FAMILY NOTES

HUSBAND NOTES: Davis SMITH

General¹: Davis Smith of Laurens Co. removed to Monroe Co. about 1821. All of his children appear to have ended up on the plantation of Davis Smith.

The old plantation house, of which I have heard many stories from my grandmother, Mary Brent Chambliss Evans, was a large two-story frame house, with a hallway down the center. An old photograph, taken about the turn of the century, shows a slave, called Sarah Low, who refused to leave after the war, as well as family members.

Before 1900, members of the family moved off, some to Atlanta, in search of work, for the days of raising cotton were over. There was no labor. So every summer, Mary Brent (named for her grandmother's second husband, Thomas Young Brent) and her siblings visited the old plantation.

Actually, it was Thomas Young Brent who'd kept the place going after the war, maintaining a store and warehouse in the community of Brent (near Forsyth). My grandmother's mother, Lizzie, and grandmother, Jane, both attended Wesleyan Female College at Macon, studying music.

It was Davis Smith who took his wife, Elizabeth Dixon, to Charleston, S. C. to see Jenny Lynn, the famous Swedish soprano brought to America by Barham Bailey, sing. From that trip, they brought back the first piano to Monroe Co. Thus, Elizabeth taught her children music.

During the War Between the States, with Davis Smith's sons off to war, the family tried to hold together. When Sherman came through Atlanta, bearing his way southward, some yankee soldiers found the plantation. Davis Smith, fearing the consequences of discovery, climbed a tree in the front yard, hiding. However, as the yankees approached on horseback, they stopped under the tree where Davis was hiding. His gold pocket watch ticked loudly....and he was afraid they would hear it.

The homeplace was a typical Georgian plantation, having a cedar-lined walkway from the street to the house, and a yard swept clean.

Davis Smith made his Will dated 1868 in Monroe Co., but was incomplete, and not probated.
