

Also sp. McIntosh, MacIntosh. John Mor Mackintosh, Jr., Gentleman, Chief of Darien, Ga., b. 1699 Kingussie, Scotland. The Clan came to America with Scottish Highlanders under direction of General Oglethorpe in 1736 to erect a fort south of Savannah, to fight Spanish. The family had recently suffered at the hands of the English in Jacobite Rebellion of 1715 during which Gen. William Mackintosh commanded an army of the Stuart Pretender to the throne of England. The Mackintosh estates confiscated, John Mor Mackintosh, Chiefton, sought refuge at the Altamaha River in Georgia, which he called "New Inverness", now Darien, after their homeland. Four years later, in 1740, just as he was about to return to Scotland to claim his title and estates as head of the Clan, Gen. Oglethorpe militarized an expedition of the Highlanders to go to St. Augustine, Fla. and fight the Spanish, during which he was taken prisoner and removed to Ft. Moosa where he was fed only bread and water. About 1741 he was released and returned home. In 1755 he was tax collector of Darien, and probably held other public offices, dying in 1762 at age of 63. He had a grandniece who married George Troup who had Governor George McIntosh Troup of Georgia and the family of Governor Charles J. MacDonald. Issue follows:

I. George McIntosh, b. 1715 Scotland m. Ann Houston [1723-10/22/1833], dau. of Priscilla and Sir Patrick Houstoun. Ann died at Cedar Point in McIntosh Co., aged 100 years. Her parents came to America with General Oglethorpe and she was born shortly thereafter at Darien, where Oglethorpe had a military post. She spent her life within ten miles of that place, never having left it but once, when she was expelled by the British. George McIntosh was educated, holding positions of honor and trust; surveyor in 1766 and appointed by General Assembly to lay out roads, and in 1768 surveyor for St. Andrew's Parish. The Legislature assigned him job of laying out town of Brunswick in 1771 which he called "Brunswick." In 1776 he was a Member of the Commons House Assembly, but became unpopular in political circles in 1777 when a proposal was made by Governor John Treutlen to unite South Carolina and Georgia. His contemporaries accused him of collaborating with the British during the war, i.e., brining 400 barrels of rice into St. John's River for enemy's use, ultimately resulting in his arrest on 1/8/1777, being placed in irons at Savannah Jail. His brother, Lachlan, angrily fought for his release, finally obtained at 20,000 pds. This incident prompted Lachlan into having a dual with Button Gwinnett, responsible for the arrest, during which they were both shot and wounded, however, Gwinnett having gangrene in his wounded leg, died 5/17/1777, three days after the dual. George's name appeared on Traitor's List published in Ga., and he died in 1779 during siege of Savannah by the British. His brother, Lachlan, desperately tried to recover his titles and estates, but all were confiscated by the British, his personal effects having been sent to his plantation at Sapelo Island by British. His brother, Lachlan, arrested by British during combat at Charleston in 1780, returned home later to find the effects and papers of George scattered about in unlocked trunks. Land grants and deeds had been placed in a small portmanteau trunk by George's wife, and these were the only valuable assets retained by the family.

He was sent to Charlestown by his father in 1748 to work in a counting house to help support his brothers, returning about ten years later to marry Miss Sarah Threadcraft. He was Major-General during the American Revolution, a delegate from St. Andrew's Parish to Provincial Congress assembled at Savannah 7/4/1775. When his brother, George, was arrested, a contest took place between Lachlan and Button Gwinnett, already brewing, Gwinnett already refusing to allow General Lachlan McIntosh to fight British forces in Florida, whereby the General called Gwinnett "a scoundrel and rascal". Gwinnett challenged the General to a duel, which took place in streets of Savannah, a short distance from the Governor's house. While trying to remove George McIntosh's personal effects from the British, Lachlan was suspended from the Continental Congress, and as he was returning to Charlestown in 1780, the city under seige, was captured and imprisoned. In 1784 he was restored to Continental Congress, but his reputation had suffered tremendously. The LWT of his wife, Sarah, dtd 1/21/1802. Issue:
