the war soldier in the First Maryland Cavalry. In the same company with me was a gentleman from California, whom you may call Copstone. I'd rather you wouldn't publish his real name. He was a splendid fellow, and before long we became very intimate, and gradually grew to be most devoted friends. He was the bravest of men, but at the same time unusually warm hearted and affectionate, and our affection for each other was something unusual among men.

—One day we were together in a pretty hot fight near Greenland Gap, Hardy county, Va., during Gen. Wm. E. Jones' raid, and, as we had no artillery with us, our regiment was dismounted and detailed to storm a church in which a body of the enemy had entrenched themselves. It was a nasty piece of work, and the prospects were dim of getting back alive. As we went at it Copeland turned to me and said: "Look here, old fellow, let's promise each other that if one of us is killed without a chance to say good bye, he will come back again to see the other, if such a thing is possible. I understood him and promised. We got off this time without much damage, but it was understood between us that the agreement was lasting.

"Not long after this we were separated. He was sent off with a detail for scouting work upon the Mississippi, and before he got back I was captured by Averill at Moorfield, after the Chambersburg raid. They sent me to Camp Chase, near Columbus, Ohio, and here I lay for a long time with some fifteen or twenty thousand other prisoners, hearing little or nothing of our men on the other side of the Potomac, and then only from the newspaper when they were brought into camp. Of Coppleton we heard nothing at all.

In Camp Chase we lived in six barracks, about three hundred men in a barrack. In the one in which I was, most of the men were Marylanders of our old command. We slept in bunks around the room and the room was heated by three big stoves. One night I was sitting by the stove nearest the door, thinking. It was late, and all the others were in their bunks asleep. I sat there one for some time, looking at the fire and lost in thought. Suddenly I felt impelled to look up, and there, just in front of me, on the other side of the stove, and between it and the door, stood a skeleton.

"Were you alarmed at all?"
"No. I was not alarmed, only greatly surprised. There was nothing to alarm. It was only Copleston, dressed in the same gray suit and black felt hat. I thought, of course, at the instant that somehow he had been captured and brought a prisoner to camp, and had only just learned where I was. I exclaimed,
'Copleston, when were you caught?' and tried to rise up to shake hands with him. I could not move."
"Copleston looked at me sadly
for a moment and then said:
'No, I was not brought here;

ALL this, sir, I assure you, was the first time I saw this visitor. As I pushed he said: 'Should there be any other occasion for to see you, I will come,' and disappeared, not going out the door, but simply fading a-impressed, but hardly after that I morning I told the men in mess of the circumstance, and was of course laughed at.

Three weeks afterwards fresh

"I will not be long," she said, after a moment's silence, "I ought to ask your consent for coming to you. I have been looking at every one in the car, and trying all the while to make up my mind. And, madame, I cannot find one to whom I dare speak but yourself. You look as if you would listen to me."

"I looked her full in the face, moved by the tone of deep feeling in her voice, and the unmistakable in the words she used. She was evidently sincere, and extremely plain in her language; if not asked, searching my face with anxious scrutiny. "Must I obey him? What was the best thing to do after receiving such a letter?" "What did your friends advise?" "They wanted me to stay with them."

"What was your first impulse?" "What did your own heart prompt you to do?" I said.

"To go to my home at once!" was her emphatic reply. "So I came away directly. I did not wait an hour to think of it; though they all said I should not come."

"And you did right?" I exclaimed.

"Did I? Oh, I am so glad, you think so!" and in her enthusiasm she seized my hand, pressing it closely in both hers. "But they reproached me, for coming after you, who were so far away. I did not care for me, and wanted to get rid of me. After I had come in the train, I began to think perhaps they were right, and my coming was not wanted; and after they had written to me to stay away from him, he might think me forward and indelicate in coming back directly. Do you think, madame, what I have done is all right?"

"So forward? Yes, yes!"

"Dear child!" I felt a self quite

"I don't want to," she said, "but I want that kind of help. I want advice. I want to know that I ought to do. O—how I am in great—in very great distress!"

"What is it, friend?" I asked, very well knowing my own eyes as I thought the same affliction had been visited us both.

"I mean—that is, if you will permit me," she continued, "that I am in distress because of my husband's conduct. My heart were aching with grief. I may have lost my best friend—my best—oh, forgive me, now I don't—I could be certain of it."

"She covered her face, and thrust

"I am sure you may be sure of success," he said, encouragingly.

"Five minutes," gasped a white girl, who had stopped at a station. After she had started again, she said: "I thank you, madame, so much! But for what you have said to me, I think I should have got off here, and taken the return train to my mother. I felt so afraid my husband would not welcome me."

"He is calling you said."

"In Rochester?"

"I am doubtful now what to do when I get there. I have an ant living in the cage. Had I not better go to her house and stop all night, or send word to my husband and wait for his answer? What would

"You advise me to do?"

"She was trembling; and her rapid changes of color showed a suppressed excitement. I considered a moment. Then I gave my advice, in consideration of her agitation, that she should go first to the house of her aunt.

"You will be rested in a short time," I added, "and can then decide for yourself what to do next. Do not send word to your husband; but if you are strong enough, go to him as such as you are rested. Go before you send

She made up her mind to this; and after a little further conversation inquired her name; and wrote it in my memorandum book, handing her my own card. I asked her to write to me, for I felt anxious to know the result.

We arrived at Rochester long before dusk; and, as we were going on, I made my husband assist the young stranger to alight, and parted from her with feelings of warm good will.

On the third day afterward, I received a letter from her. She stopped first at her aunt's house, but her impatience would not let

After tea, Sam walked to her husband's office in business. He had an office in the main yard, and she was seated at his desk waiting when the slight figure of his wife appeared in the doorway.

As he turned to see who it was, she sprang forward, flung her arms around his neck, and exclaimed, sobbing: "O George! I love you not glad to see me flow! Would you think I could stay a day from you?"

That was all the reproach she made, and it was sufficient. The husband was at his best for the moment for his pent-up jealousy and his cruel letter.

The young wife's letter to me expressed so much gratitude, that I have sometimes imagined she might have fallen into the hands of a proud or a "strong-minded" woman, who would have deemed it due to the dignity of her sex that she should obey to the letter the commands of her husband. He received, and she would have argued that a husband so well reasoned was not worth leaving, kindred or no. But the true wife's loving heart pointed out the simplest and the best way. I always took to myself some credit for my sensible counsel—the "word spoken in season."

"Visited by a Ghost."

"No, did you ever see a ghost?"

"No."

"Did you ever see any one who had seen a ghost?"

"I can't say that I ever did," the reporter replied.

Whereupon the gentleman said at in the person of one of the officers of the city government would be seen one who had once had a veritable interview with a spirit from the other world. The reporter visited the gentleman.

"Yes," he said to the reporter, "it is true, I did once see a ghost, or have an interview with a spirit. At least, I think, I may have been dreaming, but I know. But it was a most markable, a most inexplicable dream—what you might call a prophetic dream, that was fulfilled in every detail in a most extraordinary manner. And I don't think it was a dream. It was at the time of the war. I was on the Confederate side in
