Madison county, Texas, October 11, 1858. His father was Dr. James Goree Ashford, who died in Huntsville, during the sixties, and his wife, whose maiden name was Cornelia Spivey died about the same time. Dr. Ashford was a native of Alabama, and was a practicing physician until his death at a comparatively early age. He and his wife had only two children, and the daughter was Mollie, who died as Mrs. T. W.

Reeves, leaving no children.

James G. Ashford was reared by his grandmother Ashford, who was a Goree, and whose people were prominent in Texas affairs. His education was acquired in a country school in Grimes county, and his first independent experience was as a farmer in that same locality. caving the farm he found employment as a clerk in the postoffice and drug store at Courtney, in Grimes county, then went to Graball in Washington county, where he continued clerking and marked and shipped cotton for James Baldridge for several years. His next location was at Whitehall, in Grimes county, and he clerked for George E. White, one of the ablest merchauts in that locality and now a well known resident of Fort Worth. With this varied experience, Mr. Ashford came to Huntsville in 1888, and was employed by Cunningham & Ellis, who were the lessees of the state penitentiary. This firm employed him as outside store-keeper, and buyer for the prison. He was with that firm seven years, and when the state resumed control of the prison he continued in the same capacity for the state's financial agent, Hayward Brahan, and also under the second financial agent, W. G. Parish. He retired from this office to engage in the general merchandising business as one of the firm of Ball, Smither and Company. That was a partnership relation which was maintained for one year, and Mr. Ashford then started on a small seale in the furniture business on 12th Street. His business was conducted under his own name, and finally in 1896 he built his present store. The building had just been completed, at the time of a reunion of the surviving veterans of Hood's Brigade, and the new store was dedicated by being used for a ball given in honor of the old veterans.

Mr. Ashford has been prominent in many other affairs besides his individual mercantile business. He was one of the organizers of the Huntsville Electric Light & Ice Company of the Huntsville Canning Company, the Huntsville Telephone Company, the Huntsville Cotton Oil Mill Company, and helped organize and is president of the Huntsville State Bank. He is interested in agri-culture, owns several farms in Walker county, and is chairman of the good roads committee. He has taken much interest in the uphuilding of both county and city, and has done much building which has profited Huntsville, as well as himself. For the past ten years he has served as president of the school board of Huntsville, and during this time, a manual training school house has been huilt, and also a hall of music and a high school building, at a cost of fifteen thousand dollars. Mr. Ashford for ten years has served as county chairman of the Democratic party. He is one of the Democratic leaders, has served as mayor of Huntsville, and while in that office the city installed the system of water works now in operation. During his active career he has missed only a few state conventions. He was a delegate to the famous car-shed convention of 1892, and remained with the Hogg faction. He has also been a warm supporter of Senator Bailey, and it is his opinion that the state lost a fine statesman when Bailey weut out of public life. Mr. Ashford is affiliated with the Huntsville Masonic Lodge, has taken the Knights Templar degree, is a past master, past high priest and past eminent commander and was one time deputy district grandmaster of this district. He is a past chancellor of the Knights of Pythias, and a charter member of the Pythian Lodge at Huntsville.

Mr. Ashford was married at Cuero, Texas, in 1889 to Miss Ella Claire Woodworth, a daughter of J. C. and Nannie (North) Woodworth. Her father was at one time mayor of Cuero, held the office of postmaster under President Cleveland, and is now postmaster under Woodrow Wilson, was a Confederate soldier, but der Woodrow Wilson, was a Confederate Soldier, bli had brothers who were on the Union side. The family of Mr. Ashford and wife are: J. G., Jr., of Brazoria county; Mary, wife of A. M. Barton of Midway, Texas, a merchant, and private secretary of Governor Campbell, and subsequently financial agent at the penitentiary; Claire and Nan, who are both at home.

JOHN WESLEY ROBINETT. A resident of Huntsville since 1885, John Wesley Robinett has lived in Walker county since 1856. His father, David W. Robinett brought the family to Texas from Russell county, Alabama. A wheelwright and carpenter by trade, he spent the last ten years of his life as a farmer, and died on the Walker county farm in 1878. His birthplace was about twenty miles west of Richmond, Virginia, where he grew up, going to Georgia at the age of twenty-two and settling in Fluvanna county, and from there going to Alabama. He brought his family to Texas by rail as far as Montgomery, Alabama, where they took boats to Mobile and there embarked on Lake Pontchartrain steamer to New Orleans, and thence by ocean vessel to Galveston. At Galveston they again changed and took passage on the "Bettie Powell" up the Trinity as far as navigation, getting off at Liberty and continued and completed their journey of many experiences by wagon and stopped at the old Cabiness place near Hunts-

David W. Robinett had three brothers and a sister: Allen lived in Georgia; Granvil lived in Columbus, Georgia; William of Richmond, Virginia, was noted as a naval officer on one of the Confederate gun boats as a naval officer on one of the confederate gun noats during the war; and Margaret married a Mr. Williams of Virginia. David W. Robinett married Elizabeth (Clemmons, who was born in Alabama, and when she came to Texas had five children. Her death occurred in Huntsville in 1885. The children were: John W.; William, who died since the war, and saw service as a Confederate soldier with John W.; Victoria who married Chilton Rawles and lives at Graceland, Texas; Thomas died when eighteen years old; Andrew died in childhood; Katie married James H. Smith of Huntsville; Wiley Robinett, who was a child of David's first wife died in Huntsville, spent his life as a farmer and was also a Confederate soldier.

John Wesley Robinett was a boy of twelve years when the family came to Texas, and during his youth spent in the vicinity of Huntsville, he knew some old Texas independence veterans, including Sam Houston, Sam Calhoun, Captain Wright, and James Mason. He heard the last speech General Houston delivered from the hotel porch in Galveston at the beginning of the war, when he urged the necessity of Texas remaining with the Union, predicted the final overthrow of the South, and at the same time advising that Texans should remain loyal to their state whether it seceded or remained in the Union. At that time General Houston were the famous Leopard-skin vest, which is among the collection of his relics at Sam Houston Normal School.

Mr. Robinett himself entered the army in May, 1862, in Captain Dickey's Company at the Twentieth infantry under Colonel Elmore. The company was sent to Galveston and assisted in retaking that city from the Federals. Later it was at Sabine Pass, where Dick Dowling made his command famous by its remarkable exploits. pany H to which Mr. Robinett belonged was stationed at Fort Orange when the firing of cannons was heard at Sahine, and they embarked on the famous river steamhoat Florilda, and reached Sahine Pass in time to receive the prisoners from the Federal boats. Clifton and the Sachem, two big boats, and four harges laden with soldiers and four hundred and eighty prisoners were taken by the forty-two Irishmen in com-mand of the fort. That was an engagement which will always have a prominent place in the annals of the war. The prisoners were taken to Beaumont, thence to Houston, and marched through the country to Tyler, where they were confined in the stockade. After the battle at Sabine Pass, the company to which Mr. Robinett belonged returned to Louisiana, took part in the battle of Fordoshe and subsequently returned to Texas and was disbanded at Richmond, on June 8, 1865. At Galveston he received a flesh wound, and was once captured, but made his escape.

Following the war he returned to the quiet vocation of farming, but after a few years came to Huntsville and took up merchandising. His first stock was shoes, and with increasing business he expanded it to a general store. Mr. Robinett has continued in business at intervals ever since. At one time he went to Waco, and conducted a lumber yard there for eighteen months, when he sold at an advantage, and returned to Huntsville as the center of his merchandising. He has done his share towards the upbuilding and improving the town. He was the first man to lay a sidewalk in Huntsville. He built a business block, one of the best residences in the city, and other improvements have sprung up as a result of his capital and enterprise. Mr. Robinett has served as an alderman in Huntsville, is an active Demoerat, has served in county and state conventions, and was a delegate to the San Antonic convention; and nominated Governor Colquitt. Fraternally Mr. Robinett is a past master of the Masonic Lodge, has been twice to the Grand Lodge, and has taken the Royal Arch degrees. His church is the Christian.

His first wife was Amelia Drewry, a daughter of Sherman Drewry. She died in 1877, leaving three children two of whom grew up. Beulah, who married M. W. Consden, and died in San Autonio, leaving five children, and Sherman, who died unmarried at Huntsville. On October 20, 1881, at Huntsville, Mr. Robinett married Miss Annie H. Abernathy, a daughter of James Abernathy, who came to Texas from Pulaski, Tennessee; James Abernathy married Louisa Shelby, and both lived to an old age and died in Huntsville. The other Abernathy children were: James, of Huntsville. John, who died at Huntsville; Ida, wife of Jack Hampton of Huntsville.
