

Battle-fields Folder of the Western & Atlantic R. R.

This new publication has just been issued by the Western & Atlantic Railroad Co., and to say that it is superb, hardly does it justice. It is the most splendid piece of advertising matter in its line which has ever come under our eyes. The managing editor, during over twenty years of experience connected with railroads has never seen anything which is to be compared to it.

The title cover is brilliantly illuminated, and under the letters, "W. & A." is a very spirited engraving of the battle of Kennesaw Mountain. Below this, in medallion style, are portraits of Generals Johnston and Sherman, McPherson and Polk, around which the laurel impartially twines. The clasped hands at the bottom of the design shows that the war between brothers is over, and typifies the return of peace and good feeling.

The maps are the most superb which have ever been published of the Atlanta campaign, and show it in detail from Chattanooga to Atlanta inclusive. The portraits of Generals Sherman, Johnston and Cleburne, which appear in the book, are well executed, and are said to be very fine likenesses.

The text is, first, a resume of the army operations between Chattanooga have never before been put before the public in permanent form.

Among these we may mention the mending of the telegraph wire between Resaca and Dalton by Mrs. Bachman and her sister, Miss Carrie Sims. When McPherson made his famous movement through Snake Creek Gap against Resaca, a body of cavalry went to the Western & Atlantic Railroad, north of Resaca, and cut the telegraph wires, thus breaking communication between Resaca and Dalton. Mrs. Bachman and her sister saw this done, and when the cavalrymen were stampeded by the whistle of a train which was approaching on the Western & Atlantic Railroad, these two ladies went down, taking a piece of wire which they picked up near their gate, and fastened its two ends to the broken pieces of the main wire. Information was then flashed from Resaca to Dalton of the assault on Resaca and the temporary repulse of the Federals. The Confederate commander-in-chief sent down Hood's corps of three divisions under Generals Hindman, Cleburne and Walker. With these reinforcements the place was made impregnable against McPherson's further assaults, and probably saved Johnston's army from annihilation.

But it would require too much space

IN MEMORIAM.

General John A. Logan.

DIED, DEC. 26TH, 1886.

Prominent in the Atlanta Campaign, down the line of the Western & Atlantic Railroad, between Chattanooga and Atlanta, as a division commander of the Federal army in 1864; since prominent in the political records of the United States, holding high positions of honor and trust; always noted for fidelity to friends—he has ever maintained a reputation for ability and unswerving personal integrity.

No encomium which the KENNESAW GAZETTE could express can add to his well deserved fame; and with sincere sympathy for those whom he loved and who loved him, we will merely add May he rest in peace!

Battle-fields Folder of the Western & Atlantic R. R.

This new publication has just been issued by the Western & Atlantic Railroad Co., and to say that it is superb, hardly does it justice. It is the most splendid piece of advertising matter in its line which has ever come under our eyes. The managing editor, during over twenty years of experience connected with railroads has never seen anything which is to be compared to it.

The title cover is brilliantly illuminated, and under the letters, "W. & A." is a very spirited engraving of the battle of Kennesaw Mountain. Below this, in medallion style, are portraits of Generals Johnston and Sherman, McPherson and Polk, around which the laurel impartially twines. The clasped hands at the bottom of the design shows that the war between brothers is over, and typifies the return of peace and good feeling.

The maps are the most superb which have ever been published of the Atlanta campaign, and show it in detail from Chattanooga to Atlanta inclusive. The portraits of Generals Sherman, Johnston and Cleburne, which appear in the book, are well executed, and are said to be very fine likenesses.

The text is, first, a resume of the army operations between Chattanooga

have never before been put before the public in permanent form.

Among these we may mention the mending of the telegraph wire between Resaca and Dalton by Mrs. Bachman and her sister, Miss Carrie Sims. When McPherson made his famous movement through Snake Creek Gap against Resaca, a body of cavalry went to the Western & Atlantic Railroad, north of Resaca, and cut the telegraph wires, thus breaking communication between Resaca and Dalton. Mrs. Bachman and her sister saw this done, and when the cavalrymen were stampeded by the whistle of a train which was approaching on the Western & Atlantic Railroad, these two ladies went down, taking a piece of wire which they picked up near their gate, and fastened its two ends to the broken pieces of the main wire. Information was then flashed from Resaca to Dalton of the assault on Resaca and the temporary repulse of the Federals. The Confederate commander-in-chief sent down Hood's corps of three divisions under Generals Hindman, Cleburne and Walker. With these reinforcements the place was made impregnable against McPherson's further assaults, and probably saved Johnston's army from annihilation.

But it would require too much space

IN MEMORIAM.

General John A. Logan.

DIED, DEC. 26TH, 1886.

Prominent in the Atlanta Campaign, down the line of the Western & Atlantic Railroad, between Chattanooga and Atlanta, as a division commander of the Federal army in 1864; since, prominent in the political records of the United States, holding high positions of honor and trust; always noted for fidelity to friends—he has ever maintained a reputation for ability and unswerving personal integrity.

No encomium which the KENNESAW GAZETTE could express can add to his well deserved fame; and with sincere sympathy for those whom he loved and who loved him, we will merely add: May he rest in peace!