Allen G. Thurman
OF OHIO.

John B. Gordon.

FOR CONGRESS 6th DISTRICT:

Five thousand people attended the barbecue of the Farmers Alliance, at Rockmart, last Saturday.

The State Pharmaceutical convention met in Atlanta last Tuesday. A number of Macon pharmacists attended.

Cardinal Manning, who will reach his eightieth birthday on Sunday next (July 15), rises regularly at 5 a. m. He loves to see the early morning sun from his chamber window.

Farmer Tatam, of Berrien county, made last year, on his one-mule farm, twenty five bales of short staple and one bale of long staple cotton. He certainly has a variety of cotton, that is not known in this county.

The following story, is rather tough on somebody: A man walked into a Macon bar and called for whiskey. A small glass and a decanter were set before him. He looked at the glass dubiously and said: "Is this the largest glass you've got? The bartender eyed him a moment and then asked: "You're from Jones ain't you?" "Yes, that's my home." "John," said the bartender calling to the porter, "give him that pint measure over there!"

Not far from St. Simon's is an island called Blackbeard. The name, it is said, originated from a pirate called Blackbeard, who long ago inhabited it with his crew of desperadoes. A long black beard flowing to his waist gave the pirate his name. When the government dispatched vessels laden with money to pay off the men sent to colonize the state, these lawless pirates would lie in wait and secure the treasure at any cost. Some years since a colored man was plowing on this island, when his plow-share turned out $4,000 in Spanish gold. A crafty white man told him it was too old to be good, and that he would give him $150 for it. The offer was accepted, and when it was beyond recall, the poor darkey found out that he had been swindled. Even now on the neighboring island Jacky the trees are often found notched and people suppose that these marks denoted the place where the treasure booty of the old pirate is buried. Blackbeard did not live to be very old. A vessel coming by was attacked by the pirate and his men, when the captain of the bested vessel fired upon him and killed him.

COVINGTON & MACON.

The Macon correspondent in the Atlanta Constitution says the following:

Never in the history of railroad building has one little line received half so much attention as has the Covington and Macon because all other roads have been built by corporations or companies, while this one has been carried through from beginning to end by one man, and a man, who, at the start, only had money enough available to survey the line and grade the first few miles. At first almost nine people out of ten were certain that the project would fail through, but today there are over ninety miles of track laid, the trains are running for seventy three miles, and the grading has been finished up to the very corporate limits of Athens.

And now that this is the end of this wonderful enterprise, the builder of the road, Col. E. C. Machen, is being loaded down with compliments every side. The latest is in the shape of five handsome flags, which the following letter will explain:

Boston, July 2, 1888—My Dear Machen—I am very glad to hear that your railroad enterprise is at last coming to be a working success. I suppose you will have an opening, which will be a sort of public festival for the road. Allow me to take a little part in it by sending you a few flags for the decoration of the train, and one to be hoisted upon your office on festival occasions. Accept them as a tribute to business enterprise and faithful endeavor. I am, very truly, your friend,

BEN F. BUTLER.

The flags are made by the United States Bunting company of Massachusetts, of which General Butler is president.

Just twenty-three years ago Gen. Butler was in command of the Crow's Nest battery on James river, which was one of the most enterprising posts held by the federals at that time. Col. Machen was in the Confederate iron clad, Richmond, pegging away at him for all he was worth.

To-day, Butler is presenting Machen with flags to decorate the regular train that is to run over one of the most wonderful roads in the south.

What changes time and business connections do bring about.
