

FROM CHARLESTON.

An Afflicted Family—Kind and Sympathetic Neighbors.

Special Correspondence ATLANTA JOURNAL.

This community is sad and in deep sympathy with Mr. Jett and family who live near here. He lost another one of his children yesterday evening. His little daughter Emma, four years old, died after a spell of sickness, beginning first with measles and lasting eleven weeks. This is the second death in his family. Only a few weeks ago his daughter, Miss Ola Jett, died. She was a bright, sweet girl of fourteen summers. Now little Emma has gone to join her in the spirit land.

There is something remarkable in the case of this afflicted family. Mrs. Jett and eight children were taken down with measles about three months ago, and for the past eleven weeks Mr. Jett, with relatives and friends, have been required to remain by and nurse the sick day and night. It is seldom that a family has such a trial and affliction as this one, and in their great trouble they have the heart-felt sympathy of a large circle of friends. There is a little boy of three years that is still very sick. The rest are all about well.
