the state of nature; it can only be made the public principles and are properly directed and their regulated. This is an influence the stretch of laws and punishment can be claimed only by religion. Education, it should, therefore, be the first object of those who wish to the national prosperity to support the principles of law and morality, and early to place them under the forming hand of so that by instruction, they may be to the love of virtue and good grounds upon which a state should for its own sons such facilities as to make it unnecessary to go beyond its own borders as admirably stated by the venerable Dr.

Lynch, when chancellor of the university, in these words:
"I deplore this as the last extreme of intellectual humiliation. The intellect of a people is essentially its own, and its first earthly interest is to keep it its own. If the greatest of Providential trusts is delegated by proxy to others, not a vestige of manhood will remain. It is important to educate our sons in our ideas, and still more in our associations of life, and in this view I pray you see to it that Georgia is not left an alien and a stranger on her own soil."
True and eloquent as these words are, they are but a later exposition of the same truth as it appeared to the minds of those who enacted the charter in 1788. The preamble declares (referring to the youth of the state):
"Seeing them abroad to other communities for their education will not answer these purposes, is too humiliating an acknowledgement of the ignorance or inferiority of our own, and will always be the cause of so great foreign attachments that upon principles of policy, it is inadvisable."
Another remarkable section of the charter is that which contemplates the unity of the system of state education—a comprehensive scheme intended to include the common schools, secondary schools, colleges and a great university. The opening phrase in the section now to be quoted recalls the original constitution of the board of management, which included the governor, the members of the senate and the trustees.
Section 12 reads:
"The scholastic academical, at their stated annual meetings, shall consult and advise."
