

THE BAPTISMAL REGISTER OR
FORT DUQUESNE,

(From June, 1754, to Dec., 1756.)

The spirit which animated the early French emigrants to this country, was one of zeal, exploration and traffic, rather than of colonization. Whether they were missionaries, spurred on by the love of souls, or explorers, incited by ambition, or traders, urged on by cupidity, they were ever penetrating more and more deeply into the western wilds. In their early incursions into the far west, they were obliged, owing to the presence of the dreaded Iroquois, who dwelt south of Lake Ontario, to make a circuitous route.

At first they were accustomed to ascend the St. Lawrence river to the mouth of the Ottawa, continuing up that stream, reaching the upper lakes by means of Lake Nippissing, French river and Georgian bay. Subsequently, when Fort Frontenac, or Cataracoui, was built at the eastern extremity of Lake Ontario, they were enabled to change their course, and, following the St. Lawrence to its source in that lake, pass, by means of the small lakes, rivers and bays that intervene, to the southern extremity of Georgian bay. Still later they went by lake Ontario, Erie, and Huron; and finally by the Allegheny and Ohio rivers.

As early as the winter of 1669-70, or in the spring of the latter year, Robert Chavelier de la Salle penetrated to the upper waters of the Allegheny river, and descending that stream and the Ohio river as far as the falls, where the city of Louisville Kentucky now stands, returned. He left only the merest reference to this trip in his writings.

With the discovery of the mouth of the Mississippi by La Salle in April, 1682, another motive was added to those of zeal, ambition and traffic. By means of the Mississippi river, they could facilitate commerce during the long season when the St. Lawrence was blocked with ice. The English naturally regarded the action of the French with an unfriendly eye, but it was perhaps more keenly felt by the Indian traders, whose code of laws was dictated by their power alone. The English explorers had been into the valley of the Ohio as early as 1654 but without effecting any permanent results. The first person to descend the Allegheny and Ohio rivers to take possession of this country for France was Celeron de Blainville. He came in command of 215 French and Canadian soldiers and 55 Indians to counteract the designs of the English. The principal officers under him were Contrecoeur, who afterwards built Fort Duquesne, Coulon de Villiers and Joncaire-Chabert. This group placed leaden plates at what is now Warren, Pa. at Conewango creek, at the confluence of the Ohio and Chautauqua, near the river Ohio, and continued depositing their leaden plates at various plates to the mouth of the Miami river (in Ohio).

A complete history of the French occupation in and around Fort Pitt and western Pennsylvania is contained in the preface to the work from which this article is taken, Rev. A.A. Lambing, A.M. The Baptismal Register of Fort Duquesne from June 1754 to Dec., 1756 1885; & especially in Donald H. Kent's The French Invasion of Western Pennsylvania 1753 (1954, 1981) Pa. Hist. & Mus. Comm. Harrisburg.

The French took possession of Ensign Ward's small Fort George which he had erected for Virginia (where Fort Pitt later stood) on the 16th of April in 1754. They immediately set about constructing Fort Duquesne. It was designed by M. le Chevalier de Mercier, a captain of the artillery. The fort was named in honor of the Marquis de Duquesne de Menneville, who succeeded the Marquis de Jonquiere as Governor-General of Canada in the summer of 1752. This new fort was located at the extreme end of the neck of land between the two rivers. It was probably completed in June of 1754.
