have seen something of war but nothing, young men, comparable to what you will see. The desire for power is dominant over the higher emotions of patriotism and humanity. Political corruption is wide-spread and unscrupulous, and it only needs that you antagonize parties as to create the occasion for violence and the end will be all that good men fear; but, if you are to fight, gentlemen, it will be again the fight of the Roman soldiery who found in the destruction of each other the loss of liberty.

There was nothing wrong in the standard bearer of the "ring" negotiating for the support of Mr. Hargrove's leading republican of the district; but for Mrs. Felton to write a letter to a leading republican asking him to assist in the defeat of the ring-Holtzman movement, is unpardonable. There is nothing more disgraceful in the political history of once, than these bitter tirades against a talented and single lady.

Letter From Mrs. Felton.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 25, 1879. Editors Constitution—As you commented on the communication published in the Macon Telegraph and Messenger, which was a violent personal attack on Dr. Felton and myself, I demand a space in the same column for a reply. I was the sufferer from editorial malice during the late campaign, but the excuse of partisan policy will not suffice in this case. As you become a party to the attack, your gentlemanly honor will not refuse a defense. I had already written a letter to the Chronicle and Constitutionalist, which I expected them to publish, and it reached me to-day. A. W. Reese, under the direction of Senator Gordon (who made the first move in the attack), charged boldly that I "pleaded in piteously pathetic terms for radical money" to help my husband's election. I have the full, sufficient proof. I never asked for one dollar of radical money or any other money. No pecuniary aid in any shape or form was asked for the falsehood stands revealed; the evidence is complete.

Dr. Felton applied to Senator Ferry for my letter, which was handed to me to-day at the breakfast table, in the presence of Hon. E. Smith, Hon. M. A. Candler and ex-Senator Norwood. My husband asked me to read it aloud to which I did. You can refer to them if you desire to do so. Mr. Hubbard did not deliver it to me, but that there should be no cry of fraud. At my request, Mr. Stephens examined it carefully, line by line, and he says: "There is not one word to sustain the malicious allegation; not one word to contradict the statements in the Chronicle and Constitutionalist, which communication was written before Senator Ferry returned my letter. So ends the first chapter in this exposure."

A. W. Reese charges that my husband sent a messenger to Mr. Gordon "to induce him to deny its existence—to give it up or destroy it." This is as false as the story. Dr. Felton did not suppose Mr. Gordon had it in the first place. I was particularly anxious for its preservation and was determined to have it if possible.

If you desire it, I can send you a copy of Mr. Gordon's certificate, in which he states no money was sent to my husband or his friends—no money was offered, nor did any republican, independent or otherwise, ever furnish one dollar, at any time or to anybody, to assist in the election of an independent candidate in the seventh district.

I am inclined to think Mr. Reese has made a mistake, thus attacking General Toomer, Mr. Stephens, Dr. Felton, and myself in the same article. We were found in very good company, and he will not be misunderstood by the readers of these papers in Georgia, the motives being plain to all.

His last editorial has the following paragraph: "You can't always, sometimes, most generous, tell what is and is not in Washington. There are more lies to the square inch here than in any other portion of the habitable globe, and the number, variety and picturesque quality of their manufactures are calculated to make Satan turn green with envy."

Georgia, having furnished some statements of various professions, she has also furnished one magnificent senatorial blatherskite. Not to be left behind, she has furnished, also, one of the above class whose manufactures make the change in Satan's complexion. Whether the falsehoods perpetrated on Messrs. Toombs and Stephens including Dr. Felton and myself, are of the "pittoresque" character, or whether they belong to Mr. Reese's standard variety, I must leave you to decide. Very respectfully,

Mrs. W. H. FELTON.

OFFICE OF SECRETARY OF SENATE
WASHINGTON, Feb. 19, 1879.
Hon. W. H. Felton, M. C.

Sir—I am in receipt of yours of yesterday's date, asking me to state whether the Republican Executive Committee, of which I am secretary, furnished pecuniary aid to yourself or friends last fall, and whether that Committee assisted with money or the proffer of money the Independent movement in the 7th Georgia district last fall, or any time; and finally, whether I have any knowledge that Republicans in individually or as an organization furnished directly or indirectly pecuniary aid at any time or in place to further your election.

To all these inquiries I reply in the negative. I know of no pecuniary aid rendered you or in your behalf by any Republican, individually or collectively, at any time.

Very respectfully yours,
GEO. C. GORHAM.

If a man like Felton, whose Democracy has been tried thoroughly, does not submit to a convention called as the chair-man told Senator Hill, to defeat Felton, and Felton runs and is endorsed by the people three times, and not a few can be picked in his Congressional career as a Democrat, what can true Democracy find to object to? Independent Democrats like he are better democrats than his opponents, says the voters. So of other Independents. If they succeed they may be regarded as having been nominated by the people.—Constitutionalist.

One of the neatest things recently said in Washington, where neat things are neither said nor done as often as could be wished, was said by Secretary Evarts at a dinner the other night in reply to somebody who happened to be reading one of the republican jokers about the Secretary's endless sentences and gracefully repeated it. "Oh nonsense," said Mr. Evarts, good naturedly; "I don't object to that sort of thing at all. People who expect to improve by calling attention to my long sentences, forget that the only persons really opposed to long sentences in this country are the criminal classes who deserve them."—World.

It is clear from her note that Mrs. Felton believes the insinuation in A. W. R.'s letter that she wrote to Senator Ferry asking for Republican funds to help her husband in the congressional race emanated from Gen. Gordon. She fully explains this Ferry document. We have seen sufficient of her productions to know Mrs. F. is a lady of rare gifts and brilliant accomplishments. Her devotion and pluck of a true wife and is willing to battle for her husband when he is attacked through her. Her thrusts are those of the independent woman, who employs the same channel to vindicate herself and husband as was employed against them.—Eng-Sun.

An Englishman writes to the London Standard a mournful letter upon the invasion of the British markets by American manufacturers. He found in his travels that the American calicoes and cotton had superseded the same style of English goods on the continent. Coming home he found his iron-rough selling American spades, saws, chisels, hammers and axes, and dealers with stocks of American locks, bolts, stoves and lamps. American leather is sent to England to be made up into shoes.

English carriages are built out of materials which have crossed the Atlantic. States are now quarried in the United States to roof English homes. "My grocer, my butcher man and probably my dealer," says the writer, "deal largely in American goods of all kinds"; even the cigarettes which he smokes are made in Richmond, Va., and the pen with which he writes comes not from Birmingham, but from an American manufactory.

President White on Caesarism—A CASE IN POINT.

One of the most striking passages in President White's address at the Academy of Music on Saturday was that in which he referred to impending socialistic attacks upon order and the fabric of government. "How shall this be met," he said; "Think you that you can meet it by force? How by force, where all is decided by majorities? Will you meet it by denunciation? Hardly; two can play at that and while you have the disadvantage of property it is to be destroyed, your opponents have the advantage of torches with which to destroy it. Will you meet it by revolution? As Danton said, the revolution, like Saturn, destroys its own offspring. Will you meet it by Caesarism? The first thing that Caesar always does is to distribute bread and pageants to the mob, and rob you to pay for them."

Gen. Robert Toombs is the only man who can become Governor of Georgia by the unanimous voice of the people. Nothing more need be said.—Atlanta Independent.

A Pungent Letter.

The Augusta Chronicle and Constitutionalist, of Sunday, contains a letter from Mrs. Felton, wife of Hon. W. H. Felton, in reply to the insinuations of "A. W. R." the Washington correspondent of the Macon Telegraph and Messenger, that she had applied to the Republican Congressional Committee for funds during her husband's last campaign in the Seventh district. Mrs. Felton writes like a brave lady and deserves a vote from her husband and her countrymen. She writes with the confidence of a woman, and while we may not like her husband's independence, we cannot but admire her pluck and devotion as a wife. She handles "A. W. R." with gloves off, and makes some valuable remarks at Gen. Gordon, which we presume will bring the latter gentleman into the arena.—Sumpter Republican.

A spirit of extreme opposition has been aroused among Southern leaders at Washington and elsewhere against Windom's plan for colonizing a part of the West with freedmen. The whites do not want to lose the labor nor the representation that their present members secure.—Atlanta Republican.

The Black Death.

A private letter from St. Petersburg, dated January 27th says: "I have a sad story to tell. You have probably heard some reports about the epidemic now prevailing in Russia. It is a most fearful disease, brought here by the soldiers from the East. It has spread in the southern provinces of Russia with a rapidity. Thou sands upon thousands have died within the last five days. The victims when taken live on about two hours, and turn as black as all over, as a negro. All physicians ordered to the care of the sick have died within twenty-four hours after their arrival. The corpses are burned, and so are the houses in which the people die. Whole towns have been laid waste during the last few days. The government has placed a cordon of soldiers around the infected provinces, so that the people cannot get out and spread the disease. Any who attempt to leave and break through the cordon are shot dead on the spot."

The Springfield Republican is exhorting the reformers not to withdraw their hands from the reins. It says: "Against what element must actively take the field. It must criticize and educate. It must not only protest beforehand against bad nominations, but bolt them if they are made. It must develop a body of public sentiment that cannot be ignored or over-ruled in 1880. A year's effort to these ends will do much to the credit of our workers."

MISCELLANEOUS.

Haunted.

"I am sorry, sir, but all the rooms are taken."

"Was the landlord of the little house who spoke?"

"Yes, sir, all but one," he added, "that, I suppose, you would care to occupy."

"Why not?" replied I.

"Well, you see, it's haunted."

"The landlord, lowering his voice to a whisper, spoke on, and, besides being incredulous on the subject, engaged the room for a conversation."

"The attractive village of Marietta, Ga., is a great resort for those who wish to escape the heat of the world, and the cold of the winter. It is a beautiful place, and is well supplied with all the conveniences of a city. The water is pure and delicious, and the air is fresh and invigorating. The scenery is beautiful, and the climate is healthy. The people are friendly and hospitable, and the prices are reasonable. It is a place where you can enjoy the best of all worlds, and it is a place where you can find the most perfect of all homes."

"The gentleman was wrapped in a heavy cloak, and I could distinguish nothing but a pair of black eyes. I did not have time, however, to take a long drive, for he strode imperiously toward me, and demanded a room. The woman, I noticed, rather dreaded him, for I could see through the veil a pale, scared look upon her face. I assigned them the room you are to occupy and left them."

"In the morning the gentleman appeared, and without making any remark paid his bill and departed. I thought it rather strange that he should not have said something in his eyes told me not to address him about it."

"He had scarcely been gone an hour when the servant came hurrying down stairs, almost breathless with fear, and told me the biggest out with a torrent of words in which I could only distinguish 'murder!'"

"Who's murdered?" asked I. And then knew from her that the strange man was lying dead upon her bed."

"Entering the room I saw that it was indeed too true; there, stretched full across the bed, he lay, evidently struck with a heavy blunt instrument, lay the lady dead."

"She was buried the next day, and all that could be done to find her relatives or the strange man was in vain."

"Ever afterwards the servants were afraid to venture near it, because they say it is haunted by the strange lady."

"Thus closed my host's story, and as it was quite late I arose and requested to be shown to my room."

"Now," said the landlord, as he lighted my candle, "I can accommodate you with a bed upon the floor, if you desire it."

"No," said I, for I had too much pride to retreat; "I will take the room."

"Well, if you are found dead in the morning it will be no fault of mine."

"We had reached the door by this time, and bidding me good night my host departed."

"I opened the door and walked in. It was a low room, with the old-fashioned bed and rush-bottomed chairs, and through the window the moonlight cast weird shadows over the room, making it look so gloomy that I must confess that but for my pride I should have gone back; but there was no help for it, so I sat down for a while and smoked to drive away thoughts which would intrude themselves in spite of all that I could do."

"Finally closing the door, but not fastening it, for there was no lock, I thought to bed."

"Still, I could not sleep for some time. I tried all methods, but the drowsy nod till at last I was successful."

"How long I slept, I know not, but I suddenly found myself bowed awake, and there was a strange man in the room, almost invisible; a drift of air threw a cold chill over me, and I saw with astonishment that my chamber door was open."

"Staring with painful intensity, as if expecting something—for I could not turn my eyes away—I saw a white-robed figure glide softly along the floor. Directly toward the bed it came."

"A moment more and I felt a cold, icy touch on my hand, and, it seemed, a clutch upon my throat, slowly but surely strangling me. I had almost fainted when, with a sudden, quick effort, I made a desperate struggle and sprang from the bed."

"As I did so I felt myself grasped about the arms, and, in cold breath passed over my face, and I heard a low, hoarse voice, upon my ear, and the man, who I now saw to be the same, touched a small knob upon the wall above, which disclosed an aperture, and in it appeared a white-robed figure. At that moment more and I was alone, the sunlight was pouring into my chamber. I rubbed my eyes and tried to get together my scattered recollections; at last I succeeded, and, to my surprise, the man, who I now saw to be the same, presented himself at breakfast."

"Well, so you are alive after all," said the landlord, evidently astonished.

"Yes," said I. "Did not experience much trouble?"

"As I intended to stay at the inn two or three days, I determined to keep the room—to see the end of the whole matter. The second night passed as the first, and I resolved to investigate the aperture in the wall, if there was any, which I hardly believed."

"But feeling over the wall, what was my astonishment to see the same small door spring open, and disclose the box. To my surprise, the box was the work of an instant, and opening it I perceived the papers. They were of some valuable estate, and were quite old. They were drawn in favor of Ames of Marietta, Georgia."

"I said nothing to any one, but kept my own counsel."

"Casually speaking to my host I asked him if he knew of a place called Elmdale, or of any one called Ames."

"Oh, yes! that's another story of the village, in which old Ames' son was deprived of the estate on account of the loss of some necessary deed," he replied. "It was a deplorable case, for he was a noble, noble young man, and the estate is now in the hands of a villain!"

"If any man deserves hanging he does," he fiercely muttered. "Yes, the mean, base, scheming rascal! Pray pass my warmest regards to him; it is enough to set one crazy thinking about that young Ames slaving like a dog, while this villain lives in Ames' house!"

"These events caused me to prolong my stay, and I made up my mind to see the whole mystery entirely cleared. I took a walk over to Elmdale and could not help but admire its beautiful grounds and the extent of its domains."

"As I passed the entrance I perceived an elegantly dressed man sauntering up the wide path, carefully clipping the top of the grass with his law, He, I rightly guessed, was the proprietor."

"From the man's evil face and the evident delight with which he held his cane, I knew that the landlord had not misjudged him. He turned and beheld a young man in the attire of a laborer; that the proprietor had heard him also, and that he knew him—was evident, for he bowed with a mocking smile."

"The young man kept on without replying to the salutation, which, however, did not discourage the careless stranger, for he walked as leisurely as before, and disappeared within the house."

"These thoughts I went to the two contestants for the property."

"But," I said, mentally, looking toward the house, "I shall have something to do with it; your triumph shall not be long."

"I reached the house for supper, and sought my own room this time, however, with a determination to keep awake."

"When the figure appeared I kept my fears under strict control, and saw what had not used before in my terror, that the ghastly hand seemed rather like flesh and blood. It went through the man's arm, and, as I seized it, it was as cold as ice, and it slipped from my grasp, leaving in my hand a ring."

"The next morning I examined unobserved the hands of the maid who had spoken to me of my room on my arrival. I knew she was accustomed to wear a ring, and I saw it was gone. Afterward I found her looking quite anxiously about the different rooms."

"Have you lost anything?" I asked.

"Yes, sir, a ring," she replied. "Is this it?" at the same time taking the ring from my pocket. "Yes," she eagerly returned, and held out her hand for it.

"Stop a moment," said I. "Do you know Woodfell Ames?"

"Yes," said she, growing quite pale and scared looking. "Why every one knows him."

"I looked at her rather sternly, and telling her about my discovery, I managed to work upon her fear, and she confessed that she had stolen the deeds from Ames' library at the instigation of the proprietor, Woodfell Ames."

"She was a servant at Elmdale at the time, and being dazzled by a tempting bribe, had committed the deed. She was afterward charged on some ground, and came to the village of Marietta, where she had forgotten, and thinking so much about them, she must have got up in her sleep and gone to where she had laid them. I informed the landlord of my proceedings, and young Ames was soon installed in his proper place."

"The maid became afterward cured of sleep walking, and the chamber ceased to be 'haunted.' In regard to my host's tale, I am unable to say whether he was laboring under a delirium or not, but I know that the specter I saw was one of pure flesh and blood."
