MILLERGEVILLE, AUGUST 6, 1827 It has often been asserted, that the en-It has often been asserted, that the en-tire extinction of party spirit in democra-tic governmente, is as little to be desired as expected. The proposition may be true-or false, according to the sense in which it is received. The legitimute object of all political power is the public good; and if amonosing narties are immelled to action by pointed power is the public good; and if opposing parties are impelled to action by art qual degree of peritoising, and only differ concerning the best means, or the worthisst men to be employed for the promotion of the public weal, then the existence of such parties is not to be deplored. The collision of honest minds elicits truth; and when upright intentions provided, the remotiation of error follows conviction. But when a faction is organized, and controlled by unworthy men, who seek power only for personal advantage, and for the gratification of their bad assisting good citizens have ample occasions, good citizens have ample occasions, good citizens have ample occasions. lage, and for the gratification of their had passions, good citizens have ample occasion to dread, & cannot not ident if their duty to oppose, the progress of such a monser. This amonster, Faction, has 100 long infested our State—exciting unlingly feuds among her citizens, cudangesing some of her most important interests, and heaping degradation upon her character. But the time has at length arrived when the great majority of the community having discovered lite true character, look upon it with extreme disgust. They are tired of the foul streams of ribaldry, which are continuity pouring through extrain common-sewers of detraction—they are tired of the foul streams of ribaldry, which are continuity pouring through extrain common-sewers of detraction—they are tired of the cant of the self-spiled proples area, almost object in the—popyl-2 mong, they are determined to reject the kind guardinability which these generous people's men, would most cheerfully extend towards them in the self-cripted or of a successor to Governor Troup.
